286. LETTERS TO M. R. JAYAKAR

March 11, 1920

(i) By the courtesy of the postal authorities I am able to send you now the whole batch, i. e., up to 24. You will please note where I have made any addition in the second batch. I hope to send you a fairly big batch.

(ii) I send you some more today. Enough to satisfy me. The fact is I am now played out and I find that the revision work is most taxing. I have not had rest tonight.

I am anxious to make the work as thorough as I can.

(iii) I have carefully studied Mr. Das’s summary of evidence and the suggested addendum. I thought that he was going to put together the evidence of specific witnesses and enable me to study their statements. In any event, the summary before me leaves me not only unconvinced but a discussion along the lines suggested can only mar the Report which in my opinion is otherwise convincing. The points marshalled by Mr. Das appear to me like so many loose staples which will not hang together. I want them like bricks cohering and making a roadway for you to walk to your goal. Much as I would like to discuss the suggested theory as such in the Report, I cannot do it unless I have prima facie evidence.1

In arranging a discussion you please study the thing yourself and if you think otherwise I would have you to marshal the evidence on this point and discuss the theory. I would sign what you write provided that you go no further than Mr. Das has done. He has left it to us two. I do not want you to yield to my reasoning. What seems to me to be loose may appear coherent to you. I would gladly yield to you if you take a different view. I would conciliate Mr. Das if he can convince any one of us. If you consider the matter of sufficient importance for consultation, please come down for discussion. Will you please send this to Mr. Das with your remarks?

DEAR GURUDEO,

I have not been able before now to acknowledge your two telegrams, one addressed at Benares and redirected here and the other addressed here. We are all deeply grateful to you for your acceptance of the invitation2. Every effort is being made not to overload you with engagements or tamashas. Will you please let me know, if necessary by wire, how long you will be able to give to Gujarat and whether you could visit one or two important centres. The second question is regarding your residence. Will you put up at the Ashram? Nothing would delight me more than to have you at the Ashram. I am most anxious that you should, during your stay, understand what it

Gandhi violently differed from our view.” _The Story of My Life_”Memorial to J.Chamberlain”, 22-5-1896.

Apart from the Gujarati boys and girls and the Sindhi lad Girdhari, whom you may recall, Manindra is here still and Sarladevi’s son, Deepak, is also at the Ashram. It is situated about four miles from the centre of Ahmedabad and stands on a ridge on the bank of the Sabarmati.

You can, then, either stay at the Ashram or at a private bungalow in Ahmedabad with all the modern appointments. I need not say that your health and comfort are the primary consideration and your wishes will be faithfully carried out. Will you please also let me know any special arrangements or things you will desire?

Yours sincerely,

290. PRESS ACT AND HORNIMAN

The meeting\(^1\) held in Bombay for demanding repeal of the Press Act was an important one. Sir Narayan Chandavarkar\(^2\) was able to show that it was as much in the Government’s interest as in the public’s to repeal the Act. It is said of the ostrich that when it sees any danger, it buries its head in sand and imagines that there is no danger and gets caught in the end. Through the Press Act, the Government has put itself in the condition of the ostrich. If public feeling is against the Government, it can find expression only through the medium of newspapers. By suppressing the expression, one cannot change the feeling. To keep the Press Act alive is to behave like the meteorologist who, after smashing his barometer, would know the state of atmospheric pressure. By putting it on the statute-book, the Government has damaged the machine which indicates the direction and the state of the current of popular feeling, and consequently it can no longer keep itself informed about the exact state of public feeling. The only course for the Government, therefore, is \(^3\) to repeal the Press Act and it is the duty of the public to strive for its repeal.

462 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
Mr. Horniman, however, was a victim of the very same attitude which the Government displays in retaining the Press Act. It cannot tolerate a frank expression of public opinion and, therefore, it cannot tolerate Mr. Horniman who expressed it with such vigour. Very few men have shown Mr. Horniman’s capacity for educating public opinion or inspired the people with the same spirit as he did. Even assuming that Mr. Horniman did not possess any such gift, from the point of view of simple justice also no charge has been proved against him. People ought not to tolerate it, if despite this, the Government should arbitrarily keep him out. It is not true at all that those alone who agree with Mr. Horniman’s methods and ideas can work for the removal of the restrictions against him. We have plenty of grounds for differing with him. His language is sometimes harsher than it need be. Even so, we have not the slightest doubt that he should be as free as anyone else to enter India. Accordingly, we welcome the resolution passed at the foregoing meeting; not only this, we even believe that people should take effective steps to keep alive the agitation for his return and force the Bombay Government to cancel the orders against him.\(^1\) The third resolution passed at the meeting was to the effect that the securities obtained from any of the presses should be returned to them.\(^2\) We hope the Government will pay attention to all these three points.

291. LETTER TO ESTHER FAERING

THE ASHRAM,

March 14, 1920

MY DEAR CHILD.

Of course I will pray and I know I can do no better. Friends can help you little during the crisis you are passing through. May God protect you.

\(^1\) When moving the resolution, K. Natarajan referred to the proceedings in the House of Commons where the Secretary of State for India had stated that the return of Horniman to India was dependent entirely on the Government of Bombay.

\(^2\) The resolution, \textit{inter alia}, offered thanks to the Government of Bombay for cancelling the securities deposited under the Press Act by certain presses and newspapers and requested that similar action be taken in the remaining cases.

\(^3\) This and the ten letters which followed it were written to help Esther Faering during the days when the announcement of her betrothal to Dr. E. K. Menon brought a storm of criticism, much of it harsh and ungenerous, upon her head.
Once to every man and nation
Comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of Truth with Falsehood,
For the good or evil side.
Some great cause, God’s new Messiah, Offering each the bloom or blight,
Parts the goats upon the left hand
And the sheep upon the right
And the choice goes by for ever,

I hope to pick out something like this, if I can, every day, charged with my prayers. What I have sent you today is from Lowell.

295. KHILAFAT

The Leader of Allahabad and Young India have drifted apart. I entertain such sneaking regard for the former that I struggle hard to

1 This telegram was in reply to one from Girdhari Lal which read: “Kindly wire if Amritsar observe hartal and extent Hindus participation in resolution.”
2 On March 19, the Khilafat Day accept the view that may be put forth by The Leader. But in spite of the struggle of late I have invariably failed. The latest instance is the confusion into which The Leader has fallen over boycott and non-cooperation. I had thought that my meaning was clear and that there was no inconsistency. Boycott is a punishment and is conceived in a vindictive spirit. The idea of boycotting British goods is that although British goods may be better than, say, Japanese, I should not buy the former because I want to revenge myself upon the British people for a wrong done to me by British ministers, or for the utterly irresponsible and insolent language of some Englishmen regarding the Khilafat. I hold that boycott under such circumstances is a form of violence.

Non-co-operation stands on a different footing. If the Government do wrong I become a participator in its wrongdoing by co-operating with it and thus making it possible for them to do the wrong. It is my duty, not by way of punishment or by way of revenge but to the end that I may not make myself responsible for the wrongdoing, to withdraw my support off that Government. Indeed I should be justi-fied in bringing that Government to a standstill. It is clear to me, therefore, that non-co-operation is as different from boycott as an elephant from an ass.

The Leader also sees ill logic in my disapproval of violence and approval of hartal. I see none because I feel that hartal does not necessarily lead to violence. One cannot always avoid doing the right thing because there are risks to be run. The Leader’s difficulty arises perhaps from the belief that strong and definite action is not necessary and that it is possible for the Mohammedans of India to keep their peace even after an adverse decision\(^1\) by the Allied Powers. In my opinion the movement\(^2\) is bound to endorse violence unless a non-violent course of action is found that would lead to a just solution of the question. All strong action may bring about violence but we may not fear to do the right lest it may be misinterpreted and lead to wrong. All that is, humanly speaking, possible is to guard against mistakes and misunderstanding and with trust in God to go forward. I know that on the Khilafat question that course and that alone can avoid violence if, short of a proper solution of the question, anything is to avoid it at all. I therefore trust that Indians of all shades of opinion will join this movement. A firm and unanimous stand on the part of the Hindus will certainly put courage and hope into Mohammedan hearts. Any lukewarmness or indifference will lead to loss of hope and desperation.

Much the same is to be said about the objection to satyagraha. I still believe that for the moment I consider that I am alone capable of offering satyagraha in its fine form. But if that belief were to deter me from making experiments, satyagraha would never make headway. But here, there is the further fallacy of the ambiguous middle. Satyagraha in the form of civil resistance has possibilities of mischief. But hartal is no new weapon and hartal may or may not be satyagraha. Nor need non-co-operation be necessarily satyagraha. When the Hon’ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya resigned his membership on the Imperial Council1 or when Sir Rabindranath Tagore asked to be relieved of his distinction2 they did not do so as satyagrahis. Of course there is danger in widespread non-co-operation. But that is merely stating a truism. The one thing to be remembered is that for the Mohammedans the Khilafat is a question of life and death. It is essential for them to secure a proper solution. It is the sacred duty of the Hindus to give their all for the sake of their brothers so long as they work along the lines of non-violence. And I know no better way of keeping them on that path save by all Hindus, Christians, Parsees and Jews, who have made India their own, whole-heartedly supporting them and suggesting to them forcible methods of attaining redress without resort to violence.

CHI. MAGANLAL,

You may extend the time limit for the spinning-wheel if you wish to; but I think the reply you have given is all right. We will give the man something if his model is good. I think we are not using as much khadi in the Ashram as we should. Sarladevi also commented on this. I see no compelling reason why the women should have no garment of khadi on their bodies. Khadi may be dyed, if desired. Whether this is done or not, there seems nothing wrong in the girls wearing loose blouses made of khadi. The women, in any case,

Whether I die or live;
To love and serve Thee is my share,
And this Thy grace must give.
If life be long I will be glad
That I may long obey;
If short, yet why should I be sad
To soar to endless day?
Christ leads me through no darker rooms

300. LETTER TO V. S. SRINIVASA SASTRI

BOMBAY,

March 18, 1920

DEAR MR. SASTRI,

As I took an active part in the Congress affairs last year I have been asked to interest myself still more actively to the extent of joining an organization. The demand has come from those with whom I have had the privilege of working although I was not connected with their organization. They have asked me to join the All-India Home Rule League. I have told them that at my time of life and with views firmly formed on several matters I could only join an organization to affect its policy and not be affected by it. This does not mean that I would not keep or that I do not have an open mind to receive new light. I simply wish to emphasize the fact that any new light will have to be specially dazzling in order to entrance me. I placed before the friends the following points on which I hold decided views:

1. [The] highest honesty must be introduced in the political life of the country if we are to make our mark as a nation. This presupposes at the present moment a very firm and definite acceptance of the creed of Truth at any cost.

2. Swadeshi must be our immediate goal. The future aspirants after membership of the Council should be asked to pledge themselves to an out and out protection of the country’s industries—specially cloth manufacture.

3. Definite acceptance of Hindustani—a resultant of Hindi and Urdu—as a national language of intercourse in the immediate future. The would-be members will be therefore pledged so to work in the Imperial Council as to introduce Hindustani and in the Local Councils the respective vernaculars, at least as an optional medium for the time being till we are able to dispense with English for the conduct of national affairs. They will also be pledged to introduce Hindustani as a compulsory second language in our schools with Devanagari or Urdu as an optional script. English will be recognized as a language of Imperial intercourse, diplomacy and international commerce.

4. Acceptance of the principle of redistribution of provinces so far as possible on a linguistic basis at the earliest opportunity.

1 Copies of this letter were also addressed by Gandhiji to other friends, like Natesan, for private circulation.
2 Gandhiji presumably has in mind the Imperial Legislative Council, Delhi.
5. Hindu-Mohammedan unity in its essence and from a political and religious standpoint as an unalterable article of faith. This contemplates mutual help, mutual toleration and recognition of the sufferings of one section to be the sufferings of all. This will exclude, from the official programme of the League, the unity propaganda by means of inter-dining and intermarriage and will include vigorous co-operation on the Khilafat question. In my discussions amongst the friends I have also told them that I will not think of asking for official recognition of my creed of civil disobedience and that I do not belong to any party and would like to make the League a non-party organization helping all honest men if they are otherwise capable of doing justice to the service they may choose irrespective of party. The League, according to my opinion, cannot become an anti-Congress organization but it should work as it is now doing to further the interests of the Congress.

Do you advise me, knowing me as you do with my qualifications and limitations, to join the League?

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

301. LETTER TO MAZHARUL HAQUE

LABURNAM ROAD, GRAMDEVI BOMBAY,
March 18, 1920

DEAR SHRI HAQUE,

Because of my active participation in Congress work last year, I am being asked that I should take more interest and join this organization. This demand is from those people with whom I got the opportunity to work, though I had nothing to do with their organization. They say that I should join India Home Rule League. I have told them that at this stage of my life, when I have developed a firm viewpoint, I can join an organization only if I can influence their view

1 Gandhiji joined the League and accepted its presidency on April 28, 1920.
2 The letter has been translated from Hindi. The original letter was in English which is not available.
point rather than get influenced myself. It does not mean that I do not have an open mind to accept new ideas. I only want to emphasise the fact that a fresh idea, with some extraordinary relevance alone can impress me now. I want to place before my friends, my certain and firm views on the following subjects.

(1) If we want to build a better nation, the virtue of great honesty should constitute the polity of the country. Right now, we have to admit, we are not sure and certain in choosing the right path to adopt the principle of truth.

(2) Swadeshi should be our goal. It should be demanded from the members of the council that they take a pledge to save the cottage-industry, particularly the cloth-industry.

(3) Hindustani, i.e., a blend of Hindi and Urdu, should be accepted as the national language for future use. So, the future members of the councils will take a pledge that till the use of English is stopped in correspondence, etc., at the national level, Hindustani should be used in the Imperial Council and regional languages should be used in the Provincial Councils. They should resolve that Hindustani would be implemented as the compulsory co-language in middle schools with freedom to choose either the Devanagari or the Urdu script. English language will be accepted in the field of administrative matters, diplomacy, and international trade.

(4) Whenever a chance presents itself, the principle of re-division of provinces on the basis of language should be accepted.

(5) From the political and religious viewpoint, the quintessence of the Hindu-Muslim unity should be made an article of unfailing faith. In fact, this will be a viewpoint of mutual help, mutual tolerance and the feeling of mutual sharing of suffering by all. This will include the programme of co-operation on the question of Khilafat, leaving behind the propaganda of unity through the programmes of inter-caste marriage and inter-dining. During discussion with my friends, I also told them that I neither want the approval of my principle of civil-disobedience nor am I concerned with any party. But I would like to make the League a non-party organization which would help all honest persons. According to me, the League cannot be an anti-Congress organization but should work in the interest of the Congress as it is doing at Keeping in view my capabilities and my helplessness, do you suggest that I should join Home Rule League?

Yours,
M. K. GANDHI

302. LETTER TO ESTHER FAERING

BOMBAY,

Friday [March 19, 1920]

Oh I could go through all life’s troubles singing, Turning each night to day,
If self were not so fast around me, clinging
    To all I do or say.
My very thoughts are selfish, always building
    Mean castles in the air,
I use my love of others for a gilding
    To make myself look fair.
I fancy all the world engrossed with judging
    My merit or my blame.
Its warmest praise seems an ungracious grudging
    Of praise which I might claim.
Alas! no speed in life can snatch us wholly
    Out of self’s hateful sight,
And it keeps step, whene’er we travel slowly
    And sleeps with us at night.
O Lord that I could waste my life for others,
    With no ends of my own,
That I could pour myself into my brothers
    And live for them alone.

MY DEAR CHILD,

You have forgotten your promise. Do not keep me without any-thing from you for so many days. The above is my selection for the day.

303. SPEECH ON KHILAFAT, BOMBAY

March 19, 1920

It gives me the greatest pleasure to be able to move the only resolution of this great conference.

I beg to congratulate the organizers and the volunteers on the splendid success of the peaceful demonstration of today. We had many warnings given to us as to the consequences that were likely to follow from suspension of business. Bombay at least has, thanks to the effort of the Khilafat Committee, behaved nobly in the matter. The hartal was spontaneous and voluntary. No pressure whatever was used. It was a matter of great satisfaction to me to note that the Committee followed the advice tendered by me that mill-hands should not be called upon to participate in the hartal.

1 Made on the occasion of the Khilafat Day at a mass meeting consisting of about thirty thousand Muslims, Hindus and other citizens, presided over by Mia Mahomed Haji Jan Mahomed Chhotani

2 The next of the resolution read:

This meeting of Hindus, Muslims and other citizens of Bombay hereby enters its emphatic protest against the violent and irresponsible agitation going on in the United Kingdom calculated to wound the deepest susceptibilities of the Muslims and therefore the whole of India, and trusts that not only will His Majesty’s Ministers and other statesmen who desire the retention of India in the Empire as a free partner dissociate themselves from that agitation but will reassure the inhabitants of India of the fellow-feeling of the people of the United Kingdom by securing a settlement of the Khilafat question compatible with the just and religious sentiments of millions of the Muslim subjects of His Majesty.

This meeting further records its deep conviction that any other solution of the question must eventually result in complete withdrawal of co-operation from the Government and therefore appeals to all the statesmen of the Empire to prevent such a severe strain being put upon India’s loyalty.

This meeting at the same time wishes to place upon record the fact that, whatever joint steps it may be necessary to take in order to give effect to the just sentiments of Indians, there shall be no resort to violence whether in speech or deed and is firmly of opinion that any violence practised in connection with the movement will seriously injure it and cause irreparable harm.

In the event of the failure of the joint movement, the Muslims reserve to themselves the right of taking such steps as the exigencies of the situation might dictate.

That the President of this meeting be authorized to send a copy of this resolution to His Excellency the Viceroy with a request to convey the same to His Majesty the King Emperor. Amrita Bazar Patrika, 24-3-1920.
In these days of tension between employers and employees in the various industrial concerns of the country, we may not encourage labourers to absent themselves from work without the willing consent of the employers.

Our resolution divides itself into four parts. The first part consists of a protest and a prayer. It protests against violent and irresponsible agitation set up in England in connection with the Khilafat question, and appeals to the Ministers and other statesmen to dissociate themselves from this agitation and reassure us of the fellow-feeling of the people of the United Kingdom by securing an honourable settlement consistent with the just religious sentiments of the Mussulmans of India. The second part warns those concerned that an adverse solution is likely to eventuate in complete withdrawal of cooperation from the Government and will put an undue strain upon Indian loyalty, and if such a step unfortunately becomes a necessity there is likely to be excitement. The third part of the resolution warns the people in the most emphatic language against violence of speech or deed and gives it as the opinion of this great meeting that any exercise of violence is calculated to injure the sacred cause and to do irreparable harm. So far the resolution is a joint transaction between the Hindus, Mohammedans and others to whom this great land is their mother country or their adopted home.

And it commits the joint movement to a policy of non-violence in the course of the struggle. But Mohammedans have special Koranic obligations in which Hindus may or may not join. They, therefore, reserve to themselves the right, in the event of the failure of non-co-operation cum non-violence, in order to enforce justice, to resort to all such methods as may be enjoined by the Islamic scriptures. I venture heartily to associate myself with this resolution. I consider the resolution to be thoroughly respectful and moderate in tone. I see on the platform Shias and Sunnis, Hindus and Parsis, all joined together in a respectful demonstration. Complete closure of the great Hindu cloth market and Hindu business houses is an eloquent testimony of Hindu agreement with the Muslim demand. The unholy agitation set up in London has evoked an outburst of feeling in India which will never die until justice is done. It is a matter of painful surprise that even Lord Curzon, with all his knowledge and experience of India, should have allied himself with the ignorant agitation.

2 This presumably refers to the propaganda carried on in England against the Turks who were accused of crimes against humanity.

3 Gandhiji’s programme of non-co-operation was placed before the public for the first time at the Khilafat Conference held in Meerut on January 26, 1920. At the second Khilafat Conference held in Calcutta on February 29, 1920, Maulana Azad, in his presidential address, recommended this programme “for the acceptance of the Muslims”.

There is, however, a silver lining to the cloud that has gathered overhead. Mr. Montagu has been our uncompromising advocate. Mr. Lloyd George has at last reaffirmed his memorable declaration though in a somewhat halting form. I believe that the Government of India is pressing forward our claim with great firmness. The Anglo-Indian Press has not been hostile. The Times of India and the Bengal Chamber of Commerce have even warmly espoused our cause. The resolution invites all Englishmen to rally round the banner of Truth and vindicate British honour and the pledged word of the British Premier. I yield to no one in my loyalty to the British connection but I must refuse to buy that loyalty at the price of honour and at the sacrifice of the deeply seated religious sentiments of one section of my countrymen. A loyalty that sells its soul is worth nothing, and if in spite of acknowledged services of Indian soldiers, both Hindu and Mohammedan, during the late War, the promises made by British statesmen are broken, the reasons that evoke the loyalty of India will have ceased to exist. I do not lose hope, but if the hope is disappointed and the worst happens, God alone knows what will happen to this fair land of ours. We know this that there will be neither peace nor rest for the Government or the people until the wrong is righted and the feelings of eight crores of Mohammedans are respected.

I hope it is unnecessary to show why it is obligatory on Hindus to march side by side with their Mohammedan countrymen. So long as the means and the end are honourable, I can imagine no better cement for perpetually binding us both than our complete association with Mohammedans. But in a cause so sacred as this there can be, there should be, no violence either of speech or of deed. We must conquer not by hate but by love. I admit the difficulty of loving the un-just, but victory consists not in marching along a smooth surface but in conquering obstacles in a resolute and undaunted way. And in a just and sacred cause, firmness of purpose and unconquerable will are the least qualities required of us. Moreover violence can only damage this great cause. It may create a sensation but we shall never reach the goal through a series of sensations. The non-violence clause of the resolution, therefore, definitely recognizes the wisdom of self-restraint and enjoins upon all speakers to refrain from making wild or exaggerated speeches which can only lead to bloodshed, ruthless repression and humiliation of both the Government and the people. But the Mohammedans want to play a perfectly honourable game.

They wish to reserve or suppress nothing. Some of them have, therefore, insisted upon the insertion of a proviso to the resolution, meaning that if non-violence fails, they are at liberty to resort to the other methods enjoined upon them by the Koran and these are that when their religion is assailed, they should leave the country in which it is assailed or war against the assailant. And so the resolution undoubtedly foreshadows, in the most honourable and unmistakable manner, the stages through which this great movement will pass, the last stage being a bloody revolution. God forbid that this country should have to pass through such a revolution and all its horrors but the feeling on this Khilafat question runs so high and goes so deep that an unjust solution may, if peaceful means fail, land this country in a revolutionary movement the like of which we have not seen before, and if it comes responsibility will rest with Englishmen, the Hindus and the timid Mohammedans. If Englishmen will only recognize the existence of the deep feeling and the necessity of a just decision, all would be well. If the Hindus will understand the neighbourly duty and actively co-operate with the Mohammedans, they can, by united and perfectly peaceful effort, force a just solution. Timid Mohammedans by shedding their timidity at this critical moment of their history will also prevent bloodshed by letting the party of violence understand that there are no deserters of the flag of Islam. If, then, revolution is to be our lot, it will come through sheer despair.
staring honest, honourable, high-souled Mohammedans in the face and giving them a feeling of being neglected by Englishmen, Hindus and their co-religionists. I hope, therefore, that the whole of India will unite in a prayer to the Almighty and in a cry of justice that shall not be denied. I venture finally to hope that the Government will not anticipate revolution by thoughtless and angry repression. They will recognize that India is no longer an infant and that Indians have the same feelings that actuate Englishmen in similar circumstances.

L. FRENCH, ESQ.,
CHIEF SECRETARY TO THE PUNJAB GOVERNMENT
LAHORE

DEAR MR. FRENCH,

I hope you will please pardon me for not sending you the Sargodha statements earlier.¹ I had not brought them with me to Ahmedabad, and more were being taken by a local worker. And then, I have been travelling. I now send you a selection out of the numerous statements I have received. I shall hope to hear from you in due course. Will you please let me know whether the punitive police has been withdrawn?

Yours sincerely,

305. LETTER TO V. S. SRINIVASA SASTRI

March 20, 1920

DEAR FRIEND,

I hope you have read my proposal² about the observance of what may be called the Satyagraha Week from the 6th to the 13th April. I am hoping that during the week there will be no difficulty about collecting ten lacs of rupees. If there are volunteers of known respectability and unquestionable honesty we need have no receipts but simple collection from all and sundry. Monied men and women can go out and collect in the quarters best known to them. But it is not so much the manner as the matter which I wish to emphasize. I hope that there will be no difference of opinion as to the desirability of passing the week in the manner suggested by me or of having a memorial in connection with massacre\(^1\) of the 13th. In presenting the case to the people I would advise that the memory of the dead and not of the atrocity be treated as the impelling motive.

I trust that those who do not approve of the method of satyagraha will not on that account refrain from participating in the collection. This should be a truly national memorial.

But there is fasting and prayer too on which I myself lay even greater stress than on the memorial; for if there is universal fasting and prayer I know that money and whatever we want will rain down from heaven without further effort. I wish to give you my experience in this direction as a specialist \(\textit{par excellence}.\) I do not know any contemporary of mine who has reduced fasting and prayer to an exact science and who has reaped a harvest so abundant as I have. I wish that I could infect the nation with my experience and make it resort to fasting and prayer with intelligence, honesty and intensity. We would thus, incredible as it may appear, do millions of things pertaining to the nation without elaborate organization and checks upon checks, but I know that fasting and prayer, to be as effective as I have found them to be in my own experience, have to be not mechanical things but definite spiritual acts. Fasting then is crucifixion of the flesh with a corresponding freedom of the spirit and prayer is a definite conscious longing of the soul to be utterly pure—the purity thus attained being dedicated to the realization of a particular object which is in itself pure. I hope therefore that if you believe in the ancient institution of fasting and prayer you will dedicate the 6th and the 13th to the purpose and induce your neighbours to do likewise.

Then there remain the three meetings\(^2\) which I doubt not you will organize and make them a thorough success.

\textit{Yours sincerely,}

307. LETTER TO MAZHARUL HAQUE

March 20, 1920

DEAR FRIEND,

I hope you have read my proposal to observe ‘Satyagraha Week’ from April 6 to April 13. I hope that there will be no problem in collecting Rs. 10 lakh during the week. If we have honest and trustworthy volunteers, then there is no need of any receipt book. We can take the subscription from the public. Rich men and their wives can collect money from their acquaintances. But I want to put more emphasis on the subject than on the method of working. I hope there will be no difference of opinion about how to celebrate the week which I have already explained, or about the position on erecting a memorial in connection with the massacre of April 13. While putting my arguments before the public, I will advice them to work not with the feeling of revenge but with inspiration drawn from the memory of martyrs.

I believe that those who do not accept the principle of Satyagraha will not, for that reason alone, keep themselves away from the act of collecting subscriptions. In fact, it should be a real national memorial.

However, I lay greater stress on fasting and prayer than on memorial, because I know that wherever collective fasting and prayer is held, we will get in abundance the money or whatever we want even without any effort. I as a specialist, want to tell you my experiences in this particular field. I do not think that I have any such contemporary who has made fasting and prayer a science and has been a beneficiary of it like me. I wish to make the country a beneficiary of my experience and with wisdom and sincerity, want to take it on the path of fasting and prayer. Thus we can accomplish hundreds of thousands of jobs without having any big organization or a controlling agency. But I know from my experience that fasting and prayer are not mere ceremonial or mechanical things but spiritual acts. Fast drives out the physical and is closely attached to liberation of the soul and prayer is the conscious effort of the process of purification of soul. The purity thus gained can be utilized to accomplish a pure end. Therefore, I hope that if you believe in the ancient method of fasting and prayer, you will definitely come forward on April 6 and 13 and encourage your neighbours also to accompany you. Then remains the programme of the three meetings which you will undoubtedly organize with success.

Yours,

M. K. GANDHI

308. KHILAFAT

The Khilafat issue is a splendid opportunity as much as a grave problem. It is the latter because on it hangs the future peace of eight crores of Muslims and therefore of the whole of India. It is a splendid opportunity because, if the Muslims use wisdom in solving the problem, their moral power will increase and India will come to enjoy a moral empire; Hindu-Muslim unity will increase, both Hindus and Muslims will grow stronger, their moral level will rise and the English will stop looking down upon us as an inferior race. Friendship is possible only between equals. The English do not regard us as their equals; even we consider ourselves as their inferiors. And, therefore, we, Hindus and Muslims, should solve this problem and ensure that the three become equals.

The sword makes men equal. After fighting with one another like so many bulls, till they all get exhausted, the opponents salute each other and become friends. Anyone who shows weakness will humiliate himself. The other method is, instead of using physical force against the opponent, to employ soul-force and win ascendancy over him. This ascendancy is accepted not out of fear but out of love, and so both become equals. One does not consider it humiliating to admit another’s moral superiority. The other takes no pride in being morally superior. Hence both behave respectfully towards each other. We must give up the very thought of overcoming the English by the sword.

I do not want to argue that it would be impossible for us to employ such force; only, in order to use it we shall have to resort to hypocrisy, falsehood, treachery and so on, and even for employing these we shall have to acquire various other unprofitable abilities. We shall have to put forward all our strength against them and fight on till both of us are out of breath. They will not, naturally, let matters go so far; that is human nature. Even in ancient times the arts of fighting were guarded secrets. A proud man does not easily part with the means of gratifying his pride. Strength of arms necessarily carries pride with it. Therefore, if we wish to be the equals of our enemies through force of arms, we shall have to press on till the point of their defeat and, at the end of it all, we shall for ever remain enemies. Can the Khilafat problem be solved in this way?

Leaving aside the question whether or not it is right to fight, if we think merely of the result, we shall see that military strength will never solve the problem. The fight for the Khilafat is not solely against the English; it is a fight between Christians and Muslims.¹ The Christians are very well united and well-versed in the art of war; the Muslims are not equipped, the Muslims of India evidently are not, today at any rate, to try their strength against them; and the Hindus cannot stand shoulder to shoulder with the latter in a trial of strength. Under these circumstances, it is well-nigh impossible, from a practical point of view, for the Muslims to seek a settlement of the Khilafat issue by force.

One who tries his strength in fighting cannot say: ‘God’s will be done.’ He alone can say this who believes in fighting with moral force, for in such a contest defeat is out of the question. He who employs pure means may put his trust in fate, but he who uses impure means has no right to do so. The man who knowingly jumps into a well, blaming God as he does so, will instantly receive his punishment; he will die an untimely death. If a man, drinking to the last drop in the bottle, prattles, ‘If it be God’s will that I should get drunk, be it so,’ the world will laugh at him. In moral experiments, we may maintain unswerving faith in God, because we know that the outcome of such an experiment is always happy. The military man trusts to his weapons as the alcoholic trusts to the property of his drink to produce intoxication and, when the weapons break, he is like wax.

If, however, Hindus and Muslims equip themselves with the divine weapon of satyagraha, victory is certain. If they both refuse to be a party to the injustice being done by the Christians, who on earth can defeat them? If Muslims refuse to be a party to any injustice perpetrated on them, it is God’s promise to them that they will never be defeated; this is why I have said that it is our right and our duty to refuse to help the British in their unjust acts. It is only by discharging this duty that the Muslims can defend their religion against the present attack on it.

Let us now examine the views expressed by the British Labour Party on the Khilafat issue. We summarize them elsewhere.¹ This party declares that the Islamic Empire² must be split up, that the Muslims themselves demand this. How can Indian Muslims oppose it? If the Arabs do not want to remain with the Ottomans,³ should they be kept with them by force? As a satyagrahi, I can answer this question straightaway. I do not wish to deprive the Arabs of their freedom; let them be free, but let them recognize the suzerainty of the Khalifa and let the holy places remain under the control of the Khalifa. I need not fight if this is not done, but I would not co-operate either to bring about the opposite result. This injustice cannot be perpetrated without my co-operation. If every Hindu and every Muslim resigns from the service of the Government, what will be the result? The British will either have to leave India or respect our wishes. And so in my view all that is necessary is to have patience and wait for public opinion to be educated along the right lines. Will Muslims use the present awakening to good purpose or ill? They will prove themselves their own friends or foes. May God give them wisdom and may they maintain conditions in which Hindus can go all out to help them.

309. LETTER TO ESTHER FAERING

Sunday, March 21, 1920

I say to thee, do thou repeat
To the first man thou mayest meet
In lane, highway or open street—
That he and we and all men move
Under a canopy of love,
As broad as the blue sky above;
That doubt and trouble, fear and pain,
And anguish all are shadows vain.
That death itself shall not remain,
That weary deserts we may tread,
A dreary labyrinth may thread,
Through dark ways under ground be led,
Yet, if we all one Guide obey,
The dreariest path, the darkest way
Shall issue out in heavenly day;
And we on diverse shores now cast,
Shall meet, our perilous voyage past,
All in our Father’s house at last.

He that is low, no pride,
He that is humble ever shall have

I am content with what I have Little be it or much
And Lord! contentment, still, I crave

311. REFLECTIONS ON THE SATYAGRAHA WEEK

This national week will soon be upon us. We trust that it will be worthy of the occasion which it is to commemorate. The chief item of work which can be measured and which will be an acid test of our genuineness and feeling for the Punjab will be the collection of a fund to pay for the memorial site for commemora-ting the memory of the martyrs of the 13th April last. To collect ten lacs from a population of thirty crores is not a difficult task if suitable workers can be found. If rich and well-known ladies and gentlemen could be persuaded to take up the work, it could be finished inside the week. The proper thing no doubt will be to collect pro rata from every province. We hope to give such a list next week. But each province should try to collect as much more as it can, than its share. It would not matter if we succeed in collecting more. Ten lacs is not the highest sum required. It is the minimum. Everyone therefore is expected to subscribe liberally.

Then there is the fasting and prayer. This is a hoary institution. A genuine fast cleanses body, mind and soul. It crucifies the flesh and to that extent sets the soul free. A sincere prayer can work wonders. It is an intense longing of the soul for its even greater purity. Purity thus gained when it is utilized for a noble purpose becomes a prayer. The mundane use of gayatri, its repetition for healing the sick, illustrates the meaning we have given to prayer. When the same gayatri jap is performed with a humble and concentrated mind in an intelligent manner in times of national difficulties and calamities, it becomes a most potent instrument for warding off danger. There can be no greater mistake than to suppose that the recitation of the gayatri, the namaz or the Christian prayer are superstitions fit to be practised by the ignorant and the credulous. Fasting and prayer therefore are a most powerful process of purification and that which purifies necessarily enables us the better to do our duty and to attain our goal. If therefore fasting and prayer seem at times not to answer, it is not because there is nothing in them but because the right spirit is not behind them.

*                   *                   *

A man who fasts and gambles away the whole of the day as do so many on Janmashtami day\(^1\), naturally not only obtains no result from the fast in the shape of greater purity but such a dissolute fast leaves him on the contrary degraded. A fast to be true must be accompanied by a readiness to receive pure thoughts and determination to resist all Satan’s temptations. Similarly a prayer to be true has to be intelligible and definite. One has to identify oneself with it. Counting beads with the name of Allah on one’s lips whilst the mind wanders in all directions is worse than useless. We therefore hope that the coming week of dedication to national fasting and prayer will become a universal reality and not merely a formal observation.

\(^1\) The eighth day of the dark fortnight of the Shravana month, the birthday of Lord Krishna
The magnificent spectacle of tens of thousands of Mohammedans going to Jumma Masjids in different parts of India and offering heart-felt prayers for the triumph of truth did more than anything else to bring a just solution within the bounds of possibility. We would have no hesitation in guaranteeing a proper solution of the Khilafat question purely on the strength of prayer. We need not be told that the argument in favour of prayer cuts both ways, as it is open as much to our enemy as to us to pray. But that would be an argument not against prayer but against allowing the result to affect our valuation of prayer. One may not make terms with God. It is enough to know that prayer has played from times immemorial a most important part in the evolution of nations as well as individuals. May the Satyagraha Week witness a revival of the institutions of fasting and prayer in all their original glory and splendour.

312. VIOLENCE VERSUS NON-VIOLENCE

The Khilafat day has come and gone. It was a great success and a complete triumph of satyagraha, i.e., not civil disobedience but truth and non-violence. No hartal has been so voluntary as that of the 19th March in that all the canvassing that ever took place was before the 19th. It was an example of wonderful self-restraint on the part of the Committee not to have called out the mill-hands. The Committee deserves the highest praise for its efficient management and for the definite recognition of voluntarism. If the people continue to show the discipline and self-restraint shown on the 19th and add thereto in an equal measure the spirit of self-sacrifice, nothing can prevent the full fruition of our hopes regarding Khilafat. Nobody could have believed a year ago the possibility of peace being observed by the fanatical element among the Mohammedans on a matter of life and death to them and on a day of no business for the idlers. But there can be no idleness when there is prayer. All were enjoined not to quarrel, not to be angry but to pray for the right to be done. It is true that all did not definitely pray, but the spirit of prayer was abroad and it dominated the people rather than the spirit of revenge,

3 The Khilafat Committee, Bombay
anger, excitement, and so we had the amazing spectacle of the hartal day passing off like an ordinary day when everybody expects peace to be observed. The vast meeting of Bombay attended perhaps by thirty thousand men was a sight worth seeing. There was firmness in the faces of those thousands of people who listened to the speeches, yet without applause or any other effusive demonstration. The organizers deserve the warmest praise for having introduced into our meetings the ancient peacefulness, quiet, determination and orderliness in the place of modern fluster, excitement and disorderliness. The one develops just the qualities that make for satyagraha, the other inevitably leads to violence. And the message of the great meeting and the very successful hartal is not violence but non-violence. I hope that the authorities will not misread the situation. They will not fail to understand the admirable spirit of the whole demonstration or the equally admirable spirit of the resolution—a resolution to which, in my humble opinion, it is impossible for any honest lover of this country or the Empire to take exception. I hope, too, that they will read the spirit of the movement in the manner in which it is developing. I hope that the exemplary patience, self-restraint and orderliness that are evolving in our midst will have their due weight with them and that they will inform the Imperial Government that whilst there is this admirable peace in the land there is also a grim determination behind it which will not take “no” for an answer. I hope that Government will not repeat the sin of last April and entertain any false hope of tyranny and unquenchable spirit that has come into being and that will suffer everything but humiliation, dishonour and defeat [sic].

It is a matter of deep regret that so respected a body as the Liberal League should have hastily and in advance condemned the hartal. Surely a people so stricken with grief and with disappointment probably staring them in the face must have an outlet for orderly manifestation. It was because not very long ago we were afraid to speak or write what we thought that our sentiments burrowed under and became foul with stench because of the absence of the fierce sun and the open air of public opinion playing upon them. Hence we had a secret revolutionary movement. Today, thank God, we seem to have outlived the evil day. We dare to think, speak and write openly, without fear, but under restraint that openness imposes upon mankind. I appeal to the members of the Liberal League and those who think with them to recognize this plain fact and to appreciate the superiority of boldness over timid caution. If they desire to harness all the innumerable forces that are coming daily into being for the uplift of the nation, if they wish to become privileged participators in the throes of the new birth, let them not ignore the signs of the time, let them not reject the advances of the younger generation, let them not chill their ardent hopes and aspirations, but let them head this growing party of young, enthusiastic, self-sacrificing dare-devil men. Sympathize with them, respond to the heart’s throb, regulate it, for they are amenable to reason or an appeal to their high-souledness—and you have a disciplined party, obedient to the call of the country. But if they feel neglected, if they feel that the older heads will not patiently listen to their wants, will not give them a helping hand, they may despair and despair may lead to desperation resulting in a catastrophic destruction. I can recall no time so magnificently suitable for leading India to the method of satyagraha—not necessarily civil disobedience, but truth and non-violence—in which there is no defeat and in which if there is any error it hurts but those who err.

313. CONTEMPT OF COURT

The long expected hearing of the case against the editor and the publisher of _Young India_ in connection with the publication of a letter of the District Judge of Ahmedabad regarding satyagrahi lawyers and my comments thereon has been heard and judgment has been pronounced.¹ Both the editor and the publisher have been severely reprimanded. But the Court did not see its way to pass any sentence upon either of us. If I dwell upon the judgment it is only because I am anxious as a satyagrahi to draw a moral from it. I wish to assure those friends who, out of pure friendliness, advised us to tender the required apology, that I refused to accept their advice not out of obstinacy but because there was a great principle at stake. I had to conserve a journalist’s independence and yet respect the law. My own reading of the law was that there was no contempt committed by me. But my defence rested more upon the fact that I could not offer an apology if I was not prepared not to repeat the offence on a similar occasion. Because I hold that an apology tendered to a Court to be true has to be as sincere as a private apology. At the same time I owed a duty to the Court. It was no light thing for me to refuse to accept the advice of the Chief Justice especially when the Chief Justice was so very considerate in the correspondence with me. I was on the horns of a dilemma. I therefore decided not to offer any defence but simply to make a statement frankly and fully defining my position, leaving it to the Court to pass any sentence it thought fit in the event of an adverse decision. In order to show that I meant no disrespect of the Court and that I did not desire to advertise the case I took extraordinary precautions to prevent publicity and I venture to think that I succeeded eminently in convincing the Court that behind my disobedience—if it was disobedience—there was no defiance but perfect resignation; there was no anger or ill will but perfect restraint and respect; that, if I did not apologize, I did not because an insincere apology would have been contrary to my conscience. I hold that it was about as perfect an instance of civil disobedience as it ever has been my privilege to offer. And I feel that the Court reciprocated in a most handsome manner and recognized the spirit of civility that lay behind my so-called disobedience. The luminous judgment of Justice Marten lays down the law, and decides against me. But I feel thankful that it does not question the propriety of my action. Justice Hayward’s judgment recognizes it as an instance of passive, i.e., civil, resistance and practically makes it the reason for not awarding any sentence. Here then we have an almost complete vindication of civil disobedience. Disobedience to be civil must be sincere, respectful, restrained, never defiant, must be based upon some well-understood principle, must not be capricious and above all must have no ill will or hatred behind it. I submit that the disobedience offered by Mr. Desai and myself contained all these ingredients.

TO

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA

THE HUMBLE MEMORIAL OF THE UNDERSIGNED INDIAN

SUBJECTS OF HIS MAJESTY THE KING-EMPEROR

HUMBLY AND RESPECTFULLY SHOWETH AS FOLLOWS:

(1) Your petitioners have learnt with great concern the announcement recently made by you in answer to a question in the House of Commons that you would not advise His majesty to signify his disallowance of the Anarchical and Revolutionary Crimes Act being Act XI of 1919 (generally known as the Rowlatt Act).

(2) Your petitioners submit that the said Act contains provisions which are highly prejudicial to the liberties of His Majesty’s Indian subjects, among others those which empower the Indian Executive to assume at its own discretion practically uncontrolled powers of depriving His Majesty’s Indian subjects of their right to be tried by the Ordinary Tribunals of the land and those which deprive the offenders placed for trial under the said Act of many privileges which have been recognized by civilised jurisprudence as absolutely necessary for safeguarding their innocence.

(3) Your petitioners further submit that on account of the aforesaid and other objections to which the principle and the provisions of the said Act are open it has met with universal disapprobation and opposition in India and has given rise to an agitation the like of which in extent and intensity has never been known or heard of before in India.

(4) Your petitioners feel that constitutional reforms inaugurating responsible Government in India can have no value or meaning if the said Act is retained on the Indian Statute Book in open and deliberate defiance of public opinion in India.

(5) Your petitioners, therefore, submit that under the circumstances aforesaid, you will be pleased to reconsider your decision and advise His Majesty to signify through you his disallowance of the said Act.

(6) And for this act of kindness your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

Your most obedient servants,

LETTER FROM SECRETARY, HUNTER COMMITTEE, TOMALAVIYA

In his reply to Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, Mr. Stokes writes that Lord Hunter’s Committee feel that it is not within their province to review the discretion of the local Government. If in the course of their inquiry, it should appear that the evidence of any person, now in custody, is necessary to throw light on the causes of disturbances or measures taken to deal therewith, such persons will be called before the Committee and in the event, the Committee do not doubt that the Government of the Punjab will place no obstacle in the way of their appearance. The Committee observe, “Indeed, from the communication of the Private Secretary to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of which a copy is annexed to your letter, it is seen that an assurance has been conveyed to you on this point and also an undertaking that proper facilities will be allowed for consultation between persons in custody and counsel engaged in the inquiry which has been entrusted to the Committee and Lord Hunter’s Committee would expect that. In this matter, Government would afford the fullest reasonable facilities. Lord Hunter has independently suggested to the Punjab Government that this should be done. Beyond this Lord Hunter’s Committee feel that they cannot properly make any further suggestions. If the Congress Subcommittee still should feel unable to co-operate in the inquiry and should adhere to their decision to forgo the opportunity for full investigation which it is the desire of Lord Hunter’s Committee to make, His Lordship’s Committee, I am to say, can only acquiesce with regret in that decision.”

STATEMENT ON THE PUNJAB BY CONGRESS ENQUIRY COMMITTEE

LAHORE,
November 17, 1919

The following statement has been issued by the Punjab Inquiry Sub-committee of the All-India Congress Committee:

It is necessary that the public should have a connected narrative of events that have led to the decision of the Congress Sub-committee to withdraw its co-operation from Lord Hunter’s Committee. It will be remembered that, within ten days of regrettable occurrences in the Punjab, the All-India Congress Committee met at Bombay on the 20th and 21st April and, while it deplored and condemned all acts of violence, it urged upon the Government to deal with the situation in a sympathetic and conciliatory manner, immediately reversing the policy of repression. In accordance with a resolution passed by the Congress Committee, a representation was submitted on the 28th April last to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for India in which the Committee most earnestly urged His Majesty’s Government to intervene and put an end to the methods of repression and to order the appointment of a commission of officials and non-officials to investigate the causes of discontent and allegations of excesses by authorities in repressing popular disturbances.

Mr. Montagu announced in the House of Commons in the last week of May that His Majesty’s Government and the Viceroy have recognized the necessity for such inquiry as has been referred to above. Shortly after, a second meeting of the All-India Congress Committee took place at Allahabad on the 8th June last, dealing with the situation which then existed. It passed among others the following resolution:
The Committee note with satisfaction that the Viceroy and Mr. Montagu have recognized the necessity of an inquiry into the causes of the unrest and into the complaints against authorities of use of excessive and unlawful force in relation to the view of the fact that the policy of the Government of India and the Government of the Punjab is inseparably connected with such unrest and complaint and must form a subject of investigation, this Committee earnestly request His Majesty’s Government to constitute a Parliamentary Committee or a commission of persons wholly unconnected with the formulation, sanction or carrying out of the said policy. The Committee urge the following among other matters be included within the scope of the inquiry: (1) Policy of the Government of India and the Government of the Punjab in dealing with recent disturbances; (2) Sir Michael O’Dwyer’s regime in the Punjab with special reference to methods of recruitment for the Indian Army and labour corps, raising of war loan, administration of martial law and complaints of excessive and unlawful use of force by the authorities; (3) recent occurrences in Delhi and other places. The Committee further urge that interests of justice and good government demand that an inquiry should begin at an early date. At the same meeting the Committee appointed the Sub-committee consisting of gentlemen whose names are noted below: (a) to arrange for the conduct of an inquiry into the recent occurrences in the Punjab and other places through such agency as they may determine, (b) take such legal or other proceedings in relation thereto in India or England as may be necessary and (c) to collect funds for the purpose by public subscriptions:—Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, President ex-officio; Sir Rash Behary Ghosh, Pandit Motilal Nehru, Syed Hasan Imam, Mr. B. Chakravarty, Mr. C.R. Nath, Mr. Kasturi Ranga Aiyyangar, Mr.
Umar Sobani and Pandit Gokaran Nath Mistra, Secretary ex-officio, with power to co-opt others as members. The Sub-committee co-opted the following members at its meetings held on the 16th October 1919: Mr. Gandhi, Swami Shraddanand, Mr.
Purushottam Das Tandon, Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru, Mr. Ganpat Rai, Sheik Umar Baksh, Bakshi Tekchand, Mr. Gokulchand Narang, Mr. Santanam, Badr-ul-Islam Ali Khan and Lal Girdhari Lal.
We the undersigned went to the Punjab shortly after withdrawal of martial law and began our investigations on the 25th June last. We need hardly say that at every step we felt the need of the assistance of the leaders of people who had occupied a prominent position in the public life of their respective towns and none of whom had taken an important part in the events which followed disturbances. We found that many people who knew what had happened would not come forward to give evidence because of fear, real or imaginary, of police. Whilst we were going on with our inquiry, the appointment of Lord Hunter’s Committee was announced and we redoubled our efforts to collect evidence for the purposes of the inquiry. But, as we proceeded, we realised more than ever that the presence of principal Punjab leaders was necessary to guide and help us in collecting some of the most valuable evidence, to hearten those who were still keeping back from fear and to show to profit that Government wanted the inquiry to be carried on fairly and that they wanted the whole truth to be told to Lord Hunter’s Committee.

We had also expressed the desire that the Committee should have power to revise the sentences passed by the Martial Law Commission and summary courts through whose agency, it is our firm belief, an amount of permanent and prolonged injustice has been possible. But the Government of India restricted the scope of Lord Hunter’s Committee and appointed special judges for such revision. The judges appointed were both Punjab judges and rightly or wrongly (we think more rightly than wrongly), the public objected to this work being entrusted to the Punjab judges. It was therefore necessary that this tribunal should be so composed as to inspire confidence and that to that end one judge at least should be from outside the Punjab and that the tribunal should have power to admit fresh evidence where records were found to be insufficient or material evidence was, in the first instance, shut out. We had also some apprehension that our counsel might not be allowed to appear before the Committee and that, even if they were allowed, the right of cross-examination might not be extended to them. We may mention here parenthetically that it was our desire to hasten the inquiry and to avoid bitterness that led us to waive our substantial objection that the inquiry should be made by a Royal Commission appointed independently of the Government of India.

Early in October we wrote to the Government of India informing them that our Sub-committee engaged lawyers to put the case of the people before Lord Hunter’s Committee and desired to know the terms of reference of the Committee and the procedure to be adopted by them. Having been referred by the Government of India to Lord Hunter’s Committee for information regarding procedure, we wrote to Lord Hunter’s Committee for permission to lead evidence through our counsel and to cross-examine witnesses of the other side.

In the same letter we informed Lord Hunter’s Committee that we considered it equally essential for a proper and fair investigation of recent events in the Punjab that the Punjab leaders who are undergoing imprisonment should be released on parole or bail for the period of the enquiry. We thought, however, that this was a matter on which proper authority to be approached was the Punjab Government, the Government of India and the Secretary of State. In this view, so far back as the 12th September last, at a meeting of the Indian Legislative Council, one of us had urged upon the Government of India and the Punjab Government the release of the Punjab leaders on such security, personal or pecuniary, or both, as may seem adequate to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab in order that they should be able to give evidence before the Committee and have the people’s case properly put before it. A cablegram was sent to the Secretary of State on the 27th ultimo praying for the right of appearance by counsel and for the release of the Punjab leaders for purposes of inquiry when time came for leading evidence before Lord Hunter’s Committee. The Punjab Government was approached regarding all three points mentioned above.

There were protracted negotiations and appearance by counsel with right of cross-examination was allowed and status of the Congress Sub-committee recognized. Mr. Justice Mullick of the Patna High Court was appointed as one of two revision judges and we have reason to believe that the judges have power to admit fresh evidence in the circumstances already referred to. But the third equally fundamental need was left unsatisfied. The Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab rejected our request for the temporary release of principal leaders under due security in the following terms: “As regards the suggestion that certain prisoners convicted in connection with disturbances should be released from jail in order to ensure satisfactory presentation of case, I am to say it will not be possible to comply with this suggestion. If, however, the Committee desire to hear evidence of any prisoner, this will be duly arranged and if it is found necessary for counsel engaged in inquiry to visit prisoners for consultation in connection with inquiry, proper facilities for such consultation will be given.” We considered the reply to be highly unsatisfactory. Lord Hunter’s Committee was approached with a view to the wrong being righted. We were all to cite the precedent of the Solomon Committee of 1913 of South Africa for the suggested action of His Lordship’s Committee, but our suggestion was rejected. Then followed Mr. Gandhi’s interview with the Lieutenant-Governor and His Honour was prepared to allow the principal leaders to be released on parole for the day or days they had to give evidence before Lord Hunter’s Committee, and His Honour was willing also that counsel should visit in jail all prisoners whose evidence was to be tendered before the Committee. But it was clear that, while the demand for the release of the leaders was being granted in principle by advance made by His Honour upon previous position, the substantial and most practical part of the request stood rejected.

By securing release of the principal leaders and their presence in Committee room, we desired to get valuable assistance from them for our counsel in examination of witnesses. Those who know anything of law will at once recognize the force of this remark—the presence of party interested, provided he is intelligent, is most helpful whilst his case is going on. No trials can take place in absence of the accused. Lord Hunter’s Committee is in a way trying these leaders as conspirators in a political conspiracy to wage war against the King. They have been held by the Government to be responsible for the so-called rebellion. We hold the Committee cannot do justice to the matter before them if they do not have at least the leading prisoners before them. It may be mentioned here that we had asked Lord Hunter’s Committee at Delhi to be supplied with a list of official witnesses and their printed statements to enable the Sub-committee’s counsel to cross-examine witnesses punctiliously, but this request was not granted. Thus it is not possible for our counsel to take instructions from prisoners beforehand by visiting them in jail. Some of our colleagues that those prisoners who were principally interested in events then being examined by the Committee would be permitted to appear before the Committee as prisoners under custody and that they would be able, then, to help counsel in course of examination of witnesses, but we wanted to take nothing for granted. Mr. C.F. Andrews, therefore, kindly offered to go to the Lieutenant-Governor and had the point made definitely clear. He told us on return that His Honour would not allow the prisoners to appear before the Committee except as witnesses and on the day or days that they were actually required for that purpose. There was, then, nothing left for the Congress Sub-committee to do, but to abide by its manifesto not to participate in the proceedings of Lord Hunter’s Committee.

The Congress Sub-committee arrived at this decision after the greatest and most anxious consideration. It weighed every consequence, but it felt that if it was to discharge the trust laid upon it, if it was to vindicate national honour and honour of the great Punjab leaders, if it was to see truth and innocence established, it could not possibly engage in an inquiry in which the people’s party was so heavily handicapped. It must be remembered that officials are as much upon their trial as leaders. But not only are Government officials free to appear before Lord Hunter’s Committee but also to instruct Government counsel. In the words of the Congress Committee’s letter to Lord Hunter, it cannot be expected to be party to a position under which Government officials whose acts are under review can freely appear before Committee, when people’s representatives whose acts are equally under review are not allowed to appear even as prisoners under custody. We have to come to the conclusion that our work of collecting evidence must continue. We have already in our possession most valuable evidence. It needs to be supplemented and checked. The Congress Committee have therefore appointed Mr. Gandhi, Pandit Motilal Nehru, Mr. C.R. Das, Mr. Abbas Tyabji, Ex-judge, Baroda High Court, and Mr. Fazlul Haq as Commissioners, with Mr. Santanam, Bar-at-law, as Secretary for work, and the Committee hope before long to place before the public a full and accurate statement of events. The first undersigned begs to state in order to avoid any misunderstanding that he has purposely refrained from allowing himself to be appointed a Commissiner as, being the Chairman of Committee, he should be free to guide the work of the Committee as a whole.

LETTER FROM E. CANDLER

LAHORE,
December 12, 1919

DEAR MR. GANDHI,

In a conversation with a Professor of a Lahore College yesterday, a Hindu and very old friend, I came to know that the article published in the Haq (29th November 1919) might, in view of Indian etiquette and tradition, appear deliberately offensive and in bad taste as regards the reference to the possible marriage of a daughter of yours to a Mussalman. I do not know if you have any children, but I feel sure that you will accept it from me that, in any case, the point was impersonal or only personal in so far as your individual attitude was concerned. I had no idea, when I wrote the article, except in the case of an ultra conservative, that a reference to a daughter or a wife was considered indecent or offensive. If there is anything in the passage in the nature of a personal affront, I beg that you will forgive and believe me when I tell you that nothing would give me more pain than to discover that I had unwillingly offended in this way and more especially in Haq which I wish to keep clean from my taint of unfairness or bad taste. I need not point out that the political intention of the article was to put these questions to you squarely. Are you, with a view to embarrassing the Government, working up an anti-British campaign to modify the terms for the Turk?
Are the claims of the Turks really as dear to you that you would jeopardise the peace of your own country for their sake, and this in the face of the verdict of men like Gladstone, Morley, Bryce, men, whose opinion, I am sure, you value and whose disinterestedness you cannot doubt, men who, long before this agitation, denounced the treatment of the subject races by the Turk as the gravest infringement of modern civilisation, and who devoted a large part of their lives to their efforts in redressing it? Please make use of this letter, if you wish to do so, privately or publicly, in any way you deem fit.

I remain,
Yours sincerely,
EDMUND CANDLER

GENERAL SMUTS REPLY TO DEPUTATION

The Minister in his reply said that he was out for fair play and justice for all in the Union. The Indian community ought also to realise that there was a very strong and powerfully backed up movement afoot to curtail the progress of the Indian community. It would be inadvisable in the interest of the community to rake up all the past matters and have them included in terms of reference of the proposed Commission. It would be better if the trading matter alone is once for all gone into thoroughly. As the Indians are not anxious to acquire any fixed property, that matter should be left out. He also pointed out that Sir Benjamin Robertson is coming out to watch the interest and assist the Indian community and it would, therefore, be to the interest of the Indians themselves to render all the assistance they can both to Sir Benjamin and the Commission. He concluded by saying that he was very anxious to be on the best of terms with the Indian Government and those settled in the Union. He would endeavour under his Government to give fair play to all. Being in a great hurry to meet another deputation, he regretted that he could not give the time he desired to the deputation, but the facts will not slip his memory. The Commission may give us a couple of years’ rest until another agitation breaks out and we shall see then what could be done.

KHILAFAT DEPUTATION’S ADDRESS TO VICEROY

[DELHI, January 19, 1920]

WITH NAME OF ALLAH THE MOST MERCIFUL AND THE MOST COMPASSIONATE

TO HIS EXCELLENCY THE RT. HON. BARON CHELMSFORD, P.C., G.M.S.I., G.C.M.G.,
G.M.I.E., VICEROY AND GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY,

We the members of the Khilafat deputation, authorised in this behalf by the Khilafat Conference at the very important session recently held at Amritsar, beg to approach Your Excellency with a view to enlist the sympathy and secure the fullest assistance of Your Excellency’s Government in a matter of vital importance in which we are confident neither the one nor the other will be withheld. The Khilafat Conference has more than once resolved that a deputation should proceed at an early we are confident neither the one nor the other will be withheld. The Khilafat Conference has more than once resolved that a deputation should proceed at an early date to England and lay before His Majesty the King-Emperor and his Ministers a full and clear statement of the obligations imposed on every Muslim by his faith and of the united wishes cherished by Indian Mussalmans regarding the Khilafat and cognate questions, such as those relating to Muslim control over every portion of the Zaziratul-Arab, the Khilafat’s wardenship of the Holy Places, and the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. Such a desire would have been both natural and laudable at any time, but in view of the grave situation that exists to-day and is fast developing into an unmistakable menace, it has acquired an urgency and an insistence that have compelled us to give respectful expression to it, with Your Excellency’s permission, through the agency of such a representative deputation as ours. After a protracted war in which almost the entire civilized world was engaged on one side or the other, in which each nation vied with its neighbours in pouring out its blood and treasures on the most lavish scale in order to secure victory, and of which the ravages and horrors have been without precedent, it was natural that even those indirectly yet powerfully affected thereby should experience extreme war-weariness at its close and feel intense aborrence of the ancient method of settling the vital affairs of mankind through the arbitrament of the sword. Nor was it less natural that the world should cry with one voice for a lasting peace to be concluded with the utmost rapidity and yet, although more than a year had elapsed since the Treaty of Peace was signed by Germany, peace seems almost as far as ever from resuming its sway over mankind and our own continent of Asia is not without reason apprehensive of grave developments of which no one can pretend to foresee the final end. The world seems once more to be approaching a grave crisis and, although it is not possible to speak with any degree of certainty of the regions and the races likely to be affected by the storm that is obviously brewing, it requires no great perspicacity to foretell that, when it comes to burst, the Muslim world will not be left unaffected. We may suggest without disrespect that it is of paramount importance at such a juncture that the authorities at the centre of this composite Empire should be fully alive to all that transpires in remotest corners of His Majesty’s world-wide Dominions, and the least that we may reasonably expect from the statesman of the Empire is that, in concluding any settlement to which they attach any degree of finality, they should take into the fullest consideration the most binding religious obligations and the most highly cherished sentiments of 70 millions of Indian Mussalmans and the no less ardent sympathies of 250 millions of their compatriots. For one reason or another, sufficiently forcible expression had not been given to these sentiments and sympathies during the War, and we regret more than we can tell that even the religious obligations to which we have referred were not set forth with that degree of clearness and emphasis that is essential for the purpose of communicating the religious doctrines of one set of people to the ruling classes of another of alien faith.

This is neither the time nor the place to enter into any lengthy discussion of the reasons that swayed the Mussalmans of India nor into any such exposition of the doctrines that they hold to be absolutely essential for their salvation. It suffices to say that, since the armistice was concluded more than a year ago, they have not spared themselves in the task of a clear exposition of these essential doctrines of their faith and they are not unmindful of the fact which is becoming clearer every day that Your Excellency’s Government, various local Governments and those Englishmen who had held responsible offices in India before their retirement have gradually come to realise and appreciate in a daily increasing measure the deep concern of the Mussalmans of India and of their compatriots in the settlement to be concluded with the Ottoman Khilafat. Realising at the same time their own responsibility for the peace and good governance of India and tranquillity on her borders, Your Excellency’s Government and the Right Hon. the Secretary of State have, we may thankfully acknowledge, made representations to His Majesty’s Government, but that Government is obviously so far removed from us, both in point of distance and political and religious surroundings, that neither our own voice nor the representations of this Government have apparently affected the opinion, view point, and preconceived ideas of His Majesty’s ministers to an appreciable degree, and a number of ministerial utterances can be cited to prove, if proof was necessary, that they are inclined to insist on a settlement of such world-wide interest and importance as if it was solely, or at any rate mainly, the concern of the small section of His Majesty’s subjects of British birth and Christian faith. From the rest they seem to expect impassive acquiescence, if not willing submission, to the dictates of their narrowly conceived and far from Imperial statesmanship. Need we say that such an estimate of the situation that a sectional and sectarian settlement will create will prove disastrous incorrect. Deeply apprehensive as we are of the calamitous consequences of such an estimate and still more deeply anxious to prevent them while we can, we have been driven to the conclusion that one final effort must be made to give timely warning to the Imperial authorities of the dangers we so clearly foresee and respectfully entreat them to avoid the evil consequence of a settlement sought to be forced on the Mussalmans of the world contrary to the clearest commandments of their creed and the united wishes of so large a portion of humanity. Recent experience as well as the inherent difficulties of discussing such grave matters over the wires at the distance of seven thousand miles of land and sea have forced us to resolve that, with Your Excellency’s assistance, a deputation of ours should proceed at the earliest possible opportunity to England and place directly our humble but frank submissions before His Majesty and his ministers, and since we have been repeatedly asked to remember that, in arranging such a settlement Great Britain, whatever her position among her Allies and associates, could not leave their interests and wishes out of consideration, we trust that our deputation will be enabled to explain to the Allied and associated nations and their Governments the nature and binding force of Islamic obligations and the true character and scope of Muslim aspirations. We need not repeat here the clear conditions of future peace as set forth by the President of the United States of America on the basis of which the Khilafat concluded the armistice, not the unmistakable pledges of the British Premier regarding Constantinople, Thrace and the homelands of the Turks. We respectfully submit that no prospective territorial or political gains, whether real or only imagined, can compensate Great Britain or her Allies for the loss of moral credit if their pledged word is left unredeemed, and the ingenious interpretations suggested now as an afterthought by irresponsible persons will in no way prove helpful to the responsible authorities. The shock of this blow to the moral prestige of the Empire will be felt all the more severely in consequence of the sad disillusionment with regard to the pledge of His Majesty’s Government proclaimed by your Excellency’s predecessor at the commencement of the war with Turkey.

But it is not because the Mussalmans of India take their stand on British and Allied pledges, any more than they expect that a settlement with such extended and intricate ramifications can be governed by their own interests and sentiments alone, that they are so deeply agitated to-day when they apprehend a breach of these solemn pledges and an almost complete disregard of these universally cherished sentiments. The Mussalmans of India will entirely fail in their purpose if they cannot make it clear to those who have made themselves responsible for preserving to them their religious freedom in its entirety that their deepest concern today is that settlement of the Khilafat and cognate questions is apparently being outlined by His Majesty’s Government and their Allies which no Mussalman can accept or acquiesce in without jeopardising eternal salvation. This is the one governing consideration on which attention must be focussed and so intent is it that, even if the Ottoman Turks could be made to acquiesce in such a settlement, it would remain as unacceptable as ever to every believing Mussalman. The preservation of the Khilafat as a temporal no less than a spiritual institution is not so much a part of their faith as the very essence thereof and no analogies from other creeds that tolerate the lacerating and devitalizing distinction between things spiritual and things temporal, between the Church and the State, can serve any purpose save that of clouding and befogging the clearest of issues. Temporal power is of the very essence of the institution of the Khilafat, and Mussalmans can never agree to any change in its character or to the dismemberment of its Empire. The no less important question of the Zazirat-ul-Arab, over no portion of which can any kind of non-Muslim control be tolerated, is equally clearly not one of Muslim sentiment but of Islamic faith. Similarly, Islam also declares and defines the sanctity of the holy places of Islam and places this and similar matters beyond the uninformed interpretation of people of alien faiths. Mussalmans insist, and with perfect reason, that the Khalifa alone shall be the warden of the holy places. As regards the integrity of the Khalifa’s dominions, we are painfully aware that some sections of the Mussalmans of Arabia have in clear defiance of the laws of Islam stood out from the solid mass of the rest of the Muslim world. But instead of this being any argument against the latter, it furnishes it with one more compelling reason for proclaiming the truth and in accordance with the divine declaration that all Mussalmans are brother, one to another, and the divine injunction to make peace between brothers, Indian Mussalmans must seek to remove every existing misunderstanding and eliminate every cause of friction that may tend to separate Arab from Ajam, and Turk from Tajik. And it is the logical consequence of Islamic brotherhood that all Mussalmans should share the sorrows and sufferings of their brothers in every corner of the world and should see to it that principles of such universal application as that of self-determination should be applied to the Muslim no less than to the Christian and to the Asiatic no less than to the European. It is true that a great part of Europe and Christendom charges the Ottoman Turks with religious injustice and political ineptitude, but it is permissible to argue that those who do so are neither free from old-standing prejudices nor from a bitterness of latter growth, and we are confident that the verdict of history would be pronounced in due course with full regard for the difficult position in which the Ottoman Turks have stood for centuries and that it would vindicate alike the basic toleration of Islam and the essential humanity of the Turk. The loyalty of Indian Mussalmans no less than that of other communities of India to their Sovereign has been an abiding asset acknowledged as well as proclaimed throughout the history of British rule in India. It is also admitted that it depends and is mainly based on the preservation of their religious freedom in its entirety. If it has not been necessary to remind Government of this aspect of Muslim loyalty, and, in fact, of the loyalty of every Indian community, it is because we thankfully acknowledged that until lately no question had arisen in which it appeared likely to be forgotten or ignored; but now that the policy of the Allied and associated powers and the dictates of Islam seem to run counter to each other, we respectfully submit that justice and expediency alike demand that what is unalterable by human hand and has never been so altered throughout the thirteen centuries of Islam shall remain unaltered, and what is susceptible to change and is essentially changeable with every change in circumstances and surroundings should, when necessary, change. Even the most cherished Muslim sentiment may be sacrificed in subservience to Imperial demands though we humbly submit that true Imperialism should give proportionate consideration to the wishes and sentiments of every member of the Empire, but the requirements of Islamic law are so definite and of such a binding nature that they cannot be reduced by a hair’s breadth to suit the desires of Allied and associated powers any more than they can be enlarged to further the mundane ambitions of Mussalmans themselves. These are the limits set by Allah and none shall transgress them, but while the Mussalmans take their stand firmly on their credal obligations, they respectfully submit that true Imperial interests point to the same path as Islamic commandments. The War may be over but peace is still distant and doubtful and we shall beseech the Imperial authorities not to underrate the worth and value of Islamic friendship and Indian loyalty. A settlement unacceptable alike to Muslim and non-Muslim Indians, now happily reunited and standing shoulder to shoulder, will bring no peace because it will bring no sense of justice and no contentment. No Mussalman who hopes and prays for salvation would henceforward know any rest and he could only aspire to salvation by following the dictates of Islam, however the consequences may be. But if on the contrary, the heart of India is won by a generous recognition of her fitness for managing her own affairs as a member of the British Commonwealth and the Muslim world is reconciled by a just appreciation of Islamic responsibilities and obligations, Muslim sentiments of half the world would be at the back of Great Britain and no Power in the world could dare to deny to her the rights that are hers and her Empire’s. The menace that now looms so large would then shrink into nothingness without a blow being struck in wrath or a drop of human blood being shed in vain warfare. The world would then be truly not only for democracy but for God and the truth, and it is in this spirit that we desire to send our mission, with Your Excellency’s assistance, to great Britain and Allied and associated countries. We also feel confident that, once the success of our mission is assured, it would set itself with equal zeal to reassure the Muslim world and reconcile those who have parted, maybe in anger, maybe in sorrow, but in any case through misunderstanding of their common interests which everyone anxious to promote the peace of the world should endeavour to remove. May it be given through the grace of merciful Providence to us and to Your Excellency’s Government to accomplish this humane and sacred purpose.

We beg to subscribe ourselves Your Excellency’s most obedient servants.

1. CONGRESS REPORT ON THE PUNJAB DISORDERS

THE PUNJAB

(HISTORICAL AND GEOGRAPHICAL)

Historically the Punjab may be considered the most important province of India. It was here that the Aryas of Vedic times first made their home. It was here that the hymns of the Rig Veda were first chanted. It was to this province, at the great University of Taxila, that seekers after knowledge flocked from various parts of the world. It was in this province that the Pandus and the Kurus, the great heroes of the Mahabharata, fought out their great battles.

It was here that Osiris, King of Egypt, first touched Indian soil and Semiramis, Queen of Assyria, who at the head of her vast armies tried her fortune for the dominion of India, suffered a crushing defeat. The Scythians and Tartars and Persians had to measure swords with the sons of the Punjab in their attempts to penetrate into India. It was in this province that Alexander the Great, though victorious, for the first time met a foe, under King Porus, who shattered his dream of a world-wide dominion.

Authorship of this Report, the full title of which reads Report of the Commissioners appointed by the Punjab Sub-committee of the Indian National Congress, and which was published on March 25, 1920, has been attributed to Gandhiji on the basis of the following evidence:

(I) "The responsibility of organizing the work of the Committee devolved on me, and as the privilege of conducting the inquiry in the largest number of places fell to my lot, I got a rare opportunity. . . . The task of drafting the report of this Committee was also entrusted to me. . . . This report, prepared as it was solely with a view to bringing out the truth and nothing but the truth, will enable the reader to see. . . ." An Autobiography, Part V, Ch. XXXV.

   b."The Report was drawn up by Gandhi, with assistance from me." Ibid.
   c."Gandhi made the first draft of the Report in a quiet little room." Ibid.
   d."By that time, Das, Motilal and Tyabji had dropped out, and Gandhi and myself worked hard on the publication of the Report."

(iii) Letters produced in this volume which Gandhiji wrote to Jayakar during March 1920.

The Report was published in two volumes, Volume I consisting of the Report and Volume II consisting of Evidence. Here, only Volume I has been reproduced.
The Punjab proper is the land watered by the five rivers, the Sutlej, the Beas, the Ravi, the Chenab and the Jhelum, from which it derives its name. It is situated in the north-west of India, and is bounded on the north by a portion of the Himalayas and Kashmir, on the west by the Indus, on the south by Sind and Rajputana, and on the east by the river Jamna.

The present area of the Punjab is 135,773 square miles, out of which a little less than 100,000 square miles is directly under British rule, the rest being ruled by Indian princes and chiefs. The population in 1911 was slightly less than 20 millions. The province used to be much larger before, but in 1901 it was partitioned and a new province, now called the North-West Frontier Province, was carved out of it. Another slice was taken off in 1912, when the Capital of the British Indian Empire was shifted to Delhi, and the city of Delhi and a part of the surrounding territory were constituted into a distinct province.

The Punjab is inhabited mostly by Hindus, Mohammedans and Sikhs. The Sikhs have their home in the Punjab and number about 3½ million. The chief occupation of the people is agriculture, but other industries are making headway and a considerable number of factories worked by steam have sprung up in various towns of the Punjab.

The Punjab supplies the flower of the British Indian Army. During the late War¹ the contribution of the Punjab to the army was the largest of all provinces of India.

Among the fighting classes the Sikhs hold the foremost place and Rajputs and Jats come next. The Rajputs and Jats of the western and southern parts are mostly Mussulmans and those of the eastern and northern parts are Hindus. The Jats of the Central Punjab are mostly Sikhs.

We give in Sir Michael O'Dwyer's own words the Punjab's war contribution in men. Speaking on the 7th April last, Sir Michael O'Dwyer said:

I have spoken so often about the War and the Punjab's share in it during the last year that I need say but little today. We started the War with 100,000 men in the Army.

In 1917, I was able to tell you that in the first $\frac{1}{2}$ years of the War we had raised 124,000 combatants. In the next year we raised over 127,000 and a year ago the total was over a quarter of a million. We were then in the most critical stage of the War and in response to His Majesty's August Message and the Premier's appeal, I asked the province to raise another 200,000 men including 180,000 fighting men within a year. Many people thought that was an extravagant demand. Those people did not know the spirit of the Punjab. April and May 1918 were the harvest months and we advisedly did not push recruiting. But 21,000 men were enrolled.

From June to September the recruiting campaign was carried on everywhere with great enthusiasm, and in those four months 78,000 men or over 19,500 per month joined the colours. In October, owing to the influenza epidemic, the number dropped to 14,426 and in November, when we were about to make a fresh effort, our enemies collapsed and hostilities came to an end, and the number fell to 6,313, but in six months, from June to November, we had raised 99,000 men, or half of the total promised, and in the eight months, April to November, our total was 121,000 men, including 1,00,000 combatants. If the need had continued, we should have completed our quota of 200,000. As it is, we can claim to have raised about 360,000 combatants during the four years of War, or more than half the total raised in the Indian Empire, excluding, of course, the splendid contribution from our gallant neighbours and allies in Nepal.

The Mohammedans forming 5/9th of the population, gave 48 per cent of the recruits, Hindus with 3/9th of the population, furnished \( \frac{1}{4} \) th, while the Sikhs, though only 1/9th of the population, also furnished \( \frac{1}{4} \) th.

As I said last year the fighting men were drawn almost exclusively, and the non-combatants mainly, from the rural population, both for Army and even in the Indian Defence Force; the townsfolk made but a slight response to the call for men, though they helped generously in the War Loan. But most of the rural Hindus did splendidly in recruiting and their proportionate recruitment, though much below of the Sikhs, is nearly equal to that of the Punjabi Mohammedans.

The administration of the Punjab is carried on by a Lieutenant-Governor, who has a Legislative Council under him—the members of which are partly elected and partly nominated.

The capital of the Punjab is and has always been at Lahore, which is a big town with a population of about 250,000, situated at a distance of about 1,200 miles from Calcutta, 300 miles from Delhi, 784 miles from Karachi, and 1,162 miles from Bombay.

The province is divided into 5 divisions under Commissioners, comprising 28 Districts under Deputy Commissioners or Collectors, viz., Ambala Division comprising the eastern part of the Punjab including Simla, the summer headquarters of the Government of India; Jullundur, including the mountainous and sub-mountainous parts; Lahore, the central parts; Rawalpindi, the north-western; and Multan, the western part of the Punjab.

of the Punjab in season and out of season. But my pride in the province is based on no narrow parochial spirit. I have spent 15 years away from it, during which I have seen many other parts of India. I might indeed say, much have I seen and known, cities, men and manners, climates, councils, governments. But nowhere did I find the same qualities as the Punjab can show, from the prince’s palace down to the peasant’s hut. I found I could meet the Punjabi, whatever his class or condition, as man to man without suspicion or mistrust. I found him, in the mass, loyal but not subservient, brave but not boastful, enterprising but not visionary, progressive but not pursuing false ideals, or mistaking the shadow for the substance. These are the qualities which have made the Punjab among the provinces of India ‘not least but honoured of them all’, and these are the qualities which, combined with the moral courage that will be so essential in the times before you, will keep the Punjab in the vanguard of progress and prosperity.

This is what Sir M. O’Dwyer said in a public speech made on the 7th April, the day after the universal hartal in India and three days before the firing on unarmed people at Amritsar and Lahore and the murders and arson in Amritsar.

The quotation is from the speech he delivered at his last meeting in the Council prior to his then intended departure.

But the same speech also contains the following:

The Government of this province is and will remain determined that public order, which was maintained so successfully during the time of war, shall not be disturbed in the time of peace. Action has, therefore, already been taken under the Defence of India Act against certain individuals at Lahore and Amritsar, who, whatever their motives, were openly endeavouring to rouse public feeling against the Government. The British Government, which has crushed foreign foes and quelled internal rebellion, could afford to despise these agitators, but it has a duty of protection to the young and the ignorant, whom they may incite to mischief and crime, while themselves standing aside. I, therefore, take this opportunity of warning all, who are connected with political movements in the province, that they will be held responsible for the proper conduct of meetings which they organize, for the language used at and the consequences that follow such meetings. Subject to these provisions the Government has no desire to restrict, in any way, the right of public meetings; but it is a matter of common knowledge that those who organize such meetings, even with quite legitimate objects, often lack moral courage or authority to restrain some of the more violent speakers. It is also, I fear, only too true that owing to the wild, reckless language which a handful of noisy agitators habitually indulge in, sober and reasonable men, with regard for their izzat¹, shrink from attending such meetings. Restraining influences are, therefore, either absent or are not exercised. Hence the necessity for my warning, which is addressed to the Press as well as to the platform. I would ask, in all seriousness, is this the calm and reasonable atmosphere which is needed to prepare the way for constitutional reforms? It certainly is not, and those who are creating that unhealthy atmosphere are the deadliest enemies of the cause of reform, which they propose to champion. Fortunately, their influence does not correspond to the noise they make. They do not speak with the voice of the Punjab.

He then expatiated on the inoffensive nature of the Rowlatt Act² and said about it what was not true, namely, that it conferred on the police no powers of arbitrary arrest, search or interference. Everyone who has read the Rowlatt Act knows that it does contain such powers, and that it is because it contains such powers that it was so strongly objected to by the people. Sir Michael, however, was not satisfied with his fanciful description of the Rowlatt Act. He wanted to show what he felt about the great demonstration of the 6th April, which for thousands upon thousands was of a semi-religious character because of the fast. He laughed at it in this manner:

The recent puerile demonstrations against the Rowlatt Act in both Lahore and Amritsar would be ludicrous if they did not indicate how easily the ignorant and the credulous people, not one in a thousand of whom knows anything of the measure, can be misled. Those who want only to mislead them incur a serious responsibility. I would remind them of President Lincoln’s famous saying: “You can, if you are very clever and very unscrupulous, mislead all people for some time and some people for all time, but you cannot mislead all people for all time.” Those who appeal to ignorance rather than to reason have a day of reckoning in store for them.

No other Head of Government in India laughed at the people on the 7th of April. Everyone but Sir M. O’Dwyer realized more or less the meaning of the 6th of April, but Sir Michael’s one desire was to provide “a day of reckoning” for those, who he thought, were appealing to passion or ignorance rather than to reason. It is not without considerable pain, that it will be our duty to show in the following pages, how it was Sir Michael who almost invariably appealed to passion and ignorance rather than to reason, and how serious a responsibility he incurred in misleading both the people and his superiors. It will be our painful duty to show also the meaning he attached to the phrase” day of reckoning”. He had occasion to speak again on the 10th. He spoke in the evening after he had learnt what had happened at Amritsar and Lahore. He spoke to the representatives of the martial races of the Punjab, who had met at the Montgomery Hall to present him with an address. We give the speech in full as reported by the Associated Press:

I am glad to think that the excitement of this evening has not prevented us from meeting here tonight. I am proud to meet, in this unique gathering, so many representatives of the great martial races, Mohammedan, Sikh, and Hindu of the Punjab, who, though differing in origin, religion and social customs, are united to one another and to the British Government by two bonds of steel, the bonds of loyalty and valour.

You realize the difficulties of the administration and the necessity of taking measures to prevent peaceful and orderly progress being disturbed by disorder and anarchy. You have seen within the last few weeks how a law passed to safeguard the lives and property of the people against such outbursts of anarchy and revolution—a law that is only to be brought into operation if, unfortunately, those conditions should arise—has by the persistent falsehood and misrepresentation of a small but noisy class been made to appear as a deadly weapon aimed at the people, whom it is intended to protect in situations of great emergency. Those of you who have studied that law know how baseless that agitation is. You can gather something of the motives of those behind that agitation from what took place a few days ago at Multan, when the Rowlatt Bill agitation was made a pretext for offering an insult to gallant Punjabi Mohammedans, Sikhs and Gurkhas, that had returned from the front after fighting the battles of India, and these insulters had, as we know, no martial spirit themselves and no appreciation for the valour and loyalty of those who had been safeguarding their hearths and homes. Their object is to attack Government and insult those who are true to their salt. Loyal men must and will oppose their evil designs. I would, therefore, ask you to explain the motives and policy of Government, as shown in that law, to those within your influence, and to expose the campaign of falsehood that is being carried on in certain quarters in order to mislead the ignorant and credulous masses and the scum of the bazaars of the towns and to incite them to crime and disorder.

The promoters of the agitation began by announcing a policy of so-called passive resistance. What form has that taken? You heard what happened at Multan on Saturday. At Lahore and Amritsar on Sunday coercion and intimidation were used to law-abiding citizens, and in Bombay they have begun openly to defy the law. This movement, unless promptly checked, will bring about disorder and bloodshed. It has already done so at Amritsar and Lahore and will endanger the lives and property of law-abiding citizens. Government looks to you and to all loyal citizens, whatever their political views, to join with it in openly denouncing this dangerous agitation and bringing it to a speedy close. Your co-operation with Government in this and similar matters will be as valued and as much appreciated as your memorable war services.

The situation is for the moment critical, and prompt action on your part and that of Government is required. Government will do its duty without hesitation, and will support you in doing yours. Government will enforce the law, and if that leads to bloodshed, the responsibility is with those who make others break the laws.

This is my last word of counsel, and I know you will take prompt action on it and enable me to restore public order before I leave the province. The trouble, though serious, is not widespread and, with your help, will soon be dispelled.

It will be a proud memory to me that in time of war or of internal trouble, I never appealed to the martial races of the Punjab in vain. I am confident that by your action and that of the loyal and sturdy men you represent, you will, within the next few weeks, establish a further claim to my gratitude and to the consideration of Government.

I must now say good-bye. In leaving the province I shall carry away recollections of what you have done. I shall not forget you, nor your work, nor your interest.

We have copied this speech in full, as it shows at a glance Sir Michael O’Dwyer’s mentality. It was given to the martial races of the Punjab. He has not hesitated to incite them against the people. He has distorted facts, as for instance regarding the conduct of the people of Multan against the soldiers. We have investigated the incident and we have found that no insult was offered to the soldiers who passed through Multan. He has wilfully misrepresented the scope of the Rowlatt Act to his audience and then threatened the people with punishment, practically for taking part in political agitation.
We now propose to give a brief outline of Sir Michael O’Dwyer’s administration, showing how he estranged every class from him, and how he tried to reduce the influence of the educated classes over the masses.

He had considerable experience of the Punjab before he was appointed Lieutenant-Governor, to which post he was called in 1913. He signalized his rule by contemptuous references to proposals for reforms. He said in reply to an address of welcome a few weeks after his appointment:

During the short time I have held charge of this province, I have received many excellent and well-meant suggestions, as to how I should carry on the administration, what I should do to meet the aspirations of the people, to further the movement towards self-government, towards the separation of executive and judicial functions, and in regard to other matters of state policy. Abstract speculations of this nature have their interest and value, though they would gain in value, if in addition to enforcing the duties of the administration, some stress were laid on the elementary duties of the people as citizens and subjects. I should have welcomed and I shall welcome any practical suggestion, as to how Government can discharge more efficiently its primary obligation to secure life and property, and how the people can be aroused to a sense of duty towards the community. All other questions of policy are, in my opinion, subsidiary to these two and should stand over till these obligations are adequately discharged.

He thus gave notice to his hearers that those reforms which they held to be vital for the progress of the country were “abstract speculations” and that he expected his hearers to help him in securing life and property and awakening a sense of duty to the community. One would have thought that life and property had become fairly secure, and that this security was claimed to be the proudest achievement of British Rule, and that the yearning for the reforms mentioned by his audience did show a sense of duty to the community. In the same speech he addressed a homily to the vernacular Press. It was followed by action under the Press Act. Security was demanded from several vernacular newspapers; the security already deposited was forfeited in some cases. A month later in his very first speech, as President of the local Legislative Council, he gave to the Press a second warning:

If the action already taken does not have the desired effect, Government will deal with the offenders as with any other individuals that break the law by promoting disorder or disaffection, and will employ all the means the law places at its disposal, and of these the taking and forfeiture of the security are the least.
This warning was followed by a more stringent policy regarding the Press, although he himself in the same speech, referring to the peace that was prevalent in the province, said:

The great results already achieved are due to the mutual confidence and intimate association of the administration and the people, which have always been a marked feature in this province.

He had occasion, six months later, of expressing his views regarding a proposal that an executive council be established in the province. To this very innocent proposal he thus replied on the 13th April, 1914:

The proposal had come upon him rather as a surprise. The people of the province had from the start been habituated to regard the Lieutenant-Governor as the sole head of, and in the last degree responsible for, the administration of the province. The province had progressed and prospered under that system in a manner which can stand comparison with any other province or presidency, and that the matter could come within the range of practical politics only if it could be shown that the present administration of the province suffers from certain defects, and that the addition of an executive council would remove those defects.

He then insulted those who had come to honour him, by quoting: ‘For forms of Government let fools contend’.

Five months later the War broke out and the Punjabis had a fairly full experience of the working of the Defence of India Act, in the passing of which he had no small share. What share he had and what powers he wanted, so as to supersede the ordinary procedure and safeguards of law, may be seen from the following recommendations of his, which were subsequently adopted by the Imperial Government.

We take them from the Sedition Committee’s Report, page 151:

The Lieutenant-Governor considered that “it is most undesirable at the present time to allow trials of any of these revolutionaries or other sedition mongers who have been or may be arrested in the commission of crime or while endeavouring to stir up trouble, to be protracted by the ingenuity of counsel, and drawn out to inordinate length by the committal and appeal procedure, which the Criminal Law provides.” His Honour, therefore, submitted for approval a draft ordinance which provided, subject to the sanction of the local government for its application in these cases: (a) for the elimination of committal procedure in the case of offences of a political or quasi-political nature; (b) for the elimination of appeal in such cases; (c) for the taking of security from persons of the class affected by a more rapid procedure than that prescribed by the ordinary law; (d) for the prompt punishment of village officers and the fining of villagers colluding with and harbouring revolutionary criminals.

He abused the powers given to him by the Defence of India Act by prohibiting the entry into the province of Messrs Tilak and Pal1. He interned hundreds of local men with little or no cause. He gagged the vernacular Press, prevented the nationalist papers edited outside the Punjab from circulating in the province, as, for instance, New India, Amrita Bazar Patrika, Independent. He prohibited the circulation even of pre-censored vernacular papers and brought about a state of things whereby it became practically impossible for the people of the province to have a free interchange of independent views, or a free ventilation of their grievances in the public Press, and then, having prevented free speech and free writing, allowed myself to think, and gave outsiders to understand that the people of the Punjab were the happiest under his rule.

Not only did he abuse emergency legislation for the purpose of throttling political aspirations, but he abused his position as a ruler by summoning public men, using threats and giving them warnings. Lala Duni Chand, who has an unbroken record of public service, had personal experience of this part of Sir M. O'Dwyer's administration. This is what he says in his statement given to us by him:

As a secretary of the Indian Association I had to call public meetings, and after the issue of the notices I was called either by the Chief Secretary to Government or the Commissioner of Lahore to see him, and they always put such obstacles in my way of holding public meetings that many persons in my place would have done anything but held public meetings in Lahore. The Chief Secretary and the Commissioner told me more than once, presumably on behalf of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, whom to invite and whom not to invite as speakers from outside the province.

Not only this but when some of the members of the Provincial Legislative Council attended the last Provincial Conference at Lahore, these gentlemen were called by the Chief Secretary, and were taken to task in such a way that they would not have the courage to attend other public meetings in the Bradlaugh Hall. (Statement No. 553.)

1 Bipin Chandra Pal (1858-1932); educationist, journalist, orator and political leader of Bengal
2 This statement and others cited subsequently are contained in Volume II of the Report of the Commissioners appointed by the Congress Punjab Sub-committee.
In 1917, nineteen members of the Imperial Legislative Council signed their famous memorandum, setting forth their proposals for reforms.\textsuperscript{1} A meeting was held to approve of the scheme. Four of the signatories to the notice of the meeting were Punjab men. He sent for them and administered to them a severe rebuke for having dared to think for themselves and to sign the notice. Then followed the Congress-League Scheme, and he tried his best to wean the Punjab from it, and lost no opportunity of belittling the effort to bring about a hearty union between Hindus and Mohammedans. He dared to confound the issue by comparing the Home Rule movement, led by Mrs. Besant and Mr. Tilak, whose goal was attainment of self-government within the Empire by constitutional and peaceful means, with the Ghadar\textsuperscript{2} revolutionists, whose goal was frankly to sever the British connection by violent means, and with the mad people of the South-West Punjab, who desolated many a home by harbouring chimerical views of establishing an Islamic Kingdom through German aid. He put down the Ghadar movement in a merciless manner, and, we fear, not without inflicting injustice on hundreds of innocent men. He affected to consider the pillage of defenceless homes in the South-West Punjab in 1915 by treating the pillage, in the early stage, as mere grain riots, and took energetic measures only when his hands were absolutely forced and when he saw that these depredations became so serious that they might even jeopardize the work of recruiting.

On the 13th of September, 1917, a resolution was moved by the Hon’ble Mr. Muhammad Shafi\textsuperscript{3}, asking that the legislative and administrative system in the Punjab be assimilated to that of the province of Bihar and Orissa. There was no opposition to this mild resolution from any quarter. Sir M. O’Dwyer himself rose to speak in its favour, but, to the amazement of everybody, he packed into a single speech as much irrelevancy and vilification of educated classes which is not reproduced here; statement and page numbers and appendices, quoted in brackets in such cases, refer to that volume.

\textsuperscript{2} The Ghadar Party, a revolutionary organization, was started in 1911 in California by Har Dayal, editor of \textit{Ghadar}. Through his paper and party he won over many immigrants from the Punjab to his revolutionary programme. These immigrants, working through their relations, were able to spread disaffection in the Indian Army, and when forced to return to India, they carried on anti-British activities.
\textsuperscript{3} Member, Imperial Legislative Council; became member of the Viceroy’s Executive Council in 1920
as he possibly could, till at last the Hon’ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, who could brook it no longer, interrupted his speech and called for an apology, which at the instance of the Viceroy he had to tender. His Excellency the Viceroy felt called upon to dissociate himself from Sir Michael’s views. We would give a few extracts from that speech of Sir Michael’s:

Speaking of my own province, while I would welcome a speedy progress, I must say that those conditions (meaning the three conditions set forth by Mill as indispensable for self-government) are not likely to be fulfilled for many a long day.

He observed again:

We should be glad if those who are so fond of basing political claims on the loyalty of India and the sacrifices of the Indians and the sacrifices of the Indian Army, which is mainly a Punjab army, would show their loyalty to the King Emperor and their sympathy for the province, which is bearing the burden of sacrifice, not by words, however eloquent, but in some practical form, for instance, by active help in the recruiting campaign in other provinces.

The following is another passage from the same speech to show Sir Michael’s utter want of appreciation of the educated classes:

In these days when we are in danger of being deafened by political harangues and of being blinded by the shower of political manifestos, it is well occasionally to return to mother earth to clear up our minds of shams and illusions, and to ask ourselves what will all this noise and talk do for the man on the soil, the man behind the plough, the man whose life is a long-drawn question between a crop and a crop.

The implications of the speech are obvious. It was for this affront to educated classes that he was made to apologize.

The meaning of an apology in ordinary English is that when a man apologizes for his speech or action he does not repeat it. Not so Sir Michael. On October 30th the same year—nearly a month after the apology—he practically went back upon it in the following words:

In a speech last month in the Imperial Council I described the signal services of the Punjab in this War with an emphasis, which some people considered excessive, as it involved a comparison with other provinces and their action during the War. I still adhere to my argument that the loyal services of the Punjab in providing men, money and materials for the Empire stand out pre-eminent, and establish a special claim on the consideration of the Government. I also reaffirm my contention that the services of the martial classes, on whom the burden of sacrifice has fallen, are receiving and should continue to receive prior recognition from Government, and that as the so-called political concessions will be of less benefit to them than to other classes, we have to look around for forms of recognition and reward which they regard as suitable and desirable.

In this revised version we see not only a repetition of the offence but a repetition in an aggravated form. He returns to the topic by way of complaint and gives a colouring to facts in order to prove—what nobody has denied—that the war services of the Punjab were singularly great. He isolates the martial classes from the others, insults the former by imputing to them want of political ambition, and tries to wean them from association with the others by holding out prospects of special recognition. His contempt of the educated classes and his inclination to withhold political power from them are easily traceable in the extract we have quoted.

But nothing perhaps shows more clearly his dislike of the educated classes than his memorandum on the question of constitutional reforms, published together with the Government of India’s despatch of March 5th, 1919. Describing the demands made by the educated classes for the whole of India, he says:

> If it is clear that the demands emanate not from the mass of the people, whose interests are at stake, but from a small and not quite disinterested minority, naturally enough eager for power and place, we must, if we are faithful to our trust, place the interests of the silent masses before the clamour of the politicians, however troublesome and insistent. Here I may quote Burke’s warning: "Because half a dozen grasshoppers under a fern make the field ring with their importunate cries, while thousands of great cattle, who repose beneath the shadow of the British oak, chew their cud and are silent, pray do not imagine that those who make the noise are the only inhabitants of the field."

We need hardly comment upon the deadly insult implied in the quotation. He then goes on, in the same writing, in total disregard of facts, to show that the educated classes have nothing in common with the masses, and that the latter are beginning to disown the educated leaders. He belittles the efforts regarding Home Rule made by Mrs. Besant, Mr. Tilak, Mr. Jinnah, Hon’ble Pandit Malaviya and the Raja of Mahmudabad. He exaggerates out of all proportion the non-Brahmin classes’ movement, reduces the All-India Muslim League to an unimportant body, depletes the awakening of the Punjab in spite of his prohibitive orders against Messrs Tilak and Pal, and then he says gratuitously that the advancement to be considered should be “not of the political classes alone but of the Indian people”, and winds up this portion of his memorandum by saying:

I have felt it necessary to emphasize this principle because I can find no adequate recognition of it in the Government of India proposals. Perhaps it is taken for granted. But an obligation so solemn should not be kept in the background; and in its absence the proposals read as if the only question to be considered is how to satisfy the aspirations of a certain proportion of the educated classes. The latter, no doubt, claim to represent the masses, but perhaps after what has come to light in the last few months, it is hardly necessary to expose the hollowness of the claim. Apply any practical test—the prevention of religious riots, the composing of sectional differences, the raising of recruits for the combatant army or the defence force—when any of these questions is to the fore, the politician usually retires into the background. His influence for good is generally nil, but he can and sometimes does add to the trouble by injudicious or malicious interference.

It is often stated as an argument for self-government, that there are no religious riots in Native States. For this there are many reasons, but a leading one is that the professional politician does not exist there, or, if he does, is not allowed to interfere. The one recent and serious religious disturbance that I am aware of in Native States—between Sunnis and Shias in Bhopal—was fomented largely by the interference of a Mohammedan lawyer from Bombay anxious to advertise himself. In the Punjab, though sectarian feeling often runs very high, it rarely leads to riot or bloodshed, because the local authorities know on whom to depend to compose matters. Those are not politicians but quiet men of local influence.

So much for Sir Michael and the educated classes. But though he claimed to regard the others with affection, he estranged them from him and his Government by his methods of recruitment and collection of war contributions. It is not, however, without considerable hesitation that we feel bound to deal with this matter. We realize the necessity that existed during the War for a vigorous campaign of recruiting and collection of monetary contributions. We realize, too, that if India claims, as she does, equal partnership with the other members of the Empire, she must bear her full share of the Empire’s burden. We would, therefore, if we could, have avoided any reference to the methods adopted for collecting contributions in men and money. But in understanding and appreciating the sudden response of the classes and the masses to the proposal for hartal, and then, in the Punjab, the unexpected exhibition of mob fury, it is necessary to go into the causes that contributed to the remarkable demonstration and in the Punjab to the manifestation of violence. For we consider that no amount of misrepresentation about the Rowlatt Act, assuming that there was any, can possibly account for the response of the masses, and the participation of a number of people in violence. Nor can any sense of duty towards the Empire be allowed to disregard the sacredness of individual liberty or to ignore cruelty or compulsion, secretly or openly but illegally practised. The evidence that we have collected and the judicial records that we have read conclusively prove that the methods adopted for securing recruits and donations or loans travelled far beyond the line of moral or social pressure; nor were these methods unknown to Sir Michael O’Dwyer. Indeed conscription was openly talked of, suggested and advocated, and we cannot help saying that open conscription would have been infinitely better than the so-called voluntarism, which was in effect worse than conscription, because the voluntarism pressed only the weakest and permitted the strong to go scot-free.

Let us glance at the actuality. Sir Michael said at a meeting on the 4th of May, 1918, just after the Delhi programme had been settled: “200,000 men for the regular army, voluntarism if possible, conscription if necessary.” Colonel Popham Young, speaking at the same meeting, said:

When deciding how to apportion the effort it is inevitable that many must be guided, must even be compelled. We shall continue to work on the lines of voluntarism. We shall fix quotas for each district, tahsil or village with reference to the material which is available, and shall in the great majority of cases obtain the number of men we require without resort to compulsion. But in order to be fair to those who come forward at the call of duty, we must forthwith be armed with authority. We must be able to say that when there has been a failure on the part of the people to choose their champions for the areas, Government will step in and make the choice for them.

Before I leave the subject of recruitment I must say a few words about conscription. No one, of course, dreams of conscripting the whole of India’s manhood for the half million combatants required; and if we can do without conscription in any form no one will be better pleased than I. But, splendid as has been the volunteer response of the Punjab hitherto, we must face the fact that the strain has been severe, that the burden has not been evenly distributed, and that the tribes and localities which have done their duty are not a little resentful against those who have not. The land-owning classes feel that they are paying the main burden of the War both in purse and in person, and that there are other classes who pay little or nothing in either form. Inequality of burdens as between classes is always a legitimate grievance. It becomes more acute as the need of men becomes more insistent and the call for men more imperative.

The contingency of failure of the voluntary system in certain areas is there and it would be cowardice not to face it. We have given our pledge, and we must take measures in time to secure its fulfilment. I believe that in the Punjab at any rate there is now a strong feeling in favour of some form of conscription to raise the necessary quotas, both within the province and as between the various provinces, the taking, for instance, of one fit man in ten or fifteen or twenty by lot, with the option of some pecuniary forfeit to be paid to the State. I hope I carry a large majority of my audience with me here, and, if so, it is right that the province, which hitherto has borne the main burden, should state its views in no uncertain language. The decision, of course, rests in other hands. But, gentlemen, the machinery cannot be set in motion at once. What, therefore, appears necessary is that Government should take power to enforce the quotas allotted to provinces, and that all the necessary preparations should be made in advance on the distinct understanding that the measure will not be applied if the quotas are forthcoming on voluntary basis.

A circular was issued by the Punjab Government making suggestions for obtaining contributions which could only be given effect to by using more than normal pressure. We give below one paragraph from the circular.

I am to suggest that Deputy Commissioners might assist much in the campaign by estimating the contributions that might reasonably be expected from the various towns. In doing so they will derive much assistance from the local income-tax returns, especially where the assessments have recently been revised by the special establishment. Income-tax returns furnish, too, a fairly reliable index to the relative financial condition of individuals who are expected to help the loan and a rough standard, which it is believed is already being applied in some districts. To judge of the adequacy of their investments in it, it would not be unreasonable to expect that on an average an assessee would be in a position to invest in the War Loan from half to one-fourth of the income on which he is actually assessed. Applying this rough test or others, which may be found suitable to local conditions, Deputy Commissioners should be in a position to see whether towns and villages or individuals in their jurisdiction are doing what is expected of them.

The Deputy Commissioner should then, by special meetings, formation of local committees of *sahukars*¹ and such expedients, endeavour to obtain the estimated sum as a minimum contribution. Local committees of traders and others presided over in large towns by Judicial Officers, Extra Assistant Commissioners or Tahsildars, will probably be able to effect a satisfactory distribution of the loan demand. Rivalry between towns and communities might be promoted by periodical publication and comparison of the amounts subscribed. Help might be afforded by a promise to recognize liberal subscriptions by sanads, by the grant of Chairs, and by the gift of special certificates. On the other hand, it should be made clear to wealthy citizens that failure to do their duty in this matter will be taken into account in nominations to municipal and notified area committees, in appointments of honorary magistrates, and in any other forms of Government recognition, on the ground that such honours are reserved for those who have shown in a practical form their desire to assist the administration.

Consequently subordinate officials put pressure upon the people. A letter was written to an “addressee in the Ambala district, asking him to inform the D.C. within one week through Lala Rangi Lal, Sub-Judge, what amount the addressee wants to invest in the War Loan”. The meaning of this is obvious.

Judicial processes were also pressed into service. The First Class Magistrate at Chakwal discharged an accused in Criminal Case No. 82 of 1917, noting that “the accused and his brother have between them subscribed Rs. 110 towards ‘Our Day Fund’ and according to verbal compromise made, accused is accordingly acquitted.”

Mehar Singh, son of Daulat Singh, applied for remission of income-tax in Case No. 36 of 1917 in the same court. The magistrate in dismissing the application remarked among other things:

Owing to the War, the profit of the mules is immense, but the objector has not contributed a pice to any War Fund or any War Loan. He has also a son whom he would not enlist.

There is a village called Leihia in the district of Muzaffargarh. A large crowd besieged the residence of the Naib Tahsildar, assaulted the chaprasi and the rural policeman. Some people were arrested. 52 of them were tried under Section 147 of the Indian Penal Code. On appeal, the Sessions Judge acquitted some, reduced the sentences of the others. Mr. Coldstream, the Judge in question, remarked that “the people had real grievances for which they wanted to find expression”. He said further:

It is a matter of common knowledge that the efforts of the subordinate officials in Muzaffargarh to raise the War Loan and to find recruits, owing to the methods adopted by Zaildars and Lambardars on whom pressure was brought to help in the matter, led to severe frictions in many places. It must be admitted, too, that these methods were frequently unauthorized, objectionable, oppressive, and opposed to the intentions of the Government. In remote tracts, they were found intolerable by the people. These acts could not, of course, be proved by the prosecution and it would be absurd to expect proof of them to be adduced in defence in a case of the present kind. It is necessary in the cause of justice to make this clear, even if in doing so I have to get outside the judicial record. The facts I have stated are, as I have said before, matters of common knowledge.

The Judge opined that the oppressive methods were opposed to the intentions of the Government. In every place we have visited we have been informed that the officials, who have been known to the people for their oppression, have not only not been degraded or publicly reprimanded, but they have been in many cases promoted.

In the Shahpur district, a Tahsildar was unfortunately even murdered. A Special Tribunal was appointed to try the case. 46 residents were prosecuted. 4 of them were sentenced to be hanged and 12 to transportation for life. 8 were discharged and 12 finally acquitted. Sir Michael O’Dwyer’s note, from which we have taken the above facts, says that vague allegations had been made of ill-treatment of the people by the late Sayed Nadir Hussain and that the Tribunal had given every latitude to the defence to prove any facts which might extenuate the crime, but that beyond the fact that his methods of recruitment amounted almost to conscription, nothing was proved against him and the Tribunal had held that his reputation was unstained by any discreditble conduct.

In our opinion, the admission that conscription was resorted to is its own condemnation. But Sir Michael O’Dwyer must have read the evidence produced at the trial. This is what Muhammad Khan, who was the reader for the deceased, deposed on behalf of the prosecution:

The Tahsildar’s method was to have a list of all men in a village prepared by the Patwari1. When he had got the list, it was the Tahsildar’s practice to go into the village and hear if any objections were taken to the selection of the recruits. It was his practice to ask a family of 3 or 4 brothers to provide one or two recruits for the army... He also secured some deserters from the neighbourhood of Gurna, who were sent under escort to the recruiting officer... The Tahsildar had noted the fact of selection as recruits against many names in this list... The zamindars of this ilaqa' usually ran away on the approach of the Tahsildar, being not accustomed to service and being afraid to come in front of him.

Nadir Hussain Shah was overzealous and wanting in tact to influence a wild people unused to join the army. The people had no traditions to back them... On the 6th February, the Patwari prepared the lists of Bakh Lurhkan. Government had directed such a list of men with their relationships and ages. Hence on the 6th February the men knew that they were likely to be enlisted for the army and alarm started.

Khan Ahmad Hussain Khan, Revenue Assistant, said before the court:

I heard a complaint that he made men to stand naked in the presence of their womenfolk... I never heard of any instance of a woman being tormented with thorns, but I have heard that men were confined between thorny bushes. I only heard of these occurrences of June. I never saw it done myself. What I have stated I have heard from Zaildars and other zamindars. Ghulam Muhammad of Hazara Miani told me that some women had been ill-treated at Kaura Kot and also in some Pathan village, perhaps Gurna. He told me that some women had been taken to Midh Ranjha and thence to Bhulwal in order to induce their relations either to return or to enlist. I also heard that the companions of the Tahsildar had grazed the crops of the absconders and looted their houses. I have heard that Sher Ali of Bucha Kalan had 15,000 or 17,000 rupees of the Tahsildar’s accumulated money. This money was reported as a result of bribery in recruiting. I have also heard that Sher Ali misappropriated this money. . . . The villagers’ grievance was only about recruiting. They did not want to be recruited. . . I only heard later on that two women of Ghullapur had been oppressed in the month of June. The Tahsildar himself informed me that, finding a large number of deserters belonging to Chhani Rehan, he had brought some pressure to bear upon them by grazing the crops of the villagers, with the result that the absconders returned. Before his arrival the villagers had left the village.

The Court naturally refrained from finding that ill-treatment by the deceased was proved. It said:

The Revenue Assistant, Khan Ahmad Khan, stated all he had heard as to the behaviour of the Tahsildar at our special desire, but on the whole the evidence before us shows that beyond the facts admitted by the prosecution that recruitment amounted almost to conscription, no instances of ill-treatment by the Tahsildar have been proved.

On this the Government communique remarks that “he had not insulted the people or outraged their feelings”. There is no positive finding by the Court to warrant any such assertion. On the contrary, if the Government had desired to find out the truth on the strength of the serious information in possession of the Revenue Assistant and given by him to the Court, they would have made a searching inquiry into the question of treatment apart from the murder trial.

We have collected some evidence of a direct nature, which, being of a serious character, we have refrained from publishing with our report. Mr. Gandhi, who is responsible for that collection, has placed himself in communication with the Punjab Government in the matter.

In another case in the same district a mob is said to have gathered round a village and resisted the arrest of seven men. They were fired at and several casualties had occurred. The defence version that the men resisted because they were afraid of enlistment, was rejected by the Court. But the fact of the resistance and firing tends to prove the allegation of oppressing methods.

In the Multan division the manager of an estate under the Court of Wards in the Kabir Wala tahsil went among the Khiji tribe for recruiting. A scuffle ensued resulting in casualties. The public prosecutor entered nolle prosequi against the manager. The question, however, remains why did the manager go among the tribesmen and why and what did they resist?

We have some answer from the recruiting returns published by Sir Michael O’Dwyer. The recruiting returns of the Multan district at the end of December 1917 stood at 759 or 1 in 586 of the male population. By the end of November 1918, the number rose to 4636 or 1 in 93. Such a phenomenal record is only possible under methods of compulsion. The Commissioner said:

I am afraid, with a few exceptions, the leading men in the district have not done their duty. Instead of enlisting members of their own families, they tried to buy or coerce men of lower stratum; objectionable methods of coercion were resorted to by some headmen with the result that in some cases public tranquillity was disturbed. Attempts were made in numerous cases, and these were successful, to fraudulently enlist foreigners from other districts and other divisions as residents of this district though this was against the orders of the Government.

No wonder Sir Michael O’Dwyer was obliged to deplore the fact that “a large proportion of those who joined deserted from their depots or units, and very few indeed faced the enemy in the field.”

The Commissioner of Ambala Division reported that “in order to make up the quota, the people resorted to the not unnatural expedient of subscribing large sums to be given to young men to enlist—500 or 1,000 rupees being the price of a recruit.”

Another popular device was to compel men of supposed bad character either to enlist or furnish security under Section 109 or 110 of the Indian Penal Code to be of good behaviour. The report on the administration of Criminal Justice for 1917 says:

District Magistrates have spent much time in recruiting work during the year. The large decrease in the number of persons called upon to give security under Section 110 of the Indian Penal Code is in a great part due to the heavy recruiting of the army.

An official went to the village Yara, district Karnal, and a number of boys were induced to offer themselves as recruits. The father of one of these entreated the Magistrate not to take from him his only son. The Magistrate would not listen and there was excitement and a scuffle. Some persons were brought up under the Defence of India Act and five were convicted. The conviction was set aside on appeal. It appears from the judgment that the lower court had acted under express orders of Mr. Hamilton, the District Magistrate. The Appellate Court says:

The various orders passed by the District Magistrate from time to time clearly show that if these appellants had also supplied recruits from among their near relations or if they were fit for enlistment themselves, they would have been let off, provided twenty recruits were made up from the village as was originally demanded from it.

Indeed, even twenty recruits were supplied, but the District Magistrate wanted the twenty recruits from the accused themselves.

In Gujranwala, in 1917, Sir Michael O’Dwyer, not being satisfied with the recruiting results, was pleased to rebuke the people on account of their remissness. Whether by accident or design, the then Deputy Commissioner was succeeded by Col. O’Brien and the recruiting barometer went up. The result was thus summarized by Sir Michael O’Dwyer in the August of 1918 at a durbar held at Gujranwala:

A year ago Gujranwala had 3,388 men in the Army, or only one man in every 150 of the total male population. At the end of last month, it had 11,765 men with the colours, which gives a ratio of one man in every 44 of the total male population and one in every 14 of military age. Thus within a year you have raised 8,500 men. That is a triumphant instance of successful organization, mainly due to the untiring activities of your admirable District War League under the inspiring and energetic guidance of your Deputy Commissioner, Colonel O’Brien, and his assistants, and backed up by the Divisional Recruiting officer, Major Barnes, and his recruiting staff.

This result was obtained by methods of which we have a graphic description from eyewitnesses at Gujranwala, Manianwala, Chuharkhana, Hafizabad and other places. From the numerous statements collected by us and printed in the appendix we cull only an extract from one typical statement. Sardar Khan, part-proprietor of Ratali in the Gujranwala district, deposed before Mr. Labh Singh, M. A., Bar-at-Law, who was specially deputed to collect evidence. He said:

The Tahsildar came to our village in the month of Baisakh. At night, it was proclaimed by beat of drum that all should present themselves in the morning at the village daira¹. As it was harvest time and also as the people were afraid of being forcibly taken as recruits, only a small number of people attended in the morning. The Tahsildar therefore fined some 60 or 70 persons. The total amount of fine was Rs. 1,600. The people were again ordered to present themselves at the headquarters at Gujranwala which is 18 miles off. When the people went there on the fixed date, they were made to stand in a row and 7 young men were picked out. This was done by Fateh Khan, Tahsildar. The other people were abused and beaten and told to bring more recruits. (Statement 591.)

Sardar Sant Singh, Vakil of Lyallpur, thus summarizes the recruiting and war loan methods:

War loan was forcibly levied in this district. Title-hunters exacted war loan from the masses in order to win honour for themselves. Rs. 33 per square were forcibly levied en masse. No exception was made. Even an adjudged bankrupt had to pay it. The history of this levy is interesting. It was proposed that every square-holder should be made to give Rs. 33, the value of one acre of land, to the Government. No squareholder was consulted. The proposal came from the title-hunters. It was accepted by the local authorities but was modified by the local government. In place of gift, the local government took it as a loan, the interest going to the improvement of the village, and not to the individual contributors.

Uttamsingh of Chak. No. 26 G.S. was prosecuted for an offence, when he was reluctant to pay it. The case was withdrawn on his making the payment.

Imperial War Relief Fund: Ten rupees per square were levied. People paid it as they could not help it.

_Lambardars_ had to furnish recruits on the penalty of forfeiting the _Lambardari_ rights. Several were actually dismissed. Thus the value of a recruit goes to Rs. 500. Police sent up people to be bound down for keeping peace. Magistrates refused bail and sent them to the lock-up, till they agreed to furnish recruits. Criminal prosecution was withdrawn on the accused agreeing to offer himself as a recruit. (Statement 516.)

Thus Sir Michael O'Dwyer galvanized the Punjab into life and made the Punjabis feel akin in a manner they had never done before. When, therefore, the month of April last was reached and he had an occult demonstration of the oneness of the Punjab and the oneness of India, he was stupefied and delivered his splenetic speech on the 7th April, from which we have already quoted. He wanted to make and did make a supreme effort to crush the spirit that was struggling to be free from the thraldom under which he had bound it during his iron rule. He scented danger in every honest speech made by the leaders and he detected conspiracy in every combination, and thus forgetting himself issued his orders against Dr. Satyapal, Dr. Kitchlew and Mr. Gandhi. He must have known that this could only end in exasperating a people who had already been incensed against his rule. We feel tempted to say that he invited violence from the people, so that he could crush them. The evidence in the appendix shows that he subjected the Punjabis to the gravest provocation, under which they momentarily lost self-control. They have paid dearly for it, but they have also, with amazing quickness, regained self-control and risen purified through the fire of sufferings, mostly undeserved, and earned the certificate for sanity given to them by Sir Michael O’Dwyer.

CHAPTER III

THE ROWLATT BILLS

The foregoing chapter makes it sufficiently clear that the people of the Punjab were subjected to a variety of pinpricks by the local administration, and that, by its studied contempt for them, it had made it well-nigh impossible for the natural leaders of the people—the educated classes—to control the populace. It was in this atmosphere that the Rowlatt Bills came upon the Punjab.

It is common ground that at the time these two Bills were published,¹ there was little or no revolutionary crime in India. Indeed, for years it had ceased to affect any part of India other than Bengal and the Punjab. In Bengal the party of violence came into being when discontent over the partition of Bengal grew to white heat. In the Punjab it was due to the various measures of the local government, which deeply dissatisfied the people, and it became serious owing to the gross ill-treatment of the proud Sikh settlers of Canada. They infected some local men, too, with their discontent, and the forcible interference with the returned immigrants, ex Komagata Maru, brought it to a head. The causes of violence in each case were

² In 1914, several hundred Punjabis sailed for Canada as emigrants. They were, however, not allowed to land by the Canadian Government. They returned by s.s. Komagata Maru to India where they landed as prisoners and were kept in camp at Budge Budge, near Calcutta, under armed guard pending removal to their well defined and, in our opinion, avoidable and remediable. Anyway, violence, both in the Punjab and in Bengal, was brought under complete check, as the Government contend, under the powers taken by them in virtue of the Defence of India Act.

This Act was passed as an emergency measure to cope with revolutionary outbreaks that were feared during the War. It is possible to understand the use of such powers when all available fighting material had been removed from India to the battlefields of France and Mesopotamia, and when India’s internal peace had to depend largely upon the loyalty and the peace-loving nature of the people. Extraordinary powers taken by the Executive, like Martial Law, enable one policeman to do the work of perhaps four, but this is done at the cost of the liberty of the subject, by depriving him of all the wholesome checks which regulate police procedure. When, therefore, the hostilities ceased, the people had looked forward to the repeal of the Defence of India Act. They had done so more because, in spite of the declarations made by the Government that the measure would be used only in case of real necessity and never for the purpose of stifling political agitation or hindering the movements of public men, it was used for the purpose of restraining political freedom. To mention no other case it was used in order to intern Mrs. Besant and her associates, because they represented in its intense form the Indian Home Rule movement. In it, there never was any suspicion of violence entertained even by her worst enemies. The public had, therefore, grown thoroughly distrustful of the Government, and had hoped that in view of India’s unique war record, and the declaration of August 1917 foreshadowing reforms leading to responsible government, that Act would be repealed and that the people would have respite from the unwelcome attentions of the Secret Service Department.

They were therefore taken by surprise when the two Bills were sprung upon them. The Viceregal speech ushering in the Bills added to the disquiet, as it seemed to show that the Bills were designed to answer the fears of the British element in the Civil Service regarding its safety under the reforms. The Indian position was explained by Mr. Gandhi in the following letter which he addressed to the Press, when he inaugurated his satyagraha movement.

We give below the text of the satyagraha pledge referred to by Mr. Gandhi in the foregoing. We now propose to examine, as briefly as possible, Bill No. II, known as the Rowlatt Act. We will not discuss the Bill No. I, which evidently appears to have been dropped by the Government.

The Act takes its popular name from the President of the Sedition Committee that was appointed by the Government of India on the 10th December, 1917, with Mr. Justice Rowlatt as its President,

(1) to investigate and report on the nature and extent of the criminal conspiracies connected with the revolutionary movement in India and

(2) to examine and consider the difficulties that have arisen in dealing with conspiracies and to advise as to the legislation, if any, necessary to enable Government to deal effectively with them.

The committee was required to sit in camera. It presented its report on the 15th April, 1918. With the exception of four sittings which it had at Lahore, the Committee had all its sittings in Calcutta. Mr. Justice Rowlatt in his covering letter addressed to the Government says:

As directed by the order appointing us, we have on every occasion sat in camera.

The public have no knowledge up to today of the nature of the evidence given before the Committee or the names of those who gave it. Naturally, the witnesses were not cross-examined on behalf of the public, for it was totally unrepresented before the Committee.

The Bills were the outcome of the recommendations of this Committee. We have read the report and the recommendations. As the recommendations were intended to deal with a state of things that did not exist at the time they were made, it is not easy to understand them. We know the argument that without the Defence of India Act or its substitute, non-eruption of violence could not be guaranteed. This argument involves two assumptions—first, that repressive legislation is necessary not merely to suppress crime of a revolutionary character, but that it remains under check only during the continuance of such legislation. Second, that there were yet men at large who are or were suspected to be revolutionaries.

The first assumption betrays bankruptcy of statesmanship and a confession of failure; the second, if true, betrays hopeless inefficiency. The fact is that the demand for repressive legislation means disinclination to yield to the will of the people; in other words, government of them against their will. The point was clearly brought out by the Hon’ble Mr. Sastri in his memorable speech on the introduction of the Rowlatt Bill. He said that even though political amelioration did not satisfy the confirmed anarchist, it, and not repression, was the only true way of securing peace, and proceeded to say:

Because the anarchist is in this unfortunate condition of mental derangement, are we to say, since these people are not going to be satisfied by political concessions, we will not think of them; we will only apply the rule of law to them? That is not the way I think that sound statesmanship should go about the business. We should offer them satisfying measures of political emancipation. But after all it is not these anarchists that have to be satisfied. It is general atmosphere which feeds anarchy that we have got no cure, and when the anarchist finds that he gets no sympathy anywhere, that he cannot propagate his wicked doctrine in a soil where there is contentment and political prosperity, he will naturally die, even if the long arm of the law does not get at him.

The Hon’ble Mr. Sastri’s remarks on the suggestion that the innocent need not fear the admittedly repressive character of the measure, are also worthy of note. He says:

A bad law once passed is not always used against the bad. . . In times of panic caused, it may be, by very slight incidents, I have known governments lose their heads. I have known a reign of terror being brought about; I have known the best, the noblest Indians, the highest characters amongst us, brought under suspicion, standing in hourly dread of the visitations of the

1 Before the Imperial Legislative Council on February 7, 1919
When Government undertakes a repressive policy, the innocent are not safe. Men like me would not be considered innocent. The innocent then is he who forswears politics, who takes no part in the public movements of the times, who retires into his house, mumbles his prayers, pays his taxes, and salaams all the government officials all round. The man who interferes in politics, the man who goes about collecting money for any public purpose, the man who addresses a public meeting, then becomes a suspect. I am always on the borderland and I, therefore, for personal reasons, if for nothing else, undertake to say that the possession, in the hands of the Executive, of powers of this drastic nature will not hurt only the wicked. It will hurt the good as well as the bad, and there will be such a lowering of public spirit, there will be such a lowering of the political tone in the country, that all your talk of responsible government will be mere mockery. You may enlarge your Councils, you may devise wide electorates, but the men that will then fill your Councils will be toadies, timid men, and the bureaucracy, armed with these repressive powers, will reign unchecked under the outward forms of a democratic government. Well, we are all anxious to punish the wicked. None of us desire that wickedness should go unpunished, but . . . even the wicked must be punished in certain ways. When Skeffington was shot,¹ I remember the whole world was shocked . . . . Now even in war, when all humanity throbs with excitement and peril, and when nobody thinks of anything except how to conquer the enemy, even then, my Lord, there are the laws of war. You have to play the game . . . when there are criminals abroad in a country there are certain ways in which they ought to be brought to book. You ought not to lay them by the heels and punish them in ways that will shock the sense of justice; in ways that will make the innocent feel that there is no law in the land; in ways that will make honest, virtuous and public-spirited work impossible. The price even for the extinction of wickedness that is demanded then is far too high. . . Much better that a few rascals should walk abroad than that the honest man should be obliged for fear of the law of the land to remain shut up in his house, to refrain from the activities which it is in his nature to indulge in, to abstain from all political and public work merely because there is a dreadful law in the land.

Mr. Sastri did not believe in Sir William Vincent’s² dictum that the aim of the Bill he was in charge of was not “the suppression but the purification of politics.” Mr. Sastri gave credit for good inten-

Ah! if in this world good intentions always bore fruit it would be very well. . .
The history of legislation, both social and political, is strewn with instances of miscarriage of excellent intentions. Laws intended to cure poverty have aggravated it . . . and I take leave to say to the Hon’ble Sir William Vincent that the laws now placed before us, which are aimed at purifying politics, may come dangerously near suppressing them. You cannot place on the statute-book such drastic legislation without putting into the hands of over-enthusiastic executive officers what I consider short cuts to administrative peace.

This repressive measure had no public support it, and in warning the Government against carrying the measure through in the teeth of the opposition, “unanimous and unsparing, of their Indian colleagues”, he thus asked the Legislative Council:

Whom have you behind now amongst Indians? The tragic story of India may be summed up in these words, that you have governed all these centuries in India in isolation, without having any responsible section of public opinion behind you . . . No section of public opinion supports you. The nominated members have not given their blessing to this Bill. The zamindar members have not given their blessing. The lawyer members will have none of it. The members of commerce will have none of it. And yet the Hon’ble Sir George Lowndes¹ told us, ‘We must carry this legislation through, because we are satisfied that it is very right; we should have been glad of your help, but with our sense of responsibility we must go on even without your help, however much we would have liked it.’ I admire the courage of the Hon’ble the Law Member. I admire the candour with which he said, ‘We have the responsibility today; you have none of the responsibility.’ We realize that position. We have none, my Lord, of the responsibility for this legislation, and I therefore refuse to believe when the case is put correctly before the public opinion that they will say, as the Hon’ble Sir William Vincent seemed to think sections of the English public might, that we had responsibility and shirked it. We have none.

Mr. Sastri then closed his speech with the following solemn warning:

Now there is only one more remark, my Lord, I must make and that in justice to the feeling in the country of which for the moment I am the spokesman. I do not think the Hon’ble the Law Member could have meant all that he said when he said that some of us were indulging in threats of agitation. I venture to think that no one here who has spoken against the Bill indulged in anything which might truthfully be described as a threat of agitation. None of us, certainly none of the Moderates, I take leave to say, has power to go and stir up a violent agitation in the country. It is impossible. Agitation must be there already. The heart must be throbbing, if any words that we use here can have a possible affect of the general political atmosphere. The agitation is there. I wish to assure my official colleagues that none of us has had a share yet in this business, but, if our appeals fall flat, if the Bill goes through, I do not believe there is anyone here who would be doing his duty if he did not join the agitation.

In spite, however, of the passionate protest, the motion that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee was carried, and the amendment¹, that its consideration be deferred till six months after the term of office of the Legislative Council, was defeated on the 6th of February, 1919. 22 voted for the amendment and 35 against. We give the names below of the 35 who voted against the amendment and therefore for the Bill, and the 22 who voted for the amendment and therefore against the Bill. It will be noticed that the only Indian name amongst the 35 was that of the Indian member² of the Viceroy’s Executive Council. He could not vote otherwise without resigning.

² Sir Sankaran Nair, who, however, submitted his resignation in July 1919
The final passage of this Bill on the 18th March, with some modifications, which the member in charge of it accepted and which did not touch the scheme or the scope of it, brought about three notable resignations, i.e., from Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, Mr. Mazharul Haque and Mr. M. A. Jinnah.

We shall now glance at the provisions of the Rowlatt Act and see whether it justified the widespread and unexampled agitation that took place over it.

Originally, it was to be a permanent measure, but an amendment was accepted in the select committee limiting its continuance to three years from the termination of the War. We consider that this limitation does not affect the opposition to the Act on principle.

It contains 43 sections and is divided into five parts. The preamble itself is interesting and it reads:

Whereas it is expedient to make provision that the ordinary criminal law should be supplemented and emergency powers should be exercisable by the Government for the purpose of dealing with anarchical and revolutionary movements.

It extends to the whole of British India. The first part enables the Governor-General-in-Council, if he is satisfied that in any part of British India anarchical or revolutionary movements are being promoted, and that scheduled offences in connection with such movements are prevalent to such an extent that it is expedient, in the interests of public safety, to provide for the speedy trial of such offences, to declare to that effect, and thereupon the provisions of the first part would come into force in the area specified in the notification. The defenders of the measure, whilst they admit that the powers vested in the Executive are great, contend that it does not much matter, as so high an authority as the Governor-General-in-Council has to be satisfied that anarchical or revolutionary movements are being promoted, and that scheduled offences in connection therewith are prevalent to an extent justifying the withdrawal of the ordinary safeguards against miscarriage of justice. Let us see how this high authority is generally satisfied. The initiative comes through a policeman of the lowest rank, who is often interested in exaggerating criminal movements, equally often, being hopelessly ignorant, is incapable of appreciating the facts before him, and is not unoften prone to corruption. He reports to his superior that a revolutionary movement is being promoted and that offences are being committed in connection therewith. The superior officer investigates. He is satisfied, or if not satisfied, the policeman in question submits further evidence, even though it may be concocted, and thus, the report, though it may be tainted at its origin or may be of doubtful value, travels upwards, gathering importance in its career, till at last it blossoms into a pronouncement by the Governor-General-in-Council, receiving an authority wholly undeserved. A study of the events in the Punjab will show clearly what we mean and how, rumours or suspicions assumed the dimensions of concrete revolutionary movements, and how utterly innocent men can be victims, sometimes even of malicious, and almost invariably of capricious, prosecution and persecution.

Now let us see what some of the scheduled offences are. They include the highly technical offence of sedition; rioting with deadly weapons; promoting enmity between classes; causing grievous hurt by dangerous weapons; causing hurt to extort property or to constrain to an illegal act; putting a person in fear of injury in order to commit extortion, dacoity, etc. Thus an energetic criticism of a Government measure, a religious riot, a Hindu-Mohammedan quarrel, extortion for private purposes or professional dacoity may all come to be recognized as having connection with a revolutionary movement, once a suspicion gains ground that such a movement is in existence.

What is the nature of this speedy trial? We must give it in the words of the mover of the Bill. These trials are to be conducted “expeditiously without commitment, and with no right of appeal, and may take place in camera.” The court may sit for the whole or any part of a trial at any place in the province as it may consider desirable, and at the instance of the Advocate-General, at some place other than the usual sitting place of the High Court.

Section 7 provides that the Criminal Procedure Code, in so far as it may be inconsistent with part I of the Act under discussion, shall not be applicable to the trials under it. Section 8 reduces the procedure to be adopted at the trials that may involve even the death penalty to that adopted for the “trial of warrant cases by magistrates”. The accused is entitled to ask for one adjournment only, at the most for fourteen days. Section 18 brushes aside two most important sections of the Evidence Act. Sections 32 and 33 of the Indian Evidence Act provide that a dead witness’s statement can be accepted, inter alia, only if it is against his pecuniary interests and has been previously subjected to cross-examination. Both these safeguards are done away with under Section 18, if the person making the statement before a magistrate is dead or cannot be found or is incapable of giving evidence and the court is satisfied that such death, disappearance or incapacity has been caused in the interest of the accused. This is a section which is capable of bringing about a complete abortion of justice. It is a most difficult thing for a court to know when dis-appearance or incapacity, even death, has taken place in the interest of the accused. The life of an innocent man may, therefore, be easily in jeopardy on the strength of an interested statement of a person who has never been cross-examined.

Under Section 17, judgments pronounced at such trials are held to be final, subject neither to appeal nor to revision. It has been urged that neither the partial suspension of safeguards provided by the Criminal Procedure Code or the Evidence Act, nor the deprivation of the right of appeal or revision need cause uneasiness, because the court shall be composed of three members, who shall have served as permanent judges of the High Court. As we shall show in the course of our examination of the events of April last, the fact of High Court Judges constituting a special bench is an illusory comfort when the High Court atmosphere is withdrawn. The highest judge is capable of making a mistake in assessing evidence, or applying the law thereto, especially when he is unaided by the controlling influence of a well thought out code of procedure or rules of evidence.

So much for part I of the Rowlatt Act. It is punitive in character. Part II deals with preventive measures and is, therefore, as the mover1 of the Bill practically admitted, more open to attack. Whereas Part I contemplates the actual commission of scheduled offences, part II authorizes the Governor-General-in-Council, if he is satisfied that revolutionary movements likely to lead to the commission of scheduled offences are being extensively promoted, to notify that the provisions of Part II shall apply in the area specified. Therefore, Section 22 enables the local government, where it has reasonable grounds for believing that any person is or has been actually concerned in a revolutionary movement, to place all the materials relating to such a case before a Judicial officer who is qualified for appointment to a High Court and to take his opinion thereon. Thereafter, if the local government is satisfied that action under part II is necessary, it may take security from such person for a period not exceeding one year, that he will not commit or attempt to commit any of the Scheduled offences, that he shall not change his residence without notifying the Government, that he shall be restricted to a particular area, shall abstain from any act calculated to disturb the public peace or prejudicial to public safety and shall report himself at the nearest police station at specified periods.

Section 24 authorizes the Government to use “all means reasonably necessary to enforce compliance with its orders”. Thus, upon mere suspicion, the most respectable man may find himself entirely at the mercy of the police. If this is prevention, it is worse than the disease, and prevention itself calculated to produce the very disease sought to be prevented.

This part II creates a special machinery intended to check the local government. It is called the investigating authority. This authority has to revise the orders of the local government passed under Section 22, and, for that purpose, has to hold an enquiry, not at its option, but compulsorily in camera.

Such authority shall in every case allow the person in question a reasonable opportunity of appearing before it at some stage of its proceedings and shall, if he so appears to him the nature of the charge made against him.

The Section 26 from which we have quoted specially provides that the person so charged shall not be represented by pleader, “nor shall the local government be so entitled”. It charges this authority not to “disclose to the person in question any fact the communication of which might endanger the public safety or the safety of any individual”. If the “person in question”—be it noted that the ordinary phraseology adopted for describing such persons, viz., “the accused”, has been omitted in this part, and yet the person in question has to go through all the disadvantages of a trial without any single one of its real safeguards—requests the investigating authority to secure the attendance of any person or the production of any document or thing, such authority shall, unless for reasons to be recorded in writing it thinks it unnecessary so to do, cause such person to attend, or such document or thing to be produced.

As if all this travesty of justice was not complete, Section 26 further provides that “In making the inquiry, such authority shall not be bound to observe the rules of the Law of Evidence.” We make bold to say that even a mind saturated with judicial tradition cannot do even-handed justice, if it is surrounded with the licentious conditions created by the section quoted.

Section 27 regulates the disposal of the report of the investigating authority it shows that the report has no binding effect upon the Government. The same section enables the Government to prolong the period under the original order to a further twelve months. Finally, the investigating authority is to consist of “three persons of whom two shall be persons having held judicial office not inferior to that of a District and Sessions Judge and one shall be a person not in the service of the Crown in India.”

If part II is worse than part I, again, in the words of the mover, “part III is more drastic.” By way of solace, Sir William Vincent adds:

It can, however, only come into operation when the Governor-General-in-Council is satisfied that scheduled offences have been or are being committed to such an extent as to endanger the public safety.

Part I applies when scheduled offences are prevalent to such an extent that it is expedient in the interests of the public safety to provide for the speedy trial of such offences. Part III applies when such offences are so prevalent as to endanger the public safety. The line of demarcation is thus very thin, and yet part III, Section 34, enables the local government to bring the case of a suspected person before a judicial officer and after considering that officer’s opinion it may make any order authorized under Section 22 in Part II and may further direct the arrest, without warrant, of any suspected person, and his confinement under such conditions and restrictions as it may desire, provided that the confinement is not one specially set apart for convicted prisoners, and it may also direct the search of any place specified in the order. Then, when orders are passed, the course to be adopted is the same as under part II, and thus, subject to the so-called investigation by the investigating authority, the person arrested may have to remain under confinement for two years without a proper trial. And when it is remembered that the Act has been passed not in order that a single suspected person may occasionally be placed under confinement, but that it is intentionally designed to affect large bodies of people at a time of anxiety and excitement, it is not difficult to picture to oneself a reign, not of law and order, but of organized terror and disorder, or Martial Law without the name.

Part IV applies to persons already dealt with under the Defence of India Act and whom it brings automatically under the provisions of part II and to persons in confinement in accordance with the provisions of the Bengal State Prisoners’ Regulation and brings them under part III. It also brings under Part II persons affected by the Ingress into India Ordinance\(^1\) upon its expiry.

Supposing that the notifications about affected area issued under parts I, II and III are cancelled, Part V provides that, notwithstanding such cancellation, any “trial or investigation or order commenced or made under this Act, such trial, investigation or order may be continued or enforced and on the completion of any such investigation any order which might otherwise have been made, may be made, and enforced as if such notification had not been cancelled.” It also authorizes the arrest of any person affected by Part III outside the area in British India in which part III is not applicable and such person so arrested is then governed by the same procedure as in part III, as if Part III for him was in force throughout British India.

Section 42 provides that orders made under the Act shall not be called in question in any court and “no suit or prosecution or other legal proceeding shall lie against any person for anything which is in good faith done under this Act. The last section provides that the powers given by the Act are to be cumulative and not in derogation of any other powers conferred upon the local government.

It is this Act which raised a storm of opposition unknown before in India. It has been contended on behalf of the Government that there has been misrepresentation and exaggeration in connection with the Act. We hold that the Act hardly lends itself to popular misrepresentation. It has certainly been misrepresented on the official side. A typical exaggeration that we have seen complained of is a cryptic phrase, “\(na\) appeal, \(na\) dalil, \(na\) vakeel\”, meaning “no appeal, no argument, no pleader”. In our opinion, if this is the worst description of the Act on the popular side, it far understates its evils, rather than overstates them. In our opinion, no self-respecting person can tolerate what is an outrage upon society. The crime of the Government became complete when they persisted in it the face of unanimous popular opposition. We would note, too, that the Viceroy has sufficient powers by means of ordinances to deal with extraordinary situations. The Government were wholly unjustified in placing on the statute-book, on the eve of liberal reforms\(^2\), an extraordinary measure to deal with anarchy, as if anarchy had been endemic instead of being rare in India.

CHAPTER IV

SATYAGRAHA

It was in order to combat the Rowlatt Act which had raised a storm of unprecedented opposition inside the Council Chamber from the Indian members and outside from the Indian Press, that Mr. Gandhi launched out his satyagraha movement.

People have only a hazy notion of what satyagraha is and how it is applied. We therefore give it in the words of its author, who has prepared for us a special note upon it:

For the past thirty years I have been preaching and practising satyagraha. The principles of satyagraha, as I know it today, constitute a gradual evolution.

The term satyagraha was coined by me in South Africa to express the force that the Indians there used for full eight years, and it was coined in order to distinguish it from the movement, then going on in the United Kingdom and South Africa under the name of passive resistance.

Its root meaning is “holding on to truth”; hence, truth-force. I have also called it love-force or soul-force. In the application of satyagraha I discovered in the earliest stages that pursuit of truth did not admit of violence being inflicted on one’s opponent, but that he must be weaned from error by patience and sympathy. For what appears to be truth to the one may appear to be error to the other. And patience means self-suffering. So the doctrine came to mean vindication of truth, not by infliction of suffering on the opponent, but one’s own self.

Satyagraha differs from passive resistance as the North Pole from the South. The latter has been conceived as a weapon of the weak and does not exclude the use of physical force or violence for the purpose of gaining one’s end; whereas the former has been conceived as a weapon of the strongest, and excludes the use of violence in any shape or form.

When Daniel disregarded the laws of the Medes and Persians which offended his conscience, and meekly suffered the punishment for his disobedience, he offered satyagraha in its purest form. Socrates would not refrain from preaching what he knew to be the truth to the Athenian youth, and bravely suffered the punishment of death. He was, in this case, a satyagrahi. Prahlad¹ disregarded the orders of his father, because he considered them to be repugnant to his conscience. He uncomplainingly and cheerfully bore the tortures to which he was subjected at the instance of his father. Mirabai² is said to have offended her husband by following her own conscience, was content to live in separation from him and bore with quiet dignity and resignation all the injuries that are said to have been done to her in order to bend her to husband’s will. Both Prahlad and Mirabai practised satyagraha. It must be remembered, that neither Daniel nor Socrates, neither Prahlad nor Mirabai had any ill will towards their persecutors. Daniel and Socrates are regarded as having been model citizens of the States to which they belonged, Prahalad a model son, Mirabai a model wife.

This doctrine of satyagraha is not new; it is merely an extension of the rule of domestic life to the political. Family disputes and differences are generally settled according to the law of love. The injured member has so much regard for the others that he suffers injury for the sake of his principles without retaliating and without being angry with those who differ from him. And as repression of anger and self-suffering are difficult processes, he does not dignify trifles into principles, but, in all non-essentials, readily agrees with the rest of the family, and thus contrives to gain the maximum of peace for himself without disturbing that of the others. Thus his action, whether he resists or resigns, is always calculated to promote the common welfare of the family. It is this law of love which, silently but surely, governs the family for the most part throughout the civilized world.

I feel that nations cannot be one in reality, nor can their activities be conducive to the common good of the whole humanity, unless there is this definite recognition and acceptance of the law of the family in national and international affairs, in other words, on the political platform. Nations can be called civilized only to the extent that they obey this law.

This law of love is nothing but a law of truth. Without truth there is no love; without truth it may be affection, as for one’s country, to the injury of others; or infatuation, as of a young man for a girl; or love may be unreasoning and blind, as of ignorant parents for their children. Love transcends all animality and is never partial. Satyagraha has therefore been described as a coin, on whose face you read love and on the reverse you read truth. It is a coin current everywhere and has indefinable value.

Satyagraha is self-dependent. It does not require the assent of the opponent before it can be brought into play. Indeed, it shines out most when the opponent resists. It is therefore irresistible. A satyagrahi does not know what defeat is, for he fights for truth without being exhausted. Death in the fight is a deliverance, and prison a gateway to liberty.

It is called also soul-force, because a definite recognition of the soul within is a necessity if a satyagrahi is to believe that death does not mean cessation of the struggle but a culmination. The body is merely a vehicle for self-expression; and he gladly gives up the body, when its existence is an obstruction in the way of the opponent seeing the truth, for which the satyagrahi stands. He gives up the body in the certain faith if anything would change his opponent’s view, a willing sacrifice of his body must do so. And with the knowledge that the soul survives the body, he is not impatient to see the triumph of truth in the present body. Indeed, victory lies in the ability to die in the attempt to make the opponent see the truth, which the satyagrahi for the time being expresses.

And as a satyagrahi never injures his opponent and always appeals, either to his reason by gentle argument, or his heart by the sacrifice of self, satyagraha is twice blessed; it blesses him who practises it, and him against whom it is practised.

It has however been objected that satyagraha, as we conceive it, can be practised only by a select few. My experience proves the contrary. Once its simple principles—adherence to truth and insistence upon it by self-suffering—are understood, anybody can practise it. It is as difficult or as easy to practise as any other virtue. It is as little necessary for its practice that everyone should understand the whole philosophy of it, as it is for the practice of total abstinence.
After all, no one disputes the necessity of insisting on truth as one sees it. And it is easy enough to understand that it is vulgar to attempt to compel the opponent to its acceptance by using brute force; it is discreditable to submit to error, because argument has failed to convince, and that the only true and honourable course is not to submit to it even at the cost of one’s life. Then only can the world be purged of error, if it ever can be altogether. There can be no compromise with error where it hurts the vital being.

But, on the political field, the struggle on behalf of the people mostly consists in opposing error in the shape of unjust laws. When you have failed to bring the error home to the lawgiver by way of petitions and the like, the only remedy open to you, if you do not wish to submit to it, is to compel him to retrace his steps by suffering in your own person, i.e., by inviting the penalty for the breach of the law. Hence, satyagraha largely appears to the public as civil disobedience or civil resistance. It is civil in the sense that it is not criminal.

The criminal, i.e., the ordinary law-breaker, breaks the law surreptitiously and tries to avoid the penalty; not so the civil resister. He ever obeys the laws of the state to which he belongs, not out of fear of the sanctions, but because he considers them to be good for the welfare of society. But there come occasions, generally rare, when he considers certain laws to be so unjust as to render obedience to them a dishonour; he then openly and civilly breaks them and quietly suffers the penalty for their breach. And in order to register his protest against the action of the lawgiver, it is open to him to withdraw his co-operation from the state by disobeying such other laws whose breach does not involve moral turpitude. In my opinion, the beauty and efficacy of satyagraha are so great and the doctrine is so simple that it can be preached even to children. It was preached by me to thousands of men, women and children, commonly called indentured Indians, with excellent results.

When the Rowlatt Bills were published, I felt that they were so restrictive of human liberty that they must be resisted to the utmost. I observed, too, that the opposition to them was universal among Indians. I submit that no state, however despotic, has the right to enact laws which are repugnant to the whole body of the people, much less a government guided by constitutional usage and precedent, such as the Indian Government. I felt, too, that the oncoming agitation needed a definite direction, if it was neither to collapse nor to run into violent channels.

I ventured therefore to present satyagraha to the country, emphasizing its civil resistance aspect. And as it is purely an inward and purifying movement, I suggested the observance of fast, prayer and suspension of all work for one day—the 6th of April. There was a magnificent response throughout the length and breadth of India, even in little villages, although there was no organization and no great previous preparation. The idea was given to the public as soon as it was conceived. On the 6th April, there was no violence used by the people, and no collision with the police worth naming. The hartal was purely voluntary and spontaneous. I took no steps to further the idea beyond publishing the following message on the 24th March last at Madras:

Satyagraha, as I have endeavoured to explain at several meetings, is essentially a religious movement. It is a process of purification and penance. It seeks to secure reforms or redress of grievances by self-suffering. I therefore venture to suggest that the second Sunday after the publication of the Viceregal assent to Bill No. 2 of 1919 (i.e., 6th April) may be observed as a day of humiliation and prayer. As there must be an effective public demonstration in keeping with the character of the observance, I beg to advise as follows:

(i) A twenty-four hours’ fast, counting from the last meal on the preceding night, should be observed by all adults, unless prevented from so doing by considerations of religion or health. The fast is not to be regarded, in any shape or form, in the nature of a hunger-strike, or as designed to put any pressure upon the Government. It is to be regarded for the satyagrahis as a necessary discipline to fit them for civil disobedience, contemplated in their pledge, and for all others, as some slight token of the intensity of their wounded feelings.

(ii) All work, except such as may be necessary in the public interest, should be suspended for the day. Markets and other business places should be closed. Employees who are required to work even on Sundays, may only suspend work after obtaining previous leave.

I do not hesitate to recommend these two suggestions for adoption by public servants. For, though it is unquestionably the right thing for them not to take part in political discussion and gatherings, in my opinion they have an undoubted right to express, upon vital matters, their feelings in the very limited manner herein suggested.

(iii) Public meetings should be held on that day in all parts of India, not excluding villages, at which resolutions praying for the withdrawal of the two measures should be passed.

If my advice is deemed worthy of acceptance, the responsibility will lie, in the first instance, on the various satyagraha associations for undertaking the necessary work of organization, but all other associations will, I hope, join hands in making this demonstration a success.

The doctrine of satyagraha as explained by Mr. Gandhi seems to be clear and intelligible as a theoretical proposition. But, we think that it is not easy, as it may appear at first sight, to reduce it to practice in every walk of life. For the practice of such satyagraha a large amount of discipline in patience and self-control is necessary. And these are the qualities that are in practice found to be most lacking, when they are most needed. Satyagraha to be acceptable as a doctrine of everyday life by a large number of people must be capable of being practised by the average human being; and the average man is more prone to resort to violence than to sacrifice himself, when he is chafing under a sense of wrong. Mr. Gandhi’s answer is that the average man does exercise such patience in the family circle, and Mr. Gandhi only asks for its extension to the political circle.

In any case, this is not the place where we need examine the feasibility of the doctrine any further than we have done. This much is clear that the preaching of an innocuous doctrine of this nature can only do good to society. And it is our firm belief, based on our examination of hundreds of men, that, had not the spirit of satyagraha permeated the people who took part in the agitation, the results would have been infinitely more disastrous than they were. The exemplary self-control exercised by the people in the other parts of India shows, not that they are vitally different in temperament from the Punjabis, but that the restraining influence of satyagraha was powerful enough to control the anger of the people against the action of the Government in forcing the Rowlatt Act upon India. If the people had been able to vent their resentment without disregarding restraint and discipline in offering disobedience to the laws of the State, it is highly likely that the Government would have long ere this yielded to the people’s will.

But the restraining influence of satyagraha proved unequal to the strain put upon it by the Punjab Government. Had Sir M.
O’Dwyer recognized the sobering effect of satyagraha and cooperated with the people, as did the Governments of the other provinces in a more or less perfect manner, the terrible sufferings of the Punjab would have been avoided, and the history of the past few months would have been differently written.

We admit that satyagraha, if properly practised, would render government of people by brute force an impossibility, and that, therefore, an effective enforcement of laws disliked by the people would be difficult, if not altogether impossible. But that can be no ground of complaint in a state whose constitution requires the assent of the governed to their government in a given manner.

It only remains for us to examine whether satyagraha was responsible for the murders, arson, and pillage that took place in the Punjab. The preaching of satyagraha, as we have shown, could never produce violence in any shape or form, for it is negation of violence. The preaching of the civil disobedience from of satyagraha, however, can easily lend itself to misinterpretation, and can only be cautiously undertaken. We recognize the necessity for the utmost caution in advocating civil resistance. It is easy enough to undermine respect for law, but it is not equally easy to inculcate suffering involved in civil, i.e., non-violent disobedience of the laws of a state. Civil resistance can therefore only be preached where the ground has been previously prepared for self-suffering. We had to note that Mr. Gandhi frankly, and we think rightly, admitted his error in prematurely embarking on mass civil disobedience, and immediately suspended his movement.1

In the Punjab, however, the civil resistance part of satyagraha was neither appreciated nor understood, much less practised. The hartal, as such, has nothing to do with civil resistance. It may be a part of satyagraha, if it is voluntary, free from all violence and resorted to not to express ill will against, but disapprobation of the acts of a wrongdoer. Moreover, hartal is an ageold institution in India, resorted to by people under the very conditions in which it was applied in the Punjab during April. Neither satyagraha nor hartal, therefore, had anything to do with the mob excesses. What led to them will be considered in the following pages.

THE MARTIAL LAW
PART I : GENERAL

We have followed Sir Michael O’Dwyer’s administration with regard to his treatment of the educated classes and his recruiting methods. We have endeavoured to show how Sir Michael O’Dwyer estranged all classes of Punjabis from him. We have also described in sufficient detail the Rowlatt Act and its consequences. We have shown, too, the nature of the agitation that took place throughout the length and breadth of India for its repeal. We have given, in the language of its author, the principles of satyagraha, and we think we have shown sufficiently clearly that the Rowlatt Act agitation, which crystallized into shape on the 6th April, produced no violence whatsoever, and that satyagraha, as conceived and applied by its author, is singularly free from violence; indeed, its propagation and acceptance can only result in greater peace and security of life and property. We have shown, too, that the Rowlatt Act agitation and satyagraha had likewise enabled the people to realize their power, and had energized them. The people in the Punjab had no love for the Government, as represented by Sir Michael O’Dwyer. They were thoroughly discontented. This discontentment became intensified by reason of high prices. They had expected better times in every way after the War. On the contrary, the termination of hostilities brought into prominent relief their own precarious position. The unrest thus caused was aggravated by the Khilafat agitation, the Mohamedans, without just cause, distrusting the intentions of the British Government.

In order properly to understand the events of April last, it is necessary to bear in mind the foregoing facts, which are scarcely capable of being disputed.

The Punjab had a complete hartal on the 6th April. It was a scene unparallelled in the Punjab, and, for that matter, in India. On that day, the leaders and the people seemed to act as one man. There was complete fraternization between Hindus and Mohammedans. Resolutions were passed all over, protesting against the Rowlatt Act and demanding its repeal. The demonstration of the 6th of April was a peaceful assertion of the people’s will.

This, however, proved too much for Sir Michael O’Dwyer. He scented danger to the British Rule in both the hartal and the Hindu-Mohammedan unity. To him it was an anti-British combination that must be broken at any cost. Even the prosecution against the Lahore leaders dignified their peaceful acts by the name of “conspiracy and waging war”. The precis of the Lahore case, prepared by the convening authority, proceeds:

The measure commonly known as the Rowlatt Bill was passed by the Imperial Council on 18th March, 1919. Thereupon, a general conspiracy was formed by persons outside the Punjab, with whom the accused associated, to hold tumultuous meetings, and to ordain a general strike with the intention and object of inflaming popular feeling against Government, and to so overawe it as to try to induce the vetoing of the measure. Accordingly, throughout India, and in the Punjab in particular, the said conspirators, including the accused, declared a general strike, commonly known as a hartal, to take place on the 30th March, intending thereby to induce disorder, paralyse the economic life of the country, and excite disaffection and hatred towards Government.

Then follows a general statement of several meetings, called in the precis “riotous assembly”, and this is followed by two paragraphs which we must give in the words of the Government draftsman:

On the 9th April, in pursuance of the conspiracy to excite disaffection and feelings of enmity against Government, and on the occasion of the Ramnaumi procession, the accused, Rambhuj Dutt, Gokal Chand, Dharm Das Suri and Duni Chand and others encouraged the fraternization of Hindus and Mohammedans against the Government as by law established. On the 10th April, the Government of the Punjab, with a view to maintaining peace and order, prevented the ingress of one of the conspirators, by name Gandhi, into the province, and, on the same date, ordered the deportation of two other conspirators from Amritsar, by name Kitchlew and Satyapal. These precautionary measures of Government for the preservation of peace and order were seized upon by the conspirators as a signal to wage war against the King.

We cite these paragraphs to emphasize the points made by us, viz., that the hartal, the meetings preceding and following it, and the fraternization of Hindus and Mohammedans were interpreted as a menace to the Government. Nor was this treatment of the hartal and the fraternization afterthought. Sir Michael O’Dwyer had expressed himself in plain language on the 7th April. We have already quoted from his speech of that day. He had met the Hon’ble Raizada Bhagat Ram, a barrister of Jullundur. He expressed his strong disapproval of the hartal to him also, as will appear from the statement submitted by him. Raizada Bhagat Ram says:

After the meeting (of Punjab Legislative Council) I met the Lieutenant-Governor in the drawing-room. He asked me what sort of a hartal we had at Jullundur. I replied it was a complete hartal, and that there was no disturbance. Sir M. O’Dwyer asked me what I attributed it to. I answered, “to my mind it was due to the soul-force of Mr. Gandhi.” On this, Sir Michael raised his fist and said, “Raizada Sahib, remember, there is another force greater than Gandhi’s soul-force.” (Statement 650.)

Thus Sir Michael was determined to crush all political consciousness by any means he could think of. He was prepared to goad the people to madness. How he partially succeeded we shall see presently.

THE MARTIAL LAW

PART II: AMRITSAR

We shall take Amritsar first, as it was there that the goading process took place. Amritsar is second in importance to Lahore, though in many respects it is more important even than Lahore. Its population numbers 160,000. It is the city of the Golden Temple, the greatest place of Sikh worship. Being the largest commercial centre in the Punjab, and having the Golden Temple, it attracts travellers and visitors from all parts of the Punjab and even from outside.

About the middle of April marks the Hindu New Year’s Day, when in Amritsar there takes place also a cattle fair. The New Year’s Day is called the Baisakhi, the occasion being both religious and commercial. Every year it draws crowds from far and near. The Baisakhi is preceded by the Ramnaumi celebration.

Amritsar observed the 6th of April in a thorough manner; the Mohammedans, the Sikhs and the other Hindus belonging to all grades observed complete hartal. It was spontaneous and voluntary. The behaviour of the crowd was unexceptionable and there were no accidents to regret or to report.

The ninth April was the Ramnaumi day. It is principally a Hindu religious function. But this time it was used for Hindu-Mohammedan unity. The Mohammedans took a leading part in it.
Dr. Kitchlew and Dr. Satyapal were among the organizers of the fraternization. Long before this, the two leaders had risen into prominence by their public services.

Dr. Saif-ud-din Kitchlew is a Mohammedan barrister enjoying a considerable practice. He is a Doctor of Philosophy of Munster and a graduate of Cambridge. He was also a student at Aligarh. He is 35 years old, is married and has got two children. He has interested himself for several years in Hindu-Mohammedan unity.

Dr. Satyapal is a Hindu, Khatri by caste. He is a B.A., M.B., of the Punjab University. He held the King’s Commission for one year at Aden during the War as Lt., I.M.S. He was a co-worker with Dr. Kitchlew and became popular by reason of having carried on a successful agitation against the stoppage of the issue of platform tickets to Indians at the Amritsar Railway Station. Both became much more popular during the Rowlatt agitation, and both approved of satyagraha. There is no doubt that at Amritsar, as elsewhere, the Rowlatt agitation began to draw much larger audiences than before, and as the agitation gathered force, by their continuous activity they became the idols of the people.

Dr. Satyapal was prohibited on the 29th March, 1919, under orders of the Government of the Punjab from speaking in public and he was interned in Amritsar.

As has been observed in the previous chapter, hartal was observed in some parts of India on the 30th of March also. It was observed that day in Amritsar.

The meeting of the 30th March at Amritsar, according to official accounts, is said to have been attended by from 30,000 to 35,000 persons, but all accounts agree that it passed off without a single untoward incident. The speakers at the meeting emphasized the peaceful and religious character of the function. These are the closing words of Dr. Kitchlew:

We will be ever prepared to sacrifice personal over national interests. The message of Mahatma Gandhi has been read to you. All countrymen should become prepared for resistance. This does not mean that this sacred town or country should be flooded with blood. The resistance should be a passive one. Be ready to act according to your conscience, though this may send you to jail, or bring an order of internment on you.

Again:
Do not cause pain or distress to anyone. Go home peacefully. Take a walk in the garden. Do not use harsh words in respect of any policeman, or traitor, which might cause him pain or lead to the possibility of a breach of the peace or a riot.

But Sir Michael O’Dwyer was much ruffled by the hartal and the meeting at Amritsar. He, therefore, served on Dr. Kitchlew also the same order as on Dr. Satyapal. The order is dated the 3rd April and reads that he shall until further order (a) remain and reside within the municipal limits of Amritsar City; (b) refrain from communicating, either directly or indirectly, with the Press; and (c) refrain from convening or attending or addressing in writing or otherwise any public meeting.

Pandit Kotu Mal, Pandit Dina Nath and Swami Anubhavanand were also similarly restricted. These orders had undoubtedly agitated the public mind, but the people were not unnerved by them. There was, therefore, another complete hartal on the 6th April, and a meeting larger still than the one held on the 30th March. Mr. Badrul Islam Khan, a barrister of Amritsar, presided at the meeting which is said to have been attended by 50,000 people. Quoting again from the official record, the meeting passed a resolution requesting the Government that the orders against Dr. Satyapal and others might be rescinded. The burden of the speeches in connection with the orders will be found in the following sentence, which we extract from the report before us:

The only fault found with them is, that they informed all of us of the real object of the Rowlatt Act.

A resolution asking for the repeal of the Rowlatt Act was also passed. The president in concluding the proceedings said:

Today’s meeting has been held more successfully even than the meeting of Sunday last. Your object as to the expression of opinion has been accomplished. At this time people should not exhibit passions, but they should be patient. Mahatma Gandhi’s advice is: in this struggle we will patiently bear grief and sorrow and thus save ourselves from violence and harshness. Falsehood will fail and truth shall win. If you preserve peace of mind, patience and forbearance the meeting shall have vast effect. But if there is the least disturbance, and even two men fight with each other, this will entail bad result and the meeting will have no effect. The audience is therefore requested to leave the meeting-place very calmly and not to make any sort of procession.

The report from which we have quoted the above passage and which is dated the 8th April concludes:

The public fully complied with the directions of the president.

The 9th of April, as already stated, was the great Ramnaumi day. The leaders had decided that there should be complete fraternization between Hindus and Mohammedans on that occasion. The Ramnaumi is usually a religious function, but the Mohammedans having decided to take part in it, it undoubtedly assumed a larger significance. It was a big procession, in which a large number of Mohammedans took part. Dr. Kitchlew and Dr. Satyapal witnessed the procession from different places and received a great ovation from it as it went past them. The Deputy Commissioner of Amritsar also watched the procession, and as the various band parties passed him they struck up God Save the King. And again in spite of the great demonstration, there was no regrettable incident and no accident.

All this popular demonstration and unfoldment of national consciousness would have gladdened any ruler with imagination and sympathy with popular aspirations. It only enraged Sir Michael O’Dwyer. He was angry that his orders, referred to by us, instead of cowing down the people had only made them bolder and more articulate in their demands. Therefore, practically at the same time that the popular demonstration was going on in an orderly, perfectly constitutional manner, an order was being forged in the Punjab Government Secretariat, which was to destroy and disturb the people’s peace; for the Lieutenant-Governor had decided to deport Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal. The orders were received at Amritsar late at night on the 9th April, and Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal were sent for on the 10th April by the Deputy commissioner, who served the orders on them and sent them away to an unknown destination in a motor-car. The news spread throughout Amritsar like lightning. A crowd immediately gathered together. It was a crowd of mourners—bareheaded, many unshod, and all without sticks. It was on its way to the Deputy Commissioner’s bungalow to plead for the release of its loved ones. It marched through the principal streets of Amritsar, passed by the National Bank, the Town Hall and the Christian Mission Hall, the very buildings which within a short time were to be destroyed.
by some of them. Its progress was, however, stopped at the railway-carriage over-bridge which was guarded by a military picket. The men demanded passage and said that they wanted to go to the Deputy Commissioner’s bungalow to make farad—a prayer. They pushed forward, the picket fell back a little. They advanced, the military fired, killing and wounding some of them; whereon the crowd fell back. It was now no longer a peaceful crowd. It was a crowd foiled in its effort to secure the release of its leaders, and exasperated at the wounding and the killing of some of its members. These enraged men went to the railway foot-bridge and some to the Hall Bazaar, carrying the killed and the wounded. The sight of the wounded persons and dead bodies inflamed the citizens who saw them. Within a short time, a large crowd was again seen near the carriage over-bridge and the foot-bridge. This time it had armed itself with sticks and pieces of wood. Both the bridges were guarded by the military.

Meanwhile, the members of the Bar, having heard of the uproar, had offered their services to the Deputy Commissioner with a view to intervention. They were permitted to intervene. On their arrival, Mr. Plomer, the Deputy Superintendent of Police, Amritsar, told them that a big crowd had gone towards the railway yard. Some, therefore, went in that direction and some remained near the bridges. Those that went to the railway yard succeeded in clearing the crowd from it. Near the carriage over-bridge, however, the position was more difficult. Messrs Salaria and Maqbool Mahmood were trying, on the one hand, to reason with the crowd, and, on the other hand, to restrain the authorities from firing. At one time it appeared as if they would succeed, but some persons in the crowd threw stones or pieces of wood at the military, who instantly fired, killing about twenty persons and wounding many. Messrs Salaria and Maqbool Mahmood had themselves a narrow escape. The officer in charge expressed his regret for ordering the fire whilst they were in the crowd and trying to help the authorities by persuading the crowd to disperse. Mr. Maqbool Mahmood then went to the Civil Hospital and brought Dr. Dhanpat Rai to render first aid to the wounded. The stretchers were brought from the hospital, but it is said that Mr. Plomer sent them away, saying that the people would make their own arrangements. Some of the wounded were taken to Dr. Kidar Nath’s house. He was living very near to the Zenana Hospital. It is stated that Mrs. Easdon, on seeing the wounded, laughed and said that the Hindus and the Mohammedans had got what they deserved. Upon this, a party forced its way into the hospital and tried to find out Mrs. Easdon, but was in the meanwhile concealed by Mrs. Benjamin and was only thus able to escape the mob. The excited mob sacked the National Bank and murdered Mr. Stewart, the manager, and Mr. Scott, the accountant.

Those who had gone to the goods shed murdered Mr. Robinson, the railway guard. The mob attacked the Alliance Bank and upon Mr.
Thomson, the manager, firing revolver shorts, became infuriated and murdered him, threw down his body and burnt the corpse with the Bank furniture. Sergeant Rowland, the Cantonment electrician, was killed near the Rigo Bridge. The Town Hall, the Post Office and the Mission Hall were burnt, and so was a part of the Bhagtanwala Railway Station. An attack was attempted on the Chartered Bank also, but no serious damage was done to it, the Indian staff of the Bank saving the situation. Miss Sherwood\(^1\) who was cycling was brutally attacked, but she was rescued by the father of one of her Indian pupils. The crowd, there is little doubt, contained the usual badmash (hooligan) element, which seeing the opportunity resorted to looting the National Bank godowns. We might mention here that since then some policemen had been apprehended for being in possession of property stolen from the banks. The whole of the destruction and looting was finished before 5 p. m. on the 10th April.

The provocation given by the deportation of their beloved leaders to the people of Amritsar was grave and uncalled for. This was doubled when the unarmed crowd was prevented from proceeding on its peaceful errand, and upon becoming insistent was fired on. It is necessary here to recall and emphasize the fact that up to the time of reaching the carriage over-bridge and the firing on it, the mob had committed no violence. It is difficult to say what would have happened if the mob had been allowed to proceed to the Deputy Commissioner’s bungalow and there had its prayer rejected, as it was likely to be. It would have largely depended on the way the Deputy commissioner dealt with them. It must be granted that the crowd was in an assertive mood, and if the authorities thought that the crowd would have acted in a violent manner, we are not prepared to blame them for checking its advance. Our study of the evidence led before the Martial Law Commissions, of the official evidence led before

\(^1\) An Englishwoman who worked in the local Mission School
Lord Hunter’s Committee and the evidence collected by us, leads to the conclusion that there was no warrant for the firing. The authorities omitted all the intermediate stages that are usually resorted to in all civilized countries. There was no parleying, no humouring, and no use of milder force. Immediately the crowd became insistent, the order to fire was given. In this country, it has become too much the custom with the executive and the military never to run any risk, or, to put it in another way, to count Indian life very cheap.

This is what Mr. Maqbool Mahmood, High Court Vakil, who together with Mr. Salaria was trying to reason with the crowd, says with reference to the second firing:

Salaria and I shouted out to the Deputy Commissioner and the officers to get back and not to fire, as we still hoped to take the crowd back. A few of the crowd threw wood and stones at the soldiers. The soldiers at once opened a volley of fire without any warning or intimation. Bullets whistled to my right and left. The crowd dispersed, leaving 20 or 25 killed and wounded. After the firing stopped, I went up to the soldiers and enquired if they had an ambulance car, or any first-aid arrangements at hand. I wanted to run to the hospital, which was close by, for help. The soldiers would not allow me. Mr. Seymour, however, let me go. . . . The Deputy Commissioner himself was present when the fire was opened. He knew that Salaria and I were members of the Bar, and were trying to get the people back to the city. It was by mere accident that our lives were saved. I still believe, if the authorities had a little more patience, we would have succeeded in taking the crowd back. It is a matter of regret that, when the authorities decided to fire, they did not make any arrangement for an ambulance car or first aid. I believe some of the wounded might have been saved if timely medical assistance had been forthcoming. After the first few shots, the crowd rushed back, but the firing was continued even after they began running away. Many of them were hit on the back. Most of the wounded were hit above the belt, on the face or on the head. (Statement 5, pp. 30 & 31)

It should be remembered that the mob had not yet indulged in excesses. There was, therefore, no occasion for impatience, indifference of callousness, which, according to this witness, was evidently the case.

Whilst, therefore, we deplore the deportation order and the firing, and consider both as unjustifiable, and the absence of any ambulance arrangement as inhuman, nothing can be held to justify the wanton destruction by the mob of the innocent lives and properties. The bank managers were deservedly popular. The others who were murdered were unknown to the crowd and totally innocent. Miss Sherwood was a devoted Christian teacher and no remarks, however objectionable, that might have been made by Mrs. Easdon, could warrant the proceedings of the mob. The destruction of the buildings was utterly mad, and we cannot help saying that all the good that had been done by the wonderful self-restraint previously exercised by the Amritsar people was undone by these wild and unworthy acts of the mob.

Could these excesses have been prevented? Could innocent lives have been saved? What were the police doing? The Kotwali (Police Station) is a portion of the same block as the Town Hall. There were sufficient numbers of the police force at the Kotwali. The crowd did not touch the Kotwali, whilst it burnt the adjoining Town Hall with impunity. Most of the other buildings burnt were within a stone’s throw of the Kotwali. The police had also intimation of the fact that the banks were being set fire to. It was clearly the duty that the banks were being set fire to. It was clearly the duty of the police to have bestirred themselves and, even at the peril of their lives, at least tried to save the Englishmen who were murdered.

This murder and incendiaryism came upon the authorities with such suddenness that they were unnerved for the time being. Mr. Kitchin was sent post-haste from Lahore by the Lieutenant-Governor. He says in his evidence before the Hunter Committee that he met people on the road. He motored unmolested to Amritsar which is about 35 miles from Lahore. This was in the afternoon at about 4 p.m. on the 10th April. At night at about 11, a troop train came with troops under Major MacDonald. Mr. Kitchin told him “that the situation was beyond their control and that he should take such steps as the military situation demanded.” He says further in his evidence that “he advised him to send a suitable force into the city and get information, or bring the survivors, which was done.” “Why was not a civil magistrate sent?” asked Lord Hunter. Mr. Kitchin replied:

I expected that the party would have to fight their way and the presence of a civil magistrate would naturally embarrass what was purely a military operation . . . The survivors were brought out and the Kotwali was reinforced without any resistance or fighting.
He returned to Lahore on the 11th. The charge of the city was handed over by Mr. Miles Irving to the military. On reaching Lahore, he informed the Lieutenant-Governor of this and the Lieutenant-Governor approved. Next morning, Mr. Kitchin again motored to Amritsar, but he saw no indication of any disturbances. Meanwhile General Dyer had arrived, established his headquarters at Ram Bagh and had taken over full control.

The first thing General Dyer did was to make arrests. He entered the city and made about twelve arrests without any molestation or resistance whatsoever.

We now turn to the people’s doings during this time. On the night of the 10th, the city was left to itself, but there was no robbery or looting. Early in the morning of the 11th, they wanted to dispose of the dead. The military authorities would not allow, at first, more than 4 persons to accompany each bier. The people were intensely dissatisfied. They wanted a funeral procession. They sent their representatives to plead for them. At last, permission was granted after much haggling, but the procession was ordered to return before 2 p.m. The procession was very large, but the orders were strictly carried out and everything was finished before the appointed time. On the 12th April, Hans Raj, who subsequently became chief approver in the Amritsar conspiracy case, held a meeting at Dhab Khatikan, and he announced that another meeting would be held on the 13th April in the Jallianwala Bagh under the chairmanship of Lala Kanhya Lal. Lala Kanhya Lal himself denies having ever been asked or having consented to preside at any such meeting. He is a respectable pleader of long standing, 75 years old, and he is very popular. (Statement 29.) We have no doubt that his statement is correct. We believe that his name was used to draw a large crowd.

To understand the events that followed it is necessary to have a picture of Amritsar as drawn by one who belonged to it, and yet had been away just for a few days. We have such a picture given be Lala Girdhari Lal, Deputy Chairman of the Punjab Chamber of Commerce, and Managing Director of the Amritsar Flour and General Mills Company. He says:

I reached Amritsar by Calcutta Mail from Cawnpore on 11th April, 1919, about 11.30a.m. . . . From and on the canal bridge near Amritsar, I saw batches of policemen guarding the railway lines. When the train steamed into the station here, the whole place looked like a regular military post, with soldiers and guns scattered all over . . . No coolie or conveyance of any kind was to be had. Just as I came out of the platform, Sardar Bikram Singh met me and advised me either to go back where I had come from, or not to enter the city in any case. Being extremely nervous, as it appeared to me, he did not talk to me long. By the kindness of a railway servant, after waiting for 20 minutes, with great difficulty, I got a coolie to carry my luggage as far as the Golden Temple. At the foot-bridge there was a guard of some European soldiers, who would not let anyone enter the city without searching all things thoroughly. Sticks of all kinds were taken away from everyone. After a thorough over-hauling of all my things I was allowed to proceed further. No one was permitted to go over the carriage-bridge. This continued for days, till the 15th April probably. At every step outside the city, one could see nothing but only military or police as short distances with rifles and bayonets. Not a single policemen was to be seen on duty anywhere within the city. . . . The first thing that struck me, immediately on entering the city, was the stoppage of water supply completely. . . . Later, in the evening, I found the electric connection all over the city proper also cut off. To the best of my memory, this inconvenience also lasted at least up to 18th or 19th April, if not later. While proceeding to the Golden Temple, I saw marks of violence. Telegraph wires were cut, some buildings were burnt. (Statement 1, pp 1 & 2.)

According to the official testimony also, the cutting off of the water supply and electric light lasted three or four days, and it is quite evident that the cruel deprivation was intended largely to be a punishment for the whole city for the violence in which only a few could take part and which, as Lord Hunter pointed out to a witness, the peaceful citizens could not prevent.

On the 13th April, in the morning at about 9.30, General Dyer entered the city with an escort and made a proclamation. It was, according to the General’s evidence before Lord Hunter’s Committee, in three parts. The last part is the only part relevant to the occasion. It runs:

No procession of any kind is permitted to parade the city or any part of the city or outside of it any time. Any such procession or gathering of 4 men will be looked upon and treated as an unlawful assembly and dispersed by force of arms, if necessary.

General Dyer was closely questioned on the significance of the qualifications “If necessary” and on the meaning of the word “gathering” in juxtaposition to the word “procession”. “If necessary” can only mean “in the event of such gathering not dispersing otherwise”, and “gathering” can only mean “gathering in a public street”; otherwise any gathering of more than 4 men in private houses would become an unlawful assembly in terms of the proclamation.

This proclamation was read out by an interpreter in Punjabi and Urdu, at intervals, during General Dyer’s progress through the city, which he says occupied “2 or 3 hours”. The drum was beaten to gather the people. A map was handed to the General indicating the places at which the proclamation was read, and he admitted that it was not read in many parts of the city. We have examined the map of the city with the route marked. More than one half, and that the most populous part of the city, was left untouched by the General. There is abundant evidence to show that very few citizens knew anything about the proclamation. Moreover, the 13th April was, as stated before, the Baisakhi, the Hindu New Year’s Day, and many people from surrounding villages were streaming in, who knew nothing of the proclamation. That such people did come and could not have heard the proclamation is admitted by the official witnesses.

At or about the time of this proclamation a boy was announcing in the streets of Amritsar, by beating a tin can, that a meeting would be held at 4 p.m. at Jallianwala Bagh, and that Lala Kanhya Lal would preside at that meeting. There may be a question as to the exact time of this announcement by the boy. The evidence before us, however, shows that the announcement was made some time before the proclamation by General Dyer. Lala Kanhya Lal says:

I heard that some men (who have not been traced up to this time to my knowledge) had, on the 13th April, proclaimed that a lecture would be given in the Jallianwala Garden by me. This led or induced the public to think that I would give them some sound advice on the situation then existing. (Statement 29, p. 73)

At about 12.45 p.m., General Dyer was informed that a big meeting was to be held at Jallianwala Bagh at 4.30 that very afternoon. General Dyer admits that he took no steps to prevent the meeting. “I want you to explain,” asked Lord Hunter, “why you did not take measures to prevent the crowd from assembling at the Jallianwala Bagh?” The General answered:

I went there as soon as I could. I had to organize my forces, to think the matter out. . . . I thought I had done enough in warning them not to meet.

Lord Hunter asked:

Did the making of dispositions necessitate the occupation of the time between 12.40 to 4 p.m.?
General Dyer answered:

I did not believe that they would really meet, after all that I had done in the morning. I did not think of sending off another force and warn them not to go.

He got definite information at 4 o’clock that the meeting was actually being held. Soon after, he marched off towards the city with picketing parties consisting of 25 rifles of Gurkhas and 25 Sikhs. He had also 40 more Gurkhas armed with kukris, and he took two armoured cars with him. He went at the “ordinary walking pace”. To Lord Hunter’s question why he did not consider there was any necessity for proceeding with any extra expedition, he said:

No Sir, it was very hot; we went at the usual pace of marching.

He reached the Bagh about 5 or 5.15 p.m.

What is Jallianwala Bagh? The word bagh is a misnomer; ‘Jalle’ is the caste name of the original owner, wala is the genitivetermination; and the bagh, meaning a garden, is really an open piece of waste land surrounded by houses. It was, at the time, a private property owned in common by several people. As will appear from the plan attached, it is an irregular quadrangle, indifferently walled; and in most cases, the back walls of the house surrounding it enclose the quadrangle. There are three trees in the quadrangle, a dilapidated samadhi (tomb) with a dome, and a well. The main entrance is a narrow passage through which armoured cars happily could not pass. There were no other regular entrances, but at 4 or 5 points it was possible to get out through narrow openings. The ground at the entrance is an elevation, remarkably fit for posting soldiers and firing upon a crowd in front. When therefore, General Dyer marched into the Bagh with his 90 soldiers, the crowd had no easy exit.

According to the evidence before us, Hans Raj, prior to General Dyer’s arrival, was in possession of the audience estimated at 20,000. He and a few others were standing on an improvised platform marked on the plan. An aeroplane was hovering over the meeting before the arrival of the troops. Hans Raj asked the meeting not to be afraid. The audience included many boys and children, and some men had come with infants in their arms. The people had no lathis with them. There were some C.I.D. men also at the meeting. Two of them were seen talking to Hans Raj. General Dyer deployed

1 Dagger-like weapons.
25 soldiers to the right and 25 to the left, on the high ground on the north side of the rectangular space. It is best to give what happened afterwards in his own words:

Q. When you got into the Bagh, what did you do?
A. I opened fire.
Q. At once?
A. Immediately. I had thought about the matter and don’t imagine it took me more than 30 seconds to make up my mind as to what my duty was.
Q. As regards the crowd, what was it doing?
A. Well, they were holding a meeting. There was a man in the centre of the place on something raised. His arms were moving about. He was evidently addressing. He was absolutely in the centre of the square, as far as I could judge. I should say some 50 or 60 yards from where my troops were drawn up.

The General had admitted that there might have been a good many who had not heard of the proclamation. So Lord Hunter asked:

On the assumption that there was that risk of people being in the crowd who were not aware of the proclamation, did it not occur to you that it was a proper measure to ask the crowd to disperse before you took that step of actually firing?
A. No, at the time I did not. I merely felt that my orders had not been obeyed, that Martial Law was flouted, and that it was my duty to fire immediately by rifle.
Q. Before you dispersed the crowd, had the crowd taken any action at all?
A. No, Sir. They had run away, a few of them.
Q. Did they start to run away?
A. Yes. When I began to fire, the big mob in the centre began to run almost towards the right.
Q. Martial law had not been proclaimed. Before you took that step, which was a serious step, did you not consider as to the propriety of consulting the Deputy Commissioner who was the civil authority responsible for the order of the city?
A. There was no Deputy Commissioner to consult at the time. I did not think it wise to ask anybody further. I had to make up my mind immediately as to what my action should be. I considered it from the military point of view that I ought to fire immediately, that if I did not do so, I should fail in my duty.

Q. In firing was it your object to disperse?
A. No, Sir. I was going to fire until they dispersed.
Q. Did the crowd at once start to disperse as soon as you fired?
A. Immediately.
Q. Did you continue firing?
A. Yes.
Q. After the crowd indicated that it was going to disperse, why did you not stop?
A. I thought it was my duty to go on until it dispersed. If I fired a little, I should be wrong in firing at all.

Then in reply to a variety of questions, General Dyer said he continued to fire for about 10 minutes, and that he had no “military experience to use similar methods of dispersing crowds”; “he could have dispersed them, perhaps even without firing”. But he fired, because “they would all have come back and laughed at him and he would have made a fool of himself”. His reasons for firing, he has given, in answer to another question, as follows:

I thought they were trying to assault me and my force suddenly. All these pointed that this was a widespread movement which was not confined to Amritsar alone, and that the situation was a wide military situation which was not confined to Amritsar.

The General had fired 1,650 rounds of ammunition. He admitted also that if he could have taken the armoured cars into the Bagh, he would have done so and opened fire with them, that he stopped shooting when he did because the ammunition had run out, and that the crowd was very dense. He had made no provision for aiding or removing the wounded. It was not then his duty to render aid. That was a medical question. As soon as the firing ceased he retired. From time to time, he “checked his fire and directed it upon place where the crowd was thickest”, and that he did, not because they were not going fast, but because he (the General) “had made up his mind to punish them for having assembled”.

We must now supply further details of the scene from the mouths of eyewitnesses. We have already adverted to Lala Girdhari Lal’s statement. He happened to watch the scene from a house overlooking the Bagh.

I saw hundreds of persons killed on the spot. The worst part of the whole thing was that firing was directed towards the gates through which the people were running out. There were small outlets, 4 or 5 in all, and bullets actually rained over the people at all these gates, and...many got trampled under the feet of the rushing crowds and thus lost their lives. Blood was pouring in profusion. Even those who lay flat on the ground were shot... No arrangements were made by the authorities to look after the dead or wounded... I went round the whole place and saw almost every body lying there. There were heaps of them at different places... The dead bodies were of grown-up people and young boys also. Some had their heads cut open, others had eyes short, and nose, chest, arms, or legs shattered... I think there must have been over 1,000 dead bodies in the garden then... I saw people were hurrying up and many had to leave their dead and wounded, because they were afraid of being fired upon again after 8 p.m. (Statement 1, pp. 10 & 11.)

It may be mentioned here that the second part of the proclamation made on the 13th April by the drum beat, reads:

No person residing in the city is permitted to leave his house after 8. Any person found in the street after 8 is liable to be shot.

The witness further states:

Many amongst the wounded, who managed to run from garden, succumbed to injuries on the way and lay dead in the streets. It was thus that the people of Amritsar held their Baisakhi fair.

In the matter of the death-roll, it is interesting to note that according to the Government’s own showing, they did not commence investigating the figure before the 20th August, i.e., four months after the tragedy. Mr. Thompson then announced that not more than 290 had died. Now they have practically accepted the Sewa Samiti’s figures, viz., 500, which are based on actual tracing and represent the minimum. The exact figure will never be known, but, after careful investigation, we consider that Lala Girdhari Lal’s computation of 1,000 is by no means an exaggerated calculation. They must have been indifferent shots if, after directing their fire in the thickest part in a concentrated area, and among 20,000 people, the soldiers were not able to kill 1,000 men. Let it further be remembered, the fire was directed even into and from the Hansli, the narrow lane to the right, on the plan. We observed bullet marks on a balcony opposite the lane; and evidence has been led before us to show that soldiers were posted.

at points outside the Bagh to guard approaches, and men were shot whilst they were effecting their escape through these approaches. There can be no doubt that General Dyer’s plan was to kill the largest number, and if the number was 1,000 and not more, the fault was not his. His ammunition was exhausted, and he could not take his armoured cars through the passage, it being too narrow.

It is not possible to describe, in all the hideous detail, the events of the 13th, and to use Justice Rankin’s expression, its “frightfulness”. In order to appreciate it fully, one must read the whole of the official evidence and the evidence published by us. After the violence of the 10th April, the English official had become angry, and perhaps rightly so. The very men towards whom they were in the habit of showing courtesy now repelled them. Lala Dholan Das, a reputed resident of Amritsar, was one such man, but when he went at the request of the authorities to see them, he found them in an angry mood.

All were in excited temper: so much that Mr. Seymour is reported to have said that for every one European life one thousand Indians would be sacrificed. Someone suggested bombarding of the town, and Lala Dholan Das informed the officers that if, in any way, any part of the Golden Temple was touched or damaged, there would be no end of trouble, as this temple was held sacred all over the Punjab. (Statement 1, p. 7.)

Mr. Muhammad Sadiq, Barrister, went with others to see the authorities regarding the disposal of the dead on the 11th April. He says:

The impression I got from the talk I had with them was that, as Europeans had been murdered, their blood could not remain unavenged, and if there be the least resistance or disobedience or any breach of the peace, sufficient amount of force would be used and, if necessary, the city would be bombarded. (Statement 19.)

Dr. Balmokand, Sub Assistant Surgeon, says that on the 11th April, Col. Smith, the Civil Surgeon, remarked that General Dyer was coming and he would bombard the city. He drew diagrams and showed us how the city would be shelled and how it would be razed to the ground in half an hour. I said that I lived in the city, and what was to become of me if there was bombardment. He replied that I had better leave the city and live in the hospital if I wanted to save myself. (Statement 20, p. 56)
Thus we know why and how the “frightfulness” of the 13th April came about. A staggering blow had to be delivered. The idea of bombardment was evidently given up. The meeting of the 13th furnished a ready chance and General Dyer seized it. Mr. C. F. Andrews has called it a massacre, even like the Glencoe Massacre. If there can be degrees in assessing values of inhumanities, we consider that the massacre of Glencoe was infinitely worse than the massacre of Jallianwala Bagh, but the standard of correctness exacted today was not the standard set in the military manuals of the days of the Glencoe Massacre. In our opinion even the people who heard the proclamation had not understood the significance or the meaning of the prohibitory part of it. Not a single man went to that meeting in open defiance of the proclamation. No provocation whatever was given to the military authorities and nothing, either in Amritsar or outside it, justified the massacre. It was a calculated act of inhumanity, and if the British Rule in India is to be purged of this inexcusable wrong, General Dyer must be immediately relieved of his command and brought to justice.

He has stated to Lord Hunter’s Committee that Sir Michael O’Dwyer approved of his action. It is unthinkable to us that one, who was a trustee for the inhabitants of the Punjab, should have endorsed a crime against humanity. Even under Martial Law, de facto or de jure, certain canons of decency are obligatory on commanding officers. We venture to submit that General Dyer totally disregarded them. We regret that we do not, in any shape or form, desire to defend or minimize either the murders of Englishmen or incendiariism. We believe that they are indefensible, but no deeds, however dastardly, of an enraged mob can warrant a slaughter of innocent people such as General Dyer was guilty of.

The fourteenth of April was devoted by the people to clearing the dead or wounded, and burning or burying the dead. Permission had to be obtained for the purpose, and this was the laconic proclamation issued:

The inhabitants may burn or bury their dead as soon as they please. There must be no demonstration of any kind.

In reply to Lord Hunter’s questions as to the state of the city on the 14th, General Dyer said:

1 In Scotland, in 1992 during the reign of William and Mary
I went through the city to see if my orders had been carried out or not. I visited the pickets. All was quiet.

At about 2 p.m., a meeting of the local residents, municipal commissioners, magistrates and merchants was called at the Kotwali, whereat the Commissioner made the following speech:

Do you people want peace or war? We are prepared in every way. The Government is all-powerful. Sarkar has conquered Germany and is capable of doing everything. The General will give orders today. The city is in his possession. I can do nothing. You will have to obey orders. (Statement I, p. 11.)

Mr. Kitchin, the Commissioner, then went away. General Dyer with Messrs Miles Irving, Rehill, Plomer and military guard, came about 5 p.m. He rushed into the room, followed by others, all exceedingly angry, and made a speech in Urdu. The following is the translation:

You people know well that I am a sepoy and soldier. Do you want war or peace? If you wish for war the Government is prepared for it, and if you want peace, then obey my orders and open all your shops; else, I will shoot. For me the battle-field of France or Amritsar is the same. I am a military man and I will go straight. Neither shall I move to the right, no to the left. Speak up if you want war. In case there is to be peace, my order is to open all shops at once. You people talk against the Government, and persons educated in Germany and Bengal talk sedition. I shall report all these. Obey orders, I do not wish to have anything else. I have served in the Military for over 30 years. I understand the Indian sepoy and the Sikh people very well. You will have to observe peace; otherwise, the shops will be opened by force and by rifles. You must inform me of the badmashes. I will shoot them. Obey my orders and open shops. Speak up if you want war.

The General was followed by Mr. Miles Irving, the Deputy Commissioner. We cull two sentences from his speech:

You have committed a bad act in killing the English. The revenge will be taken upon you and your children.

On the 15th, all the shops were opened. One would have thought that, with the retribution of the 13th, the speeches of the 14th and the opening of the shops, the ordinary civil rule would be resumed, but it was not to be. The revenge had not yet been fully taken. Martial Law was, therefore, proclaimed¹ and what was true in fact became a fact in law. It remained in force up to the 9th June and the life or the people in Amritsar was made intolerable in a variety of ways:

1. The street in which Miss Sherwood was assaulted was set apart for flogging people and for making those who passed through it crawl on their bellies.

2. All were made to salaam, in theory English officers only, but in practice every Englishman, on pain of being arrested and suffering indignities.

3. Flogging was administered publicly and otherwise, even for trivialities.

4. All the lawyers of the town were made special constables without cause, and made to work like ordinary coolies.

5. Indiscriminate arrests were effected of persons, irrespective of status, and during detention, they were subjected to humiliations, discomforts and indescribable tortures for the purpose of extorting confession or evidence, or for the purpose of merely humiliating them.

6. Special Tribunals were formed for trying offences, which resulted in gross injustice in the name of law, leaving the aggrieved parties without a right of appeal.

We shall now deal with what is called the crawling order. The lane in which the crawling took place is a narrow and thickly populated place, with double-storey buildings on either side of it, and with numerous blind alleys shooting out of the lane and containing several houses. For the inhabitants of the lane, if they wanted to make any purchases or to go to the city, there was no option but to pass through some part of it, and therefore to crawl in and out. Sanitary or medical service could only be rendered on condition of crawling. The full length to the lane in which the order was enforced is about 150 yards. In the middle of it will be seen, on the plan hereto attached, an oblong marked “tiktiki”, which was the specially erected flogging-booth. The order remained in force for 8 days. Although General Dyer has called it “going on all fours”, and it has been called “hand-and-knee order” by the Press, the process consisted in the persons lying flat on their bellies and crawling exactly like reptiles. Any lifting of the knees or bending thereof brought the rifle-butts on...

the backs of the persons who were made to crawl. The whole motion had therefore to be performed by movement of the belly and the arms. The lane, like most Indian lanes, is dirty and full of the usual rubbish, not excluding grit. It is worthy of note that the order was only given verbally and was withdrawn after orders from superior authorities. This is General Dyer’s reason for the order:

I felt women have been beaten. We look upon women as sacred. I searched in my brain for a suitable punishment for these awful cases. I did not know how to meet it. There was a little bit of accident in that. Now, when I visited the pickets, I went down and ordered a triangle to be erected. I felt the street ought to be looked upon as sacred; therefore, I posted pickets at both ends, and told them: “No Indians are to be allowed to pass along here.” I then also said, “If they have to pass they must go on all fours.” If never entered my brain that any sensible man, any sane man, would under the circumstances voluntarily go through that street.

The deliberateness or the depravity of the punishment cannot well be surpassed. Miss Sherwood was assaulted on the 10th and the order was promulgated on the 19th. It had to be obeyed by those who night never have seen Miss Sherwood. They might have, as the vast majority of the residents of Amritsar must have, deplored the cowardly assault on her. It was such men who had to undergo the punishment. It is difficult to characterize a mind that invents and takes pleasure in inflicting a punishment whose object is merely to degrade man’s state. The pickets were posted from 6 a.m. to 8 p.m., so when Lord Hunter asked him what justification there was in passing an order which necessitated the inhabitants, lawfully residing, to crawl on all fours when they had to leave their houses, General Dyer replied: “They could leave at all other times,” i.e., between the hours after 10 p.m. and before 6 a.m. (the hour 8 p.m. was changed to 10 p.m. on the 15th). The General forgot that another order operated against it, because nobody could be but after 10 p.m., and if he did, he was liable to be shot. Yet he was able to add in the same answer:

I do not think it caused great inconvenience. If they had suffered a little, it would be no harm under Martial Law. They could get necessaries of life of life by other means. It could not be helped if they had to suffer a slight amount of inconvenience.

Lord Hunter said:

You will admit, during the period of turmoil, it is a difficult thing for peaceful citizens to give assistance in quelling the disturbances. Is it not just on that account that extreme remedy be confined to the mob, as distinguished from the law-abiding citizens?

General Dyer answered:

Yes, they were abstract law-abiding citizens, but I think on that occasion I only thought of punishing the wicked.

Q. But this street was not the street which was frequented by those who had beaten Miss Sherwood?

A. No, but I had erected a platform there in the middle of the street and thought, when I got these men who had beaten her, I would lash them down. I meant to lash them.

For a moment let us see what was actually done. Lala Ishwar Das is an assistant in a big firm in Amritsar. He had gone to Lala Labh Chand’s house, marked on the plan, on the 18th April. Suddenly Mr. Plomer came with the military into the street. L. Ishwar Das and his friends were looking from a window. Mr. Plomer struck his hunting crop at them and asked them all to stand up and salaam. Mr. Labh Chand was asked to vacate a portion of his house for the accommodation of the military. This witness says:

At about 4 o’clock in the afternoon, Ishar Das, Panna Lal, Mela Ram and I wanted to go home, but were refused permission by the police. We asked permission again, but it was given on condition that we would pass the street by crawling. So all of us had to pass out the street by crawling on our bellies. We could not go to our houses by any other road. (Statement 104, p. 163.)

It is to be observed that this was the first day of the order which had not been promulgated, whether by word of mouth or in writing. It became known only as it was being enforced.

Another witness, Lala Megha Mal, is a cloth merchant, who says:

My house is in Kutchu Kurichan (an alley from the crawling lane) and my shop is in Guru Bazaar. On the very first day soldiers were posted in Kutchu Kurichan; I was stopped by the soldiers when I was returning home at about 5 p.m., and I was ordered to creep on my belly. I however ran away, and kept away till after the soldiers had left. That day I came home at 9 p.m. and found my wife laid up with fever. There was no water in the house to be given to her, and no doctor and no medicine. I had to fetch water myself late in the night. For the seven days following, my wife had to be without any treatment, as no doctor like to creep on his belly. (Statement 114.)

In this lane is a Jain Sabha Mandir where some sadhus live. Lala Rallya Ram, opium contractor, has a house near the Mandir. As he was going to his shop, he was compelled to crawl. He says:

While I was crawling, they kicked me with their boots and also gave me blows with the butt-ends of their rifles. That day I did not go back home to take my food. . . . For full 8 days, not a single sweeper appeared; so the refuse of the house was never removed, nor were the latrines cleaned. The water-carrier, too, was throughout absent. . . . we could neither get vegetables nor other eatables. (Statement 102.)

Lala Ganpat Rai of the Jain Mandir, living in the lane, says:

Even those who had to attend the temple in the street for the purpose of worship, were made to crawl in the same way. (Statement 122.)

Lala Devi Das, Banker, was ordered to crawl on his belly. He offered to go back to his house, but he was forced to crawl. He says:

I tried to go on my hands and knees at first, but I was threatened with a bayonet, and had to creep on my belly. (Statement 99.)

Kahan Chand has been blind for the last 20 years. He was made to crawl and was kicked. (Statement 105.)

Abdulla, teacher by profession, had to crawl and whilst he was taking rest in the way, he was kicked and struck with the butt-end of a rifle. His body was scratched all over on account of his being a stout man. (Statement 106.)

Whilst the crawling was being enforced, sacred pigeons and other birds were shot. The Pinjarapole, a sacred house for the care of animals, which was just at one end of the lane, was defiled. The wells in the lanes were polluted by the soldiers easing themselves near them. (Statement 121.)

The official testimony is that 50 persons were subjected to the barbarous and inhuman process of crawling.

Those who have not undergone the degradation of compulsory salaaaming, can hardly realize the intensity of pain and humiliation caused to one who has actually undergone it. We, who have heard the description given to us by those who were made to salaam, are able only somewhat to realize what it must have meant to them. The salaaaming order, made applicable to the city containing a population of 160,000 souls, was not a small thing and it meant standing and performing fixed movements with the right arm. No wonder there are witnesses who state that they were arrested for not salaaaming in the proper manner. Nor did the effect of the order end with exacting the particular manner of salaam. The defaulters had to undergo punishment in a variety of ways.

Lala Har Gopal Khanna, B.A., was, on the 18th of April, passing through a street with some friends. He saw some policemen on horseback followed by General Dyer, who beckoned to him. On reaching there, Lala Har Gopal saluted in the military fashion, whereupon he was told that he did not know how to salaam and was told to present himself, the next day, in the Ram Bagh garden. He took leave of the General with a salute and asked Mr. Plomer, City Superintendent of Police, where he had to present himself in the Ram Bagh. Mr. Plomer immediately ordered a constable to take him to the Kotwal Sahib. On being taken, he was made to squat, along with 2 or 3 other men, on the damp floor. By 7 p.m., more men joined them. Then they were marched in pairs to the Kotwali. At the Kotwali, they had to pass the night sitting or lying in the open. A Gurkha guard was placed upon them. At 8.30, next morning, they were taken to the Ram Bagh, where they were all kept standing in the sun, until a military havildar (sergeant) taught them how to salaam. They were then let off. (Statement 95 and Statement 96.) Mian Firoz Din, an Hony. Magistrate, says:

People used to be whipped for not standing up whilst salaaming the General and Mr. Plomer. Those, who did not salaam were at times arrested. I saw a few cases of such whipping and of such arrests myself. The people were so terrified that many had to keep standing practically the whole day to prevent any mistake on their part and to avoid any such punishment. I say “practically” because they had to stand up every time they heard the sound of a motor-car. I myself did so. (Statement 2.)

Flogging, in so far as it was in public, was not only humiliating but it was torturing, and, save for the official evidence given, it is difficult to know why flogging was administered at all. Official evidence shows that flogging was administered for the so-called breach of fort discipline, and, as to those who were suspected of assaulting Miss Sherwood, General Dyer had admitted that he wanted to lash them in the crawling lane. Thus six boys were flogged on the booth, marked in the plan. Each of them was fastened to the tiktiki (triangle) and given 30 stripes. One of them, Sundar Singh, became senseless, after the 4th stripe, but after some water was poured into his mouth by a soldier, he regained consciousness. Flogging was then resumed.
He lost his consciousness for the second time, but the flogging never ceased till he was given 30 stripes. He was taken off the flogging-post bleeding and quite unconscious.

The other boys were similarly treated, and the majority of them became unconscious while they were being flogged.

They were all handcuffed and as they could not walk even a few paces, they were dragged by the police. They were then taken to the fort. (Statement 115, Statement 117 and Statement 118.)

General Dyer in his evidence has said that the lawyer constables did useful service and Mr. Kitchin has said that they rather liked it. Let us see what the lawyers themselves have to say about their appointment and the nature of the services they had to render. We have already referred to Lala Kanhya Lal. He is the oldest lawyer of Amritsar. Even he did not escape the distinction. He says:

I have to add that, along with all the members of the local Bar, I was compelled to act as a special constable. This appointment was made on the 22nd of April, when there was absolutely no necessity for such appointment for the maintenance of peace and order in the city. The police force was quite sufficient for the purpose and, as a matter of fact, the city was quiet on those days. In my old age, I was made to work like a coolie, carrying tables and chairs from one place to another, and to patrol the city in the hot sun. The abuse which was showered upon us, and the indignities to which we were put, added a great deal to our sufferings. I cannot believe that our appointment was necessary for the maintenance of peace and order. The order was meant to punish us. The local Bar takes part in public affairs and took a prominent part in the Rowlatt Act agitation; that is why the whole Bar was punished in this way. (Statement 29.)

Lala Balmokand Bhatia, High Court Vakil, Municipal Commissioner, describing the ceremony of appointing special constables, says, that they were made to sit on the ground, and it was then that we were called upon to witness 2 citizens being flogged after being tied to the post. We were specially ordered to see this scene. In the evening, all the members of the Bar were made to stand in a line.

Lieut. Newman was placed in charge. He threatened one of them with kicking. They were to report themselves thrice a day and patrol the city for the rest of the day. Mr. Bhatia says:
In other words, we had to keep ourselves in attendance the whole day, either in the garden or in the city. We were constantly reminded that we were mere constables and the punishment for any neglect was not only flogging or imprisonment, but also death. We were made to do the work of coolies, by being ordered to take tables and chairs in the presence of many people, who held us in respect, although there were orderlies and other servants enough for such work.

They were particularly taught how to salaam. They were discharged on the 12th May. He too agrees with Lala Kanhya Lal that the idea was to punish the members of the Bar. (Statement 91.)

Pandit Rajendra Misra and other lawyers support the foregoing allegations and say that they were thus insulted and illtreated, although they had helped the authorities. (Statement 94.)

Altogether, ninety-three lawyers were humiliated in this manner, not to mention the pecuniary loss they had unnecessarily to sustain by reason of being deprived of their ordinary vocation.

Perhaps, the wholesale arrests that took place during the Martial Law period, and the treatment meted out during the confinement, was the most harassing form of punishment from which, at the time the arrests were going on, no citizen considered himself to be safe.

Lala Girdhari Lal says:

The police began to arrest people from 12th April, as far as I remember. There was no break after that, and people in every sphere of life were arrested from day to day, while employed peacefully in their occupations. No charge was stated.

They were then handcuffed at once and put into the lock-up, for days and months, without being informed what they were accused of, and no opportunity was ever allowed them to see or consult friends or relations. When Mr. Badrul Islam Ali Khan was arrested, the impression created in the public mind was that all connected with the Congress movement in the city would suffer likewise. Lala Girdhari Lal had left Amritsar on the 7th of April and returned on the 11th, leaving a relation very ill at Cawnpore. He wanted therefore to go back to Cawnpore. After much difficulty, he was able to procure a pass, permitting him to leave Amritsar. He left on the 21st April by the Calcutta Mail. On the Beas River Bridge, the train was stopped and all the Indian passengers’ luggage was minutely searched. He heard after some time that he was wanted by the authorities at Amritsar. He presented himself to the Superintendent of Police at Cawnpore, who treated him courteously and sent him under escort to Amritsar. He had a newspaper in his hand, as permission had been given to him by the Sub-Inspector who was in charge. This was too much for the Amritsar Superintendent; but the Sub-Inspector quietly told him that he had allowed Lala Girdhari Lal to buy the newspaper, as there was no instruction from his chief to restrict the liberty of his charge in such a manner. Lala Girdhari Lal was at once handcuffed, and, upon his enquiring why he was arrested, no reply was returned. He had nothing to eat since 11 o’clock on 22-4-'19 till the next day at 8 a.m. He was locked up in a small room with 10 or 11 persons in it. In a corner of the room was an evil-smelling chamber-pot. The next morning they were allowed out for a few minutes for the necessary purposes of life and were shut up again. They were allowed neither to bathe nor to change clothes, and it was with difficulty that they were able to obtain water, when there was a charitably disposed constable near by. The month of May is about the hottest month of the year and the discomfort of being in a stuffy and crowded little room can be easily imagined. He was taken before some officials in due course. One of them made insulting and offensive remarks about him. On the 24th May, he was removed from the lock-up to the Subsidiary Jail. The food given was “unfit for human consumption”. On the 27th May, he and his companions were taken to Lahore, handcuffed in pairs. No one was allowed to come near them. Those who dared to talk to them were straightway arrested. They had to walk from the Lahore Railway Station to the court—a distance of about 2 miles. The Inspector of police prevented them from having water to drink on the way. On reaching the court they had to wait outside the court all day long. They were then taken to the Central Jail, where each one was locked up in an iron cage, about 7 by 2, and 4 feet high. The bathing arrangement was most filthy. A small drain, used for all sorts of purposes, was pointed out for the purpose. On the 27th, only a few, whose relatives had paid for them, were removed to slightly better rooms and could get somewhat better food, and it was only here that permission was granted to change clothes. On the 28th May, they were transferred to the Borstal Jail. On the 3rd June, some of the Amritsar prisoners were sent up for trial. Some others were asked, without knowing the nature of charges against them, to cite their witnesses. Lala Girdhari Lal was released, on the 6th June, without any trial and without ever knowing why he had been arrested at all. Thus one of the leaders of Amritsar, not unknown to the authorities, was arrested and detained for over a fortnight and treated worse even than a common felon, for every prisoner under trial is entitled to see his relations, certainly his legal advisers, and receive what food he likes. Mian Firoz Din, an Hony. Magistrate of 21 years’ standing and a raisi of Amritsar, says that, whilst the most respectable men of Amritsar were being harassed and molested, the well-known badmashes were left practically untouched. (Statement 2.)

Mr. Maqbool Mahomood, High Court Vakil, who, at the risk of his life, it will be remembered, tried, on the 10th April, to turn away the crowd near the bridge, was later on arrested by a Sub-Inspector, was taken to the police station and was prompted [sic] to say: “I could and would identify the murderers of Robinson and Rowland.” [He says :]

I informed the police that I had already sent a written statement to them and that I had stated that I could not recognize anybody. This statement was then brought to me and I was then asked to tear it off with my own hands and to submit a fresh statement giving the names of those whom they had found out as culprits. I refused to comply with the demand and some threats were flung at me. However, I was subsequently allowed to leave.

He was then cited as a defence witness. Sardar Sukha Singh told him that many people had refused to give evidence for the defence and that he should do likewise. He said he had his own conscience, to which Sardar Sukha Singh replied that in those days “nobody had a conscience and those that had, suffered.” He added that he would see that his pleader’s licence was cancelled and further that he got into trouble. (Statement 5.)

On the 20th April, Dr. Kidar Nath Bhandari, Senior Assistant Surgeon, age 62, was asked by Sardar Sukha Singh to name anyone of the mob that had gone to attack Mrs. Easdon on the 10th April. Dr. Kidar Nath told him that he could not do so. Upon this, Sardar Sukha Singh, Mr. Plomer and Mr. Marshall shouted out,”Oh! you don’t help the Government; you will also be arrested!” To this the Doctor replied, “I cannot name anybody whom I had not seen and you can do what you like.” There-upon, Sardar Sukha Singh told the Doctor that he had orders to arrest him and that he should consider himself under arrest. He was not shown the orders, but was sent to the lock-up, together with his assistant. Both of them were kept in the lock-up till the 27th April, on which date they were removed to the Subsidiary Jail. It meant a walk of about a mile and as he had heart trouble he asked for a conveyance. He added also that his being paraded and handcuffed with others through the bazaar would shock him. He was nevertheless made to walk to the jail, together with 62 other prisoners. He says:

As it was very hot, I fainted when I reached the jail, but recovered soon, owing to the kindness of a policeman, who kindly gave me a little water to drink.

He was locked up in a cell and given bread which he could not eat. The request of a friend to supply him with food from outside was refused; and so was also the request to change his clothes,"which were stinking and full of lice". On the 2nd May, the Deputy Commissioner went to the jail and the Doctor asked him why he was being detained. The answer was there was nothing against him except that he had not tried to save the life of Mrs. Easdon, when she was attacked by the mob. The Doctor tried to reason that it was not possible for him to do so, because he did not know when the mob went to her, but it was of no avail. He and his assistant were, however, released on the 12th May, without knowing any definite charges against them. Whilst he was at the Kotwali lock-up, between 20th and 27th April, someone went to him twice and said:

You are suffering for nothing. If you mention a few names who were in the mob, you will be released at once. (Statement 13.)

Mr. Mohammad Amin, a pleader, is the father of Mohammad Akram, who was sentenced to death—a sentence which was subsequently commuted to 5 years' rigorous imprisonment, in connection with the attempt to assault Mrs. Easdon. He claims personal friendship with Mrs. Eadson, and in his statement attached hereto, he contends that his son, who looked up to Mrs. Easdon as his mother, was totally innocent. On the 20th April, he, with his son and brother, was arrested and taken to the Kotwali. He says:

I was taken by a constable to the door of the havalat\(^1\). A small room as it was, it contained not less than 30 unfortunate men. It was a horrible sight to see them stretching their arms out of the iron bars and praying for a drink of water. I was going to faint at the sight. I said to a policeman,“I have no objection to going in, but I must tell you that I shall not be able to live there for a quarter of an hour.” He went to the Inspector and shortly after came back and took me to another room, where I found Dr. Bashir and Mr. Badrul Islam Ali Khan, Barrister-at-Law. From this room they took out some persons and put us, 6 newcomers, in their place. Never in my life have I ever seen a dirty place like this. Most of us kept sitting all through the night. We prayed that we might be allowed food from our houses for that one evening only, but it was refused. We asked for coverings, but they too were denied to us. After a short time, a policeman came to Gama and in our presence said, “Why do you put your life in danger? Name 4 or 5 men with whom you have some enmity, we shall make you a witness.” Gama said, “I have no enemy to name.” The policeman went away, but after a few minutes he reappeared and said to him, “Look here, name Qayam, and as to others say what you please.” We got extremely frightened at the way the police were fabricating false evidence, and thought that we were not safe.

The witness describes the condition in the jail. They were kept handcuffed in their cells in pairs and thus led even to the latrines. They begged for the removal of the handcuffs whilst they were actually in the latrines but it was no use. They were compelled to walk round and round in the hot sun—we imagine for exercise? They were given no food for 36 hours and they were made to sleep on the bare floor. The handcuffs were at a later stage removed.

The food which we were expected to take was a little heap of gram in one corner and a bucket of drinking water in the other, while near by was a tinpot for passing water. We could not take that food and kept hungry for another day.

The things improved the next day. They were allowed to have their own food and a change of clothes. Thus they remained at the fort for 22 days. On the 12th of May, they were taken to Lahore to stand their trial. They were 52 men chained together. In Lahore, they were made to sit out the whole day without drink or food. They had to walk from the Lahore station to the court and from the court to the Central Jail in the burning sun. He and his brother were discharged on the 27th of May. (Statement 14.)

Mrs. Nelly Benjamin, Sub-Assistant Surgeon, is a friend of Mrs. Easdon. She was the one who screened her from assault. She says:

When the enquiry was going on, I was taken to the Kotwali on two occasions; I was asked to say that I had seen Mohammad Amin in the crowd. As I said that was not the truth, Mr. Plomer threatened to send me to jail. I told them whatever I knew but I refused to give false evidence. They also tempted me with a reward from the Government, if I supported the story of Mrs. Easdon regarding the presence of Mohammad Amin. I refused again.

Seth Gul Mohammad, a glassware merchant, was arrested on the 20th April whilst he was offering prayer, and taken to the Kotwali. He was asked to give false evidence. Inspector Jawaharlal caught hold of his beard and slapped him so hard that it made him reel for a while. He then asked him to state, "Doctors Satyapal and Kitchlew had instigated me to bring about the hartal on the 6th and that they had encouraged me by saying that they would use bombs to drive out the English from the country." The witness refused. The officer then asked his underlings to take him aside and make him "all right". He was then taken away a few paces from the officers’ table and asked by a number of constables to please Jawaharlal by doing what he wanted. He still refused. So they caught hold of his hand and placed it under the leg of a cot, over which eight constables sat. "When the pain became unbearable," the witness proceeds, "I cried out, 'leave my hand, I will do whatever you ask me to do.'" He was then taken to Jawaharlal again. But he again refused to implicate the Doctors. He was therefore kept confined in a room that day. During the following days he was beaten, slapped and caned. He was told that he would be made an accused and hanged. This beating went on for eight days. On the eighth day he again agreed to make the desired statement. He was then taken to Aga Ibrahim, the Magistrate, before whom he repeated the same "untrue statement", that was required of him. Hans Raj, the approver, who was in the Kotwali, advised him to do as the police asked. After ten days’ detention he was let off, on the condition that he appeared at the Kotwali from day to day, which he did up to the 9th of June, when he was taken to Lahore. On the 16th of June, he was produced before the Martial Law Tribunal, where he made a clean breast of the whole thing and told the Judges that he was tortured.

Brijlal, a boy 14 years old, was kept under custody for 9 days. After two days he was made over to Hans Raj and was induced to make a false statement before the Martial Law Tribunal, which he retracts in the evidence before us. (Statement 22.)

Sardar Atma Singh, wine merchant, was arrested in front of General Dyer on the 13th April. He was made to walk with the procession and, he adds, "They tied a cloth round one of my arms and dragged me along with them through several streets of the city." He was prevented by a British soldier from getting some water to drink. Some others were arrested also during the day, and nine of them were handcuffed and confined in a cell without food. On the 15th, they were taken before the General and were all tied to a tree,"constantly abused and laughed at". After the General had finished his lunch, they were produced before him. Then Sardar Atma Singh was sentenced to 8 days' quarter-guard. He was never told what the charge against him was. During his incarceration, he was relieved by a sergeant of his gold ring and a West End hunting watch bearing his name. (Statement 30.)

Muhammad Ismail, butcher, was arrested about the 18th April. His father was also arrested and both were beaten and were released only after his brother Dina was produced. Dina himself was detained for 3 days, and is said to have been mercilessly beaten. (Statement 46.)

Abdul Aziz, vegetable seller, was arrested for having sworn at a khansama, which he denied. He was taken before the General, was kept in the lock-up for two days, was given ten stripes and was ordered to close his shop for 14 days. (Statement 123.)

Lala Raliaram, pensioner, 58 years old, was asked by a Sub-Inspector to give the names of those who had beaten Miss Sherwood. He replied that he knew nothing, as he was not present. Whereupon, he was beaten with a cane, his beard was pulled and he was made to walk up and down the lane and set free in the evening. (Statement 107.)

Lala Dadu Mal was beaten and made to crawl. He and his son were arrested, and he was discharged and rearrested and at last let off, after he had paid one hundred rupees to the headman of the bazaar for the police. He was rearrested and was compelled to pay fifty rupees more and purchase his release. The police used to go to his shop and forcibly take away cream, etc., for their use. His son was detained for 8 days and was then given 30 stripes, although, during the process, he became unconscious. He witnessed others also being flogged. He says,"These men shrieked with pain and were all bleeding." (Statement 116.)

Lala Rakharam saw Dhaniram who was made to sit down and catch hold of his ears after passing his hands under his legs. (Statement 108.)

Gholam Qadir Toopgar was arrested during the third week of April by Sub-Inspector Amir Khan. He was asked to point out the looted property, and he was beaten severely when he pleaded ignorance. He was asked to give the names of certain persons as members of the mob that had burnt and looted the Bhagtanwala Railway Station. His turban was taken off, his hands were tied with it and he was suspended from a tree for about 10 minutes. He saw 8 or 9 men, besides himself, being subjected to torture.

He says:

I saw Peera Gujar lying flat on the ground and a havildar, whom I know by face, pushed a stick into his anus in the presence of Sub-Inspector Amir Khan. He cried pitifully all the time, but the police showed no mercy. For full 3 days and nights we were not allowed any food, during which period we were subjected to police torture. I was released after 5 days. (Statement 141.)

Miraj Din, barber, generally supports the above statement, he himself sharing the same fate as Gholam Qadir. (Statement 142.)

Gholam Jilani, an Imam (leader at prayer) of a masjid and deed-writer, is perhaps the worst case of torture we have come across. He took a prominent part in organizing the Ramnaumi festival. He was arrested on the 16th April. The statement contains such a wealth of detail that it must be read in toto in order to appreciate the measure of torture that the Imam had to undergo. (Statement 134.) Mian Firoz Din, Hony. Magistrate (Statement 2) and Mr. Gholam Yaseen, Barrister (Statement 6) support what is stated about his treatment by the witness. Mohammad Shafi (Statement 139) saw some of the tortures that Gholam Jilani was subjected to and heard his piteous cries. He says that, on the same day, one Khair Din was similarly treated, his condition became so bad that he never recovered from the injuries he had received. (Statement 139.) Mian Quamar Uddin Khan, landlord and proprietor, says Maulvi Gholam Jilani met him immediately after his release. He saw the injuries which were received by him and that the story that he related to him then is the same as he has given before us. (Statement 140.) Gholam Mohammad witnessed the torture on him and on Khair Din, who, he says, died a few days ago of the injuries. (Statement 138.) Haji Shamsuddin, landlord and zemindar, also witnessed the tortures administered to Maulvi Gholam Jilani and late Khair Din. The Haji was called by the police. He says,

They drove a stick into his anus. Also, he was in a most pitiable condition. I saw his urine and excreta coming out. All of us, who were outside, were told by the police that those who did not give evidence would be treated like that.

Witnesses 136-137 also corroborate the statement about the torture to which both Jilani and Khair Din were subjected. Malik Abdul Hai, merchant of pashmina, on receipt of a telegram from the Superintendent of Police, went from Lahore to Amritsar about the 15th of May and, there, he was given over to Inspector Jawaharlal, who tempted him with reward by increment in his pay if he would give false evidence against Dr. Kitchlew. When he refused, he was threatened that he would be included amongst the accused. When all the threats and persuasions failed, he was taken to a room and thrashed “mercilessly”. Being frightened, he eventually yielded. His statement was taken down and he was summoned before the Martial Law Court. He proceeds:

I made up my mind to tell the truth... I submitted before the judges how I had been harassed by the police to give false evidence. When I had finished my deposition I came out. The Naib Court arrested me and was about to lead me to the police room when I screamed out. Thereupon, a few barristers who were then present in the Court in connection with the case, among whom were Mukand Lal Puri and Mr. Hasan and others, came on the scene... Having freed myself from the grip of the Naib Court I immediately told the judges the whole story. The presiding judge ordered me to proceed home by another route.

Mr. Badrul Islam Ali Khan, Barrister-at-Law, was arrested on the 19th April. The police walked into his wife’s bedroom and when she asked them to go outside they refused to do so. He was taken to the Kotwali, where Mr. Plomer said in a loud voice,”This is the man who wants to be the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab.” He recites how he was pressed to give evidence. He describes the condition of the cell in which he and the fellow prisoners were locked up, how they were subjected to humiliation, and discusses the charges that were brought against him, before he was finally discharged. He concludes:

There was an attempt made by the police to manufacture evidence against me by torturing a man named Gholam Jilani, who admitted the fact in his evidence before the Martial Law Commission, in the course of my trial. Thus it was that I was arrested and kept in custody for a period of two months and a half and tried for my life. (Statement 88.)

Mr. Gurdial Singh Salaria, Bar-at-Law, was also arrested. He was one of those who, in common with others, at the peril of his life, tried to go, on the 10th April, to push the crowd back from the bridge. He describes also the indignities he had to suffer. He remained in custody from the 23rd of May to the 5th of July. (Statement 87.)

The paragraphs we have devoted to indiscriminate arrests and tortures for the purpose of extorting evidence, furnish perhaps the blackest chapter in the whole of the story of the cruelties perpetrated in the name of Martial Law. The tragedy of Jallianwala Bagh was staggering for its dramatic effect. But the slow torture of the arrests was felt not only by those who suffered but by those also who were always in fear of being arrested, for, from the evidence collected by us it is clear that there was no method about these arrests. All classes and conditions of people came in for this treatment. Nobody had a feeling of safety. We wish, too, to add that we have been most careful in the collection of the evidence on this head. We were incredulous when we entered upon the inquiry, but as statement after statement came under our notice, we were driven to accept the general charge. The most damaging statements are so fully supported that, in our opinion, they will stand the test of investigation in any court of law.

We would here add that we had copious evidence about bribes having been freely taken by the police. But we have refrained from taking evidence on this point from Amritsar, because the witnesses, whilst they gave us their confidence, were unwilling to disclose their names. If the Government wish to know the truth about this class of corruption, we suggest the holding of an inquiry, with a promise of protection to those who would come forward to give their evidence. We are sure that the Government have no desire to screen offenders of this class and we feel equally sure that, by adopting the course suggested by us, they will clean the police department of its worst features. The evidence of torture, too, challenges inquiry. It is there before the Government. They cannot ignore evidence given with the detail that characterizes it.

Not much need now be said to show that where there was an organized attempt made to procure false evidence, there must have been serious and extensive abortion of justice during the trials that took place, whether before the Martial Law Commissions, the Summary Courts, or Area Officers. It may not be amiss to describe the constitution of these courts. The Martial Law Commissions were composed of 3 members, clothed with summary jurisdiction and possessing the power to inflict death sentences. They were not bound to record any evidence, and their judgments were unappealable. The Summary Courts, on the other hand, contained only one member, usually a Magistrate, and they became the courts of inferior jurisdiction, having power to award imprisonment up to two years and to impose fines up to Rs. 1,000. Their judgments also were final and unappealable to any superior court. We have examined the published records of the trials before these courts and the statistics published by the Government, and we have come to the conclusion that the majority of the convictions are wholly bad. In the Amritsar district, according to the statistical abstract, 188 were tried before the Martial Law Commissions, of whom 3 were acquitted. Before the Summary Courts and Area Officers, 173 were tried, and 32 acquitted, discharged or released.

In view of the Royal Proclamation¹ and the release of the majority of the prisoners convicted² by the tribunals mentioned by us, it is unnecessary to go into the details of these trials. But it may be mentioned that cases involving transportation for life with forfeiture of property as the minimum penalty were based on such charges as organizing the hartal or making speeches on the Rowlatt Act. Leading men were charged with serious offences on no better evidence than that of an approver. We hope, however, to discuss the Martial Law Commission trials a little more fully in our discussion of the Lahore events. We shall close our examination of the Amritsar events with the remark that the authorities committed a criminal blunder in secretly deporting Doctors Kitchlew and Satyapal; that there was at least undue haste in firing; that, had they acted with tact and consideration, then, in spite of the deportation, the mob excesses would have been prevented; that the excesses were, in any event, deplorable and deserving of condemnation; that the massacre in the Jallianwala Bagh was an act of inhumanity and vengeance, unwarranted by anything that then existed or has since transpired; that, on General Dyer’s own showing, the introduction of Martial Law in Amritsar was not justified by any local causes and that its prolongation was a wanton abuse of authority, and its administration unworthy of a civilized government.

TARN Taran

Tarn Taran is a part of the Amritsar District and a railway station. It is 16 miles from Amritsar and a Sikh centre, next only to Amritsar in importance. It was alleged by the Police Sub-Inspector that there was an attempt to loot the treasury. The evidence in our possession shows that the charge was a pure fabrication; yet a large number of persons was convicted of that charge by a Summary Court.

LAHORE CITY

In point of political importance, Lahore is the first city in the Punjab, being its capital and the seat of the Government. We have, however, treated Amritsar first, as, apart from its great importance as the Sikh stronghold, it was there that the disorder arose, and it was there that the policy of the Government was determined. Lahore is a big railway junction for Peshawar, Calcutta, Karachi and Bombay. The distance between Lahore and Delhi is 298 miles. The population of Lahore, excluding that of the Cantonment, is about 250,000 of which the Mohammedan element is preponderant, Hindus being nearly a third of the Mohammedans.

Lahore has ten colleges for boys and two for girls, and numerous high schools for boys and girls. It is also the seat of the Punjab University. It has two English dailies; one conducted in the interests generally of the bureaucracy and European commerce; the other devoted to Indian national interests. It has several dailies and weeklies in the vernaculars. Lahore, therefore, of all the places in the Punjab, possesses the largest number of the literate classes and is the best supplied in the Punjab with news from day to day. The Punjab has been noted and even congratulated by Sir Michael O’Dwyer on its comparative indifference to Indian politics, but, of late, it had begun to organize political life, and Lahore was leading the way. This awakening was strengthened by Sir Michael O’Dwyer’s speech in the Council at the threshold of his career, already referred to. Moreover, the Punjab shared in common with the rest of India the increase in political activity consequent upon the introduction of the Rowlatt legislation and Lahore led the way in the Punjab. When Mr. Gandhi announced his satyagraha declaration, the leaders in the Punjab were and remained, up to the last moment, undecided as to its acceptance, and no one seemed actually to have taken the Satyagraha Pledge, certainly none in Lahore. But fasting and hartal stood on a different footing. Their observance required no pledge and no continuity of action. But, even on this point, the leaders do not appear to have been sure of their ground, nor did they know what response the populace would make to Mr. Gandhi’s call. They decided to publish and distribute his letter with reference to it. As soon as the Government came to know that there was to be hartal, they became panicky. On the 4th of April, a police notice was issued in Lahore, prohibiting processions and meetings without previous permission. On the 5th, the leaders were invited by the Deputy Commissioner to meet him. Pandit Rambhuj Dutt Chowdhari and other leaders have described in their statements the whole of that interview and the subsequent events. At that meeting, the leaders went so far as to say that if the Government did not want them to hold the meeting contemplated by them, they would abandon it, but the Deputy Commissioner was satisfied with the following terms, namely:

(a) All may endeavour, up to the evening of the 5th, to convince the citizens either for or against the hartal.

(b) On the 6th, there should be no canvassing one way or the other.

(c) The meeting may take place, but there should be no inflammatory speech-making.

The 6th broke upon Lahore with an absolutely complete hartal such as had never been seen before. Thousands, including women and children, observed the hartal, and people went to the river to bathe and on their return they formed themselves into a procession. Strictly speaking, this was in breach of the police notice we have referred to. The procession, however, was perfectly orderly. The police wisely refrained from any interference, but when the procession went towards the Mall, they would not allow it to proceed any further than the Post Office. They obtained the services of the leaders for turning the processionists back. Lala Duni Chand and Dr. Gokal Chand Narang came to their assistance and succeeded in preventing the processionists from going up the Mall.

There is, however, a slight indication of what was troubling Sir Michael O’Dwyer. It is said that he had been saying in the course of conversations that there would be no hartal in the Punjab, but he was painfully surprised to see a complete hartal even in the capital city,

1 A popular Municipal Commissioner of Lahore
2 A prominent barrister and leader of Lahore; on this occasion he mounted a horse and led the procession back to the city.
and he is further reported to have remarked that he would make the leaders pay for the crime of having brought about such a complete hartal.

In the afternoon, there was a meeting at the Bradlaugh Hall. It was attended by thousands of people. Such a meeting Lahore had never seen before. Sir M. O’Dwyer had specially deputed the Superintendent of the Criminal Investigation Department to attend this meeting. The speeches made at the meeting were fully reported; we have seen them. While they were assertive in tone and insistent on the people’s right to have the Rowlatt legislation repealed, there was nothing seditious in them, and certainly nothing that could in any shape or form be interpreted to mean an incitement to violence. Nothing happened on the 7th and 8th.

The 9th of April, the Ramnaumi day, was observed as in Amritsar. The people gave themselves up to rejoicings and utilized the day for Hindus and Mohammedans to fraternize with each other. What was therefore a purely religious function has been happily, of late years, turned into also a national celebration. There were officials with the procession. They were cheered wherever their presence was noticed.

Thus, everything was quiet up to the 10th. Not so, however, Sir Michael O’Dwyer. He knew that Mr. Gandhi was invited by Dr. Satyapal to visit Amritsar and to explain his doctrine of satyagraha. He knew, too, that, in response to that invitation and that of Sannyasi Swami Shraddhanand, Mr. Gandhi was to visit Delhi and had left Bombay for Delhi on the 8th April. He could not brook it, and after receiving permission from the Viceroy, he stopped Mr. Gandhi’s entry into the Punjab, and had him arrested at the first station inside the Punjab border and sent him back to the Bombay Presidency wherein he was interned. The news of Mr. Gandhi’s arrest and internment was received in Lahore on the 10th, through its publication in The Civil and Military Gazette, and, without any organization or effort, there was an immediate closing of shops. By 4 o’clock, all business was suspended. Some of the citizens formed a procession and began marching towards the Mall. By the time they reached Anarkali, it had become a big procession, but as the police had prevented the procession of the 6th April from going up the Mall, the majority stopped near the Forman Christian College, but about 3 to 4

hundred persons, including students, decided to march up the Mall with the intention of proceeding to the Government House, to ask for Mr. Gandhi’s release. As soon as this was known, a party of police came out, passed by the crowd from behind, wheeled round and, facing it, stopped its march near the O’Dwyer Soldiers’ Club. The crowd, however, would not listen to the police. Order to fire was given; 2 to 3 lives were lost, more were wounded. The crowd retired back. The dead and the wounded were taken away by the police. Assistance of doctors who were passing by was refused. The crowd, thus broken up, was pushed back slowly by the police all the way through the Anarkali till very near the Lohari gate. The police wanted to disperse the crowd at this point also. They parleyed for over half an hour, as stated by Mr. Broadway, the Superintendent of Police, before the Hunter Committee. Meanwhile, Pandit Rambhuj Dutt Chowdhari, who was informed at his house, which is situated outside the city, of what had happened, hastened to the spot and offered his services. He was asked to turn the crowd back and to disperse it. The Pandit tried, but his voice could not reach except to those who were immediately near. He therefore spoke from a raised seat. Meanwhile, the Superintendent of Police was becoming impatient. The Deputy Commissioner, who was sent for, also arrived. Pandit Rambhuj Dutt Chowdhari went over to the Deputy Commissioner and asked for some time, so that he could reason with the crowd and induce it to disperse. But Mr. Fyson gave him only two minutes and told him that if the people did not disperse within that time, he would immediately order firing. The Pandit protested that he could hardly make any impression on the crowd within two minutes, but Mr. Fyson was unbending. The Pandit, however, tried and he partially succeeded in making some of the crowd turn back, but Mr. Fyson proved as good as his word, and on the expiry of the time limit gave the order to fire, inflicting about the same [number of] casualties as near the O’Dwyer Soldiers’ Club. The firing dispersed the crowd, but it left the people sore at heart.

We are of opinion that both the firings could have been avoided. The crowd was unarmed; it had passed several public buildings including, besides the Christian College, the Y.M.C.A., the Alliance Bank of Simla, the Bank of Bengal, the Post Office, the Telegraph Office, the High Court and the Cathedral. As at Amritsar, the authorities omitted to take the usual intermediate stages, and they erred in not giving sufficient time to Pandit Rambhuj Dutt Chowdhari, who had been admittedly making an earnest effort to disperse the crowd. No resistance was offered by the crowd. We presume that other crowds in India are of about the same temper under given circumstances and of the same determination or rather weakness as the Punjabi crowd. We say this because we have heard it suggested that a Punjab crowd is different from and more defiant and determined than any other crowd. We hold a different view. Some of us have seen a strong Punjab crowd being dispersed by the sweep of a heavy stick. The crowds at Lahore, Kasur and Amritsar were as determined as can be imagined, but none of them could stand even a little bit of firing. We imagine that crowds of the dimension admitted by official testimony, in any other part of the world could certainly have overwhelmed such small forces as were arrayed against them. We have it upon official testimony that a huge crowd in Bombay was dispersed on the 10th April by two dozen horsemen dashing into it, and a Bombay Pydhownie\textsuperscript{1} crowd is noted for its mischievousness when it is bent on mischief. We are inclined to think that in India generally, and in the Punjab particularly, there seems to be an unwritten code, requiring the police never to run any risk and to resort to firing on the slightest pretext. If it is a test of a civilized government that it shall not value the life of the meanest citizen as cheap, we fear that the Punjab Government has signally failed in that test. The plea that the governing race is, in numbers, hopelessly inferior to the governed cannot be accepted as any excuse for disregarding, under an ordinary test, the value of human life entrusted to its care. The indifferent answers given by some officers to questions regarding their orders strongly incline us to the belief that the firings we have mentioned could have been avoided with a little forbearance, a little tact and a little regard for the lives of the citizens. We are fortified in this belief by the knowledge that in every case that has come under our observation, no arrangement was considered necessary for taking care of the wounded after the dispersal of the crowd.

To return to the narrative, extraordinary as it may appear, the authorities, as we have seen, did not allow the relatives to take charge of the wounded and the dead. This created a great deal of ill feeling and resentment. On the 11th also, therefore, the hartal was continued. Constant parleying took place between the leaders and the authorities. The leaders pleaded, with all the earnestness at their command, for the return of the dead and the wounded, but to no purpose. Without in any way conciliating the people, the authorities wanted the hartal to be broken. We have had several interviews with the Lahore leaders since their discharge. They have favoured us with their statements; we believe that most of the leaders tried their best to break up the hartal, even though the authorities would not return the dead and the wounded, but they did not succeed. There was a big meeting on the 11th at the Badshahi Mosque at which the idea of breaking up the hartal was considered, but nothing came out of it. There was an interview again with the Deputy Commissioner, at which the leaders suggested that they should again have a meeting on the understanding that the military should not be posted near the meeting-place. Pandit Rambhuj Chowdhari affirms that such an undertaking was given by Mr. Fyson. The latter denies it. The evidence in our possession confirms Mr. Chowdhari’s affirmation. A very big meeting took place at the Badshahi Mosque. Feeling certainly ran high. Pandit Rambhuj Dutt Chowdhari was alone able with his powerful voice to gain a hearing. Without any decisive result, the meeting dispersed, and as the people were going to their homes the military fired. It is contended on behalf of the military that the situation demanded firing as the crowd had become defiant. If it is true that there was a promise by Mr. Fyson to withdraw the military, their very presence was unjustifiable. There was again loss of life. This added to the resentment of the people and made the work of the leaders wellnigh impossible. Further consultation amongst the leaders took place. The authorities began to assume a progressively uncompromising attitude. They would see some leaders and decline to see others. Hartal still remained. There was danger of starvation and consequent pillage. People, therefore, opened langarkhanas, i.e., free restaurants. These were run by voluntary subscriptions, and thus the 15th of April was reached. On the 16th Lala Harkishen Lal, one of the magnates of the Punjab, Lala Duni Chand, one of the most popular Municipal Commissioners of Lahore, with a record of unbroken public service, and Pandit Rambhuj Dutt Chowdhari were invited by the Deputy Commissioner to meet him, only to be arrested and deported. Soon after their deportation, Martial Law was proclaimed in Lahore. At that time, the reason given to the leaders by the Deputy Commissioner was that it was being proclaimed in order to break the hartal, and Col. Johnson has said definitely in his evidence that he would have put the military in charge of the shops and forcibly sold their goods if they had not opened them. This warning was actually given and the proud merchants of Lahore had to suffer the humiliation of opening their shops under military pressure. Whether the people were right or wrong in sustaining the hartal as a tangible expression of their resentment we shall not discuss, but right or wrong, there was nothing criminal in the people refusing to open their shops. But it was criminal to compel them by threat of force to open their shops. Indeed, we are not sure that a peaceful hartal is not an infinitely superior weapon, even from the Government standpoint, to the use of violence as a means of seeking redress.

However, Col. Johnson has before Lord Hunter given his opinion that Martial Law was necessary in Lahore for the sake of preventing the spread of 'rebellion' in the other parts of the Punjab. We believe that the introduction of Martial Law in Lahore was an utterly unjustifiable act. No violence was done by the people either to person or property in Lahore. We do not include in public violence the rough handling to which a C.I.D. official was subjected at one of the Badshahi Mosque meetings. It was no doubt improper on the part of those who assaulted the official. But if an incident of this character could justify the Martial Law reign, we should have Martial Law not as an exceptional event but as an ordinary rule of life. No evidence has been brought forward publicly to connect a single leader in Lahore with an organization outside. No connection has been established even between Amritsar and Lahore. The personal interest of the Lahore population was entirely bound up with the preservation of law and order. Lahore contains no martial element. The introduction of Martial Law in the city of Lahore was therefore justified neither for the safety of Lahore nor for the prevention of infection spreading from it. It was an unmerited reflection cast upon the staunch loyalty of the citizens of Lahore. We wish here to draw a broad distinction between loyalty to the British Constitution and the King, and indiscriminate support of a tyrannical deputy who disgraces a high office to which he may be called.

The disturbances, where they took place, were an undisciplined demonstration against Sir Michael O’Dwyer’s rule. From the very commencement of this rule, he estranged the educated classes by every means he could devise. He incensed the populace by his overzealous canvassing for contributions to the War in men and money. We consider it to be a proper thing to use social and moral pressure for stimulating contributions to the War, in which the very existence of the Empire may be at stake. But Sir M. O’Dwyer overstepped the limits of decency and, in his laudable zeal for outstripping his fellow satraps in supplying men and money, he forgot himself and did not consider the quality of the means adopted. The consequence was that his under-officials out-heroded Herod, and, as remarked in a previous chapter, we have in our possession evidence to show that British Rule was disgraced by officials whose one aim was to get recruits and money. It was a result too dearly bought.

It has been suggested that recruiting cannot be held to be a cause of the violent part of the demonstration, because the districts in which undue pressure is said to have been used were the districts that were exceptionally free from violence. This statement is no doubt partially true. The reason, however, in so far as it is true, is obvious. Those who were at all able to protect themselves, more or less successfully, avoided the pressure. Those who could not resist the pressure were not likely to be the men to rise against it at a later stage, unless they felt conscious of their strength. There is however such a thing as vicarious resentment, as there is vicarious sacrifice; and as national consciousness grows from day to day, so is there likely to be a demonstration of vicarious sacrifice and vicarious violence; and it behoves both the Government and the people to make a wise choice. It hardly requires any recommendation from us that vicarious sacrifice is infinitely preferable to vicarious violence. We have no doubt that the Punjab Government goaded to vicarious violence the people, who were endeavouring to train themselves for vicarious sacrifice.

But Lahore, to its credit, never left the chosen path. The sufferings of Lahore are, in our opinion, a purer treasure in a way even than those of the people who were the victims of the massacre of Jallianwala Bagh.

We shall now cast a cursory glance at these sufferings.

Col. Johnson, of African fame, was in command of the Lahore Martial Law Area from the 15th of April to the 29th of May, 1919. His administration was so sweeping that it made itself felt by all classes of people, high and low, not excluding the students, numbering several thousands, studying in the various colleges. The tallest had to bend before his iron rule.

Take his curfew order. Men, women and children, living in small places where people are used to retire early, may not notice the inconvenience of it as in a big city like Lahore. In Lahore it became intolerable. Even those who required medical help had to be without such assistance, and when the difficulty was pointed out to this officer by Pandit Jagat Narayan, he promptly stated: "You cannot wage war without having to suffer such hardships." An officer holding the responsible position that Col. Johnson did, ought not to have used a technical legal phrase in respect of a state of things which by no stretch of reasoning could be called "waging of war". It was a prostitution of terms to apply the expression to a state of things that existed in Lahore or, for that matter, in the Punjab. We have read all the evidence produced before Lord Hunter, and we have been unable to notice a single fact or argument in support of the statement that the Punjab was "waging war against the King." Col. Johnson was obliged to admit that people never made use of arms anywhere. Those who had arms, which they could have freely used, neither used them themselves nor allowed others to make use of them. We shall presently see what "waging war" actually meant in the opinion of the Judges of the Martial Law Tribunals, but here we have the spectacle of a British officer, of long standing and varied experience, making the most irresponsible statements, unsupported by anything that could be accepted by reasonable men, and acting, on his own showing, upon hearsay, taking drastic measures against the people who had done no wrong except protesting in an orderly manner against unjust administration. Many of those who broke the curfew order, knowingly or unknowingly, reasonably or unreasonably, were publicly whipped like common and incorrigible criminals.

Col. Johnson "laid the greatest importance" on the notice he gave to the effect that, if any bomb was thrown on his troops, it would be taken as done by all persons living within the radius of 100 yards, and that he would give to all those living within that area an hour’s time to leave and then dismantle and demolish every building there, except mosques and temples.

He had commandeered 800 tongas, which number was finally reduced to 200, and these were detained up to the time the Martial Law was in force. He commandeered all the motorcars belonging to Indians. He restricted travelling by railway, so as "to limit the activities of gentlemen who might proceed outside the city to the district with a view to cause trouble there”. He issued an order stopping all the free restaurants (langarkhanas). He regulated the prices of food-stuffs. He dispossessed licenceholders of their guns and his ardour had to be restrained by the Government in regard to those who were known to be men of “undoubted loyalty”. He confirmed the orders that were issued by the Deputy Commissioner closing the Badshahi Mosque,¹ and it was permitted to be opened only on an undertaking being given by the trustees that “no Hindu would be allowed to enter the Badshahi Mosque”.

He constituted Summary Courts. He himself tried cases. 277 persons were thus tried, of whom 201 were convicted. The maximum sentence was 2 years’ imprisonment, 30 stripes and a fine of 1,000 rupees. 800 stripes were ordered by Summary Court Magistrates, and they were distributed amongst 66 persons. The highest number of stripes was 30, the lowest 5. These men were publicly flogged until an order came to the effect that they were not to be so flogged. There was hardly any medical examination. Lord Hunter asked him whether he never imagined the punishment had serious effect. The answer was, “I cannot imagine it.” In his opinion it was “the kindliest method of punishment”. To Mr. Justice Rankin he said he “terrorized” people, and dozens and dozens of sentences were saved. Justice Rankin thought that it was a little strong to suggest that whipping should be regarded as the most efficacious and convenient method of summarily dealing with masses of people in minor breaches, and asked Col. Johnson whether it should not be rather exceptional, and the answer was:

I hardly agree with you. You have a very great population. You are creating new offences by the issue of these orders. If the jail is the only punishment, it would not affect this population here very much. The jail is an extraordinarily comfortable place from the general standard of households in the city. They are well fed in the Central Jail and one would soon have got used to the conditions. We were going to have the whole lot of them. I feared the jail would be filled.

In another place he says the value of whipping is equal to 1,000 soldiers. In our opinion, in applying the above reasoning, Col. Johnson has used barbarous arguments in order to support a barbarous punishment, and this fact alone makes him unfit for holding a responsible position, such as was entrusted to him by the ¹ It was closed to the public for two weeks.

Punjab Government. Nor were these the only punishments of whipping awarded. He has given those that were recorded by the Summary Courts, but the unrecorded punishments were perhaps more numerous than the recorded ones. Over 170 statements collected by us from Lahore go to show conclusively that the temper shown by the highest officers of the Crown had filtered down to the lowest, and in so filtering had reached such a fineness that it was ruffled on the slightest pretext, and was allowed to have its full play upon the populace, without any restraint worthy of the name.

His railway-travelling order, besides being general, was particularly aimed at lawyers’ clerks and their messengers. Sir C. Setalvad asked:

In the order No. 6 you say, “I have reasons to believe that munshis, agents and chaprasis of pleaders are engaged in disseminating seditious propaganda.” Therefore, you issued an order prohibiting them from leaving Lahore Civil Command without permit, and you ordered every legal practitioner to submit a complete list of every munshi, agent or chaprasi directly or indirectly employed by him?

Col. Johnson replied in the affirmative. When he was asked what evidence he had, he admitted it was all verbal.

It is well known how far this bias against the lawyer class was carried, how lawyers from outside the Punjab were refused admittance on the ground that they might also disseminate sedition. Even a scholarly lawyer of Mr. Manohar Lal’s standing, respectability, known loyalty and caution bordering even on timidity, could not count upon being safe from the attentions of the Martial Law officers. He is an M.A. of the Punjab, a B.A. of Cambridge, a fellow and a member of the Syndicate of the Punjab University. He was a foundation scholar of St. John’s College, Cambridge, and possesses several other distinctions. He is the Vice-President of the High Court Bar Association and the President of the Forman College Graduates’ Union. He was arrested at about 7.30 a.m. on the 18th of April, as a trustee of The Tribune newspaper. There was no warrant, nor was he told the charge on which he was arrested. He says:

On my arrest at my house, I had barely two minutes to take leave of my wife and children, and I was given no indication of where I was to be taken.

He says further:

At about 2 p.m., I was removed by the police from the Telegraph Office to the Central Jail, Lahore, where after the usual ceremonies at the gate, of depositing watch and chain, pencil, loose cash, etc., and signing the register by my thumb impression only, I was taken into a cell in the Ward No. 14 of the jail. This ward is meant for condemned prisoners, or those awaiting trial for capital or similar offences. In this cell, I was supplied after a time with two filthy jail blankets, and two iron basins to eat and drink out of. After about three hours, I was transferred to another part of the jail, known as the Chakkis, i.e., a series of cells furnished with arrangements for grinding corn.

I do not wish to describe the cells, because they can easily be seen. All our sanitary and other arrangements were inside the small cells, consisting of stinking earthen vessels, cleaned twice a day. I was, when in this cell, allowed a short time in the morning to walk on a small indicated beat of about fifty yards, and go to the tap for a wash, if desired. I had no clothes but the suit in which I was taken away from the house, and it was not till Monday the 21st, that, in the afternoon, I was given a few clothes brought by my son, when he came to interview me.

My wife and children had no idea of where I was confined till late in the afternoon of the day of my arrest. I was allowed no communication with them, except for the postcard I was able to send through the Superintendent of the jail on Saturday afternoon.

On Monday, 21st April, my friend, Kanwar Dalip Singh, Bar-at-Law, and my son came to see me at the jail, but, as I was allowed to see only one of them, I had a few minutes’ interview in the presence of the Darogha1 of the jail with my barrister friend. My request for the indulgence, if that it was, for a minute’s talk with my son was refused by the Superintendent, Mr. Cowan.

On Wednesday the 23rd, I was transferred to the European ward, where I was comparatively more comfortable, having considerable liberty of movement, and because of the accommodation and clean lavatory and washing arrangements and a small library.

I lived in this ward till the morning of my release, the 16th of May. During this period I had, I believe, three regular interviews with my friends and relatives, one very brief, one as a special case with Kanwar Dalip Singh, as he used to be frequently in the jail, on account of his being retained by the Government for the undefended prisoners, and one, as an act of special kindness by the Superintendent, with my brother who was passing through Lahore.

1 Head warder
During the whole of this time, I was given no indication as to what the charge or accusation against me was. I was left in a state of complete uncertainty.

Mr. Manohar Lal gives us also a glimpse of what happened to his invalid wife and children. He says:

I learnt, during one of the interviews allowed me in jail, that my house was searched after my arrest. It was locked up within less than three quarters of an hour of my arrest. My wife, an invalid lady, and my children had to find shelter in the servant's quarters and the kitchen in the compound, and they had to use bedding lent to them by friends. The search took place on the 18th of April, and my family was able to return to the house on the 19th of April, at about 6 p.m.

Two or three valuable books were also taken away by the police and remained unreturned to the day of his making the statement. He concludes the story of his arrest as follows:

To this day I am ignorant of any accusation against me, or of anything else that led to, much less necessitated, my arrest and confinement.

In examining the possible reason for his arrest, he says:

I do not take any part in the active life of the town, being almost entirely a student, so far as professional duties permit. During the many and frequent meetings to which the Deputy Commissioner called representatives, etc., of the people, I was never called, nor was otherwise present nor did I attend any of the meetings held by private gentlemen to devise means to stop the hartal.

An officer who can order or allow the arrest of a man of Mr. Manohar Lal's standing without the most searching investigation is unfit to hold the high command that Col. Johnson did. It betrays a contempt for Indian honour such as ought not to be possible in those who wear His Majesty's uniform.

Another form of torture invented by this resourceful officer was to paste his notices on the houses of those whom he considered to be "evilly disposed persons". The owner was made responsible for any damage done, including even the dirtying of these notices. Sir Chimanlal asked him for a definition of "evilly disposed persons", and asked whether those whom he suspected would be the evilly disposed people. His astounding reply was, "If you like to put [it] that way, I would not object." "I want to know what was in your mind?", asked Sir Chimanlal. The answer was:
I thought that people who were not known for their notorious loyalty should be employed on that work, and the persons deficient in this quality were selected by the C.I.D.

Sir Chimanlal suggested that the task meant watching the notices for full 24 hours from day to day. Col. Johnson admitted the necessity for such a watch, but held it to be absolutely justifiable. Intolerable as such an order was in any event, it became a thousand-fold intolerable when a whole institution was held responsible.

And this brings us to the story of the violence done to the student world as well as the professors of colleges. We must give the dialogue between Sir Chimanlal Setalvad and Col. Johnson in order that the working of Col. Johnson’s mind may be thoroughly understood.

Q. The Sanatan Dharma College was one of the buildings selected for putting up that notice?
A. I believe it was.

Q. It was not in the first list prominent, though it was but subsequently added?
A. Yes, the list was recast afterwards.

Q. And the notice stuck on the outer wall of this college was torn down by someone?
A. That was the information laid before me, not by the police, but by somebody.

Q. Is it true that all the students of the hostels of the college were arrested?
A. I ordered that every male found on the premises should be arrested.

Q. How many were arrested?
A. 500.

Q. 500 students were arrested for this notice being damaged?
A. And the professors too.

Q. All of them so arrested were marched to the Fort which is three miles away from the College?
A. Quite.

Q. And during that march they were ordered to carry their bedding on their shoulders or heads?
A. If they wanted to carry their bedding, they could.

Q. Were they not made to carry them?
A. I made no order as to that. If they wanted to carry them, they could.
Q. On a Lahore summer day?
A. It was a May day.
Q. It was very hot in Lahore?
A. Yes.
Q. All these 500 students and professors were marched a distance of three miles?
A. Quite.
Q. And they were kept under orders in the Fort?
A. Yes, that is so.
Q. How long were they kept there?
A. I think one day. I beg your pardon, two days.
Q. They were then released after taking from the Principal certain undertakings as to their seeing that the notices were preserved?
A. Yes, after I got the necessary guarantee that such a thing would not happen again.
Q. I put it to you, Colonel, do you think that the measure that you took was a reasonable one?
A. Yes. I was looking for it. I was looking just for such an opportunity.
Q. You considered it then, and you consider it now, a reasonable order to make?
A. Undoubtedly.
Q. Your frame of mind, then, Colonel, was as you indicated in your report, that you were waiting for an opportunity to bring home to them the power of Martial Law?
A. That was so.
Q. You were longing for such an opportunity?
A. Only in the interests of the people themselves.
Q. I do not suggest that it was not in their interest. It may or may not be. But you were longing for an opportunity to show the might of Martial Law?
A. Quite.
Q. You got that opportunity?
A. And I took it.
Q. And you took it and marched these 500 students to the Fort in the hot sun?
A. That is so.
Q. And you still maintain, that was a proper exercise of your authority?
A. Undoubtedly. I will do it again tomorrow, if circumstances require.
It should be remembered that the last cold-blooded reply of Col. Johnson was given, not whilst he was in the thick of the battle, but on the 24th November, 1919, nearly six months after he had left his command of Lahore. If his precious notice was wilfully defaced by anybody at all, it was his duty to make an enquiry, and not straightway proceed to punish the professors and the students. But Col. Johnson was nothing if not thorough, and therefore he took action against the D.A.V. College, the Dyal Singh College and the Medical College, not by way of punishment, but in order to keep the students “out of mischief”, and the order issued was that there was to be a roll-call of all the students, four times a day, the hours being 7 and 11 in the morning, and 3 and 7.30 in the evening.” And the Medical College students, in order to attend this roll 4 times a day, had to walk in all about 17 miles a day?” was Sir Chimanlal’s question. The impertinent reply given by Col. Johnson was: “I think it was only 16. I measured it.” Sir Chimanlal then asked:

And they had to walk like this, in the hot sun of Lahore, for 3 weeks every day?

A. That is so, unless exempted by a medical certificate.

Q. You thought, Colonel, then, and you still maintain the view, that this was a reasonable order to make in order to keep students out of mischief?

A. That was my opinion then.

Q. And still it is your opinion?

A. Absolutely.

Q. Did it ever occur to you, and does it occur to you now, that it was working upon students the utmost hardship to make them travel 16 miles every day in the Lahore sun for three weeks?

A. No hardship at all.

We must give in Col. Johnson’s own words the extraordinary justification for his extraordinary action:

Q. I put it to you again, Colonel, did it ever occur to you that by treating—I do not know how many hundreds, possibly thousands, of students in the manner you did, with regard to the roll-call, you were making these young men bear bitter hatred towards the British Government for the rest of their lives?

A. It did, but I came to the conclusion that there was so much sedition in these colleges that nothing that I did could make them worse.

Q. Do I understand you to say that although it did occur to you that this treatment of yours might result in turning them bitter against the British Government, your view was that they were such confirmed seditionists that you could not make them more bitter?

A. I do not accept your description, but the atmosphere of the colleges was such that you could not hurt it.

Q. Do you think that, by the measures you took, you were helping in the least to improve it?

A. I was certainly not making it worse.

Q. Were you improving it?

A. I was not out to make them loyal, but I was to keep them out of mischief and to keep them from outlying districts.

Q. Did you succeed?

A. Yes.

Q. You think that is the best way?

A. That is the best way I could think of. There are two ways. One is to close the colleges, and the other is to prosecute them.

Q. I take it to be your view that the best way of making people in this country loyal and well disposed towards Government is to adopt more harsh measures towards them?

A. I put it the other way—by teaching that there is a penalty for such suspected sedition.

Q. Did it ever occur to you that among these thousands of students there must have been a large number of perfectly innocent ones?

A. Yes, I gave exemptions to some.

The Colonel thought that some students had insulted English ladies. We have not found anything to justify this charge. He has himself produced nothing in support of his opinion, but he had on that account a meeting of the principals of the colleges. He had a"frank talk" with them, and asked them to submit proposals for adequate punishments. The principals came out with what was suitable punishment in their view. He considered that some of the punishments were inadequate, and he promptly informed the principals that"unless the punishments were raised, the colleges would be closed and the students would be stopped from attending the examinations.” In this way, a thousand and eleven students were punished. This is what Mr. Sant Ram Grover, M.A., B.Sc., Professor of English, Dyal Singh College, says about the students and their treatment:

During the hartal days, I observed no change in the attitude of the students of my college, and I cannot recall even a single case of unseemly conduct on the part of any of them.
Like many other buildings, our college was selected for having Martial Law notices posted thereon. About ten days or more after the proclamation of Martial Law, a notice was served on the Principal of our college, at about 7 p.m., one evening, that the writer of a seditious poster, which was attached to the notice, must be found out and reported to the Officer Commanding before 12 noon the next day. The trustees, staff, and students met the following morning to find out the writer, but were unable to do so, as no one connected with the college appeared to have been the author thereof. We were just drafting a reply, when Col. Johnson with some C.I.D. men came to our college. Raja Narendra Nath, one of the trustees, and some others came down to explain the matter to the Colonel. One C.I.D. man pointed out a place in the college, where he said he had found the poster stuck on the wall. I suggested to the Colonel that it must all be a story, for, though the poster appeared to have been fixed with a nail on the wall, there was no corresponding mark on the wall itself. We then showed to the Colonel the reply we had drafted. On this, the Colonel asked the reply to be sent to his office, which was done. The same evening, another notice was received asking the Principal to see him the next morning at 9 a.m. The Principal saw the Colonel at the appointed time, and returned with some soldiers with fixed bayonets. He was asked to pay Rs. 250 by way of fine, or go to jail for three months. The fine was paid on the spot.

A few days after, our Principal, like those of other colleges, got an order from the Deputy Commissioner to find out and punish the ring-leaders, no explanation being given as to ringleaders of what movement were meant. We took it that some students had to be punished. To satisfy this demand, the College Council met and picked out a few students, and drew up a list of punishments. The list was shown to and approved of by the trustees. I took this list myself to the Deputy Commissioner with a letter from Raja Narendra Nath, mentioning the punishments, saying that a larger number of students was not castigated, because it would cause an unnecessary agitation, dangerous to society.

A day or two after this, we got a reply that the punishments were inadequate, and that a sufficient number of students had not been punished. The College Council again met, and a few more students were added to the list, and the punishments of others enhanced. The next day, we heard from the Deputy Commissioner, approving of the punishments and sending a cheque for Rs. 250 in remittance of the fine previously realized. (Statement No. 151, p. 201.)

them from attending examinations, etc. All this without any real trial. The letter, addressed on behalf of Col. Johnson to the Principal of the D.A.V. College on the 10th of May, shows most accurately the attitude adopted by this officer. We, therefore, give it below without any further comment.

Copy of a letter No. 111-4, dated 10th May 1919, from the Staff Officer, Lahore (Civil) Command, Punjab Club, Lahore, to the address of the Principal, D.A.V. College, Lahore:

The Officer Commanding, Lahore (Civil) Area, has carefully considered your letter of the 7th instant. In reply, I am directed to say that Col. Johnson considers the disciplinary action suggested therein as entirely inadequate, in view of all the facts at his disposal, which would tend to prove that the students of your college have even exceeded those of other colleges in Lahore in seditious activities. And I am to say that unless he receives from you today a schedule of punishments which, in his opinion, are more adequately applicable to the unenviable reputation of your college, the Officer Commanding would have no alternative but to immediately close the D.A.V. College and exclude all its students from the forthcoming examination.

In order to assist you in framing a scale of punishments, I am directed to inform you that in the case of the Government College, 6 students are being expelled and debarred from ever entering any other college in the University, 6 are not to be allowed to proceed to any further examination, 6 are to be rusticated for a year, 15 forfeit their scholarships, besides minor punishments in 112 other cases.

In the Dyal Singh College, 7 students are to be expelled, 5 are to be rusticated for a year, 14 will be put back one year, 14 are suspended for three months, 2 are temporarily deprived of their scholarships, and 224 are to suffer minor punishments, whilst 245 are required to furnish substantial securities for their future behaviours.

The Officer Commanding thinks that it may help you to submit proposals which will save him the necessity of closing your college, if I add that he expects such disciplinary action to be in no degree less than those to which I have drawn your attention.

Finally, I am to say that the Officer Commanding, Lahore Civil Area, is unable to accept the proposal that any portion of the fines inflicted should be paid to the Comforts Fund for British soldiers.

Staff Officer,
Lahore Civil Command

Then there was an order making it a crime for more than 2
Indians to walk abreast. “The preamble stated, ‘Whereas it is expedient to prevent violence or intimidation, if more than two ‘natives’ come and do not give way to a European, that is likely to lead to a breach of the peace’,” said Col. Johnson to Sir Chimanlal. Sir Chimanlal elicited the fact that the breach of the peace would be committed not by the “natives”, but by the Europeans, and Indians had to suffer in order to prevent a breach of the peace on the part of European who might resent more than two Indians walking abreast. One of the reasons he gave to Sir Chimanlal for depriving Indian owners of their cars was that it was a reasonable measure, as “he wanted to bring home to the people that they could not play this game and that they could not have risings in Lahore.”

The following questions and answers demonstrate fully the blighting effect of Col. Johnson’s rule.

Q. Is it true, as has been alleged, that a marriage party in a certain part of Lahore was arrested, because they were more than ten, and moving about as they usually do, and the marriage party and the bridegroom were arrested and the priest and others were flogged?

A. It is quite true. It is the one instance that I know of, that is to be regretted. The moment I heard of it the fines were remitted and the Civil Magistrate was removed.

It is good of Col. Johnson that there was at least one instance which caused him some regret, but it is also the one instance which shows how dangerous the punishment of flogging is, and how his totally unnecessary orders caused the greatest irritation and inconvenience to the population that was perfectly harmless.

We have been dwelling on the acts of Col. Johnson as if they were his own original productions. Whilst he was, no doubt, capable of doing most of the things himself, there can equally be no doubt that there was a mind and a purpose behind these acts that was not Col. Johnson’s. That Officer was executing Sir Michael O’Dwyer’s policy and wishes. Mr. Manohar Lal was arrested, because he was a trustee for The Tribune. That independent newspaper had to be killed. Mr. Kalinath Roy, the able Editor of The Tribune, had offended him more than once by his independence. His article on Sir Michael’s vituperative speech of the 7th April, entitled “Blazing Indiscretion” was the last straw. How blazing the indiscreet speech was, the events have shown. He had not a single self-respecting man to defend his indefensible conduct towards the educated classes. Anyway, Mr. Kalinath Roy was duly arrested, tried and convicted for seditious
1. We have no hesitation in saying that there was not a word of sedition in Mr. Roy’s writings. His trial was nothing less than an outrage on decency in political life. No less cruel was the prosecution of the Editor of Pratap, a paper that had just commenced its career and whose Editor was widely known for his meekness and the harmless religious character of his writings. The existence of independent journalism became an impossibility during the Martial Law regime and The Tribune, the Punjabee, and the Pratap stopped publishing.

We now come to the oppression not practised in its nakedness, as it was in connection with the orders we have till now dealt with, but veiled and practised in the name of law and justice. We refer to the Martial Law Commissions. These Commissions were supposed to conduct a judicial but summary trial of persons who were supposed to have committed serious crimes, i.e., waging war. We have examined the papers in connection with the trial of the Lahore leaders. They were 11 in number, most of them occupying a high status in society, and some of them worthy to be Sir M. O’Dwyer’s peers. Seven of them are barristers or pleaders. Lala Harkishen Lal has furnished us with a statement, in which he has no hesitation in saying that he was charged because Sir M. O’Dwyer was, in plain English, jealous of his reputation as a financier, and in other respects concerned with activities which were distasteful to the Lieut.-Governor. He shows in his statement how insidious attempts were made to ruin the enterprises that he was controlling. Lala Harkishen Lal says that his deportation was without the least justification, and his trial and conviction were based purely on fabrication. The general dislike that Sir M. O’Dwyer felt towards the deponent was intensified in that the deponent had been appointed a member of the Congress Deputation, and was to proceed to England at the end of April, 1919, and that he had also been elected to preside at the Punjab Provincial Conference which was to be held at Jullundur on the 18th and 19th of April, 1919.

He and the other leaders were tried for waging war. We have read the precis of the charge against the accused, and it consists in the accused having taken part in the Rowlatt Act agitation, in the hartal, having made speeches, having supported langarkhanas and in being present at the meetings we have already described. We have read the evidence produced against these popular leaders, and we have read also the judgment, and have come to the conclusion that the whole of the trial was a travesty of justice, and it was an abuse of language to consider their acts as tantamount to the ‘waging of war’. It is remarkable, too, that the judges took judicial notice of the state of war in the Punjab, because of the proclamation establishing Martial Law, whereas it was their clear duty, in trying individual cases, to take evidence rebutting the proposition that there was a state of rebellion or war in the Punjab. Lala Harkishen Lal has stated what it cost him to undergo the trial and imprisonment. He says the telegrams cost him well-nigh Rs. 1,200, the trial another sum of Rs. 12,000 and the appeal a good round sum, but the accounts were not yet complete. Loss of business meant nothing less than 3 lacs of rupees. It may mean nothing to him to lose all this money, but we are aware of some who have been impoverished because of these so-called judicial trials.

Mr. Santanam, a barrister of 10 years’ standing, and practising in Lahore, and who was engaged for the defence, has furnished us with a graphic description of the tribunals. We make no apology for giving a long extract from his statement. After describing what he had seen himself of the firing on the 10th April, and of the other effects of the Martial Law, he proceeds:

The consciousness of the humiliation to which every Indian, irrespective of status, was subjected in those days was however nothing in comparison to the pain one felt at the sorry plight of those poor prisoners who had been arrested in hundreds and were being arraigned before the Martial Law Tribunals. It is no exaggeration to say that no legal help of any kind was for theoming. The Government had, no doubt, out of a feeling of great humanity (one likes to think so at least), appointed a counsel for each Tribunal to take up the case of those who could not afford to engage a lawyer to defend them. But this was a colossal sham, as such a counsel had often to defend as many as 10 to 15 men at a time, and that too, without any adequate time to consult them, or prepare their case. Some of these gentlemen had confessed to me that in several cases they had not had as much as 5 minutes with each accused for consultation, before being asked to defend them against such serious charges as waging war, conspiracy, arson, murder, etc. The procedure usually was to bring up before a Tribunal a batch of the accused, often numbering 30 and 40, who had never been told for what offence they had been arrested, to read out the charge to them, and ask them then and there to name what witnesses they were going to summon in their defence. They were also told at the same time that the Government would try their best to summon these witnesses, but could not guarantee that each and every one would be produced. As often as not, the precis of the evidence for the prosecution was not read out to them, nor were they allowed to take copies of the precis. Each accused was asked if he had a counsel of his own; if not, he was told that the counsel appointed by the Crown would defend him. After this, they were taken back to the jail, and were not allowed to see even the Crown counsel till 9 o’clock on the morning of the day fixed for their trial, which usually was 3 or 4 days after the day on which the charge was read out to them. Sometimes, I am told, the Crown counsel was allowed to see the prisoners in jail from 7 a.m. in the morning till 8.30 a.m., when the prisoners were usually taken to court. But it can be imagined what this concession amounted to, if it is remembered that these counsel had to attend the court every day at 10 a.m., and had to defend fresh batches of accused each day, so that they could only have consultation with those whose cases were coming on that very day. Let it also be remembered that the trial of 20 and 30 persons on very serious charges was usually over in a day, and it can be imagined what sort of trial these poor men could have had.

If this was the fate of the men who were too poor to engage counsel, the fate of those who were in a position to do so was not any better, as, though willing to pay, they could not find any counsel of any standing to take up their cases. The first difficulty they encountered was that no one knew on which day any accused would be brought up before a Tribunal and arraigned. In this uncertainty, the better class of lawyers could not accept a brief beforehand, quite ignorant as to whether the date would be suitable to them or not.

The second difficulty was that most of the lawyers having taken some part or other in politics, which was anathema to the then Government, were afraid that their turn might come next to be arrested, and did not want to hasten the evil day by taking up the cases of the alleged revolutionaries. The third and the most important one was that there was a general belief that the Government looked upon counsel who took up such cases as seditious and revolutionaries themselves and such a course was enough in itself to get a man into trouble. This idea was strengthened by the action of the Hon’ble Mian Mohammad Shafi, now a member of the Viceroy’s Executive Council, whom a relative of Seth Ram Pershad had engaged to defend him when he would be brought up for trial. A few days after this, Mr. Shafi returned the brief, and I have it on very reliable authority that the reason he gave was that a high officer of the Government had as much as given a hint to him that such a course on his part was not looked upon with approval by the Government. It can better be imagined than described what effect this incident had on the already demoralized Bar.

My own personal experience is that whether the Government disapproved or not, it was evident that the police which was all in all at that time, certainly did not relish the idea. Up till May 1919, I had the good fortune not to attract the attention of the C.I.D. to myself. But on May 14th, I was engaged on behalf of the accused in the case of Lala Harkishen Lal and others, known as the Lahore Leaders’ Case and went up to Simla with a petition for transfer of the case and for permission to get counsel from outside, which was, of course, never granted. But this action of mine seems to have been enough for the C.I.D., for, when I came back from Simla, I was told that the C.I.D. had been regularly patrolling my house in my absence and incidentally frightening my family into fits. Ever since then, I have been regularly shadowed and my movements watched and it is only recently that their unwelcome attentions have been somewhat relaxed.

From what I have said above, it will be clear that the accused were practically undefended and the Government succeeded in its object of securing speedy convictions without any opposition. The order prohibiting counsel from outside entering the Martial Law [area] was meant only to prevent the truth of the atrocities being committed here from becoming known to the outside world, and to obviate the possibility of any agitation being set up against the monstrous injustice perpetrated here under colour of judicial procedure.

Not content with setting up these difficulties in the way of an efficient defence being put up, the Tribunals went further and did things which no court, either civil or military, with any pretensions to deal justice of even a rudimentary character, would dare do. The ordinance of the Viceroy empowered the convening authority to convene a court with the powers of a Summary General Court Martial “wherever it might be necessary in the interests of public safety.” But all the trials conducted by all the four Martial Law Tribunals were invariably under the powers of a Summary General Court

Martial, or, as it is otherwise called, a Drumhead Court Martial. I might explain that these Courts Martial are intended for the armies on the actual field of battle, where the niceties of legal procedure cannot be observed in the interests of military expediency.

The counsel engaged in the cases were treated with scant courtesy and were made to feel that they were there by mere sufferance. The most reasonable requests were most insolently refused and sometimes counsel were even actually insulted.

No records of proceedings were allowed to be taken on behalf of the accused except short notes by the counsel himself. There was actually an order to this effect by the convening authority which I herewith attach. (Appendix A.)

The record taken down by the court was an extremely unfair one, as the evidence-in-chief for the prosecution was taken down verbatim, but the answers in cross-examination were not taken down for the most part, especially those which were in some way favourable to the accused, in spite of repeated requests by the counsel for the accused. The reply usually given by the Commissioners was that, sitting as a Summary General Court Martial, they were not obliged to keep any record at all, except such notes as they considered necessary for their own use. As a consequence of this, it will be observed in the existing records that there are often pages of depositions of prosecution witnesses followed by a few lines of statement in cross-examination and these few lines too contain the most futile and unimportant answers. As an instance, I might point to the evidence of one Maratab Ali Shah, a Sub-Inspector of Police in the Lahore Leaders’ Case, being witness No. 29 for the prosecution. He was subjected to a very severe cross-examination for nearly half an hour, and if it were all taken down, it would have been clear that if any witness broke down completely, it was he. But on the actual record there are only two lines, and this man’s evidence has been relied on by the Commissioners in their judgment.

No fair or reasonable opportunities were given for cross-examination. Counsel were often told to limit their examination to a certain number of questions, or were given a time limit, irrespective of whether their questions were relevant or not. A good deal of protection was given to the prosecution witnesses and the Commissioners very often told them not to answer inconvenient questions, though perfectly relevant to the case. They also encouraged them to be insolent to the counsel.

Very often when a witness was cornered and was hesitating for an answer, the Commissioners told him, “If you don’t remember, say so”; and this hint was invariably taken by the witness who afterwards was ready with his answers, ”I do not remember.” The protection accorded to the European witnesses specially was something ludicrous. Any questions put with the object of making them contradict themselves were considered lese-majeste. Very often a witness, who had deposed to a certain incident, would shelter himself behind the reply ”I do not remember.” After this you were not allowed to put any other questions prompting his memory so as to elicit the true reply. If you did, the Commissioners came out with, ”Do not you hear that he says he does not remember?” In deposing to the above facts, I speak from my experience of the Tribunal presided over by the Hon’ble Mr. Justice Leslie Jones, which tried the Lahore Leaders’ Case.

Towards the close of the case, very little argument was allowed. Very often a time limit was placed. Legal objections were brushed aside most contemptuously. When I appeared before the Tribunal presided over by the Hon’ble Mr. Justice Broadway in the Gujranwala Leaders’ Case, I put in an application raising nearly all the points of jurisdiction now raised before the Privy Council. The learned Commissioner at first refused to hear me and said he would send on the application to the convening authority for disposal. On my protesting against such a course and quoting a section of the Army Act for the simple proposition that the convening authority was functus officio when the court was once convened, and it was for the Court to decide these questions, he most grudgingly allowed me to argue, but told me that he would allow me only half an hour for arguing about 7 or 8 points of jurisdiction that I had raised. My protests were ignored, and I began my argument. In the middle of my argument, the Government Advocate got up to object to some remark of mine. The Commissioner at once came out with this remark, ”Mr. Herbert, why do you think it worthwhile to object? It will only make him take a longer time. Let him have his say and let us be done with it.” At the end of a little over half an hour, I was asked to finish my arguments as I had only 5 minutes more allowed to me. I had perforce to comply with it and the Court without calling on the other side for a reply passed its order. In it, only a few objections I took up are dealt with most cursorily and the rest ignored.

The trials which were carried on under such circumstances were a mere farce, and no real justice was sought to do [sic] or was administered. My experience of the two Tribunals I appeared before was an extremely painful and humiliating one, all the more so, because I had the honour of appearing before both the presiding officers in the calmer atmosphere of the High Court, where I had known them to act at least with a judicial decorum. My experience of Martial Law has been a revelation to me, inasmuch as I found that judges who, in the High Court atmosphere, would respect judicial forms and give a scrupulously fair hearing to the accused and their counsel, brushed aside in the Martial Law atmosphere all canons of propriety and rendered themselves practically unfit as judges even though dealing with matters of life and death.

Nor were the leaders the only ones arrested and tried. Several others were tried before the Martial Law Commissions, and many more before the so-called Summary Courts. We have been furnished with a statement, from which we find that sixty-four were tried before the Commissions, of whom eight were discharged, three hundred and fifty tried before the Summary Courts and one hundred and two discharged, and 40 were arrested and released without trial, after having been kept in custody for several days, even extending to over a month, as in the case of Mr. Manohar Lal.

Thus Lahore, which had done no wrong, which had tried to conciliate the authorities, whose leaders had done all that was humanly possible to serve the authorities, had Martial Law inflicted upon it, and that under an officer who proved to be heartless, cruel, and utterly indifferent to the sentiments and susceptibilities of the people who had the misfortune to come under his charge. Every conceivable form of humiliation of every stratum of Lahore society was brought into service. We consider that, so far as we are aware of the local conditions, Martial Law was totally uncalled for, was unduly prolonged, and was ruthlessly and inhumanly administered, and indescribable injustice was perpetrated, even through the courts known as Martial Law Commissions or Summary or Area Officers’ Courts.

KASUR

Kasur is an important town in the Lahore district, about 40 miles from Lahore. It is an important railway station on the main line, and a fairly large trade centre, with a population of 24,000. On the 6th April, there was no hartal in Kasur. Nothing happened on the 10th, but, on the 11th, the news of Mr. Gandhi’s arrest and the deportation of Drs. Satyapal and Kitchlew had reached Kasur early in the morning. There was, therefore, hartal during part of the day, and a public meeting in the evening. The speeches were so unexceptionable that, with all the desire to prosecute the leaders, the leading lawyers of Kasur, in connection with the speeches, nothing could be found against them of an incriminating nature in their speeches. We know that the Sub-Divisional Officer, Mr. Marsden, laboured the point about the speeches and, in his evidence before the Hunter Committee, suggested that the lawyers, by their irresponsible talk and failure properly to interpret the Rowlatt Act, had created an atmosphere of excitement. Whether there was misrepresentation about the Rowlatt Act in the course of conversation on the part of anybody, we do not know. Some exaggeration and some mis-representation about unpopular acts of a legislature or an executive are, unfortunately, inevitable in any society, no matter how well organized or cultured. But we believe that the lawyers in question did not indulge in any exaggeration whatever about the evil effects of the Act. As we have shown in discussing the Act, its evil effects are hardly capable of being exaggerated, for the Act perpetuates a regime of lawlessness, wherever it can be made applicable.

The 12th of April followed with a complete hartal. The temper of the people was different of the 12th from that of the 11th. We believe the testimony of one of the witnesses before the Hunter Committee that some people had come in from Amritsar, had given an exaggerated picture of the events there and inflamed the minds of the gullible or the disreputable element in Kasur. The idlers as well as the middle class people gathered together, marched on the station, and tried to set fire to it. The fire which was started in the lamp-room was easily put out by some of the leaders, who had rushed in on hearing of the intentions of the crowd. Partially foiled in the attempt, the crowd went to the signal station, wherein a train had just arrived and stopped. The crowd emptied the mineral waters compartment of its contents, and, seeing some Europeans, made a disgraceful attack on them, in which they were again foiled by the timely appearance of Mr. Ghulam Mohiyuddin, a noted pleader of Kasur, and his friends. Mr. Sherbourne and his children were taken to a place of safety. The train, however, proceeded further with two more precious lives. They were two English soldiers. On the train reaching the station, the soldiers thought their safety lay in escape. They got out of the train and fired on the howling mob in pure self-defence. But their fire produced no effect on the mob, save perhaps to excite it to still further fury, and these two innocent Englishmen were brutally clubbed to death. In all the excesses, none perhaps was so brutal, inhuman and cowardly as this unprovoked murder of innocent soldiers. Indefensible as the conduct of the mob must be held in Amritsar, it has at least the double provocation in the shape of the arrest of Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal, and the firing near the carriage-bridge as an extenuating circumstance. We cannot too strongly condemn these excesses. Drunk with the blood of their innocent victims, these rioters proceeded to the revenue offices, and burnt them. They were finally dispersed by the police, who were ordered to fire on them.

It is remarkable how the mob fury subsided in every place in a few hours. In Kasur, too, perfect quiet reigned after a few hours. Our examination of these incidents shows that the mob fury was a sudden outburst, and not the calculated result of a conspiracy or a plot. The authorities were able to make arrests without any difficulty. Mr. Marsden was sent to replace the Indian Sub-Divisional Officer, and Martial Law was proclaimed on the 16th April.

The administration of Martial Law was placed in the hands of Col. MacRae, who was followed by Captain Doveton. In some respects, these two officers excelled their brother officers in their inventiveness, irresponsibility and total disregard of the feelings and sentiments of those who were affected by their orders. We give the following condensed summary of their proceedings, made from the evidence before Lord Hunter’s Committee. The first arrests commenced on the 16th. There was a proclamation parade at the Town Hall, and, evidently, to signalize the inauguration of Martial Law, they arrested Baba Dhanpat Rai, an aged and respected leader of long standing. He is 65 years old. He was detained at the Lahore Central Jail for 46 days, and released on the Ist of June, without ever having been told why he was arrested. 21 further arrests were made that same day, 3 more the next day, 4 on the 18th and 40 on the 19th. In all, 172 persons were arrested; of these, 97 were discharged without being sent up for trial. Of the 75 sent up, 51 were actually convicted. Amongst the men arrested were included Maulvi Ghulam Mohyuddin and Maulvi Abdul Kadir, who were the men who had succeeded in protecting Mr. and Mrs. Sherbourne and who, otherwise, had used their influence entirely to restrain the excesses of the crowd. The houses of many of these leaders were searched without the slightest excuse. On the 1st of May, the whole town of Kasur, excluding women and little children, was required to attend at the railway station for purposes of identification. They were made to sit bareheaded in the hot sun till 2 o’clock, without water or food. As one of the witnesses said before Lord Hunter, this was a totally useless procedure, bare of any substantial results, so far as the collection of evidence was concerned. We who have some experience of law and the manner in which evidence can be collected and tested have no hesitation in saying that it is impossible to secure correct identification by holding a parade in this manner, and that no value can be attached to identification thus procured. We suspect that the so-called parade was held purely with a view to humiliating the whole town and in order to strike terror. For, after the people had collected, search parties were sent out in order to see that nobody absented himself. It is not difficult to imagine the state in which the unprotected women must have been in the presence of these search parties.

During the trials at Kasur, 40 men were sentenced to be whipped. The total number of stripes given was 710. The flogging-post was erected on the station platform. Schoolboys were also punished with flogging. The head master of one school is supposed to have reported that his boys were getting insubordinate and asked for military help. The Officer Commanding, thereupon, suggested that some of the boys should be whipped. Therefore, boys from this school and another were ordered to be collected. The head master was asked to select 6 boys. He selected those who were not quite high class, but who were not physically fit. The Officer Commanding, therefore, rejected these boys and asked Mr. Marsden to select others, and so a selection was made out of the boys belonging to the complaining school and another, without any other reason than that they were bodily fitted to receive the punishment more than the others. They were whipped outside the station entrance in the presence of other schoolboys. In answer to the question by Lord Hunter as to what the object was, the reply given by Mr. Marsden was that there was no particular object. If should be remembered that there was no question of any Martial Law offence. No investigation, no trial. It was an unlawful and wanton use of authority. It was in Kasur again that prostitutes were invited to witness flogging on one occasion. (See their joint statement No. 279. B.)

Two men were even shot by the sentries. One was found to be dumb. Probably in both cases the shooting was wilful and wanton. We think that had the sacredness of Indian life been recognized, and a sense of justice prevailed at the top, the sentries would not have been so free with their guns, as we fear they were.

Kasur was the place where fancy punishments were most common.”What happened was,” said Mr. Marsden,”Captain Doveton did not like to go through the formalities of trial and sentence.” He wanted to do things”summarily”. There can be no question of a record of the many punishments awarded by this capricious officer. He”used to make people mark time and climb ladders”. By way of change, some sadhus were whitewashed. Capt. Doveton denies that this was deliberate. He says that they were asked to unload lime and they became whitewashed. We totally disbelieve this explanation, and we believe the testimony of eyewitnesses who have described the process. One form of punishment consisted in making the so-called delinquents lift heavy bales in the station warehouse. People who failed to salaam every white man were made to rub their noses on the ground if they were not flogged. Captain Doveton and Mr. Marsden suggested that the people liked Martial Law and were rather”amused” at these punishments than terrified or humiliated. Capt. Doveton got from the people an address for him-self, and actually, by way of punishment, required Mohammedans to compose verses in his praise. He inflicted also the punishment of skipping, which consisted in the punished people skipping 20 times without a break. He says that at least 20 people were thus punished.

Mr. Marsden has complained that among the exaggerations made by the pleaders there was one in which a Hindu pleader was reported to have said that the people were like”unarmed cattle in the eyes of the Government”. The punishments that we have described, and the levity with which the people’s feelings were regarded, certainly bear out the charge made by the pleader. In this report, Captain Doveton has said that these people had become”willing slaves”. Sir Chimanlal Setalvad asked him to interpret the term and he said,"It means, willing to work in the way you require.” This officer tried cases which were of a civil nature, and ordered punishment, and in this manner disposed of the case of the rental of a temple property. He also punished people who in his opinion were turbulent or defiant, and he said that he imposed ultra Martial Law punishments, because he did not consider that the Martial Law punishment was suited to those who were”merely truculent or openly defiant". Sahibzada Sultan Ahmed asked him whether, in doing so, he was not going beyond General Benyon’s instructions. Capt. Doveton thought that he had a full discretion to do so. He sent out parties of reprisals in respect of those whom he had called but who had not turned up. The reprisal consisted in burning the property of such people. He was asked whether he thought he was justified by any Martial Law order. His reply was, "Yes, I do." And thus several poor people had their belongings destroyed, without warrant.

Before the trials of the prisoners were commenced, gallows were erected in a public place, in anticipation of the Judges awarding the punishment of hanging. These gallows were erected as near to the scene of the mob outrage as possible. It was elicited in the course of examination that this was done by the orders of Sir M. O’Dwyer, but before the hanging order could be carried out, public hanging was vetoed, because, we fancy, of the agitation set up in the Indian Press against this contemplated outrage upon public decency. This hanging suggests a serious reflection. Eighteen persons were hanged as a result of the Martial Law trials throughout the province, and many more would have been hanged but for the strong agitation that was set up throughout India, and the timely, firm and philanthropic promptitude of the Hon’ble Pandit Motilal Nehru, who entered into cable communication with the Secretary of State and, pending proceedings in appeal, asked for the suspension of death sentences. Fortunately, the Secretary of State intervened and ordered the Viceroy to suspend these death sentences. We cannot help expressing our deep regret that the Viceroy should not have of his own accord suspended these death sentences. Our regret is all the more poignant from our knowledge of the looseness and disregard of ordinary procedure with which Martial Law trials were carried out. We much suspect that many of those who were hanged and over whose heads the death sentences are still hanging, were or are totally innocent.

In deliberate disregard of facts, and insolent adherence to that attitude, perhaps no officer has outdone Col. MacRace if he has been equalled by any of his brother officers who had charge of Martial

1 Bar-at-Law; Member for Appeals, Gwalior State; one of the three Indian members of the Hunter Committee Law administration. In his statement before the Hunter Committee, he said, "This city has for many years past been noted for sedition." He admitted that he had never known Kasur before. Sir Chimanlal therefore asked: "On what do you base that statement of yours?"

A. It is all hearsay.

Q. You had no personal knowledge?
A. No.

Q. Who told you that this place had for many years past been noted for sedition?
A. I don’t propose to answer that question.

Q. You make this statement in a responsible document to the authorities, and so I want to know what is the basis of this statement?
A. I leave it as I have put down.

Q. True, you may leave it as you have put down, but I want to know the reasons for your statement. I put this question, because, previous to this, officials have stated that in Kasur before the 10th April, there was no political activity and nothing done so far as politics were concerned. And therefore I am surprised to find in your statement that this city has for many years past been noted for sedition. Do you still adhere to that statement?
A. I won’t answer this question.

Q. Then you make the statement: "This city harbours pleaders who are well known to have anti-Government feeling." Is that also hearsay?
A. Yes.

Q. And stands on no other footing, as the other statement?
A. Yes.

Q. Are you aware, as Martial Law administrator, that several pleaders assisted the authorities, in the 12th and subsequent days, to maintain law and order, and that one of them was actually seen to mingle in saving Mr. Sherbourn?
A. Yes.

Q. Knowing that several pleaders assisted the authorities in the manner I have described, you still adhere to the statement that the pleaders are well known to have anti-Government feeling?
A. I adhere to the statement, and say it is hearsay.

Q. Do you adhere to it now?
A. I acknowledge your facts as correct.

Q. If they are correct, do you adhere to this sweeping statement or are you prepared to modify it?
A. I put it to you in turn: did all the pleaders try to stop the whole . . .?
Q. Well, I am not here to answer your question.
A. Well, I don’t want to answer yours.

Col. MacRae had also stated that the hundis of Kasur merchants who had not joined them in the hartal, were dishonoured by the Amritsar merchants. Col. MacRae replied that that was also hearsay, and “he had no evidence in support of it”. This officer had ordered that Martial Law notices should be posted on the houses of the well-known agitators. Sir Chimanlal asked what he meant by the word “agitators”. The answer was: “I think it is good English.”

Q.—But what do you mean by agitators?
A.—I don’t want to answer otherwise than I have said in my statement.

This unedifying dialogue went on for some time longer. We have reproduced these portions to show the manner in which this officer, at least, discharged the very responsible duties which he had to perform, and with reference to which he has been indemnified in advance by the Government.

This officer had issued orders that reprisals would be taken against the property of the persons on whose walls any proclamation had been defaced. He declined to answer the question whether the order was written or oral, by saying, “What does it matter whether it was written or oral?” It is difficult to say which is more offensive, whether the insolence of the answer or the brutality of the order. We use the term “brutality”, because the reprisals were to be taken (according to the answer given by the witness) “even though the notice may have been defaced by someone else”; and when he was asked whether he thought the order to be a reasonable order, he replied: “It was reasonable order, and I still think so.”

Q. As regards the whipping of schoolboys, you gave directions that the biggest six boys were to be selected for whipping?
A. Yes, generally speaking.
Q. Their misfortune was that they happened to be big?
A. Of course.
Q. Because they were big, therefore they had to suffer these lashes?
A. Yes.
Q. Do you think it was a reasonable thing to do?
A. I thought so under the circumstances, and I still think so.

We have selected only a few samples from the answers given by the two officers in question. In fact, their answers are a study in insolence and irresponsibility. We do not know that those who appointed these officers are not more to blame than the officers themselves. They perhaps knew not what they were doing. But those who selected them should have known that these officers were unfit for the post to which they were called. On the merits, we are of opinion that the introduction of Martial Law was, so far as local circumstances are concerned, totally unnecessary and the Act¹ was administered in an improper manner.

PATTI AND KHEMKARN

These are two small railway stations, a few miles from Kasur. At Khemkarn, the station property was looted and wires cut. As stated by Mr. Marsden, it was a small thing and done by “apparently the lower classes, shopkeepers, riff-raff labourers and people of that type”. And at Patti, as stated by Mr. Marsden, the chief inhabitants of the town gave assistance to the officials and the police, and all was quiet. Yet the effect of Martial Law was felt at these two villages also in full force.²

GUJRANWALA

Gujranwala district is in many respects one of the most important in the province and Gujranwala itself, though a small town continuing a population of 30,000, is the most notable for being the birth-place of Maharaja Ranjit Singhji. It is also an important railway station, only 42 miles from Lahore on the main line. The places in this district which have come under our notice, besides Gujranwala, are Wazirabad, Nizamabad, Akalgarh, Ramnagar, Hafizabad, Singla Hill, Moman, Dhaban Singh, Manianwala, Nawan Pind, Chuharkana, and Sheikhu-pura. Gujranwala was cut up into two districts on the first of November last, the portion cut out being known as the Sheikhupura district. For the purposes of this report, therefore, the original district will be considered as one whole, coming under the jurisdiction of the same officer.

It is common cause that there were no signs of unrest up to the 13th April last, or, more correctly speaking, up to the 14th. So much was this the case that Col. O’Brien³ was in the ordinary course

³ Deputy Commissioner of Gujranwala transferred, on the 12th, to Ambala, and was the recipient of an address from his friends and admirers at Gujranwala. In answer to a question by the Hunter Committee he said that had he or the authorities known that there was any trouble brewing, he would certainly not have been transferred, but would have remained at Gujranwala, as, indeed, he was brought to Gujranwala immediately there was trouble, i.e., on the 14th. On the 30th March, there was no stir at all in Gujranwala, and there was no hartal. On the 4th April, the matter of the hartal was informally discussed by the members of the District Congress Committee in connection with Mr. Gandhi’s message. A large public meeting was held on the 5th, at which 4 innocuous resolutions were passed dealing with the Rowlatt Act. The speeches made at this meeting were studiously moderate. Col. O’Brien was, however, anxious about this meeting. He sent for certain noted men of Gujranwala and warned them that if any disturbances took place they would be held responsible; and they asked the Deputy Commissioner, and the Superintendent of Police who was also present at the interview, to attend the meeting, if they chose to. The 6th of April opened with a complete hartal and people, young and old, joined in fasting and prayer. The various statements made before us go to show that the authorities tried their utmost to prevent the hartal, and even fasting, and great pressure was exercised on behalf of, or by the authorities to prevent the hartal.

Up to the 12th, as has already been remarked, everything was calm and quiet. But suddenly the news of the arrest and ex internment of Mr. Gandhi, as also the arrest and deportation of Drs. Satyapal and Kitchlew, found its way to Gujranwala; so also did the happenings of the 10th at Amritsar and Lahore. On this, the common people as well as the leaders, began to consider the advisability of another hartal, this time by way of protest against the said arrests and sympathy for those who had died or were wounded by the firing at Lahore or Amritsar. The leaders had an informal conference, and after much discussion, they seem to have come to the conclusion that, whilst they recognized that, at that time of tension, a hartal might be a dangerous thing, they would not be able to restrain the ardour of the people, and that therefore they should try, if there was a hartal, to keep the hartalists occupied, and engage their attention by arranging an open-air meeting. The authorities again tried, without success, to prevent a hartal, and the 14th of April saw another complete hartal.

The 13th of April and after, being the Baisakhi holidays, Gujranwala had attracted a large crowd of holiday-makers, who are at no time averse to having a drink, and were least so on this occasion. So, on the 14th, at Gujranwala, we find the elements that go to make a crowd unruly, viz., the holiday mood of ‘do as you please’, the drink, the resentment over the Government doings, the knowledge of mob excesses elsewhere, and idleness.

Early in the morning it was rumoured that a dead calf was hung up on one of the railway bridges near the station. There is no doubt that, whoever did it, it was a most imprudent act, calculated to rouse the worst passions of the Hindus. Various theories have been put before us—one is, that it was the work of the police, who did not like the union between Hindus and Mohammedans. It has been developed in the Gujranwala statements. The authorities have not been able to trace the mischief-makers. There can be little doubt that it was done by those who wanted to disunite the two sections. The effect, however, was quite the contrary. The people simply considered the hanging of a dead calf to have been instigated by the authorities, the more so because pork was found to have been thrown by someone on a mosque. And this belief knit the two closer together. A crowd, therefore, proceeded towards the station railway bridge. Meanwhile, a train going to Wazirabad from Lahore side, had arrived. A khansama on it gave the news of the massacre of the 13th. The train was packed with holiday-makers. Some of the crowd were evidently bent upon stopping the train from proceeding further. They seem to have thrown stones at the train. They then began to set fire to the Gurukul bridge. The attempt, however, was indifferently made. Whilst this was being done, the Governor of the Gurukul, Lala Rallya Ram, Mr. Labh Singh, Bar-at-law, Mr. Din Muhammad, pleader, and others, scenting the danger, proceeded to the scene of action. A European officer and a few constables were also seen approaching the bridge. The fire was put out by the Gurukul staff, assisted by the Indian gentlemen just mentioned. It is an extraordinary thing that the Superintendent of police said that “it was no business of the police to extinguish fire, but their duty was to protect public property.” (Statement 282).

The crowd then proceeded to the Kachi bridge, which lies on the other side of the station. Here the Superintendent of Police, Mr. Herron, was trying to disperse the crowd, and thought fit to fire, inflicting several casualties. Meanwhile, the leaders were trying to restrain the crowd and keep the people within the town limits. They had, therefore, organized a meeting which was proving quite successful, and might have proved entirely successful, but for an unfortunate occurrence. The men who were wounded were brought to the meeting, we presume, to excite its sympathy. The attempt entirely succeeded. The meeting broke up, and a crowd proceeded towards the station, bent upon seeking vengeance. Valuable properties, one after another, were destroyed, including the Church, the Post Office, the Tahsil, the Court House and the railway station. It seems that the police were mere onlookers, and made no attempt to check this incendiarism. In the statements before us, it has actually been suggested that the police even incited the mob to incendiarism, and the evidence contained in them certainly lends colour to the suggestion.

Col. O’Brien returned post-haste to Gujranwala. He seems to have telephoned to Lahore for a blank card. Examined by Sir Chimanlal Setalvad as to what powers he had, he said, “I had a conversation with the Chief Secretary on the telephone on the 15th, and said to him, I might probably have to take certain actions and I hope that they will be legalized afterwards, if done in good faith.” “But that was before the declaration of Martial Law?” asked Sir Chimanlal Setalvad. Col. O’Brien replied, “Yes.” Sir Chimanlal further asked, “You telephoned to him that you would have to take certain actions, and you wished that your actions should be legalized, if done in good faith, and he issued a blank cheque?” The answer was, “Yes. He said, ‘Use your common sense. It would be all right’.” If this be the genesis of the Indemnity Act, we have no hesitation in saying that it was discreditable. What action was taken by this officer “in good faith” will be seen presently.

We are satisfied that the destruction of the valuable property, including a place of devotion, was wanton and unjustified, and no firing on the part of the Superintendent of Police, or even the wicked hanging of a dead calf on the bridge, could possibly be held to justify incendiarism. The firing and, especially, the hanging of a dead calf constituted grave provocation, but they could not be pleaded in justification of excesses.

When Col. O’Brien returned, the mob’s fury had subsided. He had asked for assistance, and it came promptly at 3 o’clock in the shape of aeroplanes, which dropped bombs on utterly innocent people. At no place where bombs were dropped was any meeting going on. Bombs were dropped on the Khalsa Boarding House. This is how a student describes the scene:

We heard the noise of aeroplanes at about 3 p.m. . . . They remained hovering over the Boarding House for about 10 minutes . . . . Suddenly a noise was heard and a shell came down, which struck our confectioner Ganda Singh . . . . A small piece of it injured the finger of my right hand. A boy fell down on account of the shock. (Statement, 296, p. 408.)

The Superintendent of the Boarding House has also made a statement. He says:

No political meeting was ever held in our school, nor is it allowed. On the 14th April, none of the boarders went to the city. Our hostel and school are at a distance of about half a mile from the city and more than a mile from the station. (Statement 297, p. 409.)

According to the evidence given by Captain Carbery before Lord Hunter’s Committee, his orders were “to disperse crowds going or coming”. So far as the bomb-throwing on the Khalsa Boarding House is concerned, there was no crowd either going or coming, there was no meeting and it appears to us that there was no necessity whatsoever for throwing bombs on the Khalsa Boarding House, and it was by a stroke of good luck only that no lives were lost.

It is interesting to find, from the officers concerned, how they dropped bombs and fired machine-guns. People were bombed who were running back to their village when the firing was started. The following dialogue took place between the Hunter Committee and the officer.

Q. You first bombed, and they began to run away into the village?
A. Yes.

Q. That is over the houses in the village?
A. Yes. I suppose some of the shots hit the houses.

Q. The people were running away, they dispersed and got into some houses?
A. Yes.

1 Machine-guns were used or bombs dropped on Gharjak, Bhagwanpura, Dhulla and other neighbouring villages.
Q. You fired the machine-gun into the village; you may be thereby hitting not those people whom you dispersed, but other innocent people in their houses?
A. I could not discriminate between the innocent people and other people. I tried to shoot the people who ran away and who I thought were coming to do damage.

Q. The result of bombing was that they dispersed?
A. Yes.
Q. They ran into the village?
A. Yes.
Q. Was not your object accomplished? Where was the need of firing the machine-gun indiscriminately into the village?
A. The machine-gun was not fired indiscriminately. I shot at the men who were running away. I said the crowd scattered and ran back into the village and I fired at the men.

The officer says he was at a height of 200 feet. He could see “perfectly well”. To the question “What was the further need of machine-gunning them and killing them”, the prompt reply was, “To do more damage.”

Q. Your object seems to be to hit or kill more people of that crowd, although they had begun to disperse, and were running away after the bombs were thrown?
A. I was trying to do it in their own interest. I also realized that if I tried to kill people, they would not gather again and do damage.

“The idea being to have a sort of moral effect?” was the further question put by Sir Chimanlal. “Quite right,” was the quiet reply.

The officer then machine-gunned into another village. There he fired into a crowd of people who were returning to their village, having come from Gujranwala. The evidence before us shows that there was no crowd such as is described by the officer, but there were stray parties of people who were utterly innocent. It is an admitted fact that they were all totally unarmed. The reason for firing into the Indian quarters of Gujranwala was that the people should not be in the street. “150 rounds” were fired “into the native city” and the officer, in order to make certain that he was understood, said to Sir Chimanlal, “You must understand it was no good firing at the houses. I was firing at the natives, into the native city.”

In our opinion, all this firing from the aeroplanes was entirely unjustified. It was begun after the destruction by the mob was over, and the crowds had dispersed. There was, therefore, no question of preventing further damage. We believe, too, that the firing was thoughtless, if not vindictive, and the officers in charge of the machines, on their own showing, held the lives of the villagers cheap, and fired in order to terrorize the people. The casualties, according to the list supplied and embodied in the statements produced before us, amount to 12 killed and 24 wounded, and if the loss of life was not greater, it was no fault of the officers concerned. The bombs would not explode.

If there was no excuse for the bombing of the 14th, there was less to bring the aeroplane into play on the 15th, because Col. O’Brien had by that time more military aid than he needed, certainly all he had asked for.

Sir Michael O’Dwyer seems to have been the originator of the suggestion of bombing from aeroplanes. Whether he was or not, it is certain that he approved of it. It should be remembered that the people of the Punjab were not used to the aeroplane or any other bombing. It must be admitted that aeroplane bombing can be justified only in proved necessity, and in the face of existing or imminent danger. All danger had been over in Gujranwala when the aeroplanes arrived. The mere presence of the aeroplanes was absolutely sufficient protection. The European population of Gujranwala was in no danger. Not a single European life was lost. Nothing has been shown to prove a military necessity for bombing. The official evidence shows that bombing was recklessly practised upon an unresisting people, and at a time when there was no danger threatening life or property, and when the experience of Amritsar and Kasur had shown that the mob fury was a sudden and momentary outburst with no persistence about it. On the 15th began indiscriminate arrests of barristers, pleaders and other leaders, some of whom, the authorities knew, had helped, at considerable risk to themselves, to curb the fury of the mob. There was at the time of these arrests, on Col. O’Brien’s own showing, not a tittle of evidence to justify these arrests. They were made, as he says, in virtue of regulation 12 of the Defence of India Act regulations. This regulation simply authorizes arrests on suspicion well grounded. The only possible regulation which Col. O’Brien had in mind could be the following:

In exercise of the powers conferred by Rule 12 A.A. of the Defence of India Consolidation Rules, 1915, the Lieutenant-Governor is pleased to authorize all commissioners to arrest without warrant any person against whom reasonable suspicion exists that he is promoting or assisting to promote rebellion against the authority of the Government.

If this is the regulation he had in mind, he, being a Deputy Commissioner, had no power of arresting under it. Moreover, it was a stretching of interpretation to have arrested the people who had done no wrong to the knowledge of the Deputy Commissioner, as at least he then possessed. It was admitted in the evidence before the Hunter Committee, and it is amply proved before us, that these leaders were arrested there and then, some of them were not even permitted to put on their clothes or even their head-dress. They were handcuffed in pairs, and about 22 of them chained together were made to walk a distance of two miles through the city, headed by two municipal commissioners, one a Hindu and the other a Mohammedan, and carried to Lahore in an open truck without arrangements for food or other necessities of life. The prisoners included the Governor of the Gurukul, Mr. Rallya Ram, nearly 63 years of age. He says :

I was in a batch of 22 prisoners. All were chained together and handcuffed in pairs. We were, in this condition, marched through the public streets, and were made to run. We were taken to Lahore in an open truck. One of us was not even allowed facility for answering calls of nature. He was asked to perform it where he was seated, and when we reached Lahore, I was unable to get out of the prisoners’ van without the rest, who were chained with me, also coming down. I was, therefore, forcibly dragged down and much hurt owing to my suffering from lumbago. (Statement 282, p. 388)

Col. O’Brien was asked why he would not allow people time even to dress. His reply was that he was in a hurry to finish the arresting. It is pertinent, therefore, to enquire why he did not send these leaders in a van to the station. The irresistible inference is that he wanted to make a demonstration and terrorize the people. Col. O’Brien considered that the arresting “was the kindest thing to do”.

On the 16th, Martial Law was proclaimed, and, under it, the people of Gujranwala were subjected to humiliation, flogging and many indignities. In order to compel people to open their shops, the following remarkable order was passed :

NOTICE UNDER MARTIAL LAW RULE NO. 2

April 18, 1919

As we have come to know that some shopkeepers, who live within the municipal limits of Gujranwala, shut up their shops when the army and the police people go to them to purchase articles, or that they refuse to sell the articles to the army or the police soldiers for a reasonable price. Therefore, the undermentioned orders are issued that after the publication of this Notice, those shopkeepers who would be found acting as mentioned above, would be arrested and they would be liable to be punished by flogging.

(Sd. ) F. W. BERBERY,
LIEUTENANT-COLONEL,
OFFICER COMMANING, DISTRICT GUJRANWALA

The following Martial Law notice shows what was meant by the Saluting Order, so much discussed by the members of Lord

MARTIAL LAW NOTICE No. 7

We have come to know that Gujranwala district inhabitants do not usually show respect to the gazetted commissioners, European civil and military officers of His Imperial Majesty, by which the prestige and honour of the Government is not maintained. Therefore we order that the inhabitants of Gujranwala district should show proper respect to these respectable officers, whenever they have occasion to meet them, in the same way as big and rich people of India are respected.

Whenever anyone is on horseback or is driving any kind of wheeled conveyance, he must get down. One who has opened or got an umbrella in his hand, should close or lower it down, and all these persons should salute with their right hand respectfully.

(Sd. ) L. W. Y. CAMPBELL,
BRIG.-GENERAL,
OFFICER COMMANING, DISTRICT GUJRANWALA

Col. O’Brien sought to justify this order on the ground of Indian custom. Neither custom nor prudence can possibly be held to justify an order so manifestly humiliating and degrading. The evidence tendered before us goes to show that in its execution, soldiers had also to be saluted, and flogging was the punishment awarded for failing to salaam. If anybody did not salute them, he was struck on the back twice or thrice with a stick. Opposite the shop of Haveli Ram, a haldi seller, a person who was a stranger and was buying haldi, was struck for this very reason that he did not get up and salute the soldiers. He had not seen the soldiers as he was with his back to the street. (Statement 305; also Statement 290, 293, 298, 300 and 301.) Students had to attend daily to salute the Union Jack.

1 Yellow turmeric
Men of status were made to clean the drains in the bazaar, although in some cases the municipal sweeper had already cleaned them. (Statement 304.)

People were forbidden to carry sticks. Railway travelling was stopped for some time, and the curfew order was issued, thus reducing the people to a state of helplessness.

Then followed the prosecutions before the Martial Law Tribunals and the Summary Courts, and about these the same remarks are applicable as have been made about the Amritsar trials. There is abundant evidence to show that the evidence had been manufactured. The theory of rebellion practically broke down before Lord Hunter’s Committee. The only ground Col. O’Brien had to give was that rebellion was “judicially proved”. Almost every public leader was arrested. The treatment meted out to Diwan Mangal Sen and his family, the vindictive evacuation of Lala Amar Nath’s house, the arrest and detention of people who were never tried, constitute a story of deliberate cruelty which was a disgrace to British Administration.

WAZIRABAD

Wazirabad is the next important railway station, 20 miles from Gujranwala on the main line. It is also a junction station. It is a small place, with a population of about 10,000. Just after the Baisakhi fair, every year, large gatherings of people from surrounding villages and districts take place in Wazirabad. There was no hartal on the 30th March, or the 6th April last, but the crowds that gathered from the villages brought also the news of the happenings at Lahore, Amritsar and Gujranwala. The people who had come from the villages, twitted the Wazirabads for not observing hartal, and said that “since the people of Wazirabad did not observe hartal, nobody would take their girls in marriage”. (Statement 312, p. 434.) There was a meeting on the 14th, at the mosque, to consider the desirability of having the hartal. On the 15th, the hartal came off, but there were mischief-makers, who were not satisfied with the mere stoppage of business. The events, of which they had heard in an exaggerated form, rankled in their bosoms, and they proceeded to cut telegraph wires and damage the railway line. Some of these then proceeded to Rev. Mr. Bailey’s house. They were joined by others on the way. The mob wantonly burnt the Rev. Mr. Bailey’s house, including his valuable literary treasures. The police appeared to have been present at the scene, but they made no attempt to check this most unjustifiable incendiarism. Fortunately, no lives were lost. Not a single person of note seems to have taken part in this destruction. Some of the notables of Wazirabad appeared to have attempted to check the mob excesses, with more or less success. The Rev. Mr. Bailey’s house stands on an isolated piece of ground, about two miles from Wazirabad and a mile from Nizamabad. So much for the mob action, for which there is no justification. The destruction of an innocent and popular missionary’s house makes the action all the more regrettable and reprehensible. We have not been able to find out any particular motive for this action, save that the mob had yielded to an anti-European fury.

Col. O’Brien, accompanied by the police and the military, reached Wazirabad on the 16th. Arrests took place immediately, and the whole of the demonstration, like that of Gujranwala, took place in Wazirabad also.

On the 18th, a durbar was held, at which Col. O’Brien is reported to have said:

Listen, you foolish and mad people, you had thought that the British Government had ceased. Now your madness will be cured. We have got a prescription for your madness. Be it known to you all that the Government has authority to confiscate the property of any person, to raze to the ground his house, nay, if it likes, it can set fire to it. Accordingly, first of all, I do hereby order that the whole property of Jamiat Singh Bagga be confiscated to the Government. (Statement 313, p. 142)

Martial Law was proclaimed the following day. This is how its administration is described by Dr. Daulat Singh, late secretary of the local Arya Samaj:

Martial Law notices were posted at different places and on some buildings. These were affixed to the places and houses with which the arrested persons had connection. A set of Martial Law notices was also posted at the Arya Samaj Mandir, although the Arya Samaj had nothing to do with any of the events. I, who was against the hartal and took no part whatsoever in the movement, was to be held responsible for the safe custody of the Martial Law notices, as I happened to be the secretary of the Arya Samaj. Two persons had to be specially engaged to keep watch, and I had to go personally several times to see the notices, that no mischief-monger might tear them away or damage them. Martial Law authorities were very particular that the notices were not injured or interfered with. (Statement 308, p. 422)

It was a breach of Martial Law regulations to remove or deface such notices, and occupiers of premises to which the notices were affixed were held responsible. Dr. Daulat Singh was arrested, and the registers of the Arya Samaj were attached and removed. He was detained for 10 days, asked to give evidence against certain persons, and then discharged about the 30th May. He was arrested again on the 7th June. He describes how evidence was manufactured against him, how he was given no time even to engage a pleader, how on the flimsiest evidence he was convicted and how Col. O’Brien said: “As Swami Shraddhanand is taking part in the agitation, you must be taking part also.” (Statement 308, p. 426.)

It is further stated that if any person did not salaam a European by mistake or oversight, he had his turban taken off his head and tied round his neck. He was dragged to the camp by the military. There he was either fined or flogged. (Statements 308 and 313.) One witness states that although he had salaamed, but because his salaam was not noticed, he was made to kiss the shoes of the officer in question. (Statement 319.) This evidence is abundantly corroborated by many witnesses.

Butter was regularly collected for the troops without any payment. When the collection of butter was stopped, one rupee per house was “realized for the expenses of the military”. (Statement 314.) Only widows were exempted. The witness adds that when the money thus collected was exhausted, more was collected. The same witness says that, in addition, 67,000 rupees were collected as indemnity from Wazirabad. He was himself a municipal commissioner, and he had to do his share of collecting in his own ward.

He himself was arrested on the 7th June, and was given only one hour to produce his defence witnesses. Those who had arms were authorized to fire without hesitation on any mob, if they exceeded the limits of the law. (Statement 309.)

The evidence before us further shows that bribes were freely given to and accepted by the police from persons who wanted to avoid arrest or to get out of having to give false evidence.

A number of charpais (cots) were taken away from the people for the use of the military. They have neither been paid for, nor
As in Gujranwala, the curfew order was imposed in Wazirabad also, and schoolchildren were compelled to attend roll call and salute the Union Jack thrice a day. “They were put to great trouble, specially by walking a long distance in the noonday sun.” (Statement 311, p. 434.)

Reference has already been made to the confiscation of Sardar Jamiat Singh’s property. It is interesting to know exactly what this means. His son, in his statement says:

When the Deputy Commissioner and other officers reached near our shop, I came to know that warrants had been issued against my father also. The police searched our residential house and sitting-room, and scolded the ladies in the house in my presence. They then asked where Jamiat Singh had gone, or where they had concealed him. (Statement 311, p. 431.)

Although the son had definitely told the police that his father had gone to Jammu, he was constantly worried. On the 21st April, the confiscation order was pronounced. Four ladies and six minor children were summarily turned out of the house.

The ladies had only those few clothes on which respectable purdanashin women generally wear within the four walls of their houses, and the children were even more scantily dressed, and, in fact, some of the children had been playing in the yard without any clothes. They did not allow the ladies to put on their shoes even, and the children who were naked were turned out as they were. The family of a man who was worth lakhs and who had donated thousands of rupees to schools, colleges, dharmsalas and other charitable institutions, and who had helped hundreds of people in the city in time of need, was that day without a house and without the necessaries of daily life. (Statement 311, p. 432.)

Only those who know what purdanashin ladies wear whilst in their houses and what they wear when they go out, can appreciate the enormity of the outrage done to the ladies in thus turning them out, and Sardar Jamiat Singh is the premier citizen of Wazirabad, a leader among the Sikhs, who had done valuable work during the War and was the recipient of a sanad from the Commander-in-Chief. Sardar Jamiat Singh surrendered himself as soon as he returned, i.e., on the 26th April, but the confiscation orders were not withdrawn till the 4th of May. We have gone through the record, such as it is, of his case, and a variety of papers submitted to us, and we have no doubt that the conviction against him was wholly wrong. The charge-sheet was not shown to him in the first instance. His counsel could not get a certified copy of it, nor were all the defence witnesses called. Sardar Jamiat Singh is 62 years old. He has a cataract in one of his eyes. He was treated as a common felon, and for some time was locked up in a solitary cell.

The trials of persons arrested here seem to have been more farcical than elsewhere. Here is a graphic description as to how evidence was manufactured.

All the citizens were sent for by beat of drum to the police station. Minors and badmashes (entered in the register) were considered as informers. Anybody, against whom the police wanted to get up a case, was brought before the boys who were tutored to give evidence, and thus the poor men were entangled. The same boys appeared before the Commission as witnesses; and it was on their evidence alone that the people were punished. (Statement 313, p. 444.)

NIZAMABAD

Nizamabad is a small village hardly a mile from Wazirabad, and consists of one narrow lane full of houses and workshops combined. It is a noted place for handmade cutlery prepared by hereditary artisans with the crudest tools. There is no doubt that some of the men, as has been already stated, joined the crowd that burnt Mr. Bailey’s house, but the punishment meted out to the poor villagers was out of all proportion to the crime of a few of them. On the 18th of April, a special British troop train came from Lahore side and stopped before the village, which is situated near the railway. The soldiers surrounded the village. They looted the shops, took out flour, ghee, molasses and made the villagers carry these things to the train. For nearly a fortnight the people were made to attend the police station and had to sit in the sun from 7 in the morning till 8 in the evening. The people had to close their workshops. (Statement 329.)

A lad named Muhammad Ramzan had unwittingly crossed the soldiers’ cordon. He was grazing his goats. He was shot and he died on the spot. “Two or three British soldiers tied the dead body with his turban, dragged it and left it by the pond near the village.” (Statement 330.)

Mir Wajid Ali, a Mughul, describes in a long statement how attempts were made to extort evidence, how people were made to attend the police station from day to day and wait there in the hot sun, and he winds up his statement:

My son and I were searched and put in the lock-up. On the 9th of June, my son Islam Beg and myself were brought before the Deputy Commissioner, Col. O'Brien, at about 6 p.m. with 5 or 6 other persons of Wazirabad. We were all released by the Deputy Commissioner after undergoing the punishment of rubbing our noses on the ground. (Statement 327, p. 454.)

Thus, when there was no evidence at all on which to convict, a degrading form of punishment had to be invented in order to insult apparently innocent men. 6,500 rupees were exacted from these villagers as indemnity. (Statement 327.)

Witnesses 324, 325, 326 and 334 have given evidence showing how attempts were made by the police by threats and actual corporal punishment to extort evidence.

AKALGARH

Akalgarh is a railway station beyond Wazirabad on the Wazirabad-Lyallpur branch. It has a population of about 4,000, and is noted chiefly for its being the residence of the celebrated Diwan Sawan Mal and his son, Mul Raj, Governors of Multan in the later days of the Sikh rule.

In Akalgarh itself, there was no disturbance of any kind whatsoever during the month of April last. There was the hartal on the 6th and a public meeting, at which Diwan Gopal Lal, one of the descendants of Diwan Sawan Mal, presided. On the 14th April, there was another hartal over the arrests and the events at Amritsar and Lahore. Telegraph wires were, however, cut on the 15th, when there was no hartal at Akalgarh. These wires were cut at a distance of about a mile, whether from Akalgarh or from the railway station. It was not the work of a crowd, nor, so far as we can see, of anybody from Akalgarh. The theory suggested to us was that the wire-cutting was done by those who were coming back from the Wazirabad Baisakhi fair, Akalgarh being 23 miles from Wazirabad.

On the 22nd of April, however, the Deputy Commissioner came, stopped at the canal bridge and sent for the gentry of the town. He required them to repair the road leading to the dak bungalow, and ordered that it must be repaired quickly by the town people in such a manner that his motor could have an easy passage. Nearly Rs. 2,000, therefore, were collected from the people, and the road extending over a mile was compulsorily fitted for the passage of the Deputy Commissioner’s motor. The whole of the amount was raised in a single day from the small town. Not only, therefore, was the levy illegal and objectionable on principle, but it was also unconscionably heavy for a place so poor as Akalgarh.

Then followed, as at Gujranwala and Wazirabad, the arrests of the leading people. A batch of 30 accused was tried, 20 of whom were acquitted, 2 lads of 15 years of age were sentenced to simple imprisonment for one day, 6 were convicted and the case against 2 was withdrawn.

The intimidation of witnesses, the corruption that went on during nearly two months and the terrorism that reigned at Akalgarh are all set forth in the statements furnished to us, with a wealth of detail enough to carry conviction. We propose to sample out a few of these disgraceful incidents.

Nanak Chand was called to the police station and asked to give false evidence. On his refusal “he was made to stand in the sun for half an hour”. He was abused. He was told that he would be shot if he did not give evidence. Thereupon, he gave a statement to dictation, but he says that he gave the true evidence before the Court. He adds that he saw other people being treated likewise. People were forced to assemble at the dak bungalow. He was obliged to supply the military officers milk free of charge. (Statements 343 to 345.)

Diwan Gopal Lal referred to above was arrested on the 22nd April. He was detained in jail for two months and was ultimately let off for want of evidence. He says:

I was arrested because I refused to pay money which the Revenue Assistant and M. Sahib Khan demanded from me as a bribe through the Zaildar and Chaudhri Ghulam Kadir and Sirdar Khan. While I was in jail, they received from my relatives, as a bribe, a sum of Rs. 5,000 for me, and Rs. 1,000 for my brother-in-law. (Statement 340 p. 468.)

Ram Lal, a student aged 15 years, was arrested on the 23rd April, and discharged on the 13th May. (Statement 342.)

Lala Ganesh Das Pasi and his two brothers were arrested. He states how a bribe of Rs. 2,000 was paid; how he was still detained, how they were finally discharged, how on the 23rd of May his property was confiscated on the plea that he was an absconder. He says that his property was not restored to him, in spite of his acquittal, up to the 19th of July 1919. (Statement 346.)

Chaudhri Fazal Dad was a Lambardar and Vice-President of the Municipality of Akalgarh. His crime was that he had appeared as a defence witness, on which account, he says, he was arrested, tried and fined Rs. 500. On May 26th, he was, without any reason, as he says, dismissed from lambardarship by Colonel O’Brien. He states that the road repairs, referred to above, were done during his lambardarship. He states that “the people who were not of the labouring class were forced by the Revenue Officer and the Zaildar to work without any payment”. Out of the Rs. 1,800 collected by force, “only Rs. 700 or Rs. 800 were given to the contractor”. He adds:

All the people of the town were collected at dak bungalow, and some machine-guns and some big guns were fired from the railway line. The people were plainly told that they should not appear as witnesses for the defence, and ought to appear for the prosecution, as desired by the Sub-Inspector of Police. (Statement 336.)

Rs. 1,000 were also collected from the people as the expenses of the machine-gun firing already referred to, and a small sum for repairing the telegraph wire. (Statement 340 A.)

RAMNAGAR

Ramnagar is no bigger than Akalgarh. It is situated about 5 miles from Akalgarh on the bank of the Chenab. It is not on the railway line. The late Maharaja Ranjit Singh had a palace there called Baradari.

There was a hartal on the 6th April, and a partial hartal on the 15th April. No damage is reported to have been done at Ramnagar, but it is alleged that an effigy of His Majesty was burnt on the 15th April, and the ashes thrown into the river. We have enquired into this allegation with the closest attention. Several hundred witnesses were examined by us. And though the evidence thus collected was convincing and conclusive to repudiate the charge, it was decided to invite the public in the openest manner to give us any information to the contrary that they might possess. A public meeting was, therefore, held on the 30th November, 1919, in the open at Ramnagar, at which those who believed that the King’s effigy had been burnt or had information on it, were invited to make either a public or a private statement, but not a single witness came forward to state that there ever was any such insult offered to His Majesty. We are satisfied that it was entirely a manufactured charge. The statements, collected by us, will show that up to the 23rd April no mention was ever made of this matter by any of the police officers. Col. O’Brien has stated in his judgment, which we have carefully examined, that the delay in mentioning the incident was due to preoccupation on the part of the police. This is wholly unacceptable, for, there should have been a mention of the incident at least in the police diary. On the 17th April, the Inspector of Police, although he went round the whole of Ramnagar, made no mention of it. The alleged leader in the affair, although he was available, was not arrested before the 9th of May.

Yet the people of Ramnagar were, all the same, not only made to labour under a calumny, but the best of them were made to suffer heavily through a prosecution wantonly undertaken, supported by manufactured evidence led in a trial in which the canons guiding ordinary trials were set aside.

Lala Karam Chand, 60 years old, by temperament a religious man, living practically in retirement, was himself a victim. He was prosecuted along with 27 others and sentenced. He was in Government employ from 1877 to 1900 in the Postal and the Railway Departments. After 1910 “he practically renounced worldly affairs”. He passed 9 months out of the year at Hardwar. He denies that “there was any funeral procession arranged for, or any effigy burnt”. He admits that a few boys passed through the bazaar on the 15th April and shouted “Hai Hai Rowlatt Bill” (Alas! the Rowlatt Bill). He says that on the 17th April a Sub-Inspector went to Ramnagar and recorded that there was hartal but nothing else. And it was on the 23rd April that the Revenue Officer went to Ramnagar and after consultation with the Zaildar, sent him and others to Akalgarh on the pretext of an enquiry. On the 24th, they were handcuffed and sent to Gujranwala and remained in jail up to the 16th May. Till then they did not know for what purpose they had been arrested. They were brought back to Ramnagar on the 17th May. On the 19th, they were required to give the names of their witnesses and they were tried on the 22nd, with the result we have already mentioned. (Statement 422.)

Lala Sundar Das states that even the despatch of telegrams by the people of Ramnagar in connection with the arrests was resented. He and others were produced, on the 11th June, before the Deputy Commissioner at Gujranwala, and, before they were discharged, they were ordered by Colonel O’Brien “to draw lines on the ground with their noses and express repentance”. (Statement 419.)

Lala Hans Raj says that Abdulla, Lambardar of Ramnagar, went to him on the 8th May, and told him that if he did not pay Rs. 200, he would be arrested the next morning. The witness protested. He says:
The next morning, I found the brother of Abdulla, Lambardar, and another person belonging to a criminal tribe, sitting at my door with lathis (sticks) in their hands. No sooner had I opened the door than I was suddenly seized by them and dragged to the bazaar.

The witness still refused to pay the money. He was then forcibly taken to the police station. He then describes how evidence was manufactured against him and others, after he himself had been given the option of becoming a Crown witness. The witness was at Wazirabad on the 15th April and reached Akalgarh at about 5.15 p.m. It was, therefore, physically impossible for him to have taken part in any procession or demonstration at Ramnagar, at the time when the effigy is stated to have been burnt. (Statement 417, p. 357.)

Lala Gobind Sahai and others were arrested for having dared to go to the Deputy Commissioner in connection with this case, and were released on the 11th June, after undergoing the same performance as Lala Sundar Das. (Statements 423 and 424.)

Lala Ram Chand describes how at first the prosecution story, that an effigy was carried in a funeral procession and burnt with several maunds of wood, had been changed into the burning of a cloth doll. (Statement 425.)

Sayed Hakim Shah, a retired station-master, sets forth how the prosecution story shifted, how he himself happened to go to the riverside on the very evening and saw nothing burning, how on the 22nd May he was asked to give evidence for the prosecution and how he refused and was badly treated for his refusal. He has a record of 37 years’ service in the Railway Department. (Statement 432.)

Bhagwan Das was approver in the effigy case. He has now made a long statement repudiating the evidence which he gave for the prosecution, setting forth the circumstances under which he did so. (Statement 443.)

We feel that Akalgarh and Ramnagar were made to suffer humiliation, loss of liberty, loss of money and terrible anxiety, simply because Col. O’Brien was bent on teaching a severe lesson to people, those who had for the first time in their lives begun to realize national consciousness and to interest themselves in public affairs. The tyranny was aggravated by reason of the presence of an utterly unscrupulous local official, Malik Sahib Khan, whose name figures prominently in the statements collected by us regarding these villages.
HAFIZABAD

Hafizabad is 15 miles from Akalgarh on the Wazirabad-Lyallpur railway line, and is a fairly large trade centre. It has a population of more than 5,000 souls.

The hartal spirit, as a protest against the authorities’ action at Lahore and Amritsar on the 10th, was travelling along the whole railway line and had reached Hafizabad also. And there was a complete hartal on the 14th April. A crowd, principally of drunken idlers, had gone to the station. Near the level crossing about 300 yards from the station, this crowd stopped the train and, in a wanton manner, attacked Lieutenant Tatam, who was in a first-class compartment with his little boy. They broke the window panes of the carriage. Meanwhile, others in the crowd resented this barbarous behaviour and protected Lieutenant Tatam at some peril to their own lives. At the request of Lieutenant Tatam, the driver hurried away the train, which safely reached Wazirabad. On the 15th, a drunkard, called Top, led a crowd of about a hundred and broke the wires and damaged a points-man’s hut. Top was taken in custody, the crowd followed him to the Tahsil and broke the Tahsil windows by throwing stones. A shot fired into the air dispersed this crowd.

Colonel O’Brien went to Hafizabad on the 22nd April. Then followed a repetition of what has been described about Akalgarh and other places, resulting in the terrorizing of a whole population. 1

Bihari Lal Kapur was arrested, together with his servant boy, for reasons mentioned in his statement, and in connection with the attack on the train. He says two boys and a Government servant were produced as witnesses against them, but they were acquitted after having been kept in custody for one month and nine days. (Statement 396.)

Harnam Singh had to submit to extortion to the tune of two hundred rupees, in order to save his son, but it proved of no avail. The son was arrested, tried and imprisoned. (Statement 397.)

Hukam Devi states that her son had to go to jail, because she was unable to find money to bribe the police. (Statement 398.)

Ruldu Ram, a pleader’s clerk, describes the way in which private feuds were taken advantage of for the purpose of damaging the leaders, even those who had done valuable work during the War.

1 It was reported that Gujranwala police proceeded to Hafizabad with warrant for the arrest of 121 persons, containing neither names nor descriptions of the persons to be arrested, and the police did arrest 121 residents of Hafizabad under the warrant.
He describes also the way in which the police concocted evidence. (Statement 401.)

Sardar Diwan Singh, Sub-Editor, says:

First of all, 6 men, all of whom were respectable people, were arrested and handcuffed. They were not told the charges against them, nor were they given any other information. After the lapse of a month and a half, charges were framed against them. In order to get up false prosecution witnesses, the people were subjected to corporal punishment; filthy and abusive language was used against them in the bazaar. They were severely treated and the police subjected respectable men to all sorts of hardships and indignities. . . . Telegrams were sent to His Excellency the Viceroy and the Lieutenant-Governor, Punjab, about false prosecution witnesses. But no attention was paid nor any enquiry held. . . . When it became known to the Colonel that such telegrams were being sent, they were censored and refused. The Summary Court Martial disposed of all the Hafizabad cases in the course of one single day. . . . The accused in the Hafizabad cases included big landowners, raises, bankers, lawyers and other respectable people, and were marched through the streets and were deliberately humiliated. (Statement 388, p. 517.)

Lala Rup Chand Chopra gives a graphic account of the energetic measures taken by Colonel O’Brien regarding the recruiting, and then regarding the prosecutions under Martial Law. Not finding things to his satisfaction, i. e., many people not having been arrested up to the 30th April, Colonel O’Brien is said to have removed some of the old officials and put in men of his own choice. On the evening of the 30th April, a proclamation by beat of drum was issued to the effect that every turban-wearer was to present himself the next morning in front of the Tahsil, and if anybody absented, he would be shot. He adds that during the new regime, people were made to sit all day long in the open, and the process was repeated from day to day. (Statement 390.)

The same order as at other places was issued regarding school-children. Some British soldiers helped themselves to various articles from shopkeepers, without making any payment. The witness went with Mr. Andrews to the Inspector’s house on the 20th October, and a case of extortion was brought to his notice on the part of the punitive police, with the result that two constables had to be dismissed and a havildar degraded. Mr. Chopra concludes his statement by saying that he is an Oxford man, has resided in England for 13 years, belonged to the Indian Ambulance Corps raised in London, and that he has never taken part in politics, but that he comes forward with his evidence for the sake of seeking redress for the wrongs done to the people. (Statement 390.)

Lala Beli Ram Kapur was arrested and locked up with 23 others in a room measuring 12 by 15, the same room having to be used by all of them for natural purposes also. They were kept as under-trial prisoners up to the 6th of June. (Statement 405, p. 540.)

Sardar Mewa Singh, a retired head clerk in the Forest Department, describes the cruelty of the recruiting methods. He describes his own arrest as follows:

On the 21st of April, I was arrested without a warrant. On the 22nd, warrants were drawn and the signature of the District Magistrate obtained. I was placed for two days in the Hafizabad lock-up, which was very dirty. 23 men were packed up there in a single room. It could hardly accommodate four persons. We were put to fearful discomforts, not being allowed even to ease ourselves, when we felt the necessity. Two of us were taken out at a time in handcuffs. At times we had to pass stools in the lock-up. On the 23rd of April, 1919, we were removed to the Gujranwala District Jail. All the 23 persons were bound by the same chain. Handcuffs were put on the hands of everybody. We were taken there under strict surveillance and a guard of armed military police. We were not allowed to answer a call of nature, or to drink water on the way. The treatment accorded to us by the menial staff was intolerable. On the 23rd of May, 1919, we were again taken back to Hafizabad for identification. I cannot express the horrible treatment that was meted out to us by the police on our way to Hafizabad. Some seven or eight men were allowed their own food by the Superintendent, Jail, Gujranwala. When we were taken out from the Gujranwala Jail in handcuffs, the Jailor asked the Sub-Inspector of Police to allow us to take our meals which were ready, but the latter refused to allow us to do so. We had thus to fast for the whole day. We were brought down to Lahore on the 29th May. The papers were shown to the Public Prosecutor, who sent this case back, considering our offence to be slight. On the evening of 4th June, Mr. Wace called on us to put in a list of defence witnesses. In spite of our repeated requests we were not informed of the charges against us, nor were we given the names of the prosecution witnesses. The date for the hearing was fixed for 7th June, which left us a very short time to prepare our defence. We could not inform our relatives, nor engage the services of lawyers. One of my defence witnesses, Dr. Umrek Singh, Assistant Surgeon, was at Simla. He was not called. In cross-examination, Dr. Daulat Ram admitted that he was on bad terms with me. Other prosecution witnesses appeared out of fear of the police.
My defence witnesses, who are all respectable gentlemen, had deposed that I had been confined to bed on account of some trouble in the eyes, and could not have left my house. I am more than 60 years of age. I have never taken any part in any political meetings. Mr. Wace, after consultation with Colonel O’Brien, the Deputy Commissioner, fined me Rs. 500. My petition for mercy still remains undealt with. This is all due to the mischief of the police who had won over a few badmashes (hooligans) to support them. Thus all the occurrences took place on the same day, at the very place. The disturbances continued for two days, the 14th and the 15th. On the former, the police did not try at all to check the activities of the people, rather, they abetted them. On the latter day, the disturbances were quelled by simply firing a few blank cartridges and without the help of any additional police or military from outside. Had the police done their duty on the first day, these things would never have happened at all. The damage done to the buildings at Hafizabad might have amounted to a few rupees. Rs. 6,000 have been collected from the inhabitants in the form of a fine. The people have to bear the expenses of the punitive police, and this is a source of great trouble to the poor subjects of His Majesty. (Statement 389.)

Lala Ram Sahai, Head Master, Anglo-Sanskrit School, was also among those who were arrested. In his absence, his house was searched. The search continued up to 11 at night. He was taken to the Gujranwala jail and brought back to Hafizabad after a fortnight. He says:

Here pressure was brought to bear upon me to become a prosecution witness. The Inspector of Police used no physical force, but he employed moral pressure of every kind. He first praised me as an educated man and then alarmed me that I might be hanged and all my property confiscated, or that I might be transported for life. First, I told him that I did not like to play the traitor, and he advanced try [sic] arguments as to how it was no treason to tell the truth. I then consulted my father and the religious instructor of the school and decided that I must tell the truth and nothing but the truth. On my saying so to the Inspector, he told me that he wanted truth only. But when I made my statement, he suggested that I should not say that I was ready to speak at the peaceful meeting of the 6th April. He also suggested that if I was questioned as to whether the leaders took part in violence or not, I should answer that I was not expected to know it, for I was not present on the occasion. I, of course, fully believed and believe even now, that the leaders among the accused, such as Gurdial Singh and Lala Ram Sahai, did no violence. But I suppressed this from my statement, being influenced by the atmosphere that had been created around me. After I had given my statement, I was told that there was no evidence against me, and that I would be released and made to appear as a prosecution witness. I, of course, was prepared to tell the truth and did tell it, except that I did not mention that the accused did no violence. No question was put to me about violence in the Court.

On 21st May, 1919, we were again brought back to Hafizabad. Prostitutes and other low people came to identify us. This time, as the number was very large, and as there was not sufficient room in the prisons, we were kept outside in a big office room. We were handcuffed day and night, and had to answer calls of nature in batches in full view of each other’s nakedness. We were handcuffed two by two, and answered the call of nature in the same position. We slept at night in the open, with handcuffs on.

On the 23rd of April, 1919, I was presented before Colonel O’Brien, who ordered me to furnish a security of Rs. 1,000, which I did and was thereupon released. After 4 days, the Deputy Commissioner sent for me again, and I was told outside his bungalow that I was under no restrictions any more. Colonel O’Brien then came out and said, “Toba Karo” (cry penitence). I expressed, in word and action, my repentance, though I knew that I was innocent. He then said that I must “clear myself”, by which he meant that I must appear as a prosecution witness.

As written above, I appeared as a prosecution witness afterwards, according to my promise. The Deputy Superintendent of Police told me afterwards that he would have arrested me again if I had not appeared as a prosecution witness. Martial Law was not yet over.

I again want to emphasize the fact that I fully believe that the leaders took no part in the violence done at the station or in the Tahsil. (Statement 413.)

We quote at length from this statement, in order to show what subtle pressure was brought to bear on a cultured man to make him give false evidence, and how even Colonel O’Brien let himself to the coaxing process, not excluding threats. The indignities and the indecency, as described by the witness, during the confinement, mostly wrongful, to which cultured or well-brought-up men had been subjected, betray the degradation to which the officials had sunk in their desire to suppress agitation.

SANGLA HILL

Sangla Hill is a comparatively modern place. It is a railway station, 62 miles from Lahore, situated on the Lahore-Lyallpur branch. It has a population of about 4,000 people. It was on the 12th April that a hartal was observed owing to Mr. Gandhi’s arrest.
According to Mr. Bosworth Smith,

The effect of the meeting in connection with the hartal was not at once evident. On the 13th, the Baisakhi fair passed off fairly quietly. . . . On the 15th, telegraph wires were cut between Sangla and Salanwala. On the 16th, a Sikh with some other Sikhs, assisted by a large mob from the town, forcibly released a military prisoner at Sangla station. He was an Indian prisoner. On the evening of that day (15th), some men made a murderous attack on Mr. Wells, a telegraph inspector.

This account is altogether exaggerated. The testimony produced before us shows clearly that the Sikh who forcibly released a military prisoner had run amok, and there was no crowd behind him. It was an individual affair. There was no murderous attack on Mr. Wells on the 15th or any other day, and he was not seriously injured. It is perfectly clear from the evidence in our possession that the people of Sangla were in no way implicated in any attack on anybody, or in any damage to property. But Martial Law was, all the same, proclaimed on the 19th April. The Deputy Commissioner visited Sangla and did nothing at the time, except to warn the people against repeating the hartal. On the 22nd, however, an officer with British soldiers arrived, arrested 11 leaders and after a few hours’ detention released them. Arrests, however, were commenced on the 26th April. The arrested people were released on the 29th. But on the 12th May, a military demonstration was held and shots were fired from the hill, evidently with a view to overawe the people. Captain Ewing of the mobile column stated before Lord Hunter’s Committee that they had “a demonstration with a machine-gun and Lewis gun firing before a large number of people”. On the same day, 13 leaders were again arrested, handcuffed and marched under humiliating circumstances. On the 13th May, 64 further arrests were made. They were bound with their own turbans, a most disgraceful procedure, and marched off to the police station. A roll-call of inhabitants was taken daily for some days. On the 14th, 47 other arrests were made, and on the 18th, Mr. Bosworth Smith told the people under arrest that if they paid a fine of Rs. 50,000, they would all be released. Mr. Bosworth Smith admits that he wanted to levy a fine of Rs. 50,000 on the Sangla people, but denies that he made it a condition of release. All the same, the fact stands that, on the 19th May, 116 persons out of 124, all told, were released, the contention on the part of the people being that some people, apart from those who were arrested, agreed to the fine of Rs. 50,000. The eight persons not released were tried on the 1st of June, convicted and sentenced to 6 months’ imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 100 each, on evidence which was totally insufficient to sustain the conviction.

People were flogged upon pretexts the most trivial, admittedly without any previous medical examination, as a rule. Provisions were carried away from shopkeepers without payment. Respectable people were called upon to pull pankhas (fans) for the officers and to stand in the sunshine from time to time. School-boys, including little children, were compelled to attend roll-call from day to day, and made to stand in the hot sun and say, “Sir, we have done nothing wrong, and we will do nothing wrong in future.” This was so strict that Mr. Balmokand could not get an exemption for his nephew, 7 years old. He tried his “best to get the boy exempted from roll-call, but to no use”. The boy, therefore, attended regularly for 3 days. On the 5th day, on his return, he was perspiring. “He fell down and began vomiting. Doctor Gian Chand of Sangla was called, but in vain. Then an army I.M.S., who was there, was called, but he too could not help. The boy died on the 7th May.” The roll-call was compulsory for 4 times every day. (Statement 358.)

Basant Ram was arrested along with 25 others on the 19th May. He and the others were released on the 22nd May, without any statements having been taken from them. He says:

During the period of arrest, the police did not permit us even to answer calls of nature, unless we paid something. We paid Rs. 2 daily for this very purpose.

On the 23rd May, he was again summoned and was told by the Thanedar (Sub-Inspector) that if he still refused to give evidence, he would be taught a lesson then and there. He further says:

He began to beat me very severely in the bazaar, and dragged me through the bazaar to the police station. (Statements 366 and 368.)

Sohan Mal had several maunds of ice taken away from him by the military without payment. (Statement 369.)

Harish Chandra, a student, although he had salaamed, was stopped by the military. He was there and then given 5 or 6 cuts with a cane on his legs, arms and back, without being heard. The witness says:

The Commanding Officer threw a leather hunter [sic] over me in rage, which clung round to my feet, but he drawing it back, they took their way.
Sardar Singh was pressed to give false evidence. He refused. He was, therefore, arrested and kept in the lock-up for 4 days. He says:

Even the members of the Municipal Committee came to the lock-up and asked us to give evidence, if we wanted to be released.

The witness was in the lock-up along with 97 other men. (Statement 371.)

Lachhman Das had the contract of a serai (rest house). During the Martial Law days, the military made it their headquarters and did not allow any traveller to occupy it. He paid, himself, Rs. 75 as rent per month and Rs. 30 to his servants. He suffered a loss of Rs. 150 per month. The officers remained there for 2 months. He had to remain in his shop day and night, for the rations were taken from him. One night, one of the officers’ servants came to fetch milk for the Extra Assistant Commissioner and the Inspector of Police. He was, therefore, obliged to light a lamp. This was treated as a breach of the curfew order by the Commanding Officer, and consequently he and his companion were arrested. He pleaded that he was bound to supply milk to the officers and that, if he had not, he would have committed an offence, and that he could not possibly supply the milk without lighting a lamp. The officers paid no heed to the plea. In the meantime, his eldest brother came out from the neighbouring house and enquired what the matter was, and so he, too, was arrested. They all remained in custody for 2 days, and were then released under security. 5 days later they were summoned to the station and were sentenced to a fine of Rs. 50 and five stripes each.

Lachhman Das was pronounced to be medically unfit for receiving whipping; his fine was, therefore, doubled in lieu of stripes. (Statement 372.)

Sham Das was not allowed to drink water, whilst he had to stand in the heat of the sun when under custody. He, therefore, fell ill, but he received no medical attention. He was set free after 9 days. He says, “Even now, I do not know the reason of my arrest.” (Statement 373.)

The authorities wanted the nephew of Nihal Chand, and as he was not at the time in Sangla, the uncle was arrested. He was kept standing in the sun like many other people. He proceeds:

Owing to my old age and also owing to the strong sunshine, I fell down.
senseless 3 times. I was released after 4 or 5 days, without any explanation. (Statement 374.)

Jan Muhammad Patoli says that whilst they were made to wait from day to day, they could neither eat nor drink. He, too, like witness No. 374, fell sick owing to the hot sun. He was set free after 10 days. He adds that when he opened his shop, constables helped themselves to his goods. He rendered bills, but never received any payment. (Statement 375.)

Sohan Lal and 2 others, respected and well-known residents of Sangla Hill, have made a joint statement. They state that Rai Sri Ram, Sub-Divisional Officer, visited Sangla Hill on the 18th. He saw the people, made no arrests and went away. On the 19th Colonel O’Brien visited Sangla Hill. He, too, saw the people and said that he was pleased to pardon them regarding the hartal. The arrests only began on the 22nd April. (Statement 376, p. 503.) If what Mr. Bosworth Smith has stated regarding the disturbances at Sangla Hill had been true, the two responsible officials would not have gone away without making any arrests. The suggestion naturally is that it was Mr. Bosworth Smith who altered the position and prompted the arrests, and has magnified individual offences into popular disturbances, so far as Sangla itself is concerned. It is true that telegraph wires were cut near Sangla. The Moman station, which is not far from Sangla, was burnt and looted, but unless Sangla people could be directly traced to have taken part in the wire-cutting or the burning of the station, they could not be held liable.

The above 3 witnesses give particulars of the different arrests with names. These arrests we have already referred to in describing the administration of Martial Law in Sangla. The paragraph in the statement, showing how evidence was manufactured, will bear repetition. The witnesses state:

On the 11th May, by means of violent threats, beating and exposure in the sun, the police succeeded in forcing 29 persons to stand as witnesses for the prosecution. This number included boys of ten years, and 14 men of the railway staff. One was Prem Singh Bazaz, who had been previously convicted for abduction by force and sentenced to $3\frac{1}{2}$ years. (Statement 376, p. 504.)

Dr. Karam Singh Nanda relates how he, in common with others, had to give daily attendance for identification and stand in the sun without water and food. He says that many fainted, and that he suffered so much from the heat of the sun from day to day that he fell ill and was invalided for 2 months. He says that he was identified as being in Sangla on the 12th, whereas he was in Gujranwala and had to give evidence in the court on that day. He refers also to the fact that 180 men, who were arrested, were detained for 9 days and were asked to pay Rs. 50,000 if they wished to be released. (Statement 380.)

Kundan Lal, commission agent, states how British soldiers helped themselves to goods from shops without payment. (Statement

MOMAN

Moman is a railway station, 6 miles from Sangla on the Lahore side. There is no doubt that a party proceeded to this station from the surrounding villages and burnt and looted it, a procedure for which there was no provocation whatsoever, and which was an act of pure wanton destruction. It is not certain whether the people from the surrounding villages burnt the station, or whether it was a party of outsiders. In any case, the high-handed measures taken by the authorities by way of reprisals were totally uncalled for. We have not burdened our notes with many statements regarding Moman, because it is practically a part of Sangla, and the people of the surrounding villages came in for the same ill-treatment that the people of Sangla had been subjected to.

MANIANWALA AND NEIGHBOURING PLACES

This is a village hardly containing a population of 500 men, and it is one of the villages near the railway station, Dhaban Singh. This station was burnt and looted by the people from the surrounding villages on the 16th April, 1919. The villagers had heard exaggerated reports of what had happened at Amritsar, which evidently excited them to this act of incendiarism; and as one of the witnesses states, what began as an act of vengeance ended as one of loot on the part of evil-doers.

But, bad as the action of some of the villagers was, the reparation exact ed by the authorities was heartless, and passed the bounds of decency. On the 19th April, a troop train arrived at the Dhaban Singh station. Guns were pointed towards Manianwala; some soldiers alighted from the train and proceeded to the village, shooting as they went. One man at least was shot dead, others were wounded. One at least was maimed for life and rendered unfit for work. There seems to have been no warrant for this shooting. Women fled from their houses on hearing the shots, including those who were about to be mothers.
Sardar Atar Singh, a Lambardar of thirty years’ standing, and founder of the village, narrowly escaped death. His house was searched, cupboards were broken open, and cash and other things removed. Atar Singh is said to be 115 years old. He is certainly over 100 and can hardly move about, and passes his days seated on a bedstead. He and Inder Singh were arrested; he, being unable to walk, was put on a horse. They were both taken to the station, and confined in an iron wagon which served as an improvised lock-up. There, they were detained for some days. This wagon, being made of iron, without any lining, was naturally unbearable during the hot days of April, and in this way, several other villagers had to pass their days often without food and water. (Statement 577.)

A few days later, Mr. Bosworth Smith came with a party of soldiers, more than once. Mr. Labh Singh, an ex-professor, M.A., and Barrister, was specially sent by us to Manianwala to make further investigation as to the evidence of a shocking character given to us. He has brought statements which are reproduced as a part of our own record. This is what witness Teja Singh deposed before him:

I had not yet left for the bungalow where most of the villagers had gone by the order of the police. It was in my presence that Mr. Bosworth Smith gave a severe beating to Munshi Nawab Din and Lehna Singh. He asked him to give evidence against Bhai Mool Singh, forcing him to say that the latter had delivered a speech against the Government. After placing him in the custody of a constable who was ordered to take him to the bungalow, Mr. Bosworth Smith went towards the women. He removed their veils and used abusive language. He called them “flies, bitches, she-asses” and worse things. He said to them, “Your skirts will be examined by the police constables. When you were sleeping with your husbands, why did you allow them to get up and go?” He also spat on them. (Statement 580.)

Gurdevi, the aged widow of Mangal Jat, stated before Mr. Labh Singh:

One day during the Martial Law period, Mr. Bosworth Smith gathered together all the male persons of our village, over 8 years, at the bungalow, which is some miles from our village, in connection with the investigations that were going on. While the men were at the bungalow, he rode to our village, taking back with him all the women, who met him on the way, carrying food for their men to the bungalow. Reaching the village, he went round the lanes and ordered all the women to come out of their houses, himself forcing them out with sticks. He made us all stand near the village daira. The women folded their hands before him; he beat some with his stick, spat at them and used the foulest and most unmentionable language. He hit me twice and spat in my face. He forcibly bared the faces of all the women, and brushed aside their veils with his own stick. He called them “she-asses, bitches, flies”, and “swine”, and said, “You were in the same bed with your husbands; why did you not prevent them from going out to do mischief? Now your skirts will be looked into by the police constables.” He gave me a kick also, and ordered us to undergo the torture of holding our ears by passing our arms under and around the legs, while being bear double. (Statement 582.)

This statement is supported by several women of Manianwala.

Nawab Din, Government school-teacher, says that Mr. Bosworth Smith pressed him to say that Mool Singh had spoken against the Government, and states:

But when I repeated that it was not the fact, he began to belabour me with sticks, and beat me so long so cruelly that the marks of injury were visible on my wrist and ankles for a long time after. He said that I was a Government servant and I should, therefore, give evidence in favour of the Government. He went on beating me for some time, after which he ordered a constable to take me to the bungalow. (Statement 578.)

One Lehna Singh also received similar treatment. [He says:]

As we left for the bungalow, the Sahib addressed himself to the women, whose cries fell upon our ears, as we went along. (Statement 579.)

We have dwelt upon these incidents at some length, and we consider that an officer who is capable of behaving in the manner Mr. Bosworth Smith seems to have, is totally unfit to occupy a post of any responsibility in a civilized Government or to wear His Majesty’s uniform.

The other statements in connection with the incident at Manianwala show how over eighty villagers were arrested and subjected to the greatest inconvenience, how the villagers were obliged to pay for meals which the Government was bound to supply them whilst they were in detention, and how they were pressed under a vareity of threats to give false evidence, how flogging was administered, how Mr. Bosworth Smith conducted his trials, and how on the kind of evidence described in the statements, villagers were tried before the Martial Law Commission, and some of them trans-ported for life. Happily the sentences were reduced, and, under the Royal Proclamation these very men have been discharged. But no such discharges can possibly atone for the grave injustice done to the villagers, the majority at least of whom appear to have been utterly innocent. A punitive police has been imposed on the villagers, and a heavy indemnity was levied upon them by Mr. Bosworth Smith, which was subsequently reduced.

We cannot close this brief review of the barbarities of Manianwala without mentioning that Mr. C. F. Andrews personally visited the place on behalf of the Congress Sub-committee, and he brought evidence supporting the statements about the inhuman treatment described above.

NAWAN PIND (CHAK NO. 78)

This again is a very small village, smaller even than Manianwala, in the Tahsil Khangah Dogran. This is also near the railway station, Dhaban Singh, and, therefore, came in for practically the same treatment as Manianwala, except that the women-folk seemed to have escaped the disgraceful treatment that was meted out to their less fortunate sisters of Manianwala. That some villagers might have taken part in the burning of the Dhaban Singh station is quite likely, but there can be no justification for the cruel and vindictive punishment of a whole village, and yet the selection we have made out of nearly 40 witnesses, all speaking about similar or the same incidents, shows that the same treatment was meted out to the residents of Nawan Pind as to those of Manianwala.

Khushal Singh states that the day following the burning of the railway station, the inhabitants of the surrounding villages, including Nawan Pind, had gathered on the railway station. The Tahsildar was there to select a man for the membership of the District Board, and on the arrival of the men, the booking-office was on fire. After giving their votes, the men went away. The Tahsildar must have known most of the voters, and yet many of them were arrested in connection with the burning of the station. This witness states that, on his happening to be at the railway station the 3rd day after the fire, he learnt that the Sub-Inspector had been asking the porters to identify those who had burnt the station. The porters protested that the people were too many, and it was night time, and that they could not, therefore, identify them. The Sub-Inspector seems to have cajoled them. He said he would collect people from those villages and they (the porters) should only point out some of them and that he would see to their arrest. The next step was that all the people, except women and children, were ordered to appear before Mr. Bosworth Smith. [The witness says :]

1 In November 1919, before leaving for Africa

No sooner did the Sahib arrive there, than we were all placed in rows. The porters, as well as the railway staff, came with the Sahib. The porters were ordered by the Sahib to identify from the rows of the people those men who were concerned in setting the railway station on fire; those who were touched by the porters were separated from others, and bound hand and foot.

The identification was conducted in the following manner:

A man was identified by one porter, with a Lambardar, Zaildar and the Sub-Inspector of Police at his elbow. Then again another porter was made to identify the same person, in like manner. Thus some 28 or 29 men were arrested. One Bhagwan Singh begged to state that he had not left his home on the said day. The Sahib ordered him to be bound to a tree and flogged 12 times, because he had made a submission. After that, all the persons that were identified by the porters were taken to the railway station, where the names of the people had been called by the Patwari. Ishwar Singh was not present. The Sahib enquired whether there was any relative of his present. The Patwari replied that his brother-in-law, meaning me (Khushal Singh), was there. The Sahib at once ordered my arrest. We were all taken to the serai (rest house) and shut up in a room, and a guard was posted outside. We remained there for 2 days without anything to eat or drink. The relatives who came there with food were turned back. . . . On the 9th day we were taken back to the canal bungalow. Ishwar Singh also arrived on that day. The Sub-Inspector told him that if he deposed in favour of the prosecution, he would not be arrested. Teja Singh, son of Maya Singh Kambo, of Nawan Pind, was also there at that time, and was made a prosecution witness. Sadhu Singh, goldsmith, Jwala Singh, Zaildar, and Banta Singh, son of Jwala Singh, had also been arrested, and they were set free by the Sub-Inspector of Police on their promise to appear as prosecution witnesses. No sooner was I made a prosecution witness, than I was also released. Everybody, man or woman, from our village, was made to sit before the Tahsildar. Everybody who was arrested was called and punishment pronounced against him. No evidence was taken. If anyone said anything, he was beaten. (Statement 611.)

Here we have a full view of the so-called trials conducted by Mr. Bosworth Smith, as also of the way in which prosecution evidence was manufactured. Mr. Wathen, the Principal of the Khalsa College, Amritsar, one of the biggest educational institutions in the Punjab, has left on record his view of how justice was miscarried in Nawan Pind. We reproduce below the whole of his argument:

The case of Bhagwan Singh and Maghar Singh, sons of Jewan Singh of Nawan Pind, Chak No. 78, Tahsil, Khangah Dogran, Dist. Gujranwala.

These two men were convicted on the 9th of May, 1919, under Article 6(a), (b), (c), Indian Penal Code, the charge being that they took part in burning Dhaban railway station, and were sentenced to two years’ rigorous imprisonment and Rs. 200 fine each.

The parties are now appealing against their conviction on the following grounds:

(a) They were not present that day at the railway station, and offered to produce several witnesses to prove an alibi. Their witnesses were not called by the court.

(b) They were identified by coolies of the railway, who were to them complete strangers, and it is suggested that the coolies were prompted, possibly bribed, by certain enemies to single out these two brothers.

(c) The enemies, it is suggested, are Jwala Singh, Zaildar, and Jewan Singh, Lambardar, who have an old quarrel with the family of Jewan Singh. This quarrel, which is about a lambardarship, has been going on for about 5 years. Evidence about it can easily be had and was offered, but was not called for.

(d) This statement has been made to me by the youngest brother of the accused, Jagat Singh, a boy of 18, whom I know well and who has been my pupil for four years in this College and School. Of Jagat Singh’s personal loyalty I have no doubt whatever. I am in a position to know what Jagat Singh’s feelings are, and a suggestion that Jagat Singh was a politician of anti-British tendency would be regarded here as ludicrous; also the fact that these brothers who support the boy sent him here suggests that they are loyal; for it is usually the loyal Sikhs who send the sons from afar to an institution which is supposed to have the special favour of the Sircar. I have made enquiries among the railway coolies, many of whom know the two convicted brothers, and their universal opinion is that the brothers are perfectly innocent, and the case has been got up against them by their enemies.

(e) The point which seems to vitiate the evidence against the men is that the third brother, Mangal Singh, was also identified by the same coolies as having been present at the railway station. It so happened that on the very day when he was alleged to have been at Dhaban, he happened to be staying with Jagat Singh at Khalsa College and was seen there by many reliable witnesses, including the Vice-Principal and some members of the staff.

He (Mangal Singh) actually came to see me in order to get leave for Jagat Singh. I wrote and told the Deputy Commissioner of this, and on learning [this] in the Court, [he] immediately ordered Mangal Singh’s release. I suggest that had the Court realized that Mangal Singh, whose alibi was proved, was the brother of Bhagat Singh and Maghar Singh, it would have regarded the evidence as to identifying them as vitiated, for the same coolies who identified Bhagat Singh and Maghar Singh also identified Mangal Singh.

(SD.) G. A. WATHEN
PRINCIPAL
KHALSA COLLEGE, AMRITSAR
(Statement 613.)

The parties in question were hastily discharged on the production of Mr. Wathen’s letter, but everybody cannot have the good fortune of having an intermediary known to a man occupying Mr. Wathen’s position, as young Jagat Singh proved to be.

Bishan Singh gives a detailed account of the trial. He describes how, when a railway babu said he could not identify, the Lambardar and the Zaildar coaxed him, and how a man who had been away from Nawan Pind was thus identified and convicted. (Statement 612.)

Surain Singh was asked about the presence of Mangal Singh in the course of the trial of a batch of prisoners by Mr. Bosworth Smith. He proceeds:

I said he was not present there. But certain other people, such as Jwala Singh, Zaildar, and Jiwan Singh, deposed that he was in the riot. Upon this, Mr. Bosworth Smith sentenced me to 3 months at once. I was let off as it was found afterwards that Mangal Singh was at Amritsar on the day of the occurrence at Dhaban Singh, from the letter of the Principal, Khalsa College. (Statement 614.)

We presume that Surain Singh was sentenced on a charge of perjury. He was a Lambardar. It was possible for him to escape full imprisonment, because of Mr. Wathen’s letter, but although he has been proved to be innocent, his dismissal still stands.
Sohan Singh was also sentenced for the same reason, and released too upon the same discovery. He too was a Lambardar and was dismissed like Surain Singh. (Statement 615.)

Nandi, wife of Khushal, deposing about her son, says:

No defence was even demanded. The fact is, he, against whom the railway coolies reported, was punished. No one was asked to even give his own statement. A man belonging to their kot (village) objected to such a procedure. He was fastened to a shisham tree and severely lashed. (Statement 616.)

As in other places, so in Nawan Pind, the officials helped themselves freely to people’s goods. Thus, goods worth more than 108 rupees were taken from Hira Singh in the shape of flour, dal, sugar, ghee and milk. The villagers made collections, and paid the poor man. (Statement 618.)

Kishan Chand says he supplied Mr. Penny’s and Mr. Bosworth Smith’s camp and others with rations to the extent of 400 rupees. The villagers made up the amount. (Statement 619.)

Jwali, wife of Kahan Singh, states that her husband, 70 years old, weak as he was, was also arrested. She says:

The police on duty would not allow us to give food to our relatives without payment. I had to pay Re. 1 per day per head, as was done by others. (Statement 620.)

Nand Singh says:

The whole male population of the village, from 10 years upwards, was sent for. They were made to sit in rows in the sun, from morning till evening. Mr. Bosworth Smith was there. My brother, Bhagwan Singh, stood with folded hands and said that he was innocent and had not committed any crime. Upon this, Mr. Bosworth Smith became angry and ordered him to be beaten. A rope was sent for, which was brought by Satroo, Chaukidar, with which Bhagwan Singh was bound at once. Satroo was ordered to cane him, and he gave 12 lashes. Mr. Bosworth Smith was standing by him and said he did not mind if he was dead. He became unconscious, water was poured into his mouth and after a little time he came to his senses. He was then taken away by the Sub-Inspector and arrested. This frightened the whole people, and none dared to speak. Soldiers with rifles were standing round all, and Mr. Bosworth Smith said that if anybody spoke he would be also treated likewise. (Statement 621.)

This village was fined Rs. 10,000. One-third was taken during the last rabi. (Statement 622.)

CHUHARKANA

This is an important mandi, viz., a market-place visited by hundreds of men from the neighbouring villages, who bring their stock to the market. The village of Chuharkana lies about a mile and a half from the mandi. The station Chuharkana is near the mandi.

The hartal was observed on the 12th April. A public meeting announcing it was held on the previous day, in which all, including the municipal councillors, took part. Nothing happened up to the 14th. By the 15th, however, the news from Amritsar and Lahore had become common property, and people were much agitated. Some people, living at the mandi, and others from the villages who were at the mandi, proceeded to the railway station, and in broad daylight, took implements from the railway gang, damaged the line and burnt the station.

This was followed by the arrival of the military, and machine-guns, with an armoured train. There was considerable indiscriminate shooting. Rai Sahib Sri Ram Sud has sought, in his evidence before the Hunter Committee, to justify the shooting, but the whole of the evidence in our possession contradicts his statement. Indeed, he seems to be condemned out of his own mouth. It should also be remembered that the shooting took place before the proclamation of Martial Law. Now, R. S. Sri Ram Sud is a Sub-Divisional Officer of many years’ standing; he has served in the district since August 1918; he, therefore, knew the people. He made himself principally responsible for the firing and, when he was cornered by Pandit Jagat Narain, he said that his authority was derived from the Criminal Procedure Code. In answer to Sir Chimanlal, who enquired on what he came to the conclusion that he should fire, he said, “Because we already came to know that the mob had already collected there, and there was reliable information of it.” Again he says: “I had already heard that the people of Chuharkana were rushing to the market to loot.” “Therefore, without any further enquiry, you began to fire?” asked Sir Chimanlal. “Yes, we determined to open fire,” was the answer. He was then asked: “Your idea was that you wanted to strike terror.” He replied, “Well, if necessary. And we found it necessary.” “And after that firing, you proceeded further to the station?” asked Sir Chimanlal. “Yes,” was the reply. The Rai Sahib then described the movements of the people.

Q. What do you mean by moving? They were not committing any mischief?
A. No, not at that time. People were coming out and going into the village.
Q. You do not know what their object was in coming out and going into the village?
A. Well, their object was to attack the armoured train.
Q. From a distance, how did you know that they were collecting to attack the armoured train?
A. Unfortunately, I cannot illuminate things which are in my brain.
Q. Pardon me, Lala, we are dealing with what materials you then had and what you saw then. I want to know, when you refer to their movements, what was the actual movement. Will you kindly tell me?
A. I said they were coming and going and I fancy they were collecting.
Q. With what object you cannot say?
A. They were collecting for some sinister purpose.
Q. From the fact that you saw some people were going to the village and certain people going out, you concluded that they were collecting with some sinister object?
A. They saw our armoured train and yet they did not hide. What was the conclusion?

Now this evidence was given by the Rai Sahib on the 17th December. The evidence collected by us on our own behalf was long before that time and it was checked by one of us on the 6th December, and it goes to show that there was no crowd collecting and that the movement that the Rai Sahib saw was the very opposite of what he imagined it to be. The people were going out and hiding themselves through fear.

Dula Singh, a Jat, who knows what he is talking, and who seems to know every inch of the ground, says:

They fired with the machine-guns at the men who were leaving the village out of terror. I saw three persons falling down wounded by the machine-gun fire. Maula Baksh and Kartar Singh, Members of the committee, were also in the carriage. (Statement 468.)

Ganpat Mal says:

Firing from the machine-guns lasted for a long while and people went on running hither and thither. . . . On the 17th April, the same course was followed; the British soldiers came with machine-guns. They alighted from a train and fired on the people who were running hither and thither. (Statement 458.)
Thus, whilst we will not go so far as to say that firing before Martial Law could not be justified, we believe that the firing referred to by the Sub-Divisional Officer was hasty, premature, indiscriminate and due to panic or over-zeal. To strike terror was no part of the officer’s business. It is a sign not of strength but of weakness, not a vindication of justice but a perpetration of injustice. A guilty conscience alone resorts to terrorism. We admit that the incendiariism, the looting and the wire-cutting were all bad, unwarranted and disgraceful, and that the culprits deserved condign punishment. But nothing that the people did could possibly justify the random firing that was resorted to and that resulted in the loss of innocent lives and permanent injury to several innocent people, and the other barbarous measures that were taken, in order to “terrorize” a whole people.

The other measures were more or less the same everywhere. The evidence about looting by the soldiers is stronger and more voluminous for Chuharkana than elsewhere. Cattle were forcibly seized and milked for the soldiers. Goats, utensils, eatables were taken away even in the absence of the owners. It is difficult to estimate the material loss that the people must have suffered during the Martial Law regime.

Sucha Singh says:
The police got one bedding from me by frightening me and it has not been returned as yet. (Statement 449.)

Shaman deposes to the effect that his crops were forcibly taken by the sepoys who were there, for the use of their horses. (Statement

Mohan Lal says:
When Mr. Bosworth Smith came here, provisions of the value of Rs. 45 were taken away from our shop, but no value has been realized up to this time. (Statement 474.)

Haveli Ram says:
My shop and house were locked up for 10 or 15 days. . . . Many of the mandi shops were searched. The British soldiers promenaded the mandi, and tyrannized over the people. They used to enter the shops and take away anything they pleased . . . The soldiers paid nothing to me as the price of the things they bought from me. (Statement 453.)

Ganpat Mal says:
They took away anything they saw for their ration. Hens, eggs, goats and milk, all these were forcibly snatched from the people. The policemen came to the people and asked for beddings, which people had to give because they were very much afraid. Until now they have not been returned. The police took buffalo milk forcibly from me and nothing was left for my children. I gave one bedding, which has not been returned to me as yet. . . . During the Martial Law days, I had to pay Rs. 25 from mandi side, and Rs. 10 from the village side, for defraying the expenses of the military rations. (Statement 458.)

Certain shopkeepers, who had supplied the military with rations, sent in to the authorities a list of the articles supplied. The reply sent by the Superintendent of Police, Gujranwala, was:

It be sent to the Sub-Inspector with the direction that this money can under no circumstances be realized now. The applicants be made to understand that they should not trouble us again and again.

The villagers were prevented from cutting their crops for some days. In some cases, their crops were confiscated without just cause. These acts are practically admitted by Mr. Bosworth Smith who was chiefly responsible for the Martial Law administration in these parts, viz., between Sangla Hill and Sheikhupura.

Shan Singh says:
My pecuniary losses amounted to about 2,000 rupees on account of the damage done to my crops. (Statement 454.)

Jiwaya says:
I had my crop of gram, $\frac{31}{4}$ qilaas', near that of Sher Singh, which has been used by the army for their horses and was never paid for. Even when they were asked not to do it, they threatened me stating that if we prevented them from taking the green fodder, they would take us before the Sahib, and we would be punished. (Statement 456.)

Ganpat Mal says:
It was also ordered that all that were present should remain in the village and no one should go outside into the fields to reap the wheat crop. He ordered the Patwari to go round the fields, so that people should neither reap their crops nor give anything to their animals to eat or take care of them. Accordingly, the cattle wandered uncared for, and the crops were ruined. Some of the crops were damaged by the military. We got only one-fourth of the output of the crop. (Statement 458, p. 597.)

About the so-called trials and the procedure adopted prior to them, the statements bristle with facts corroborating what has been stated by us about other places. Mr. Todar Mal says that when the identification parade was going on, Mr. Bosworth Smith said: “I want only big men, they are *gandi makkhi*¹, I do not want common people.” This witness was pointed out as one of the guilty ones by Sardar Kartar Singh. He says:

I immediately challenged him and asked him why he had singled me out. He said that he could not give the reason, as the C.I.D. had prohibited him. He would have to do what was required. (Statement 450, p. 589.)

He was tried, but acquitted by the Martial Law Commission.

Kanshi Ram says:

The defence evidence, which we wished to produce before the Deputy Commissioner, was not allowed, nor was anybody’s statement recorded. (Statement 451, p. 590.)

Maya Singh says that his son Ujagar Singh had gone out to fetch medicine and was arrested together with others. He protested, and thereupon *Langra*² Sahib (i.e., Mr. Bosworth Smith) ordered him to be fastened to a tree and to be given 25 stripes. . . . He was confined in the cell for 10 days, and when the accused were identified in the canal rest-house, none identified him, and he was accordingly let off. (Statement 448.)

Haveli Ram says:

One day, Ladha Singh, the watchman, informed all the *mandiwalas*³ that all should present themselves the next morning at the canal bungalow, and that the absentees would have their properties forfeited. We reached the bungalow the next morning, and had to sit there without any food or drink. We were all required to stand in the sun at 12 noon, and had to do so for full 2 hours. All those that were pointed out by porters at the instance of the Lambardar were arrested and sent to the police-station. They were given nothing to eat or drink, and if anybody wished to give them anything to eat or drink, he was beaten and abused. They were taken to Lahore the next day, and were brought in groups, and their sentences were read to them. (Statement 452, p. 592.)

Sardar Shan Singh says:

I was confined in the serai, with other arrested people, after being handcuffed behind my back. I had to stay there for about 15 or 16 days. I could not even take my meals; nor could I bind my turban on account of the handcuffs being put on my hands from behind. I was kept handcuffed even during the night. Other people, who were confined with me then, used to put food into my mouth; others would bind for me my turban on my head. My elder brother, Kahan Singh, was also confined with me there. He had one Arab horse which Ali Mohomed, Sub-Inspector of Police, asked him (my brother) to give to him, and he (the Sub-Inspector) would let him go. My brother replied that he was quite innocent and would not give his horse for nothing. The Sub-Inspector of Police was very angry at this refusal of my brother, and he added that he would charge him with many offences. The first thing that he did was to put surreptitiously some articles of a railway babu in the house of my brother, and then after an investigation, got those articles produced from his house. . . . . The Sub-Inspector of Police asked me to pay Rs. 500, if I wanted to save my skin. I refused to pay, and on that I was also charged with my brother. But afterwards my wife borrowed the amount of Rs. 500 from someone and paid the same to the Sub-Inspector, through Sundar Singh, Zemindar, Sheikhupura, Chak Manora. Upon that, the Sub-Inspector of Police promised to release me. . . . . The Sub-Inspector stopped the men who were made to despose against me, from giving their evidence, but he put only one ordinary witness instead. This resulted in my release on account of the ineffectiveness of the evidence. (Statement 454, p. 549.)

Even a blind man was not free from interference. Ladha Mal, a blind man, was asked to produce his son, and, as the son was not then present, he was arrested, and discharged only after the mother had brought the son. (Statement 467.) Ganpat Mal states that Mr. Bosworth Smith ordered the villagers to gather together on pain of their property being burnt or confiscated. He says:

Accordingly all people, out of fear, assembled in the Durbar Sahib\(^1\). The Langra Sahib ordered the Patwari to bring the census report. Lala Sri Ram, the Deputy of Sheikhupura, read out the names from the report of those who were not present. The women were sent for, through the police. The Sahib ordered them to produce their husbands: otherwise, their houses would be burnt and lands confiscated. After giving this order, the women were asked to go; and the brothers and fathers of the absentees, who were present there, were arrested and taken away.

He further says:

The arrested men were brought in batches of 10 or 12, and sentenced to two years’ imprisonment each, and fined Rs. 200. No evidence was taken, only they were asked to beg pardon and the people replied, “Sir, we are innocent; if we have done anything, we should be pardoned.” (Statement 458.)

Sardar Harnam Singh says he pays a revenue-tax of Rs. 400, and that he bought Rs. 800 worth of War Bonds. He pays Rs. 60 as house-tax. His brother, Khushal Singh, was arrested. He engaged Mr. Martin for his defence on a payment of Rs. 1,000, but, he says:

Nobody allowed him to plead. Nobody heard the defence witnesses, who were present; nor were they sent for. Khushal Singh’s case was disposed of within 5 minutes.

He says:

In all summary trials, Mr. Bosworth Smith, or any Inspector of Police present used to address the accused thus. “Do you beg for pardon?” To this the accused invariably replied, “Sir, we are innocent, we should be pardoned.” But this was recorded on the file as if accused had made confession of their guilt. No defence witness was heard; nor was any time given to prepare the defence. On the first day, about 100 people were convicted, and within 2 or 3 hours their judgments and orders were also written. (Statement 447.)

Rs. 1,500 were levied from Chuharkana as a fine. Towards this, Mangal Singh and his brother had to pay Rs. 230. (Statement 460.)

The firm of Lala Faquir Chand Jangli Mal paid Rs. 50 for the maintenance of troops in the month of April, Rs. 114 for the punitive police, Rs. 20 for the Lieutenant-Governor’s Memorial. “These sums were realized forcibly from us,” says the agent. (Statement 480.)

SHEIKHUPURA

Sheikhupura is a historic place, 25 miles from Lahore, and the last place to be noticed in the Gujranwala district. It derives its name from the pet name of the Emperor Jehangir, and it was the residence of Rani Nakain of Maharaja Ranjit Singh. It has a population of about 2,500 people.

Sheikhupura observed a hartal on the 6th of April. It was spontaneous and complete, in spite of the interference by the Sub-Inspector of Police with the people. There was a meeting in the evening, where, as admitted by the officials, temperate speeches were made. The Sub-Divisional Officer, Rai Sahib [Sri] Ram Sud, unsuccessfully attempted to stop the meeting by summoning the pleaders and using threatening language towards them. Then, up to the 13th, there was... perfect peace. The news of Amritsar and Lahore, however, had its effect upon Sheikhupura’s population, and the morning of the 14th saw another spontaneous and complete hartal, when too, there was no untoward incident. It has been alleged that a baker’s shop was forcibly closed that day and that the baker was assaulted. The statement is denied, in spite of a conviction registered by the so-called Summary Court. During the night, however, some telegraph and signal wires were cut by unknown persons, very probably from Sheikhupura.

In any case, the trouble did not arise out of the hartal, but all the same Martial Law was proclaimed on the 19th, and everything that has been narrated of the other places happened in Sheikhupura also. The pleaders came in for special attention. They were subjected to special humiliation; they were arrested and detained for 40 days and finally discharged without a trial and without being told why they had been arrested. A special feature in Sheikhupura was that the whole of the male population, over the age of ten years, was made to sweep a large area of land,¹ just in order to humiliate the people. They were also made to attend, from early morning till evening, for 7 days for the purpose of the so-called investigation. Schoolboys had to attend, as in other places also.

A 60-year-old respected Lambardar of 38 years’ standing and a retired Inspector of Police², was arrested simply because his sons were not in Sheikhupura when they were wanted. His property was confiscated and his tenants prohibited from cutting the crops.

The soldiers and the police freely helped themselves to the goods of the people. The usual pressure was applied for extorting evidence and the trials resulted in the same miscarriage of justice as elsewhere. But, unlike the other places, Mr. Bosworth Smith reported the pleaders to the High Court with a view to their being deprived of the right of practising. Out of nearly 70 statements, we have selected about 30 for presentation, which support all the statements made above.

Sardar Boota Singh, B.A., LL.B., was a member of the District War League, who had assisted in recruiting and had received a certificate for his services. He says that he took no part in either hartal, being engaged elsewhere on both the days. Writing of the 14th April he says:

No mob was seen collected in any place, no demonstrations were made anywhere and nothing unusual was done by the people.

Together with the other local pleaders, he was suddenly arrested on the morning of the 19th. [He adds:] All of us were put in charge of some 25 soldiers, who carried loaded guns with fixed bayonets. We were made to parade the city in this condition and were more than once made to sit upon filthy ground in the presence of our co-villagers. After making a full display of our humiliating condition for about an hour, we were marched double speed towards an armoured train. . . . I was abused, jeered at and beaten with a stick on account of my not keeping pace with the others owing to my ill-health.

The prisoners were taken to Lahore, the journey occupying two hours. Their repeated requests to be allowed to answer nature's call were refused by the guard, and no food was supplied to them till late in the evening. [He continues:] From the railway station, we were taken to the Central Jail Lahore, where we were handcuffed and taken to solitary cells. For 40 days we were thus detained, thereby suffering the greatest possible discomfort and hardship.

As if all this was not enough, further humiliation was heaped upon them, even as they were discharged; for they were taken handcuffed to Sheikhpura, marched to the police station and then to the Naib Tahsildar's house in the town, evidently in order to mock them, and it was there that they were finally discharged. (Statement 486.)

Lala Ushnak Rai, B.A., LL.B., is a first-grade pleader of 9 years' standing. He has been a hereditary Lambardar of two villages, owns extensive landed property, and has continuously aided the War funds. He says, “Up to April last, I never took part in any political meeting.” On the morning of the 15th, he was sent for by the Sub-Department Officer. He promised to co-operate with the officers in the maintenance of law and order. The same evening, the Sub-Department Officer went to Chuharkana, a step which seems to be inconsistent with his evidence before Lord Hunter's Committee, before which he stated that the peace of Sheikhpura was apparent and not real. It should be remembered that he left Sheikhupura in spite of the wire-cutting incident already referred to. The witness says that he co-operated with the local Extra Assistant Commissioner up to the evening of the 18th April. He even presented himself on the 19th before the Sub-Divisional Officer, and reported that all was well in Sheikhupura, but a few minutes later he was arrested in his own house and was not allowed either to close the doors of his house or to put on his jacket.

He adds:

I was then made to squat on dirty ground, while they were waiting for Gosain Maya Ram, whose office was only a few yards off from mine. I had no desire to squat down, as I was not tired, but I was made to squat in order to humiliate me.

Speaking of the railway lock-up at Lahore, he says:

It was totally unfit for habitation, as it had been used previously as a latrine, and was reeking with foul smell.

They were made to leave their turbans and shoes outside the lock-up. Gauhar Singh, being a Sikh, protested against the removal of the turban, and wanted to keep his spectacles on, as he could not see without them on account of his age. His protests were disregarded. He was dismissed from his lambardari without his being informed of it, and his appeal to the higher authority was also dismissed without his being heard. (Statement 485.)

Gosain Maya Ram, also B.A., LL.B., says that the arrests took place early in the morning:

We were not properly clad. Some were arrested in their night-shirts and pyjamas, whilst Maulvi Alim Din, Pleader, had only a shirt and a dhoti on. Our request to have our clothes brought was met with a curt refusal and a frown.

He further adds, to illustrate the studied manner of the humiliation:

Myself, S. Boota Singh, Maulvi Alim Din and Jamiat Singh were put in one compartment, and were ordered to sit on the floor, although there were benches to sit upon. Sardar Buta Singh had taken a purgative the same day, early in the morning. He wanted to make water, and requested one custodian to allow him to do so, but to no purpose. All of us repeatedly made the requests, whereupon one of the soldiers replied, “Can't you swallow it?”

After describing the other scenes, he says:

The hardships which we had to undergo in the jail are simply indescribable. The ordinary jail food is fit for cattle, and not for human beings. We were allowed to leave our cells for half an hour only in the morning, and half an hour in the evening, for bathing, etc. Even this one hour was many times denied to us by the warders, who used to open and shut out doors at will. (Statements 483.)
This witness relates an interesting conversation he had with the Sub-Divisional Officer, who tried to warn him first, and then the other pleaders, from going to the meeting of the 6th April, and when he succeeded in showing that there was nothing wrong about the meeting and nothing inconsistent with the pleaders' licences to go to the meeting, the appeal was made on personal grounds, to which the Gosain weakly yielded. Then the Sub-Divisional Officer sent for other pleaders and told them that the Gosain had promised not to join the meeting. When the latter heard of this, he said:

I felt hurt, and thought that the Sub-Divisional Officer had made wrong use of my name to influence the others; so I wrote to him that I meant to go to the meeting, and that he had no right to use my name in this fashion. (Statement 484.)

Sardar Pritam Singh, Pleader, who happened not to be arrested, witnessed the ushering in of Martial Law, which was proclaimed in the evening of the 19th April. He thus described it:

This proclamation was read by the Sub-Divisional Officer, Rai Sahib Sri Ram himself, and after the reading was over, the people were told by him that he had been invested with powers to shoot them, in case they repeated the hartal a second time. On this occasion, he made a thrust at the chins of several old respectable people with the end of his stick.

He then describes the machine-gun demonstration referred to before the Hunter Committee:

About the end of April, a moving column of British and Indian soldiers made a demonstration of the strength of the Sirkar (Government) with a number of machine-guns and motor-cars mounted with guns. Several iron pieces were placed against a mound, facing the machine-guns. After the machine-guns had been worked, and the iron pieces pierced with gun-fire, they were shown to the people, who had been made to see the tamasha by the order of the authorities. They were told that those persons would be made the targets of these very machines, if they rebelled against the Sirkar again. This show of power was, however, preceded by the reading of a proclamation, issued by the Lieutenant-Governor, wherein he had advised the people to co-operate with the Government in bringing about normal conditions.

This demonstration of power, side by side with an appeal for co-operation, seems to be an incompatible mixture.

There was another demonstration, on or about the 7th May, of a different character, this time intended not merely to terrorize, but also to humiliate. We again give it in the language of the same witness:
He gathered together in the sun all the people of the place including, among others, pleaders who had not been arrested. The pleaders were separated from the rest and made to stand in two rows, the front row consisting of those who had not joined the meeting of the 6th April, and the back row consisting of those who had joined that meeting but without taking any active part in it. Mr. Bosworth Smith then began his speech, and he took the Indian pleaders as his text. He said among other things, that the pleaders of India were a low class of people (kamin), who agitated against the Sirkar and made the innocent zemindars their tools. He asked me, personally, as to what my father was, and where I had received my education. On being informed that I was the son of a schoolmaster and had my education in the Forman Christian College at Lahore, he wondered how I could have at all taken to the agitation. Mr. Bosworth Smith went even so far as to call me a “little worm”, in the presence of the other pleaders.

After he had done with the pleaders, Mr. Bosworth Smith made Sardar Gauhar Singh, a retired Inspector of Police, parade before the people, barefooted and handcuffed, in the sun. The Sahib told the people that Gauhar Singh was a disloyal subject of the Government, and that three of his sons had been sent to jail for their misdeeds. The Government would forfeit [sic] his pension and deport him to Burma.

He then advised the people generally. He said that they were all suar log (swine) and gandi makkhi (contemptible flies). He actually spat on the ground, saying kala log (black men) ganda log (contemptible people), sab ek rang ka (all of one colour), inasmuch as they had rebelled against the Sirkar by the closing of their shops. He told them that they never should listen to the pleaders, who always cheated them, but go for advice to their Lambardars, Zaildars, Tahsildars and Deputies. (Statement 503.)

Here we have a special insult offered to the pleaders, an attempt to wean the people from those whom they considered their friends, the studied degradation of a respected Inspector of Police, because of the supposed misdeeds of his sons, and a vulgar abuse of the whole of his audience, and all this by an officer who was in charge of the district, and who was sent to restore order, and to punish the evil-doers.

The case of Gauhar Singh shows to what extent the officials went in relentlessly persecuting innocent people. Sardar Gauhar Singh and his family have practically been ruined, and in bringing ruin to these men, the officer who especially interested himself in them did not hesitate to resort to questionable means. If the statement of Sardar Amar Singh, his son, is to be relied upon, Rai Sahib Sri Ram had his eyes upon this family for some time. Says this witness:

Accordingly, on the 19th of April, 1919, my father was arrested and sent to the Lahore Central Jail, without being guilty of any crime, but he was released that very day. What happened to us at Sheikhpura that day is beyond description. All our houses were locked up and all ladies and children turned out. The crop in the fields was confiscated, a guard was stationed there, and we were prevented from reaping it then. On this account, we suffered a heavy loss, which is well known to the people of our village. We were constantly threatened with our houses being set on fire.

On the 20th April, the witness, along with two brothers, was arrested. His brother-in-law was also arrested, also a friend of his, together with two servants. Sardar Amar Singh says that they were made to suffer “simply for my sake, as they were my servants”. And these five, that is, the brother-in-law, the friend and the two servants were released without trials on the 28th May. The witness himself was brought to Sheikhpura on the 24th May. He was presented to the public, handcuffed, on the pretence of identification. He says this was done “merely to disgrace me in the eyes of the public”. On the 26th, he was brought before Mr. Penny, but as there was no evidence at all against him personally, he was discharged. (Statement 490.)

Witnesses 492, 493, 497, 499, 500 and 501 depose either to pressure having been brought to bear on them to give evidence against Gauhar Singh, or to having been themselves arrested, charged and convicted for no other fault than that they would not perjure themselves. Sardar Gauhar Singh, himself describing his case, says:

In spite of my sons having voluntarily surrendered as required by the authorities, my house, stables and other quarters remained locked up for about 8 days, and a strong police guard was placed around our house and the fields. So we had to remain out homeless. Our crops suffered a great deal owing to our not being allowed to look after them. Our poor tenants, who were to receive 2/3 of the produce, suffered as well. These tenants had to pay full canal dues without any reduction. On the 17th of May, I was arrested again and was released on the 30th of May, 1919.

He was dismissed from his lambardarship, without being asked to show cause. (Statement 488.)

Although there was no damage done in Sheikhpura, and no damage done by the crowd of people to the wires indemnity was levied. Gosain Maya Ram, Pleader, says:

The value of the loss cannot exceed Rs. 5 at the most. At first, the indemnity proposed was Rs. 9,000 which was subsequently reduced to Rs. 100, out of which nearly Rs. 60 were recovered from 4 pleaders, who had the misfortune to be sent to jail for forty days, for no fault of theirs. (Statement 483.)

Lala Thakar Dass has brought to light what Mr. Bosworth Smith admitted in his evidence, namely, that he wanted a tobaghar (house of repentance) to be erected. The witness's contribution was to be Rs. 1,000. (Statement 507.)

Before closing our review of the events of Sheikhupura during April, it is necessary to glance at a portion of the evidence given by Colonel O'Brien, Mr. Bosworth Smith, Rai Sahib Shri Ram Sud, who show the animus that they brought to bear upon their work. It will be remembered that Colonel O'Brien justified the arrests without warrants, of people in general, on the strength of powers given to the Commissioners under the Defence of India Act. The ordinary common sense view of the section, which we have already quoted, would be that the Commissioners did not include Deputy Commissioners; where powers have been given to Deputy Commissioners, they have been specifically mentioned. However, as far as Sheikhupura pleaders were concerned, Col. O'Brien shifted the ground by saying that they were arrested for organizing hartal. Mr. Bosworth Smith, who was never before in Sheikhupura and, therefore, had never seen the pleaders before, has not only condemned them as a class without cause, but had the effrontery to report them to the High Court. Rai Sahib Shri Ram Sud has admitted that he had a ground of complaint that one of the pleaders was (a) “a subscriber to The Tribune”, (b) “was seen bareheaded with another pleader on the day of hartal”, and (c) “as the president of the meeting, after the 6th April, he got letters of regret from some of the pleaders”; while another was (a) “a subscriber to the Moslem Herald”, (b) “was seen at the home of another pleader”, and (c) “had written a letter to the president of the meeting, regretting his inability to attend it”.

We have not dealt with the summary trials in any detail nor with extortion. The evidence on both these points is to be found in the Sheikhupura statements in a full measure. The summary trials were a farce. The evidence on extortion is most damaging.

LYALLPUR

Lyallpur is the headquarters of the Lyallpur district. It is a new town containing a population of over 15,000. It is one of the largest depots for the exportation of wheat in the province. There was a spontaneous and complete hartal on the 6th April, and there was a public meeting also, at which resolutions were passed and carefully prepared, written-out speeches, moderate in tone, were delivered. The meeting was held after due consultation with the authorities. Nothing happened up to the 12th. But, by that time, the news of the arrests of Mr. Gandhi, Dr. Kitchlew and Dr. Satyapal had arrived and also about the firing at Lahore and Amritsar. This brought about another spontaneous hartal. The leaders tried to avoid it, but they were not able to control the feelings of the people. They, however, rendered to the authorities great assistance in observing peace. Rumours about the alleged firing on the Golden Temple had considerably disturbed the Sikh population specially, and the hartal was prolonged. But, through the tact and vigilance of the leaders, the hartal was broken up on the 15th. There was no disturbance whatsoever in the town. Wires were cut near Lyallpur, but there was no connection between the wire-cutting and the hartal or any person in Lyallpur. Bundles of bhusa (chaff), stacked at the station, were burnt. This was considered to be the work of incendiaries. Innocent people were arrested and put to a lot of trouble in this connection, but upon a claim made on behalf of the Secretary of State for compensation a full enquiry was held and the magistrate dismissed the claim, and found that the burning of bhusa was not the work of incendiaries. Unfortunately, the enquiry was held too late for the protection of the innocent people. We have annexed the judgment to the statements recorded by us. The magistrate says:

The bhusa appears to have gone on fire between 8.15 p.m. and 8.45 p.m. The fire was noticed by the picket at about 8.40. The night was dark, there was strong wind blowing from the direction of the factory at the time. This wind later developed into a dust storm of great violence.

The stack or rather pyramid of bales which was nearest to the factories had taken fire. The fire had begun on the side nearest to the factories. The sirki covering or roof over the bales had caught fire. The fire communicated itself to the bales at once. The chaukidar of the bhusa stacks was absent at the time. The store-keeper or the officer in charge of baling operations arrived shortly after the fire had begun. I reached the spot with cavalry very shortly after the fire had begun. A few people from the factories, a few members of the municipal staff and the store-keeper alluded to above were the only persons on the spot when I arrived. There was no information of any crowd having visited the stacks or of any single person having been seen near the stacks. The absence of the chaukidar seems to have been due to laziness and not to have been arranged or premeditated. Neither patrol nor picket saw anything suspicious in the vicinity of the goods yard. The subsequent dust storm and the covering of the ground by footprints of the helpers who tried to prevent the fire spreading to other stacks prevented all possibility of evidence.

A very exhaustive police enquiry was made; no trace of anything bearing on the burning of the bhūsa came out. There were some approvers in the Lyalpur cases, who were associates of and in the secrets of those who were convicted in the Lyalpur disorders. None of these however had any information to give in regard to the burning of the bhūsa, which does not seem to have formed part of the plans of their associates.

There was a strong suspicion at the time that this was the work of an incendiary, because,
1. similar acts had occurred elsewhere in connection with the disorders;
2. a plot to burn bhūsa had been alleged to have existed at Toba Tek Singh;
3. of the fact that goods had been removed from the goods yard the day before.

The police enquiry, however, has failed to connect the burning of this bhūsa with the act of any incendiary or with any riot or rioters. Those convicted in jail in Lyalpur disorder were questioned by me. They have now, after conviction, no object in concealing what they knew, and have given information on a number of other points, but none of them have any information to give about the bhūsa.

I have examined the theory of whether it was the act of some villager or villagers, but no clue has been obtained.

Four factories were working on the day in question. One of them was in close proximity to the stacks. During the winter months no fires were caused to the bhūsa by factories working; but since April, there have been a number of fires in piles of open cotton in factory yards, due to cinders from chimneys, etc. It is possible, though not likely on account of the distance, that this may have been the cause of the bhūsa fire.

I have been unable to find anything, except suspicion, to point to this injury having arisen from riot and unlawful assembly within the area.

I am unable, therefore, to make the assessment contemplated in Section 15 A (2) (c) of the police Act.

Incidentally, the magistrate has remarked:

There were no riots or disturbances at Lyalpur that day; though shops were shut, no disorder or unlawful assemblies were noticed in the town itself (Statement 517 A.)

So much was Lyalpur free from violent tendencies that Mr. B. W. Smith, Superintendent of Police, in giving his evidence before the Hunter Committee, said that Martial Law was not “essential”, though he considered it was “desirable”; and yet there was all the military display, all the terrorism, prosecutions, salaaming orders, restrictions upon travelling and unwarrantable attempts to discredit and to undermine the influence, such as it was, of the natural leaders of the people.

It was not before the 22nd that arrests were commenced. Lala Chint Ram Thapar says:

On the 22nd, the people were not even out of their beds. When machine-guns were placed all round the city which was surrounded by British soldiers. About twelve people were arrested, I being one amongst them . . . . On the 2nd of May, we were produced before the court, handcuffed in twos. We protested . . . In this way, we were taken from jail to court and from court to jail, and as long as we remained in the court, we remained handcuffed and were not allowed to sit. Efforts were made to make me an approver, and an autograph letter of the Deputy Commissioner was sent to me through a friend of mine.

But the witness was unbending. After conviction, the prisoners were taken to Lahore. The witness says:

At about 11 a.m., in the scorching heat, we had to walk from the jail to the station with handcuffs and fetters on. Our ankles were wounded owing to the fetters. (Statement 521, p. 664.)

Lala Bodh Raj, Chairman of the District Congress Committee, Director of the Punjab National Bank, Limited, at Lyallpur, and Vice-Chairman of D.M.A.S. High School Committee, a legal practitioner of 22 years’ standing, was also among those who were arrested. Unlike the Gujranwala district, the prisoners were told what charge they were to be tried under. It was under Sec. 143 of the Indian Penal Code regarding the formation of unlawful assembly. So they applied for bail and the application was rejected on the ground that some other charges, too, were under contemplation. Describing the treatment, whilst under detention, the witness says that although undertrial prisoners are entitled to have their own food from their houses, their application that they should be allowed to have their own food brought to them was not only rejected but they were taunted with this that as they could observe fast, they should be satisfied with jail food. During the trial, they were kept standing from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. They, therefore, requested that they should be allowed to have refreshment during the day at their own expense. It was allowed for the first day but for the rest of the days they were told that they were not entitled to
it. The magistrate refused to allow them the inspection of records before or after the commencement of the proceedings, and yet they were asked to name the defence witnesses. (Statement 517.) Lala Amir Chand arrived at Lyallpur on domestic business on the 13th April. He had arrived from Calcutta at Lahore on the 5th April. He, too, was arrested. The trial was postponed from time to time at the instance of the authorities. The last date fixed was the 14th of June, but, suddenly without a warrant, the date was anticipated and the trial took place on the 5th of June. The witness says, he was convicted without being able to produce his witnesses. He was charged afresh on the 6th and was sentenced to undergo imprisonment for 3 months, and on the 18th of June he was awarded 2 years’ imprisonment. In common with so many sentences that were revised by the Lieutenant-Governor, his sentence had also undergone revision and he was discharged on the 18th of September. He was arrested again and made to furnish security, but for reasons best known to them, the police withdrew the case. The witness states that he subsequently learnt that he was arrested on the suspicion that he might have destructive instruments with him, as he had come from Bengal. He concludes:

This was why the officers came with pistols in their hands to my house to arrest me. (Statement 524.)

Sardar Sant Singh, Vakil, gives a graphic description of the trial of the pleaders and others. He shows how at every step they were obstructed in their defence, and delay was caused, during which time they were kept under detention, and although the case was not finished when Martial Law ceased to exist, they were convicted. Fortunately, as the trial was finished after Martial Law, they were able to appeal. The convictions were pronounced to be illegal by the Superior Court, and the cases were remanded for retrial. They were then released on 23rd July, but they were promptly rearrested, though this time they were allowed out on bail.

They, therefore, all in good faith, restarted their practice, but they were immediately sent for by the magistrate, and informed that they were still under-trial men, and were “guilty of improper conduct” for resuming their practice. The witness says that although the warning was concluded in the form of advice, they considered it prudent not to resume practice. The last act in the drama, however, was not yet finished. On the 1st of October non-bailable warrants were issued.

They were arrested, and the witness says:

We were subjected to the indignity of sleeping in a dirty room, on dirty matting on the floor; our request to send us to the judicial lock-up in the jail was disregarded.

Ultimately, however, owing to the agitation that was set up by the Hon’ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya in the Imperial Council regarding this atrocity, the proceedings were withdrawn and the pleaders discharged from detention. (Statement 516.)

Mr. Ram Dass Chhokra, Barrister-at-Law, says that, for the offence of reading a paper on satyagraha, he was interned “within the municipal limits of Lyallpur”, and this internment lasted till the abrogation of Martial Law. He says:

But, an order, which was harder than the one of internment, was one regarding the fixing of Martial Law notices at my office in the Kacherry Bazaar. My office is at a distance of at least half a mile from my residential house, and to guard the Martial Law notices from such a distance at the risk of one’s complete liberty was a very hard job. I made modest request to the Commander in regard to this matter, which was not, however, granted. I said to the Commander that as my office was at a considerable distance from my house the Martial Law notices might be handed over to me personally instead of being fixed to my office during my absence, for, in the latter case they might be torn away before I came to know of their existence. I also made a second request to him, and that was that I might be allowed to paste the notices on to a board, which I would make arrangements to exhibit at my office during the day time, but which could be put away during night, and so I could be saved the night watch of notices. The Commander said those were quite reasonable requests and he would consult the Deputy Commissioner and let me know. The next day, I was informed that I could go to the office of the Superintendent of Police every evening, and find out if there were any Martial Law notices. As regards the second request, he kept perfect silence.

I saw the Deputy Commissioner after these orders had been passed against me, and asked him bluntly why I was being persecuted. He said he had not been receiving good reports about me. I said, “That is exactly what I have come to know. Will you kindly tell me specifically what it is that you have against me?” He promised to look up Police papers. I went to him twice

1 Malaviya had given notice of 92 questions, regarding Martial Law in the Punjab which he intended to ask in the Imperial Legislative Council in September 1919. They were however disallowed.
after this, but each time I was informed that he had no time to do so. And I do not know till now the reasons for the strange action of the authorities.

The pressure put upon witnesses to give false evidence was practically of the same character as described elsewhere. A remarkable expression was made use of by an officer to a witness who was expected to give evidence in particular, “ya takhat lo, ya takhta milega”, meaning, “choose between the throne and the gallows”. If the witness gave evidence as desired, he was to be free; if he did not, imprisonment was to be his lot. (Statement 530. See also Statements 518, 522, 525, 531, 533, 536, 537 and 548.)

GUJRAT

Gujrat is a historic place, famous for the battle 1 of Gujrat during the Sikh war. It has a population of nearly 20,000. It is a railway station beyond Wazirabad, on the main line, and nine miles from it.

An attempted hartal for the 6th April was prevented by the efforts of a local merchant, Lala Ram Chand Tandon, the President of the Sanatana Dharma Sabha. But on the 13th, some students from Lahore and belonging to Gujrat, as also a party that had gone to Wazirabad for the Baisakhi festival, returned by the late night train about 11 p.m. They formed themselves into a kind of procession, and entered the town, crying out against the Rowlatt Act. In the morning, they spread the news of the doings in Lahore and other places, and succeeded in inducing shopkeepers to close their shops. The hartal having taken place, the authorities sent for the Municipal Commissioners, and asked them to keep watch in their respective wards. Accordingly, during the night of the 14th, they, with the help of their friends, looked after their respective wards, and nothing untoward happened during the night. On the 15th, the boys and others who had joined them proceeded to the Mission School, and asked the Head Master to close it. The latter, however, refused and is said even to have caned some of the boys. Thereupon the boys threw stones at the windows and smashed some panes. They did similar damage at the Station, burnt some papers, but before they could do anything more than break a few window panes, they were fired upon, and they dispersed. There were no casualties.

There was nothing beyond the above incidents. No responsible person had taken part in the promotion of the hartal or in what followed. Yet Martial Law was proclaimed in Gujrat on the 19th April. Mr. Williamson, the Deputy Commissioner, knew nothing about the Martial Law. He did not want it, and when he received a telegram announcing Martial Law, he questioned whether it could be Gujrat, in the Punjab, at all. He thought it must be Gujrat, in the Bombay Presidency. But he was mistaken, and Gujarat, which had done nothing to deserve it, was handed over to the military, and remained under their sway till Martial Law was done away with in June.

In Gujrat, there are two factions, in one of which local officials seem to be involved. The other is headed by Seth Chirag Din, a prominent citizen, and, till recently, an Honorary Magistrate and Municipal Commissioner. The official faction, therefore, appears to have determined upon breaking up their opponents. And Mr. Har Gopal, a Barrister of Gujrat, and others were arrested and detained in custody for a long time. They were tried by the Martial Law Tribunal and honourably acquitted; the judges remarking that the officials who had given evidence on behalf of the prosecution had perjured themselves. Lala Ram Chand Tandon, who had assisted the authorities during the War, and who holds Government sanads for various acts, was also harassed. Respectable pleaders and others had their houses searched without the slightest cause.

Seth Chirag Din himself was dispossessed of his magistracy and commissionership. He holds several sanads from the Viceroy downwards. He holds a Kaisar-i-Hind medal. He was responsible for singly supplying 200 recruits. We invite attention to our selection of the Gujrat statements. Mr. Har Gopal applied for permission to prosecute the officials concerned for perjury, but the permission has not been granted.

All the other hardships, referred to in the other districts, were the lot of the residents of Gujrat also. It may be stated that there has been no political life in Gujrat. It does not boast of even a District Congress Committee.

A punitive police has been imposed upon Gujrat without any justification whatsoever. A tax of Rs. 42,000 has been fixed, and is to be exacted in six instalments. The first instalment has already been collected; strange as it may appear, one-fourth of it has been exacted from Lala Ram Chand Tandon and one-fourth from some pleaders. We consider that the incidence of the tax is as inequitable as the tax
JALALPUR JATTAN

This is a small village in the Gujrat district, about eight miles from Gujrat. It is an important weaving centre.

There was no hartal here on the 6th April. On the 15th, however, what may be termed a sympathetic hartal took place. There was no damage done by the crowd. A procession was formed, in which all participated. A telegraph wire was cut by someone during the night of the 15th or 16th.

Apparently, for this offence, Martial Law was duly proclaimed. Arrests of respectable people followed. Seventeen were arrested in all. One was discharged without being brought up before the court. The others were produced before the Martial Law Commission. Of these, ten were discharged and the remaining six were sentenced to a variety of terms of imprisonment.

Schoolboys, including little children, had to attend the Thana three times a day during Martial Law.

An indemnity of Rs. 12,000 has been imposed on this village without any justification. One-sixth of it has already been collected.

MALAKWAL

Malakwal, an important railway junction, is reached from Lala Musa which is on the main line, and which is over ten miles from Gujrat. It has a population of 3,000. At Malakwal, on the 17th April, some men, probably railway labourers, had torn down rail, thus endangering the lives of passengers. A train was, as a matter of fact, derailed, but happily no damage was done.

Martial Law was proclaimed in due course and there was a repetition of the usual things. On enquiry we found that over forty arrests were made, including young students and about twenty of the railway clerical staff. Of these, eight were acquitted, and over fifteen released without ever being brought to trial, though they were detained for a long time in custody. Respectable men were compelled to pull pankhas for the officers. They were also called upon to clean streets and do other sanitary work. School-children were compelled to appear three times a day to salute the Union Jack.

The railway clerical staff was dismissed, although acquitted. Some of these were servants, who had an unbroken record of over thirty year’s service.

We have now reviewed, in the briefest manner possible, the events of April last in the five districts, in which Martial Law was proclaimed, viz, Amritsar, Lahore, Gujranwala, Lyallpur and Gujrat. In spite of our desire to do full justice to the tragedy in the Punjab, for it was nothing less, we have been unable to do so. It is not possible for us to condense into the compass of a brief review the story of persecution, corruption and disregard of human feelings that is revealed in the evidence we are presenting to the public. We have endeavoured to hold the scales evenly. We have endeavoured to make every allowance for the exceptional circumstances in which the officers suddenly found themselves placed. Yet, we have come to the conclusion that the measures taken by the authorities to suppress what have been termed disorders were far in excess of the requirements.

What was the nature of the disorders, and how did they arise? These disorders consisted in incendiaryism in isolated places; murders of innocent Europeans; cutting of telegraph wires; burning, in an indifferent manner, of one or two small bridges; and derailment in one or two places. It is admitted that they were not universal, that the armed population remained unaffected, took no part, directly or indirectly, in the disorders; that the vast masses of the peasantry took no part in violence; that the population, even according to the official testimony, alleged to have been concerned in the disorders, was only 414 lacs out of 2 crores, the total population of the Punjab. According to the evidence in our possession, the only places where violence did take place were Amritsar, Kasur, Gujranwala, Wazirabad, Nizamabad, Hafizabad, Moman, Dhaban Singh, Chuharkana, Khem Karn, Patti and Malakwal, containing a population of about 214 lacs. But it has to be remembered that of this population of 214 lacs, it is clear from the evidence both before us and the Hunter Committee and that obtainable from the records of the several trials, that only a very small fraction could have taken an actual part in the alleged disorders. The European lives lost were four. We cannot too strongly condemn this action of the mob.

But how did a people, generally peaceful, find it in them to burn public property and commit murders? We have attempted to give the answer. Sir Michael O'Dwyer put an undue strain upon the proverbial patience of the people. By his vilification of the educated classes, by his methods of recruiting and collecting the War Loan and other funds, by his suppression of the public Press, he had caused immense irritation among the people. His utterly unjustifiable deportation of Mr. Gandhi and Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal lighted the material he had made inflammable. Being defeated in his attempt to prevent the peaceful demonstration of the 6th April against the Rowlatt legislation, he thought he would make one supreme effort to crush the spirit of the people, struggling to find a free and disciplined expression. He mistook this healthy plant for a poisonous weed to be rooted out by every means; and he resorted to the madness of the deportations just mentioned. It would still perhaps have been well if he had issued peremptory orders to his subordinates not to be free with their rifles. But it was impossible for him to be temperate and furious at the same time. The unwise firing at Amritsar strained the temper of the people to the breaking point. The crowd became mad, and, in its fury, committed arson, murder and pillage, and spent its fury in three hours. The other places, mentioned by us, caught the infection from and copied Amritsar, we are, however, thankful to be able to say, without any further destruction of life except at Kasur.

Was this a state of rebellion or waging of war? Was this a state beyond the power of the civil authority, taking assistance, if necessary, from the military to cope with? Was it a state necessitating supersession of law? We have answered the question in dealing with each place separately, and the cumulative effect of the whole examination strengthens the conclusion that, so far as the published evidence before the Hunter Committee and the evidence in our possession shows, there was no necessity whatsoever for the promulgation of Martial Law. The secret evidence led before Lord Hunter’s Committee will have to be extraordinarily clear and overwhelming to establish a case for Martial Law.

The theory of rebellion or war completely broke down before the Hunter Committee. There was no proof of organization outside the Punjab and behind the so-called conspiracy. On the contrary, Col. O’Brien—one of Sir Michael’s trusted lieutenants—had to admit that he had no evidence to support the theory of rebellion, that it was mere guess-work and that his arrest of the leaders of Gujranwala, too, was based on mere table-talk. He admitted that he had nothing to connect the leaders directly with violence, but that he wanted to hold them responsible if there was any violence at all in Gujranwala. The other witnesses fared no better. They only betrayed their own incapacity for assessing the values of acts and events.
The fact is it was necessary for Sir Michael’s theory that the Rowlatt agitation was mischievous, to establish a widespread conspiracy. The wish was father to the thought, and he saw, and he made others see that in every speech of the leaders there was sedition, in every hartal a conspiracy, and in every Hindu-Mohammedan fraternization a menace to British rule. No wonder the conspiracy theory broke down.

And if Martial Law was unjustified, much more so was its prolongation for nearly two months. The measures taken under it were such as to disgrace any government, calling itself civilized. Its inauguration was heralded by the massacre of the innocents of Jallianwala Bagh. The tone of frightfulness set up by General Dyer was approved by Sir Michael O’Dwyer during the two dark months that followed. If our figures are correct, and we hold them to be so, nearly 1,200 lives were lost, at least 3,600 men wounded, and some permanently disabled. The vengeance taken was out of all proportion to the wrong done by the people—wrong moreover, which was initiated under grave provocation. The slow torture administered to the survivors during the Martial Law period, we have sufficiently described. We can only hope that the revelations presented by us will make a repetition of the atrocities impossible.

CHAPTER VI

CONCLUSION

We have now dealt with the five districts in which Martial Law was proclaimed. We have dealt with Sir M. O’Dwyer’s regime, and we have endeavoured to examine the Rowlatt Act and the satyagraha movement.

We desire to state that we have endeavoured to keep ourselves to the facts before us, and not based our conclusions on anything outside the evidence, printed separately, supplemented by the evidence given before Lord Hunter’s Committee and the record of the Martial Law Tribunals.

We have been obliged in places to use strong language, but we have used every adjective with due deliberation. If anything, we have understated the case against the Punjab Government. We recognize that we have no right to exact an impossible standard of correctness from the Government. In times of excitement and difficulty, any officer is prone to make mistakes, in spite of the best intentions in the world. We recognize, too, that when the country is on the eve of important changes introduced in the administration, and the Sovereign has made an appeal to the officials and the people for co-operation we should say nothing that may be calculated to retard the progress.

But we feel that it is not possible to ignore acts of atrocious injustice on a wholesale scale by responsible officers, as it would not be possible, no matter how bright the future might be, to ignore the criminal acts of the people. In our opinion, it is more necessary now than ever before that the official wrong should be purged as well as the people’s. The task of working the Reforms and making India realize her goal in the quickest time possible would be well-nigh impossible if both the people and the officials did not approach it with clean hands and clean minds. If, therefore, we recommend that officials who have erred should be brought to justice, we do so not in a vindictive spirit, but in order that the administration of the country may become purified of corruption and injustice. Whilst, therefore, we believe that the mob excesses in Amritsar and elsewhere were wrong and deserving of condemnation, we are equally sure that the popular misdeeds have been more than punished by the action of the authorities.

We believe that had Mr. Gandhi not been arrested whilst he was on his way to Delhi and the Punjab, and had Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal not been arrested and deported, innocent English lives would have been saved, and valuable property, including Christian churches, not destroyed. These two acts of the Punjab Government were uncalled for, and served like matches applied to material rendered inflammable by previous processes.

In examining, in detail, the events in the different districts of the Punjab, we have refrained from saying anything regarding the Government of India. It is impossible, however, to ignore or slur over the inaction, if not the active participation, of the Central Government in the official action. His Excellency the Viceroy never took the trouble of examining the people’s case. He ignored telegrams and letters from individuals and public bodies. He endorsed the action of the Punjab Government without inquiry. He clothed the officials with indemnity in indecent haste. He never went to the Punjab to make personal inquiry, even after the occurrences. He ought to have known, at least in May, everything that the various official witnesses have admitted, and yet he failed to inform the public or the Imperial Government of the full nature of the Jallianwala Bagh massacre, or the subsequent acts done under Martial Law. He became a party to preventing even a noble and well-known English Christian of unimpeachable veracity in the person of Mr. C. F. Andrews from proceeding to the Punjab, whilst he was on his way, not to inflame passions, but simply to find out the truth. He allowed Mr. Thompson, the Chief Secretary to the Punjab Government, to indulge in distortion of facts and insult the Hon’ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, whose statements, made in the Council, have almost all been now proved to be true out of the mouths of the official witnesses themselves. He expressed such a callous indifference to popular feelings and betrayed such criminal want of imagination, that he would not postpone the death sentences pronounced by the Martial Law Tribunals, except after he was forced to do so by the Secretary of State for India. He seems to have closed his heart against further light by shutting out questions by a responsible member of the Council like the Hon’ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya. He would not visit the Punjab for local inquiry. We refrain from criticizing his attitude over the Rowlatt agitation. But a sense of public safety forbids us to ignore His Excellency’s inability to appreciate and deal with the situation in April. Whilst, therefore, we do not think His Excellency was wilfully neglectful of the interests of those who were entrusted to his charge by His Majesty, we regret to say that His Excellency Lord Chelmsford proved himself incapable of holding the high office to which he was called, and we are of opinion that His Excellency should be recalled.

We summarize below our other conclusions:

1. The people of the Punjab were incensed against Sir M. O’Dwyer’s administration by reason of his studied contempt and distrust of the educated classes and by reason of the cruel and compulsory methods, adopted during the War, for obtaining recruits and monetary contributions and by his suppression of public opinion by gagging the local Press and shutting out nationalist newspapers from outside the Punjab.

2. The Rowlatt agitation disturbed the public mind and shook public confidence in the goodwill of the Government. This was

\[2\] Imperial Legislative Council shared by the Punjab in a fuller measure perhaps than elsewhere, because of the use made by Sir M. O’Dwyer of the Defence of India Act for purposes of stifling public movements.

3. The satyagraha movement, and the hartal which was designed as a precursor of it, whilst they vitalized the whole country into activity, saved it from more awful and more wide-spread calamities, by restraining the violent tendencies and passions of the people.

4. The Rowlatt agitation was not conceived in an anti-British spirit, and the satyagraha movement was conceived and conducted in a spirit entirely free from ill will and violence.

5. There was no conspiracy to overthrow the Government in the Punjab.

6. The arrest and internment of Mr. Gandhi, and the arrests and deportations of Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal were unjustifiable, and were the only direct cause of hysterical popular excitement.

7. The mob violence which began at Amritsar was directly due to the firing at the railway over-bridge, and the sight of the dead and wounded at a time when the excitement had reached white heat.

8. Whatever the cause of provocation, the mob excesses are deeply to be regretted and condemned.

9. So far as the facts are publicly known, no reasonable cause has been shown to justify the introduction of Martial Law.

10. In each case, Martial Law was proclaimed after order had been completely restored.

11. Even if it be held that the introduction of Martial Law was a State necessity, it was unduly prolonged.

12. Most of the measures taken under Martial Law, in all the five districts, were unnecessary, cruel, oppressive and in utter disregard of the feelings of the people affected by them.

13. In Lahore, Akalgarh, Ramnagar, Gujrat, Jalalpur Jattan, Lyallpur and Sheikhpura, there were no mob excesses at all worthy of the name.

14. The Jallianwala Bagh massacre was a calculated piece of inhumanity towards utterly innocent and unarmed men, including children, and unparalleled for its ferocity in the history of modern British administration.

15. The Martial Law Tribunals and the Summary Courts were made the means of harassing innocent people, and resulted in abortion of justice on a wide scale, and under the name of justice caused moral and material sufferings to hundreds of men and women.
16. The crawling order and other fancy punishments were unworthy of a civilized administration, and were symptomatic of the moral degradation of their inventors.

17. The imposition of indemnity and of punitive police at various places, notwithstanding exemplary and vindictive punishments meted out, through nearly two long months, mostly to innocent men, and the exaction of fines and illegal impositions were an uncalled for; unjust, and added injury.

18. The corruption and bribery that took place during Martial Law form a separate chapter of grievance, which could have been easily avoided under a sympathetic administration.

19. The measures necessary for redressing the wrong done to the people, for the purification of the administration and for preventing a repetition in future of official lawlessness are:

(a) Repeal of the Rowlatt Act.
(b) Relieving Sir M. O'Dwyer of any responsible office under the Crown.
(c) Relieving General Dyer, Col. Johnson, Col. O’Brien, Mr. Bosworth Smith, Rai Sahib Sri Ram Sud and Malik Sahib Khan, of any position of responsibility under the Crown.
(d) Local inquiry into corrupt practices of the minor officials, whose names have been mentioned in the statements published by us, and their dismissal on proof of their guilt.
(e) Recall of His Excellency the Viceroy.
(f) Refund of the fines collected from people who were convicted by the Special Tribunals and Summary Courts; remission of all indemnity imposed on the cities affected; refund thereof where it has already been collected; and removal of punitive police.

It is our deliberate opinion that Sir M. O'Dwyer, General Dyer, Col. Johnson, Col. O’Brien, Mr. Bosworth Smith, Rai Sahib Sri Ram Sud and Malik Sahib Khan have been guilty of such illegalities that they deserve to be impeached but we purposely refrain from advising any such course, because we believe that India can only gain by waiving the right. Future purity will be sufficiently guaranteed by the dismissal of the officials concerned.

We believe that Col. MacRae and Capt. Doveton have failed equally with Col. O'Brien and others the carry out their trust, but we have purposely refrained from advising any public action against them, as, unlike the others mentioned by us, these two officers were inexperienced and their brutality was not so studied and calculated as that of the experienced officers.

2. LETTER TO ESTHER FAERING

[DELHI]

Thursday [March 25,]† 1920

MY DEAR CHILD,

My heart and my prayers are with you. Your letter grieves me beyond words. That you should suffer so much pain! But true joy will come to the godly. And as my faith in your godliness is unshakable, I have a certain belief that you will have a peace full of joy.

You will certainly see Mr. Menon² if you think that you should. I am anxious for you to get an early boat.³ The voyage will give you the solitude you need and your home and your father the comfort and the companiship you will want.

If you have not returned Mr. Banker's trunk, please do not send it by parcel. It may be returned on your coming back to Bombay. There is absolutely no hurry.

With love,

Yours,

BAPU

BOMBAY,

[March 25, 1920]¹

REVERED SISTER,

I have just arrived from Delhi and am leaving for Sinhgarh tonight. The resolutions you have sent seem all right. I shall arrange to send in my speech². I hope you have kept copies of the resolutions. You must have got the letter written from the train. Show the resolutions to the Committee of the Mill Owners’ Association if it is necessary. If they want to announce them let them do so, but it is not necessary.

I have already written to you that the Poet should be put up with Bhai³. I must have mentioned this to Bhai. Did I write to you that he is going to be in Gujarat for a week?⁴

I do not yet know if Bhai Shankerlal is here or not. It is necessary to keep myself informed about your health also. Saraladevi is with me. I will certainly try and bring her with me.

Blessings from

[SINHGADH,]⁴

March 27, 1920

MY DEAR RAZMIA.

I have already written to Dr. Ansari about the Khilafat question. But I feel that I should write to you also. My talk with Hasrat Mohani has left me much disturbed. According to him nobody believes in non-co-operation. But it has been taken up merely to conciliate me. Now in a matter so important as this there should be no question of conciliation and I would not have anything simply for my conciliation. Moreover non-co-operation to be successful has got to be taken up most enthusiastically by all, and no great cause has ever

² Although this letter was written on Gandhiji’s personal letter-paper bearing his Sabarmati address, it must, in fact, have been written from Sinhgadh where he had arrived on March 26.

I would therefore like you to discuss this with Hakimji\textsuperscript{1} and let me know on his own behalf as also yours as to what is the real situation. There is no doubt in my mind that if this difficult Khilafat question is to be settled satisfactorily the Mussulmans of India will not only have to know their own mind but they must be prepared for sacrifices beyond measure. If there is no spirit of sacrifice at least they should get rid of a man like myself. I can secure no diplomatic triumph. I can only guide along the difficult, narrow and thorny path of self-sacrifice allied to absolute truth. Where these are absent I should feel like a square man [sic] in a round hole. I suggested to Hasrat Mohani that the principal leaders who want to do active service should meet me in Bombay between the 6th and the 13th April, and we could have a quiet chat, not for once only but often during the Satyagraha Week.

MY DEAR HENRY,

You will not I hope consider that I have been less attentive to you than I should be because of the very great irregularity in my correspondence. The fact is I have no time. I simply write when and where I must.

Your latest letter fills me with sorrow. I do not know how far you did right in writing as you have done to Babu Surendranath. You know him better perhaps than I do. I shall therefore say nothing more about it. I do not know that I should agree with you in your categorical description of Mr. Samarth.\textsuperscript{2} He is a man with strong views. I would even call him dense. But holding strong views myself I too run the risk of having that adjective applied to me. So I remain satisfied by simply saying that Mr. Samarth's ways are not my ways.

And that attitude of detachment always leaves me free to try to win him over to my side. Lately, that is, during my five years’ stay in India, I have found the truth of the position abundantly illustrated. If we get enraged against a person, we render ourselves more or less unfit to serve him.

Now for the Khilafat. I do not mind your differing from me so violently as you do. You accuse me of narrowness because of my being cooped up in India and not knowing anything of the new life in Europe. I can only say that the new life in Europe appears to me to be abhorrent for its total disregard of sanctity of promises and of its idolatrous worship of brute force and money. Being in the thick of it, you are unable to feel the foul stench that modern Europe is filling the world with. I who stand outside it know what it means. But here again I will not argue with you. I certainly feel sorry that I cannot have your co-operation on this very important question and if I could but see you face to face I would certainly endeavour to convert you to my view.

On the British Guiana Scheme, we are at one. There is no danger of my falling into the trap. On South Africa, Fiji and all colonial affairs we agree. We have, therefore sufficient in common to work upon.

Andrews returns here on the 2nd April. East Africa for me seems to be the storm centre because the issues have not yet become crystallized. I hope therefore you will concentrate upon East Africa.

Did I acknowledge the two books from Millie? I am ashamed to say that I have not read them. I have no time. Please tell me something about Maud, Sally, Ceilia. And let me know how my bed-fellow Waldo and Leon are doing.

I am dictating this at Sinhgarh where I have come for four day’s solitude. Dr. Mehta, Mahadev, his wife and others whom you do not know are with me. Mrs. Saraladevi Chaudhuri, your one-time hostess in Lahore, is also with me.

With love to you all,

Yours,

BHAV

RABINDRANATH TAGORE’S VISIT

Information has been received that Sir Rabindranath Tagore, the poet, is to spend a week in Gujarat. We shall profit best from his presence if we give him peace and learn from him the things we should. He does not like too many functions. He keeps indifferent health. Perfect silence is essential at the meetings which he is to attend. He dislikes people shouting. We believe that, if we bear these restrictions in mind, he will be able to visit Surat and Broach. How can we honour him best? By helping his enterprise financially. He is deeply attached to his Santiniketan Ashram and the School it runs. The Ashram was founded by his father and the School by himself. He meets the expenses for these from donations received. He has used his own money, too, for these enterprises of his. When he toured Madras last year, he received donations for Santiniketan from every place that he visited. We think it will create an excellent impression if something like that happens in Gujarat too. We hope this will be borne in mind at every place he visits.

8. LETTER TO M. R. JAYAKAR

Sunday [March 28, 1920]

DEAR MR. JAYAKAR,

I enclose herewith a draft cable in connection with our Report. I need not say anything further as I hope to meet you on Tuesday. I would like you to consider the advisability of your going to England alone to support our Report. I am totally against a spectacular display in the shape of sending a big deputation. It will hamper swift movement and concentration and it can only irritate the authorities. I want to be absolutely frank. I conside that I am the fittest to go, but my going is a virtual impossibility. You come next in my view; because you are a student like me and we want a man of application and studious habits and possessing a level head. Whether you can spare yourself or not is another question. The only possible men who can do effective work, besides us two, are Malaviyaji and Motilalji and Mr. Das. I have not considered the relative merits, because I myself feel that Malaviyaji cannot be spared from India. I know that Motilalji ought not to be, unless certain things happen and Mr. Das has a heavy case to which, I understand, he is tied down for three months. I have gone into this matter somewhat fully, because we may not get time during my short stay in Bombay for an exhaustive discussion.

Yours sincerely,

9. MEANING OF "BANDHU"

[Before March 30, 1920]

I had praised Shrimati Sarladevi's article, "Bandhu," appearing in the issue of 29th February and asked the readers to read it several times over. Thereupon, some of them wrote to me to say that they had gone through the article and reflected over it but had failed to make out its meaning. They have requested me to explain the meaning myself. I could not reply immediately, being busy with my numerous activities. Now that I have some peace in Sinhgadh, I have read the article three times and give here the meaning as I understand it.

The first part of the article was written several years ago when she was living in Bolpur. I saw her in her disconsolate state when her husband was in jail. I saw that nothing would give her peace. The consolation which a friend could give in such circumstances, I tried to, but I could see that this brought no peace to her mind. She was suffering, I saw, as a woman separated from her husband does. When I spoke about the release of prisoners, trying to guess when one could expect them to be out, I found that I could engage her attention. It was while she was in this frame of mind that I once requested her to write something for Navajivan or Young India. She hesitated, putting me off with the remark: “Ideas will just not come.” One day she observed: “Long ago I wrote something which, in Bengali, would be considered good. If you agree, I will complete it, and you may have it translated if you wish. I should have the right to send the Bengali to some other journal.” I agreed. ‘One does not look a gift-horse in the mouth’ is a saying in English. Moreover, my aim was to see that she had something to occupy her.

It is easy to explain the meaning now. There is a saying among us that “Time is invincible.” Time has also been described as an enemy. This same Time takes for us the form of a bandhu when we are not plunged in the grief of separation or lost in the midst of pleasures, and gives us peace. This was the peace which was Sarladevi’s when she lived in the woods. And so, Time, like a bandhu, tells us at early dawn: “Now be seated here and dive deep into your mind for a while.” And again, when we have done our duty for the hour, is it any wonder that the Time-bird should smile at us with a face lit up with joy?

In the afternoon, no doubt, drowsiness comes upon us but the Brother Time cautions us to look outside, to observe the fields there and see that they are quiet, but not asleep. “What aspirations and hopes, what music and beauty shine through!” By thus overcoming laziness, we have had the peace of the noon too. And now comes twilight. Tired? Well, the Bird says: “Enough! Now sit quietly in one spot and do nothing.” What else is there to do? For one who goes over the day’s work with a tranquil mind at twilight and thanks God for a day well spent, what else is there to do at that hour? Passing the day thus, Sarladevi found that Time was a bandhu.

Here starts the second part. Who is to live in the house—she or the furniture? “We have left the woods and come to a city. Cupboards all around and tables and chairs.” “A little bit of sky framed” in a small window—this is all that remained as a visible symbol of the Formless. “I must visit so-and-so, or invite so-and-so. The servant has left today; the order day also a servant left.” Time passes on, without stopping, and every day something remains unfinished. Daily there are new worries. In such a state of mind, Time is an enemy—it is not peace. And so Sarladevi asks, doubtfully, whether Time is always a bandhu or one only when the heart is ready to receive him as such. “As we can have no real contact with a bandhu unless we make the mind free, so this bandhu perhaps does not like coming to us in the midst of all this uncontrolled rushing about for material things?” Of course, he does not. Happiness comes only where there is self-control. Lack of self-control is a sign that one is not at peace with oneself.

And therefore the writer asks: “Who is this gentleman whom one can approach only if one shakes off gentlemanliness? Is it the perfection inside me? One who is perfect inside needs no external bandhu to complete that perfection.” If at all one does, the author proceeds to show what kind of a bandhu he must be.

Time being no longer ours, whom should we seek? Pondering over this, she remembered the Bhagavad Gita. She discovered in it the Ancient Being of beings, the Supreme Ruler. Only in Rama can the weak find strength. When there is no living creature to console one in separation and lighten the grief, the grief-stricken one calls on Rama. So long as the elephant could struggle against the crocodile, he did not remember God;1 but, when his lordship was exhausted, he began to call on the servant of servants. Hence Sarladevi says: “I who used to roar, I will humbly surrender myself in love to the charioteer2 bandhu, friend of Arjuna and yet none else but God. I will not approach Him like Duryodhana exhibiting my strength. I will lay my strength aside and then go to Him, receive His grace and have supreme peace. As in the body so in the universe; as with me, so with all of you; as in my affliction my God was my staff, so may He be to all of you. Searching for that God, I have to look inwards to scan the heavens there and, as I do so, I realize that I am my own friend and I am also my own foe. If I would realize the Universal Self, I must first realize the self in me. Thus “The self is its own bandhu.”” 3

ON THE TRAIN,

March 30, 1920

MY DEAR CHILD,

I have just received your letter for which I thanked God. I am from a resting place going to the Ashram. After leaving Delhi, I have not been able to write to you. I had four days' good rest. I hope to go back after the 13th April. When are you going to Denmark?

11. THE SATYAGRAHA WEEK

First and foremost in the programme for the holy National Week I put fasting and prayer. I have said enough to emphasize the necessity of both these for the unfoldment of our national life.

I speak of these from personal experience. But, writing to a friend on this very matter of prayer, I came across a beautiful thing from Tennyson which I present to the readers of Young India, if perchance I might convert them to a definite belief in the efficacy of prayer. Here is the gem:

. . . More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let they voice Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If, knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer
Both for themselves and those who call them friend?
For so the whole round earth is every way
Bound by gold chains about the feet of God.

Throughout my wanderings in India, I have had the privilege of mixing with men of all creeds, of mixing with thousands of women, hundreds upon hundreds of students. I have discussed with them national problems with a passion which I am unable to describe. I

1 On March 25, 1920
2 Gandhiji could go back to Sinhgadh only on April 29.
have found that we have not yet reached a conscious recognition of our national state. We have not had the discipline necessary for a realization of that state and I venture to say that there is nothing so powerful as fasting and prayer that would give us the requisite discipline, spirit of self-sacrifice, humility and resoluteness of will without which there can be no real progress. I hope therefore that millions throughout India will open the Satyagraha Week with sincere fasting and prayer.

I do not wish, during this week, to emphasize the civil resistance part of satyagraha. I would like us to contemplate truth and nonviolece, and to appreciate their invincibility. Indeed, if all of us regulate our lives by this eternal law of satya and ahimsa, there will be no occasion for civil or other resistance. Civil resistance comes into play when only a small body of men endeavour to follow truth in the face of opposition. It is difficult to know what is truth, when to defend it to the point of civil resistance and how to avoid error in the shape of violence in one's pursuit after truth. There may well be differences of opinion as to the advisability of preaching civil resistance as a creed during a week devoted to national uplift, in which one seeks the cooperation of all without distinction of party, class or creed.

Beyond the prayer and fasting on the 6th and the 13th we have the collection for the Jallianwala Bagh Memorial.¹ I trust that complete organization would be set up in every province, in every district, and every town or village.

The third part of the activity is represented by three meetings during the week all over India at the stated times, whereat I have suggested the passing of certain resolutions, viz., on the Rowlatt Act which gave rise to the satyagraha movement, the Khilafat question which by Hindu association cements Hindu-Muslim unity, and what may be called the Jallianwala Bagh resolution, to be passed on the 13th April, calling upon the Government to take such measures as may be necessary to prevent a repetition of the tragedies that were witnessed during Martial Law regime and which were opened even before the inauguration of Martial Law by the unlawful massacre of the 13th. I suggest the following resolutions for acceptance:

¹Vide “The 6th of April and the 13th”, 10-3-1920.
FOR THE 6TH APRIL

1. This meeting of the citizens of . . . hereby places on record its emphatic opinion that there will be no peace in the land until the Rowlatt Act is repealed and therefore appeals to the Government of India to introduce at the earliest opportunity a bill repealing that Act.

FOR THE 9TH APRIL

2. This meeting of Hindus, Mohammedans and others, the inhabitants of . . ., trusts that the Khilafat question will be solved consistently with the just demands of the Mussulmans of India and with the solemn pledges of His Majesty’s ministers and this meeting records its opinion that in the event of adverse decision being arrived at, it will be the duty of every Indian to withdraw co-operation from the Government until the pledges are fulfilled and Mussulman sentiment conciliated.

FOR THE 13TH APRIL

3. This meeting of the inhabitants of . . . is of opinion that whilst mob excesses at Amritsar, although committed after grave provocation, were worthy of condemnation, the deliberate and calculated massacre, without warning, by General Dyer, of innocent, unarmed and otherwise defenceless men to Jallianwala Bagh was an unexampled act of barbarity and hopes that the Government of India and the Imperial Government will take such steps as will render impossible a repetition of such barbarity and other similar barbarities committed by responsible officers in the Punjab during the period of Martial Law administration and hopes that recommendations made by the Punjab Sub-committee of the Indian National Congress will be carried out in their entirety.

12. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

CHI. MATHURADAS,

Although a translation of the Punjab report is carried by Gujarati, it will be better to have a translation of our own.

Send six copies of the report and of the evidence to Vamanrao, the headman. He will pay for the same. Send him the bill. I am finding much peace here. So I spend all the time writing letters. You must have got back your harmonium from Revashankarbhai.

Blessings from

13. SPEECH AT GUJARATI SAHITYA PARISHAD

AHMEDABAD,
April 2, 1920

Let us consider what kind of literature should be produced if we are to educate the masses. The poet gave us today the right point of view on this. He was shrewd in taking the example of Calcutta. He saw that things are the same in Ahmedabad as in Calcutta and his verbal attacks were entirely for our benefit. Sydney Smith was skilled in the art of satire. By using the pronoun “we”, he tried to soften the blow; but our poet has used the pronoun “we” to mean his own people. We should see, however, that his attack is against us. Describing Calcutta,

1 As noted by the addressee

5 Rabindranath Tagore who had spoken earlier at the Conference. “The search after gold must be subservient to the search after God” was his message.
he says that the banks of the sacred Ganga are covered with huge buildings and this has turned what should be a beautiful scene of nature into an eyesore. Such a spot should fill us with thoughts of nature. Instead, when he thinks of Calcutta, his eyes fill with tears.

According to me, a labourer that I am, our duty is to realize God. Forgetting that, we have given ourselves to the worship of money and the pursuit of self-interest.

I ask writers: “Will you, through your creations, bring me sooner to God?” If their reply is in the affirmative, I will be a slave to their works. If the work of any writer bores me, it is not my dullness that is to blame but his art itself. A gifted writer should so perfect his art that the reader would be simply absorbed in his work. I am sorry that our literature has little of this kind of thing. There is nothing the masses can learn from the literature of today. There is not one idea in this literature in virtue of which it may endure for a week, or a year or a whole age.

Let us, then, see what literature we possess in the holy books we have had with us from ancient times. The satisfaction they give we don't derive from our modern literature. Even a barely passable translation of any of those works is more interesting to read than anything of the latter. There is much indeed, some will say, in contemporary literature. That may be, but it is an exhausting task to search for that “much”. Whoever gives us today anything like what Tulsidas and Kabir1 gave?

Live as you may,
Realize God anyhow, anyway.

We never see these days anything of this kind. Where do we find now what we received in the age of Akhar2?

I returned to India after twenty years in South Africa and, looking round, I discovered that we lived in a state of fear. A people in such a state cannot express itself fearlessly. If we have to write under the weight of suppression, the springs of poetry in us will not flow nor will truth come floating on the wave. The same is true about newspapers. With the Press Act hanging over him, the editor cannot write uninhibitedly. With the same Act hanging over the writers, not a single line is written in freedom and hence it is that truth is not

1 A fourteenth-century poet and saint who had Hindu as well as Muslim followers
2 A Gujarati poet of the seventeenth century presented as it ought to be.

This is a period of transition in India. Crores of people feel that great changes are about to take place, that our poverty will give place to glory, that now the Age of Truth will dawn upon us. I hear these hopes expressed wherever I go. Large numbers of people think that India is about to turn a new leaf. If it does, what sort of writing shall we find on that new leaf? The Reforms which will have been granted will only prove to be a collar and we shall continue to be driven like bullocks, as we are driven today. At such a time, I ask the servants of literature nothing less than that they help us to a vision of God and Truth. They must demonstrate that India is not given to sinful ways, that she will not betray one's faith [in her].

No Indian in Madras has served South India so well as did Pope¹—not the Pope of the Iliad fame. I am ever in love with human beings and would, therefore, always want to steal people's hearts. In order that I might steal the hearts of my brothers of the South, I had to learn their language. I cannot just now quote anything from the writings of the Rev. Pope, but this I will tell you that the poems, or rather the poetry, in Tamil which even the peasant can enjoy as he waters his field is just superb. The watering of the field begins even before the sun has risen. Bajri and wheat, everything is covered with pearly dew. The liquid drops on the tree leaves shine like pearls. This is what the men, these peasants, as they water the fields sing about. When I lived at Kochrab², I used to watch the peasants and listen to their songs. I found obscene words in their mouth. Why should this be so? I should like to have an answer to this from Shri Narasinhrao³ here and from the Chairman⁴.

I say to the Sahitya Parishad that, unless you help remove the filthy language from the mouths of our peasants, the sin of our degradation will be on your heads. I want to know from the servants of literature what the condition of the majority of our people is and what they will write for this majority. I will say only this to the Sahitya Parishad and repeat it over and over again: rid yourselves of all your shortcomings.

Lewis' thought of writing a book and wrote one for his children. They read it to their profit; men, women and children today may also read it and profit by it. I ask for such literature from our men of letters. I want, not Banabhatta's Kadambhari but Tulsidas's Ramayana. I have my doubts whether Kadambari will be with us for ever, but Tulsidas's work will certainly endure. Let us at present get just rotli,\(^3\) ghee and milk from our literature. Later on we shall add almonds, pistachio nuts, etc., and produce something like Kadambari.

If the meek people of Gujarati—a people filled with sweetness, whose goodness is without bounds, a people so very simple-minded and having unswerving faith in God—if these people are to go forward, their men of letters should sing and write for labourers and peasants in the fields.

It is my heartfelt prayer that people may learn to write the truth, speak the truth and live the truth.

14. LETTER TO “THE TIMES OF INDIA”

LABURNUM ROAD,
GAMDEVI,
BOMBAY,
April 3, 1920

SIR,

I submit for adoption the following three resolutions\(^4\) during the Satyagraha Week, i.e., for the 6th, 9th and 13th. I take it that there will be no two opinions about the first and the third resolutions. But I have heard criticism about the Caliphate resolution. I suggest that without the non-co-operation clause the Caliphate resolution will be inane. The country requires some definite action. And nothing can be better for the country than non-co-operation as some definite action. The forces of violence cannot be checked otherwise.

15. APPEAL FOR JALLIANWALA BAGH MEMORIAL FUND

BOMBAY,
April 6, 1920

I trust that Bombay will respond in its own generous manner to the Punjab Memorial. It is a national monument. I have said repeatedly that it is in no sense anti-British. We should be unfit to call ourselves a nation if we did not treasure the memory of those innocent men who fell on the fateful 13th of April, 1919. I hope that Englishmen will see their way to subscribe to the Memorial. Their cooperation will be a demonstration of the non-racial character of the Memorial. Moreover, it stands independent of any finding, adverse or otherwise, of the Hunter Committee. It has been officially admitted that the men killed were innocent. Nothing that the Hunter Committee may find can possibly free India from the obligation to nationalize the plot in which innocent blood flowed in such profusion and to erect on it a national memorial that shall preserve the memory of the dead and shall yet be free from any poison or hatred.

16. SPEECH AT NATIONAL WEEK MEETING, BOMBAY

April 6, 1920

In connection with the National Week, a public meeting of the citizens of Bombay was held under the joint auspices of the Presidency Association, the Provincial Congress Committee, the Bombay branches of the Home Rule League, and the National Union, at the open space near the French Bridge, Bombay, yesterday. Among those present, besides the President, were Mr. M. K. Gandhi, Mrs. Annie Besant, Mr. M.A. Jinnah, . . .

. . . the Hon’ble Sir Dinsah M. Petit was elected to the chair. . .

The following is an authentic summary of Mr. Gandhi's speech . . . in seconding the resolution moved by the Hon’ble V. J. Patel urging the repeal of the Rowlatt Act.

Mr. Gandhi said he hoped that at least during the Satyagraha Week, if not for

1 Released as a letter to the Press always, the meetings would be conducted on the same principles as they were done during the satyagraha campaign. The principles were that there should be no signs or sounds of approval or disapproval of the speakers’ remarks but that they should be listened to in perfect silence and with respect. Mr. Gandhi felt that if this rule was observed the audience would be able to follow clearly the views that might be expounded by the various speakers. He called this the Satyagraha Week but he hoped that no one in the audience would be frightened by the word. He fully realized his responsibility as he knew that he was addressing a meeting called under the auspices of the Bombay Presidency Association which was a non-satyagraha body. He spoke about the Satyagraha Week without hesitation because he was neither emphasizing nor offering civil resistance for acceptance. He wanted to emphasize the necessity for truthfulness in speech and in deed and of non-violence in their relentless pursuit of Truth. Mr. Patel who had preceded him had said that resolutions were of no use. He agreed with Mr. Patel to a certain extent. But there were resolutions and resolutions. Theirs was not a resolution of despair but of confidence. It was not so much addressed to Government as it was a prayer addressed to the Almighty. He as a believer in fasting and praying made bold to say that if they had Truth on their side and a prayerful heart combined with determination to sacrifice themselves they could not but achieve success. Their resolution was moreover an invitation to Government to do their duty. The Congress had offered co-operation on the Reforms in so far as that co-operation spelt national uplift. It was an act of nobility on the part of the Congress when it offered co-operation in spite of the Rowlatt Act remaining on the statute-book as a weapon that could be used by Government at any moment to repress the people or their activities. The resolution was an invitation to Government to respond to that nobility by removing the Rowlatt Act even before the Reformed Assembly met. Mr. Patel had also pointed out the difficulty of carrying a repealing measure in the event of Government not repealing the Rowlatt Act before the Reformed Assembly met. He very properly urged that the Viceroy had merely to certify that a particular measure would endanger the peace of the land to stop its progress. But he (Mr. Gandhi) felt that there were other ways of combating any such untoward result if the Government failed in its duty. He had no doubt about the Act being repealed during the first session of the Reformed Assembly. But even if that new Assembly failed to do its duty he assured the meeting that so long as there was a handful of satyagrahis left alive, there would be no peace in the land until that Act was repealed before its statutory period.

Therefore he seconded the resolution, not in despair but in all confidence, and recommended it to the audience as a token of the fixed resolve of the people of India to secure the repeal of that obnoxious measure which had cost such suffering for so many people.

17. THE PUNJAB SENTENCES

The Commissioners appointed by the Congress Punjab Sub-committee have in their report accused His Excellency the Viceroy of criminal want of imagination. His Excellency’s refusal to commute two death sentences out of five is a fine illustration of the accusation. The rejection of the appeal\(^1\) by the Privy Council no more proves the guilt of the condemned than their innocence could have been proved by quashing the proceedings before the Martial Law Tribunal. Moreover, these cases clearly come under the Royal Proclamation\(^2\) in accordance with its interpretation by the Punjab Government. The murders in Amritsar were not due to any private quarrel between the murderers and their victims. The offence, grave though it was, was purely political and committed under excitement. More than full reparation has been taken for the murders and arson. In the circumstances common sense dictates reduction of the death sentences. The popular belief favours the view that the condemned men are innocent and have not had a fair trial. The execution has been so long delayed that hanging at this stage would give a rude shock to Indian society. Any Viceroy with imagination would have at once announced commutation of the death sentences—not so Lord Chelmsford. In his estimation, evidently, the demands of justice will not be satisfied if at least some of the condemned men are not hanged. Public feeling with him counts for nothing. We shall still hope that either the Viceroy or Mr. Montagu will commute the death sentences.

But if the Government will grievously err, if they carry out the sentences, the people will equally err if they give way to anger or grief over the hanging if it has unfortunately to take place. Before we become a nation possessing an effective voice in the councils of nations, we must be prepared to contemplate with equanimity, not a thousand murders of innocent men and women but many thousands before we attain a status in the world that shall not be surpassed by any nation. We hope therefore that all concerned will take rather than lose heart and treat hanging as an ordinary affair of life.

(Since the above was in type, we have received the cruel news. At last H. E. the Viceroy has mercilessly given the rude shock to Indian society. It is now for the latter to take heart in spite of the unkindest cut.—Editor, \textit{Young India}.)

18. SIR RABINDRANATH TAGORE

The visit of the greatest poet of the age to Gujarat is no small event. And Gujarat has honoured itself by extending to the poet a royal welcome in its capital. The deep reverence shown by the people must have touched the Poet's heart. His address to the Sahitya Parishad is a prose poem. It breathes the loftiest sentiments. Every line of it is proof of the religious spirit pervading his effort. It is worthy of the Poet and the occasion. His reference to Calcutta as the product of modern civilization is a fine token of his innate courtesy and humility. He had to speak the truth in Ahmedabad with its commercialism and its sixty odd mills. He had to tell Ahmedabad that the search after gold must be subservient to the search after God. He performed his task with consummate skill by describing the condition of Calcutta. We hope that the people of Gujarat will take to heart the Poet's message. That would be its best appreciation.

19. LETTER TO DEVDAS GANDHI

BOMBAY,

[April 8, 1920]

CHI. DEVDAS,

I got all your letters. I look forward to more of them. For the present, keep writing to me regularly. I am always waiting to hear how things are going on there.

Take care of your health above everything else. Studies follow health. Development of the self comes between the two. This self, of course, will shed its light on both, health and studies. He who has

1 The draft of the article in Gandhiji's hand is available at the Gandhi Smarak Nidhi. The opening sentence in the draft reads: “It is no small event—the visit of the greatest poet of the age to Gujarat.”

3 Delivered on April 2.
4 The date is mentioned in a note to Devdas Gandhi which Sarladevi Chowdhari wrote on this letter.

known the atman has known everything. Even the preservation of our health is to this end, and study too. This statement, however, may mean nothing or everything. If we do our work, looking upon everything as the means to the sole end of knowing the atman, we come to know it. We have to have faith till we do so. To put the same thing in the language of the Gita, we should go on doing our duty with no desire for the fruit. Millions of labourers work to dig a mine, in order to find one diamond. For many years they need to have faith that there is a diamond deep down. When at last they get it, it is not as if it had dropped there just then. It was always there. The same is true about the atman and knowledge of the atman. But why write all this to you? Whether or not you are aware of it, you have the vision of the atman all the time. Writing about your health and studies, I was led to all this. I placed studies below preservation of health. Should we also regard knowledge of the atman as taking second place to the body? In trying to answer this, we should see that we are always gaining knowledge of the atman. The effort does not cease during illness. If there is anything you do not understand, ask me.

Saraladevi is by my side. Pandit Rambhuj Dutt is expected tomorrow.

Mahadev left for Hajira today. Durga has also gone with him. From there he will proceed to Sinhgadh and reach the place by about the 21st. Nothing is certain about me.

20. SPEECH AT NATIONAL WEEK MEETING, BOMBAY

April 9, 1920

In connection with the National Week, a public meeting of the citizens of Bombay was held under the auspices of the Central Khilafat Committee of India, on the open space near the French Bridge, Bombay, last night. Mr. Mia Mahomed Haji Jan Mohamed Chhotani presided. . .

1 Self
2 Wife of Mahadev Desai
3 Gandhiji reached Sinhgadh on April 29.
4 A nationalist Muslim leader of Bombay
5 The report in The Times of India, 10-4-1920 adds that the proceedings were in vernacular.
Mr. M. K. Gandhi moved the following resolution:

This meeting of the Hindus, Mohammedans and others, the inhabitants of Bombay, trusts that the Khilafat question will be solved consistently with the just demand of the Mohammedans of India and with the solemn pledges of His Majesty's Ministers and this meeting records its opinion that in the event of adverse decision being arrived at, it will be the duty of every Indian to withdraw co-operation from the Government until the pledges are fulfilled and Muslim sentiment conciliated.

Mr. Gandhi said they had met there that night not exclusively in connection with the question of the Khilafat, but rather to look back on what had happened in India during the last twelve months. The two events that stood out most prominent among others were the inauguration of swadeshi and the laying of the foundation of genuine Hindu-Muslim unity. The first was started in April and the latter became an accomplished fact when Hindu and Muslim blood mingled together in Jallianwala Bagh. Since then, that unity had gone on increasing. He appealed to the Hindus to sympathize with and support their Mohammedan brethren in the Khilafat question and thus cement that unity for good. Muslim hearts were sore, as they had never before been sore, over the threatened dismemberment of the Turkish Empire and over the question of Khilafat. If the Hindus failed to sympathize with the Mohammedans on the present occasion the great opportunity of cementing the unity would go, never perhaps to recur.

Proceeding, Mr. Gandhi said he had never blindly supported a cause and would never so support one. He asked them to support the Mohammedans because he felt that the Muslim cause was just. He had read the report of what happened at the interview1 between the Prime Minister and the Khilafat Deputation, and he found there was no demand urged by the Deputation that was not just. Now what they naturally expected in the Prime Minister of the British Empire was that he should adhere to the solemn promises he had made whilst the War was on, regarding the Turkish question. What the Muslims of India wanted was that the status quo ante bellum should be maintained as far as possible regarding Turkey. They desired, among other things, that Constantinople and Turkey-in-Europe should remain in Turkish hands, and that there should be Turkish suzerainty over the Jazirat-ul-Arab.2 As to those parts of Turkey which had a majority of non-Muslim population, the European powers might ask for whatever guarantees they liked from Turkey for the protection of the non-Muslim races provided those guarantees were not prejudicial to the position of the Sultan. If the Arabs, who were Muslims, wanted self-government they might have it but there should be the suzerainty of the Sultan over them. When they in India asked

21. TWO LETTERS

I have received two thought-provoking letters. One of them is by a well-educated, pure-minded sister. The second is from an English friend, a prominent Christian gentlemen of England. The sister writes:

These remarks are evidence of the purity of the sister’s heart. She is perfectly right in saying that it is a great sin to disfigure or tear out the King’s picture. If children learn such discourtesy and rudeness in their tender age, they will never grow fit to serve the people. A little reflection will be enough to show that in insulting the Emperor we but insult ourselves and, trying to throw dust at the sun, we only throw it in our own eyes. We may not like the British administration, but the Emperor is not responsible for it. He does not even know what happens in his Empire. It is not his duty, he does not have the means, to keep himself so informed. How is he to blame, then? Even if the blame is his, how will he be better by our tearing out his picture? The important thing, however, is that unworthy thoughts should not make their appearance in children’s minds at all. They should be innocent. The mind should be innocent for the entire period of one’s student life. Attachments and aversions should have no place in that period. Even if, however, we cannot attain such a high state, we may certainly keep ourselves free from rudeness, discourtesy and thoughtlessness. I don’t think Navajivan is read by many children. I would therefore urge the parents to ask the children to read this article and see that they correct their wrong habit. Teachers also can do this.

The second point in the letter of this sister is about the people’s bad habit of using foul words. The habit is so widespread that I think it will be difficult to remedy it. I have tried to do my bit to correct this bad habit, but I must admit that it was with the utmost difficulty that I could do so among my clients and others I am in contact with. It is an almost incurable disease. I remember what my clients often told me, that such words dropped out of their mouth without their meaning to use them. However difficult the task, we must succeed in it. It does not even require our arguing with people, nor is it a matter on which people have strong feelings. It is only a matter of getting rid of a bad habit of long standing, so long indeed that the people cannot even see anything wrong in it. Many of the readers of Navajivan will feel that this article cannot be for them; for they never use foul words. If however, they pay attention to the language they employ, they will discover that even they use the word salo'. We must constitute ourselves censors to keep watch over one another and, noting offensive words in the language, make a deliberate effort to get rid of them. If every time we hear a person using some bad word we politely request him to refrain from doing so, some improvement can be brought about. Even school-children have this habit; we acquire it right from our childhood. Improvement can easily be effected in schools through the teachers and, if the school-going boys can command courage, they can rid their own homes of this unclean habit.

The letter from the English friend I shall take up next week.

22. LETTER TO "THE BOMBAY CHRONICLE"

BOMBAY,
April 11, 1920

SIR,

Bombay has responded generously and yet not generously enough, to the call of duty from the Punjab. At the time of writing, it has subscribed nearly three lacs to the Jallianwala Bagh Memorial fund. Is it too much to expect Bombay to pay five lacs and the whole presidency with such trade centres as Ahmedabad and Karachi to subscribe the minimum ten lacs?

It is to be hoped that there will be no hesitation on the part of any-one to subscribe to a fund whose object is not to perpetuate the memory of the atrocity but of the innocent victims. I am told that the deed was so horrible that the memory of the dead could not fail to revive the memory of the deed and that therefore the whole episode should be forgotten. This is like saying that the innocents should not be thought of in our prayers because of the likelihood of our thinking of Herod. I suggest that the objectors have in their most laudable desire not to perpetuate hatred made the mistake of supposing that hatred can be eradicated by forgetting causes there of. Hatred can be done away with only by an enlightened training and that in spite of the remembrance of the deed. The nation will not forgive the deed if it cannot find harmless scope for perpetuating the memory of the victims. The best way of checking hatred, therefore, is to teach the nation to isolate the memory of the dead, which is a sacred trust, from the"frightfulness" which should be forgiven even if it cannot be forgotten.

What will be the nature of the memorial is the question asked. It will depend upon the committee which has been specially appointed for the purpose and which includes the Hon’ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, the Hon’ble Pandit Motilal Nehru, Swami Shraddhanandji and myself. And I do know that whatever the shape that the memorial finally takes, it will certainly not contain anything offensive.

I hope, therefore, during the two days that the collection will continue, those who have not yet paid will not fail to take their share in this National Memorial. And it will be truly national and the Bagh will be a place of pilgrimage only if young and old, men and women, rich and poor give their quota.

Yours, etc.,

24. SPEECH AT NATIONAL WEEK MEETING, BOMBAY

April 13, 1920

In connection with the National Week, a public meeting under the auspices of the Bombay Branch of the Home Rule League, and the National Union, was held on the open space near the French Bridge, Bombay, last night. Mr. M. A. Jinnah presiding.

Mr. M. K. Gandhi moved the following resolution:

This meeting of the citizens of Bombay is of opinion that whilst mob excesses at Amritsar, although committed after grave provocation, were worthy of condemnation, the deliberate and calculated massacre without warning by General Dyer of innocent, unarmed and otherwise defenceless men at Jallianwala Bagh was an unexampled act of barbarity and hopes that the Government of India and the Imperial Government will take such steps as to render impossible a repetition of such barbarity and other similar barbarities committed by responsible officers in the Punjab during the period of the Martial Law administration and hopes that recommendations made by the Punjab Sub-committee of the Indian National Congress will be carried out in their entirety.

Mr. Gandhi said they had heard Dr. Tagore’s message, and he could say that the acts of barbarity perpetrated by some officials in the Punjab could not have been condemned in more scathing terms than those used by the great poet. He entirely agreed with the Chairman that the acts committed by General Dyer were unworthy of a soldier and were such as would befit only a coward. Proceeding, Mr. Gandhi said they asked Government to adopt such measures as would render impossible a repetition of the barbarities committed in the Punjab, and to adopt in their entirety the recommendations made by the Sub-committee of the Congress. The main recommendation with which they were concerned was that under no circumstances in future should Sir Michael O’Dwyer and General Dyer be given responsible positions either in India or in any other part of the British Empire. It was their minimum demand that these officials should be displaced. They admitted that some people in the Punjab committed bad deeds which deserved to be condemned but the deeds perpetrated by some Government officials were worse still. They could never forget what happened at the Jallianwala Bagh. They could never forget the memory of the innocent people who died there. He was glad that the people of Bombay had contributed Rs. 3,25,000 to the memorial, though he must say he felt a little bit disappointed that it was not quite what he had expected from Bombay. Continuing, Mr. Gandhi said they could not forget, till life lasted, the memory of the Jallianwala Bagh victims. He entertained no thoughts of vengeance, because vengeance was the resort of the coward. But they could never forget the memory of the dead. All that they intended in erecting the memorial was to reverence the memory of the innocent dead. Malice never entered into their thoughts.

25. LETTER TO ESTHER FAERING

SABARMATI,

MY DEAR CHILD,

I have just returned from Bombay. I passed the fasting and prayer week\(^1\) at Bombay. It is true I have not written to you but that does not mean that I have thought any the less of you or prayed for you less lovingly. I had no time and I felt I had sent you enough verses to last you for some time. I should send more if I knew your condition of mind. And so I allowed a few days to pass by without committing myself to writing.

But now I have your precious letter. I am quite resigned to your marriage. I will not argue against it. You will do exactly as God guides you. Only always be sure it is the voice of God.

Yes, I should certainly love to see Mr. Menon. That you are willing to give yourself to him is proof enough to me that he is no ordinary young man.

There is no certainty about my going to London. It is mere talk

26. LETTER TO DEVDAS GANDHI

ASHRAM,

Chaitra Vad 11 [April 15, 1920]

CHI. DEVDAS,

I arrived in the Ashram today, Thursday. I completed the two-day fast in Bombay.¹ I got the letter which you wrote after your return from Patna.

Sarladevi and Panditji² are in Bombay. They will arrive here on the 19th, leaving Bombay for Godhra on the 16th.

I saw a good deal of the poet³ in Bombay, too. I also had him once for dinner at Revashankerbhai’s⁴.

The collection⁵ in Bombay should be considered good, though of course it fell below my expectations.

Aunt⁶ and Nirmala are both here. Mahadev and Durga have left for their village.

Balkrishna and Prabhudas are in Sinhgadh. Govindbabu is kept in Bombay for swadeshi work.

Have you now settled down to a routine? Mr. Andrews reports

¹ The events mentioned the test relate to 1920. In that year, Thursday fell on April 15, Chaitra Vad 12. The figure “11” seems to be a slip for “12”.
² Gandhiji was in Bombay from April 6 to April 13, 1920.

So I end today’s letter to you with news in general.

I have your letter. It will not do if both of you fall ill there. Get lost in the scenery there: sing, play and improve your health. I will soon reach there if I do not go to England. Mahadevbhai too will come. No one knows about Saraladevi. I expect her to arrive on the 22nd or 23rd.

often they do it unknowingly. I am glad to know that you get the medicines over there. There should be no cause of worry if you remain vigilant and take proper care of yourself. Despite this, if death comes, why worry? Until you realize that the finer elements are your body and do not come out of the physical, you will have found a new body for yourself [sic]. This is simply an idea. Other people also console like this. All religions regard death as a welcome help. Therefore, nothing stops us from consciously contemplating death as Socrates did.

I hope you have not taken sannyasa from public life as was reported.

Kindly remember me to Mrs. Haque. Tell her I often see Mr. Hydari in Bombay. Is she engaged in some public work?

30. LETTER TO ABBAS TAYABJI

THE ASHRAM,
April 17 [1920]

MY DEAR FRIEND,

Will you forgive me for not writing to you all these long days? Not a day has passed but I have longed to write to you a love letter. But the pressure of work has prevented me from so doing. I pleaded with Sarladevi to write to you on my behalf but she said nothing but a letter in my own writing would do. And so the weary days have gone on. I hope however that you received my message through Rehana. What a wonderful girl she is. Indeed the Tagores and the Tayabjis are the rarities for India and they are her friends. And it is my good fortune that I tumble upon them wherever I go. But I am not going to be satisfied until I get the girlies and Mrs. Abbas to do some spinning for me. You will blame me I know. Well, you can easily remedy the evil by sending one of the girls here to learn the art. If, however, that is impossible I must send you a teacher from here. Please tell me what you will have me to do.

And now for your health. Rehana told me that you still kept indifferent health. You worry too much. I should burrrr away all worry and trust myself and the world to God. We are less than ants in the scheme of the universe. All therefore that is given to us to do is to try our best without attaching ourselves to results. And this applies as much to indisposition of the body as of the Punjab. In the one case you consult a doctor and sing; in the other you write a conscientious report and sing till you receive further orders. And now love to you all. A big post awaits me.

“Cheer boys, cheer; no more of idle sorrow” is a hymn I learnt as a schoolboy. It abides with me today.

Yours sincerely,
M. K. GANDHI

3 This was a peculiar form of greeting used by the addressee and Gandhiji whenever they met.
31. THE KHILAFAT

I commented last week on a letter from a learned sister. I also referred in that article to a letter from an English friend. He writes to this effect: “I am surprised that you take interest in the Khilafat issue. I helped you on the South Africa question. I believed you to be a well-wisher of the British and to be a wise and honest man. But now you want to unite the Hindus and the Muslims against the British, taking the side of Turkey. I have lived in Armenia and know what oppression the [Turkish] Muslims have practised. I doubt your bona fides but, before hearing from you that what I see in newspapers is correct, I shall form no conclusions against you.” The letter from the learned sister was prompted by love and so she did not doubt my bona fides. In the letter from the English friend, despite the friendly tone, my bona fides is in doubt. Both, of course, question whether my efforts will have happy results. They are not the only ones to have this doubt. Other friends have felt the same way.

I think it is impossible, when resisting injustice, wholly to prevent ill will against the wrongdoer. There is no doubt either, that a man who cherishes hatred harms himself through it. No one is perfect, of course, and, therefore, the man who cherishes hatred deserves our compassion, for he wishes the world to forgive him his errors but, refusing to forgive the world its errors, he has rendered himself unworthy of being forgiven. However, having long been given to anger and hatred, we cannot keep away these enemies even if we wish.

What then should we do? Should we refrain from opposing injustice, lest someone should oppose the wrongdoer? This is what happens among relations and friends. We want the mistakes of our relatives to be buried. In my view, if hatred is harmful so is misplaced love. There will be no harm done if mistakes by our relations are also exposed; there may be some good, on the contrary. The first step towards undoing a wrong is to recognize it as such and feel ashamed of it. It cannot be recognized fully if it is covered up and the person who has done the wrong abandons all shame, grows defiant and sinks ever deeper in the pit of error. Just as, in the case of a boil on the body, there is nothing for it but to cut it open, so also there is no way but to bring a mistake to light.

Neither of the two letters above suggests that injustice may not be resisted. It is with the method of resistance that they quarrel. In my method, resistance to injustice is taken to the length of parting company with the wrongdoer, be he one’s father, if he does not change. If we do not, we become a party to the injustice. It is my personal experience that even if resistance to injustice is taken to the point of leaving the wrongdoer, it does not detract a bit from one’s love for him. Injustice is a great wrong. It is a test of one’s love whether one can love a friend despite his error. There is no great merit in returning good for good. As we learn from Shamal Bhatt, the enlightened man is one who returns good for evil. The Gita teaches us to look alike on friend and foe.

There is, thus, only one royal road before us. We should think long and much before deciding that a particular act is unjust or wrong. We should not be too ready to come to conclusions against any man who may appear to have acted unjustly. But, judge the matter how carefully we will, if we find that a wrong has been done we should fight it to the end. At the same time, if we discover that we were in error in believing that a wrong had been done, we should be ready to admit our error that very moment and apologize for it.

This method which I am demonstrating before India and in the cause of which I engage my friends, is a new experiment. It may have shortcomings; I see some. I never lay claim to perfection. But it is my conviction that this is the only right path. India can save herself along that path alone.

I am convinced that on the Khilafat issue the Muslims are in the right. The moment I see their error I will stop helping them. I do not say that they are free from hatred but I am sure that, joining my love with their hatred, I can diminish the intensity of that hatred. I also believe that, if my method is followed by a large number, their hatred can be counteracted altogether. Those who are full of hatred will in any case fight injustice, and exercise no restraint in doing so. The man who is free from hatred has also no choice but to fight. The wrongdoer, of course, is full of hatred. His victim, when he acts, acts in hatred. The only question is what the man without hatred should do. The answer to this is not always easy to find. A man grows through moral dilemmas. One rises only by falling again and again. Our duty is to remain alert, lest we make a mistake. To do nothing because of such fear is cowardice. Despite, therefore, the danger of our making mistakes, wherever we find injustice we should resist it with love and thus deserve success [in our effort]—this, in my humble view, is the way taught by the Gita.

In Champaran,\(^1\) in Kaira\(^2\) and in the agitation against the Rowlatt Act,\(^3\) fighting injustice passionately I failed to check hatred altogether but I could help to a greater or less extent in ending the injustice and succeeded in giving the people a glimpse of the sun of satyagraha. I could not reveal its full glory because my tapascharya\(^4\) and my knowledge, I find, are much too imperfect. I am a friend of the British. My conscience bears witness that I wish no ill to the millowners. And so I keep to my path, with my mind ever at peace.

\textbf{32. NOTES}

\textbf{SATYAGRAHA WEEK}

The occasion passed off peacefully. I should like volunteers in every village in Gujarat and Kathiawar to send to \textit{Navajivan} a brief account of the celebrations. They should also mention in the report the amount of collections\(^5\) at each place and say what has been done with them. The collection in Bombay may be said to be good, though it has not reached the figure of five lakhs. However, what is important to know is not the amount received but the spirit in which the contributions were offered. Anyone who knows this is bound to be entirely satisfied. If the rich offered big sums, the poorest among the poor also contributed their mite. Women gave on their own account and also persuaded others to give. The Gujarati Stri Mandal\(^6\) played a fine part in this. With Shrimati Sarladevi in the chair, they passed strongly-but properly-worded resolutions. \textit{Dheds}\(^7\) and \textit{Bhangis}\(^8\) also offered what little they could within their means. Everyone, moreover, paid cheerfully. We can safely assert that there was no occasion to press anyone to pay or shame anyone into doing so. I also observed, through my talks on this subject with hundreds of men and women who went round for collections, that there must have been hardly any people who had paid with the idea of perpetuating hatred and ill will. Most of them had only one thought in their mind, to perpetuate the memory of the innocent people who had been killed. Many also felt that by converting the Jallianwala Bagh into national property and raising a memorial column in it we would succeed in further cementing Hindu-Muslim unity which was strengthened on April 13, 1919. What Sir Rabindranath Tagore has said is perfectly true, that we shall certainly not advance by keeping alive the memory of General Dyer’s cruelty. To perpetuate the memory of truth, firmness, courage and innocence, wherever these may be found—that is the people’s real duty and in doing so lies the nation’s regeneration.

35. SPEECH AT MEETING OF MILL-HANDS, AHMEDABAD

April 18, 1920

This is the second anniversary of the peaceful triumph of justice. I call it a victory both for the mill-owners and the mill-hands. I call this a victory of justice because the demand of the mill-hands was just and the means adopted by them to secure acceptance were pure. I should not wish victory for the mill-hands by unjust means.

Last year Swami Shraddhanandji graced the last anniversary by his presence. Between then and now many things have happened and they have altered materially the state of India. A new spirit fires us, a new atmosphere pervades Indian society. But I do not propose to detain you on the general position in our country.

It would however ill become me to call myself your friend—and I pride myself in being considered a fellow-labourer—if I omitted all mention of the part that the mill-hands played in the events of the April of last year. During that month I was arrested at the instance of Government. There is no doubt that it was a serious blunder. But could the mill-hands undo the mischief by incendiarism and bloodshed? You are deeply attached to Anasuyabehn. She is worthy of your adoration. You heard a rumour to the effect that she was arrested; you were staggered; you were indignant. You felt that you were like birds with clipped wings. All this does credit to your love for her. But I would again ask: Is incendiaryism a fit expression of your love for her? Nor may we escape responsibility by pleading that others too were concerned in the misdeeds. It is impossible for me to describe to you in adequate language the deep grief both she and I felt when we heard of the happenings in Ahmedabad. I can see nothing but catastrophe for India from methods of violence. Workmen would be committing suicide and India would have to suffer indescribable misery if working men were to vent their anger by criminal disobedience of the laws of the land. I do wish that you would not be misled into acts of violence because sometimes you see that violence seemingly answers the purpose for which it is intended.

When I began to preach satyagraha and civil disobedience it was never meant to cover criminal disobedience. My experience teaches me that truth can never be propagated by doing violence. Those who believe in the justice of their cause have need to possess boundless patience and those alone are fit to offer civil disobedience who are above committing criminal disobedience or doing violence. A man cannot commit both civil and criminal disobedience at the same time even as he cannot be both temperate and furious at the same time and just as self-restraint is acquired only after one has been able to master his passions, so is the capacity for civil disobedience acquired after one has disciplined oneself in complete and voluntary obedience of the laws of the land. Again, just as he alone can be said to be proof against temptations who having been exposed to them has succeeded in resisting them, so may we be said to have conquered anger when having sufficient cause for it we have succeeded in controlling ourselves. We failed last year in this test. It is my earnest prayer to you all that on this auspicious day you will recall the mistakes of April last and make a fine determination never to repeat them.

I shall now say a few words about the condition in general of the mill-hands, of which they need to know a great deal. We cannot become rich by merely getting more wages; nor is becoming wealthy the all in all. Anasuyabai has not dedicated her life to you merely for the purpose of securing for you better wages. Her object in doing so is that you may get enough to make you happy, to make you truly religious, that you may observe the eternal laws of ethics, that you may give up bad habits such as drink, gambling, etc., that you may make good use of your earnings, that you may keep your houses clean and that you may educate your children.

Your economic condition has improved. There is room for yet more improvement. It can take place in two ways by consultation with the mill-owners or by using undue pressure. The first is the only true remedy. In the West an eternal conflict has set up between capital and labour. Each party considers the other as its natural enemy. That spirit seems to have entered India also, and if it finds a permanent lodgment, it would be the end of our industry and of our peace. If both the parties were to realize that each is dependent upon the other, there will be little cause for quarrel.

I do not propose to examine the duty of the capitalist. If the labourer alone were to understand his rights and responsibilities and confine himself to the purest means, both must gain. But two things are needful—both the demands and the means adopted to enforce them must be just and clear. It is an unlawful demand which seeks merely to take advantage of the capitalists' position. But it is an altogether lawful demand when the labourer asks for enough wages to enable him to maintain himself and to educate his children decently. To seek justice without resorting to violence and by an appeal to the good sense of the capitalist by arbitration is lawful means.

In order then to achieve the end you must have unions. A beginning has already been made. I trust that the mill-hands in every department will form their unions and everyone should [sic] scrupulously observe the rules that may be formed for them. You will then approach the mill-owners through your unions and if the decisions of the former do not satisfy you, you will appeal to arbitration. It is a matter of satisfaction that both parties have accepted the principle of arbitration. I hope that that principle will be fully developed and that strikes will for ever become an impossibility. I know that strikes are an inherent right of the working men for the purpose of securing justice, but they must be considered a crime immediately the capitalists accept the principle of arbitration. Ways are improving and there is every possibility of a continuous improvement. But there is equal need for reducing hours of labour. The mill-hands seem to be working twelve hours or more. Those who have to work so many hours per day can have no time left for mental or moral betterment. Their condition therefore must be reduced to that of the beast. It is our duty to escape the peril and yet in every step we take we must guard ourselves against damaging our industries.

The mill-owners tell me that the mill-hands are lazy, they do not give full time to their work and they are inattentive. I for one cannot expect attention and application from those who are called upon to work twelve hours per day. But I would certainly hope that when the hours are reduced to ten the labourers will put in better and almost the same amount of work as in twelve hours. Reduction in hours of labour has brought about happy results in England. When mill-hands learn to identify themselves with the interest of the mill-owners they will rise and with them will rise the industries of our country. I would therefore urge the mill-owners to reduce the hours of labour to ten and urge the mill-hands to give as much work in ten as they have been doing in twelve.

It is now time to examine the use we should make of the increasing wages and the hours saved. It would be like going out of the frying-pan into the fire to use the increase in wages in the grogshop and the hours saved in the gambling den. The money received, it is clear, should be devoted to education of our children, and the time saved to our education. In both these matters the mill-owners can render much assistance. They can open cheap restaurants for working men where they can get pure milk and wholesome refreshments. They can open reading-rooms and provide harmless amusements and games for them. Provided such healthy surroundings, the craving for drink and gambling will leave them. The unions also should attempt similar things. They will be better employed in devising means of improvement from within than in fighting the capitalists.

It is a sign of national degradation when little children are removed from schools and are employed in earning wages. No nation worthy of the name can possibly afford so to misuse her children. At least up to the age of sixteen they must be kept in schools. Similarly women also must be gradually weaned from mill-labour. If man and woman are partners in life and complementary, each of the other, they become good householders only by dividing their labour, and a wise mother finds her time fully occupied in looking after her household and children. But where both husband and wife have to labour for mere maintenance the nation must become degraded. It is like a bankrupt living on his capital.

And just as it is necessary for the labourers to develop their minds by receiving education and to educate their children so it is necessary to develop the moral faculty in them. Development of the moral faculty means that of the religious sense. The world does not quarrel with those who have a true faith in God and who understand the true nature of religion. And if it does such men turn away the wrath of their adversaries by their gentleness. Religion here does not mean merely offering one’s namaz or going to the temple. But it means knowledge of one’s self and knowledge of God, and just as a person does not become a weaver unless he knows the art of weaving so does he fail to know himself unless he complies with certain rules. Chief amongst these are three that are of universal observance. The first is observance of truth. He who does not know what it is to speak the truth is, like a false coin, valueless. The second is not to injure others. He who injures others, is jealous of others, is not fit to live in the world. For the world is at war with him and he has to live in perpetual fear of the world. We all are bound by the tie of love. There is in everything a centripetal force without which nothing could have existed. Scientists tell us that without the presence of the cohesive force amongst the atoms that comprise this globe of ours it would crumble to pieces and we would cease to exist, and even as there is cohesive force in blind matter so much must there be in all things animate and the name for that cohesive force among animate beings is Love. We notice it between father and son, between brother and sister, friend and friend. But we have to learn to use that force among all that lives, and in the use of it consists our knowledge of God. Where there is love there is life; hatred leads to destruction. I hope that Anasuyabehn will help you to learn this great law of love and I ask you, if you recognize her love towards you, to reciprocate it by feeling in your own persons that same love towards the whole of humanity. The third rule is that we have to conquer our passions. It is called brahmacharya in Sanskrit. I do not use it here merely in its accepted narrow sense. He is not a brahmachari, who, although he may be a celibate or may be living a chaste life as a married man, otherwise gives himself up to a variety of indulgences. He alone is capable of knowing himself who brings under complete subjection all his passions. He who exercises self-restraint in its widest sense is also a brahmachari—a man of faith, a true Hindu or a true Mohammedan.

It is a breach of brahmacharya to hear questionable language or obscene songs. It is licentiousness of the tongue to utter foul abuse instead of reciting the name of God, and so with the other senses. He alone can be considered the true man who having subjected his passions becomes perfectly self-restrained. We are like a rider who cannot keep his horse under control and is quickly brought down. But one who drawing in the reins keeps the animal under subjection stands a fair chance of reaching his destination. Even so does a man who can control his passions make for the goal. He alone is fit for swaraj. He alone is a seeker after truth. He alone becomes capable of knowing God. It is my earnest wish that you will not reject these remarks as if they were copy-book maxims. I ask you to believe that we shall never go forward until we have learnt the value of observing these truths. What I have told you is a fragment of my own experiences. My service of you is due simply to my love for you and I partake of your sorrows because I hope thereby to justify myself before my Maker. What though your wages were quadrupled and you had to work only a quarter of the time you are doing now if, not withstanding, you did not know the value of true speech, if the rakshasa in you injured others and gave the reins to your passions. We must have more wages, we must have less work because we want clean houses, clean bodies, clean minds and a clean soul, and we strive for better wages and less work in the belief that both are essential for this fourfold cleanliness. But if that be not the object to be achieved, it would be a sin to attempt and get better wages and reduce the hours of labour. May God grant you Anasuyabai the power to achieve the end.

37. LETTER TO MAHADIDEV DESAI

[Before April 20, 1920]

BHAISHRI MAHADIDEV.

I got your letter. Whether or no I get time, just as eating gives me pleasure so do some letters and, therefore, as I find time for eating, so do I for such letters.

I shall arrive in Bombay on the 20th. You may stay on there up to the 21st if absolutely necessary and come to Bombay on the 22nd. I hope that even if we have to go, it will not be before the 1st of May. We shall decide about the clothes when we are in Bombay. Fatima’s wedding is fixed for the 26th and I must be back at . . . for the occasion. At the time, you may stay here if you wish to, or in Bombay if you prefer, or, if we do not go to England, in Sinhgadh—Balkrishna and Prabhudas feel restless in Sinhgadh.

BOMBAY,
Tuesday [April 20, 1920]

CHI. BALKRISHNA AND PRABHUDAS,

On reaching Bombay today, I received your letter. Whether or not we should go to England will be decided today. I expect that it will be cancelled and then hope to be certainly there. Fatima’s wedding is on the 26th. It seems I will be able to come only after the wedding is over. Both of you should just enjoy yourselves. In case I go to England, I will call you here to meet me. COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION

We have absurdities enough in India in communal representation being demanded by other small groups because the principle has been conceded in the case of Mohammedans. But when the cry for communal representation comes from Indians in Burma, the absurdity becomes criminal. We understand some Indians of Rangoon have pleaded for communal representation in the Burmese Council to be formed under the Reforms. We do hope that the demand will be withdrawn before mischief is done. The Burman will have every right to resent any such separate treatment of Indian settlers there. We are in Burma as guests of the Burmese for their and our mutual good, not for the exploitation of the former. Their welfare should be our first consideration. As a friend correctly points out, the Indian demand would be like Gujaratis or Marwaris claiming communal representation for themselves in the Bengal Council. Surely, Indians of Burma would have a right to enter the Burmese Council, only if they by force of ability and service can command the Burmese vote. We, who desire that nobody should set up claims in India which are against our interests, are bound to guard against desiring rights in Burma in conflict with the interests of the Burmans. And yet that is precisely what lies at the bottom of this demand for communal representation by Indian settlers. We, therefore, trust that wiser counsels will prevail and that we shall hear no more of communal representation for Indians in Burma.

MR. HORNIMAN’S DEPORTATION

26th April will be the anniversary of Mr. Horniman’s deportation. During the interval the public have shown in various ways their strong disapproval of the summary order of the Bombay Government. Apart from Mr. Horniman’s qualification, deportations without trial of any British subject must be a matter of great concern to any order-loving citizen. We must make it impossible in India for any British subject to be deported or have his liberty otherwise restricted without due trial except under circumstances in which every government must have the power of suspending the operation of the ordinary rules of law. And we must make it clear that no circumstances are proved to have existed for Mr. Horniman’s deportation. We hope therefore that the whole of the Presidency will ask at public meeting in every village that Mr. Horniman’s deportation should be cancelled without delay.

JALLIANWALA BAGH MEMORIAL

The National Week has been a striking success if Bombay is any index of the rest of the country. The three meetings were entirely successful. The Government know the opinion of the country on the Rowlatt Act, the Khilafat question and the Punjab tragedy. It is difficult to know to what extent fasting and prayer were undertaken. But there is no doubt that a respectable number went through the discipline in a proper religious spirit. But the most effective demonstration of the success of the national observance was the response made to the Jallianwala Bagh Memorial. The list published daily shows the liberality of the donors and its catholicity. But the public know little of the spontaneous help rendered by the fair sex and by those who have not hitherto been touched by the national spirit. A band of ladies went through personal canvassing with most encouraging results. Even Dheds and Bhangis collected subscriptions for the Memorial. Lists have been coming in from far and near. Contributions have come in from far-off Champaran. It is hoped that those who have received the amounts will send their contributions to Lala Girdhari Lal at Amritsar without delay. They should remember that the day for the payment of the balance of the purchase price is near.

42. SWADESHI

The National Week closed on Tuesday the 13th. It was in every way a remarkable demonstration of Hindu-Muslim unity, the determination to secure repeal of the Rowlatt Act and the satyagraha spirit. The speeches delivered were sober and more to the point than before. There was no disorderliness at any of the meetings of which we have received reports.

What however about swadeshi? Was swadeshi too not a product of the satyagraha spirit and activity? It undoubtedly was. But swadeshi work is the most constructive of all. It does not lend itself to speeches so much as to solid action. It is not possible to save fifty crores of rupees annually by speeches or demonstrations. It involves much more than the severing of this annual drain. It involves the honour of Indian womanhood. Everyone who has any connection with the mill industry knows that the women working in the mills are exposed to temptations and risks to which they ought not to be exposed. Many women for want of home employment accept road repair labour. And only those who know what this labour is, understand the risks the women run. Give them the spinning-wheel and no woman need ever seek any other employment than sitting at the spinning-wheel.

Swadeshi means even distribution of wealth from an occupation next in importance only to agriculture. It supplements agriculture and therefore automatically assists materially to solve the problem of our growing poverty. Thus swadeshi is our veritable Kamadhenu供应ing all our wants and solving many of our difficult problems. And an occupation which saves our honour and provides our livelihood becomes a religious duty.

How can the great consummation be achieved? The answer is simple. Those who realize the importance of the problem must set about working in one or all of the following directions:

1. Learn spinning yourself whether man or woman. Charge for the labour if you need money, or make a gift of at least one hour’s labour to the nation daily.

2. Learn weaving yourself whether for recreation or for maintenance.

3. Make improvements in the present handlooms and the spinning-wheels, and if you are rich, pay for them to those who would make them.

4. Take the swadeshi vow and patronize the cloth that is both hand-spun and hand-woven.

5. Introduce such cloth among your friends and believe that there is more art and humanity in khadi whose yarn has been prepared by your poor sisters.

6. If you are a mother, you will give a clean and national culture to your children and make them wear clothes made out of

1 A mythical cow that gave whatever one asked of her beautiful khadi which is available to millions and which can be most easily produced.

Swadeshi then means the creation of a most perfect organization in which every part work in perfect harmony with every other. If we succeed in bringing into being such an organization, not only is success of swadeshi assured, but real swaraj comes to us as a matter of course.

43. INDIANS ABROAD

The prejudice against Indian settlers outside India is showing itself in a variety of ways. Under the impudent suggestion of sedition the Fiji Government has deported Mr. Manilal Doctor, who with his brave and cultured wife has been rendering assistance to the poor indentured Indians of Fiji in a variety of ways. The whole trouble has arisen over the strike of the labourers in Fiji. Indentures have been cancelled, but the spirit of slavery is by no means dead. We do not know genesis of the strike; we do not know that the strikers have done no wrong. But we do know what is behind when a charge of sedition is brought against the strikers and their friends. The readers must remember that the Government that has scented sedition in the recent upheaval in Fiji is the Government that had the hardihood to libel Mr. Andrews’ character. What can be the meaning of sedition in connection with the Fiji strikers and Mr. Manilal Doctor? Did they and he want to seize the reins of government? Did they want any power in that country? They struck for elementary freedom. And it is a prostitution of terms to use the word sedition in such connection. The strikers may have been over-hasty. Mr. Manilal Doctor may have misled them. If his advice bordered on the criminal, he should have been tried. The information in our possession goes to show that he has been strictly constitutional. Our point, however, is that it is an abuse of power for the Fiji Government to have deported Mr. Manilal Doctor without a trial. It is wrong in principle to deprive a person of 1 Son-in-law of Dr. Pranjivan Mehta, an old associate of Gandhiji. He went to Fiji in 1912 to take up public work there.

2 Jayakunvar

The indenture system introduced in 1877 in Fiji was abolished in January 1920.
his liberty on mere suspicion and without giving him an opportunity of clearing his character. Mr. Manilal Doctor, be it remembered, has for years past made Fiji his home. He has, we believe, bought property there. He has children born in Fiji. Have the children no rights? Has the wife none? May a promising career be ruined at the bidding of a lawless government? Has Mr. Manilal Doctor been compensated for the losses he must sustain? We trust that the Government of India which has endeavoured to protect the rights of Indian settlers abroad will take up the question of Mr. Doctor’s deportation.

Nor is Fiji the only place where the spirit of lawlessness among the powerful has come to the surface. Indians of (the late) German East Africa find themselves in a worse position than heretofore. They state that even their property is not safe. They have to pay all kinds of dues on passports. They are hampered in their trade. They are not able even to send money orders.

In British East Africa the cloud is perhaps the thickest. The European settlers there are doing their utmost to deprive the Indian settlers of practically every right they have hitherto possessed. An attempt is being made to compass their ruin both by legislative enactment and administrative action.

In South Africa every Indian who has anything to do with that part of the British Dominions is watching with bated breath the progress of the commission1 that is now sitting.

The Government of India have no easy job in protecting the interests of Indian settlers in these various parts of His Majesty’s dominions. They will be able to do so only by following the firmest and the most consistent policy. Justice is admittedly on the side of the Indian settlers. But they are the weak party. A strong agitation in India followed by strong action by the Government of India can alone save the situation.

Sammelans: it must be clear that our national awakening is not confined to politics alone. The enthusiasm displayed at these gatherings indicated a happy change. We are giving in thought their proper place to the vernaculars in our national life. Raja Ram Mohan Roy’s prophecy that India will one day be an English-speaking country, has not today many stars in its favour. The great reformer’s spirit, however, still haunts some. A number of our eminent men hastily generalize in favour of English as the national medium. The present status of English as a court language weighs with them unduly. They fail to see that the present status of English is no credit to us and that it is not conducive to the growth of a true democratic spirit. That crores of men should learn a foreign tongue for the convenience of a few hundreds of officials is the height of absurdity. An instance is often cited from our past history to prove the necessity of a lingua franca to strengthen the Central Government of the country. Nobody disputes the necessity of a common medium. But it cannot be English. The officials have to recognize the vernaculars. The second consideration that appeals to the Anglicists is India’s position in the Empire. The argument, put in plain words, amounts to asking 31 crores of Indians to accept English as their common language for the sake of the other parts of the Empire whose population is not more than 12 crores.

The first fact that ought to receive consideration from every student of this problem is that after a century and a half of British rule English has failed to take the place of a lingua franca of India. A kind of broken English, no doubt, does seem to have succeeded in this respect in our cities. But this fact can only dazzle those who profess to study our national problems in big cities like Bombay and Calcutta. And what is their population after all? It is only 2.2 per cent of the total population of India. The second fact that the Anglicists ignore is that a very large majority of our vernaculars are akin to one another, and as a result of this, Hindi as a lingua franca suits all the provinces except the Madras Presidency. In view of this advantage in favour of Hindi and in view of our present national consciousness how can we accept English as our lingua franca?

The solution of this problem will decide the fate of the vernaculars. In our educational system English is suffered to have an unnanural dominance over vernaculars. The extreme Anglicists hold that English should be used as the medium of instruction "at the earliest age possible". This argument is based on the fact that children in a foreign country pick up the language of the country without difficulty at an early age. Refuting this argument the Calcutta University Commission say:

Whereas in a foreign country a child is surrounded by others who speak the language of the country, in a class-room he is surrounded by others who, with the exception of the teacher, are as ignorant as himself of the new medium; it is a class of one person teaching many, not of many teaching one; and it is only by experiment that class-room methods can be worked out successfully.

The "educational economy", as an advantage of vernacularizing our educational system, has received recognition at the hands of the Commission. We have pointed out, in our issue of February 11, that the recommendations of the Calcutta University Commission in this connection are a further step. The next logical step after this is recommending the use of vernaculars as the medium in our universities also. The Sadler Commission have made the matriculation stage as a halting place between the use of vernaculars as the medium of instruction in secondary schools and their use in the college department. They have suggested as their own opinion a bilingual system for the future. But they also say:

We do not wish to prejudge the future. It is not for us to predict whether the natural desire to use Bengali to the utmost will eventually outweigh the immense advantages of being able to use a medium common not only to the educated classes throughout India, but to more peoples than any other, and giving access in effect to the literature and the scientific records of the world.

Though in view of the evidence submitted to them the Commissioners could not be persuaded to lay down a policy for the future in favour of vernacularizing university education also, it is equally true that they could not find anything in the evidence which supported the Anglicists or the bilinguists. Thus, though the replies to the Commissioners’ questions do not in themselves decide the future, they do reveal a strong movement in favour of the immediate introduction of Bengali for some University purposes, and of its ultimate introduction for others, a movement of which there was little sign in the debate in the Imperial Legislative Council of 1915.

If we study the Commissioners’ analysis of the replies, we can more fully appreciate their remark. The question put to the witnesses was: “Do you hold English should be used as the medium of instruction and examination at every stage above matriculation in the university course?”

The replies are analysed as follows:

(i) 129 are positively in the affirmative;
(ii) 29 are in the affirmative, with slight reservations;
(iii) 68 are in favour of a joint use of English and the vernacular either side by side in the same institution, or in parallel institutions;
(iv) 33 replies suggest the gradual replacement of English by the vernacular as the object to be aimed at;
(v) 37 are in the negative; and
(vi) 9 are insusceptible of classification.

So, 155 replies are in favour of the English medium and nearly 138 are not against using the vernacular medium sooner or later. This proportion is certainly encouraging to the vernacularists. Besides, even among those that favour the English medium there is not an inconsiderable section of witnesses who advise the foreign medium, because there is no provision for proper and sufficient text books for different subjects. This school of educationists is not against the vernacular medium on principle. They do not like us to get into water till we have learnt swimming. Of a similar sort but more decisive is the evidence of the remaining witnesses that stand for the English medium. This latter evidence has stamped the vernaculars as unfit ever to serve the purpose of the medium of instruction. These witnesses betray an ignorance of the history of our vernaculars. There was a time when Sanskrit was the sole medium for Hindu philosophy. But a few enthusiastic scholars enriched their vernaculars with a decent store of philosophic literature and brought Hindu philosophy within the reach of the masses. Can we not with our present ideas of organization do for our vernaculars in the sphere of science what once those vernacular scholars did in the sphere of philosophy? As against the diffidence of these witnesses, the vernacularists can cite the example of Japan. The Rev. W. E. S. Holland, Principal of St. Paul’s Cathedral College, Calcutta, in his evidence, writes:

Japan by use of the vernacular, has built up an educational system that commands the respect of the West.
The evidence of Babu Ramananda Chatterjee, the editor of the Modern Review, is even more convincing. He says:

The use of the vernaculars in all grades of university education is indispensably necessary. All objections have force only temporarily, for the most highly developed modern languages and literatures were at first no better than Bengali. In their case development was obtained by use; and it will be obtained in our case, too, in the same way.

Thus we find that though the evidence before Dr. Sadler’s Commission is not today in favour of vernacularizing university education, it does hold high hopes for the future of the cause of the vernacular medium. Time was when the vernacularists’ cause was looked upon with distrust. There is now not only no distrust but confidence has taken its place. Two important institutions have recently joined the cause. The Women’s University of Poona1 and the Osmania University of Hyderabad are using the vernaculars as the sole medium. Their progress is being keenly watched by many. Their success will, as Justice Sir Abdul Rahim says, make the solution of the problem of the vernaculars easier. At the last convocation of the Hindu University, the Hon. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya invited all the eminent vernacularists to meet in a conference. We hope that such an organized effort will hasten full recognition of the vernaculars as media of instruction.

The present distribution of provinces is another factor which has done no less an injury than any other to the cause of the vernaculars. The redistribution of provinces on a linguistic basis will be followed by a rearrangement of universities.

We have shown above the three allied spheres of work for the cause of vernaculars. And it is evident that unless we advance this cause, we shall not be able to remove the growing intellectual and cultural gulf between our men and women and between the classes and the masses. It is also equally certain that the vernacular medium alone can stimulate originality in thought in the largest number of persons.

46. LETTER TO J. L. MAFFEY

SATYAGRAHA ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
April 24, 1920

DEAR MR. MAFFEY,

I thank you for your prompt telegram in reply to mine about the proposed Khilafat mission. Although I cannot possibly grumble at the reply, I feel the responsibility so much that I had not the heart to proceed with the mission without the fullest approval of the Viceroy. What I mean is that no matter how strong and stubborn may be my opposition to Government actions or measures, I am anxious to have my conduct regarded as above suspicion and as that of a friend. I have no desire to go to England, for I feel that I can work most effectively in India rather than in England. But I have a vague feeling that I owe it to the Imperial Government and to the British public to tell them what a broken pledge on the Khilafat question is likely to mean. But I cannot do it without the assistance of the authorities. I was therefore disinclined to go unless the Mahomedan friends wanted me to, in spite of my failure to get an unequivocal approval of my mission from the Viceroy. I have now sent the enclosed cablegram to Mr. Montagu and await his reply.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

47. Uses of Khadi

The movement for swadeshi is slowly gathering momentum, though it is not progressing well enough to satisfy me. The Satyagraha Week saw a good awakening among the people and the swadeshi movement has also gained correspondingly. Muslims have now started taking greater interest in it. There is a new spirit among them. For them swadeshi means boycott. I have stated my view that boycott will not serve our purpose; even then, to the extent that boycott implies swadeshi, it is bound to produce some good. If any person, being angry, starts a fast, he will certainly enjoy the physical benefits of fasting. In like manner, adopting swadeshi in the spirit of boycott will have its benefit for the people. If we give up European goods but continue to use Japanese goods, we shall be falling out of the frying-pan into the fire.

How, then, can we ensure the propagation of swadeshi? Everyone who loves swadeshi is in duty bound to ask this question. If anyone believes that this can be done by increasing the consumption of mill cloth, he is wrong. We just do not produce enough cloth in India to meet our needs. If, therefore, we rest satisfied with using mill cloth, we shall have appropriated that much cloth from what is now available to the poor and thus raised its price. This would be wrong. But, then, the need for a swadeshi store in every village is also undoubted, for, as things stand today, those who use swadeshi cloth cannot get their needs from the ordinary shops. The truth of the matter is that he alone really encourages swadeshi who spins and weaves, if only to produce a yard of cloth and no more. If new mills could be brought into existence by a mere puff of the breath, this very day we could ensure the reign of swadeshi, of a sort. But mills take time to put up. With a puff of the breath we can learn hand-spinning no doubt. If only people try, any man or woman can learn spinning in no more than a day.

Hundreds of women have started spinning in this way but we do not get enough men and women to wear the cloth produced. A year ago, khadi was not available in sufficient quantity. Hand-spun yarn was quite difficult to come by in the beginning. Now, after one year, I am offered so much hand-spun yarn that I cannot take it all. The stocks of khadi with me have grown so large that the quantities cleared are inadequate.
The problem, then, of overcoming the prejudice against khadi has become as important as that of producing more cloth. We shall not succeed in producing all at once fine cloth from hand-spun yarn, in place of the [coarse] khadi being produced at present. The hundreds of thousands of women who spin will continue to produce yarn good enough only for khadi.

The swadeshi movement received the finest impetus from Shrimati Sarladevi Chowdhriani. During the National Week, she expressed a desire to wear a sari and blouse of khadi. I have not so far succeeded in inducing any woman to wear a sari made of khadi and so at first I thought Sarladevi was joking. But she was perfectly sincere in what she said and, what is more, she meant khadi as rough as what I wear. I got a sari and a blouse made for her and she celebrated the National Week in these. When her maternal uncle\(^1\) saw her in this dress, he also remarked: "If you don't feel embarrassed yourself, there is nothing wrong with this dress. You can go anywhere in it."

There was a big party on the 11th at Mrs. Petit's in honour of the poet and she had to decide whether she could attend it in khadi. She then remembered the poet’s remark and honoured that party by attending it in this same khadi dress. She received no less respect than she used to in her costly silk saris. After this she went to all meetings and functions in khadi and at everyone of them which I attended I could see that people's respect for her had increased because of this dress. Thus, the uncle and the niece, who have acquired a reputation in the country for their artistic sense, did not reject khadi from that point of view at any rate. On the contrary, they introduced khadi as a dress for women in gatherings of rich people. This lady, who had been used to saris and other garments of finest texture, felt proud of wearing a khadi sari and a khadi blouse, not fighting shy of their heaviness. Till this attitude becomes fixed among large numbers of men and women or is adopted, at any rate, during this period of transition, I do not think it will be possible to make swadeshi a country-wide movement, for, as things are, if any cloth can be produced in lakhs of yards, it is khadi.

But I take no pity at all upon khadi-wearers. I do not believe I lack a sense of art, and in my eyes khadi is artistic enough. I can say from my experience and that of others, that, as against calico which sticks to the body because of perspiration in the summer, khadi has the property of absorbing moisture. Khadi is a more useful and superior cloth. It is more beautiful than calico because it has a soul in it. We can say that a piece of khadi has a personality of its own, if personality can be attributed to cloth. We can know, if we wish to, who attended to which process in the manufacture of any piece of khadi. There is some craftsmanship at any rate in the making of khadi. We can see that there is none in calico. Just as no two leaves of a tree are exactly alike, no two lengths of hand-spun, hand-woven khadi can be so. No painter can paint two paintings which are alike in every way; in like manner no weaver making khadi can make two lengths of it of identical quality. To some this will be a matter of regret. They probably believe that the right thing is to have, and to be able to produce, crores of yards of cloth of identical quality, one piece indistinguishable from another. This kind of machine production has its uses, but it is never reckoned as art. If we could not produce pins, or could not get paper, of identical quality, we would certainly feel at sea. But even in this machine age, even today, people who have appreciation of art prefer hand-made paper. Every one will be able to see the difference between hand-made paper and machine-made paper. Hand-made paper is expressive of a certain quality of individuality, of the art of its maker. Maybe such paper cannot be made available to many. All that I wish to prove here is that there is an art in khadi, as there is in paper, which is absent in machine-made goods. If we had not developed a prejudice against Indian goods, we would have appreciated the art in khadi too. In Scotland, the tweed prepared from wool by the women there is even today esteemed superior to the machine-made variety. The Scottish nobles prove, by their use of it, that the beauty and the warmth to be found in its roughness is not to be found in the smoothness of the machine-made variety. Hand-made tweed is considered fashionable and artistic and therefore fetches more money.

Unfortunately for India, hand-made khadi came to be looked upon as clothing for the lower classes, as having no art in it. No one sets value on it and the khadi weaver can hardly earn eight annas a day. How can we expect appreciation of art in a country with such perverse notions? How can we expect such a country not to starve? Here, in this country, there is no appreciation for craftsmanship. The rich, fascinated by the machine-made, polished goods from Europe, see art in them, with the result that in their homes and in their dresses they never patronize Indian craftsmanship. The Collector of Surat once told me, commenting on the swadeshi movement: "Look at my drawing-room, how it patronizes Indian craftsmanship, how much art it holds; compare it with the homes of your rich friends and then tell me who encourages swadeshi better." What he said was true and I felt rather small. I am convinced that the day when India feels honoured in wearing hand-spun khadi and pays for it for the sake of the art which lies in it, starvation will disappear from the country and we shall find that the poor, who are hard put to it to get even cereals to eat, are well supplied with them.

I have, today, a very large stock of khadi with me. We are, moreover, facing a situation in which it may be necessary to abandon an activity that gives work to some women and poor people. I have had, therefore to employ what ability I possess and try to prove some self-evident truths. To me, coats, Indian-style shirts and other garments made of khadi seem quite beautiful. If, however, I cannot carry the reader so far with me, I should like to say that khadi has many other uses. It can be used to make school bags and hammocks for children. Chairs, couches and other articles of furniture can be covered with it. Big car-pets can be made from dyed khadi. It can serve for canopies. Handkerchiefs of any required size can be made from it. Straining pieces, bags, pillow-cases, bed-covers and many other useful articles can be made out of it. I appeal for help from every reader for popularizing khadi. A Khatri has come forward to dye khadi red with swadeshi material. With his help, I am getting some khadi dyed red. For bed-covers, etc., red khadi is better. I want every reader to remember that a large number of women are employed at present in spinning. Some of them led immoral lives and some could not afford even milk for their children; these sisters have now been earning something through an honest occupation. I want every reader to play his part in promoting this craft through which we can end starvation in India and help people to lead purer lives.

Anyone who wants to place an order for khadi should write to the Manager, Khadi Section, instead of to me. If he writes to me, there is likely to be delay in his getting a reply. The prices of the varieties of khadi which have accumulated in the Ashram can be had by writing to the Manager, Satyagraha Ashram.

48. KATHIAWAR MANNERS

I have received several letters about the remarks I made, in the course of my speech outside Lal Darvaja during a session of the Sahitya Parishad, concerning manners in Kathiawar. In one of them, I am accused of having done injustice to Kathiawar. My belief, on the contrary, is that in my speech I had praised the manners of Kathiawar. It was the exaggeration of these which I condemned. The generosity, the courtesy, the hospitality, the straightforwardness and the affection to be found in Kathiawar, I can never forget, nor upbraid. But, if I failed to criticize the intrigues, the hypocrisy, and the falsehood which have found their way into Kathiawar by reason of those very qualities or of other hostile factors, I would be missing an opportunity of saving others from the very faults from which I have escaped. Wherever I move and whenever I come in contact with Kathiawaris, I experience their good qualities as well as their faults. It is my conviction that the growing generation in Kathiawar, the youth, will advance very much if they develop the former and avoid the latter. They cannot however, eschew the faults if they just refuse to see them. I shall, therefore, ask the following questions of my correspondents:

1. Is it not your experience that the Kathiawari, more than others, gives promises which he should not, trying to be excessively obliging?

2. Have you not observed that, more than others, the Kathiawari spends beyond his means through what he supposes to be expression of regard for others?

3. Have you not observed that the actions of a Kathiawari, though he is ever so full of courtesy in the beginning, show him deficient in good manners, both in public and private?

I have experienced all the three faults in good measure. Even today, I receive complaints against Kathiawaris in respect of these faults. It may be that, because I come into contact with them frequently, I magnify their faults. Maybe because I am a Kathiawari, more complaints are brought to me about these faults. If so, this only means that the Kathiawaris have no more faults than the others. Even so, I shall urge them to rid themselves of whatever faults they have, so that their lives may become worthier and they are better able to serve themselves and the country.

Why should we derive false satisfaction from thinking that we are not worse than others? It is the duty of every man and every woman to observe his or her own faults regardless of what others do. I hope, therefore, that Kathiawaris, who are distinguished for their courage and venturesome spirit, will spot out their minutest faults and get rid of them and offer their courage and adventurous spirit as gifts to the nation, eschewing the defects which, in his sincerity, the late Navalram\(^1\) observed in us and described.

49. IT IS A YEAR NOW

It will be a year on the 26th since Mr. Horniman’s deportation, and yet we have not been able to secure his return to India. When the Emperor’s proclamation was published,\(^2\) everyone thought that Mr. Horniman’s case was covered by it. But the Governor of Bombay thought otherwise and so far he has had his way in this matter. A great principle is at stake in Mr. Horniman’s return, namely, the freedom of the citizen. Let us leave out of consideration Mr. Horniman’s personal qualities. Maybe he was guilty, but, under a modern administration, even a murderer cannot be hanged or imprisoned without a proper trial. Within these last twelve months, a person in Ahmedabad who was charged with murder and was sentenced to be hanged, having been tried by a duly constituted court, was let off because of some procedural flaw, and that by our own Governor. The Bombay Government displayed a high sense of justice in that case. Why should it not display the same sense of justice in Mr. Horniman’s case? Some people may also defend [the Government] by saying that a Government which displayed such a sense of justice must have a strong reason for depriving Mr. Horniman of his freedom without a trial; we do not accept this as a valid argument. That murderer was no threat to the Government; Mr. Horniman, in one sense, may be regarded as a threat to it. He could discomfit the Government by his pen and by his speeches and so the Government had some motive in depriving him of his freedom. This is why the sense of justice

\(^1\) A nineteenth-century Gujarati writer

displayed in the murderer’s case was not shown in Mr. Horniman’s case. This is my view. If Mr. Horniman wrote anything unlawful, he may be tried and sentenced, but the people ought not to tolerate punishment without a trial. In defending Mr. Horniman’s freedom, therefore, the people will be defending their own freedom, and so we hope they will not forget his case, but strive hard and take effective steps to secure the withdrawal of the prohibitory order against him.

Let us now consider what we can do. In Bombay, the months of April and May are a period of inactivity, the leaders being away. We cannot, therefore, hold any effective meeting in Bombay on the 26th. But, at the very first opportunity, mammoth meetings can be held on a fixed day all over the Bombay Presidency and people can demonstrate to the Government that they will not rest in peace until the order against Mr. Horniman is withdrawn. Let us not think that enough resolutions have been passed and that there is no point in passing any more. We should change our attitude to resolutions. Resolutions are looked upon as the first and the last step; instead, we should think of them as the first step, intended to convey the people’s determination. If the Government fails to act upon them, we must have the strength to see that they are acted upon. We need not consider at the moment what that strength should be and how and when it should be employed. What should concern us now is whether the people are unanimous, whether they wish to have Mr. Horniman released. We have suggested how we can know this.

50. WHY SHOULD I GO TO ENGLAND?

Some readers take such a keen interest in all my actions that I am not always able to satisfy their curiosity. The reason is not my negligence, but the fact that I do not get enough time to answer all questions and that it is not possible for me to spare sufficient space in Navajivan for answering them through it. Some matters, however, being of public interest, I consider it essential to clarify the position. One such issue is the proposal that I should go to England.

Some readers have asked me why I, being generally opposed to leaders going to England, have myself now got ready to go. What they say about my view is quite correct and so their question is perfectly justified. But, then, I have never believed that no one should go to England under any circumstances. I can imagine a situation in which to refuse to go to England would be criminal. Not that I think of the Khila-fat issue in this light. It is not quite essential that I should go. However, my going may possibly do some good and so I have left the final decision to Muslim friends. When they expressed a desire that I should be ready to go in case they wanted me to do so. I agreed, and put forward two conditions: one, that people here should really be keen [that a deputation should go] and, two, that we should have the permission and approval of the Viceroy. His permission has been received. But he hesitates to express an opinion on the desirability of our going. So again I went to the Khilafat Committee and left to them the responsibility of deciding what I should do in this situation. There is a difference of opinion among the members. The general view was that, for the present, we should give up the idea of going; accordingly, the proposal of going to England has been dropped.

We were to go not only for the purpose of securing a settlement but also, should the settlement not meet our demands, to warn them of the reactions in India. Non-co-operation is no ordinary weapon. Properly employed, it can secure us full justice. I would, therefore, think it essential to give the fullest warning to the Government before employing such a mighty weapon and would welcome the idea of going to England for that purpose, circumstances permitting. But the Viceroy did not approve and we, ourselves, are not quite ready; I decided, therefore, that it would be better if I did not go. Even so, if the Muslim friends want me to go or if I see that the Government would like my going, I would certainly agree to go.

51. TO READERS

Only recently we changed the size of Navajivan and revised the price of a copy in Bombay and Ahmedabad. Paper is getting more scarce and its price is increasing. It seems that, if we continue to incur loss on Navajivan at the present rate, at the end of the year, that is after five months, the loss will have amounted to ten thousand rupees. The reader will undoubtedly approve of our decision not to accept advertisements. I also imagine that the reader will not approve of such a heavy loss. We have, therefore, decided to carry out the management’s proposal to reduce the size to the minimum possible and so the reader will get only an eight-page Navajivan this time. I hope the reader will not be upset by this. As I have said before, I regard the reader as a partner in Navajivan. The management of Navajivan do not run it for pro-fit or as business; nor do they wish to run it at a loss. If the paper had to be published at a loss, I would feel that the people have no need of it. But I believe otherwise. For those who are managing the paper, this experiment of running a journal without advertisements is quite new. Besides, nobody had any idea that the price of paper would rise so high. It was supposed, on the contrary, that with the end of the war it would come down. It was also believed that the paper we used when we started was good enough. Experience has shown us that it was impossible to maintain the files of Navajivan with this inferior quality paper. Under these circumstances, the subscription rate has to be much higher. Accordingly, for the present we have fixed the subscription at four rupees for new subscribers, so that the old ones may not have to pay anything more; and, in order that the latter might have a share in bringing down the loss, the size has been reduced to eight pages. If there is no great increase in the price of paper, I hope we shall not have to make any more changes, during this year at any rate. I trust the reader will forgive us for the change that we have been obliged to make. At the same time, I wish to assure him that, the reduction in the size notwithstanding, there will be no cutting down of the fare. While dealing with the usual subjects more briefly, it will be our constant endeavour to see that nothing of importance is left out.

52. TO THE MEMBERS OF THE ALL-INDIA HOME RULE LEAGUE

It is a distinct departure from the even tenor of my life for me to belong to an organization that is purely and frankly political. But after careful deliberation and consultation with friends I have joined the All-India Home Rule League and accepted the office of its President.¹ Some friends whom I consulted told me that I should not join any political organization and that if I did, I would lose the position of splendid isolation I enjoy at present. I confess that this caution had considerable weight with me. At the same time I felt that if I was accepted by the League as I was, I should be wrong in not identifying myself with an organization that I could utilize for the advancement of the causes in which I had specialized and of the methods which experience has shown me are attended with quicker and better results than those that are usually adopted. Before joining the League, I endeavoured to ascertain the opinion of those who were outside the Presidency and with whom I had not the privilege to come in such close contact as with co-workers in the Bombay Presidency.

The causes referred to by me are swadeshi, Hindu-Moslem unity with special reference to Khilafat, the acceptance of Hindustani as the lingua franca and a linguistic redistribution of the Provinces. I would engage the League, if I can carry the members with me, in these activities so that they occupy the largest part of the nation’s time and attention.

I freely confess that reforms take a secondary place in my scheme of national reorganization. For I feel that the activities chosen by me, if they could but absorb national energy, would bring about all the reforms that the most ardent extremists can ever desire, and so far as the desirability of full self-government at the earliest possible moment is concerned I yield to none in my desire to hasten our progress. And it is because I feel that the progress towards self-government can be best accelerated by developing the activities I have mentioned that I keep them in the forefront of the national programme. I shall not treat the All-India Home Rule League as a party organization in any sense of the term. I belong to no party and I wish to belong to none hereafter. I am aware that the constitution of the League requires it to help the Congress,¹ but I do not consider the Congress as a party organization, even as the British Parliament, though it contains all parties and has one party or other dominating it from time to time, is not a party organization. I shall venture to hope that all parties will cherish the Congress as a national organization providing a platform for all parties to appeal to the nation with a view to moulding its policy and I would endeavour to so mould the policy of the League as to make the Congress retain its non-party national character.²

This brings me to methods. I believe that it is possible to introduce uncompromising truth and honesty in the political life of the country. Whilst I would not expect the League to follow me in my civil disobedience methods, I would strain every nerve to make truth and non-violence accepted in all our national activities. Then we shall cease to fear or distrust Government and their measures. I do not wish however to develop the theme any further. I would rather let time solve the many questions that must arise from the bald statement I have made. My purpose just now is not to demonstrate the propriety of my action or the truth of the policy herein adumbrated but to take the members of the League into my confidence and to invite criticism of the programme herein set forth and any suggestions they may wish to make for the advancement of the welfare of the League.

53. WHY I HAVE JOINED THE KHILAFA T MOVEMENT

An esteemed South African friend who is at present living in England has written to me a letter from which I take the following excerpts:

You will doubtless remember having met me in South Africa at the time when the Rev. J. J. Doke¹ was assisting you in your campaign there and I subsequently returned to England deeply impressed with the rightness of your

¹ The All-India Home Rule League was affiliated to the Indian National Congress.

² In September 1920, Gandhiji assembled Home Rule Leaguers at Calcutta and changed the creed of the League into a form later adopted by the Congress at its Nagpur session He also changed the name of the League to “Swarajya Sabha”.

³ Joseph J. Doke (1861-1913); minister of Johannesburg Baptist Church; edited Indian Opinion during Gandhiji’s and Polak’s incarceration in 1911 attitude in that country. During the months before the War I wrote and lectured and spoke on your behalf in several places which I did not regret. Since returning from military service, however, I have noticed from the papers that you appear to be adopting a more militant attitude. ... I notice a report in The Times that you are assisting and countenancing a union between the Hindus and Moslems with a view of embarrassing England and the Allied Powers in the matter of the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire or the ejection of the Turkish Government from Constantinople. Knowing as I do your sense of justice and your humane instincts I feel that I am entitled, in view of the humble part that I have taken to promote your interests on this side, to ask you whether this latter report is correct. I cannot believe that you have wrongly countenanced a movement to place the cruel and unjust despotism of the Stamboul Government above the interests of humanity, for if any country has crippled these interests in the East it has surely been Turkey. I am personally familiar with the conditions in Syria and Armenia and I can only suppose that if the report which The Times has published is correct, you have thrown to one side your moral responsibilities and allied yourself with one of the prevailing anarchies. However, until I hear that this is not your attitude I cannot prejudice my mind. Perhaps you will do me the favour of sending me a reply.

I have sent a reply to the writer. But as the views expressed in the quotation are likely to be shared by many of my English friends, and as I do not wish, if I can possibly help it, to forfeit their friendship or their esteem I shall endeavour to state my position as clearly as I can on the Khilafat question. The letter shows what risk public men run through irresponsible journalism. I have not seen The Times report referred to by my friend. But it is evident that the report has made the writer to suspect my alliance with “the prevailing anarchies” and to think that I have “thrown to one side” my “moral responsibilities”.

It is just my sense of moral responsibilities which has made me take up the Khilafat question and to identify myself entirely with the Mohammedans. It is perfectly true that I am assisting and countenancing the union between Hindus and Muslims, but certainly not with “a view of the embarrassing England and the Allied Powers in the matter of the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire”. It is contrary to my creed to embarrass governments or anybody else. This does not however mean that certain acts of mine may not result in embarrassment. But I should not hold myself responsible for having cause embarrassment when I resist the wrong of a wrongdoer by refusing assistance in his wrong-doing. On the Khilafat question I refuse to be a party to a broken pledge. Mr. Lloyd George’s solemn declaration is practically the whole of the case for Indian Mohammedans, and when that case is fortified by scriptural authority it becomes unanswerable. Moreover, it is incorrect to say that I have “allied myself to one of the prevailing anarchies” or that I have “wrongly countenanced the movement to place the cruel and unjust despotism of the Stamboul Government above the interests of humanity”. In the whole of the Mohammedan demand there is no insistence on the retention of the so-called unjust despotism of the Stamboul Government; on the contrary the Mohammedans have accepted the principle of taking full guarantees from that Government for the protection of non-Muslim minorities. I do not know how far the condition of Armenia and Syria may be considered an “anarchy” and how far the Turkish Government may be held responsible for it. I much suspect that the reports from these quarters are much exaggerated and that the European powers are themselves in a measure responsible for what misrule there may be in Armenia and Syria. But I am in no way interested in supporting Turkish or any other anarchy. The Allied Powers can easily prevent it by means other than that of ending Turkish rule or dismembering and weakening the Ottoman Empire. The Allied Powers are not dealing with a new situation. If Turkey was to be partitioned, the position should have been made clear at the commencement of the War. There would then have been no question of a broken pledge. As it is, no Indian Mohammedan has any regard for the promises of British Ministers. In his opinion the cry against Turkey is that of Christianity versus Islam with England as the leader in the cry. The latest cablegram from Mr.

2 Not traceable
Mohamed Ali strengthens the impression, for he says that unlike as in England his deputation is receiving much support from the French Government and the people.

Thus, if it is true, as I hold it is true, that the Indian Mussulmans have a cause that is just and is supported by scriptural authority, then for the Hindus not to support them to the utmost would be a cowardly breach of brotherhood and they would forfeit all claim to consideration from their Mohammedan countrymen. As a public server, therefore, I would be unworthy of the position I claim, if I did not support Indian Mussulmans in their struggle to maintain the Khilafat in accordance with their religious belief. I believe that in supporting them I am rendering a service to the Empire, because by assisting my Mohammedan countrymen to give a disciplined expression to their sentiment it becomes possible to make the agitation thoroughly orderly and even successful.

54. NON-CO-OPERATION

A writer in The Times of India, the editor of that wonderful daily and Mrs. Besant have all in their own manner condemned non-co-operation conceived in connection with the Khilafat movement. All the three writings naturally discuss many side issues which I shall omit for the time being. I propose to answer two serious objections raised by the writers. The sobriety with which they are stated entitles them to a greater consideration than if they had been given in violent language. In non-co-operation, the writers think, it would be difficult if not impossible to avoid violence. Indeed violence, The Times of India editorial says, has already commenced in that ostracism has been resorted to in Calcutta And Delhi. Now I fear that ostracism to a certain extent is impossible to avoid. I remember in South Africa in the initial stages of the passive resistance campaign those who had fallen away were ostracized. Ostracism is violent or peaceful according to the manner in which it is practised. A congregation may well refuse to recite prayers after a priest who prizes his title above his honour. But the ostracism will become violent if the individual life of a person is made unbearable by insults, innuendoes or abuse. The real danger of violence lies in the people resorting to non-co-operation becoming impatient and revengeful. This may happen, if, for instance, payment of taxes is suddenly withdrawn or if pressure is put upon soldiers to lay down their arms. I however do not fear any evil consequences, for the simple reason that every responsible Mohammedan understands that non-co-operation to be successful must be totally unattended with violence. The other objection raised is that those who may give up their service may have to starve. That is just a possibility but a remote one, for the committee will certainly make due provision for those who may suddenly find themselves out of employment. I propose however to examine the whole of the difficult question much more fully in a future issue and hope to show that if Indian Mohammedan feeling is to be respected, there is nothing left but non-co-operation if the decision arrived at is adverse.

55. THE USES OF KHADDAR

While the swadeshi movement is going forward by leaps and bounds and Mohammedans are taking it up as enthusiastically as Hindus, it is well to consider the best method of promoting swadeshi. The veriest tyro in swadeshi knows that we do not manufacture enough cloth to supply our wants. If therefore we merely use mill-made cloth, we simply deprive the poor of what they need, or at least increase the price of mill-made cloth. The only way therefore to encourage swadeshi is to manufacture more cloth. Mills cannot grow like mushrooms. We must, therefore, fall back upon hand-woven and hand-spun yarn. Yarn has never perhaps been so dear as it is today and mills are making fabulous profits out of yarn. He, therefore, who hand-spins a yard of yarn, helps its production and cheapens its price.

How to spin yarn and weave cloth is then the question. I know from personal experience that it is possible to flood the market with hand-spun yarn and hand-woven cloth if the standard cloth comes to be recognized as fit for wear. This cloth is called khaddar in Upper India. It is called khadi in the Bombay Presidency. Thanks to Sarladevi¹, she has shown that it is possible to make even saris out of khaddar. She thought that she could best express herself during the National Week by wearing khaddar sari and khaddar blouse. And she did it. She attended parties in her khaddar sari. Friends thought it was impossible. They thought a woman who had never worn anything but the finest silk or the finest Dacca muslin could not possibly bear the weight of heavy khaddar. She falsified all fears and was no less active or less elegant in her khaddar sari than in her finished silk saris.”If you do not feel awkward in that sari of yours, you may go anywhere and to any party and you will find it would be well with you.” It was with some such words that her great uncle, Sir Rabindranath Tagore, blessed her when he saw her in her khaddar sari. I relate this sacred incident in order to show that two of the most artistic people of India found nothing inartistic in khaddar. This is the cloth I venture to introduce to the cultured families of India, for on its use hangs the immediate success of the swadeshi movement during its infant stage.

To me khaddar is any day more artistic than the finest Dacca muslin, for its association. Khaddar supports today those who were starving. It supports women who have been reclaimed from a life of shame or women who, because they would not go out for work, remained idle and quarrelled among themselves for want of occupation. Khaddar therefore has a soul about it. It has an individuality about it. The wearer is able to trace all the processes of its manufacture to the respective manufacturers. If our tastes were not debased, we would prefer khaddar to sticky calico even during the summer season. Let those who are now using it certify, if they will, to the truth of my statement.

This khaddar is now being stocked at the Satyagraha Ashram. And I have accumulated a stock which is beyond the capacity of the space at my disposal. I therefore ask the readers of Young India to come to the rescue by introducing khaddar in their own homes.

Needless to say that the Ashram makes no profits from it. Any margin left is devoted to recouping the loss incurred in the initial stages or in reducing the price of khaddar received from districts where the cost is heavier than elsewhere, for the cost is not the same all over. In inducing weavers to take to their original occupation, I am obliged to pay enough to support them and for the present.

Khaddar can be used for making underwear, even if one is disinclined to use it for the outer costume. But even if one is not inclined to use it for personal wear, it can be used for making caps, towels, wipers, tea-cloths, satchels, bed-sheets, bedding, holdalls, carpet pieces, cushions, covers for furniture etc. I am having it dyed Turkey red in swadeshi dye. It then becomes more durable and looks less dirty when it is used for carpets or mattress-making or upholstering. I would advise those who wish to support this industry of the poor and the neglected to send for the khaddar by corresponding with the Manager, Khaddar Department, Satyagraha Ashram, Sabarmati.

CHI. MAGANLAL,

I was very unhappy after I had left you. It was a mere chance that I heard your despairing words. Why did you keep them to yourself so long? The right thing for you is to come to me every time you feel despondent. I beg you that, henceforth, you should open your heart and let me know everything. Your writing [about these things] will not weary me. I should feel troubled, rather, if you didn’t write.

Meanwhile, I send you the verse which has been my support in hours of despair:

All impressions of sense, O son of Kunti,
Are hot or cold, give pleasure or pain;
They but come and pass, ever fleeting,
Bear them unmoved, O Bharata.

57. Press Statement on the Turkish Treaty

The cablegram regarding the decision of the Conference\(^2\) at San Remo, is most disquieting. The decision is bound to greatly disturb the Mohammedan mind. I hope, however, that the Mohammedan leaders will neither be disheartened nor give way to anger. The issues involved are tremendous. The greatest self-restraint is, therefore, absolutely necessary. Non-co-operation is, I remain convinced, the only remedy enabling India to give disciplined expression to the deep wound that is being made into her very heart. The way to be trodden is, I know, weary and full of thorns, but I am certain that it is possible to wrench justice from an alliance that prides itself on its brute force. I know that the temptation to answer violence with violence is almost irresistible, yet I feel certain that the slightest violence done by us will not only return to us with mad fury, but will dash to pieces the present hope of Islam, whereas the completely peaceful withdrawal of co-operation must inevitably result in a revision of any arrangement that the Powers might make regarding Turkey. And that can be demonstrated to be unjust and a breach of the solemn promises made by His Majesty’s Ministers. To those who distrust non-co-operation, I can only say, in all humility: ‘You will accelerate the eruption of violence, if you succeed in defeating the scheme of non-co-operation and cannot replace it by some definite course of strong action, which must be more than a mere protest, so much more, that resort to it must bring about this desired end.’

SINHGADH,

Vaishakh Sud 12 [April 29, 1920]¹

CHI. MAGANLAL,

I have been waiting for your letter like one thirsting for water. When I see you in despair, I lose heart, for I have built great hopes on you. I wish that you should not keep back from me a single thought or feeling. That is the only way I can retain your fullest devotion. You must, therefore, reassure me on this. You probably know what happened with Narahari. He kept back something in his mind and, without intending it, did me an injustice. I am sure this does not apply to you in the least. Even that instance was a trivial affair. But all of us can learn a great deal from it.

60. LETTER TO ABDUL BARI

[SINHGADH,]

April 30, 1920

DEAR MAULANA SAHEB,

You will please pardon me for not going to Fyzabad. I could not without seriously impairing my health which I wish to conserve if only for the coming fight. I seem to have lost the use of my left leg. I am hoping to regain it here if I am permitted to stop for a few days. Please plead for me before our friends.

You must have heard all about the English visit. I was disinclined to go unless the friends particularly wished me to go. Of that there was no clear indication and I decided to send a cable² to Mr. Montagu. I now await his reply. I feel strongly that Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and Shaukat Ali should be in Bombay for constant

61. LETTER TO SARLADEVI CHOWDHARNI

SINHGADH,
April 30, 1920

I posted a pencil letter\(^2\) just before leaving Poona for Sinhgadh. The doctor [told me that I] was too pulled down to attempt walking up. I in my infatuity thought I could do it. So Mahadev, Dipak and I began climbing up. But you will be sorry to learn that I could not move up even half a furlong when I felt an unbearable strain on the left thigh and I had to give up the attempt. I felt humiliated and deeply cut up to find myself so much reduced in strength. But I must be cheerful even under reverses. I shall try to be.

I have just got up with two dreams, one about you and other about the Khilafat. To my great joy, you returned within two days. I asked ‘How so quickly?’ You replied, ‘Oh it was Panditji’s trick to have me by him. Jagdish’s marriage is as far off as ever. I have therefore returned.’ I discovered that it was a dream. I fell off again to sleep in disgust to find myself there before a huge Mohammedan audience. One speaker who was speaking on the use of Hindustani as the common medium included the dialect spoken by the Bagdadis as hindustani offshoot and therefore worthy of study. The others in the audience protested against this travelling outside India. Abdul Bari Saheb who was with me sided with the man. But he was speechless under the angry protest of the audience. Bari Saheb did not like this treatment of the man. I was explaining the pros and cons to them. The conversation drifted into the ways and means. I emphasized the necessity for adhering to truth at all costs when there was confusion and I got up. I commenced this [letter] immediately on getting up.

Dipak climbed up with Mahadev without any chair. He is none the worse for it. He had milk on starting and cake on reaching. He is now sleeping heavily. Prabhudas is looking much better and more active. Balkrishana had come half way to receive us. Revashankerbhai is coming tomorrow. The ice doctor too has just now turned up bringing two goats for me. I understand that Tilak Maharaj is coming this evening. His party is already in his bungalow.

Here are goats coming in with their agreeable music. If the marriage is over or postponed I expect you to join the party and enliven it with your music and your laughter.

I can go on writing. But I must stop not from fear of wearying you but for the sake of taking up other work.

I am just reminded of L. Girdharilal’s postcard asking for your bracelet which you had subscribed to the Bagh fund. I think it was sent to you yesterday. In any case I put you in mind of it. I thought you had given the bracelet there and then.

You will not worry about my leg. The magnificent climate of this place should see me through. About Dipak you will not worry. We shall all look after him. Shankarlal took him out for a drive round Colaba. He asked me whether he could take him to the cinema. I said I would not take the responsibility. I would send him some other time if you wished me to. I suggested instead a drive to Colaba or the Victoria Gardens. Hence the drive. Both Mahadev and Dipak dined with Shankarlal. Was I right about Dipak?

After my talk with you I have been thinking a great deal about you. I see that if you want to, you can do much, but you need to steady your mind. You should think over and put into practice what you hear and read. I could see from your exercise book that your power of thinking is weak. My advice now is this. Understand all that you read, think over it and put into practice whatever appeals to you. Read Navajivan carefully. Try to understand the meaning of every verse of the Gita. This way alone will you go forward. Decide once for all that you will pass your whole life in the Ashram and acquaint yourself with all the work there. Consider in which of the activities you can be most useful and work accordingly. Meet Chi. Maganlal from time to time and acquaint yourself with everything with his help. Ask him for work. You should not remain imprisoned in your room, thinking that you are a child and that it would be improper to speak with others; understand that you can mix with everyone so long as your heart is pure and learn things from all of them as from brothers. Serve everyone. I shall take you to Bombay at the proper time. See that you write neatly. You handwriting should be as good as types in print. Write to me regularly in legible handwriting.

66 LETTER TO MANGALDAS PAREKH

SINGHADH,
April 30 [1920]¹

BHAIISHRI MANGALDAS,

I have your letter. It was three in the afternoon when I got it and I am writing this reply immediately. Even so, I do not think it will reach you on the 1st. I think your suspicion of Ambalal-bhai² is unjustified. I told you even that I had agreed with Ambalal-bhai on certain rates. I did not go further into the matter because I thought you knew why I had gone to his place. There was nothing in my talk with him which I need have kept back from you, nor did I consider it improper to enter into negotiations with him after I had informed you. I negotiated with the mills which agreed to do so. I thought it advisable to restrict the scope of the strike, and I still think that way. How may I convince you that I have not the least desire to have things my own way in all matters? I exert myself to the utmost to see that justice prevails. More often than not, the line I take up is based on pure justice and, as justice always prevails, the people in their simplicity are led to believe that I try to have my own way in all things. When they come to know me better they see that I have no such desire, for I want neither money nor honour. I had had enough of wealth and gave up its pursuit. God meets all my needs through friends. Honour I receive in over-flowing measure from my conscience so that no room is left for receiving more from others. For what other reasons, then, should I feel tempted to have anything my own way? There is a fundamental difference between our points of view and so there always remains some distance between our positions. You believe that, as it is, the workers get more than enough and that they will not use well what they will now get [in addition]. I believe that they get very little at present. I do not think either that even the increase I have asked for is sufficient to meet all their needs. Nor do I believe as a matter of principle that they will use their additional income unwisely. Hence I demand practically the highest rates which prevail in Bombay, not the average of the highest and the lowest, and I see no injustice in this. I have already told you that, had I known in advance how much they spend on machinery in Bombay, I would never have agreed, as I did when we took the decision to appoint a pancha, to take the Bombay rates for comparison. It is my duty to see that the industry in Ahmedabad does not suffer in any way, and as far as I can see I am not at all violating this duty in asking that the workers be paid as much as Rs. 30. Because you cannot see this, you think I am obstinate, but how can I believe so myself? I see that the difference between us is understandable. I would do much to be able to go with you, but I would not take a single step which would do injustice to the workers. Ambalalbhai has had no hand in the letter which I wrote to you. I think that he has acted in all sincerity, that he has done nothing out of a desire to harm your good name. If I think any time that this is his motive, I would not be with him even for a moment. To me, your reputation is as dear as his. I should like to be a party only to what will advance your interest. It is still my request to you to accept the rates which have been agreed upon and, with the help of sincere workers like Anasuyabehn and Bhai Shankarlal whom you have with you today, raise the industry in Ahmedabad to a high level and set an example to others.

My health has gone down very badly these days, otherwise I would have come running straight to you. If possible come to Sinhgadh yourself and take some rest. There is no need to worry.

I return the papers, which you sent.

67. LETTER TO ADA WEST

[SINHGADH,]
April 30, 1920

MY DEAR DEVI,

The place where I have arrived today is a lonely little historic fortress. The scenery around is glorious and the weather most bracing but mild. I have come here to give tone to a system which is much run down. I have with me Dr. Jivraj Mehta, Mahadev Desai, Swami Anand, Prabhudas, Balkrishna and Dipak. You know only Prabhudas. I need not introduce the others in this letter as I am anxious to finish this soon. I have a splitting headache on me, but having taken out your letter I must finish the reply.

Mrs. Gandhi has kept remarkably well. She is looking after Harilal’s children. Fatima was married to a nice young man on the 20th. It was a very simple ceremony, quite unpretentious. It was performed on the Ashram grounds. We shall meet her often as her husband lives in Ahmedabad. I have not heard from Mr. Kallenbach since his expulsion from England. I have inquired but without result.

I am sorry to hear about Mrs. West. I hope she is better. Please make love to Hilda on my behalf. Does she ever remember or think of me? Building operations are still going on at the Ashram. I hope one day you will see it and even take your share in making it.

My life remains as busy as ever. I have not a moment I can call my own.

Devdas is at Banaras finishing his Hindi studies. Harilal is going strong about his business. What he will ultimately do, I do not know.

With love,

Yours,

68. LETTER TO SARLADEVI CHOWDHURI

May 1, 1920

It is now nearly 5 p.m. I have hardly left my bed. I had a most torturing headache last night and I remained in a comatose condition up to 11 p.m. I slept fairly well after. I am free from the headache but I cannot walk even a furlong. I ask you however not to worry about me. I thought you should know my condition, if only to keep you to the fortnight’s limit if Jagdish’s marriage is then over3 or if it is postponed. If you would persuade Panditji, too, to come so much the better. He must see and live the Ashram life.

Tilak Maharaj paid us a visit in the morning. He came in with his son and son-in-law. The conversation was purely formal.

Dipak is getting on. He seems to like the place. His tastes are clean. He is easily led. I shall put in' with this what I succeed in getting from him.

Revashankerbhai came in this morning. He brought some luscious mangoes. I fretted to find that you were not here to share them. This morning I got [up] at our usual time but turned in again. I did not watch the sunrise. Had you been here I know you would have dragged me to watch His Majesty coming in.

Padshah has been writing in the East and West. Perhaps the cutting came in whilst we were yet together. I have dictated an article based on it. It is rather good. You shall certify.

4 The source, however, has “up”.

VOL. 20 : 25 MARCH, 1920 - JUNE, 1920 263
And now for a boon. I know you have granted many. The appetite has grown with the receiving. You said you were shy over working at the Ashram. Will you not get rid of your shyness by commencing household work there? This I do not mind having for my sake. It is not a matter of changing our viewpoint. It is merely a matter of getting rid of one’s disinclination. Great and good though you are, you are not a complete woman without achieving the ability to do household work. You have preached it to others. Your preaching will be more effective when people know that even at your time of life and in your station you do not mind doing it.

With love,

Yours,

69. LETTER TO SARLADEVI CHOWDHIRANI

May 1, 1920

I have culled the most powerful verses from the twenty I read yesterday. I remembered you once said the Bhagavad Gita did not appeal to you so much as some other things from other poets. These verses, too, may therefore fall flat on you. But I could not help sharing with you what seemed at the moment ennobling to me. Moreover they are my solace in my enforced idleness. For I have not been able to leave my bed.

70. LETTER TO JAMSHEDJI NASARWANJI MEHTA

SINGHADH,

[May 1, 1920]

BHAISHRI JAMSHEDJI,

I welcome your letter. I cannot possibly fail to understand you or your sentiments; nor can it be said that those who are opposed to the idea of non-co-operation are not friends of the Muslims. There can well be a difference of opinion even among friends.

And now I shall answer your questions:

1. It is true that the effect of non-co-operation will be to create opposite to the Government, but it has not been conceived in a spirit of retaliation and, therefore, the question what crime the Government has committed does not rise; though, of course, the latter has not done all it could have. If the British Government fails to secure justice, the Indian Government can resign. In a situation like this the Indian Government cannot rest content with a mere protest. This is where it has failed and so the people are within their rights in withdrawing their co-operation and thereby expressing their displeasure.

2. We may not knowingly inflict pain on others. Nevertheless, if in consequence of some unavoidable act of ours anyone suffers, we cannot be held responsible. I have always the right to resign from Government service and, if the Government feels unhappy because of my resignation, I am guilty of no violence towards it. I may be living in my father’s house and incidentally serving him in many ways, but I may quit the house and stop co-operating with him when I see him doing an injustice and that would certainly hurt him; even then, my duty would be to leave the house. My father would have invited that suffering on himself. If we do not act in this manner, the oppressors all the world over get a charter of freedom to persist in their evil ways.

3. Thus you will see that if we can organize non-co-operation without indulging in violence we have every right to do so; it is in fact our duty to do so.

1 A Parsi business man and public worker of Karachi
2 The letter was in reply to one from Jamshedji Mehta dated April 24, 1920. The source assigns this letter to May 19, which is evidently an error, Gandhiji was in Singhadh only till May. Probably “19” was a misprint for “1”.
4. Shaukat Ali’s speech has not alarmed me, for I think I understand what he means. I do admit that all the Muslims do not view non-co-operation in the same light that I do. But there is a clear understanding with them that there can be no violence side by side with non-co-operation. Besides, though Muslims may adopt non-co-operation in a spirit of retaliation, we can produce a happy result from it and save ourselves from an outbreak of violence. All good actions, by whatever feelings prompted, yield some fruit. The man who follows truth or exercises self-restraint out of fear or shame will yet reap the outward benefit of doing so; such is the power of good actions.

Many others must have sincerely felt the same doubt which you have and hence I am sending your letter and my reply for publication in the Navajivan.

71. WHY I HAVE JOINED THE HOME RULE LEAGUE

MEMBERS OF THE
HOME RULE LEAGUE

Though much pressed before now by friends to join the All-India Home Rule League, I could not bring myself to do so. One reason for this was that I could not, and still do not, take interest in politics merely as such. But this time there was pressure of a different kind. When I was first asked, my views were not so well known as they are now. Besides, unlike as on previous occasions I found it impossible to remain silent during the last Congress. I saw that I must place before the people my views on some of the issues. I was quite active at the Congress, and I do not regret the fact.

I was tempted to join the Home Rule League. I wrote to friends outside the Bombay Presidency and consulted them. I told them that, if I joined the Home Rule League, it would be in the hope of being to 1 At Madras, as president of the Khilafat Conference, on April 17. In his letter to Gandhiji, Jamshedji Mehta had complained that Shaukat Ali’s loose interpretation of “non-co-operation” and “non-violence” was rather alarming.

2 The Amritsar Session of December 1919 put my ideas and methods into practice. Most of the friends approved of my ideas and also of my intention of joining the League. Some others approved of my ideas but expressed the fear that, by joining the League, I would sacrifice my freedom and my independent position. This fear had considerable weight with me. But I decided that, when they were admitting me to the League in full knowledge of my views, I would be able to preserve my freedom; I saw, moreover, that I would gain a platform for propagating my ideas. It is with this hope that I have joined the League.

I think that the key to the speediest achievement of swaraj lies in swadeshi, Hindu-Muslim unity and the spread of Hindi as the national language. Hence I will try to interest the League in these activities.

India’s economic emancipation and moral regeneration can only be achieved through swadeshi. I would, therefore, exact a promise from every candidate for election to the Legislative Assembly that he would not be afraid to levy a tariff on foreign goods to any extent necessary for protecting Indian industry. So long as there is no unity between Hindus and Muslims, I think swaraj will remain a mere dream. I should like, therefore, to extend all help to the Muslims in their fight on the Khilafat issue and thus win them over for ever. I shall, therefore, try to engage every member of the League in Khilafat work.

We are to work with the millions and influence them. I will, therefore, try and see that I, and others as well, use for our work, both inside and outside the League, the respective regional languages in each region and the national language, that is to say, Hindustani, on the national plane. I would have every member of a legislature give the assurance that he would try to use, and see that others used, the respective regional languages in the [provincial] legislatures and the national language in the Central Legislature.

This idea carries with it another. To ensure speedy attention to people’s needs and development of every component part of the nation, I will strive to bring about a linguistic division of India and try to induce the League to take up this cause. I will exert myself to get separate provinces for the Telugu, Sindhi, Marathi, Oriya and Gujarati-speaking peoples and will do all I can to use the League to plan the means, and induce others to plan them, for the full development of each.

If I succeed in engaging the League in these activities, I shall feel confident of our being able to achieve swaraj at an early date. Looking at the matter from this point of view, I would put less value on the Reforms than on these other things. I do not mean to say that the Reforms are of no consequence. But I am not prepared to give them more importance than they deserve. Even if we were to have all power in our hands today, so long as we do not understand swadeshi or value Hindu-Muslim unity or retain the delusion that English may serve as the language of administration, I see that the Reforms could be used to deprive us of our freedom. They are but a means, not an end in themselves. Swadeshi and the other things are both means and ends at once.

I am of the view, besides, that my method of work yields better results, and quicker. This method consists in firm adherence to truth in all that we do, putting the fullest trust in truth and fearing no one in following truth as we know it. Acceptance of this principle brings about such a revolution in our life that we become self-reliant that very instant. Instead of depending on others, we learn forthwith to depend on ourselves. I wish, therefore, to work hard for the introduction of this principle of satyagraha in the activities of the League. I have no intention of drawing it into civil disobedience. The idea has not spread widely, and it seems to me that the country has not yet understood the spirit of civil disobedience. I wish, therefore, that no member should be alarmed because of my views about disobeying laws.

I shall seek other opportunities of elaborating my ideas before members of the League. Meanwhile, I invite comments from every member on the views set forth above. I also hope that all of them will express an opinion on the rightness or otherwise of my step.

72. NON-CO-OPERATION

Now that the idea of non-co-operation is making an impact, I feel the need for an easily intelligible [Gujarati] equivalent for it as I felt for “passive resistance”. Asahakar immediately occurs to me, but I request the help of readers for finding a better term.

The learned Mrs. Besant has passed strong strictures against non-co-operation,¹ and so have a correspondent in The Times of India and its Editor. Mrs. Besant’s services to India have been so invaluable, her industriousness so great and her love for India so fine a thing that I cannot but hesitate to criticize her statements or express my difference with her. I have always, however, accepted the principle that we can differ, respectfully, even from those whom we look upon as our elders, and that gives me courage on this occasion as well to express my dissent from her.

With all three of them the great fear is that non-co-operation is bound to lead to violence. We certainly cannot claim that violence will never occur but, having taken all precautions against its occurrence, we must, I feel, go ahead with our programme. If we know that those who want to resort to violence are only waiting for non-co-operation to start, we should certainly postpone it. According to me, the success of the Muslims’ cause lies in their preventing the outbreak of violence. They have realized this so well that violence is bound to be kept out. They know that non-co-operation cannot proceed even for an hour along with violence.

Someone may ask whether it is ever possible to prevent violence from breaking out anywhere in India. The reply to this is that an army is no longer an army if anything happens in it which was not in the plan; likewise, if we have become one, we must have the capacity to prevent accidents like outbreak of violence. Before we have acquired such capacity, we shall commit errors and shall have to rectify them. I admit all this but I know that the people must acquire this self-discipline. It seems to me that this is a great opportunity for doing so.

These writers have assumed, without any reason whatever, that the advocates of non-co-operation do not know their job. The latter do not intend to climb to the last step of the staircase of non-cooperation all in one jump. If they proceed step by step, there will be very little fear of their falling.

There are risks, of course, in non-co-operation. But there is no alternative left. If the unjust settlement of the Khilafat issue is intolerable, there must be some way out. If the people are not to have even this weapon of non-co-operation, violence will remain the only course for them and that is a remedy worse than the disease, for our aim is not to vent anger but to secure justice on the Khilafat issue. Violence will not succeed in that; it seems to me, therefore, that there is no other weapon except non-co-operation.

73. NOTES

THE JALLIANWALA BAGH MEMORIAL AND POPULAR AWAKENING

If we wish to measure the increase in popular awakening during the last year, we can do so from the contributions being received from all quarters for the Jallianwala Bagh memorial. From the list below, it will be seen that, wherever efforts have been made, even small villages have not lagged behind cities in offering their contributions. We have received several letters informing us that in certain places even the poorest of the poor have contributed amounts equal to what they spend on some accustomed necessity of theirs; in some parts, the volunteers moved the whole day from place to place and from house to house, to collect funds. The villages in which Mr. Mahadev Desai moved have, according to the information he sends us, a population of not more than a thousand each and yet in every village people contributing to the Memorial Fund belonged not only to the upper and educated classes, but also to the lower and illiterate classes; that is to say, there were contributors not only from Brahmins and _Vanias_ but also from goldsmiths, carpenters, smiths, oilmen and _Kolis_. In one village, the majority of the population was Muslim. There are names of women, too. Shri Mahadev Desai reports that, in collecting the amounts he did, he did not have to press anyone for contribution. He would briefly explain to the people the reason for raising this Fund; in some places, he would show pictures of the Jallianwala Bagh, etc., in the report of the Congress Committee and explain what had happened,¹ and instantly, people would come with whatever they could afford.

A saying which a gentleman quoted humorously to Mr. Desai, in one of the villages he visited, is worth reporting here. The gentleman remarked: "Well, friend, though the dubli² gathers only the kharmato, the havaldar³ must have his trinket all right. That is what it is, these days. But this is a national cause, and so how can one refuse to pay?" There is a profound meaning in this saying; it brings out the condition of our peasantry in a most touching manner. The word kharmato means the grain left over in some corners after the harvest has been removed from where it was gathered in the field. With this explanation, the meaning of the saying will be clear. The present condition of our peasantry is like that of the dubli picking up kharmato; even so, they give his trinket to the havaldar, and gladly—to a havaldar who is a worthy beggar, that is, a national worker.

From this fact, another inference may also be drawn, that it is easier to carry on national work in villages than in cities; it would, therefore, be natural to make a start with village swaraj and thence proceed to swaraj for the whole country.

74. LETTER TO SARLADEVI CHOWDHRANI

May 2, 1920

Yesterday I gave you selections from the first chapter of the Ashtavakra Gita. In it Janaka learnt that the remedy for his deliverance lay with himself, and that was to be free from the snare of the senses. In the second chapter he expresses his joy at the revelation. Here are some of the verses:

अहो निरजनम्: शान्तो बोधिस्त संप्रकृति: प्रतः।
एषाणमाहं कालं मोहेनैव विरै:।। १ ॥

अहो जनसमूहे देहि न दैत्ये दर्शयासि।।
अरण्यभिज्ञ संब्तुं च क्रियान्ति कर्त्तव्याहम्।।। ५ ॥

I have selected five out of twenty-five. May I again charge you to copy them out and send them to Devdas? I should love to finish for you an abridged edition of this beautiful work of art.

I am no better today. I must still confine myself to bed. You still continue to haunt me even in my sleep. No wonder Panditji calls you the greatest shakti of India. You may have cast that spell over him. You are performing the trick over me now. But even two swallows cannot make a summer. If you are the greatest shakti, you will enslave India by becoming her slave in thought, word and deed.

I cannot get Dipak to write both to you and Panditji. You must therefore be satisfied with one letter to Panditji alone. He says, “Why should I write daily to Mataji, if she will not write?” I hung on this the lesson of good for evil. I told him too that probably you had written but the post had not yet been delivered. I was certain of a letter from you yesterday. But none came. Today too there is a blank. I wonder,

1 A dialogue between King Janaka of Videha and Raikva, the low-born, ugly-looking philosopher
2 Pandit Rambhuj Dutt Chowdhari
3 Embodiment of life-force
however. I know you have not failed me. It is the wretched post.

I enclose herewith two cuttings from The Times of India on Indian music. They may interest you. Or get rid of your inertia and you can give your music to India. It is not enough that you sing for her. You can make her sing even as you do. But that requires application and study, a determination to give your musical talent to India. If you are taking the trouble of copying the verses for Devdas I take it you will copy the bhajan too for the boy.

We had a visit from Tilak Maharaj yesterday also. He frankly said he had not my forbearance and he believed in giving tit for tat. This was in answer to my gentle remonstrance over his trenchant criticism of Mrs. Besant. Probably you have not read it. I read it only here. He has even defended Mr. Khaparde’s description of her as aunt Putna. He was refreshingly frank in his remark.

Miss Faering has not yet arrived. I have invited her to come to Sinhgadh if she need not be in Bombay for her passage. The last hope of hearing from you today is gone. For the post-boy has arrived bringing some newspapers only. Devdas writes saying Panditji—pardon me, I mean Malaviyaji—again thinks I should go to England. I am afraid he is too late now, and perhaps it is as well. Without perfect organization here our going would be worse than useless.

75. LETTER TO ESTHER FAERING

Sunday, May [2.] 1920

MY DEAR CHILD.

I do not know whether you have arrived. If you have, do come up to Sinhgadh. It is a beautiful place. It is reached from Poona by a tonga. If I knew, I could easily arrange everything. But I know you are able to manage this yourself. Sinhgadh is about 13 miles from Poona. The tonga hire is at least Rs. 5/-. Sometimes it is more.

76. LETTER TO B. KRIPALANI

May 2, 1920

I do believe your grandson’s is doing better at the Ashram than he could do anywhere else. If I did not believe that of any boy I would certainly not keep that boy in the Ashram. In my opinion the Ashram education is such an all-round education that a boy discharged from it is capable of earning more than he would be after a study elsewhere for the same number of years. He acquires, that is to say, more confidence in himself. But I do confess that boys at the Ashram are constantly taught to believe that education is meant for building character and not wealth. Boys at the Ashram are constantly weaned from wealth hunger. I would strongly advise you not to force Girdhari to any institution, but to keep him wherever he wishes to remain. He is well able to choose for himself.

77. LETTER TO LALCHAND

May 2, 1920

MY DEAR LALCHAND,

I have read all your notes in the Young India of the 28th April. The first is quite good, the second is not bad, but it is weak and halting. The matter of the third is good, but the manner of dealing with it is bad, the fourth is bad both in manner and matter—in matter because the Congress Deputation, you must know, is not going, and if you did not know you should have made certain. It is bad in manner because the style is not that of Young India. The fifth note is very good in matter, but you have hardly done justice to a case so important as that of the ill-treatment of a lady. My criticism is not meant to frighten you. It is meant only to warn you to be more careful in future in your selection of subjects and manner of dealing with them. Young India will not look faulty for want of a variety of subjects. But it will certainly look paltry, if the subjects chosen do not show originality, accuracy of information, and strength in dealing with

1 Father of J. B. Kripalani
2 Girdhari, nephew of J. B. Kripalani
3 An employee on the editorial staff of Young India them. To be accurate, original and strong you must become a deep student. Then only will you acquire enlightened confidence in yourself. Never mind therefore the range of your subjects but go in for the depth, walk round your subject, walk into it, walk through it, and you will make the pages of Young India live. (Re-reading my own articles in the current issue I miss my usual strength in some parts of them. The Khaddar article is the best, but the English of the last paragraph show[s] that I was half asleep or indifferent when I wrote it. Look at ‘even if one is disinclined to use it’, followed immediately by ‘even if one is not inclined to use it’. The word ‘use’ occurs four times in four lines. I would never pass such a tenth-rate sentence in a good article. But you have. I do not mind your having done it, because until I have confidence in your style I must pay the penalty of my illness, sleepiness or indifference.

Take again “Non-co-operation” . It is all solid stuff, but not at all solidly put. I know under what extreme difficulty I wrote that article, but I cannot on that account expect the readers to excuse indifferently written articles. My first article is fairly readable, but had I written it in Sinh-gadh, it would have been written differently. The manifesto is the thing I like. It is nice in style, terse in expression, brings out all my points gracefully and concisely. I could have written it better but it can pass muster.

And now I have given you enough food for thought. You have come to me to get the best out of me. Give the best of yourself to the country, and do better than your best from week to week and if you would do this you must study swadeshi, read up Dutt, Radhakamal Muckerji, Barrow, and all the writers on Indian industries; you must read up blue-book, statistical abstracts and deluge the readers with facts and figures from week to week. You will not tell me you have no library. You must go to Ahmedabad and search all the libraries and find out what you can get. Similarly on Hindi and the vernaculars, study the history of the French craze during the Norman period, how the English nation was saved by some lovers of English, how the energy of a single professor in Russia revolutionized Russian teaching, and how practically from that period commenced the Russian national revival. Then take the linguistic distribution. You will find among my papers some material already collected, but you can collect it yourself. On Hindo-Muslim unity you have to specialize on the Khilafat question. You must get Mr. Banker to give you his English weeklies, the New Age and the Nation; study the history of Turkey, answer like a student all the calumnies against it. Add to this your knowledge of finance and you have enough to deal with every week.

I would like you not to destroy this letter, but read it carefully more than once and keep it as a reminder of what I expect of you. Of course you will share it with Patwardhan, but I do not want you to share the responsibility with him, for the simple reason that I have not yet burdened him with the responsibility of editing Young India. He has shouldered it and done it bravely too, but I have not yet located him. Till then his work in Young India is a gift for which I am thankful but which I will not criticize as I must criticize everything coming from your pen.

Do not please confuse two different thoughts. It is not the payment you accept which distinguishes your work from Patwardhan. You have come to me reserved for Young India. Patwardhan has come in as the handy man, as a stopgap. Maganlal takes no payment but I criticize him mercilessly in the departments which are his and Patwardhan will come in for similar treatment when he is installed as chief of any department.

Yours sincerely,

Boycott of British goods is a punishment. If I buy British goods I do not identify myself with any injustice perpetrated by the British Government. But if I co-operate with the Government even when it is doing an injustice I become party to it. Hence non-co-operation in respect of an unjust Government becomes a duty. If, through the timidity of influential Mohammedans and aloofness of Hindus, the masses of Mohammedans fail to take up non-co-operation, a bloody revolution must inevitably result, provided, that is to say, the Khilafat question is decided against the Mohammedans. If, however, both the above classes were to understand the inwardness of the general Mohammedan feeling, they could make non-co-operation a thorough success and bring about the desired result.

79. LETTER TO MAGANLAL GANDHI

May 2, 1920

I casually asked Mahadev yesterday whether he knew why you were unhappy. He thereupon reported the conversation about the car and all that you poured out on the occasion. At the moment, however, I shall answer none of those points. I shall wait for a letter from you. There should have been one today. Or, rather, what reply can I give? But I should certainly like to say something to calm you. I shall do so only after I hear from you.

About Radha, I shall clear the position right now. I do not want her to be married. It was your worry, as I understood it, which prompted me to think and say what I did. If, now, you have made up your mind about the girl and can carry Santok with you, I would look upon Radha’s inviolate brahmacharya as our biggest achievement in the Ashram. My ideas and feeling about Radha and her marriage are the same as they have always been. Devdas’s interpretation is that my ideas have not changed, but that I have become more considerate towards others. Or you may call it weakness if you like. I am not impatient, as I used to be, that others should share my views. That impatience has disappeared with more thinking and experience.

Mahadev bhaini Diary, Vol. V
DEAR BROTHER,

I have your letter. Government employees will be asked to give up jobs only when definite alternative plans have been made for their livelihood. In this connection I am in consultation with Muslim brethren. I have not advised anyone to leave the country,¹ nor can I do so. Some of our Muslim brethren do no doubt intend to leave the country. We cannot stop them, but I tell these people also that their leaving the country will not be of any avail. If we leave the country as a step in satyagraha, we cannot think of bringing any pressure on the Government through it. In my opinion the time for Hindus [sic] to leave India may come when there is a Hindu king and when the subjects, in collaboration with him, make the practice of Hindu religion compulsory. If we now fail to non-co-operate with the Government I will understand this to signify that the religious spirit of the Muslims has weakened. As everyone can see, this question of the Khilafat involves a great blow to Islam. If at such a juncture Muslims are not prepared to make sacrifices in life and property, it can only mean that the religious spirit has become extinct in them. I would not be surprised if such a disaster should come to pass for, travelling round the world, I have witnessed the power of the age of Kali². The religious spirit is everywhere in decline and I find irreligion even in many things that are done in the name of religion. If what I have written is not clear to you, please tell me.

I hope the work of the Gurukul³ goes on nicely now. I have been in this secluded spot⁴ for the last four days.

Yours,

MOHANDAS

81. LETTER TO SARLADEVI CHOWDHRAI

May 3, 1920

MY DEAR SARALA,

Finding Janaka exulting in the discovery that he was the changeless Brahma, Ashtavakra challenges his position in the 3rd chapter and says:

\[\begin{align*}
\text{Having known the } \textit{atman} \text{ to be in truth the Imperishable One without a second, how is it that you, enlightened about the } \textit{atman} \text{ and ever firm in mind, take pleasure in acquiring possessions?} \quad \text{Ashtavakra Gita, III, 1} \\
\text{Just as, not knowing a sea-shell, one covets it under the delusion that it is a piece of silver, so through ignorance of the } \textit{atman} \text{ one sees it as the delusive world of sense objects and takes pleasure in them.} \quad \text{III, 2} \\
\text{Having learnt that the } \textit{atman} \text{ is the living spirit, absolute and unconditioned, supremely beautiful, if one remains attached to the gross pleasure of sense, one gets defiled.} \quad \text{III, 4} \\
\text{It is strange that even a wise one, knowing himself present in all creatures and all creatures present in himself, should be dominated by the sense of “I” and “Mine”.} \quad \text{III, 5} \\
\text{Having learnt that the } \textit{atman} \text{ is the absolute and unconditioned, supreme, if one remains attached to the gross pleasure of sense, one gets defiled.} \quad \text{III, 4} \\
\text{It is strange that even a man abiding in the Supreme Oneness and set on attaining } \textit{moksha} \text{ should get distraught with passion, yielding to its overmastering urge through experience of the pleasure it brings.} \quad \text{III, 6} \\
\text{It is strange that a man who knows for certain that the desire which has possessed him is an enemy of knowledge should yet long for pleasure even though extremely enfeebled and nearing death.} \quad \text{III, 7} \end{align*}\]
The challenged Janaka, retaining the same exultant mood, replies in the fourth chapter:

It is strange that a man unattached both to this world and the other, able to discriminate between the transient and the eternal and aspiring after moksha, should be afraid of moksha itself. III, 8

The steadfast man when consuming things which please, or when made to suffer, is neither happy nor angry, ever seeing the one atman every-where. III, 9 The high-souled man, looking upon the ever-active body of his as not his, how should such a one be affected by praise or blame? III, 10

The man of steady intellect, who the entire universe as maya and is no more interested in its shows, how will he have fear even when death is near? III, 11

The high-souled one whose mind is free from desire even when things look hopeless, who, self-realized, rests supremely content in himself, with whom may such a one be compared? III, 12

The man of steady intellect who knows that all this, in very truth, is appearance and no more, will he feel drawn by one thing and repelled by another? III, 13

He who has inwardly renounced attachment, who is unaffected by the pairs of opposites and who hopes for nothing—to him chance-brought things of enjoyment occasion neither happiness nor suffering. III, 14

You will note that the verses in the fourth chapter are somewhat dangerous. It is strong food for a delicate stomach. All the chapters are not of equal length. The third for instance has 14 verses and the fourth only six.

82. LETTER TO MAGANLAL GANDHI

SINHGADH,

Vaishakh Vad 1 [May 4, 1920]

CHI. MAGANLAL,

I got today the post you sent me. As you have had no time, however, to write to me, I shall say something on the basis of what I heard from Mahadev, wishing to give you as much peace as I can.

1. Why did I at all inquire about the car? This itself shows my growing weakness.

2. There was much waste of time and money in what we did over Gurudev and Fatima. The result was nothing or almost nothing.

There can be no comparison, indeed, between the man, self-realized and steady in intellect, who enjoys things as sport, and the beclouded man carrying on his back, the burden of this world. IV, 1 The yogi, firmly established on that plane, which Indra and the other gods weakly yearn to attain, is never moved to joy. IV, 2

Neither good deeds nor sins touch the man who knows That: the sky and smoke do not touch each other in fact, though seem to. IV, 3

The high-souled man who knows that this whole universe is but the atman itself, who can forbid him from living as he will spontaneously? IV, 4

None but the man of perfect knowledge has the strength to end all desire and aversion, in all the four planes of existence, from Brahma to a blade of grass. IV, 5

Rare is the man who knows the identity of his self and the Lord of the Universe; such a one does what he may and knows fear from no quarter. IV, 6

The letter also appears in Mahadevbhaini Diary, Vol. V, under May 3. May 4 is the more likely date since Gandhiji left Sinhgadh on that day.

Rabindranath Tagore, for whom a reception was held in the Ashram when he visited it on April 2, 1920.

Imam Abdul Kadir Bawazeer’s daughter whose marriage was celebrated in the Ashram; vide “Invitation to Wedding”, 20-4-1920 and “Three Occasions”, 9-5-1920.
3. It is not true that work comes seeking me and I don’t go seeking it.

4. Sarladevi had her meal sitting on the cushion bed on the floor and I also take my meals sitting there. Where is the need for all this hurry? Would it take more time if she and I had our meals at the right place? Even if it did, would it matter very much?

5. I am no more as scrupulously firm as I used to be.

6. India and the Ashram have lost by my activities outside the Ashram.

7. Indeed, I should leave everything else and, confined to the Ashram, lose myself in its activities like the school, etc. No one will now charge me with accepting defeat.

8. About Radha’s marriage.

9. The power which was mine, in virtue of which everyone was obliged to listen to what I said, has disappeared.

   I think it is natural that these and similar doubts should arise in your mind. Especially when I am so far away or, even though living in the Ashram, am like one living far away, my numerous activities are bound to perplex people.

   I inquired about a car since in any case we have introduced many unwanted things. Economically, I saw that a car would be an advantage. We certainly use cars a good deal. The question was whether we could accept a car as a gift. I did not think it quite proper to give an immediate reply on my own. For two days I struggled hard against the idea but, thinking of Lyall1, I softened and thought that I would accept the gift if you also desired that I should. Actually, I am so little in love with a car that I have often wished that Anasuyabehn’s car might break down. It is true, however, that now I am not opposed to using a car as much as I used to be. I think, therefore, that you would be perfectly right if you believed that it was my weakness to have inquired about the car.

   About Gurudev, I was a mere witness. I submitted to the desire of you all. Left to myself, I would not have gone in for arches, etc. I would have thought out a way of honouring him which would have cost little effort. I don’t feel either way about what happened. I believe it was our duty to give him a fitting welcome. I don’t think the students lost anything by being busy in this work. They merely followed the duty of service. These facts need to be borne in mind.

Moreover, Gurudev is an exceptional man. He has poetry, goodness and patriotism in him. This is a rare mixture. He deserves to be honoured. What simplicity his is!

All that was done for Fatima seems perfectly right to me. If we remember that Imam Saheb is a Muslim, we shall see that we did nothing much. Every step was taken after full thought. If you admit that we were bound to celebrate her marriage, you will see that everything we did was right. Imam Saheb could have observed still greater simplicity. It would have been excellent if he had given her no ornaments, but how can we expect so much? I especially want to satisfy you on this.

You may be sure I don’t go seeking work. Which activity, do you think, did I go out of my way to take upon myself? If I had not joined the Khilafat movement, I think, I would have lost everything. In joining it I have followed what I especially regard as my dharma. I am trying through this movement to show the real nature of non-violence.
I am uniting Hindus and Muslims. I am coming to know one and all and, if non-co-operation goes well, a great power based on brute force will have to submit to a simple-looking thing. The Khilafat movement is a great churning of the sea of India. Why should we be concerned with what it will produce? All that we should consider is whether the movement itself is a pure and worthy cause. I cannot leave any field in which I have cultivated some strength. My moksha lies through them.
If I refuse to work in these fields, I shall not succeed in giving anything through the Ashram either. It was for this reason that Doke described me as a pathfinder. He had intended to name his book ‘Pathfinder’ or ‘Jungle-breaker’. He kept the present name at the instance of Polak.

Even by establishing the Ashram I have shown a path. It is for you and others who are working in it to follow the path and reach the destination. Meanwhile, if it is given to me to live longer and have some peace, I may, on the basis of my matured experience, prepare a better scheme for the Ashram; that is another matter. However, you are free to engage me in the fullest discussions about this.

On that day Sarladevi was the only one left to take her meal and therefore had it where she was sitting. Ordinarily she used to have her meals in the dining-room. For myself, since I fell ill I have my meal wherever I happen to be when it includes no cereals. I do this for my convenience; it may also be attributed to my weakness. Your complaint is right, of course.

My staunchness has not disappeared. My ideas have grown stronger and more piercing. My indifference to worldly pleasures has increased. What I used to see but dimly has now become clearer to me. I have grown more tolerant, so that I am less particular about others [doing what I want them to do].

It is impossible for me to answer the question whether India and the Ashram have gained or lost through my outside activities. If I could think of a way, I would certainly confine myself to the Ashram, but the thing is not entirely in my hands. I should like it if you can convince me with argument and hold me down [to the Ashram].

It is quite true that I have lost my former fire. My illness has disabled me. I have myself observed that, ever since I lost the strength to stand beside you all and work, I have lost my fire. The steel-like strength of my body having given place to softness, I put up with many things. Did anyone ever see me going for a change of air? Well, that is what I do now. When I think of the expenditure which has been incurred over me I get still more nervous. I feel ashamed when travelling second class. My soul suffers on such occasions and, to be sure, it loses its lustre. There is no way out of this. My best time is over. People may take now what they can from my ideas. I have given expression to these feelings often enough, off and on.

But in the midst of all this, neither you nor I need despair. We should be able to see our defects and, wherever possible, should correct them. You have learnt a great deal through my 50 years of life. Cherish it. Build on it, bring credit to yourself and me. When you experience any difficulties point them out to me. Overcome those of them which you can by your own effort. Don’t lose heart. If you find anywhere in this letter that I have misunderstood you, do not brood over the thing, but immediately seek a clarification.

I want you to be perfectly at peace and cheerful. Shamaldas has wired to me for money. I am saying no to him. We simply cannot give him any money.

83. THE DELHI NOTIFICATION AND PRESS ORDERS

The first repressive move in connection with the Khilafat movement has commenced at Delhi in the shape of a notification under the Seditious Meetings Act and a gradual muzzling of the Muslim Press. We are not surprised at this. We must expect the Government to anticipate every move of the Committee and expect it to thwart the scheme of non-co-operation. Nor can the Government be blamed for it so long as it acts wisely and temperately. But the people must be prepared for the Government even to lose its senses, become panicky and adopt insane measures. O’Dwyerism may erupt anywhere any day. The people must prepare for all contingencies. The preparation is simple. They must not lose their heads on any account whatsoever. They must not be angry. They must not play into the hands of mischief-makers and answer Government madness with madness. No one should act on his own responsibility. It should be remembered that civil disobedience is not to be offered, at any rate at this stage, in connection with the Khilafat movement. Non-co-operation, too, has not yet commenced. Every Government order must be strictly obeyed, all rules and laws faithfully carried out. Then and then only is non-co-operation likely to succeed. All the laws of war are applicable to this great struggle. An army moves silently, calmly and deliberately. No unit acts on its own responsibility. Discipline is the watchword of success. So must it be with the Khilafat army of peace. Its strokes will be sure and certain only when there is no violence in the face of the greatest provocation. The Government is not bound by any rule of non-violence. Indeed, the last resort of a Government is violence. The leaders must be prepared for prosecutions, internments, imprisonment, etc. Others must be ready to take their places. Then, when we have proved ourselves by going through the process of purification, will victory come, not till then.

2 The sub-committee, consisting of Gandhiji, Shaukat Ali and Abul Kalam Azad, appointed by the All-India Khilafat Committee
Perhaps the best way of answering the fears and criticism as to non-co-operation is to elaborate more fully the scheme of non-co-operation. The critics seem to imagine that the organizers propose to give effect to the whole scheme at once. The fact however is that the organizers have fixed definite, progressive four stages. The first is the giving up of titles and resignation of honorary posts. If there is no response or if the response received is not effective, recourse will be had to the second stage. The second stage involves much previous arrangement. Certainly, not a single servant will be called out unless he is either capable of supporting himself and his dependents or the Khilafat Committee is able to bear the burden. All the classes of servants will not be called out at once and never will any pressure be put upon a single servant to withdraw himself from the Government service. Nor will a single private employee be touched for the simple reason that the movement is not anti-English. It is not even anti-Government. Co-operation is to be withdrawn because the people must not be party to a wrong—a broken pledge—a violation of deep religious sentiment. Naturally, the movement will receive a check, if there is any undue influence brought to bear upon any Government servant or if any violence is used or countenanced by any member of the Khilafat Committee. The second stage must be entirely successful, if the response is at all on an adequate scale. For no Government—much less the Indian Government—can subsist if the people cease to serve it. The withdrawal therefore of the police and the military—that third stage—is a distant goal. The organizers however wanted to be fair, just and above suspicion. They did not want to keep back from the Government or the public a single step they had in contemplation even as a remote contingency. The fourth, i.e., suspension of taxes, is still more remote. The organizers recognize that suspension of general taxation is fraught with the greatest danger. It is likely to bring a sensitive class in conflict with the police. They are therefore not likely to embark upon it, unless they can do so with the assurance that there will be no violence offered by the people.

I admit as I have already done that non-co-operation is not unattended with risk, but the risk of supineness in the face of a grave issue is infinitely greater than the danger of violence ensuing from organizing non-co-operation. To do nothing is to invite violence for a
It is easy enough to pass resolutions or write articles condemning non-co-operation. But it is no easy task to restrain the fury of a people incensed by a deep sense of wrong. I urge those who talk or work against non-co-operation to descend from their chairs and go down to the people, learn their feelings and write, if they have the heart, against non-co-operation. They will find, as I have found, that the only way to avoid violence is to enable them to give such expression to their feelings as to compel redress. I have found nothing save non-co-operation. It is logical and harmless. It is the inherent right of a subject to refuse to assist a government that will not listen to him.

Non-co-operation as a voluntary movement can only succeed if the feeling is genuine and strong enough to make people suffer to the utmost. If the religious sentiment of the Mohammedans is deeply hurt and if the Hindus entertain neighbourly regard towards their Muslim brethren, they will both count no cost too great for achieving the end. Non-co-operation will not only be an effective remedy but will also be an effective test of the sincerity of the Muslim claim and the Hindu profession of friendship.

There is, however, one formidable argument urged by friends against my joining the Khilafat movement. They say that it ill becomes me, a friend of the English and an admirer of the British constitution, to join hands with those who are today filled with nothing but ill will against the English. I am sorry to have to confess that the ordinary Mohammedan entertains today no affection for Englishmen. He considers, not without some cause, that they have not played the game. But if I am friendly towards Englishmen, I am no less so towards my countrymen, the Mohammedans. And as such they have a greater claim upon my attention than Englishmen. My personal religion however enables me to serve my countrymen without hurting Englishmen or for that matter anybody else. What I am not prepared to do to my blood-brother, I would not do to an Englishman. I would not injure him to gain a kingdom. But I would withdraw co-operation from him if it became necessary, as I had withdrawn from my own brother when it became necessary. I serve the Empire

by refusing to partake in its wrong. William Stead\(^1\) offered public prayers for British reverses at the time of the Boer War because he considered that the nation to which he belonged was engaged in an unrighteous war. The present Prime Minister\(^2\) risked his life in opposing that war and did everything he could to obstruct his own Government in its prosecution. And today if I have thrown in my lot with the Mohammedans, a large number of whom bear no friendly feelings towards the British, I have done so frankly as a friend of the British and with the object of gaining justice and of thereby showing the capacity of the British constitution to respond to every honest determination when it is coupled with suffering. I hope by my ‘alliance’ with the Mohammedans to achieve a threefold end—to obtain justice in the face of odds with the method of satyagraha and to show its efficacy over all other methods, to secure Mohammedan friendship for the Hindus and thereby internal peace also, and last but not least to transform ill will into affection for the British and their constitution which in spite of its imperfections has weathered many a storm. I may fail in achieving any of the ends. I can but attempt. God alone can grant success. It will not be denied that the ends are all worthy. I invite Hindus and Englishmen to join me in a full-hearted manner in shouldering the burden the Mohammedans of India are carrying. Theirs is admittedly a just fight. The Viceroy, The Secretary of State, the Maharaja of Bikaner\(^3\) and Lord Sinha have testified to it. The time has arrived to make good the testimony. People with a just cause are never satisfied with a mere protest. They have been known to die for it. Are a high-spirited people like the Mohammedans expected to do less?

85. REPRESSION IN DELHI

There was no reason to believe that the Khilafat movement would go on without the Government resorting to repression. If anyone believed so, the notification issued by the Delhi Government should open his eyes. The notification forbids the holding of any meeting in Delhi Province for a period of three months without the prior permission of the Government. This is but the beginning.

The Government would certainly not permit a movement like non-co-operation without trying to suppress it. No government would, for that matter. The movement is of such a nature that, if it succeeds, the administration would come to a standstill. The Government is certain to take steps to prevent this.

It is through repression that the people will be tested. If the Government were to remain quiet, non-co-operation would not have much effect. Every State depends in the last resort on the pistol, that is, on the power it wields. In this fight, however, the people’s weapon is their capacity for suffering. If they pit their physical strength against the Government’s, they will lose. The idea, therefore, of employing physical force simultaneously with non-co-operation will have to be given up altogether. And so I hope that the people will remain peaceful despite any repressive measures the Government may take in Delhi or elsewhere. Their success lies in doing so and going ahead with the programme. It should be remembered that in this struggle the soul-force of the Indian people is to be pitted against the brute force of the Allies.

If, in this, there is the slightest admixture of brute force by the people, even what is claimed as soul-force will be looked upon as brute force or as weakness.

If the people want to succeed on the Khilafat question with the help of soul-force, they should be ready to go to jail, to be deprived of their property and to resign from Government service. This is certainly no movement aiming at easy success.

It also needs to be borne in mind that we have not so far introduced the element of civil disobedience in this struggle. As I understand the matter, civil disobedience and non-co-operation do not go together. Any ordinances, therefore, which the Government might promulgate or any orders it might pass must be fully obeyed. If, in this movement, even a single worker follows his own judgment, he will do it much harm.

There is no difference between those who join this fight and the troops in an army. In an army, the individual soldier cannot act on his own responsibility but must await orders from his superiors, and this is also true of the Khilafat struggle or of any other struggle. If the soldier in the army is required to respect and obey his superiors, not to show temper, and so on, these things are equally necessary for workers in a movement like this one for the Khilafat. If we can acquire full control over the people, victory will be ours this very day. For acquiring such control, it is essential that the principles laid down above be followed. I hope, therefore, that no individual will risk anything on his own responsibility.

As it is, we have not started even non-co-operation. The peace terms have not yet been finalized. The latest telegram from Mahomed Ali is encouraging. Whether or no there is room for hope, till the peace terms are definitely announced and instructions are issued by the Khilafat Committee, no one is to take even the step of resigning. At present, the people chiefly need to be educated in this, that none of them should, even by chance, be guilty of violence.

86. ABDUCTIONS ON BORDER

There are certain wild tribes on the North-West Frontier of India. They are Muslims and live by carrying out raids and abducting people.¹ Recently they abducted an English girl and set her free only when they received a ransom. In like manner, they plunder Hindus in surrounding villages, abduct some and set them free when they are paid ransom. They harass Muslims, too, in the same manner. This is not, therefore, a case of Muslims plundering Hindus. Nevertheless, some Hindus, on the strength of the happy spirit of Hindu-Muslim unity which is in the air today, want that the Muslims, if they are sincere, should take steps to stop these raids. I know that this is said in ignorance. Indian Muslims have no influence whatever on the wild tribes on the border. They themselves suffer from these raids, as I have pointed out. Be that as it may, we must think out measures to stop this harassment. Those who suffer from these raids and abductions should get help. It is for the Government to provide it. If it cannot ensure such protection, what happens to the mighty power of protection with which it is credited? I have no illusions left about this power. The Government is not as strong for preventing crime as it is for punishing the guilty after a crime has been committed. The instances of Arar and Katarpur are quite fresh in our memory. Personally, I would not blame the Government for this state of affairs. As long as human nature remains what it is, crimes will continue. The State succeeds in preventing them, more or less, to the extent that they can be prevented by fear of punishment.

The best remedy against this should be with the people themselves. Be it on the border or elsewhere, the people should be capable of defending themselves. If they do not have the capacity, they should cultivate it. One method is to win over one’s neighbour by love, and the other is to stop him by fear. Generally, a mixture of the two is employed. People develop enough physical strength for self-defence, and also try to cultivate friendly relations with the neighbours. The inhabitants of the border villages can employ both these methods.

¹ During the period, 1919-20, no fewer than 611 raids took place in the Peshawar, Kohat, Bannu and Dera Ismail Khan districts. They resulted in the killing of 298, the wounding of 392, and the kidnapping of 463 British subjects. India in 1920.
They may prepare themselves to fight the raiders unitedly, and may also negotiate with them when there is peace. If the border tribes are starving, the people can help them as neighbours, after laying down terms. This is what the Government itself does.

At the same time, those Muslims who have any contact with the border tribes may send messages to them and persuade them to give up raids. If these measures are taken simultaneously, by the Government, by the people and, especially, by the Muslims, people may be saved from this harassment. It will not avail to sit back, thinking that the Muslims do nothing; besides, such a thought may be unfair to them.

I have had to write on this subject because newspapers in the North are full of it and I have received some letters on it. Men from the border areas have also been here [to see me]. As the spirit of nationalism grows among us, our desire to know about developments in other parts of the country should also increase.

87. A HUMBLE SUGGESTION

I observe that many candidates have come forward for the choice of the would-be electors for the reformed Councils. It must be granted that it is possible to render some service to the State by entering these Councils. But it is my firm belief that many can serve the country better by remaining outside. The late Mr. Keir Hardie used to say that it was practically impossible for a true Christian to remain in the British Parliament. Carlyle called it the talking shop. When there are many candidates, those who have accepted service of the land as an article of faith would do well to stand outside the lists, and they will find that they will be better occupied by educating the electorate and keep- ing the elected members to their promises at the polls. Even in England one sees the most effective service rendered by those who keep themselves outside the House of Commons. The real affairs of the English nation are conducted not by the seven hundred odd M.P.s but by the larger body who really control them. I would therefore venture to suggest to the larger body of those whose only ambition is to serve India, not to trouble about entering the Councils. To the aspirants after membership of Councils I would respectfully urge: ‘Pray avoid the Councils if it is any axe of your own which you want to grind there, for it can be ground elsewhere. In a chamber where only national interests are supposed to be conserved and where a stiff fight has to be put up against strong vested interests, how can you think of serving your own little interest? Surely, you will not wish to injure the national cause by mixing your own with it.’ I do not know who are the aspirants. But I draw my inference from what happens over municipal council elections. We shall benefit by our people entering the Councils if they are true men filled with humility and love of the country, courageous, fearless and versed in the subjects they have to handle.

The Reforms Act is full of defects which must be remedied. But even as a razor with the keenest edge is useless in incompetent hands, so may a most perfect constitution be rendered nugatory if it is handled by selfish or ignorant councillors. The most expeditious manner of reforming the Reforms Act would be to send to the Councils only those who wish to serve the nation. In their hands, even a defective constitution may be utilized for the good of the nation even as an able artisan effectively manages indifferent tools and even makes them better. We shall discuss the voters’ duty some other time.’

88. FAMINE IN ORISSA

Most of us perhaps do not even know where Orissa is. Our great poet, Sir Rabindranath Tagore, has made Orissa, with the name of Utkal, famous in a poem of his. Jagannath Puri lies in Orissa, and a terrible famine is raging just now in Puri district itself. Orissa is a part of the province of Bihar, Bihar and Orissa being both under one Lieutenant-Governor. Orissa is a part of one of the poorest regions in India. We do not hear much about the suffering there because the people are backward in every way. I have often been asked to visit Orissa because of this famine, but as I am not in a position to go there I urged Bhai Amritlal Thakkar, who is free from his Jamshedpur work, to go there and he left at twenty-four hours’ notice. Already a telegram and a letter have arrived from him. He is now touring villages to observe the conditions there. I see even from his letters, however, that the people’s suffering is acute. He writes:

I visited a Bengali children’s home and a hospital for beggars. These institutions are being run on donations obtained from Calcutta. The number of orphans, boys and girls, is about a hundred. There are some thirty to thirty-five patients in the hospitals. From the large number in both these institutions, the extent of the suffering in the neighbourhood can easily be imagined.

In another letter he writes:

There have been numerous deaths. I have read the report of a committee of non-officials on this subject. The report ought to be published. Tomorrow I shall be visiting some villages in a bullock-cart. I shall be out for about five or six days. I shall be able to send a detailed report after my return from there; in between, I shall write a letter or two. In any case, do issue an appeal for funds. It would not be proper for me to move in the villages empty-handed. If possible, I shall take one or two cartfuls of rice from here and use the stock only in case of urgent need. Even then, kindly make immediate arrangements to collect funds.

There is also a letter from a gentleman in Orissa, who writes:

There is a village named Dawa; it had 59 families. In this place, draught was followed by floods and the resulting damage was heavy. This village had a population of 411 of whom 11 were children and all of them died for want of milk. Of the 411 inhabitants, 303 are still alive and they look like skeletons. In all, 58 people have died. Sixty-one people have left their homes; some houses are vacant; of some others, the roofs have blown off. It is rare to see any food with these villagers; most of them go about naked. For lack of clothes to cover their limbs, some women simply cannot stir out of their homes. Some subsist on grass and leaves.

I shall publish further information as I receive it. But what I have given is sufficient to justify our sending help. I hope every one will contribute what he can. I am not yet in a position to say how much will be needed, but when I appeal to people to offer what they can, the total figure is not quite relevant. I have already written to Bhai Amritlal Thakkar to keep an account of the expenses incurred, and a full account will of course be published. We who take pride in describing ourselves as Indians must consider it our religious duty to suffer when any part of India does so. How, then, can we remain unmoved by Orissa’s suffering?

89. CURSE OF WIDOWHOOD

Mr. Kanchanlal Khandwala’s letter is full of figures about widows. Anyone’s heart will bleed to read them. Impatient reformers will merely say that remarriage of widows is the only straight and simple remedy for this. I cannot say so. I too have a family of my own. There are many widows in my family, but I can never bring myself to advise them to remarry and they will not think of doing so either. The real remedy is for men to take a pledge not to remarry.

But there are other remedies, barring remarriage, which we do not adopt, or rather do not wish to adopt. Here they are:

1. Child-marriages should stop.
2. No boy and girl should be betrothed till they are of an age to live together.
3. Not only should a woman who has never lived with her husband be permitted to remarry, she should actually be encouraged to do so. Such women should not be classed with widows.
4. Those who became widows before the age of fifteen and who are still young should be free to remarry.
5. Instead of being regarded as a sign of ill fortune, widowhood should be looked upon as a holy state and respected accordingly.
6. The best arrangements should be made to educate widows and give them some occupation.

There is no doubt that, if these reforms are brought about, Hindu society would be rid of the evils arising from widowhood. Every family and every community may adopt these reforms for themselves. Many reforms are delayed because everyone waits for someone else to make a start. It is a divine injunction that man should do a good deed the moment he sees it as such; about a sinful act, one should think, consult a fortune-teller and take advice from thousands of people, and ultimately refrain from it. We become guilty in the sight of God if we delay in the performance of a good deed. But we act the opposite way. We are not afraid of doing anything sinful, but, when it comes to doing good, we wait for conferences.

90. THREE OCCASIONS

A wedding having taken place in the Satyagraha Ashram, I could not help making a comparison between this wedding in the Ashram and the weddings outside. I take the liberty to place before the reader some of my reflections on this.

Imam Saheb Abdul Kadir Bawazeer is an earnest Muslim of a noble family. His father was the Muezzin in the Jumma Masjid in Bombay for several years. The Imam Saheb has been with me for the past many years. He was with me in jail, too. After his experience of jail, he lost interest in business and came over with his family to stay with me in Phoenix. Bodily labour was a rule in Phoenix. The Imam Saheb had never done it, but started it there. We used to bring out Indian Opinion and the Imam Saheb picked up the work of composing.

The Imam Saheb has two daughters. He has lived with me as if he were my own brother and we have fully respected each other’s religion, so that we have never felt sorry that we belong to different religions. We have felt nothing wrong in his doing his namaz and the Hindu following his own method of worship; on the contrary, we have believed that this is as it should be.

And now came the wedding of his eldest daughter, Fatima. We held consultations. Fatima, over twenty, is a wise girl. After having consulted her and the Imam Saheb, we decided to have a wedding which would become the Ashram and our life of poverty. We dropped the marriage procession, the band and all other pomp; we dropped even the feast. That the students might realize the importance of their brahmacharya, they too were consulted and it was decided that they should not attend the marriage. The relations of Imam Saheb and of the bridegroom, Bhai Syed Hussein Uraizee, and others connected with the Ashram, were invited to give their blessings. They were offered home-made sherbet and fruits and nuts. As for illuminations, there was nothing except a hanging lamp.

The ceremony lasted two hours, of which half an hour was taken up by the maulood sharif or reading out in Arabic the life of the Prophet by way of an auspicious beginning. This was followed by the Kaji Saheb writing down the nikahnama in the presence of witnesses. The Khatib Saheb Abdul Munim Bagzada of the Jumma Masjid in Bombay led the bride and the bridegroom in reading it. It was then signed. This ceremony took about twenty minutes. Then came fatecha or thanksgiving, after which the sherbet and fruits were served and the bride and bridegroom paid their respects to the elders of the latter. The bridegroom wore a simple dress. The function, which began at half-past six, ended at half-past eight. Sister Fatima, then, went to meet the Ashram students. This was a moving scene. Knowing that the time had come for parting from her fellow students and the other residents, she started crying. She was reminded that it was her duty to carry her Ashram training with her to her husband’s home. She understood that it was her duty to spread the message of truth, compassion, swadeshi, national service and simplicity in her new home. This wedding, thus, was over in two and a half hours.

Next morning I went to the city. There I saw numberless marriage processions. The bandsmen, in a variety of strange costumes, deafened one’s ears with their noises. Children and young men, loaded with ornaments and velvet clothing in this intolerable heat, were dripping with perspiration. The bridegroom was veiled in a profusion of flowers. I saw in this no religion, nor real joy nor any grandeur. If we really wish to have band music, why foolishly ape the West? If we would follow the West, we should see that we have the genuine thing. Any person even with ordinary knowledge of music will say that there is no sweetness at all nor any music in the bands which we order. If we wish to take out a marriage procession, why should we not wear garments to suit our country’s climate? If we wish to deck the bridegroom with jewels, why should we not use some discrimination or sense of art? If we want songs to be sung, why should we not train the women in them?

My complaint is not against pomp and splendour. Those who have money and no high aim in life will no doubt have them. They must have occasions to use their wealth. But I wish to see in all these things some discrimination and thought, some restraint and art, and progress. I do observe some changes in our marriage customs, but most of them, one observes, have been made without thinking. Instead of decreasing, pomp and expenditure have increased. It is entirely forgotten that marriage is also a sacred ceremony. If the better type of families introduced well-considered changes, I feel sure that others would soon seize upon them. If the life of the nation is to progress, we should examine every aspect of it.

1 Marriage agreement

There is a charge against us which has some truth in it. We make too much ostentation. Rather than really enjoy ourselves, we make a show of enjoyment; instead of sincerely mourning, we make a show of mourning.

I left Ahmedabad and went to Bombay. There were other tenants in the bungalow in which I put up. There was a death in one of their families. The time was about noon. Suddenly the air was rent with cries; weeping and wailing had begun. The voices of children, women and men rose together. This crying went on till about nine or ten in the evening. Other women arrived; they, too, joined in beating their breasts and wailing. Most of this was mere show. Certainly, there is no respect for dharma in all this. Our religion forbids us to weep for the dead. Followers of other religions do not do so. In all this crying, one’s duty towards one’s neighbour is entirely forgotten. That there might be a sick person or a marriage in the adjoining house—why take thought of this? After all, it is the practice to cry, and cry loudly; if one does not do so, one will be denounced; hence one must cry loudly and beat one’s breasts—this is the idea. It prevails not only among the poor or the illiterate but even among the better classes. How shall we rid ourselves of this evil practice, this sin?

I had two bitter experiences after Fatima’s marriage, and I could not help comparing these with that, which seemed to me a grand occasion. I offer my reflections to readers with the hope that we shall closely examine our ways and give up the harmful practices which obtain among us.

BHAISHRI MAVALANKAR².

Kindly forgive my writing this letter. I cannot help doing so. I heard yesterday that you are preparing to marry. I simply could not bear the idea. Would you not observe a year’s mourning? How can you forget the memory of a woman whom you called your better half, whose body became one with yours? Are we under no obligation to observe some self-control? I heard that your mother was very insistent. Why should even a mother’s opinion count in this matter? How can we do anything unworthy of ourselves? To what end have we been educated? 94. LETTER TO SYED FAZLUR RAHMAN

THE ASHRAM,
May 11, 1920

DEAR SYED FAZLUR RAHMAN,

Technically it is the Government which is perpetrating the injustice against Turkey and thus violating Indian sentiment and therefore I cannot withdraw my support of its injustice by boycotting British goods. Indeed I expect to gain British sympathy and by it compel the British Government to do the right thing. I do not say that a successful boycott cannot achieve the end. But it will be by way of punishment and not by way of duty [.]. We are ourselves not to be party to an injustice. My plan of non-co-operation today does not involve the withdrawal of servants from benevolent institutions but if a Government were wholly corrupt I would not hesitate to stop its activity by complete withdrawal of co-operation. I would refuse to have even useful service through a corrupt agency and when the activity of a completely unjust Government is brought to a standstill it is simultaneously replaced by another agency that will perform the useful services such as you mention. But as yet I do not take that view of the British Government. It suffers temporary aberrations less often perhaps than any other institution of similar type. And it is possible to compel it to retrace its steps by taking up a modified form of non-co-operation. I hope you are now able to see that non-co-operation is both just and necessary when an intolerable injustice is being perpetrated as in the case of Khilafat. I hope you will also see that my position is not so very spiritual as it is logical.¹

Yours faithfully,
M. K. GANDHI

95. DISTRESS IN ORISSA

Orissa, in spite of its enjoying the honour of having one of the great places of pilgrimage, viz., Jagannath Puri, appears to be a godforsaken country. For, even whilst India is pulsating with a consciousness of national life, we know little of Orissa. For most of us, it is a mere geographical expression. Not being a centre of modern education it has not produced the modern type of workers and, therefore, nobody knows whether the people of Orissa are happy or unhappy. For months past an Orissa friend has been trying to interest me in its problems. He has for the last few weeks been telling me that there is practically a famine in the land. In a little village containing 59 families, numbering all told 411 men and women, recently 11 infants, he says, died for want of nutrition. Altogether 58 deaths have taken place owing to starvation, 61 have abandoned the village and those who are left are mere skin and bone. They have neither food nor clothing. Women being insufficiently clad will not leave their homes and some are living on grass and leaves! I was not prepared to believe this terrible story. I felt that before making a public appeal there should be some authentic information to be placed before the people. I therefore approached the Servants of India Society for lending Mr. Amritlal Thakkar’s services. His fitness for the work cannot be questioned, for he has qualified himself for it for years by such kind of investigations. My request was readily granted and the following is the substance of what he has to say after a week’s stay in the Puri District of Orissa:

I have been travelling in the villages for the last 8 days. There are certainly famine conditions in Orissa. Whilst I was in Jamshedpur, I believed that Orissa was one of the granaries of India because Balassore provides a vast quantity of rice. But alas! Today I find that the people of the affected district have to get their rice from Calcutta, Sambalpur, etc. The country had a double visitation—famine and flood. It is said that during the last six months over 1,500 people must have died of starvation. I have already visited nearly 19 villages. Of these 6 are said to have lost 40 inhabitants simply from starvation.
People are still dying. An old man died in my very presence. He was among those who had come for relief. A co-worker has just returned from a village telling me that he saw an old man who was dying of starvation. One stumbles upon children recently bereft of parents. You see wherever you go many reduced to mere skeletons. I have sent you the following telegram:

I have visited already 19 villages. I am still travelling. Scores have died of starvation. Recently the Government have begun to distribute relief but it is insufficient. Please send five thousand rupees at once. Altogether from 30 to 50 thousand rupees will be required.

According to the Famine Code, 50 tolas of grain have to be given to those who are unfit to work but only 26 tolas are being given per head. The relief was commenced on the 10th April. Nearly 4,000 men have already received it. The quantity will, I hear, be shortly increased to 40 tolas.

The Oriya people are very poor. His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor some time ago visited the affected parts but not more than 5,000 people have been able to obtain partial relief. No famine works have yet been opened.

Mr. Thakkar’s letter speaks for itself. I hope that the cry of distress coming from Orissa will not be heard in vain and those who can will not fail to contribute their quota.

96. NEITHER A SAINT NOR A POLITICIAN

A kind friend has sent me the following cutting from the April number of East and West:

Mr. Gandhi has the reputation of a saint but it seems that the politician in him often dominates his decisions. He has been making great use of hartals and there can be no gainsaying that under his direction hartal is becoming a powerful political weapon for uniting the educated and the uneducated on a single question of the day. The hartal is not without its disadvantages. It is teaching direct action, and direct action, however potent, does not work for unity. Is Mr. Gandhi quite sure that he is serving the highest behests of ahimsa, harmlessness? His proposal to commemorate the shooting at Jallianwala Bagh is not likely to promote concord. It is a tragic incident into which our Government was betrayed, but is the memory of its bitterness worth retaining? Can we not commemorate the event by raising a temple of peace, to help the widows and orphans to bless the souls of those who died without knowing why? The world is full of politicians and pettyfoggers who, in the name of patriotism, poison the inner sweetness of man and, as a result, we have wars and feuds and such shameless slaughter as turned Jallianwala Bagh into a shambles. Shall we not now try for a larger symbiosis such as Buddha and Christ preached, and bring the world to breathe and prosper together? Mr. Gandhi seemed destined to be the apostle of such a movement, but circumstances are forcing him to seek the way of raising resistances and group unities. He may yet take up the larger mission of uniting the world.

I have given the whole of the quotation. As a rule I do not notice criticism of me or my methods except when thereby I acknowledge a mistake or enforce still further the principles criticized. I have a double reason for noticing the extract. For, not only do I hope further to elucidate the principles I hold dear, but I want to show my regard for the author of the criticism whom I know and whom I have admired for many years for the singular beauty of his character. The critic regrets to see in me a politician, whereas he expected me to be a saint. Now I think that the word “saint” should be ruled out of present life. It is too sacred a word to be lightly applied to anybody, much less to one like myself who claims only to be a humble searcher after truth, knows his limitations, makes mistakes, never hesitates to admit them when he makes them, and frankly confesses that he, like a scientist, is making experiments about some of ‘the eternal verities’ of life, but cannot even claim to be a scientist because he can show no tangible proof of scientific accuracy in his methods or such tangible results of his experiments as modern science demands. But though by disclaiming sainthood I disappoint the critic’s expectations, I would have him to give up his regrets by answering him that the politician in me has never dominated a single decision of mine, and if I seem to take part in politics, it is only because politics encircle us today like the coil of a snake from which one cannot get out, no matter how much one tries. I wish therefore to wrestle with the snake, as I have been doing, with more or less success, consciously since 1894, unconsciously, as I have now discovered, ever since reaching the years of discretion. Quite selfishly, as I wish to live in peace in the midst of a bellowing storm howling round me, I have been experimenting with myself and my friends by introducing religion into politics. Let me explain what I mean by religion. It is not the Hindu religion, which I certainly prize above all other religions, but the religion which transcends Hinduism, which changes one’s very nature, which binds one indissolubly to the truth within and which ever purifies. It is the permanent element in human nature which counts no cost too great in order to find full expression and which leaves the soul utterly restless until it has found itself, known its Maker and appreciated the true correspondence between the Maker and itself.

It was in that religious spirit that I came upon hartal. I wanted to show that it is not a knowledge of letters that would give India consciousness of herself, or that would bind the educated together. The hartal illuminated the whole of India as if by magic on the 6th of April, 1919. And had it not been for the interruption of the 10th of April, brought about by Satan whispering fear into the ears of a Government conscious of its own wrong and inciting to anger a people that were prepared for it by utter distrust of the Government, India would have risen to an unimaginable height. The hartal had not only been taken up by the great masses of people in a truly religious spirit but it was intended to be a prelude to a series of direct actions.

But my critic deplores direct action. For, he says, “it does not work for unity.” I join issue with him. Never has anything been done on this earth without direct action. I rejected the word “passive resistance”, because of its insufficiency and its being interpreted as a weapon of the weak. It was direct action in South Africa which told and told so effectively that it converted General Smuts to sanity. He was in 1906 the most relentless opponent of Indian aspirations. In 1914 he took pride in doing tardy justice by removing from the statute-book of the Union a disgraceful measure\(^1\) which in 1909 he had told Lord Morley would be never removed, for he then said South Africa would never tolerate repeal of a measure which was twice passed\(^2\) by the Transvaal Legislature. But what is more, direct action sustained for eight years\(^3\) left behind it not only no bitterness, but the very Indians who put up such a stubborn fight against General Smuts, ranged themselves round his banner in 1915 and fought under him in East Africa.\(^4\) It was direct action\(^5\) in Champaran which removed an age-long grievance. A meek submission when one is chafing under a disability or a grievance which one would gladly see removed, not only does not make for unity, but makes the weak party acid, angry and prepares him for an opportunity to explode. By allying myself with the weak party, by teaching him direct, firm, but harmless action, I make him feel strong and capable of defying the physical might. He feels braced for the struggle, regains confidence in himself and knowing that the remedy lies with himself, ceases to harbour the spirit of revenge and learns to be satisfied with a redress of the wrong he is seeking to remedy.

\(^1\) The Transvaal Asiatic Registration Act
\(^2\) Once in 1906 as the Transvaal Asiatic Law Amendment Ordinance and again in 1907 as the Transvaal Asiatic Registration Act.

\(^4\) Against the Germans during World War I
\(^5\) The satyagraha led by Gandhiji in 1917 to secure redress for the grievances of indigo plantation labourers against European landlords
It is working along the same lines that I have ventured to suggest a memorial about Jallianwala Bagh. The writer in East and West has ascribed to me a proposal which has never once crossed my mind. He thinks that I want “to commemorate the shooting at Jallianwala Bagh”. Nothing can be further from my thought than to perpetuate the memory of a black deed. I dare say that before we have come to our own we shall have a repetition of the tragedy and I will prepare the nation for it by treasuring the memory of the innocent dead. The widows and the orphans have been and are being helped, but we cannot “bless the souls of those who died without knowing why”, if we will not acquire the ground which has been hallowed by innocent blood and there erect a suitable memorial for them. It is not to serve, if I can help it, as a reminder of the foul deed but it shall serve as an encouragement to the nation that it is better to die helpless and unarmed and as victims rather than as tyrants. I would have the future generations remember that we who witnessed the innocent dying did not ungratefully refuse to cherish their memory. As Mrs. Jinnah truly remarked when she gave her mite to the fund, the memorial would at least give us an excuse for living. After all it will be the spirit in which the memorial is erected that will decide its character.

What was the “larger symbiosis” that Buddha and Christ preached? Buddha fearlessly carried the war into the enemy’s camp and brought down on its knees an arrogant priesthood. Christ drove out the money-changers from the temple of Jerusalem and drew down curses from Heaven upon the hypocrites and the Pharisees. Both were for intensely direct action. But even as Buddha and Christ chastised they showed unmistakable gentleness and love behind every act of theirs. They would not raise a finger against their enemies, but would gladly surrender themselves rather than the truth for which they lived. Buddha would have died resisting the priesthood, if the majesty of his love had not proved to be equal to the task of bending the priesthood. Christ died on the Cross with a crown of thorns on his head defying the might of a whole Empire. And if I raise resistances of a non-violent character I simply and humbly follow in the footsteps of the great teachers named by my critic.

Lastly, the writer of the paragraph quarrels with my “grouping unities” and would have me take up “the larger mission of uniting the world”. I once told him under a common roof that I was probably more cosmopolitan than he. I abide by that expression. Unless I group unities I shall never be able to unite the whole world. Tolstoy once said that if we would but get off the backs of our neighbours the world would be quite all right without any further help from us. And if we can only serve our immediate neighbours ceasing to prey upon them, the circle of unities thus grouped in the right fashion will ever grow in circumference till at last it is co-terminus with that of the whole world. More than that it is not given to any man to try or achieve. "मथा पिंडे तथा ब्रह्माण्ड" is as true today as ages ago when it was first uttered by an unknown rishī.

97. KHILAFAT

As I told you in my last letter I think Mr. Gandhi has made a serious mistake in the Khilafat business. The Indian Mohammedans base their demand on the assertion that their religion requires the Turkish rule over Arabia; but when they have against them in this matter the Arabs themselves, it is impossible to regard the theory of the Indian Mohammedans as essential to Islam. After all if the Arabs do not represent Islam, who does? It is as if the German Roman Catholics made a demand in the name of Roman Catholics, with Rome and the Italians making a contrary demand. But even if the religion of the Indian Mohammedans did require that Turkish rule should be imposed upon the Arabs against their will, one could not, nowadays, recognize as a really religious demand, one which required the continued oppression of one people by another. When an assurance was given at the beginning of the War to the Indian Mohammedans that the Mohammedan religion would be respected, that could never have meant that a temporal sovereignty which violated the principles of self-determination would be upheld. We could not now stand by and see the Turks reconquer the Arabs (for the Arabs would certainly fight against them) without grossly betraying the Arabs to whom we have given pledges. It is not true that the Arab hostility to the Turks was due simply to European suggestion. No doubt, during the War we availed ourselves of the Arab hostility to the Turks to get another ally, but the hostility has existed long before the War. The non-Turkish Mohammedan subjects of the Sultan in general wanted to get rid of his rule. It is the Indian Mohammedans who have no experience of that rule who want to impose it on others. As a matter of fact the idea of any restoration of Turkish rule in Syria or Arabia seems so remote from all possibilities that to discuss it seems like discussing a restoration of the Holy Roman Empire. I cannot conceive what series of events could bring it about. The Indian Mohammedans certainly could not march into Arabia themselves and conquer the Arabs for the Sultan. And no amount of agitation and trouble in India would ever induce England to put back Turkish rule in Arabia. In this matter it is not English Imperialism which the Indian Mohammedans are up against, but the mass of English liberal and humanitarian opinion, the mass of the better opinion of England, which wants self determination to go forward in India. Supposing the Indian Mohammedans could stir up an agitation so violent in India as to sever the connection between India and the British Crown, still they would not be any nearer to their purpose. For today they do have considerable influence on British world policy. Even if in this matter of the Turkish question their influence has not been sufficient to turn the scale against the very heavy weights on the other side, it has weighed in the scale. But apart from the British connection, the Indian Mohammedans would have no influence at all outside India. They would not count for more in world politics than the Mohammedans of China. I think it is likely (apart from the pressure of America on the other side, I should say certain) that the influence of the Indian Mohammedans may at any rate avail to keep the Sultan in Constantinople. But I doubt whether they will gain any advantage by doing so. For a Turkey cut down to the Turkish parts of Asia Minor, Constantinople would be a very inconvenient capital. I think its inconvenience would more than outweigh the sentimental gratification of keeping up a phantom of the old Ottoman Empire. But if the Indian Mohammedans want the Sultan to retain his place in Constantinople, I think the assurances given officially by the Viceroy 1 in India now bind us to insist on his remaining there and I think he will remain there, in spite of America.

This is an extract from the letter of an Englishman enjoying a position in Great Britain, to a friend in India. It is a typical letter, sober, honest, to the point, and put in such graceful language that whilst it challenges you, it commands your respect by its very gracefulness. But it is just this attitude based upon insufficient or false information which has ruined many a cause in the British Isles. The superficiality, the one-sidedness, the inaccuracy and often even dishonesty that have crept into modern journalism, continuously mislead honest men who want to see nothing but justice done. Then there are always interested groups whose business it is to serve their ends by means fair of foul. And the honest Englishman wishing to vote for justice but swayed by conflicting opinions and dominated by distorted versions often ends by becoming an instrument of injustice.

The writer of the letter quoted above has built up a convincing argument on imaginary data. He has successfully shown that the Mohammedan case, as it has been presented to him, is a rotten case. In India, where it is not quite easy to distort facts about the Khilafat, English friends admit the utter justice of the Indian Mohammedan claim. But they plead helplessness and tell us that the Government of India and Mr. Montagu have done all it was humanly possible for them to do. And if now the judgment goes against Islam, Indian Mohammedans should resign themselves to it. This extraordinary state of things would not be possible except under this modern rush and preoccupations of all responsible people.

Let us for a moment examine the case as it has been imagined by the writer. He suggests that Indian Mohammedans want Turkish rule in Arabia in spite of the opposition of the Arabs themselves and that if the Arabs do not want Turkish rule, the writer argues, no false religious sentiment can be permitted to interfere with self-determination of the Arabs when India herself has been pleading for that very status. Now the fact is that the Mohammedans, as is known to everybody who has at all studied the case, have never asked for Turkish rule in Arabia in opposition to the Arabs. On the contrary, they have said that they have no intention of resisting Arabian self-government. All they ask for is Turkish suzerainty over Arabia which would guarantee complete self-rule for the Arabs. They want the Khalif’s control of the holy places of Islam. In other words they ask for nothing more than what was guaranteed1 by Mr. Lloyd George and on the strength of which guarantee Mohammedan soldiers spilt their blood on behalf of the Allied Powers. All the elaborate argument therefore and the cogent reasoning of the above extract fall to pieces based as they are upon a case that has never existed. I have thrown myself heart and soul into this question because British pledges, abstract justice and religious sentiment coincide. I can conceive the possibility of a blind and fanatical religious sentiment existing in opposition to pure justice. I should then resist the former and fight for the latter. Nor would I insist upon pledges given dishonestly to support an unjust cause as has happened with England in the case of the secret treaties. Resistance there becomes not only lawful but obligatory on the part of a nation that prides itself on its righteousness.

It is unnecessary for me to examine the position imagined by the English friend, viz., how India would have fared had she been an independent power. It is unnecessary because Indian Mohammedans, and for that matter India, are fighting for a cause that is admittedly just, a cause in aid of which they are invoking the whole-hearted support of the British people. I would however venture to suggest that this is a cause in which mere sympathy will not suffice. It is a cause which demands support that is strong enough to bring about substantial justice.

98. “IN PROCESS OF KEEPING”

The writer of “Current Topics” in The Times of India has attempted to challenge the statement made in my Khilafat article regarding ministerial pledges, and in doing so, cites Mr. Asquith’s Guild Hall speech of November 10, 1914. When I wrote the article, I had in mind Mr. Asquith’s speech. I am sorry that he ever made that speech. For, in my humble opinion, it betrayed, to say the least, a confusion of thought. Could he think of the Turkish people as apart from the Ottoman Government? And what is the meaning of the death knell of Ottoman Dominion in Europe and Asia if it be not the death knell of Turkish rule and therefore also of the Turkish people as a free and governing race? Is it, again, true historically that the Turkish rule has always been a blight that “has withered some of the fairest regions of the earth”? And what is the meaning of his statement that followed, viz., “Nothing is further from our thoughts than to imitate or encourage a crusade against their belief”? If words have any meaning, the qualifications that Mr. Asquith introduced in his speech should have meant a scrupulous regard for Indian Muslim feeling. And if that be the meaning of his speech, without anything further to support me I would claim that even Mr. Asquith’s assurance is in danger of being set at nought if the resolutions of the San Remo

1 Made by the Allies, for example, with Russia, Italy and the Grand Sherif of Mecca in 1915
Conference are to be crystallized into action. But I base my remarks on a considered speech made by Mr. Asquith’s successor two years later when things had assumed a more threatening shape than in 1914 and when the need for Indian help was much greater than in 1914. His pledge would bear repetition till it is fulfilled. He said:

Nor are we fighting to deprive Turkey of its capital or of the rich and renowned lands of Asia Minor and Thrace which are predominantly Turkish in race. . . . We do not challenge the maintenance of the Turkish Empire in the homeland of the Turkish race with its capital at Constantinople.

If only every word of this pledge is fulfilled both in letter and in spirit, there would be little left for quarrelling about. In so far as Mr. Asquith’s declaration can be considered hostile to the Indian Muslim claim, it is superseded by the later and more considered declaration of Mr. Lloyd George—a declaration made irrevocable by fulfilment of the consideration it expected, viz., the enlistment of the brave Mohammedan soldiery which fought in the very place which is now being partitioned in spite of the pledge. But the writer of “Current Topics” says Mr. Lloyd George “is now in process of keeping his pledge”. I hope he is right. But what has already happened gives little ground for any such hope. For, imprisonment or internment of the Khalifa in his own capital will be not only a mockery of fulfilment but it would be adding injury to insult. Either the Turkish Empire is to be maintained in the homelands of the Turkish race with its capital at Constantinople or it is not. If it is, let the Indian Mohammedans feel the full glow of it, or if the Empire is to be broken up, let the mask of hypocrisy be lifted and India see the truth in its nakedness. To join the Khilafat movement then means to join a movement to keep inviolate the pledge of a British minister. Surely, such a movement is worth much greater sacrifice than may be involved in non-co-operation.

99. SPEECH ON NON-CO-OPERATION, BOMBAY

May 12, 1920

An urgent meeting of the All-India Khilafat Committee was held\(^1\) in Bombay on 12th May to deliberate finally on the non-co-operation movement . . . the Central Committee has finally unanimously decided to adopt and work a full non-co-operation programme as recommended by the sub-committee consisting of Messrs Chhotani, Gandhi, Abul Kalam Azad and Shaukat Ali . . . .

Mahatma Gandhi in a clear, forcible speech again explained the non-co-operation movement. Its success depended on the firmness and courage of Moslems. Their Hindu brethren would willingly support Moslems but Moslems should take the lead. Every effort should be made to impress on all that any violence under any provocation would fatally injure the cause, while joint action was in progress. He assured all that his wife and children would gladly sacrifice their life and all for this sacred cause . . .

After solemn discussion and a speech from Mr. C. Rajagopalachari the resolution\(^2\) was unanimously and most enthusiastically adopted, all standing and calling on God to witness their firm adhesion.

100. LETTER TO ABBAS TAYABJI

THE ASHRAM,

THE ASHRAM,

May 13 [1920]\(^3\)

MY DEAR FRIEND,

I was delighted to receive your cheerful letter. I am glad you feel like taking up more national work. You congratulate me quite wrongly. I deserve congratulations for drawing you out and still more for keeping you at Lahore in spite of the terrible depressions you used to have. You do not know what we would all have lost if we could not have kept [you]. And I shall have to share those congratulations

\(^2\) On non-co-operation, moved by Gandhiji. This resolution is not reproduced here.

\(^3\) Gandhiji and Abbas Tayabji were in Lahore in early 1920 in connection with the work of the Congress Punjab inquiry committee. The reference to Lahore in this letter therefore suggests that it was written during that year.
with Mrs. Abbas and your great daughters who cheered you, sent you and kept you at Lahore. So I can by their sufferance keep only a quarter. And that would not have been mine, if you had not been a willing listener. So I suppose you will divide the quarter or will you want the whole and fight for it, now that you can again say burrrr—[?]

Please tell the girls I shall be jealous of their engagement if they do not bring their future husbands also to the great cause. But I forget that you all move in that vicious—or is it virtuous—circle of the Tayabjis.' So there is no bringing—you are all there.

May the girls prosper and be a credit with their husbands to the great family and the nation which the family adorns. I must claim my yarn when you return.

101. LETTER TO MAHADEV DESAI

ASHRAM,

May 13, 1920

BHAISHRI MAHADEV,

Your letter of the 5th I got only today. You should now shake off your despondency, the sense of emptiness in your heart. Buoyancy will return when it will, it cannot be forced. You will not have it by going away from me. It will come only by your remaining with me and doing what work you can.

Is there any place where peace of mind may be had for money? A king in his palace may be all restlessness and a sufferer like Job may have peace. Did not Bunyan have complete peace in Jail? And you had it, didn’t you, lying ill in bed? One can have peace if one does not hanker after things. As for hankering, is it not that what Mangaldas does while so many workers live in peace? Do you think it would make much of a difference if your body could give good service, and what harm if it does not? It should be enough that you do not obstruct its working and take all possible measures to keep it fit.

Who knows what strength is to be found in [the text]: “The mind itself is [the cause of] men’s [bondage and freedom]?.” Does it lose its truth because we hear it every day? If you accept its truth, revolve it over and over again in your mind and rise above your grief, your melancholy, your despondency and your fancies.

Here is the Viceroy’s letter\(^2\). I think I should now go. ‘I’ means ‘we’. I have written to Shaukat Ali to tell him this. He is in Bombay at present. I have asked him to come here. We shall know after he comes—do not worry at all—be perfectly calm and await events. Things will take care of themselves. After all, it is my job, isn’t it, to worry over arrangements on your account, to attend to getting clothes ready for you and so on? And so start when I tell you. I am not impatient, since I am at home and quite comfortable.

Make Esther happy\(^1\), and be happy yourself. Build very sound health; you will then be able to attend to other things well enough.

The Khilafat meeting yesterday went off very well. I was satisfied. Everyone took a strong line.

103. LETTER TO MAHADEV DESAI

[Vaishakh] Vad 12 [May 15, 1920]\(^3\)

BHAISHRI MAHADEV,

I got your two letters today. I like your reproaches because they show your love for me.

I have been inquiring daily about you. Every day I got Anandanand to write to you and complained about absence of letters from you. I started getting them only three days ago.

I must, however, admit one weakness of mine. It was very clearly observed by Kallenbach and he gave me a good scolding for that. I give the impression of forgetting those who have been tried and tested.\(^4\) What particular need to write to him or say good night to him? Is that love which needs to be supplemented with ceremony? Would he misunderstand me if I did not write to him? Would anyone water an oak tree? But plant a mango sapling and see what happens if you fail to water it for two or three days or to make a hedge around it. I have imagined Esther as a mango sapling and you as the Kabirvad.\(^5\) You may behave as an alfonso sapling, if you wish. But it seems you wish to remain a sapling for ever. Should I satisfy that wish too? And if I do not, would you deny me the virtues you have attributed to me? If you want to hang a dog, give it a bad name. An admirable way of bringing about a man’s fall is to invest him with fine virtues. But I shall not let myself fall. I am where I am. So be careful. Whenever you are hungry for letters from me, you will get them but, then, who would be the oak tree and the Kabirvad? A small pot needs constant filling. Does the sea ever need that?

What you say is quite right. Since you are still weak, the only thing to do is to leave everything to me. I used to tell Polak that he had two wives, Mrs. Polak and I, for he would pour himself out only before us two and likewise be angry only with us. You also seem to have got into the same habit. But what would Durga say?

Shaukat Ali has come down here today. His courage leaves nothing to be desired. Besides, the trio from Dutch Guiana is also here, so that today I don’t have time even to breathe. In the morning, Lallubhai¹ and Brelvi² were here. We had a useful and pleasant discussion about the national language. They have sent Rs. 200 for Orissa³. Even if it is decided that we should go to England, we shall be starting after a month.

I am glad you helped yourself to the fruit. Surely, it was not meant for me alone? It was meant for me and mine. Your sending some of it to Haribhau⁴ was evidence of your being a Kabirvad. Saving money on a telegram was another instance, and not going to Belgaum was a third, though, you had my permission to go. Now that Anandanand is going there, there is little need for you to go. I must be in Kashi on the 30th.⁵

Maganlal and Radha have left today on a tour. I believe they will go to Sinhgadh. I have advised them to do so.

104. LETTER TO ANASUYABEHN SARABHAI

PUJYA ANASUYABEHN,

Bhai Shankerlal came and left. I got your wire in time. My talk with him was quite satisfactory.

After reflecting on the subject of workers when I get time, I shall certainly write something.2

You have apparently not called on Mahadev. I do expect an assurance from you that, in my absence, you will visit the Ashram and look after its inmates. I am alive today. I may not be there tomorrow. But I draw solace in the thought that you will certainly be there after me [to carry on the work]. I do not say that you carry on this benevolent activity setting aside your own.

Miss Faering3 is a simple Irish woman. You can look after her to some extent.

Adopt Deepak4 and look after him. I won’t recommend anyone else. Deepak has been brought up as you have been, so you will be able to understand him better. When I am not around, I shall expect you to be more cautious.

Do not forget swadeshi. Do as much of it as you can. If you have faith in it, I would expect you to devote half an hour a day to it.

105. THE KHILAFAT

A good many questions are being raised about the Khilafat. There is plenty of discussion in the papers too about it. Several people express the opinion that non-co-operation will lead to violence, and they ask how, if that happens, we shall profit from non-co-operation. As in all great ventures, there is bound to be an element of risk in non-co-operation. Life is full of experiments and risks. Not even moksha is to be obtained without our venturing for it. Man, full of errors, can consider only this: ‘Is there a greater risk in doing this or in not doing it? If there is less risk in doing it, is it unavoidable for other reasons as well?’

4 Son of Saraladevi Chowdharani

I am convinced that, had there been no move for non-co-operation, violence would long since have broken out. It is non-co-operation which has prevented violence. The Muslims are boiling over, but they have kept their patience in the belief that the Hindus are with them. When they began to suspect that, despite all this, they might not get justice, they had to think. What should they do now? Some thought of violence. Some considered the unworthy idea of boycott but they realized that, even if it was right, it was not feasible. Meanwhile, at the very first conference in Delhi, I suggested non-co-operation. They hailed it with one voice. I told them that non-co-operation would be possible only if they gave up the idea of violence. Even if there was a single murder by any of us or at our instance, I would leave. They agreed, and understood that non-co-operation was, in many respects, a more potent weapon than violence. This idea of non-co-operation was then taken up and, today, it has spread everywhere; it is only because of this that we have peace in India. I am quite convinced that, had the Muslims not fixed their eyes on non-co-operation, we would now be witnessing a miserable state of affairs in India. I think the Government would have succeeded in suppressing violence, but it would have occurred all the same. If it occurs even in spite of non-co-operation, the Government will be able to suppress it. The only question is whether it would have occurred in the absence of non-co-operation. The answer to this must be in the affirmative.

So, then, we have to consider whether non-co-operation is necessary on other grounds. We cannot start it simply because violence has been prevented. Many evil things are done in this world. Steps to prevent them suggest themselves to us, but we do not feel bound to take them. In many places in India itself people do cruel things. If we could have our way we would prevent them, but we do not go to these places and try. The thing is beyond our capacity. Sometimes it does happen that we are in a position to prevent an evil by a lesser evil, but it does not therefore become our duty to commit the lesser evil. Hence we shall have to consider non-co-operation from two points of view. Is it an objectionable weapon? I have often replied to this, that it is not so, that, on the contrary, it is one’s religious duty to non-co-operate on certain occasions. In fact, there is nothing wrong in non-co-operation itself.

We have then to consider whether or not we should use the weapon of non-co-operation on this occasion. In other words, should the Hindus help the Muslims to this extent? One and all admit that on the Khilafat issue the Muslims are in the right. It is the evident duty of Hindus to be with the Muslims in their suffering. The latter have no other weapon save non-co-operation. Can the Hindus then stand aloof and keep neutral? In my humble view, the Hindus are bound to join in non-co-operation.

106. WHAT SHOULD THE VOTERS DO?

Many who had hitherto no concern with Council elections will be shortly called upon to vote for the reformed Councils. The powers, too, of elected members will be found to have increased. This adds to the voters’ responsibility. In all our cities the citizens have been exercising the municipal franchise. And of these elections it cannot be said that the electors have always acquitted themselves in a wise manner. Electors’ private relations with the candidates have often weighed with them more than the candidates’ qualifications. It would be well if we set up a better standard for the elections to the Legislative Councils. Only thus shall we be able to make the best use of the Councils. I suggest also that voters should not identify themselves with any party or its quarrels. They should consider candidates’ views and not their party. Their character should weigh more even than their views. A man of character will make himself worthy of any position he is given. Even his mistakes will not much matter. I consider it impossible for a man without character to do higher national service so that if I were a voter, from among the list I would first select men of character and then I would understand their views. My questions to them would be:

1. Do you approve of the present swadeshi movement? If so, are you prepared to levy heavy import duties on foreign cloth? Will you favour legislation for cheapening the materials and machinery required to produce swadeshi articles?

2. Do you hold that all the affairs of a province should be conducted in its own vernacular and that the affairs of the nation should be conducted in Hindustani—a combination of Hindi and Urdu? If you do, will you endeavour incessantly to introduce the use of the vernaculars in the administration of the respective provinces, and the national language in the Imperial administration?

3. Do you hold that the present division of the provinces of India was made for administrative and political purposes and that no regard was paid to the people’s wishes? And do you hold that this division has done much harm to the national growth? If you think so, will you try to bring out a redistribution on a linguistic basis as early as possible?

4. Do you hold that there is not the remotest likelihood of India’s regeneration without Hindu-Muslim unity? And if you think so, are you, if a Hindu, willing to help the Mussulmans in all legitimate ways in their trouble?

A satisfactory answer to them alone will entitle the candidates to my vote if I had one. I suggest these questions because I regard them as of great importance. If the electors do not see any significance in these questions, they may put others which they consider to be of greater importance for the upliftment of the nation. If is not the particular questions that matter but the knowing of candidates’ views on national questions. My attempt is to point out that we need an electorate which is impartial, independent and intelligent. If the electors do not interest themselves in national affairs and remain unconcerned with what goes on in their midst, and if they elect men with whom they have private relations or whose aid they need for themselves, this state of things can do no good to the country; on the contrary, it will be harmful.

Now it remains to be considered what the electors should do if they do not receive a satisfactory answer to their questions or if they cannot find men of character. It is an established custom with regard to elections that electors, if they do not find any candidate to their liking, need not register their votes. In such a case abstention amounts to an exercise of one’s vote. Exception was taken to this procedure, that if good electors refuse to make their choice bad electors would make the worst choice. This is to a certain extent true. But suppose in a certain place, all candidates being drunkards, the better portion of the electorate abstain from voting and the candidates manage to secure votes from their kind, can they exercise any influence in the Councils? No doubt their vote has its numerical value, but their views and speeches cannot influence the Council. Moreover, an intelligent abstention has its own effect. The electors having once failed to find a proper candidate will next time take steps to find out a suitable man and elect him, and by so doing they will raise the level of their own place. In a growing nation people are able to understand the national affairs and they are expected to purify the political atmosphere they live in and to maintain its purity. All enlightened and thoughtful voters will find that occasionally situations must arise when they will have to purposely refuse to register their votes. I earnestly hope that on such occasions our electors will have courage to do so. I hope that when they do exercise the vote they will give it to the best man no matter to which party he belongs.

107. FOR USERS OF KHADI

The reader will be glad to know that the stock of khadi which had accumulated in the Satyagraha Ashram has been entirely sold out. Shri Narandas Purshottam and Shri Vithaldas Jerajani of the Shuddha Swadeshi Bhandar have bought up khadi and other things worth 10,000 rupees and demands for khadi are also coming in from the Punjab, Sind and other provinces. So, the centres which had been asked not to send any more khadi [to the Ashram] have now resumed its supply. Those who want to buy khadi keep asking for samples and prices, but at present we are in no position to be definite about either. It should be remembered that it is only a year since the revival of hand-spinning. Following its revival hundreds of women who used to remain idle for want of work have started working and earning some money. Hundreds of weavers, who had given up their profession, have resumed weaving. So, the hand-spun yarn is not yet sufficiently fine and the khadi is not of uniform quality or texture. Moreover, the weavers are not paid at a uniform rate in all places. Where they cannot afford to accept payment at a low rate, they are offered more. By and by, we shall be able to achieve some sort of a standard regarding the width, the quality and the price of khadi, and, if we learn to appreciate its usefulness and sacredness, we shall soon succeed in getting khadi worth lakhs of rupees produced and see that the people earn all that money. Meanwhile, the khadi-wearer should be satisfied with whatever quality of khadi he gets. The only assurance which can be given is that nothing would have been added to the price of this khadi over and above the cost of the cotton and the labour involved in turning the cotton into cloth. If, moreover, we take its durability into account, we shall find no cloth which can stand comparison with it.

108. FAMINE IN ORISSA

I wrote something about the Orissa famine in last Sunday’s Navajivan. I was expecting a letter from Shri Amritlal Thakkar, as I hinted then. I have received it now and it is as follows.¹

This letter is the result of first-hand investigation. How acute the distress is will be known only hereafter. Our duty, meanwhile, is clear to us. Where even a single person, for no fault of his, dies of hunger because of famine, other people have no right to eat in peace. I hope, therefore, that everybody will help to the best of his ability. Orissa is not such a place that the people themselves can help [those in distress] at the time of a calamity like this. They have received no help from other places. We have heard of this suffering and so it is our clear duty to help them. In Ahmedabad, the Gujarat Sabha has taken up this work and collections have already started for this purpose.

Receipts will be given for any contributions received and the accounts received from Shri Amritlal Thakkar will also be published.

109. MILL-OWNERS AND WORKERS OF AHMEDABAD

I had hoped that I would not have to write anything about the dispute between the mill-owners and the workers. But, when thousands of people stop working, I feel that as a journalist I am in duty bound to bring this matter to the notice of readers. There are problems of which a genuine solution is rendered more difficult by public discussion. Even so, when a situation has become the subject of talk among people, it is the duty of the journalist to put the matter before the public in its true perspective. This is so in regard to the conflict between the mill-owners and workers.

There are more than fifty mills in Ahmedabad. In these mills not less than fifty thousand workers are employed. The workers of the throstle section of the spinning departments demanded from their employers a wage of Rs. 30 and ten hours’ work instead of twelve hours’ as at present.

They submitted these demands after much thinking. There are other demands besides these which are not in dispute. They are, for instance, that in mills where they are not getting clean water, arrangements should be made to supply it to them, that lavatories, if not clean, should be improved, that separate lunch rooms should be provided where they do not exist at present. These facilities ought to be provided as a matter of course. It is a matter of shame that they have to be asked for.

What raised a serious dispute, however, was the demand for an increase in wages and decrease of working hours.

There were consultations between the representatives of mill-owners and workers. In this the object of both parties was to avert a strike. This could happen only in two ways: either the workers remain ignorant and do not try to understand their rights or, though knowing them, forgo them; Alternatively, in case of difference of opinion between the two parties, they go to a third party for a decision. If this latter course is followed, the workers should be able to act unitedly. As the mill-owners need some means, a body like their Association, to speak with one voice and in concert, the workers should also have a union to represent them. With this end in view, an effort was made to organize workers’ unions and a start was made with the workers of the throstle section. Some unions were actually formed. If these unions function well, acting with unity of purpose and speaking with one voice, their strength will increase very much indeed and, at the same time, the members will learn to be bound by their decisions whether these are to their liking or not. The risk is that, with the establishment of unions, the workers’ strength will increase and may be misused. The advantage would be that the members would learn to obey rules and exercise some self-restraint. Arbitrators can be appointed and disputes settled through them only if there are such unions. Only when this practice has taken root will there be an end to strikes.

\[\text{On March 31, Gandhiji had written to the mill-owners requesting them to grant certain concessions to the workers.}\]

In this case, when the workers put forth their demands as above, some mill-owners wanted to refer them straightway to arbitrators for their decision. Shri Ambalal [Sarabhai] took the lead in this. He felt that if disputes were resolved through arbitration, strikes could be averted and the industry could be saved losses. And so he and others, who subscribed to his view, drew up a panchanama and this was signed.

Shri Mangaldas was of the view that it would be better if there was nobody between the mill-owners and the workers; that this in fact would be the most honourable thing for the two parties. Any difference of opinion between them they should settle between themselves. He even tried to settle matters in this way. His great fear is that the workers are growing insubordinate day by day and refuse to submit to discipline. If this went on, the industry would suffer. Hence the workers should have training in securing justice by direct negotiations with the employers. He did solve some disputes in this way. But, finally, he also accepted to some extent the principle of arbitration in regard to the workers of the throstle section. It was decided that a joint award by him and myself would be accepted.

This notwithstanding, Shri Ambalal’s panchanama remained,

2 Instrument appointing a board of arbitrators
but on the understanding that, if Mangaldas’s proposal led to an agreed decision, it should be accepted by Shri Ambalal’s party. Shri Mangaldas and I could not reach agreement up to April 25. As Shri Ambalal was proceeding to England, he decided to finalize the rates of wages in so far as he was concerned and did so in consultation with the representatives of the workers. Shri Mangaldas was informed about them. Thereafter we started our consultation but could not come to an agreed decision. As a result, except in the twelve mills of Shri Ambalal’s group, there was a strike from May 9. A compromise was possible if the workers accepted something less than the wages proposed by Shri Ambalal’s group. This, however, they could not do, since they believed that even the wages accepted by Shri Ambalal’s group were not adequate. At length, they agreed to entrust the matter to a single arbitrator for award. But Shri Mangaldas and I could not name such an arbitrator acceptable to both of us and so a strike has started.

My only wish is that the workers should preserve complete peace despite the strike, that the mill-owners, too, should take alm thought and do only what is right and proper. I see no need, just now, to answer questions like these: whether or not the demands of the workers are justified, whether they have erred in doing what they have done, whether the decision of the Ambalal group to appoint arbitrators was proper, whether there was any principle at stake in Shri Mangaldas’s party fighting for a modification of rates by a small percentage, whether it was right of me to have associated myself with both panchas. For the present, I think it would be better not to go deeply into disputed matters so that a favourable atmosphere might be created for ending the strike without untoward incidents and for the resumption of work by the mill-hands.

110. MORE THOUGHTS ABOUT WIDOWS

The ideal of widowhood is one of the glories of the Hindu religion. If the vow of unswerving devotion to the husband has any meaning, it is that, once a woman has, with full knowledge, accepted and looked upon a man as her husband, even when he has died she should cherish his memory and rest in it, nay, find joy in it. It is by living in this way that thousands of widows in India have become sacred names worthy of remembrance in one’s morning prayers. Only recently I had occasion to call on Ganga-swarup Ramabai Ranade and saw her in her own room. In the centre of the room, I saw a couch, with a portrait of the late Justice Ranade placed on it. I understood its significance but to make sure I asked her why the portrait was kept there. She replied: “Well, this was his couch; it was on this that he generally sat and so I have reserved it for his portrait. I pass my day and also sleep at night under its shadow.” I was filled with joy to hear these holy words and I understood the glory of widowhood the better. I know that chaste and devoted wives like Ramabai are to be found everywhere in India.

But where shall we find men with the ideal of devotion to one wife? If there are none such, are the men merely to honour chaste and devoted wives and be satisfied with that; should they not honour such wives by themselves following with absolute firmness the ideal of devotion to one wife? What can be better worship than emulation? Where, on the contrary, there is not the slightest desire to emulate, what value is to be put upon mere lip-worship? I have been in India for five years and have gathered a good deal of experience of every aspect of Indian life. I have seen many a young man generally considered to have good character and to all appearances bearing great love for his wife, getting engaged and marrying soon after the wife dies. And this has pained me a great deal. If we had not been slaves of certain customs, the very idea that a man who had lost his wife should, even before he has returned home from the cremation, think of remarriage would be harrowing. Actually, the mother wishes to see her widowed son married again at the earliest. Even the mother-in-law encourages her widowed son-in-law to get married and the son-in-law is not in the least embarrassed when so advised. What is the meaning of such a man shedding tears [over his dead wife]? What is the value of innumerable efforts such a man may make to perpetuate the memory of his former wife? Again, how much value should the new wife attach to the love which he may shower on her? How can such a life be considered as guided by thought? I see nothing but wickedness in it and, as long as men do not mind being thus brazen-faced, to praise widowhood seems to me sheer hypocrisy and the very height of selfishness on their part.

1 Literally, in a state like Ganga’s. According to the Mahabharata, the sacred river took human form and lived as wife of King Shantanu for some time. Among Hindus, the term is prefixed to the name of a widow.

2 Widow of Justice Mahadev Govind Ranade who died in 1901; a social reformer of Maharashtra
A man who has been a friend to his wife for some years, has shared her joy and sorrow, has enjoyed life with her, should he not observe mourning even as long as one does on the death of a mere friend? Even in England, where widows can remarry, a woman of good family does not, maybe for fear of public opinion, venture to seek another man’s company for a period of one year. The nobility of an Indian husband, however, does not last beyond the cremation ground and, at times, in the very precincts of the crematorium, even as the body of his holy wife is being consumed to ashes on the pyre, his relatives do not hesitate to propose to him remarriage and the widowed man feels no shame in lending his ear to such talk. It is essential that India saves herself from this pitiable plight. I see man’s selfishness, conscious or otherwise, even in the movement for encouraging widows to remarry. By helping them to do so, men want to forget their own shame. If men believe that widows really suffer, they can help the latter to forget that suffering by themselves following uncompromisingly the ideal of taking only one wife. In such matters, public opinion has become so feeble that I have seen, all over India, educated men of noble families entering into ill-matched unions or, on the death of their wife, remarrying immediately.

Whether or not men do their duty, why should the women not have their rights? Women must have voting rights, by all means; but what will women, who do not understand what rights are or, if they understand them, do not have the strength to secure them, do with voting rights? Let them have these rights, there is no harm in that; let them become members of legislatures in India; but the foremost duty of women is to save themselves from the intentional or unintentional tyranny of men and make India glorious and strong. It is only when an ignorant woman is ready to sacrifice her equally ignorant daughter to the fire of a recent widower’s lust that the man, whose tears of grief on the loss of his wife have not yet dried, can think of remarrying. For my part, I believe that it is women’s right, nay, it is a duty they owe to themselves, to their menfolk and to India, to bring about reforms of this kind.

111. LETTER TO ESTHER FAERING

THE ASHRAM,
May 16, 1920

MY DEAR CHILD,

I cannot send you a love-letter, for the publication of the peace terms\(^1\) again unsettles the regularity of my work. I am glad you are able to leave quite so early as the 19th. I hope you received my telegram\(^2\) in reply to yours. Please do not worry about what happens to us here. We are all in God's keeping and if we wait upon Him and Him alone, whatever happens is for our good. Even so-called afflictions turn out then to be for our benefit. Give yourself perfect rest and peace at home, let your father meet you as a better Christian for having been to India and having come in contact with the Ashram and then when you are rested, strong in body, mind and soul, return. May you have a safe voyage, a happy time at home and a safe return. You will write of course regularly and give me your home address.

With deep love,

Yours,

BAPU

112. LETTER TO DEVDAS GANDHI

ASHRAM,
Vaishakh Vad 13 [May 17, 1920]\(^3\)

CHI. DEVDAS.

Your letter of the 6th came as a shock to me. I am always afraid for your health. If I did not press you to come here, it was partly also because of this fear. I thought it would be better for you to live alone in some cool place. I am waiting impatiently for your next letter. I did not get the letter you wrote before the 6th; I don't know if I shall get it. The postal department is in no end of a mess these days. I sent a telegram to Panditji about you, but I have had no reply to that either. Remember that I am going to Kashi on the 30th. There will be no harm if now you stay on there till then. We shall meet and think about the future.

I think I shall not have to go to England. Now that the peace terms are known, all that remains is to consult among ourselves what to do next.

Blessings from

113. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

ASHRAM,
May 17, 1920

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have your letter. It is good you thought about the Peace Terms. Had you not sent me the Peace Terms I would not have been able to write all that I did today and yesterday.

Why should you not take the money for the mangoes from Saraladevi? I think it is a purely practical matter. Why should she not get some work done through you if she cannot get it done equally well from somebody else? And if you refuse to take money for the expenses incurred, she will certainly be unable to do so. Hence, according to me such an exchange of money between friends is possible. Thereby frindship is strengthened, not weakened.

Have the enclosed letter sent to Shaukat Ali. Send it by the easiest method possible. He receives direct mail very late. That is why I am sending the letter through you.

Shankerlal had a letter saying that Miss Faering would be

You may even send the letter to Shaukat Ali with someone.

114. PRESS STATEMENT ON TURKISH PEACE TERMS

The Turkish terms¹ are admittedly a staggering blow to the Indian Mussulmans. In spite of the claim made in the Government communiqué that the peace terms are a fulfilment of Mr. Lloyd George’s pledge of 5th January, 1918, it is in my opinion not a true fulfilment either of the letter or the spirit of the pledge. However, what to do now is the question. I hope that the Mohammedans will not lose self-control nor give way to despair. Given an adequate measure of intelligent self-sacrifice, I have no doubt that it is possible to secure justice. There is no sacred character about the peace terms. They are capable of being revised. The only question is whether the Mohammedans can exercise full self-control and at the same time undergo considerable amount of self-sacrifice. Any outbreak of violence will, undoubtedly, spoil what is a good cause. I am convinced that non-co-operation is the only effective remedy both for avoiding violence and for healing the wound inflicted on Mohammedan India. If other Indians and Englishmen would make common cause with their Mussulman fellow-subjects the task will be easy and it will ensure non-violence in the land.

I trust that the Khilafat Committee will call immediately a joint conference of Hindus and Mohammedans to consider the steps to be taken with a view to concerted action being taken for securing a revision of the terms in consistence with the pledged word of British ministers and the known religious sentiment of Indian Mussulmans.

115. LETTER TO DEVDAS GANDHI

ASHRAM,
Amavasya [May 18, 1920]

CHI. DEVDAS,

I got only today your letter of the 21th. You must have missed my letters for about a week because, thinking that you would come here, I did not write any. When I had no letter from you, I lost patience and started writing. When I did not receive any even after this, I sent a telegram and now they have started coming.

You cannot praise Panditji’s kindness too much. He gets so many things done through his large-heartedness.

I am bound to worry about you in a general way. But I feel reassured by the thought that your character will always protect you.

I shall arrive there on the 29th. Since I shall be starting from Bombay at night, there is only one train I can take. Panditji, I presume, will be there. Pandit Motilal has written to everyone suggesting that all of us could stay in a hotel, but I have replied to him saying that, if Panditji is there, he will not allow me to put up at any place but his.

I have already sent you a copy of Mr. Montagu’s reply.

Mr. Aiyyar of Pondicherry was here. He stayed for three days.

The workers’ strike will end today. I believe they will resume work from tomorrow. I think I sent you all the leaflets.

Fatima is on a visit here with her mother-in-law, and so I stop.

Blessings from

Readers of Young India will be agreeably surprised to learn that the article about khaddar has not only resulted in complete disposal of the stock that had accumulated at the Ashram, but it has evoked orders from Baluchistan, the Nilgiris, and even Aden. This is as it should be. The revival of the ancient cottage industry of India—hand-spinning during leisure hours in their own homes by the millions of women, and hand-weaving in similar circumstances by men—cannot but produce a silent yet effective revolution in this country and prevent an annual drain of crores of rupees which need never have left India and distribute the savings among the poor millions instead of concentrating them in the hands of a few capitalists. This is not to say that we do not want capitalists in India. They are there already. They are able to take care of themselves. It is the poor millions who need to be lifted up from grinding poverty and consequent degradation. Nothing but a full revival of the hand-spinning and the hand-weaving industry can raise them effectively and speedily. It is to be hoped therefore that the demand for khaddar being proved, its production will be stimulated in every nook and corner of India.

The most wonderful experience, however, of the popularity of swadeshi has been that of Shrimati Sarladevi Chowdhriani and Mrs. Mohani, the wife of that sincere and indefatigable worker, Maulana Hasrat Mohani. Writing from Lahore whilst preparing to go to Bareilly, where she had to go to attend the Khilafat Conference, the former says:

I have done my packing racked with conflicts as to what to take and what not to take with me—whether to wear khaddar dress there while addressing the audience or swadeshi silk, the point of which will not be so well understood—whether to take up the trunk or to wrap up the holdall with clothes inside the bedding—whether to be smart and fashionable as of old or to be simple and common only. I have at last chosen to be the latter. But it is taking time and trouble to assimilate the new method.

1. This article has been identified as Gandhiji’s from the draft in his hand preserved in the Gandhi Smarak Nidhi.

3. Held on May 3, 1920
Writing after her experiences of Bareilly, she says:

Just coming back from visits to Mohammedan families. There were two ladies—wife and sister in one place. They took the vow for charkha and swadeshi. In another place there were six ladies who all took the same vow. It was a family of Cutchi Bohras, very rich and cultured, settled down here since the days of the Mutiny. I find I can do the swadeshi and charkha propaganda to perfection in these provinces. My swadeshi dress is having its effect. At a meeting called in Bareilly by Mrs. Mohani, fifteen Mohammedan ladies took the swadeshi vow.

Speaking to the Bareilly divisional conference in Hindustani on a resolution on swadeshi, she laid stress upon the deep poverty of India and her two chief wants—food and raiment—and she said that if we did not know how to manage our own homes and could not make the two ends meet, we would be ill fitted to undertake the management of the national affairs. It was remarkable, she added, that whilst the people were ready to listen to speeches which required from them no action and no sacrifice they were chary of attending meetings where they were told home truths and which drew their attention to their primary duty of attending to swadeshi at all costs. She asked them to work in the spirit of the late Vidyasagar, who was not only not ashamed of but took pride in wearing throughout his life khaddar cloth. She admitted that return to khaddar was difficult, but all upward movements were so. India would never be able to produce the beautiful cloth she did before, until she resolutely refused to use silks from China, Japan, France and elsewhere, and was content in the interval to wear cloth made out of coarse yarn that daughters of India were able to produce today. Her poverty and her nakedness, too, left no option to those who realized the actual condition of the country. She appealed to those on the platform to lead the way, emphasizing her admonition by quoting:

यज्ञयज्ञार्थं कुस्ते लोकमृदुवच्छते॥ of the above remarks in their own home, for they had to prepare

117. SOME QUESTIONS ANSWERED

I write to thank you for yours of the 7th instant and especially for your request that I should, after reading your writings in Young India on non-cooperation, give a full and frank criticism of them. I know that your sole desire is to find out the truth and to act accordingly, and hence I venture to make the following remarks. In the issue of May 5th you say that non-co-operation is”not even anti-Government”.¹ But surely to refuse to have anything to do with the Government to the extent of not serving it and of not paying its taxes is actually, if not theoretically, anti-Government; and such a course must ultimately make all government impossible. Again, you say, “It is the inherent right of a subject to refuse to assist a government that will not listen to him.”² Leaving aside the question of the ethical soundness of this proposition, may I ask which government, in the present case? Has not the Indian Government done all it possibly can in the matter? Then if its attempts to voice the request of India should fail, would it be fair and just to do anything against it? Would not the proper course be non-co-operation with the Supreme Council of the Allies, including Great Britain, if it be found that the latter has failed properly to support the demand of the Indian Government and people? It seems to me that in all your writings and speeches you forget that in the present question both Government and people are at one, and if they fail to get what they justly want, how does the question of non-co-operation arise? Hindus and Englishmen and the Government are all at present”shouldering in a full-hearted manner the burden the Mohammedans of India are carrying,”³ etc., etc. But supposing we fail of our object—what then?
Are we all to refuse to co-operate and with whom?

Might I recommend the consideration of the following course of conduct?

1.”Wait and see” what the actual terms of the Treaty with Turkey are.

2. If they are not in accordance with the aspirations and recommendations of the Government and the people of India, then every legitimate effort should be made to have the terms revised.

¹*Vide*”How to Work Non-co-operation”, 5-5-1920.
3. To the bitter end, co-operate with a Government that co-operates with us, and only when it refuses co-operation, go in for non-co-operation.

So far I personally see no reason whatsoever for non-co-operation with the Indian Government, and till it fails to voice the needs and demands of India as a whole there can be no reason. The Indian Government does sometimes make mistakes, but in the Khilafat matter it is sound and therefore deserves or ought to have the sympathetic and whole-hearted co-operation of every one in India. I hope that you will kindly consider the above and perhaps you will be able to find time for a reply in Young India.

I gladly make room for the above letter and respond to the suggestion to give a public reply as no doubt the difficulty experienced by the English friend is experienced by many. Causes are generally lost, not owing to the determined opposition of men who will not see the truth as they want to perpetuate an injustice but because they are able to enlist in their favour the allegiance of those who are anxious to understand a particular cause and take sides after mature judgment. It is only by patient argument with such honest men that one is able to check oneself, correct one’s own errors of judgment and at times to wean them from their error and bring them over to one’s side. This Khilafat question is specially difficult because there are so many side issues. It is therefore no wonder that many have more or less difficulty in making up their minds. It is further complicated because the painful necessity for some direct action has arisen in connection with it. But whatever the difficulty, I am convinced that there is no question so important as this one if we want harmony and peace in India.

My friend objects to my statement that non-co-operation is not anti-Government, because he considers that refusal to serve it and pay its taxes is actually anti-Government. I respectfully dissent from the view. If a brother has fundamental differences with his brother, and association with the latter involves his partaking of what in his opinion is an injustice, I hold that it is brotherly duty to refrain from serving his brother and sharing his earnings with him. This happens in everyday life. Prahlad did not act against his father, when he declined to associate himself with the latter’s blasphemies. Nor was Jesus anti-Jewish when he declaimed against the Pharisees and the hypocrites, and would have none of them. In such matters, is it not the intention that determines the character of a particular act? It is hardly correct as the friend suggests that withdrawal of association under general circumstances would make all government impossible. But it is true that such withdrawal would make all injustice impossible.

My correspondent considers that the Government of India having done all it possibly could, non-co-operation could not be applicable to that Government. In my opinion, whilst it is true that the Government of India has done a great deal, it has not done half as much as it might have done, and might even now do. No government can absolve itself from further action beyond protesting, when it realizes that the people whom it represents feel as keenly as do lakhs of Indian Mussulmans in the Khilafat question. No amount of sympathy with a starving man can possibly avail. He must have bread or he dies, and what is wanted at that critical moment is some exertion to fetch the wherewithal to feed the dying man. The Government of India can today head the agitation and ask, to the point of insistence, for full vindication of the pledged word of a British Minister. Has the Government of India resigned by way of protest against the threatened, shameful betrayal of trust on the part of Mr. Lloyd George? Why does the Government of India hide itself behind secret despatches? At a less critical moment Lord Hardinge committed a constitutional indiscretion, openly sympathized with the South African passive resistance movement and stemmed the surging tide of public indignation in India, though at the same time he incurred the wrath of the then South African Cabinet and some public men in Great Britain. After all, the utmost that the Government of India has done is, on its own showing, to transmit and press the Mohammedan claim. Was that not the least it could have done? Could it have done anything less without covering itself with disgrace? What Indian Mohammedans and the Indian public expect the Government of India to do at this critical juncture is not the least, but the utmost that it could do. Viceroy's have been known to tender resignations for much smaller causes. Wounded pride brought forth not very long ago the resignation of a Lieutenant-Governor. On the Khilafat question, a sacred cause dear to the hearts of several million Mohammedans is in danger of being wounded. I would therefore invite the English friend, and every Englishman in India, and every Hindu, be he moderate or extremist, to make common cause with the Mohammedans and thereby compel the Government of India to do its duty, and thereby compel His Majesty’s Ministers to do theirs.

\[1\text{Vide Lord Hardinge's Speech}, 3-12-1913.\]

There has been much talk of violence ensuing from active non-co-operation. I venture to suggest that the Mussulmans of India, if they had nothing in the shape of non-co-operation in view, would have long ago yielded to counsels of despair. I admit that non-co-operation is not unattended with danger. But violence is a certainty without, violence is only a possibility with, non-co-operation. And it will be greater possibility if all the important men, English, Hindu and others of the country, discountenance it.

I think that the recommendation made by the friend is being literally followed by the Mohammedans. Although they practically know the fate, they are waiting for the actual terms of the treaty with Turkey. They are certainly going to try every means at their disposal to have the terms revised before beginning non-co-operation. And there will certainly be no non-co-operation commenced so long as there is even hope of active co-operation on the part of the Government of India with the Mohammedans, that is, co-operation strong enough to secure a revision of the terms should they be found to be in conflict with the pledges of British statesmen. But if all these things fail, can Mohammedans as men of honour who hold their religion dearer than lives do anything less than wash their hands clean of the guilt of British Ministers and the Government of India by refusing to co-operate with them? And can Hindus and Englishmen, if they value Mohammedan friendship, and if they admit the full justice of the Mohammedan claim, do otherwise than heartily support the Mohammedans by word and deed?

Young India, 19-5-1920

118. PLEDGES BROKEN

After the foregoing was printed the long expected peace terms regarding Turkey were received. In my humble opinion, they are humiliating to the Supreme Council, to the British Ministers, and if as a Hindu with deep reverence for Christianity I may say so, a denial of Christ’s teachings. Turkey broken down and torn with dissensions within may submit to the arrogant disposal of herself, and Indian

3 Of the Allies
Mohammedans may out of fear do likewise. Hindus out of fear, apathy or want of appreciation of the situation, may refuse to help their Mohammedan brethren in their hour of peril. The fact remains that a solemn promise of the Prime Minister of England has been wantonly broken. I will say nothing about President Wilson’s fourteen points\(^1\), for they seem now to be entirely forgotten as a day’s wonder. It is a matter of deep sorrow that the Government of India \textit{communique} offers a defence of the terms, calls them a fulfilment of Mr. Lloyd George’s pledge of 5th January, 1918, and yet apologizes for their defective nature and appeals to the Mohammedans of India, as if to mock them, that they would accept the terms with quiet resignation. The mask that veils the hypocrisy is too thin to deceive anybody. It would have been dignified if the \textit{communique} had boldly admitted Mr. Lloyd George’s mistake in having made the promise referred to. As it is, the claim of fulfilment of the promise only adds to the irritation caused by its glaring breach. What is the use of the Viceroy, saying,”The question of the Khilafat is one for the Mohammedans and Mohammedans only and that with their free choice in the matter Government have no desire to interfere,” while the Khalif’s dominions are ruthlessly dismembered, his control of the holy places of Islam shamelessly taken away from him and he himself reduced to utter impotence in his own palace which can no longer be called a palace but which can be more fitly described as a prison? No wonder His Excellency fears that the peace includes”terms which must be painful to all Moslems”. Why should he insult Muslim intelligence by sending the Mussulmans of India a message\(^2\) of encouragement and sympathy? Are they expected to find encouragement in the cruel recital of the arrogant terms or in a remembrance of ‘the splendid response’ made by them to the call of the King ‘in the day of the Empire’s need’? It ill becomes His Excellency to talk of the triumph of those ideals of justice and humanity for which the Allies fought. Indeed, the terms of the so-called peace with Turkey, if they are to last, will be a monument of human arrogance and man-made injustice. To attempt to crush the spirit of a brave and gallant race, because it has lost in the fortunes of war, is a triumph not of humanity but a demonstration of inhumanity.

\(^1\) Accepted by the Allies as the basis of peace on January 4, 1918
\(^2\) Published on May 14, 1920; \textit{vide} Appendix”Viceroy’s Message to Muslims of India”, before 3-6-1920.
And if Turkey enjoyed the closest ties of friendship with Great Britain before the War, Great Britain has certainly made ample reparation for her mistake by having made the largest contribution to the humiliation of Turkey. It is insufferable therefore when the Viceroy feels confident that with the conclusion of this new treaty that friendship will quickly take life again and a Turkey regenerate, full of hope and strength, will stand forth in the future, as in the past, a pillar of the Islamic faith. The Viceregal message audaciously concludes, "This thought will, I trust, strengthen you to accept the peace terms with resignation, courage and fortitude and to keep your loyalty towards the Crown bright and unmarred as it has been for so many generations." If Muslim loyalty remains unmarred it will certainly not be for want of effort on the part of the Government of India to put the heaviest strain upon it, but it will remain so because the Mohammedans realize their own strength—the strength in the knowledge that their cause is just and that they have got the power to vindicate justice in spite of the aberration suffered by Great Britain under a Prime Minister whom continued power has made as reckless in making promises as in breaking them.

Whilst therefore I admit that there is nothing either in the peace terms or in the Viceregal message covering them to inspire Mohammedans and Indians in general with confidence or hope, I venture to suggest that there is no cause for despair or anger. Now is the time for Mohammedans to retain absolute self-control, to unite their forces and, weak though they are, with firm faith in God to carry on the struggle with redoubled vigour till justice is done. If India—both Hindu and Mohammedan—can act as one man and can withdraw her partnership in this crime against humanity which the peace terms represent, she will soon secure a revision of the treaty and give herself and the Empire at least, if not the world, a lasting peace. There is no doubt that the struggle would be bitter, sharp and possibly prolonged, but it is worth all the sacrifice that it is likely to call forth. Both the Mussulmans and the Hindus are on their trial. Is the humiliation of the Khilafat a matter of concern to the former? And if it is, are they prepared to exercise restraint, religiously refrain from violence and practise non-co-operation without counting the material loss it may entail upon the community? Do the Hindus honestly feel for their Mohammedan brethren to the extent of sharing their sufferings to the fullest extent? The answer to these questions, and not the peace terms, will finally decide the fate of the Khilafat.

119. LETTER TO PRABUDAS GANDHI

CHI. PRABHUDAS,

I find that there is a marked improvement in your health. You can get even more benefit by keeping yourself cheerful. Do not worry about your work, nor even about your health. Remain cheerful as is the wont of human nature. Doing so, you will be able to take the full advantage of the pure air there. I will go to Kashi in a few days. Therefore, coming there is just not possible. I feel sorry about that.

120. LETTER TO DEVDAS GANDHI

[BOMBAY, Jeth Sud 2] [May 20, 1920]²

CHI. DEVDAS,

I get letters from you regularly now. Since I am going there,¹ I hesitate to say that you may go to Almora. If you wish to, you may, though. If you feel like staying there [for some time], we shall draw up a programme only after I arrive there.

I have come here³ for a day in connection with the Khilafat. You will be reading about it all in Young India and Navajivan.

As for my health, there is nothing in particular except weakness. I am so weak that I cannot walk at all. The legs have lost all strength. I cannot understand the cause. I can do my writing and other work well enough.

Prabhudas, Balkrishna, Doctor, Mahadev and Revashankerbhai have stayed on in Sinhgadh. Miss Faering left yesterday.

121. LETTER TO MAGANLAL GANDHI

BOMBAY, Thursday [May 20, 1920]¹

CHI. MAGANLAL,

I have come here for a day. Ever since you left, I have spent the time for morning and evening prayers in long discussions. I discussed the things we have been talking about: my connection with the Ashram, Khilafat, swadeshi, Home Rule League work, how I cultivated peace and how others can do so. We talked at length. I am going to talk more yet. You will get reports from others.

Jaisukhlal has been to see me. He came only yesterday. His health is broken. Vrajlal is still running a temperature. His face looks all right, though. Make yourself thoroughly familiar with things before you return. I shall have to leave Ahmedabad for Kashi on the 26th.

122. LETTER TO SHAH HAFIZ ALAM

[May 21, 1920]²

DEAR SHAH SAHIB,

I have your letter of the 14th instant. I received it only today on my return from Bombay, where I had gone for the Khilafat business³.

I wish our friends will understand that the whole struggle consists in suffering imprisonment and all the other hardships that the Government may seek to impose upon us. We must not expect to carry on a stubborn non-co-operation campaign and yet expect not to be arrested, bound over, imprisoned, deported. The whole struggle consists in our ability to undergo all these things without a single muscle being moved. I for one, therefore, will not only quarrel with the vigour of Government but will prepare the community for much greater. I hope to be in Benares on the 30th instant where I will be pleased to meet Allaha-bad friends. What we now need is not big meetings but a proper grasp of the situation on the part of those who have to lead the movement.

128. WHAT SHALL WE DO NOW?

The peace terms have been announced. We understand the English term peace to mean the treaty which ends fighting. But it also means quiet. If the terms which are announced had been described as the terms of war, the description would have been truer to facts. But, as was said in ridicule of the late Mr. Gladstone by an equally great man, the late Mr. Disraeli, language was invented not to express men’s thoughts but to conceal them. That remark is perfectly applicable to the peace terms now announced. To say that there is peace where one

1. As noted by the addressee
2. In connection with the conference on the Khilafat issue to be held at Allahabad; vide“Telegram to Shaukat Ali”, 22-5-1920.
party forces the other to agree to something against its will, crushes it under its brute strength, is a grave offence against Satyanarayan.

And yet the Supreme Council has framed such terms and sent them to Turkey. It has, by doing so, disgraced the epithet it uses to describe itself. For a council which ignores justice and, blinded by its strength, wishes to describe injustice as justice, to call itself supreme is to add insult to injury. The peace terms may be said to have completely violated the pledges given by British Ministers. The promise was to the effect that the Turkish Empire would be preserved intact in Asia and Europe, wherever there were communities of Turks. But the Turkish Empire has been preserved only in name. In fact, the Supreme Council has, as it were, imprisoned the Sultan in his own palace. This amounts to torturing the Turks by constantly reminding them of their past glory. There was hope that the holy places of Islam would remain under the control of the Khalifa. Actually, he has been deprived of his suzerainty over these holy places as also over the peninsula which Muslims know as Jazirat-ul-Arab; in all this, there is not even a trace of justice or truth. Its being described, nevertheless, as justice is the very limit of man’s pride and haughtiness, his reliance on brute strength. If such one-sided terms can be described as just, many things in the world which we usually know as injustice will have to be considered just.

And yet His Excellency the Viceroy, addressing the Muslims, tells them that they should remain peaceful, that what now remains leaves room for hope and so they should take heart, rather than fall into despair. They should remember [he says] the old friendship between England and Turkey, and now that the peace terms have brought about a reunion, they should cement the new friendship and help in creating a new and glorious Turkey. These words of His Excellency are like branding again a man who has received burns. What should one do in this difficult situation? If the Muslims sit still, all that they have done during the last four years will be proved to have been hollow. If the Muslims have no peace, Hindus can have none, and vice versa—such is the law of friendship. If, losing our peace of mind in this way, we give way to anger and, getting excited, take to violence, we shall have lost the game. If we refrain from

1 God in the form of Truth
2 In his message of May 14, 1920; vide Appendix”Viceroy’s Message to Muslims of India”, before 3-6-1920.
violence, however, and show that we have the strength for self-sacrifice, we need not at all conclude that we have lost the game.

The Muslims and the rest of the country need not at all be shocked that the peace terms have been finalized. If India does her duty, these terms will certainly be revised. There is no reason to doubt this. To get these terms revised, India has only one thing at her disposal and that is non-co-operation. Non-co-operation has now become a duty because, if we do not start it, India will have been party to this injustice. The British Empire is alive only because of the co-operation of all its subjects. In everything it does, the Empire must have co-operation, whether the co-operation is given willingly or otherwise. The chief manifestation of satyagraha is refusal to submit to compulsion. Hence, wherever the people have even a little of satyagraha in them, they refuse to submit to compulsion and the rulers may manage such satyagrahi subjects by cajoling, that is, by pleasing them. On this issue of the Khilafat, the people should not submit to force nor allow themselves to be won over by cajoling. Hence, if the feelings of the Muslims have been really hurt, at any rate they cannot co-operate with the Empire. If the Muslims cannot, how can the Hindus?

A meeting of leading Hindus and Muslims is to be held shortly to consider when and how to start non-co-operation. If the decisions of this meeting are enthusiastically accepted by the people, we shall produce good from what seems evil today. Meanwhile, the people should show the utmost patience and wait. That will be tapascharya for them.

This great issue, however, raises many secondary issues. Some of these deserve attention. People from a number of places have strongly urged on me the inadvisability of non-co-operation and the risks involved in it. Hence, thinking that the answers I have given to some friends who have advised me deserve to be read by readers of Navajivan as well, I give here the substance of a letter from an English friend and of my reply to him.

129. IMPORTANCE OF KHADI

The reader will be glad to know that we have been receiving orders for khadi from all over India. All the stocks of khadi have been sold out and orders are still pouring in. But people should not understand from this that one should order no more khadi. Because people had lost faith in it, the production of khadi has stopped but otherwise our position is so good that we can produce heaps and heaps of it. Besides, though I want khadi to be sold, I place so high a value on it that I do not want anyone to order it, if it is actually not needed, just in order to reduce accumulated stocks. Khadi made from hand-spun yarn is sacred to me, so that such khadi is not to be thrown away. Moreover, consumption of khadi without real need will harm the country. Khadi will have been wisely used when we start wearing it in place of the fine cloth or foreign or mill-made cloth now used by us. Only then shall we succeed in overcoming the shortage of cloth in India. The rule, therefore, is that people who use a great variety of dresses should reduce their needs of cloth—so that the pressure on available cloth may be reduced and even in meeting their genuine needs they should use khadi wherever they can. This will spare cloth for the people and the money spent over cloth will have been well used, for, instead of a few people earning it, it will be distributed among thousands. It is not enough that we produce and consume; we should use our discretion in doing so. Production—and the manner of consumption too—should be so organized as to benefit the maximum number of people. This is the simple principle of economics. People starve only where this is violated. Hence a demand for khadi by itself will not please me. I can see, though, from the type of people who order khadi that they wish to put it to good use. We should also rejoice inasmuch as the demand for khadi is an expression of the love for the ideal of swadeshi. Orders for khadi have been received from places like Baluchistan and the Nilgiri Hills and from far-away Aden.

Perhaps we can derive still more satisfaction from the experience of Shrimati Saraladevi Chowdhari and the wife of the capable and extremely good-natured Maulana Hasrat Mohani. Saraladevi had an invitation to attend the Khilafat Conference at Bareilly. She went there on the 3rd. Having enjoyed wearing a khadi sari during the Satyagraha Week, she was perplexed what her duty was and considered the matter with herself. She wrote in one of her letters:

After reaching Bareilly, on the basis of her experience there, she wrote:

At the Provincial Conference at Bareilly, she moved the resolution on swadeshi. I give here some paragraphs from her speech in Hindi on that occasion:

Soon after she had made this speech, she and her husband were to be put to a test, for their eldest son was married last Wednesday. They were faced with the question what dresses they should get ready for the bride and the bridegroom. Writing about this, Pandit Rambhuj Dutt Chaudhari says:

130. MILL-OWNERS AND WORKERS OF AHMEDABAD

There is a proverb in English that all's well that ends well. Accordingly, the difference which arose for some time between the mill-owners and workers and the strike by the latter will be forgotten in a few days by both the parties as well as by the people but the good memories of that strike will remain. The workers, it can be safely asserted, showed in good measure the qualities of patience, firmness, courtesy, etc. It can also be said that they made an honest effort to give up drinking.

Two circumstances militated against peace: that twelve mills were working and that the workers of the threshle department alone were on strike. The other workers were thrown out of employment for no fault of theirs. Even so, they exercised no pressure and peace was preserved throughout. We cannot adequately congratulate the workers on this.

We must admit, also, that the mill-owners, too, played their part in preserving peace. If they had wanted, they would have or could... have provoked breach of peace. There is no doubt that, even if the workers had refused to be so provoked, the mill-owners could have made the maintenance of peace very difficult. On the contrary, the mill-owners, too, were always thinking how the strike could be ended early and it was because of this that it ended in ten days’ time. I hope the workers will unhesitatingly resume work and give full satisfaction to their employers. If they make good use of the increase in wages which the arbitrators have granted them, the fears which many mill-owners entertain on this subject will be dispelled. While, on the one hand, the wages have increased, on the other working hours have decreased. The workers should make good use of time thus saved and prove their worth by displaying greater vigilance and doing in ten hours the work they used to do in twelve.

I appeal to the mill-owners to be generous to the workers and win them over. If both the parties thus strive in the same direction, there will be no cause for difference or bitterness. One good principle has emerged as a result of this strike, namely, the principle of arbitration. The workers will not [I hope] go on strike hereafter but, whenever there are any differences between them and the employers, the two will always resolve their differences through arbitration. If this principle of arbitration comes to stay, there will be no reason at any time to fear disputes or strikes in Ahmedabad mills.

Both the parties have passed resolutions to this effect, but the value of resolutions depends on the future behaviour of those who pass them. The law cannot oblige them to do so. Everything depends upon the integrity and sense of honour of the two parties. And, therefore, rather than depend on the principle of arbitration, if the workers behave with courtesy and respect and the mill-owners, on their part, maintain a fatherly attitude towards the workers, no occasion will arise for an arbitrator to be appointed or for the workers to go on strike. The latter should realize that they can count on the services of revered Anasuyabehn or Shri Shankerlal Banker only so long as there is justice in their demands. But the ultimate aim of these two is also that the workers should have no occasion to require their services. If such a happy result can be brought about, everybody may then direct his attention to improving the internal conditions among the workers, and more can be done towards that end. It is very necessary to undertake such work all over India. There is awakening and people’s enthusiasm and strength have increased. All this energy, however, if not used with discretion, will run to waste like so many floods and may even do harm if it takes a wrong turn as the latter do when they suddenly change their course. That the workers should try to improve their internal conditions need not be said; but I trust the mill-owners will take full interest in their effort and help them. It is to their advantage to do so. Where self-interest and the interest of others have gone together, the results have been the finest; let this general experience be the experience of the mill-owners and the workers alike.

131. MARRIAGE PROCESSIONS

I have received a letter on this subject from a highly educated lady. Thinking the following part of the letter¹ to be important, I place it before readers.

My purpose in reproducing this letter is to see that people start thinking about the subject, which I took courage to discuss, and do something at any rate to carry out the suggestions. On questions of reforms like these, so useful to the people, we cannot rest content with holding good views. We should, rather, learn to abandon immediately any custom which we think to be injurious. A number of people came to me from Baroda. As this was a year of marriages among Patidars² and as the Gaekwar Government had prohibited the evil custom, prevalent among them, of marrying off even little boys and girls, these people had come to consult me on how to get the ban removed. I told them that, if I had the powers of the Gaekwar Government, I would offer such satya-graha against people marrying off boys and girls of tender age that they would not even be able to stay on in the State. These friends understood my joke and not only did they give up the idea of securing my help but started discussing how this custom of child marriage, which had had so strong a hold over the people, could be ended. I told them that, if other communities have every year auspicious periods during which marriages can be celebrated, the shastras cannot be so wrong-headed as to forbid this to Patidars. In such matters, it should not be necessary even to seek advice. Any individual who feels so inclined may refuse to marry off his daughter, and think himself free, like anyone else, to arrange the marriage in any year. On this, they said that, if they did not get their daughters married this year they might not get a suitable match later. Thus [they said] though some customs may be bad, it is difficult to go against them. I told them, in reply, that even if but one single person comes forward to oppose such wicked customs, he will certainly get another to keep him company, and I gave these friends the examples of some Patidars who had waited till their daughters had grown up. I told them finally that one who is convinced of the rightness of a certain course will risk anything in following it. About a daughter, the utmost risk is that she might remain unmarried till rather late. I can see no difficulty at all in this. It has been my experience that a wisely educated girl has no difficulty in maintaining self-control. I told the men of this. They took leave of me. I do not know what they finally did, but this example shows how strong is the force of custom. Until, regardless of its strength, we fight this force of custom with all our energy, we shall not succeed in ending these evil customs which sap the vitality of the people.

But I have strayed from the question of marriage processions to that of ill paired unions. The common man will not experience the same difficulty in getting rid of ostentatious marriage processions as the Patidars do in saving their daughters [from the evil of child marriage]. If everyone who is sick of such processions introduces reforms immediately where he is himself concerned, without waiting for others, we shall, with very little effort, shake off the hold of this and other suicidal practices of like nature.

132. STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

I observe that, following the announcement of the peace terms, people\(^1\) have been resigning their honorary positions and renouncing titles on their own responsibility. I think this is a hasty step. Before taking the momentous step of non-co-operation, it is very necessary for people to make petitions for a reconsideration of the peace terms and give public expression to their feelings on this issue. I hope, therefore, that people who have been thinking along these lines will not act individually and will take no steps without instructions from the central body\(^2\).

133. SPEECH ON SETTLEMENT OF MILL STRIKE, AHMEDABAD\(^3\)

May 23, 1920

SHETH SHRI MANGALDAS, SISTERS AND BROTHERS,

Our reason for gathering here today is that the strike is over and we are once again free. The relations of the employers and the workers are again normal. We started the business of the meeting with two prayers. I hope every brother and sister here has reflected over these prayers. If any of them has not done so, I should like to draw their attention to them. Their tune was good, no doubt, but it is not to the tune that I draw your attention. I do so to the sweetness, the meaning, expressed through the tune. If we think over the two prayers, we shall see what a vast difference there is between \textit{jiva}\(^4\) on the one hand, and \textit{Shiva}\(^5\) on the other, between the human being, man or woman, in all his or her weakness, and Almighty God. We can do nothing except through God’s will. God is the Supreme, All-powerful

\(^1\)For example, Yakub Hasan who resigned his membership of Madras Legislative Council on May 20, 1920

\(^2\) The Central Khilafat Committee

\(^3\) According to a Bombay Secret Abstracts report this speech was made on May 23, 1920, at a meeting of representatives of mill-owners and mill-hands.

\(^4\) Self

\(^5\) The third God in the Hindu Trinity: principle of transcendent goodness.
Existence, Whom we cannot but obey, against Whom neither satyagraha nor duragraha\textsuperscript{1} avails, Who is omnipresent, omniscient and knows all. And so the prayer-song asks: “O God, what greatness yours, and what an insignificant, ignorant creature I am! What has one like me to do with pride and conceit?” We have but one duty, to pray to God, to pray to Him whether we are in bed or sitting, whether we are eating or doing anything else. This is what our shastras enjoin and our bhajans advise. The experience of all men points to the same thing. And so it is that we commence the business of this important meeting with prayers to God.

I should like to tell the men and women present here that, if they would leave this world satisfied that they had fulfilled the purpose for which they had come into it, they should do everything with God as witness. You should ask yourselves, before you do anything, whether it would please God. If the answer is in the negative, do not go ahead with it.

When explaining the duty of workers, this is what I said once. If they wish to improve their conditions and want the goodwill of their employers, they should be honest and give up their addictions; they should become industrious and work hard, should be efficient and courteous. To be courteous means to carry out orders and speak with due respect, and this not only to the employer but to everyone else. We are not courteous if we are humble before the employer and salute him but insult our superior appointed by this very employer. One of the employers told me that the spinners in his mill had taken up the stand that they would resume work only if a certain jobber was removed. I should like to ask these workers who had refused to resume work whether they had come to this decision with God as witness.

We have now decided that hereafter we will not resort to a strike. We have found another weapon in its place, a weapon far more dignified than strikes. If we have a grievance and even a respectful representation to the employer brings no redress or satisfaction, we should go to the Association\textsuperscript{2}. If we get no satisfaction from that quarter also, we should approach the panch for justice. The members of this panch are present before you. Sheth Mangaldas has been appointed to represent the employers and I, at the instance of the revered Anasuya-behn and Bhai Shankerlal and with my consent, to represent the workers. This panch will decide the points at issue in any dispute which may arise in the course of one year from now. While it functions, there must be no strike. Complaints are still being received from places that in some mills the workers have not resumed work. I felt ashamed when I heard this and wondered whether there was any point in holding this meeting. But the majority of the workers have resumed work and it is for their sake that I am here today. I entreat those who have gone back to work to persuade the others to do the same. But they are not to force anyone in this matter, not to abuse anyone or speak with the least disrespect, not to go about flourishing a stick. You should only entreat them, should prostrate yourselves at their feet, humble yourselves before them, reason with them and tell them that it is their dharma to go back to work. If any members of the Union are guilty of rudeness and refuse to go back to the mills, they have no right to continue as members of the Union. I therefore request all friends who have not resumed work to do so tomorrow itself. Only then will this big meeting justify itself.

\textsuperscript{1} The opposite of satyagraha \textsuperscript{2} Presumably, the Mill-owners’ Association

In the presence of Shri Mangaldas, I request the employers—as a representative of workers I can only request them with folded hands—that they should be generous to the workers and look kindly on them. I, on your behalf, have conceded to them that, if any workers misbehave or are guilty of some offence towards them, they may dismiss such workers and I shall not intervene. My only request is that they should be kind to the men, not dismiss anyone who might happen to be above the others and something of a leader to them. Sheth Mangaldas has assured me that he does not desire a single pice of the workers, that they do not want the workers’ curses by robbing them of what is theirs, that they would rather part with a rupee to a worker than deprive him of a pice. He has told me this time and again. There will be no more disputes between the workers and the employers in regard to wages. Sheth Mangaldas asked me how they could agree to give the workers anything if the latter put their demand aggressively. If the workers approached them in a friendly spirit, as becomes employees, they would not mind conceding a rupee. I told him that, if any workers approached him in an arrogant spirit, he might certainly refuse to concede anything. Even when the manner is respectful, the workers may not demand anything in excess of their rights. If the workers remain courteous and are reasonable and if the employers display generosity and a sense of justice, you would have no need of approaching Anasuyabehn or Shankerlal or me.

All mill-owners who are members of the Association came together today and looked into the rates of wages in other departments. They fixed these rates at generous figures. I don’t say that the rates were an award by the panch. If that had been so, we could only say that the workers had had bare justice. What has happened is of far greater value than any award by the panch. If they granted an increase to workers in the throstle department, the employers argued, what crime had workers in other departments committed? It would be more dignified, more generous, they felt, to give them something before, rather than after, they came asking for it. The rates were not fixed by the panch; actually, they are higher than what the panch had recommended and were offered by the employers of their own free will. We should welcome them without reserve, nay, even gratefully.

Workers in the blow-room and card-room, workers carrying basket-loads or drawing carts, oilmen, sizers,folders and such other workers have not been granted this permanent increase, but they have what was granted to them earlier in the scheme signed by Bhai Ambalal. That is, they get an increase of 25 per cent. Everyone, of course, will have a working day of ten hours.

In the case of framers, the figure has been raised from 35 per cent to 40 per cent and they will get a bonus, too, in the same way that the workers in the throstle department have been getting. In this matter, the framers have no ground for complaint. The employers have been generous to them.

For weavers and warpers, the figure put down was 25 per cent but this has been raised to 33\(\frac{1}{3}\) per cent.

Winders will get an increase of 40 per cent over the existing rate, which will mean more than a rupee.

All these rates are good. All will admit, surely, that they are higher than the existing ones. Everyone will get an increase of between 25 and 40 per cent. I hope you will all be happy with these rates, be grateful to God and thank the employers.

I have heard that the workers in the weaving department are still dissatisfied. I have not looked closely into this matter; I have had no time to do so. The employers have given much thought to the subject. Their view is that the workers should not claim anything for the period of the strike.

I have told them of what I have heard about the workers in the weaving department. Their attitude is that they have given this increase on their own and so the weavers should not create a hitch when they wished to introduce connection for all time. Though I do not know who is in the right between you two, the employers and the workers, I put it to the latter whether, now that the employers had done so much for them, they would not like to abide by their decision. Even if they have taken up their stand to test the workers, the latter had better given in. Assuming that, when marking attendance, the managers informed you, as you say they did, that you would be paid [for the strike period], even then I would say that we cannot insist on having our way in this matter.

My next point, by way of advice, is that on this issue, too, we may demand justice, but the right way is not a strike. Some of the workers refuse to go back to work; this does not become them. An important principle has been laid down, that you should never go on strike, that in case of dispute you should take it in the first instance to the Union and, failing there, place it before the panch. Can we now take the law in our own hands and refuse to go back to work?

Those of you who are still holding out should return to work from tomorrow. You may represent your case before the employers and, if you think that they have not been fair to you, ask for a panch; you may not, however, stop work even for an hour. I hope you will ever cling to this principle.

The employers cannot go on a strike. It is you, workers, who are obliged to do so. And so it is with a view to avoiding unnecessary loss to you and maintaining happy relations that they have accepted the principle of arbitration. If it is accepted only by them, what would be the workers’ contribution? I request the workers of the weaving department to present respectfully any demand they may have and return to work. If you do so, the employers will feel that you have been very good and therefore they ought to concede your demand. We may not adopt tactics of coercion; if anyone believes that the demand could be secured through coercion, he is mistaken. I wish to declare in the presence of the employers that, if at any time I find workers unreasonable, I will not help them but, on the contrary, help the former. My duty is to oppose injustice whenever I see it. If the workers are unreasonable with the employers, I can bring myself to oppose them too as I can oppose the Government and the employers.

If I accepted a bribe from you today—if you shower me with praises and garland me with flowers, that is as much as a bribe—if I were to be taken in by it all and get conceited, I might next learn to receive bribes from Sheth Mangaldas. I shall be of value only so long as I am useful in getting even justice dealt out. If you try to do an injustice, I shall have to oppose you and see that justice was done. I am against no one in this world; I do not take sides against employers nor will I ever do so against workers, but I should certainly oppose injustice by either. If we commenced the business of this meeting with God’s name, it was entirely because we want justice.

I should once again like to tell Sheth Mangaldas as the leader of mill-owners and President of the Association, as a leading figure in the Vaishnava community, that, if he wanted the employers to have the workers under their full control, they should always do justice with God as witness, look kindly on them and love them as their own children. I want to assure him that, if they do this, the workers will not betray them.

We have done a great many things sitting under this tree.1 We started our work today under this tree with God as witness; it is for you to see it through. Here, under this very tree, I want to tell you that our task is not yet over; it has just begun. So long as you have not obtained the employers’ certificate, your task is not over, or mine or the revered sister’s2 or Bhai Shankerlal’s. The flower garlands you have offered us mean nothing; it is your work which will count.

I shall end, as I began, with thought of God. The workers of the throstle department have collected some money and they offer it to me to be used in some good cause. I accept money from every quarter; for other causes, however, I generally hold out my hand to men like Sheth Mangaldas and will continue to do so in future. I will certainly not refuse the money you offer with so much love. I shall hand it over to the revered sister. She will use it for the uplift of the workers, to help them, especially, to be free from the evil of drinking.

Next, the money will be used to provide education to workers’ children and milk to such of them as go without it. I do not know how much you have brought but [whatever it is] I accept it as a token of your love and, as an expression of my love, I will use it in the manner I have indicated.

134. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

ASHRAM,
May 25, 1920

You have asked me [a] very searching question. I have always recognized that there are fundamental differences between you and me on the marriage and the caste question. I do not consider marriage to be a necessity in every case. From the highest standpoint it is a status lower than that of celibacy but I recognize it to be an absolute necessity in most cases. At the same time I would put disciplinary restraints upon the choice of man and woman and just as it would be considered improper for a brother to marry his sister I would make it improper for a person to marry outside his or her group which may be called a caste. I would there-by make the other men or women free from the attentions of that person. And if a person cannot get a suitable match within the limits prescribed for him or her he or she should be satisfied to remain unmarried. In other words I do not believe in unbridled licence. The vast majority of unions are due merely to physical attraction. I would narrow down this circle of attraction. So you see that I would be averse to a Brahmin going outside his circle for the choice of a wife; there is no question here of untouchability. Caste I consider a useful institution if properly regulated. Untouchability is a crime against God and humanity. I would purify the former, I would destroy the latter. If Manilal fell in love with a pariah girl, I would not quarrel with his choice but I would certainly consider that he had failed to imbibe my teaching. I would like him to be satisfied with his own caste division not because he would have any repugnance against the others but because I would like him to exercise self-restraint. Similarly for the institution of caste. In the Ashram we do not observe any caste restrictions, because we are making a new experiment but I would not like a Brahmin to go beyond his pale, and indulge in dining here, there and everywhere. Again, therefore, non-dining with me does not proceed from a sense of . . . it but it proceeds from a sense of discipline. Rob the caste of its impurities, and you will find it to be a bulwark of Hinduism and an institution whose roots are embedded deep down in human nature. Now for the Khilafat question. I have said nothing about Armenia because I know nothing about it and because I do not want the Sultan of Turkey or any other power to rob Armenia of its independent existence. It can have autonomy as well under the Turk as any other power. I have said always that absolute guarantees may be taken from the Sultan about non-interference with the internal administration of Armenia; similarly for Arabia. The position created by the peace treaty is simply intolerable. The Arabians have lost what independence they had under the Sultan because they were more than a match for him. And now if the king of Hejaz and Amir Feisal can help it, Arabia and Mesopotamia will be drained dry for both these men will be puppets in the hands of British officers whose one aim would be to make as much money as possible for the European capitalists.

135. LETTER TO DEVDAS GANDHI

Tuesday [May 25, 1920]

CHI. DEVDAS,

I got one letter from you which you wrote from Calcutta. I wrote a good many to you. I wonder why you did not get any.

I shall arrive there on Saturday, accompanied by Bhai Shankerlal and Jugatram. I shall be travelling by the Jabalpur Mail. I have not looked up when it arrives there. But I have an impression that it arrives early in the morning.

Blessings from

136. LETTER TO PRABHUDAS GANDHI

ASHRAM,

Tuesday [May 25, 1920]

CHI, PRABHUDAS,

I received your letter. I liked it very much indeed. I will certainly furnish you all the means for finding your path. The path is quite easy for persons like you. You may imbibe all the zest you can from Vinoba, but what you are seeking, you will not get from anything outside of yourself but only from within yourself. However, Vinoba will help you to scrape out the crusts that may have grown over your mind. Do not be impatient. Repeat to yourself again and again that compassion is the root of dharma. Understand what is real compassion and you will get everything else. It is the effort to understand the real meaning of compassion and truth that wearies us. It is only through experience that we understand their meaning. I will be returning after about fifteen days. See that instead of going after this thing or that, you cling to the study of Sanskrit alone. Music, of course, is there. If you do this, you will feel no burden on your brain. Learn other things which you may in the ordinary course of things. You have lost nothing by going to Sinhagad. It would indeed have been better if I could have stayed on. If, however, your health improves, the other things will follow without any effort on your part. But worrying even about one’s health is a sin. If we are able to preserve the body, we will be able to find the means of realizing the atman while still alive. If we fail, we will get another, better than the present one. It is Tulsidas who has taught us the truth that it is the body which is the source of the sense of ‘I’ but as it is also a means [of realizing the self], we may try to improve its condition, and you are doing that in Sinhagad.

You may certainly come here when you wish. I am sending the reply by return of post. I thought of sending a wire, but then dropped the idea.

1 As supplied by the addressee. In his letter dated May 20, 1920, Prabhudas had sought Gandhiji’s permission to leave Sinhagad and return to the Ashram.
I have fully understood the nature of Balkrishna. He must have got my letter. I will arrange things for him as he desires. I have written him a long letter.

It seems to me that you will now come only with Radha¹.

137. INSANITY

In the course of its discussion of my views on non-co-operation the Allahabad Leader asked me to state what I meant by ‘wise and temperate action’ on the part of the Government in dealing with the Khilafat agitation. The U.P. Government have provided me with an excellent illustration of unwise and intemperate action almost, if not altogether, amounting to insanity. I refer to the externment from Mussoorie of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, the son of the Hon’ble Pandit Motilal Nehru.

Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru’s dignified letter to the Superintendent of Police furnishes the public with all the facts in connection with the order served on him. The whole of the Allahabad public could bear witness, if witnesses to the action of an honourable man were necessary, that Mr. Nehru junior was proceeding with his mother, his sisters and his ailing wife to Mussoorie purely for reasons of health. Having inquired of him, having received an unequivocal, straightforward and full explanation of his presence in Mussoorie, having the knowledge that the members of the family were with him in Mussoorie, the authorities ought to have accepted Mr. Nehru’s word and refrained from taking further action. It should be remembered that Mr. Nehru in his letter to the Superintendent of Police said:

I have no concern with the Afghan delegation² and it was an accident that we both happened to be in the same hotel. As a matter of fact their presence here has put me out to a certain extent as I was looking forward to taking possession of the rooms at present occupied by them. I am of course

² Which came to India to prepare the foundation for a treaty of friendship, and in April, 1920, was in Mussoorie interested in the delegation as every intelligent person must be. But I had or have not the slightest intention of going out of my way to meet them. We have been here now for the last seventeen days and during this period I have not seen a single member of the delegation even from a distance. You are yourself aware of this fact as you told me this morning.

This was not enough for the authorities. They had lost their mental balance. They wanted an assurance that Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru would not have any communication with the delegation, for we learn from the same letter:

But although I have no intention whatever of seeing the Afghans or of having any communication with them, I utterly dislike the idea of binding myself down to any course of action at the instance of the Government, even though such action may not prove irksome. It is really a question of principle or conscience. You will, I feel sure, appreciate my position.

And the Government whom Mr. Oakes, the Superintendent of Police, represented, appreciated the position by serving on him the order of externment two days after the receipt of the letter. Mr. Nehru was anxious that the Government should have the full facts before them, [and] therefore told them in the same letter:

If the Government chooses to serve any order on me, I am for the present prepared to obey it. It will be a great inconvenience to me to go down suddenly and leave my family by themselves here. The condition of my wife’s health requires the most careful attention and my mother is a confined invalid and it is most difficult to leave them uncared for. My sudden departure will upset my father’s and my plans entirely and cause us any amount of trouble and anxiety. But I suppose individual conveniences cannot be considered in high matters of State.

In a well-regulated State, individual inconvenience is as much a ‘high matter of State’ as any other, except when individual welfare demonstrably requires to be sacrificed to corporate welfare. In this instance there was nothing, so far as the public are aware, to warrant the inhumanity of tearing a husband from his ailing wife and separating an aged mother from her only son and protector when they have no one else to look after them and are away from home. I call.

1 The order of externment from Mussoorie passed on Jawaharlal Nehru was withdrawn on June 19, 1920.
this insanity of a very severe type and it can only proceed from a guilty conscience. The Government know that the peace terms1 are dishonourable and in breach of the pledges of ministers. They know, too, that the Mohammedan sentiment has been deeply hurt. They know that the Hindu sympathy is completely with them and they know that the Afghan delegation is also in complete accord with the Indian Mohammedan feeling. They are therefore afraid of any Indian of importance being in the position of knowing anything of or from the Afghan delegation. The Government have therefore become hyper-suspicious.

But we must not answer this madness with madness. I am loath to think that the Government of Sir Harcourt Butler2 desires to goad the people to violence so that he can repeat the frightfulness of the Punjab and terrorize the people into silence and submission. But whether it is the intention of that Government to do so or not, the leaders of the Khilafat movement must prepare themselves for more acts of the Mussoorie type. And the way to success lies not in becoming angry but in welcoming such acts of repression so that they may, ceasing to produce any effect upon those against whom they are directed, cease altogether even as a medicine that does not react upon a patient is necessarily stopped by the administering physician. The severest punishment is stopped as soon as it fails to produce the effect intended.

But the most shocking instance of madness comes from Sind. The Alwahid, published in Karachi in Sindhi and owned by a responsible merchant, has in its issue of the 13th instant a letter from the Secretary of the Khilafat Committee, Jacobabad, which, after relating that some respectable men connected with the Khilafat movement were sent to jail, proceeds that a respectable zemindar was whipped by the Deputy Commissioner within closed doors and that on his crying out, the police entered the room and administered further beating to him. In Mussoorie, at least, the decorum of law, such as it is, was observed. Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru was not physically molested. But in Sind, if the allegation of the Secretary of the Khilafat Committee is true, a respectable man has been whipped by a Deputy Commissioner, so far as the public are aware, without any cause.

1 In regard to Turkey; vide Appendix “Turkish Peace Terms”, before 3-6-1920.
2 Lieutenant-Governor of the then United Provinces, known at present as Uttar Pradesh whatsoever warranting such procedure. The Governor of Bombay enjoys the reputation of being the sanest of Governors and one may trust that he will make the fullest enquiry into the incident and the other allegations made, and publish the result of that enquiry. The Bombay Chronicle supports the Alwahid statement by giving the version of the same incident received by Mr. Shaukat Ali. If the facts set forth are true the offending Deputy Commissioner must be removed. But whether he is removed or not, the duty before those who are guiding the Khilafat movement is absolutely clear. Are they prepared to go through the fieriest of ordeals? An insolent treaty of peace, if it is in any way resisted by those who are affected by it, can only be supported by an equally insolent exhibition of force. And if Indian Mohammedans and Indians in general are more concerned with the revision of the treaty than with showing resentment and anger, they will submit to all the ill-treatment that may be meted out to them and yet pursue the policy of not submitting to the treaty. Any use of violence against Government violence must kill the Khilafat movement.

138. KHILAFAT : MR. CANDLER’S OPEN LETTER

Mr. Candler has favoured me with an open letter on this question of questions. The letter has already appeared in the Press. I can appreciate Mr. Candler’s position as I would like him and other Englishmen to appreciate mine and that of hundreds of Hindus who feel as I do. Mr. Candler’s letter is an attempt to show that Mr. Lloyd George’s pledge is not in any way broken by the peace terms. I quite agree with him that Mr. Lloyd George’s words ought not to be torn from their context to support the Mohammedan claim. These are Mr. Lloyd George’s words as quoted in the recent Viceregal message:

Nor are we fighting to destroy Austria-Hungary or to deprive Turkey of its capital, or of the rich and renowned lands of Asia Minor and Thrace which are predominantly Turkish in race.

Mr. Candler seems to read ‘which’ as if it meant ‘if they’, whereas I give the pronoun its natural meaning, namely, that the Prime

---

1 Sir George Lloyd
2 Made on January 5, 1918
Minister knew in 1918 that the lands referred to by him were ‘predominantly Turkish in race’. And if this is the meaning, I venture to suggest that the pledge has been broken in a most barefaced manner, for there is practically nothing left to the Turk of ‘the rich and renowned lands of Asia Minor and Thrace’.

I have already given my view of the retention of the Sultan in Constantinople. It is an insult to the intelligence of man to suggest that ‘the maintenance of the Turkish Empire in the homeland of the Turkish race with its capital at Constantinople’ has been left unimpaired by the terms of the peace. This is the other passage from the speech which I presume Mr. Candler wants me to read together with the one already quoted:

While we do not challenge the maintenance of the Turkish Empire in the homeland of the Turkish race with its capital at Constantinople, the passage between the Mediterranean and the Black Sea being internationalized, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Syria and Palestine are in our judgment entitled to a recognition of their separate national condition.

Did that mean entire removal of Turkish influence, extinction of Turkish suzerainty and the introduction of European-Christian influence under the guise of Mandates? Have the Moslems of Arabia, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Syria and Palestine been committed, or is the new arrangement being superimposed upon them by Powers conscious of their own brute strength rather than of justice of their action? I for one would nurse by every legitimate means the spirit of independence in the brave Arabs, but I shudder to think what will happen to them under the schemes of exploitation of their country by the greedy capitalists protected as they will be by the mandatory Powers. If the pledge is to be fulfilled, let these places have full self-government with suzerainty to be retained with Turkey as has been suggested by The Times of India. Let there be all the necessary guarantees taken from Turkey about the internal independance of the Arabs. But to remove that suzerainty, to deprive the Khalif of the wardenship of the holy places is to render Khilafat a mockery which no Mohammedan can possibly look upon with equanimity. I am not alone in my interpretation of the pledge. The Right Hon’ble Ameer Ali, calls the peace terms a breach of faith. Mr. Charles Roberts reminds the British public that the Indian Mussulman sentiment

1 Syed Ameer Ali (1849-1928); Judge of the Calcutta High Court, 1890-1904; member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council regarding the Turkish Treaty is based upon the Prime Minister’s pledge regarding Thrace, Constantinople and Turkish lands in Asia Minor, repeated on February 26 last with deliberation by Mr. Lloyd George. Mr. Roberts holds that the pledge must be treated as a whole, not as binding only regarding Constantinople but also binding as regards Thrace and Asia Minor. He describes the pledge as binding upon the nation as a whole and its breach in any part as a gross breach of faith on the part of the British Empire. He demands that if there is an unanswerable reply to the charge of breach of faith it ought to be given and adds the Prime Minister may regard his own word lightly if he chooses, but he has no right to break a pledge given on behalf of the nation. He concludes that it is incredible that such a pledge should not have been kept in the letter and in the spirit. He adds:

I have reason to believe that these views are fully shared by prominent members of the Cabinet.

I wonder if Mr. Candler knows what is going on today in England. Mr. Pickthall writing in New Age says:

No impartial international enquiry into the whole question of the Armenian massacres has been instituted in the ample time which has elapsed since the conclusion of armistice with Turkey. The Turkish Government has asked for such enquiry. But the Armenian organizations and the Armenian partisans refuse to hear of such a thing, declaring that the Bryce and Lepssens reports are quite sufficient to condemn the Turks. In other words the judgment should be given on the case for prosecution alone. The inter-Allied commission which investigated the unfortunate events in Smyrna last year, made a report unfavourable to Greek claims. Therefore, that report has not been published here in England, though in other countries it has long been public property.

1 On February 26, 1920, Lloyd George declared in the House of Commons: “The pledge given in January, 1918, was given after full consultation with all parties. . . . It was specific, unqualified and deliberate. . . . The effect of the statement in India was that recruiting went up appreciably from that very moment.”

2 Marmaduke Pickthall; journalist and novelist; editor of The Bombay Chronicle; possessed close and intimate knowledge of the Near East

3 Eventually Armenia, abandoned by the Allies, became a Soviet Republic on November 25, 1920

4 On May 15, 1919, the Greek army was sent to Smyrna, and hundreds of Turkish civilians were massacred.

5 The Report of the Allied Admirals, made in October, 1919, and suppressed by the Government, condemned the Smyrna landing in toto and declared the Greeks guilty of looting, arson and murder.
He then goes on to show how money is being scattered by Armenian and Greek emissaries in order to popularize their cause and adds:

This conjunction of dense ignorance and cunning falsehood is fraught with instant danger to the British realm, and concludes:

A Government and people which prefer propaganda to fact as the ground of policy—and foreign policy at that—is self-condemned.

I have reproduced the above extract in order to show that the present British policy has been affected by propaganda of an unscrupulous nature. Turkey, which was dominant over two million square miles of Asia, Africa and Europe in the 17th century, under the terms of the treaty, says the London Chronicle, has dwindled down to little more than 1,000 square miles. It says:

All European Turkey could now be accommodated comfortably between the Lands End and the Tamar, Cornwall alone exceeding its total area, and but for its alliance with Germany, Turkey could have been assured of retaining at least sixty thousand square miles of the Eastern Balkans.

I do not know whether the Chronicle view is generally shared. Is it by way of punishment that Turkey is to undergo such shrinkage, or is it because justice demands it? If Turkey had not made the mistake of joining Germany, would the principle of nationality have been still applied to Armenia, Arabia, Mesopotamia and Palestine?

Let me now remind those who think with Mr. Candler that the promise was not made by Mr. Lloyd George to the people of India in anticipation of the supply of recruits continuing. In defending his own statement, Mr. Lloyd George is reported to have said:

The effect of the statement in India was that recruiting went up appreciably from that very moment. They were not all Mohammedans but there were many Mohammedans amongst them. Now we are told, that was an offer to Turkey. But they rejected it, and therefore we were absolutely free. It was not. It is too often forgotten that we are the greatest Mohammedan power in the world and that one-fourth of the population of the British Empire is Mohammedan. There have been no more loyal adherents to the throne and no more effective and loyal supporters of the Empire in its hour of trial. We gave a solemn pledge and they accepted it. They are disturbed by the prospect of our not abiding by it.

Who shall interpret that pledge and how? How did the

1 On February 26, 1920
Government of India itself interpret it? Did it or did it not energetically support the claim for the control of the Holy Places of Islam vesting in the Khalif? Did the Government of India suggest that the whole of Jazirat-ul-Arab could be taken away consistently with that pledge from the sphere of influence of the Khalif, and given over to the Allies as mandatory Powers? Why does the Government of India sympathize with the Indian Mussulmans if the terms are all they should be? So much for the pledge. I would like to guard myself against being understood that I stand or fall absolutely by Mr. Lloyd George’s declaration. I have advisedly used the adverb ‘practically’ in connection with it. It is an important qualification.

Mr. Candler seems to suggest that my goal is something more than merely attaining justice on the Khilafat. If so, he is right. Attainment of justice is undoubtedly the cornerstone, and if I found that I was wrong in my conception of justice on this question, I hope I shall have the courage immediately to retrace my steps. But by helping the Mohammedans of India at a critical moment in their history, I want to buy their friendship. Moreover, if I can carry the Mohammedans with me I hope to wean Great Britain from the downward path along which the Prime Minister seems to me to be taking her. I hope also to show to India and the Empire at large that given a certain amount of capacity for self-sacrifice, justice can be secured by the peacefullest and cleanest means without sowing or increasing bitterness between the English and Indians. For, whatever may be the temporary effect of my methods, I know enough of them to feel certain that they alone are immune from lasting bitterness. They are untainted with hatred, expedience or untruth.

Young India, 26-5-1920

139. SAVARKAR BROTHERS

It is My earnest desire at this time that so far as possible any trace of bitterness between My people and those who are responsible for My Government should be obliterated. Let those who in their eagerness for political progress had broken the law in the past respect it in the future. Let it become possible for those who are charged with the maintenance of peaceful and orderly Government to forget the extravagances which they have had to curb. A new era is opening. Let it begin with a common determination among My people and officers to work together for a common purpose. I therefore direct My Viceroy to exercise in My name and on My behalf My Royal clemency to political offenders in the fullest measure which in his judgment is compatible with the public safety. I desire him to extend it on this condition to persons who for offenses against the State or under any special or emergency legislation, are suffering imprisonment or restrictions upon their liberty. I trust that this leniency will be justified by the future conduct of those whom it benefits and that all My subjects will so demean themselves as to render it unnecessary to force the laws for such offences hereafter.—The Royal Proclamation.

The Proclamation from which the above extract has been copied was published in December last. Thanks to the action of the Government of India and the Provincial Governments, many of those who were undergoing imprisonment at the time have received the benefit of the Royal clemency. But there are some notable "political offenders" who have not yet been discharged. Among these I count the Savarkar brothers. They are political offenders in the same sense as men, for instance, who have been discharged in the Punjab. And yet these two brothers have not received their liberty although five months have gone by after the publication of the Proclamation.

Mr. Ganesh Damodar Savarkar, the elder of the two, was born in 1879, and received an ordinary education. He took a prominent part in the swadeshi movement at Nasik in 1908. He was sentenced to transportation for life with confiscation of property under Sections 121, 121A, 124A and 153A on the 9th day of June, 1909, and is now serving his sentence in the Andamans. He has therefore had eleven years of imprisonment.

Section 121 is the famous section which was utilized during the Punjab trials and refers to "waging war against the King". The minimum penalty is transportation for life with forfeiture of property. 121A is a similar section. 124A relates to sedition. 153A relates to promotion of enmity between classes 'by words either spoken or written' or 'otherwise'. It is clear therefore that all the offences charged against Mr. Savarkar (senior) were of a public nature. He had done no violence. He was married, had two daughters who are dead, and his wife died about eighteen months ago.

The other brother was born in 1884, and is better known for his career in London. His sensational attempt to escape the custody of the police and his jumping through a porthole in French waters, are still fresh in the public mind. He was educated at the Fergusson College, finished off in London and became a barrister. He is the author of the proscribed history of the Sepoy Revolt of 1857. He was tried in 1910, and received the same sentence as his brother on 24th December, 1910. He was charged also in 1911 with abetment of murder. No act of violence was proved against him either. He too is married, had a son in 1909. His wife is still alive.

1 Vinayak Damodar Savarkar, a leading revolutionary who later became the chief leader of All-India Hindu Mahasabha

Both these brothers have declared their political opinions and both have stated that they do not entertain any revolutionary ideas and that if they were set free they would like to work under the Reforms Act, for they consider that the Reforms enable one to work thereunder so as to achieve political responsibility for India. They both state unequivocally that they do not desire independence from the British connection. On the contrary, they feel that India’s destiny can be best worked out in association with the British. Nobody has questioned their honour or their honesty, and in my opinion the published expression of their views ought to be taken at its face value. What is more, I think, it may be safely stated that the cult of violence has, at the present moment, no following in India. Now the only reason for still further restricting the liberty of the two brothers can be ‘danger to public safety’, for the Viceroy has been charged by His Majesty to exercise the Royal clemency to political offenders in the fullest manner which in his judgment is compatible with public safety. I hold therefore that unless there is absolute proof that the discharge of the two brothers who have already suffered long enough terms of imprisonment, who have lost considerably in body-weight and who have declared their political opinions, can be proved to be a danger to the State, the Viceroy is bound to give them their liberty. The obligation to discharge them, on the one condition of public safety being fulfilled, is, in the Viceroy’s political capacity, just as imperative

1 He carried on agitation for the freedom of India, which at one time reached the stage of his sending fire-arms to India from Paris.
2 Off Marseilles, in July 1910, when he was being brought to India from England where he was arrested under the Fugitive Offenders Act of 1881
3 Of A. M. T. Jackson, the Collector of Nasik in December 1909. It was alleged that the pistol with which Jackson was murdered was one of the many sent by Savarkar from London.
4 Government of India Act, 1919
as it was for the Judges in their judicial capacity to impose on the two brothers the minimum penalty allowed by law. If they are to be kept under detention any longer, a full statement justifying it is due to the public.

This case is no better and no worse than that of Bhai Parmanand who, thanks to the Punjab Government, has after a long term of imprisonment received his discharge. Nor need his case be distinguished from that of the Savarkar brothers in the sense that Bhai Parmanand pleaded absolute innocence. So far as the Government are concerned, all were alike guilty because all were convicted. And the Royal clemency is due not merely to doubtful cases but equally to all cases of offences proved up to the hilt. The conditions are that the offence must be political and the exercise of Royal clemency should not, in the opinion of the Viceroy, endanger public safety. There is no question about the brothers being political offenders. And so far the public are aware there is no danger to public safety. In answer to a question in the Viceregal Council in connection with such cases the reply given was that they were under consideration. But their brother has received from the Bombay Government a reply to the effect that no further memorials regarding them will be received and Mr. Montagu has stated in the House of Commons that in the opinion of the Government of India they cannot be released. The case however cannot be so easily shelved. The public are entitled to know the precise grounds upon which the liberty of the brothers is being restrained in spite of the Royal Proclamation which to them is as good as a royal charter having the force of law.

140. A HARD CASE

I have received the following telegram from the families of Messrs Bugga and Ratanchand:

Bugga and Ratto under orders transfer Andamans. Bugga, suffering hernia and piles since ten years. Was operated upon. Ratto aged over forty and therefore should not be sent Andamans under Jail Manual Rule 721.

The readers will remember that these were the accused on whose behalf appeals were made to the Privy Council in common with others and whose appeals were rejected on technical grounds.\(^1\) The Hon’ble

\(^1\) Vide “The Amritsar Appeals”, 3-3-1920.
Pandit Motilal Nehru has analysed the cases and shown that they are no more guilty than the others who have been discharged. But several who were originally sentenced to death had their sentences commuted to imprisonment and are now set free. What is it that distinguishes these two cases from the others? Is it the fact of the appeal itself? If they had not appealed, or rather, if a philanthropic lawyer out of pity had not taken up their case, fought for them against tremendous odds, they would not have escaped the hangman’s noose. H. H. the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab has been showing a generous discretion in releasing many who suffered between April and June last year. Although he had the opportunity, after the dismissal of the appeal, to hang Messrs Bugga and Ratanchand, H. E. the Viceroy, it is equally true, has commuted the sentence of death to one of transportation. But I venture to submit that if the Royal Proclamation is to be given effect to in the fullest measure, Messrs Bugga and Ratanchand are entitled to their liberty. They are no more a danger to the State than Lala Harkishen Lal, Pandit Rambhuj Dutt Chowdhari and others of that distinguished company. But for the time being, strong as the case is for their discharge, I am pleading not for a complete release but for keeping them in the Punjab and if they have been sent away already, for bringing them back, if for nothing else, out of consideration for the wives of these poor men. Let not the public think that the acts of the Government of the day are dictated only by fear and expedience, not by logic and high principles of justice.

141. LETTER TO MANGALDAS G. PAREKH

May 26, 1920

BHAISHRI MANGALDAS,

I was unhappy that we could not arrive at a decision yesterday. I was quite hopeful that we would. I told you that I had already discussed the matter with Ambalalbhai. The final result was that the mills which go with him will pay warp-pieceRs. 13 a week [fortnight?] and 8 annas a week as bonus. This rate is for 340 to 380

1 The source has “horse” here.
2 In regard to the detailed working out of the terms of settlement of the dispute between mill-workers and mill-owners spindles. For spindles less than 340, the rate is Rs. 12-12-0 and for more than 380, Rs. 13-4-0. The rate for weft-piecers has been fixed at Rs. 13-8-0. For doffers, it is Rs. 9-4-0, with a bonus of 4 annas. For half-timers, the rate fixed is Rs. 5.

Hours of work are fixed at 10. The rates above are also on this basis. Besides, if [at least] 75 per cent of the mills do not join, the ten-hour scheme will not come into effect at present.

Caution money will not exceed ten days’ [wages]. These are the main points. I still request you to accept, and persuade others to accept these terms. I think so much is perfectly reasonable.

BOMBAY,

Bhim Agiarash [May 28, 1920]

It is not for me to write a preface to this essay, for the author is a friend of mine. I can say only this about it, that the views it expounds are a credit to swadeshi dharma. I should like India to profit to the utmost from this essay.

143. INSANITY

I have said that in employing the extreme weapon of non-co-operation we must learn to exercise patience. If we get excited, we may invite serious harm. If the Government is seized by anger, we can do nothing but bear it. Every time those in authority make a mistake, they want people to get excited and commit acts of violence. If the people walk into this trap, public attention will be diverted from

1 The booklet was published by Swami Anand from the Satyagraha Ashram in 1920.
2 Dattatreya Balkrishna Kalelkar (1885- ); popularly known as Kaka Saheb; associated with Gandhiji since 1915 the original injustice to the disorders. The Government and the public join hands to suppress the mischief-makers and, by and by, the Government’s injustice is forgotten. It may also happen that, when the people agitate against the injustice, the authorities make a powerful effort to repress the agitation and in their attempt to cover up the original injustice overstep reasonable limits. In the result, the authorities go to insane lengths in repressing the agitation.

I think our Government is possessed by some such insanity. Pandit Motilal Nehru is known to everyone in the United Provinces’. The Governor there has known him for thirty years. His only son, Jawaharlal, is a barrister and he, too, is well known among the people. He helps his father to the utmost in his professional and public work. Everyone in the United Provinces knows that his mother keeps indifferent health. Of late Shri Jawaharlal Nehru’s wife has been very ill. The Nehru family often goes in summer to Mussoorie for a change of climate. This year, it was all the more necessary for them to do so in view of the illnesses referred to above. When the decision to go there was made, they did not even know that members of the Afghan Delegation were to visit Mussoorie, nor that the latter would be staying in the same place as they. However, since accommodation in Mussoorie is none too plenty, the Nehru family and the Afghan delegates found themselves together. The officials could not bear their staying in the same building. It was not possible, however, to put restrictions on Shri Jawaharlal Nehru straightway and so the Superintendent of Police sent for him and told him that he would be permitted to stay on in Mussoorie provided he gave an undertaking that he would not even so much as speak with those delegates. How can a person who has any sense of self-respect give such an undertaking? Actually one may maintain no relations with the delegates; that is beside the point. In fact Shri Nehru remained in Mussoorie for 15 days and never had so much as a word with them. But it is one thing, of one’s own free will, not to speak to a person without occasion and another to bind oneself under pressure from a third party not to do so. Hence Shri Jawaharlal refused to give such an undertaking. Thereupon he was immediately served with an order to leave Mussoorie. He had placed all the facts before the official and told him of his difficulties, too. But what are [people’s] difficulties to an official?

1 Now Uttar Pradesh
If the king is mindful of the difficulties of the weakest section of his subjects, his rule would be Ramarajya, it would be people's rule. We cannot expect this of any government in modern times, be it British or Indian, Christian, Muslim or Hindu. Europe, which we are so impatient to imitate, also worships brute force or, which is the same thing, majority opinion, and the majority, surely, does not always look after the interests of the minority. In ordinary matters, the principle of majority rule is, by and large, justice as the world understands justice, but the purest justice can consist only in the welfare of all. It is only a government that fully protects the weakest among its subjects, and safeguards all his rights, which may be described as perfectly democratic. Such a government does not mean the rule of the majority, but protection of the interests of even the smallest limb of the realm. We cannot at present expect from our Government such protection and such rule. But the step it has taken is plain insanity, for it is inconceivable that it has any strong reason for it.

This is but a symptom of insanity. If the report received from Sind is true, the Deputy Commissioner there seems to have reached the very height of midsummer madness. Not only does he place restrictions on respectable citizens with a view to arresting the Khilafat movement, but he is also said to have beaten up one such person.\(^2\) Let us hope the Governor of Bombay will carefully inquire into this matter. At the moment, however, it is more necessary to consider our own duty. Non-co-operation cannot be said to have started yet; when it does, beyond doubt the Government will employ all its strength to suppress it. Who can say what degree of insanity will possess it then? If at that time the people remain firm, refuse to be provoked and are guilty of no acts of violence, they will have risen high indeed and the Khilafat issue, I have no doubt, will be solved in our favour.

The Khilafat Committee is meeting very soon to pass the final resolutions about non-co-operation and related matters. The All-India Congress Committee is meeting\(^3\) most probably on May 30, and the Khilafat Committee is likely to meet at about the same time in Kashi or Prayag.

1 Literally “the reign of Rama” here, however, it means an ideal political order.

3 The Congress Committee met in Banaras on May 30 and resolved to hold a special session of the Congress in Calcutta later in the year to consider Gandhiji’s programme of non-co-operation.
144. WHY IS NON-CO-OPERATION BEING DELAYED?

A reader of Navajivan writes:

I have dropped an adjective here and there in this extract. There are many more accusations, but I do not have the courage to reproduce them. The correspondent has given his name too; I do not wish to publish it either. It is possible that he himself may have intended his letter as private advice. Nevertheless, I have reproduced the portion which I thought was worth reproducing.

It is only so long as there are among the people men full of all this anger and suspicion, be they only a few isolated individuals, that difficulties will arise in employing a priceless weapon like non-co-operation. The writer of this letter has not at all understood the principle underlying the use of such a weapon. Nor has he the patience which Muslim friends show. I have not at all conceived non-co-operation as the weapon of the unarmed. The strong and the weak, all can employ it. I have often explained how on some occasions non-co-operation may be a sacred duty.

The grave charges made against British Ministers are unjustified. I believe that the Prime Minister has committed a breach of promise in this matter, but I do not believe the charge that the [entire] British Cabinet is faithless and treacherous or that all the officers in India are autocratic. I do not share the belief that the British people or the British Ministers are utterly worthless in comparison with us and that we abound in virtues. Personally, I am all love for the British people. They are a brave, unsuspecting and a fairly godfearing people; they are not totally irreligious. If they worship brute strength, they also recognize soul-force. This country has done many wrong things, but it has many good deeds to its credit. It has produced many a yogi who deserves to be adored. The organizing ability of the people, their patience and their skill are worth emulating. Because I see their faults, because they have done injustices to India, I cannot abandon or stifle my sense of justice. There will be hardly anyone who has fought against the injustice of the British as I have done. But, behind all this fighting, deep down in me, there is my regard for this nation or, if one prefers, my unthinking love for it. I believe that no other people, excepting Indians, recognize soul-force as quickly as the British do.

1 The letter is not translated here.
This is the basis on which I have conducted my many campaigns. Should I, however, be mistaken in my estimation, I would not have to repent for that reason since I do not depend, in any movements which I lead, on external circumstances but only on the purity of the cause and of the means employed. Truth has nothing to fear from time. It can afford to be patient. One who follows truth will see no danger at all in waiting.

What charges against the Moderates, besides? If most of the people believe that the Moderates are nothing but traitors and flatterers, I would certainly be disappointed and grieved. I for one believe that both the parties' have the welfare of the country at heart. When we were all slumbering, the country resounded with Surendranath’s voice. There was a time when the word of Sir Dinshaw Wacha was respected all over the Bombay Presidency. I consider it a sin to describe such national leaders as traitors or flatterers. At present I do not approve of many of their views. My recent experience has certainly taught me new things. I cannot tolerate Surendranath Banerjea’s blind attachment to the English language. I do not follow some of Sir Dinshaw Wacha’s ideas on economics. But this certainly does not diminish in the slightest measure my reverence for either. I cannot forget the service they have rendered to the country and I would consider myself fortunate if, at their age, I have the same zeal for national service which they display. Tulsidas has said that everything, animate and inanimate, is a mixture of good and bad qualities. But our duty is to distinguish the good from the bad, and imbibe the former and ignore the latter just as the swan takes in only milk, leaving the water of evil behind. For, where would we be if our kinsfolk and our society saw only our faults?

I most emphatically wish to request the people of Gujarat to keep aloof from the poison which is in the air today. The foregoing letter is a sign of that poison and that is why I have reproduced it here. As my mother tongue is Gujarati and especially as Gujarat is the land of my birth, I believe that the best I have I can give to Gujarat first, knowing that through Gujarat, it can spread throughout India. It is

1 Nationalists and Moderates

3 Dinshaw Edulji Wacha (1844-1936); Joint-Secretary of the Congress, 1896-1900; President of the Congress in 1901 and later, one of the leaders of the Moderate party my earnest desire that Gujarat and India remain unpolluted by the poisonous wind that is blowing at present, and I shall believe to the end of my life that they have it in them to remain so. This poisonous wind is the only cause for the delay in the spreading of the fragrant breeze of Truth. We cannot hope to see our country rise by getting angry with the British, by distrusting all mankind and by accusing and hating one another. Hatred, faultfinding, etc., are the symptoms of a disease, of weakness. The weak sees weakness everywhere; the wicked believes everyone to be wicked. The snake and the scorpion are afraid of every creature. Why do we forget the law of this world: “If we are good, the whole world is good”?

Let me say a few words about the Rowlatt Act too. I am confident that this Act will be repealed before its time and that too, I believe, without our having to offer satyagraha by way of civil disobedience. Should this not happen, I have no doubt that satyagraha will be launched again.

145. MISCELLANEOUS ISSUES

I received some letters while I was touring Saurashtra for swadeshi propaganda, and a few were also received directly in the Navajivan office. I could not reply to all of them in Navajivan then. I even sent brief notes to some of the correspondents to say that I would reply when I got the time. I have carefully preserved all of them and I got a chance this week to go through them. Some of them would be relevant at any time and I intend to use them as occasion arises. One such letter is from a well-known, religious-minded lady of Saurashtra. I quote a part of it below:

This is what her letter says in effect. I was asked similar questions by others as well in the course of my tour and so I shall try to answer them.

First as regards swadeshi. I think of swadeshi in terms of swadeshi cloth only, for about fifty crores of rupees are lost annually by the country because of our use of foreign cloth, though all that money could be saved and spent so as to be distributed among our own craftsmen. In fact, formerly we did spend an equal or nearly equal amount in this manner. If starvation has increased terribly in our country, it is only because our craftsmen have not taken up any other profession in place of the one lost and because our countless young women have forgotten their mothers’ holy occupation, by which they covered India’s nakedness, of spinning some yarn every day in their homes. And, therefore, no matter what efforts are made in other directions, even if the cotton mills in India multiply to four times their present number, the miserable condition of the millions in India will never improve so long as these craftsmen and women do not take again to their old occupations. That is the reason why I have long believed, and still do, that swadeshi is our highest dharma. It is doubtless desirable that needles, penholders, etc., should be made in our country. We must certainly reach that stage finally. But there is no comparison between these industries and that of cloth. The former will be new industries introduced for the first time in our country. We shall not succeed in absorbing in them the crores of people who have been impoverished. The energy, moreover, which will enable us to produce cloth worth 60 crores of rupees with the cooperation of countless women and craftsmen, will profit us in future as well. In reviving an industry which will yield an annual income of 60 crores of rupees, we shall have to cultivate a great many sterling qualities, such as capacity for self-sacrifice, power of organization, intelligence, honesty, steadfastness, etc. Only then shall we succeed in putting my apparently limited idea of swadeshi on a firm basis.

1 Not translated here. The correspondent had asked Gandhiji whether he intended to extend the swadeshi movement to other items besides cloth, and why he seemed to show special concern for the untouchable communities.

Now as regards the depressed classes. This issue covers that of the decline in India’s fortunes. The lady refers to it and asks whether, by merely removing the stigma of untouchability from these classes, we shall succeed in raising India’s fortunes. I feel certain that we can bring about that happy result, for the strength which will enable us to shake off this sin will also help us to get rid of our other sins and it is my firm conviction that, so long as we remain submerged in some of these, India’s fortunes will continue at a low ebb. I believe that by serving the depressed classes I serve the whole society. Though it is indeed a fact that, like the untouchables, other communities also suffer, the former are oppressed in the name of dharma. As an orthodox Hindu, therefore, I consider it my especial duty to free myself, and to persuade others to free themselves, from this notion of dharma. We cannot compare the sufferings of the untouchables with those of any other section in India. It passes my understanding how we consider it dharma to treat the depressed classes as untouchables; I shudder at the very thought of this. My conscience tells me that untouchability can never be a part of Hinduism. I do not think it too much to dedicate my whole life to removing the thick crust of sin with which Hindu society has covered itself for so long by stupidly regarding these people as untouchables. I am only sorry that I am unable to devote myself wholly to that work.

There is no question here of freedom of eating with or marrying any of them. The only question is whether physical contact with them should be avoided. When a member of this community becomes a Muslim, I do not avoid such contact with him; when he becomes a Christian, I salute him; I consider it no sin to allow myself to be touched by a Muslim or a Christian after he has touched such a person, but I object to physical contact with the man himself! The very idea seems to me unjust, devoid of reason and contrary to dharma. That is why I consider myself sanctified when I touch any person of this class and have been continually beseeching the Hindus in all manner of ways, though remaining within limits of propriety, to free themselves from this stigma. I appeal to this lady, too, who has written her letter in all sincerity and frankness, that she should use her great powers and influence over the people to help Hindu society to throw off the burden of this sin: the practice of untouchability. She may also set a very worthy example to others by introducing the holy spinning-wheel in her own home, if only for a while and gifting a little of her time to the country.

146. NOTES

AN EXAMPLE TO FOLLOW

Contributions for the Orissa Famine Fund continue to pour in from all quarters without any effort for collection. This is a happy sign of increasing national consciousness and charity of heart. But the contribution received from a charity-box, at the Esplanade High School of Bombay, deserves special notice. The High School keeps a charity-box and teachers and students are encouraged to drop their contributions into it. The amount so collected is used for relieving distress at any place, without any distinction of caste or creed. Only the teachers, students and employees of the school are allowed to put sums of money into it. Suitable rules have been framed in order to prevent any misappropriation of money. The smallest amount to be dropped is 2 annas and inducements are given for larger contributions by offering various certificates and in other ways. It is unnecessary here to dwell on the rules; we only wish to point out to readers that this practice of keeping a charity-box is worth emulating. If students and teachers in every well-maintained school are thus encouraged to give something in charity and if the funds collected are utilized properly, a large amount could be raised, almost without effort, for relieving distress in our country and every school can spend its amount for some good cause of its own choice.

How Employees’ Condition May Improve

Regular readers of Navajivan probably remember that, in the issue of September 21, a correspondent, signing himself “Sarvodaya”, suggested reduction of working hours for employees. Another correspondent, an educated business man, who signs himself “Viragi”, has now given his views on the subject. He writes:

These views are admirable, no doubt. Once, however, in a meeting of mice one of them suggested that a bell be tied to the cat’s neck, so that its sound could warn them of her approach and they could all run back into their holes. The question then arose who would bell the cat. In the same way, the question which arises here is, who, from the employees, will undertake this important task. It is not at all difficult if the large number of employees in Bombay come together and reach an agreement. There is no better way of propagating a good idea which may strike a man than its practice by the man himself. Why should not “Viragi” himself implement his idea?

Dacoities in Matar Taluka

A correspondent, who does not give his name, says that dacoits are very active in Matar Taluka these days, and adds that there have been two raids since Vaishakh Sud 51. Those who want steps to be taken in this matter should give more details. There is no need at all to be afraid of giving one’s name and address. The people should now give up such fears. There is surely no danger in giving the information that there was a raid at a certain place, and even if there should be any danger in giving information, one should not be afraid of giving it so long as it is true. If any reader knows more about this matter and if the information is passed on to us, we hope to use it to secure relief for the people.

It is also necessary to add here that the people must now learn to defend themselves against such dangers. If all the residents of a village unite to take concerted measures, we believe the dacoits will generally not succeed in carrying out their raids.

147. KHILAFAT : FURTHER QUESTIONS ANSWERED

I have been overwhelmed with public criticism and private advice and even anonymous letters telling me exactly what I should do. Some are impatient that I do not advise immediate and extensive non-co-operation; others tell me what harm I am doing the country by throwing it knowingly in a tempest of violence on either side. It is difficult for me to deal with the whole of the criticism, but I would summarize some of the objections and endeavour to answer them to the best of my ability. These are in addition to those I have already answered:2

1. The Turkish claim is immoral or unjust and how can I, a lover of truth and justice, support it?

2. Even if the claim be just in theory, the Turk is hopelessly incapable, weak and cruel. He does not deserve any assistance.

3. Even if Turkey deserves all that is claimed for her, why should I land India in an international struggle?

4. It is no part of the Indian Mohammedans’ business to meddle in this affair. If they cherish any political ambition, they have tried, they have failed and they should now sit still. If it is a religious matter with them, it cannot appeal to the Hindu reason in the manner it is put and in any case Hindus ought not to identify themselves with

1 April 20, 1920

Mohammedans in their religious quarrel with Christendom.

5. In no case should I advocate non-co-operation which in its extreme sense is nothing but a rebellion, no matter how peaceful it may be.

6. Moreover, my experience\textsuperscript{1} of last year must show me that it is beyond the capacity of any single human being to control the forces of violence that are lying dormant in the land.

7. Non-co-operation is futile because people will never respond in right earnest, and reaction that might afterwards set in will be worse than the state of hopefulness we are now in.

8. Non-co-operation will bring about cessation of all other activities, even working of the Reforms, and thus set back the clock of progress.

9. However pure my motives may be, those of the Mussulmans are obviously revengeful.

I shall now answer the objections in the order in which they are stated:

1. In my opinion the Turkish claim is not only not immoral and unjust, but it is highly equitable, if only because Turkey wants to retain what is her own. And the Mohammedan manifesto has definitely declared that whatever guarantees may be necessary to be taken for the protection of non-Muslim and non-Turkish races, should be taken so as to give the Christians theirs and the Arabs their self-government under the Turkish suzerainty.

2. I do not believe the Turk to be weak, incapable or cruel. He is certainly disorganized and probably without good generalship. He has been obliged to fight against heavy odds. The argument of weakness, incapacity and cruelty one often hears quoted in connection with those from whom power is sought to be taken away. About the alleged massacres\textsuperscript{2} a proper commission has been asked for, but never granted. And in any case security can be taken against oppression.

3. I have already stated that if I were not interested in the Indian Mohammedans, I would not interest myself in the welfare of the Turks any more than I do in that of the Austrians or the Poles. But I am bound as an Indian to share the sufferings and trials of fellow-Indians. If I deem the Mohammedan to be my brother, it is my duty to help him in his hour of peril to the best of my ability, if

\textsuperscript{1} In connection with the agitation against the Rowlatt Bills \textsuperscript{2} In Armenia his cause commends itself to me as just.

4. The fourth refers to the extent Hindus should join hands with the Mohammedans. It is therefore a matter of feeling and opinion. It is expedient to suffer for my Mohammedan brother to the utmost in a just cause and I should therefore travel with him along the whole road so long as the means employed by him are as honourable as his end. I cannot regulate the Mohammedan feeling. I must accept his statement that the Khilafat is with him a religious question in the sense that it binds him to reach the goal even at the cost of his own life.

5. I do not consider non-co-operation to be a rebellion, because it is free from violence. In a larger sense all opposition to a Government measure is a rebellion. In that sense, rebellion in a just cause is a duty, the extent of opposition being determined by the measure of the injustice done and felt.

6. My experience of last year shows me that in spite of aberrations in some parts of India, the country was entirely under control, that the influence of satyagraha was profoundly for its good and that where violence did break out there were local causes that directly contributed to it. At the same time I admit that even the violence that did take place on the part of the people and the spirit of lawlessness that was undoubtedly shown in some parts should have remained under check. I have made ample acknowledgment of the miscalculation I then made. But all the painful experience that I then gained did not in any way shake my belief in satyagraha or in the possibility of that matchless force being utilized in India. Ample provision is being made this time to avoid the mistakes of the past. But I must refuse to be deterred from a clear course, because it may be attended by violence totally unintended and in spite of extraordinary efforts that are being made to prevent it. At the same time I must make my position clear. Nothing can possibly prevent a satyagrahi from doing his duty because of the frown of the authorities. I would risk, if necessary, a million lives so long as they are voluntary sufferers and are innocent, spotless victims. It is the mistakes of the people that matter in a satyagraha campaign. Mistakes, even insanity, must be expected from the strong and the powerful, and the moment of victory has come when there is no resort to the mad fury of the powerful but a voluntary, dignified and quiet submission—but not submission to the will of the authority that has put itself in the wrong. The secret of success lies therefore in holding every English life and the life of every officer serving the Government as sacred as those of our own dear ones. All the wonderful experience I have gained now during nearly 40 years of conscious existence, has convinced me that there is no gift so precious as that of life. I make bold to say that the moment the Englishmen feel that, although they are in India in a hopeless minority, their lives are protected against harm not because of the matchless weapons of destruction which are at their disposal, but because Indians refuse to take the lives even of those whom they may consider to be utterly in the wrong, that moment will see a transformation in the English nature in its relation to India, and that moment will also be the moment when all the destructive cutlery that is to be had in India will begin to rust. I know that this is a far off vision. That cannot matter to me. It is enough for me to see the light and to act up to it, and it is more than enough when I gain companions in the onward march. I have claimed in private conversations with English friends that it is because of my incessant preaching of the gospel of non-violence and my having successfully demonstrated its practical utility that so far the forces of violence, which are undoubtedly in existence in connection with the Khilafat movement, have remained under complete control.

7. From a religious standpoint, the seventh objection is hardly worth considering. If people do not respond to the movement of non-co-operation, it would be a pity, but that can be no reason for a reformer not to try. It would be to me a demonstration that the present position of hopefulness is not dependent on any inward strength or knowledge, but it is hope born of ignorance and superstition.

8. If non-co-operation is taken up in earnest, it must bring about a cessation of all other activities including the Reforms, but I decline to draw therefore the corollary that it will set back the clock of progress. On the contrary, I consider non-co-operation to be such a powerful and pure instrument, that if it is enforced in an earnest spirit, it will be like seeking first the Kingdom of God and everything else following as a matter of course. People will have then realized their true power. They would have learnt the value of discipline, self-control, joint action, non-violence, organization and everything else that goes to make a nation great and good, and not merely great.

9. I do not know that I have a right to arrogate greater purity for myself than for our Mussulman brethren. But I do admit that they do not believe in my doctrine of non-violence to the full extent. For them it is a weapon of the weak, an expedient. They consider non-co-operation without violence to be the only thing open to them in the war of direct action. I know that if some of them could offer successful violence, they would do today. But they are convinced that, humanly speaking, it is an impossibility. For them, therefore, non-co-operation is a matter not merely of duty but also of revenge. Whereas I take up non-co-operation against the Government as I have actually taken it up in practice against members of my own family. I entertain very high regard for the British constitution. I have not only no enmity against Englishmen but I regard much in English character as worthy of my emulation. I count many as my friends. It is against my religion to regard anyone as an enemy. I entertain similar sentiments with respect to Mohammedans. I find their cause to be just and pure. Although therefore their view-point is different from mine I do not hesitate to associate with them and invite them to give my method a trial, for I believe that the use of a pure weapon even from a mistaken motive does not fail to produce some good, even as the telling of truth, if only because for the time being it is the best policy, is at least so much to the good.

148. SPEECH AT KHILAFAT COMMITTEE MEETING, ALLAHABAD

Mahatma Gandhi, in a solemn speech which was listened to in perfect silence, said he knew full well that Muslims realized that non-co-operation was the only remedy now left to India in four stages.² He whole-heartedly sympathized with them and was prepared to co-operate with them to get the peace terms revised. He was of opinion that the present was a warfare between false Christianity and Islam. On the one side was the strength of arms and on the other side moral force. We wanted to win the war with moral force. The course that the movement of non-co-operation should pursue would be graduated in four stages, and previously to working out the first of them His Excellency the Viceroy should be approached and given notice of one month to see that the Turkish peace terms were revised in conformity with Moslem demands, and, in case it was not done, to resign and join the movement of non-co-operation. After a month the first stage would be put into operation. He suggested that a committee consisting of members prepared to remain with him and invested with full powers be appointed to work out the scheme, whose decisions would be binding on all people. He disapproved of boycott as impracticable and suggested that swadeshi should be adopted instead. He urged upon the people to avoid violence in any shape or form.

149. SPEECH ON SWADESHI, BOMBAY

June 4, 1920

At the opening ceremony Mr. Gandhi was accompanied by Shrimati Saraladevi Chowdharani who was dressed in her khaddar sari and blouse.

Mr. Gandhi in his speech at the opening ceremony referred to the instance of the Duchess of Sutherland whose indefatigable industry had popularized the use of home-woven and homespun Scotch tweed furnishing as it did the honourable and lucrative occupation of the hundreds of Scotch women. She was able to show that there was more art in the rough-looking Scotch tweed made by the poor Highlander than in the woollen pieces turned out in huge factories. Mr. Gandhi said that he would not be satisfied until India recognized the true art in the homespun. When it became fashionable like the Scotch tweed it would, like the latter, fetch a higher price than the mill-made articles thus making it possible to double the rates he was now paying for homespun yarn.

1 Delivered when declaring open the Khadi Bhandar of Narandas Purshottamdas and Vithaldas Jerajani
I have great expectations of Kheda district. The store which I am just going to declare open should not merely spread the use of swadeshi cloth. I shall be satisfied only if it regularly buys up all the cloth produced in the villagers of Kheda district and becomes a centre for swadeshi cloth. Why should they have to go to Bombay to buy stocks for this store? I am confident that the women of Kheda district make sufficient cloth to meet the needs of the whole district, and that, too, in their spare time. I hope people with zeal will supply them spinning-wheels and cotton for spinning. For our cloth, we pay two rupees a head annually to foreign countries. On this reckoning, if we weave our own cloth we shall save fourteen lakhs of rupees on cloth for the seven lakh people of Kheda district, and this saving, moreover, will be shared, not among the rich few, but entirely among the large numbers of our poor brethren. In this way, the swadeshi movement serves the purpose of an insurance company. Again, I should like to point out emphatically that, if we would further the cause of swadeshi, this store should pay attention to the production of indigenous cloth rather than compete in sales with other stores. I urge you for this purpose to send round volunteers from house to house to supply cotton to people and collect the prepared yarn and cloth from them. This is how the East India Company penetrated Indian markets. For rehabilitating our indigenous industries, we shall have to display even greater organizing power, perseverance, thrift and commercial shrewdness than were displayed by the East India Company. I hope that this new enterprise will ensure the success of swadeshi on which national revival depends.

151. POLITICAL FREEMASONRY

Freemasonry is a secret brotherhood which has, more by its secret and iron rules than by its service to humanity, obtained a hold upon some of the best minds. Similarly there seems to be some secret code of con-duct governing the official class in India before which the flower of the great British nation fall prostrate and unconsciously become instruments of injustice which as private individuals they would be ashamed of per-petrating. In no other way is it possible for one to understand the majority report of the Hunter Committee, the despatch of the Government of India and the reply thereto of the Secretary of State for India. In spite of the energetic protests of a section of the Press to the personnel of the Committee, it might be said that on the whole the public were prepared to trust it especially as it contained three Indian members who could fairly be claimed to be independent. The first rude shock to this confidence was delivered by the refusal of Lord Hunter’s Committee to accept the very moderate and reasonable demand of the Congress Committee that the imprisoned Punjab leaders might be allowed to appear before it to instruct counsel. Any doubt that might have been left in the mind of any person has been dispelled by the report of the majority of that committee. The result has justified the attitude of the Congress Committee. The evidence collected by it shows what Lord Hunter’s Committee purposely denied itself.

The minority report stands out like an oasis in a desert. The Indian members deserve the congratulations of their countrymen for having dared to do their duty in the face of heavy odds. I wish that they had refused to associate themselves even in a modified manner with the condemnation of the civil disobedience form of satyagraha.

3 Pandit Jagat Narayan, Sir Chimanlal Setalwad and Sardar Sultan Ahmed Khan
4 The Indian members of the Hunter Committee submitted a separate minority report the substance of which is found in the Government of India’s despatch; vide Appendix “Government of India Despatch on Hunter Committee Report”, 3-5-1920.
The defiant spirit of the Delhi mob on the 30th March can hardly be used for condemning a great spiritual movement which is admittedly and manifestly intended to restrain the violent tendencies of mobs and to replace criminal lawlessness by civil disobedience of authority, when it has forfeited all title to respect. On the 30th March civil disobedience had not even been started. Almost every great popular demonstration has been hitherto attended all the world over by a certain amount of lawlessness. The demonstrations of 30th March and 6th April could have been held under any other aegis as under that of satyagraha. I hold that without the advent of the spirit of civility and orderliness, the disobedience would have taken a much more violent form than it did even at Delhi. It was only the wonderfully quick acceptance by the people of the principle of satyagraha that effectively checked the spread of violence throughout the length and breadth of India. And even today it is not the memory of the black barbarity of General Dyer that is keeping the undoubted restlessness among the people from breaking forth into violence. The hold that satyagraha had gained on the people—it may be even against their will—is curbing the forces of disorder and violence. But I must not detain the reader on a defence of satyagraha against unjust attacks. If it has gained a foothold in India, it will survive much fiercer attacks than the one made by the majority of the Hunter Committee and somewhat supported by the minority. Had the majority report been defective only in this direction and correct in every other there would have been nothing but praise for it. After all satyagraha is a new experiment in the political field. And a hasty attributing to it of any popular disorder would have been pardonable.

The universally pronounced adverse judgment upon the report and the despatches rests upon far more painful revelations. Look at the manifestly laboured defence of every official act of inhumanity except where condemnation could not be avoided through the impudent admissions made by the actors themselves, look at the special pleading introduced to defend General Dyer even against himself, look at the vain glorification of Sir Michael O’Dwyer although it was his spirit that actuated every act of criminality on the part of the subordinates, look at the deliberate refusal to examine his wild career before the events of April. His acts were an open book of which the Committee ought to have taken judicial notice. Instead of accepting everything that the officials had to say, the Committee’s obvious duty was to tax itself to find out the real cause of the disorders. It ought to have gone out of its way to search out the inwardness of the events. Instead of patiently going behind the hard crust of official documents, the Committee allowed itself to be guided with criminal laziness by mere official evidence. The report and the despatches, in my humble opinion, constitute an attempt to condone official lawlessness. The cautions and half-hearted condemnation pronounced upon General Dyer’s massacre and the notorious crawling order only deepens the disappointment of the reader as he goes through page after page of thinly disguised official whitewash. I need, however, scarcely attempt any elaborate examination of the report or the despatches which have been so justly censured by the whole national Press whether of the moderate or the extremist hue. The point to consider is how to break down this secret—be the secrecy ever so unconscious—conspiracy to uphold official iniquity. A scandal of this magnitude cannot be tolerated by the nation, if it is to preserve its self-respect and become a free partner in the Empire. The All-India Congress Committee has resolved upon convening a special session of the Congress for the purpose of considering, among other things, the situation arising from the report. In my opinion the time has arrived when we must cease to rely upon mere petitions to Parliament for effective action. Petitions will have value, when the nation has behind it the power to enforce its will. What power then have we? When we are firmly of opinion that grave wrong has been done us and when after an appeal to the highest authority we fail to secure redress, there must be some power available to us for undoing the wrong. It is true that in the vast majority of cases, it is the duty of a subject to submit to wrongs on failure of the usual procedure, so long as they do not affect his vital being. But every nation and every individual has the right, and it is their duty, to rise against an intolerable wrong. I do not believe in armed risings. They are a remedy worse than the disease sought to be cured. They are a token of the spirit of revenge and impatience and anger. The method of violence cannot do good in the long run. Witness the effect of the armed rising of the Allied Powers against Germany. Have they not become even like the Germans, as the latter have been depicted to us by them?

We have a better method. Unlike that of violence it certainly involves the exercise of restraint and patience; but it requires also resoluteness of will. This method is to refuse to be party to the wrong. No tyrant has ever yet succeeded in his purpose without carrying the victim with him, it may be, as it often is, by force. Most people choose rather to yield to the will of the tyrant than to suffer for the consequence of resistance. Hence does terrorism form part of the stock-in-trade of the tyrant. But we have instances in history where terrorism has failed to impose the terrorist’s will upon his victim. India has the choice before her now. If then the acts of the Punjab Government be an insufferable wrong, if the report of Lord Hunter’s Committee and the two despatches be a greater wrong by reason of their grievous condonation of these acts, it is clear that we must refuse to submit to this official violence. Appeal to the Parliament by all means if necessary, but if the Parliament fails us and if we are worthy to call ourselves a nation, we must refuse to uphold the Government by withdrawing co-operation from it.

152. THE MOHAMMEDAN DECISION

The Khilafat meeting at Allahabad has unanimously reaffirmed the principle of non-co-operation and appointed an executive committee to lay down and enforce a detailed programme. This meeting was preceded by a joint Hindu-Mohammedan meeting at which Hindu leaders were invited to give their views. Mrs. Besant, the Hon’ble Pandit Malaviyaji, the Hon’ble Dr. Sapru, Motilal Nehru,

Chintamani and others were present at the meeting. It was a wise step on the part of the Khilafat Committee to invite Hindus representing all shades of thought to give them the benefit of their advice. Mrs. Besant and Dr. Sapru strongly dissuaded the Mohammedans present from the policy of non-co-operation. The other Hindu speakers made non-committal speeches. Whilst the other Hindu speakers approved of the principle of non-co-operation in theory, they saw many practical difficulties and they feared also complications arising from Mohammedans welcoming an Afghan invasion of India. The Mohammedan speakers gave the fullest and frankest assurances that they would fight to a man any invader who wanted to conquer India, but they were equally frank in asserting that any invasion from without undertaken with a view to uphold the prestige of Islam and to vindicate justice would have their full sympathy if not their actual support. It is easy enough to understand and justify the Hindu caution. It is difficult to resist the Mohammedan position. In my opinion, the best way to prevent India from becoming the battle ground between the forces of Islam and those of the English is for Hindus to make non-co-operation a complete and immediate success, and I have little doubt that if the Mohammedans remain true to their declared intention and are able to exercise self-restraint and make sacrifices, the Hindus will “play the game” and join them in the campaign of non-co-operation. I feel equally certain that the Hindus will not assist Mohammedans in promoting or bringing about an armed conflict between the British Government and their allies, and Afghanistan. British forces are too well organized to admit of any successful invasion of the Indian frontier. The only way, therefore, the Mohammedans can carry on an effective struggle on behalf of the honour of Islam is to take up non-co-operation in real earnest. It will not only be completely effective if it is adopted by the people on an extensive scale, but it will also provide full scope for individual conscience. If I cannot bear an injustice done by an individual or a corporation, and if I am directly or indirectly instrumental in upholding that individual or corporation, I must answer for it before my Maker; but I have done all it is humanly possible for me to do consistently with the moral code that refuses to injure even the wrong-doer, if I cease to support the injustice in the manner described above. In applying, therefore, such a great force there should be no haste, there should be no temper shown. Non-co-operation must be and remain absolutely a voluntary effort. The whole thing, then, depends upon Mohammedans themselves. If they will but help themselves, Hindu help will come and the Government, great and mighty though it is, will have to bend before this irresistible force. No Government can possibly withstand the bloodless opposition of a whole nation.

153. LETTER TO S. R. HIGNELL

LABURNUM ROAD, BOMBAY,

June 12, 1920

DEAR MR. HIGNELL,

I have purposely refrained from replying to your letter of the 6th May conveying Mr. Montagu’s message in reply to my cable to him regarding my proposed visit to London on the Khilafat question. I have myself given the matter my most anxious thought and have consulted my Musalman friends. And I have come to the conclusion that I must not go to London for the purpose intended by Mr. Montagu. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to be able to discuss the general Indian question with Mr. Montagu personally. But I feel that I at least must devote for the time being my exclusive attention to the Khilafat question. I flatter myself with the belief that mine is the greatest contribution to the preservation of the public peace in India. And my withdrawal from it today can be justified only for the purpose of hastening a proper solution of the difficult Khilafat question. Mr. Montagu’s message, on the contrary, holds out no such hope if I went to London. In the circumstances and at the present juncture, I deem it wiser not to proceed to London unless I am wanted there definitely for the purpose of discussing the Peace Terms with a view to their revision. Will you kindly send Mr. Montagu the purport of this letter?

Yours sincerely,

With reference to the approval that seems to have been accorded to the scheme of repatriation, said to have been recommended by the South African Commission and accepted by the Union Government, I would respectfully caution the public against accepting the proposed scheme.

The public have not the interim report of the Commission. We do not know the conditions of repatriation. It seems to me therefore that it is most hazardous to venture any opinion at all on a scheme of which we have a most imperfect knowledge. Generally, it must be stated that any scheme of State repatriation must be looked upon with the gravest suspicion, especially when the scheme is fathered by those who are uncompromisingly hostile to Indian aspirations. The Indians of South Africa are able to remain in that country because of their domicile. I very much fear that the proposed scheme will be found to involve forfeiture of domicile against acceptance of repatriation money, that is, passage back to India and possibly a trifling sum as pocket-money. I am inclined to think that apart from everything else such considerations will be wholly insufficient for giving away a valuable right. I would hardly call any such repatriation as purely voluntary.

This, however, is one of the many objections that may be advanced against the proposed repatriation. I have no doubt that the best thing is to suspend judgment till we have the full scheme before us for examination. It is to be hoped that the Government of India will take the public fully into its confidence before pronouncing upon the scheme.

155. LETTER TO N. C. KELKAR AND OTHERS

[About June 15, 1920]

DEAR MR. KELKAR,

I am sorry I have not been able to attend the Congress constitution. I now send you my draft. You will see that I have aimed at simplicity, intensity and representation of all parties and all shades of opinion ensuring the predominance of that view which is most acceptable to the country. You will notice too that the Congress under the sturdily wieldy body retaining all the spectacular effect. Please go through the whole draft critically and suggest your dissent unhesitatingly wherever you disagree.

Having taken all this time myself, I have no right to hurry you, but I know you will give it as early attention as you can. If there is content matter we must meet. I am at the present moment usually resident in Bombay and if we can meet in Bombay it will save much time. Any date will suit me.

1 The draft in pencil in Gandhiji’s hand, the source for this item, has been badly damaged by termites. Evidently, copies of the letter were sent to the other addressees also.

2 At the Congress session in December 1919, Gandhiji was asked to revise the constitution of the Congress. The revised draft was circulated during the Congress session in September, 1920, at Calcutta. In his letter to Kelkar of July 2, 1920, Gandhiji acknowledges Kelkar’s criticism of his draft. This letter forwarding the draft to Kelkar must, therefore, have been written about a fortnight earlier. Moreover, for the greater part of June, 1920, Gandhiji was in Bombay as he mentions in the second paragraph. It would seem therefore that this letter was written about the middle of June, 1920.

156. THE LAW OF SUFFERING

No country has ever risen without being purified through the fire of suffering. Mother suffers so that her child may live. The condition of wheat-growing is that the seed grain should perish. Life comes out of Death. Will India rise out of her slavery without fulfilling this eternal law of purification through suffering?

If my advisers are right, evidently India will realize her destiny without travail. For their chief concern is that the events of April, 1919, should not be repeated. They fear non-co-operation because it would involve the sufferings of many. If Hampden had argued thus he would not have withheld payment of ship-money, nor would Wat Tyler have raised the standard of revolt. English and French histories are replete with instances of men continuing their pursuit of the right irrespective of the amount of suffering involved. The actors did not stop to think whether ignorant people would not have involuntarily to suffer. Why should we expect to write our history differently? It is possible for us, if we would, to learn from the mistakes of our predecessors to do better, but it is impossible to do away with the law of suffering which is the one indispensable condition of our being. The way to do better is to avoid, if we can, violence from our side and thus quicken the rate of progress and to introduce greater purity in the methods of suffering. We can, if we will, refrain, in our impatience, from bending the wrongdoer to our will by physical force as Sinn Feiners are doing today, or from coercing our neighbours to follow our methods as was done last year by some of us in bringing about hartal. Progress is to be measured by the amount of suffering undergone by the sufferer. The purer the suffering, the greater is the progress. Hence did the sacrifice of Jesus suffice to free a sorrowing world. In his onward march he did not count the cost of suffering entailed upon his neighbours, whether it was undergone by them voluntarily or otherwise. Thus did the sufferings of a Harishchandra suffice to re-establish the kingdom of truth. He must have known that his subjects would suffer involuntarily by his abdication. He did not mind because he could not do otherwise than follow truth.

1 Legendary King of Ayodhya who held his loyalty to truth above his wife, son, kingdom and wealth. Finally, after undergoing countless sufferings, he, his family and his subjects were raised to heavenly bliss.
I have already stated that I do not deplore the massacre of Jallianwala Bagh so much as I deplore the murders of Englishmen and destruction of property by ourselves. The frightfulness at Amritsar drew away public attention from the greater though slower frightfulness at Lahore where attempt was made to emasculate the inhabitants by slow processes. But before we rise higher we shall have to undergo such pro-cesses many more times till they teach us to take up suffering voluntarily and to find joy in it. I am convinced that the Lahorians never deserved the cruel insults that they were subjected to; they never hurt a single Englishman; they never destroyed any property. But a wilful ruler was determined to crush the spirit of a people just trying to throw off his chafing yoke. And if I am told that all this was due to my preaching satyagraha, my answer is that I would preach satyagraha all the more forcibly for that, so long as I have breath left in me, and tell the people that next time they would answer O’Dwyerean insolence not by opening shops by reason of threats of forcible sales but by allowing the tyrant to do his worst and let him sell their all but their unconquerable souls. Sages of old mortified the flesh so that the spirit within might be set free, so that their trained bodies might be proof against any injury that might be inflicted on them by tyrants seeking to impose their will on them. And if India wishes to revive her ancient wisdom and to avoid the errors of Europe, if India wishes to see the Kingdom of God established on earth instead of that of Satan which has enveloped Europe, then I would urge her sons and daughters not to be deceived by fine phrases, the terrible subtleties that hedge us in, the fears of suffering that India may have to undergo, but to see what is happening today in Europe and from it understand that we must go through the suffering even as Europe has gone through, but not the process of making others suffer. Germany wanted to dominate Europe and the Allies wanted to do likewise by crushing Germany. Europe is no better for Germany’s fall. The Allies have proved themselves to be just as deceitful, cruel, greedy and selfish as Germany was or would have been. Germany would have avoided the sanctimonious humbug that one sees associated with the many dealings of the Allies.

The miscalculation that I deplored last year was not in connection with the sufferings imposed upon the people, but about the mistakes made by them and violence done by them owing to their not having sufficiently understood the message of satyagraha. What then is the meaning of non-co-operation in terms of the Law of Suffering? We must voluntarily put up with the losses and inconveniences that arise from having to withdraw our support from a Government that is ruling against our will. Possession of power and riches is a crime under an unjust government; poverty in that case is a virtue, says Thoreau. It may be that in the transition state we may make mistakes; there may be avoidable suffering. These things are preferable to national emasculation.

We must refuse to wait for the wrong to be righted till the wrongdoer has been roused to a sense of his inequity. We must not, for fear of ourselves or others having to suffer, remain participators in it. But we must combat the wrong by ceasing to assist the wrongdoer directly or indirectly.

If a father does an injustice, it is the duty of his children to leave the parental roof. If the head master of a school conducts his institution on an immoral basis, the pupils must leave the school. If the chairman of a corporation is corrupt, the members thereof must wash their hands clean of his corruption by withdrawing from it; even so, if a government does a grave injustice, the subject must withdraw cooperation wholly or partially, sufficiently to wean the ruler from his wickedness. In each case conceived by me there is an element of suffering whether mental or physical. Without such suffering it is not possible to attain freedom.

157. HINDI IN MADRAS

I have the greatest faith in the Dravidians some day taking up Hindi study seriously. If an eighth of the industry that they put in mastering English were to be devoted to learning Hindi, instead of the rest of India remaining a sealed book to them, they will be one with us as never before. I know that some would say the argument cuts both ways. The Dravidians being in a minority, national economy suggests that they should learn the common language of the rest of India than that the rest should learn Tamil, Telugu, Canarese and Malayalam in order to be able to converse with Dravidian India. It is for that reason that Hindi-propaganda work of an intense type has been going on in the Madras Presidency for the past eighteen months under the aegis of the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan of Allahabad. In response to an appeal by me to the Agraval Marwadi Sammelan held in Bombay last week, the wealthy Marwadis of Bombay and Calcutta present there subscribed on the spot Rs. 50,000 for five years’ Hindi propaganda in Madras Presidency. They have once more demonstrated that Hindi work is a speciality of this princely merchant class of India. This generous response increases the responsibility of the Sammelan of Allahabad and of those Dravidians who share with me the belief that Madras must take up Hindi for the sake of full national expansion. Let no Dravidian think that learning Hindi is at all difficult. A little time taken from the recreation hour daily and in a systematic manner will enable an average man to learn Hindi in one year. I would venture to suggest, too, that large municipalities might now introduce Hindi as an optional language to be learnt in the municipal schools. I can say from experience that Dravidian children take to Hindi in a remarkably easy manner. Little does anyone know that almost all the Tamils and the Telugus living in South Africa can carry on an intelligent conversation in Hindi. I venture to hope therefore that the young men of Madras will show their appreciation of Marwadi generosity by availing themselves of the facility afforded to them of learning Hindi without payment.

MY DEAR HENRY,

I have your letter as also Millie’s. As for your letter, we must for the time being agree to differ. You cannot understand the religious viewpoint which guides me in the matter. I am satisfied that the Muslim cause is strictly just. I am not supporting and will not support an unjust demand on their part. But assume that their demand is just and you give me an unanswerable clause compelling me to throw in my lot with the Mussalmans. On the South African, Fiji and the East African question, we have a common platform and I know that you are putting forth your best energy in these matters. I do not know your views on the Punjab. There again we may differ. I hope you got the Congress Sub committee’s report. I wonder whether you agree with its findings. For me the Hunter Committee’s Majority Report is a piece of shameless jobbery.¹

Millie’s letter is a human document, which I was pleased to receive after so many months. The cheerful character of the news she has given me about the family has pleased me much and I was delighted to find that my bed-companion Waldo was much healthier than he used to be. I was glad too to have news about Agnes². Please tell her when you see her that I would prize a few lines from her now and then provided that she does not bind me to a reply. I was sorry to have the bad news about Sally. I do not suppose any of us ever thought much of the match. But I have considered Sally to be a brave girl and I hope that she is bearing bravely the failure of her experiment. My family is ever increasing. If you now visited the Ashram you would be surprised at its bigness and I think the solidity of the work would please you. There we are concentrating on education, weaving industry and heart-culture. The family has outgrown the buildings you saw. We are living in a cramped condition. Devdas is growing wonderfully. He continues to answer the true description that once Ceilia gave when I saw them all in Poona. She said ≈"When Devdas enters a room, he seems to fill it.” I am dictating this letter to Sarala Devi in Bombay. Much of my work is done whilst I am lying down in bed. Devdas is with me and so is Mahadev Desai. He has just gone to Surat to pay a visit of condolence and so you find Sarala Devi helping me. You will be glad to learn that I have at last got good news of Kallenbach.¹ He is in Berlin. He sent me messages through Miss Anna Kirby. Unfortunately, I have not his address or I would have sent it to you. Miss Kirby wrote to me from Y.W.C.A., Johannesburg. She might have come back to London. If people are allowed to go to Berlin and if you succeed in tracing his address, please send Jamnadas there to see him.

With love,

Yours,

BOMBAY,

Friday [June 18, 1920]

Bhai Shri Sakarlal,

I have just received a telegram about Vrajjal. It is not that you alone have lost a jewel-like brother; we, too, have lost a co-worker no less precious than a brother. His hallowed soul is now resting in an exalted place. Bhai Vrajjal gave an excellent demonstration of what the higher life can be. I know you cannot but grieve; but lighten the burden of your grief with the thought that his life was sublime and that all of us share your grief.

161. LETTER TO CHHAGANLAL GANDHI

[June 18, 1920]

Chi. Chhaganlal,

I have your telegram. I am shocked by the telegram about Bhai Vrajjal. I just can’t believe that he died as a result of a mishap. He passed away while he was yet happy in every way. He did not have to be looked after by anyone. These days we are being visited with fierce wrath. Write a letter to his brother, signed by all, and send the accompanying letter with it. I can write no more just now. I expect a detailed letter from you.

Blessings from

162. DUTY OF SELF-SACRIFICE

They who live on the *amrit*¹ of what remains after a yajna,² attain to eternal Brahma;³ O Arjuna, those who do no yajna, even this world is not for them, not to speak of the next.⁴

Narada gave his considered opinion that Parvati⁵ should go and do tapasya. Her parents liked the idea, for tapasya brings happiness and destroys sin and suffering. Tapasya is the basis of all creation. They, therefore, desired that Parvati, taking this to heart, should go and do tapasya.⁶

The term yajna can be interpreted in a number of ways but there is only one meaning acceptable to men of all faiths, and that is, to be ready even to lay down one’s life for true welfare. Parvati wanted such a one as Siva as her consort and so was advised to do penance. If anyone wants to know what was the penance she did, he should go to the incomparable work of Tulsidas. A woman gives birth to children in suffering and sacrifices herself in bringing them up. Life comes out of death. A seed must disintegrate under earth and perish before it can grow into grain. Harishchandra went through endless suffering to honour his word as a man of truth, Jesus put on a crown of thorns to win salvation for his people, allowed his hands and feet to be nailed and suffered agonies before he gave up the ghost. This has been the law of yagna from immemorial times. Without yajna this earth cannot exist even for a moment. Before the Turks could conquer Constantinople,⁷ they sacrificed innumerable troops and used the corpses as a bridge. I cannot help feeling that we want to advance our country without fulfilling this immutable law of suffering which has prevailed in India.

We want full independence without the sacrifice of a single life. We would be happy if we could do without sacrifice of money either. A great many people have got frightened of non-co-operation. What must be the reasons? I can think of only two: first, that people may have to starve if they give up their jobs and, second, if anyone makes a mistake and the Government resorts to firing, thousands may lose their lives. This means that we want a solution of the difficult and important problems of the Khilafat without the least suffering on our part. Non-co-operation is some sort of very easy yajna, it is penance in a small way, requiring a little self-sacrifice. I would certainly not think of it as any suffering if 20 or 25 thousand, or may be a 100 or 150 thousand, gave up service to secure justice or in order, at any rate, not to be a party to injustice; nay, where the institution in question is well run I would look upon such suffering [by employees] as natural; instead of running away from it, they should welcome it. I would not in the least be pained if thousands of men are ruined in the attempt to seek a just solution of a problem like the Khilafat. I would look upon it as a test of people’s devotion to dharma. I believe that there can be no victory except through such suffering, and also that thousands of men suffering in that way cannot but win.

No measure of repression by the Government in consequence of non-co-operation can move or frighten me. I am convinced that the severer the repression the sooner will the problem be solved.

There is only one fear: lest people make a mistake, put themselves in the wrong and invite punishment, lest any individual yield to anger and assault or kill an official. If this happens, the pure law of self-sacrifice will be tarnished and to that extent the desired end will be delayed. Only the purest things can be offered in sacrifice. If Harishchandra had the least little evil in him and he had renounced a kingdom, we would not be singing his glory today. Christians, in regarding Jesus as the Saviour, attribute total perfection to him. Looking at the matter in this light, [we see] that we could start non-co-operation in full force immediately if we knew that there was not the slightest possibility of our being guilty of anything wrong in our agitation regarding the Khilafat or any other issue. If the movement has been divided into stages, it is because of doubts whether we would remain blameless. Considering all this, and considering that self-sacrifice is an inescapable duty if we are to ensure India’s regeneration, we should entertain no fears at all about non-co-operation; on the contrary, we should realize that without some kind of _yajna_ or _tapas_ by way of non-co-operation, we shall succeed neither in solving the Khilafat problem, nor in securing justice for the Punjab nor in winning and retaining swaraj.

163. “WHAT SHOULD I DO?”

Mrs. Polak has sent me a picture which shows one Mr. Glading, an Englishman of eighty years, spinning wool on a wheel. He has taken up this work in his old age by way of recreation. The old man cannot spend the whole day talking or reading the Bible; at this age, again, how can he join the games others play at home? Moreover, he must have a partner in the game and not everyone can get one. So, the old man must have thought of cultivating a useful hobby and chosen the spinning-wheel.

Before I got this picture, a gentleman who had retired from a high post had been to see me. He did not know how to spend his time. He could not spend the whole day telling his beads. He wished to have some philanthropic work. He came to me for advice since I have the reputation of being a man engaged in a good many activities. I could not think of any better work for him, considering his health, than plying the spinning-wheel. I politely put it to him that he could spin. I am afraid that I failed to make an impression on him. Perhaps I lowered myself in his esteem.

Some believe that spinning is just an activity reserved for women. To mention the spinning-wheel before men is to make them feel that they are being insulted. Not only do I not think this way but I believe, on the contrary, that all work beneficial to society is for both, men and women.

It is natural, of course, that since women cannot work as hard physically as men and do not as readily go out for work, spinning is regarded as especially their job.

But cooking is done by men in many families, though ordinarily it is women’s work. Similarly, though the spinning-wheel may be ordinarily for women, occasionally men also can work on it. Many men are trying, at present, to effect improvements in the spinning-wheel. I would, therefore, certainly advise people in the same position as the friend above to start plying the spinning-wheel.

Lawyers and doctors go to clubs and play cards or billiards, but I doubt if they refresh their minds thereby. If, on the other hand, they were to stay at home and, sitting in a clean room, work at the spinning-wheel, I am sure they would get more innocent pleasure from this work than they ever could from cards. Sir John Lubbock¹ found his rest in turning from one type of useful work to another and his recreation in watching ants at work. Lord Salisbury amused himself with experiments in chemistry. Gladstone sought relief from his work in the House of Commons by employing himself in splitting logs of wood. We stand in need of such recreation more than the British do.

The country lacks food and clothing, or whatever there is very dear. As for milk and ghee, large numbers have to go without them. At a time such as this, dharma consists wholly in producing and supplying these two things in enough quantities. Not to eat and not to clothe ourselves till we have fed the hungry and clothed the naked is the whole of dayadharma². I would, therefore, humbly suggest to all persons in the position of this friend that, if it is not possible for them to do body labour in their spare time by working on farms or in such other ways, they should most certainly get hold of a spinning-wheel and spend their time spinning. This will safeguard both dharma and material interests.

No effort on this path is ever wasted
And no obstacle undoes the progress made;
Even a little of this dharma
Saves one from great danger.³

Editors often have something or other ready at hand to fill space in newspapers. In English this is called ‘evergreen’ that is, always fresh. You can publish the matter any time. I unexpectedly came across something like this in The [Bombay] Chronicle. It contains the following information.

The Hindus invented the decimal system. Geometry and Algebra were first developed in India, and so too Trigonometry. The first five hospitals to be built were in India. The physicians of ancient Europe used Indian drugs. Hindus investigated the anatomy of the human body in the sixth century B.C. and about the same time acquired the art of surgery. People in ancient India knew the art of casting iron pillars of the same kind which they make now. India specialized in carving caves. Alexander, when he invaded India, found republican states in the Punjab and in Sind. In ancient India, women enjoyed all those rights for which women of Europe are fighting hard at present. Municipalities were in existence in the times of Chandragupta. It was the Hindus who perfected the science of grammar. The Ramayana and the Mahabharata still remain unrivalled.

I do not know how far these statements are true, but this I know, that, if the late Justice Ranade were alive today and heard such talk of India’s past glory, he would certainly have asked, ‘So what?’ He used to say that no people could progress by merely dwelling on its past glory. If at all we do so, it should be only in order that we may be able to add to it. Where is the man who can write the Ramayana today? Where are the morals of ancient times? Where is the ability of those days? And devotion to duty? We have added nothing to the drugs discovered thousands of years ago, nor do we even have adequate knowledge about those mentioned in the ancient books. We witness the same poverty in respect of all the other gifts mentioned above, borrowing as we do everything from Europe. I, at any rate, feel that so long as we have not revived in the present the glory which was ours in the past, wisdom lies in not speaking about it. That wealth which has no exchange value, which the world does not recognize as such, brings not credit, but only humiliation and is in the nature of a burden. If, as we believe, we had these gifts in ancient times, we ought to be able to give evidence of them again. We are indeed heirs of a brave people, but by confessing at the same time our inability to be worthy of that heritage we shall achieve nothing. We shall see hereafter how we can become so worthy.

165. NOTES

Writing about Orissa, Shri Amritlal Thakkar says that he has toured more villages and found that starvation is more widespread than was thought. This is so, it seems, because, the means of transport being inadequate and the people comparatively poor, no complaints would be heard from them. They live in the conditions they find themselves in, so that these would come to light only if somebody went among them and felt pity for them. How shall we ever know the places in which such conditions prevail? A newspaper from that place points out that the area being low lying, floods from Central India are always pouring into it. Some dams have been built to check these floods, but they are giving way. New ones need to be built at some of the places. Unless this is done, damage from floods will continue every year. To devise measures against this, the newspaper suggests that the Government should call a conference of engineers to obtain their opinion and take the necessary steps. We hope that Shri Amritlal Thakkar will, when he has time, inquire also into the question of what should be done to prevent famines and will investigate the causes of the chronic poverty of these unfortunate people.

The reader will be glad to know that, thanks to the efforts of Amritlal Thakkar and the co-operation of Shri Karsandas, the well-known Gujarati merchant of Calcutta, a sum of Rs. 18,000 has been collected for famine relief.

You have been pouring out your heart to me on the Khilafat and other matters\(^1\) whereas I have been unable to reciprocate because of the great strain I have been undergoing just now. All the same you know that you are ever in my mind. I know what spiritual struggles mean for you. I hope you are keeping better health. You wrote to me that you were very bad after your return from Calcutta.

I wish you will not concern yourself about my position on the Turkish question i.e., you will depend upon it that I shall do nothing blindly. I am committed to nothing on the Turkish question so that upon proof of the immorality of a position being found I could not retrace my steps. The unfortunate position in which I find myself is that I thoroughly distrust Lloyd George. Somehow or other I distrust the Armenian case as I distrust the Arabian case and I am so prejudiced against the present British diplomacy that I scent the foul hand of the deceitful diplomat in Armenia, Arabia, Mesopotamia, Palestine Syria. The position therefore I take up is that as soon as I can remove my prejudice I shall retire from the untenable position I may find myself in. I do ask for suzerainty\(^2\) over Armenia, Mesopotamia, Palestine and Syria with proper safeguards. You say the safeguards are nothing. I do not agree with you. If the Allied Powers are themselves insincere and jealous of one another they may mean nothing. But if they are sincere, the safeguards can certainly be effective. Britain claims suzerainty over the Transvaal, but the Transvaal had no interference with its internal affairs. Why should Armenia have to complain if it has full autonomy with a Turkish Resident there? If Britain only meant well by Turkey everything could be satisfactorily arranged. If Turkey had joined the Allies, could Britain have dispossessed Turkey of Armenia, Arabia or Mesopotamia? Would Britain then not have brought about reforms in Turkey by friendly pressure instead of a victor’s dictation? The insolence and hypocrisy of the Ministry bolstered up by equal insolence and hypocrisy in the Viceroy’s communique are really insufferable.

\(^2\) Of the Khalif
You consider Mahomed Ali’s representation to be as unclean as the Treaty. I do not agree with you so far as the condemnation of the Treaty is concerned—I do think that practically the whole of India is with Mahomed Ali. If you say that the condemnation is not intelligent, is not based on knowledge, but is due to utter distrust of Britain, I should agree with you, but the condemnation is there. I do not read news-papers as a rule, but look at the enclosed in The Leader. Mahomed Ali certainly believes that the whole of India is at his back in the condemnation. Nor is his claim for suzerainty unclean, because he implicitly believes in the correctness of his demand. He has broken no pledge, for his claim was much higher than it is made today, whereas the peace Treaty is an abomination, a sin against God and man. Remember, too, that the Allied Powers, which simply mean England writ large, speak from a consciousness of their brute strength. Poor Mahomed Ali represents, as he considers, a weak nation and supports the cause of a Power that has been already sufficiently humbled and humiliated. I am prepared to excuse some exaggeration in him. I am totally unprepared to tolerate the shameless exhibition of brute force. If only I could infect India with my belief in the weapons of unadulterated suffering, i.e., self-suffering, I would bring down this insolence from its pedestal in a moment and reduce to nothingness the whole of the powder magazine of Europe.

Shaken as I was by this Peace Treaty, the Hunter Report has taken away all my faith even in the good intentions of the Ministry and the Viceregal Council. Nor has Mr. Montagu come well out of the ordeal. He has tried to serve both God and Mammon and has failed hopelessly. If the British Constitution survives this shock it will be due to some inherent vitality in it. Those who are at the helm at the present moment have certainly left no stone unturned to smash that constitution to pieces. Mahadeo just now reminds me that you have cancelled by your wire the letter I am replying to. That however does not alter the situation. I would like you to realize with me the enormity of the double crime of the present British administration or make me see my folly and correct myself!

I need not worry you about my views on caste. There, too, my moral position need not cause you anxiety. You have mistaken my standpoint. Not to dine with a fellow-being out of repugnance is a sin. Not to dine with him by way of self-restraint is a virtue. Do you know that Indian mothers impose the restraint upon themselves of not sharing even the family meals? I believe Narottam’s mother does not dine at the common kitchen. I consider that her self-restraint is unnecessary. It is possible that it has some merit in it. It is certainly not sinful. I hold it to be a virtue to restrict the area of my choice of a wife even as it is a virtue to restrict myself to one wife rather than many. Surely you must grant the necessity and the virtue of limiting one’s indulgences. The sin comes in when I limit the area of service, the area of sacrifice. I have often thought that you have not yet realized the full grandeur of the perfect theory of Hinduism, however debased it may be today in practice.

My health is fair, but I am longing for perfect peace, rest and solitude. I have just heard that the Turkish Peace Terms are to be completely revised. There may be then some hope of my stealing away for a few days.

Sir G. Barnes\(^1\) has invited me also to go to British Guiana. I have told him I could not go whilst the Khilafat agitation is going on. Are you going?

I read your letter to the Imperial Citizenship Association on East Africa.\(^2\) Evidently you wrote it under great stress. They criticized it adversely. I remained silent but I could not help sympathizing with the criticism. Your letter was scrappy and gave hardly any information. They complained bitterly, too, that you have not yet sent in any report on S. Africa.\(^3\) I do think as you went as their accredited agent you owed them a full report. Indeed your very first writing if only as a matter of courtesy was due to them. I wish you would still mend the error in so far as it is mendable.

167. LETTER TO PRIVATE SECRETARY TO VICEROY

LABURNUM ROAD,
BOMBAY,
June 22, 1920

DEAR MR. HIGNELL,

I enclose herewith a representation signed by Mussulman representatives and another by me for submission to His Excellency. The Mussulman representation does not bear original signatures, as it was circulated in the different parts of India and signatures authorized by wires. Some of the signatures are on soiled paper but authority in every case is in the possession of the Central Khilafat Committee.

I do not wish to say anything about the representations but shall only express the hope that they will receive due weight from His Excellency. I propose to hand the copies to the Press on Thursday evening.

168. LETTER TO VICEROY

June 22, 1920

VICEROY AND GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA

YOUR EXCELLENCY.

As one who has enjoyed a certain measure of Your Excellency’s confidence and as one who claims to be a devoted well-wisher of the British Empire, I owe it to Your Excellency and, through Your Excellency, to His Majesty’s Ministers, to explain my connection with and my conduct in the Khilafat question.

1 Vide Appendix “Muslim Leaders’ Representation to Viceroy”, 22-6-1920.
2 Vide the following item.
3 The Turkish Peace Treaty was handed over to the Ottoman Delegation at Paris on May 11, 1920. These terms were published in India on May 14, 1920, along with a message from the Viceroy to the Muslims of India. This letter was written consequent upon this message.
At the very earliest stage of the War, even whilst I was in London organizing the Indian Volunteer Ambulance Corps, I began to interest myself in the Khilafat question. I perceived how deeply moved the little Mussulman world in London was when Turkey decided to throw in her lot with Germany. On my arrival in India in the January of 1915 I found the same anxiousness and earnestness among the Mussulmans with whom I came in contact. Their anxiety became intense when the information about the secret treaties leaked out. Distrust of British intentions filled their minds and despair took possession of them. Even at that moment I advised my Mussulman friends not to give way to despair but to express their fears and their hopes in a disciplined manner. It will be admitted that the whole of Mussulman India has behaved in a singularly restrained manner during the past five years, and that the leaders have been able to keep the turbulent sections of their community under complete control.

The peace Terms and Your Excellency’s defence of them have given the Mussulmans of India a shock from which it will be difficult for them to recover. The terms violate Ministerial pledges and utterly disregard Mussulman sentiment. I consider that as a staunch Hindu wishing to live on terms of the closest friendship with my Mussulman countrymen, I should be an unworthy son of India if I did not stand by them in their hour of trial. In my humble opinion their cause is just. They claim that Turkey must not be punished if their sentiment is to be respected. Muslim soldiers did not fight to inflict punishment on their own Khalifa or to deprive him or his territories. The Mussulman attitude has been consistent throughout these five years.

My duty to the Empire to which I owe my loyalty requires me to resist the cruel violence that has been done to the Mussulman sentiment.

So far as I am aware Mussulmans and Hindus have as a whole lost faith in British justice and honour. The Report of the Majority of the Hunter Committee, Your Excellency’s Despatch thereon, and Mr.

414 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
Montagu’s reply\(^1\) have only aggravated the distrust.

In these circumstances, the only course open to one like me is either in despair to sever all connection with British rule, or if I still retained faith in the inherent superiority of the British Constitution to all others at present in vogue, to adopt such means as will rectify the wrong done and thus restore confidence. I have not lost faith in such superiority and I am not without hope that somehow or other justice will yet be rendered if we show the requisite capacity for suffering. Indeed my conception of that Constitution is that it helps only those who are ready to help themselves. I do not believe that it protects the weak. It gives free scope to the strong to maintain their strength and develop it. The weak under it go to the wall.

It is, then, because I believe in the British Constitution that I have advised my Mussulman friends to withdraw their support from Your Excellency’s Government, and the Hindus to join them, should the Peace Terms not be revised in accordance with solemn pledges of Ministers and the Muslim sentiment.

Three courses were open to the Mussulmans in order to make their emphatic disapproval of the utter injustice to which His Majesty’s Ministers have become party, if they have not actually been the prime perpetrators of it. They are:

1. To resort to violence.
2. To advise emigration on a wholesale scale.
3. Not to be party to the injustice by ceasing to co-operate with the Government.

Your Excellency must be aware that there was a time when the boldest though also the most thoughtless among the Mussulmans favoured violence and that hijrat (emigration) has not yet ceased to be the battle-cry.\(^2\) I venture to claim that I have succeeded by patient reasoning in weaning the party of violence from its ways. I confess that I did not—I did not attempt to—succeed in weaning them from violence on moral grounds, but purely on utilitarian grounds. The result for the time being at any rate has however been to stop violence. The school of hijrat has received a check if it has not stopped its activities entirely. I hold that no repression could have prevented a violent eruption, if the people had not had presented to them a form of direct action involving considerable sacrifice and ensuring success, if such a direct action was largely taken up by the public. Non-co-operation was the only dignified and constitutional form of such direct action, for it is the right recognized from times immemorial of the subject to refuse to assist a ruler who misrules.

At the same time I admit that non-co-operation practised by the mass of people is attended with grave risks. But in a crisis such as has overtaken the Mussulmans of India no step that is unattended with large risks can possibly bring about the desired change. Not to run some risks now will be to court much greater risks, if not virtual destruction of law and order.

But there is yet an escape from non-co-operation. The Mussulman representation has requested Your Excellency to lead the agitation yourself as did your distinguished predecessor\(^1\) at the time of the South African trouble. But if you cannot see your way to do so, and non-co-operation becomes a dire necessity, I hope that Your Excellency will give those who have accepted my advice and myself the credit for being actuated by nothing less than a stern sense of duty.

169. THE NON-CO-OPERATION COMMITTEE

There seems to be a great deal of misunderstanding and misconception about the non-co-operation committee appointed by the Khilafat Committee at Allahabad on the 3rd instant. A friend who was present at the meeting writes to say that the committee was formed for the purpose of giving full effect to non-co-operation and to act in all matters in connection with it as if it was representative of the whole Mussulman population of India even in the matter of making representations to the authorities. That this was not the committee’s scope is the purpose of this writing to show.

\(^1\) Lord Hardinge
As I stated its objects when I invited the formation of the committee, they were to ascertain and enforce the wish of the nation on non-co-operation. Whilst it is a representative body with full powers to act, it cannot be said—it is not intended—to represent all the best and the most influential Mohammedan opinion. It does not for instance represent the titled nobility in Islam. It is no fault in the committee. It has been purposely restricted to those who are able to give their whole time and attention to the work of organized non-co-operation and in the process of ensuring obedience to instructions, other discipline and non-violence. It is therefore a committee of workers. It is not expected that the whole of the Mussulman India will be equally strong in non-co-operation. Some doubt its efficacy, others consider it to be a milk-and-water remedy. Some dread it as being too strong for India in her present stage; they say she has not developed the measure of sacrifice at present to ensure success. The committee does not represent or contain such doubting elements though they may otherwise be much more influential than many Mussulmans who are on the committee. It contains those only who have the largest faith in non-co-operation and who, although they swear by it, yet will not force the pace to the breaking point but will endeavour to carry the nation with its programme, in so far as it is practicable, and who whilst doing so will not themselves be deterred from taking the boldest steps and will seek out those who are prepared to do likewise. This committee, therefore, starting without any, has to build its reputation upon its work and upon results it may achieve. It will cease to exist if it shows no work or in spite of work shows no results. For outsiders it has the least representative capacity. Shaukat Ali is an amiable man but a rabid fanatic, carrying no weight with anybody; Hasrat Mohani a useless man who thinks of nothing but swadeshi; Dr. Kitchlew a man of yesterday with no experience of the world outside Amritsar. Much the same may be said against the others; I am no doubt a superior person but after all a crank and an interloper at that. Any representation signed by it will carry little weight with the outside world in so far as it depends upon the influence of the signatories. It does not therefore mean that it will never make representations. It certainly will, when swiftness is of the essence or when others for reasons of expediency or otherwise are not prepared to sign representations. Indeed, canvassing of signatures to weighty representations will be one of the means of gauging public opinion and testing the spirit of sacrifice among the elite of the land. For the masses and for internal work, however, the committee is the most representative. It is difficult perhaps to find two men more representative of Mussulman opinion than Shaukat Ali and Hasrat Mohani. The others though less known have been chosen for the qualities of strength, perseverance, patience, calmness, truthfulness, courage under difficulty and sacrifice believed to be possessed by them.

It has been suggested that I am to lead the movement. The statement is only partially true. I say this not out of humility merely but it is a literal fact. If the belief gains ground that I am leading the movement it may prove fatal to it. I am leading the movement in the sense that I am the adviser whose advice is most acceptable today and who has the determination not surpassed by anybody to carry out the programme of non-co-operation. But I do not pretend to represent Mussulman opinion. I can only try to interpret it. I could not stand alone and expect to carry the Mussulman masses with me. I should be very properly hooted out by a mixed Mussulman audience if I tried to make a point against the best Mussulman opinion in matters of religion. But if I were a Mussulman, I would not mind contesting issues before a Mussulman meeting in the face of heavy odds against me. I consider myself to be a sagacious worker and my sagacity means no more and no less than a fine perception of my limitations. I hope I never travel beyond my limits. Certainly I have never done so consciously. It is necessary for every intelligent Mussulman to bear in mind my limitations and the scope of my function. Ignorance is likely to prove fatal to the success of the movement. My connection with it must not stupefy workers into indolence or indifference. My connection should means, if it is to be productive of good results, greater watchfulness, greater sense of responsibility, greater capacity and willingness for work and greater efficiency. I can think out plans but execution must ever rest with Mussulman workers. The movement must be worked and led by them with the assistance of friends like me but also without if need be. I must not be expected to make non-co-operators; Mussulman leaders alone can make them. No amount of sacrifice on my part will produce in the Mussulman world the spirit of non-co-operation, i.e., sacrifice in a matter of religion. The Mussulman leaders will have to show it in their own persons before the masses evolve it.
And now the question why there are no Hindu leaders on the committee is easily answered. The supreme committee can only be purely Mussulman. My presence, too, I consider as an evil but it is a necessary evil because of my qualifications. I have specialized in non-co-operation. I have successfully experimented with it. The resolution about non-co-operation was conceived by me at the conference at Delhi. I am on the committee therefore as a specialist and not because I am a Hindu. My function is therefore of an adviser merely. That I happen to be a staunch Hindu with the conviction that every Hindu should consider it to be his duty to go with the Mussulmans the full length in non-co-operation, is no doubt an advantage to the committee. But that advantage was at its disposal whether I was on it or not.

Whilst I am considering the Hindu connection with the Khilafat movement, even at the risk of repetition I would like to clear up my own position. As I consider the Muslim claim to be intrinsically (as distinguished from religiously) just, I propose to go with them to the extent of fullest non-co-operation. And I consider it to be perfectly consistent with my loyalty to the British connection. But I would not go with the Mussulmans in any campaign of violence. I could not help them in promoting, for instance, an invasion of India through Afghanistan or otherwise for the purpose of forcing better peace terms. It is, I hold, the duty of every Hindu to resist any inroad on India even for the purpose specified as it is his duty to help his Mussulman brethren to satisfy their just demands by means of non-co-operation or other form of suffering, no matter how great, so long as it does not involve loss of India’s liberty or inflicting of violence on any person. And I have thrown myself whole-heartedly into the non-co-operation movement, if only because I want to prevent any such armed conflict.

1 In the third week of January 1920, it being the conference of the members of the Indian Khilafat deputation which waited upon the Viceroy on January 19. For the text of the resolution, vide Appendix “Resolutions Passed at Khilafat Committee Meeting”, 3-6-1920.
2 At the joint Hindu-Muslim Conference held at Allahabad on June1 and 2, 1920, the Hindu representatives had expressed their fear that complications might arise from the Indian Muslims welcoming an Afghan invasion of India. The Muslim speakers gave an assurance that they would resist any foreign invasion undertaken purely for conquest, but added that any invasion undertaken to uphold the prestige of Islam and to vindicate justice would have their full sympathy, if not their actual support.
170. THE DUTY OF THE PUNJABI

The Allahabad Leader deserves to be congratulated for publishing the correspondence on Mr. Bosworth Smith who was one of the Martial Law officers against whom the complaints about persistent and continuous ill-treatment were among the bitterest. It appears from the correspondence that Mr. Bosworth Smith has received promotion instead of dismissal. Some time before Martial Law, Mr. Smith appears to have been degraded. The Leader correspondent says:

He has since been restored to his position of a Deputy Commissioner of the second grade from which he was degraded and also been invested with powers under Sect. 30 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Since his arrival, the poor Indian population of the town of Ambala Cantonment has been living under a regime of horror and tyranny.

The correspondent adds:

I use both these words deliberately for conveying precisely what they mean.

I cull a few passages from this illuminating letter to illustrate the meaning of horror and tyranny:

In private complaints he never takes the statement of the complainant. It is taken down by the reader when the court rises and got signed by the magistrate the following day. Whether the report (received upon such complaints) is favourable to the complainant or unfavourable to him it is never read by the magistrate, and complaints are dismissed without proper trial. This is the fate of private complaints. Now, as regards police challans, pleaders for the accused are not allowed to interview undertrial prisoners in police custody. They are not allowed to cross-examine prosecution witnesses. . . . Prosecution witnesses are exa- mined with leading questions . . . Thus a whole prosecution story is put into the mouth of police witnesses. Witnesses for the defence, though called in, are not allowed to be examined by the defence counsel. . . . The accused is silenced if he picks up courage to say anything in defence. . . . Any Cantonment servant can write down the name of any citizen of the Cantonment on a chit of paper and ask him to appear the next day in court. This is a summons . . . If anyone does not appear in court, who is thus ordered, criminal warrants of arrest are issued against him.

There is much more of this style in the letter which is worth producing, but I have given enough to illustrate the writer’s meaning. Let me turn for a while to this official’s record during Martial Law. He is the official who tried people in batches and convicted them after a farcical trial. Witnesses have deposed to his having assembled people, having asked them to give false evidence, having removed women’s veils, called them “flies, bitches, she-asses” and having spat upon them. He it was who subjected the innocent pleaders of Sheikhupura to indescribable persecution. Mr. Andrews\(^1\) personally investigated complaints against this official and came to the conclusion that no official had behaved worse than Mr. Smith. He gathered the people of Sheikhupura, humiliated them in a variety of ways, called them “suvar-log”\(^2\), “gandi makhi”. His evidence before the Hunter Commission betrays his total disregard for truth and this is the officer who, if the correspondent in question has given correct facts, has been promoted. The question however is why he is at all in Government service and why he has not been tried for assaulting and abusing innocent men and women.

I notice a desire for the impeachment of General Dyer and Sir Michael O’Dwyer. I will not stop to examine whether the course is feasible. I was sorry to find Mr. Shastriar\(^3\) joining this cry for the prosecution of General Dyer. If the English people will willingly do so, I would welcome such prosecutions as a sign of their strong disapproval of the Jallianwala Bagh atrocity, but I would certainly not spend a single farthing in a vain pursuit after the conviction of these men. Surely the public has received sufficient experience of the English mind. Practically the whole English Press has joined the conspiracy to screen these offenders against humanity. I would not be party to make heroes of them by joining the cry for prosecution, private or public. If I can only persuade India to insist upon their complete dismissal, I should be satisfied. But more than the dismissal of Sir Michael O’Dwyer and General Dyer is necessary the peremptory dismissal, if not a trial, of Colonel O’Brien, Mr. Bosworh Smith, Rai [Sahib] Shri Ram and others mentioned in the Congress Sub-committee’s Report. Bad as General Dyer is I consider Mr. Smith to be infinitely worse and his crimes to be far more serious than the massacre of Jallianwalla Bagh. General Dyer sincerely believed that it was a soldierly act to terrorize people by shooting them. But Mr. Smith was wantonly cruel, vulgar and debased. If all the facts that have been deposed to against him are true, there is not a spark of humanity about him. Unlike General Dyer he lacks the courage to confirm what he has done and he wriggles when challenged. This officer remains free to inflict himself upon people who have done no wrong to him, and who is permitted to disgrace the rule he represents for the time being.

What is the Punjab doing? Is it not the clear duty of the Punjabis not to rest until they have secured the dismissal of Mr. Smith and the like? The Punjab leaders have been discharged in vain if they will not utilize the liberty they have received, in order to purge the administration of Messrs Bosworth Smith and company. I am sure that if they will only begin a determined agitation they will have the whole of India by their side. I venture to suggest to them that the best way to qualify for sending General Dyer to the gallows is to perform the easier and the more urgent duty of arresting the mischief still continued by the officials against whom they have assisted in collecting overwhelming evidence.

171. SPEECH AT BOMBAY ON BANARAS HINDU UNIVERSITY

June 23, 1920

A public meeting was held at the Madhav Bagh, Bombay, yesterday, when the Hon’ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya delivered a lecture on the Banaras Hindu University. H. H. the Maharaja Scindia of Gwalior presided, and there was a very large attendance, among those present being H. H. the Maharaja of Bikaner, Mr. M. K. Gandhi, Maulana Shaukat Ali. . . .

Mr. M. K. Gandhi said no man had worked more zealously and arduously in the cause of the University than their friend, Pandit Malaviya. Whenever he had had occasion to speak to the Pandit on the subject he had told him that he should make the furtherance of the cause of the University the principal work of his life. More than that he had told him that he should, if he could, leave the field of politics altogether and devote himself entirely to the cause of the University. Bombay had always been famous for the ready manner in which it came to the help of a deserving cause and he had no doubt that Bombay would extend its support to the University with her wonted generosity. Not only Pandit Malaviya, but two Maharajas had come to them that afternoon like humble petitioners. It was their duty therefore to contribute as much as they could to the funds of the University and they should do it promptly and on the spot. He concluded by proposing a hearty vote of thanks to H. H. the Maharaja Scindia for presiding at the meeting.

1 Who were arrested under the Martial Law and subsequently released under the amnesty announced in the Royal Proclamation of December 23, 1919

172. LETTER TO ESTHER FAERING

BOMBAY,
June 25, 1920

MY DEAR CHILD.

I have not been regular in writing to you as I had intended to. I have been too busy with the Khilafat question. I did however ask Mahadev to write to you on my behalf. You must also be receiving Young India regularly.

I had expected to hear from you from on board. But as yet there is nothing from you. I wrote to you a letter to reach you on your steamer and another to London care of Thomas Cook. I do hope you received both these letters.

I am now fixed up for the time being in Bombay. I enclose herewith the letters to the Viceroy. They will give you an idea of my activity. Devdas is with me.

I am anxious to hear about your meeting with your father and your health. Of course I expect to hear from you regularly.

With love,

Yours,

BAPU

173. “IN MEMORIAM”

Ashad Sud 11, 1976 [June 26, 1920]

It is difficult for me to write about Bhai Vrajlal’s death. I still cannot forget his figure. Not being free from moha yet, I do not find it easy to write objectively. I envy his death. I look upon him as a fortunate man indeed. What better death can we imagine than that of a man who had to receive service from no one, who actually died while serving others? When one dies a serene death, with God’s name on his lips, we regard him as one hallowed by good deeds. Bhai Vrajlal died doing God’s work.¹ I am aware that there is some exaggeration in saying this, but I know him so well that I am sure if he had been asked to choose he would have elected to die at the very hour when he did.

He was ever devoted to dharma. He had let me into the depths of his heart. So far as I remember, he asked to be alone with me only once. He had on that occasion acquainted me with his deepest feelings and told me of his moral dilemmas as well. The Ashram was very dear to him, as he showed through his actions. I thought of him as a muni². He rarely felt inclined to talk but his face was ever radiant. He never looked upon any work as low and used to take the utmost service from his body.

It is difficult, it would even be a sin, to forget his serene image. How should we cherish his memory? There is, I think, only one way for us, namely, to emulate his many fine qualities. He saw dharma in keeping silent and occupying himself in cheerful service. Let us keep him ever living by accepting this dharma and following it ever more firmly and filling our life with his.

BOMBAY, June 26, 1920

The demands in this resolution go beyond those in the Congress Committee Report. The resolution calls for the impeachment of O’Dwyer and his fellow officers. The Congress Sub-committee did not go so far, though the All-India Congress Committee has made this demand. My personal view still favours the Sub-committee report, but I move this resolution in deference to the wishes of the majority. I believe the Hunter Report is a plain, deliberate shielding of the officials in the Punjab. If I could have my way,

I would bring in a resolution advising non-co-operation and satyagraha against this, for that is the only way to succeed in our aim. I have not come here to make a speech; I speak from the depth of my heart. I have not come here to persuade you merely to pass resolutions, but to do many more things. If you can get Lord Chelmsford recalled to England, you will have done a far more important thing than hanging O’Dwyer or Dyer. The man who is most guilty of slighting public opinion should be the first to be removed. The hero of Martial Law, Bosworth Smith, still holds his post. The people should aim at having Dyer, O’Dwyer and Lord Chelmsford debarred from holding any post. In this resolution, we also ask for the return of fines to the people and compensation for their losses. You probably do not know the horror of these fines. There is no sense in asking for the dismissal of the officials while these huge fines remain unreturned. So long as the Rowlatt Act remains on the Statute-book, satyagraha is bound to go on. If only the people learn how to use this weapon, all sufferings would end. My own faith in satyagraha is unshakable. The Punjab injustices still remain unredressed. For these injustices, we are as much responsible as the officials. Our minimum demands are three : Lord Chelmsford’s recall, return of the fines and the Rowlatt Act to be buried for ever.

1 The meeting was held under the auspices of the Bombay Home Rule League and the National Union to protest against the Hunter Committee Report, with M. A. Jinnah presiding. The chief resolution of the meeting, moved by Gandhiji, protested against the majority report of the Hunter Committee and its acceptance by the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India, and urged them to implement the recommendations of the Congress report on the Punjab disorders.

We have taken one step forward on this question, and not an ordinary one at that. The Viceroy was served with a notice that he should take our side or else we would not be able to co-operate with him in carrying on the government. Let us hope that the Viceroy will have wisdom enough to take up the people’s fight. The British Empire, however, is not so fortunate as to see such a glorious day. Hence, we have no choice but to prepare for non-co-operation from August 1. The non-co-operation about which there has been so much talking and which has consumed so much paper and ink is near at hand.

We must be ready for it in a month’s time. The Muslims and Hindus will be put to the test. But, at the moment, I wish to say a few words to the Hindus alone. Before the Muslims act about the Khilafat, the Hindus need not do anything. When, however, the Muslims start non-co-operation, what should the Hindus do? A prominent Hindu gentleman in Allahabad said that for one Muslim resigning his position as Justice of the Peace or throwing up a job, three Hindus will be ready to follow suit. They will not have done much thereby. Muslims number more than seven crores and Hindus more than twenty-two crores; that means there are more than three times as many Hindus as Muslims. If there are three Hindus to stand by the side of every single Muslim, both Hindus and Muslims will have made equal sacrifices and to have done this will be evidence of friendship. In fact, friendship admits of no arithmetical calculation. But this does not mean that a friend may contribute less than his share. Friendship means or should mean that, even though paying very much more than one’s share, one should feel that nothing has been paid. We have, then, to ask ourselves whether the Hindus will stand by the Muslims; nay, the eyes of the whole world will be fixed on the Hindus for whether the Muslims win or not will depend largely on the attitude of the Hindus. If they support the Muslims, there is no doubt that the latter’s sufferings will end the sooner.

Hindus can avail themselves [of the opportunity] in two ways; one, by making sacrifices in proportion to those of Muslims and, two, by refusing to jump into the positions given up by Muslims. The first means that for every Muslim giving up his job there will be from one to three Hindus doing so. If Hindus act in this way, they will have done a great thing. The second means that no Hindu will fill the place left vacant by a Muslim and this too will be something great. Any Hindu taking up a job given up by a Muslim will have acted as an enemy of the latter and non-co-operation will become, if not impossible, extremely difficult. Thus, the Hindu who cannot do more may at any rate attend their meetings to show his sympathy and refrain from putting obstacles in their way and thus prove that he is not hostile to them.

176. LIVING ON THE PAST

As a son cannot live on his father’s reputation for long, so the people of India cannot maintain their prosperity only on the strength of the glory of ancient India. We saw last week that at present there is poverty, not prosperity, in India.

We have to think over the causes and remedies for this state of affairs.

Akbar’s successors lost the splendour of the Mogul Empire of his time, because they lost, one by one, Akbar’s qualities of character. Jehangir lost one, Shahjehan one more, Aurangzeb more still and his successors lost almost all. The result was that they lost the Empire to the British. The Indian people in modern times have behaved like Akbar’s successors.

Not wanting to admit this, we blame the British for everything; we fell because of their cunning, they robbed us of our wealth and left us beggars, we cannot even breathe without their permission; how are we to blame then [we ask]?

Though there is much exaggeration in this charge, there is also some truth in it. What is the cause of the control the British have acquired over us? May it not be our own fault? Who were the people tempted by the rupees of the East India Company? If that Company did business according to its own fashion, does the fault lie with it? If a wine merchant sells wine, can the consumer throw the responsibility on him? If I pay to the usurer interest equal to the principal, how is that the usurer’s fault? I, at any rate, cannot speak ill of him. A writer has said that as long as there are persons who can be deceived, so long will deceivers exist.

We shall not advance by finding fault with and hating the British. As long as we have not got rid of the shortcomings which enabled the British to get a hold here, we shall remain slaves.

And yet we are always pointing out their faults to the British and will continue to do so. This is what the Congress has mainly done. Speakers who do this are as numerous as leaves on a tree. I believe, therefore, that it will be more fruitful to try and see our own faults than to dwell on those of the British. The saying “If we are good, the entire world is good” is not to be lightly brushed aside. There is much force in it. If we remain upright, nobody will be able to corrupt us. It is a principle of medical science that so long as one’s blood is free from impurity, the poisonous air outside can have no effect on it. That is why, during an epidemic, some people are attacked while others are not. Likewise, had we been incorruptible, the East India Company could have done nothing and at the present time, too, officers like Michael O’Dwyer would have lost their jobs.

What are our failings, then, because of which we are helpless and cannot stop the profuse flow of wealth from our country, and in virtue of which our children get no milk, three crores of our people get only one meal a day, raids occur in broad daylight in Kheda district, and epidemics like the plague and cholera cannot be eradicated in our country while they can in others? How is it that the haughty Sir Michael O’Dwyer and the insolent General Dyer can crush us like so many bugs and the priest in Simla can write unworthy things about us; how is it that an intolerable injustice has been done to us in the Punjab? On the Khilafat issue, the British Prime Minister has gone back on his word. In both these matters, we seem to feel helpless.

The reason is our inveterate selfishness, our inability to make sacrifices for the country, our dishonesty, our timidity, our hypocrisy and our ignorance. Everybody is selfish, more or less, but we seem to be more selfish than others. We make some self-sacrifice in family matters, but very little of it for national work. Just look at our streets, our cities and our trains. In all these, we can see the condition of the country. How little attention is paid to the convenience of others in streets, in the town as a whole and in trains? We do not hesitate to throw refuse out of our courtyard on to the street; standing in the balcony, we throw out refuse or spit, without pausing to consider whether we are not inconveniencing the passersby. When we are building a house, we take little thought of the inconvenience that may be caused to our neighbours. In cities, we keep the tap open and, thinking that it is not our water which flows away, we allow it to run waste. The same thing is seen in the trains. We secure a seat for ourselves by hook or by crook and, if possible, prevent others from getting in. No matter if others are inconvenienced, we start smoking. We do not hesitate to throw banana skins and sugar-cane peelings right in front of our neighbours. When we go to draw water from a tap, we take little thought for others. Many such instances of our selfishness can be listed.

Where so much selfishness exists, how can one expect self-sacrifice? Does the business man cleanse his business of dishonesty for the sake of his country? Does he forgo his profit? Does he stop speculation in cotton for his country’s sake? Is any effort made to keep down milk prices by giving up the profit from its export? How many give up a job when necessary, for the sake of the country? Where are the men who will reduce their luxuries and adopt simplicity and use the money so saved for the country? If it is necessary for the country’s sake to go to jail, how many will come forward?

Our dishonesty is there for all to see. We believe that business can never be carried on honestly. Those who have the chance never refuse a bribe. We have the worst experience of corruption in the railways. We can get our work done only if we bribe the railway police, the ticket master and the guard. Even for securing a railway ticket, we have to use dishonest means or shut one’s eyes to them. The contents of railway parcels which can be opened ever so slightly, if not of those which are wellpacked, are sure to be pilfered.

Our hypocrisy is only a little less than that of the British. We have made cowardice especially our own. Nobody wants bloodshed in connection with non-co-operation, and yet it is out of this fear of bloodshed that we do not want to do anything. We are so possessed by the fear of the Government’s armed might that we dare not take any step. And so we submit to force in every matter and allow dacoits to plunder us in broad daylight.
What shall I say about our hypocrisy? It has increased in every field. Weakness is always accompanied by hypocrisy. Moreover, where the people want to be upright but cannot be so, hypocrisy will naturally increase; for, if we are not upright, we are anxious to seem so and thus we add another moral weakness to the one which we already possess. Hypocrisy has entered our religion as well, and that so fully that the marks which we put on our forehead, the rosary and things of that kind have ceased to be tokens of piety and become signs of impiety.

The origin of all is ignorance, to be sure. It is because we are ignorant of our strength that other weaknesses grow. We doubt the very existence of the atman in us, have to faith in its powers. This ignorance will not disappear merely with education. It can go only with a change in our ways of thinking. Literacy is necessary only to the extent that it develops our thinking power and teaches us to distinguish between good and evil.

Hence, so long as we have not given up our selfishness and learnt to be mindful of the interests of others, have not learnt self-sacrifice, have not taken refuge in truth, eschewed fear and become brave, shed hypocrisy and banished ignorance, the country will not prosper in any real sense.

177. NOTES

EDUCATED “ANTYAJAS”

The report of the second Kathiawar Antyaj Conference, which appeared in last week’s issue, contained some criticism of the educated Antyajas of Bombay. Apart from that criticism, we also hear that often, in conversation, they make such remarks as: ‘This is your Hinduism’, ‘This is what your shastras say’, There were some Hindus in the train’. This is the strain in which they talk. Antyajas should never permit in their mind the thought that they are not Hindus. Is it right for them to despise Hinduism because those who claim to be Hindus oppress them? A person does not leave his family because he is harassed by the other members, but tries, rather, to reform them; educated Antyajas should act in the same way. Those who have had schooling in Bombay and claim to be the leaders of their community are to be looked upon as educated men. Besides, it is not dharma to run down one’s own work. No occupation which it is not immoral to follow should be regarded as low. Antyajas are generally engaged in weaving, agriculture and sanitary duties. The first two provide clothing and food to the people and the last preserves public health. No society can live without all these three occupations. To call any of them low or base is evidence of sheer ignorance. It should not be our desire, when educated, to leave our occupation; our effort should be to ennoble it. In other words, we should all, despite the occupation we follow, be and live as virtuous and educated men and keep ourselves clean.

178. THE MUSSULMAN REPRESENTATION

Slowly but surely the Mussulmans are preparing for the battle before them. They have to fight against odds that are undoubtedly heavy but not half as heavy as the Prophet had against him. How often did he not put his life in danger? But his faith in God was unquenchable. He went forward with a light heart, for God was on his side, for he represented truth. If his followers have half the Prophet’s faith and half his spirit of sacrifice, the odds will be presently even and will in a little while turn against the despoilers of Turkey. Already the rapacity of the Allies is telling against themselves. France finds her task difficult. Greece cannot stomach her ill-gotten gains. And England finds Mesopotamia a tough job. The oil of Mosul may feed the fire she has so wantonly lighted and burn her fingers badly. The newspapers say the Arabs do not like the presence of the Indian soldiery in their midst. I do not wonder. They are a fierce and a brave people and do not understand why Indian soldiers should find themselves in Mesopotamia. Whatever the fate of non-co-operation, I wish that not a single Indian will offer his services for Mesopotamia, whether for the civil or the military department. We must learn to think for ourselves and before entering upon any employment find out whether thereby we may not make ourselves instruments of injustice. Apart from the question of Khilafat and from the point of abstract justice, the English have no right to hold Mesopotamia. It is no part of our loyalty to help the Imperial Government in what is in plain language daylight robbery. If therefore we seek civil or military employment in Mesopotamia we do so for the sake of earning a livelihood. It is our duty to see that the source is not tainted.

5 In Mesopotamia, which became a British mandated territory under the Turkish peace terms

It surprises me to find so many people shirking over [sic] the very mention of non-co-operation. There is no instrument so clean, so harmless and yet so effective as non-co-operation. Judiciously handled it need not produce any evil consequences. And its intensity will depend purely on the capacity of the people for sacrifice.

The chief thing is to prepare the atmosphere of non-co-operation. ‘We are not going to co-operate with you in your injustice’, is surely the right and the duty of every intelligent subject to say. Were it not for our utter servility, helplessness and want of confidence in ourselves, we would certainly grasp this clean weapon and make the most effective use of it. Even the most despotic government cannot stand except for the consent of the governed which consent is often forcibly procured by the despot. Immediately the subject ceases to fear the despotic force his power is gone. But the British Government is never and nowhere entirely or even chiefly laid upon force. It does make an honest attempt to secure the goodwill of the governed. But it does not hesitate to adopt unscrupulous means to compel the consent of the governed. It has not gone beyond the ‘Honesty is the best policy’ idea. It therefore bribes you into consenting to its will by awarding titles, medals and ribbons, by giving you employment, by its superior financial ability to open for its employees avenues for enriching themselves and finally, when these fail, it resorts to force. That is what Sir Michael O’Dwyer did and that is what almost every British administrator would certainly do if he thought it necessary. If then we would not be greedy, if we would not run after titles and medals and honorary posts which do the country no good half the battle is won.

My advisers are never tired of telling me that even if the Turkish peace terms are revised¹ it will not be due to non-co-operation. I venture to suggest to them that non-co-operation has a higher purpose than mere revision of the terms. If I cannot compel revision, I must at least cease to support a Government that becomes party to the usurpation. And if I succeed in pushing non-co-operation to the extreme limit, I do compel the Government to choose between India and the usurpation. I have faith enough in England to know that at that moment England will expel her present jaded ministers and put in others who will make a clean sweep of the terms in consultation with an awakened India, draft terms that will be honourable to her, to Turkey and acceptable to India.

But I hear my critics say: ‘India has not the strength of purpose and the capacity for the sacrifice to achieve such a noble end.’ They are partly right. India has not these qualities now; because we have not—shall we not evolve them and infect the nation with them? Is not the attempt worth making? Is any sacrifice too great to gain such a great purpose?

179. PRESS STATEMENT ON BOYCOTT OF REFORMED COUNCILS

Needless to say that I am in entire accord with Lala Lajpat Rai on the question of the boycott of the reformed Councils². For me it is but one step in the campaign of non-co-operation and as I feel equally keenly on the Punjab question as on the Khilafat, Lala Lajpat Rai’s suggestion is doubly welcome. I have seen the suggestion made in more quarters than one that non-co-operation on the Reforms should commence after the process of election has been gone through. I cannot help saying that it is a mistake to go through the election farce and the expense of it when we clearly do not intend to take part in the proceedings of these Legislative Councils. Moreover, a great deal of educative work has to be done among the people. And if I could I would not have the best attention of the country frittered away in electioneering. The populace will not understand the beauty of non-co-operation if we seek election and then resign. But it would be a fine education for them if the electors are taught not to elect anybody and unanimously to tell whosoever may seek their suffrage, that he would not represent them if he sought election so long as the Punjab and Khilafat question were not satisfactorily settled.¹ I hope, however, that Lala Lajpat Rai does not mean to end with the boycott of the Reform Councils.² We must take, if necessary, every one of the four stages of non-co-operation if we are to be regarded as a self-respecting nation. The issue is clear. Both the Khilafat terms and the Punjab affairs show that Indian opinion counts for little in the councils of the Empire. It is a humiliating position. We shall make nothing of the Reforms if we quietly swallow the humiliation. In my humble opinion, therefore, the first condition of real progress is the removal of these two difficulties in our path. And unless some better course of action is devised nolens volens non-co-operation must hold the field.

[Before July 1920]³

We want to conduct a novel experiment here. The experiment is so delicate that the teachers of the National School would not have the courage to undertake it on their own if I did not associate myself with it.

We wish to introduce co-education here. The teachers once told me: “The number of girls in the school is rising now, and there are grown-up girls, too, amongst them. Should we set up a separate class for girls after some time?” Immediately I replied in the negative and remarked that is was not at all necessary to have a separate class for girls.

¹ When elections were held in November 1920, in six cases out of 637 election was impossible owing to the absence of a candidate.

² Lajpat Rai was not originally in favour of Gandhiji’s non-co-operation programme, but at the Nagpur Congress session of December 1920 he threw in his lot completely with Gandhiji like so many others.

³ The speech, as stated in a prefatory note in the source, was first reported in, presumably, the July 1920 issue of _Madhapudo_, a manuscript magazine of the Ashram School.
Soon after, however, I realized the seriousness of the matter and I thought of the magnitude of the risk involved. I felt that it would be better if I explained to you all, students as well as teachers, the women and the other inmates of the Ashram, certain rules of conduct. Do not think that everything I say now is absolute law. I shall merely express my views. The teachers may discuss them afterwards and make necessary changes.

Boys and girls may sit in the same class, but they should maintain some discipline in doing so. Boys should sit in a separate row. Adolescent boys and girls should not sit together, because that may involve the danger of chance contacts. Many of these girls are already come of age and many others will be so in a short time. Thus the girls are growing up and some of the boys studying with us are already grown up. These boys and girls should not touch one another. Physical contact disturbs brahmacharya. Outside the class-room, the boys may mix, converse, cut jokes and play among themselves; the girls may do the same among themselves. But the boys and girls may not do this together; they should neither converse nor joke with one another. And they certainly may not carry on private correspondence with one another. Children at any rate should have nothing private. For a man who adheres to truth, what secrets can he have to keep? Even for elders it is a sign of weakness to have any private correspondence. You should not imitate this weakness of theirs, but should overcome your weakness as they may advise you. Ordinarily, parents do not confess their weaknesses to their children and, in such matters, they do not utter a single word. This, however, is a grave mistake on their part. By acting in this way they push their children down into the deep pit of disaster. If all parents take care that their children do not repeat their mistakes, the extent to which the boys will benefit cannot even be imagined. When I say that nobody should keep anything secret, it does not mean that you should pry into the secrets of others; these are not your concern. If we elders are sitting somewhere and talking among ourselves and if we ask you to leave us alone, you ought to walk away. You cannot cure us of our weakness by listening to our talk. But you should have no letter or other matter of interest which you cannot lay fearlessly before your elders. The best thing is that there should be no exchanges between boys and girls, whether inside or outside the class-room, in the absence of elders. No girl should go to the room reserved for boys and converse, discuss or study there like any other boy. There can be no objection to girls serving water or talking to boys in the presence of some elders, for example, on the prayer ground. It is their duty, in fact, to serve water to everybody there. Even here, however, propriety should be observed. They should take care that there is no physical contact. There is every danger of physical desire being awakened when grown-up boys touch grown-up girls. It is therefore essential that they guard against any possibility of such physical contact.

As days pass I realize with increasing clearness that preservation of the vital fluid is imperative if one has determined to serve the country. Which service can I get out of you with these your lean and lanky bodies? None of you seems to have any flesh on his body. Bodies like yours are the result of failure to conserve the vital fluid. All of you should conserve this fluid and build up your bodies. As long as the body is weak, it is not possible even to acquire knowledge, let alone putting it to any use. A hot-tempered person can acquire knowledge, and so can a dishonest person, but one who does not observe brahmacharya can never acquire knowledge. We can gather from our Puranas that big demons, who subsequently became embodiments of sheer lust, had to observe brahmacharya for acquiring knowledge.

That a healthy body is essential for acquisition of knowledge needs no proof. I wish, therefore, to train you to have bodies as strong as demons’. In spite of my best efforts to improve them, I shall never see you with bodies like Shaukat Ali’s. For this, we, your progenitors, are to blame. However, if even now preservation of the vital fluid is ensured India can once again give birth to a Hanuman. How can a person, whose body is as thin as a stick, cultivate the virtue of forgiveness? Such a person will submit through sheer terror. If Shaukat Ali were to slap me in the face here, how can I pretend to pardon him? If I do not react in any way, it will mean that I have been cowed down. I can, of course, pardon Rasik here. I tell you, therefore, if you wish to become forgiving and truthful heroes you must resolutely conserve your vital fluid. If I display so much vigour at this age of 51 it is only because I have conserved it. If I had done so from the beginning, I cannot imagine to what heights I should have soared by now. I appeal to all parents and guardians present here to help their boys in every way to conserve the vital fluid. If they cannot restrain themselves any longer and come and tell you so, requesting you to get them married, then only should you arrange their marriage. It is not as if men could remain unmarried only in the old days. Lord Kitchener was a bachelor—he did not marry. I do not believe that he must have been seeking satisfaction elsewhere. He had decided that only bachelors and unmarried men—that is to say, only persons of strong physique—should join the army; they should be unmarried and not given to dissolute ways either. I would therefore request all the elders not to marry off their sons and daughters in a hurry for fear that they may not get suitable partners afterwards. Please wait till they themselves come and express their desire. I am sure God will be there at that time and will see that the boy or the girl gets a suitable match.

I wish to mention another matter to the boys, namely, that boys and girls who have chosen and are studying under the same person as their teacher are as brothers and sisters to one another and must live as such. There can be no other relationship or bond between them. All of you staying in this Ashram and studying in this school are like brothers and sisters. The day this relationship is violated, I shall not have a moment’s hesitation in winding up this Ashram or the school. At that time I shall not think of what people might say. You should assure me that you will preserve your relation of brothers and sisters; then alone will I go ahead with this experiment fearlessly and also invite other girls here. There is a gentleman who has expressed a desire to come and stay here. He has a 12-year-old daughter. Among us a girl of this age is considered to have grown up and is married off. Hence you must reassure me so that I may in turn reassure the gentlemen that his daughter’s virtue will remain unblemished here and that he will be able to mould her character as he wishes to. This experiment is so delicate that only if the rules I have laid down are obeyed in every particular can parents and guardians of the girls be free from anxiety and the teachers and other elderly members of the Ashram conduct this experiment without any apprehensions. For these people to have suspicions and to spy upon the girls will harm both parties.

Whoever feels that it is not possible for him to restrain himself any longer, that his physical urge has grown so strong that it is impossible for him to curb it, should immediately quit this place rather than bring shame to the Ashram and break up this holy experiment. The Bible has gone to the length of enjoining that, if one’s eyes are not under one’s control, one should thrust a needle into them. I do not think that I shall be in such a plight; but should I ever be, you can trust me and this river Sabarmati.

Whether or no sex desire has awakened in you, all of you should meditate on what I have said and act upon it. We cannot ignore the difference created by God. Only by respecting this difference will anyone in whom sex desire has become active be able to control it—for one in whom it has not become active this control will be quite easy. I have often said, and I repeat here once again, that I had to make great efforts to adhere to brahmacharya. I have not come across till this day any man who has struggled to practise brahmacharya with such effort. For him who has indulged in carnal pleasure even once, it becomes very difficult to conserve his vital fluid thereafter. You would, therefore, do well not to taste the pleasure at all. Those who feel that their desires have been roused should suppress them at that stage, while those whose desires are yet dormant will not need to put in any particular effort. They have merely to be careful that their desires are not roused. Only those who conserve their vital fluid will be able to serve the nation. Similarly, the girls can become worthiest housewives only by practising brahmacharya. She who serves not one person, her husband, but the whole country, the poor and the afflicted—who will not call her the worthiest housewife?

I wish to draw your attention to one more thing. Plain clothes help in keeping brahmacharya, though it must be admitted that this help is negligible. It is possible that a man donning khadi may be a veritable sinner, and also that a man dressing himself up in grand attire may be the purest among pure brahmacharis. I would worship such a man; but a sinner dressed in khadi, should he come near me, I would immediately show him out. All the same, we certainly cannot don gaudy dresses and try to look handsome. If a brahmachari need display his body to anybody, it is only to God and to no one else, and God sees us in all our nakedness. Why then should we decorate ourselves in fine garments? Real beauty shines through one’s virtues. We should impress others by our virtues, not by our looks. Clothes are intended only for covering the body; and this can be covered by coarse khadi in the best possible manner. If older people themselves find it difficult to wear khadi clothes, even then they should accustom their children to wear khadi. The mother who decks her child in rich garments, pleased with the thought that the child looks lovely thereby, is foolish. How do rich garments confer beauty? And even if they do, what is the good of it? If somebody wished to marry my daughter only for her good looks, I would turn him out with contempt. I would give her in marriage only to a person who wanted her as a wife for the sake of her virtues. If you wish to appear handsome, do not put on gaudy garments but cultivate virtues. If you become virtuous, you will positively appear handsome and you will be honoured wherever you go.

I do not think that I have anything more to say. I have told you everything I wanted to. What I have said is of priceless worth. If you have not understood it have it explained to you by your elders or your teachers, because even small boys ought to understand and bear in mind what I have said. You should all reflect upon it and, after digesting it, act upon it to the utmost you can and thus make it possible for me to try this experiment in co-education fearlessly and make a success of it.

APPENDICES

APPENDIX I

TURKISH PEACE TERMS

1. The frontiers of Turkey will be as already demarcated, and where necessary revised by a Boundary Commission to be created. According to this delimitation Turkey will include the Constantinople sector of Thrace and all the predominantly Turkish areas of Asia Minor.

2. The rights and titles of the Turkish Government in Constantinople will not be affected, but the right to modify this provision is reserved in the event of the failure of Turkey faithfully to fulfil the treaty.

3. A Commission of the Straits will have authority over all waters between the Mediterranean mouth of the Dardanelles, the Black Sea mouth of the Bosphorus, and of the waters within three miles of each of these mouths; also on the shores to such extent as may be necessary. The duty of the Commission will be to ensure freedom of navigation in these waters in peace and war.

4. A scheme of local self-government will be drafted for Kurdistan, including provision for the protection of the Assyro-Chaldeans and other minorities. The League of Nations will decide later whether Kurdistan should be granted independence of Turkey, if it be proved that separation is desired by the majority of the Kurdish people.

5. Certain portions of Smyrna are formed into a separate unit to be administered by Greece, the suzerainty of Turkey being continued for a period of years till the autonomous State of Smyrna decides its own destiny.

6. With the exception of the Constantinople sector, Eastern Thrace is ceded to Greece, provision being made for the local self-government of the town of Adrianople.

7. Certain portions of the Armenian districts of Turkey are added to the existing Armenian Republic, the boundary between Turkey and Armenia in certain districts being referred to the arbitration of the President of the United States, whose decision will be final thereon and on any stipulation regarding the Armenian access to the sea.

8. Syria, Mesopotamia and Palestine are provisionally recognized as independent States, subject to administrative advice and assistance from a Mandatory Power until such time as they are able to stand alone. The mandate for Syria has been entrusted to France and those for Mesopotamia and Palestine to Britain.

1 Communicated by the Allies to Turkey and published in India in Gazette of India Extraordinary, dated May 14, 1920 mandate for Palestine will include the provision for giving effect to the declaration of November 8, 1918, regarding the establishment of a national home for the Jewish people.

9. The Hedjaz is recognized as a free and independent State. The King of the Hedjaz undertakes to assure free and easy access to Mecca and Medina to Muslim pilgrims of all countries.

10. Turkey relinquishes all rights and titles over Egypt and the Sudan and Cyprus.

11. Turkey recognizes the French protectorate over Morocco and Tunisia.

12. Turkey relinquishes her claims to certain islands in the Aegean.

13. The military, naval, and air forces at the disposal of Turkey will consist of the following: (1) the Sultan’s bodyguard at Constantinople; (2) a troop of gendarmerie for the maintenance of internal order and security and the protection of minorities; (3) special elements for reinforcements of the gendarmerie and eventual control of the frontiers. The bodyguard is limited to 700 and the gendarmerie with special elements to 50,000. All warships interned in Turkish ports are declared to be finally surrendered. The Turkish fleet is limited to six torpedo boats and seven sloops.

No military or naval air forces or dirigibles are to be maintained.

14. Control will be maintained over the finances of Turkey until the discharge of her international obligations has been assured.

15. Freedom of navigation and transit is secured.

The following ports are declared international ports, provision to be made for free zones in each: Alexandretta, Busrah, Constantinople, Dedeagatch, Haief, Hailad Pasha, Smyrna and Trebizond.

16. In addition to the above are numerous provisions regarding (a) League of Nations, (b) protection of minorities, (c) restoration of abandoned property rights, (d) prisoners of war, (e) graves of Allied soldiers, (f) punishment of war criminals, (g) economic questions and concessions, (h) labour conventions and (i) antiquities. But it is not necessary to detail these in the present statement.

VICEROY’S MESSAGE TO MUSLIMS OF INDIA

The decisions of the Supreme Council of the Allies in respect of the peace settlement with Turkey have been made known to the world. They have been reached after the most careful and anxious consideration of representations from the Muslims of all countries, and you have my assurance that before coming to its present decision the Supreme Council has had all possible regard to those representations which have proceeded from the Mohammedan subjects of His Majesty in India. My Government are issuing along with a summary of the peace terms a statement which explains the principal decisions and the reasons for them. These decisions are in full accordance with the high principles which have been applied in the peace settlement with all other Powers lately at war with Britain and her Allies. Nevertheless they include terms which I fear must be painful to all Muslims. The long delays which have protracted your anxiety for over a year although they have been unavoidable, have filled me with regret for your sakes, and now in your hour of trial I desire to send you a message of encouragement and sympathy, which I trust will uphold you. In the day of the Empire’s need you made a splendid response to the call of your King and country, and by so doing you contributed much to the triumph of those ideals of justice and humanity for which the Allies fought. The Empire of which you form a part is now firmly established on these ideals and a great future of political progress and material prosperity is within the grasp of the Muslims of India, who have ever enjoyed under British rule the fullest religious freedom. Before the late disastrous War Great Britain had always maintained the closest ties of friendship with Turkey and I am confident with the conclusion of this new treaty that friendship will quickly take life again and a Turkey regenerate, full of hope and strength, will stand forth in the future as in the past, a pillar of the Islamic faith. This thought will, I trust, strengthen you to accept the peace terms with resignation, courage and fortitude, and to keep your loyalty towards the Crown bright and untarnished as it has been for so many generations.

God save the King Emperor!

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA DESPATCH ON HUNTER COMMITTEE

REPORT

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

HOME DEPARTMENT

Political

To

THE RIGHT HON’BLE EDWIN MONTAGU

HIS MAJESTY’S SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA

SIMLA

May 3, 1920

SIR,

We submit for your information and for any orders His Majesty’s Government may desire to issue the report which was presented on the 8th March, 1920, by the Disorders Committee, together with our review of the report and our conclusions thereon. In the ordinary course the report would have been published with a resolution of the Government of India in the Home Department, but we consider the subject so important that after discussion with you we have decided that it is best to communicate to you our views and findings on the report for the information of His Majesty’s Government. We desire to add that our views and conclusions are unanimous, except on those points where the dissent of our Hon’ble Colleague, Mr. Shafi, has been expressly indicated. We may also state that our Hon’ble Colleague, Sir George Lowndes, now on leave, concurred in all the conclusions we had reached up to the time of his departure.

2. In Resolution No. 2168, dated the 14th October 1919, the Governor-General-in-Council with the approval of the Secretary of State appointed a Committee to investigate the disturbances in Bombay, Delhi and the Punjab, their causes, and the measures taken to cope with them. The Hon’ble Lord Hunter, lately Solicitor-General for Scotland and now Senator of the College of Justice in Scotland, was appointed President of the Committee, which consisted of the following Members:

(1) The Hon’ble Mr. Justice G. C. Rankin, Judge of the High Court, Calcutta.

(2) The Hon’ble Mr. W. F. Rice, C.S.I., I.C.S., Additional Secretary to the Government of India, Home Department.

(4) The Hon’ble Pandit Jagat Narayan, B.A., Member of the Legislative Council of the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces.
(5) The Hon’ble Mr. Thomas Smith, Member of the Legislative Council of the Lieutenant-Governor of the United Provinces.

(6) Sir Chimanlal Harilal Setalvad, Kt., Advocate of the High Court, Bombay.

(7) Sardar Sahibzada Sultan Ahmed Khan, Muntazim-ud-Doula, M.A., L.L.M., (Cantab.), Bar-at-Law, Member for Appeals, Gwalior State.

The Committee began its sittings on the 29th October, 1919, and after hearing evidence at Delhi, Lahore, Ahmedabad, and Bombay finished its labours in the first week of March 1920, when its report was presented to the Government of India.

Before reviewing the findings of the Committee we desire to make some preliminary observations regarding the scope of the enquiry, the procedure followed by the Committee in recording evidence, and the general character of its conclusions.

3. In order to obtain a general view of the character of the disturbances and of the scope of the enquiry it will be useful to explain briefly the relative geographical position of the chief centres of disorder and to refer to a few salient dates which indicate the sequence of events in point of time. It was at Delhi—the Capital of India and from its historical and commercial importance a determining factor of considerable weight in the attitude of the rest of Northern India—that disturbances first occurred on the 30th March. They were of such a character as required the use of the military to restore order and before this was achieved it became necessary to fire twice on the mob. On the 10th April violent rioting took place at Amritsar and Lahore in the Punjab, and at Ahmedabad in the Presidency of Bombay, and distinct unrest manifested itself in a minor degree at places as far distant as Calcutta and Bombay. Lahore is a city of 230,000 inhabitants and the capital of the Punjab. Amritsar, which is 20 miles east of Lahore, is a town of more than 150,000 inhabitants and of great commercial importance. Ahmedabad has a population of roughly 280,000 and is an industrial town where 78 mills are located. The distances respectively of Lahore, Amritsar and Ahmedabad from Delhi are roughly 300, 280 and 540 miles. The situation in the Punjab after the 10th April rapidly deteriorated and Martial Law was proclaimed on the 15th April in the districts of Lahore and Amritsar, and shortly after in three other districts. About two weeks later a thundercloud on the frontier burst and the mobilization of troops for the Afghan war began on the 4th May. This seriously affected the general situation in the Punjab and it was not found possible to withdraw Martial Law from all the districts concerned before the 12th June nor from railway lands till a later date. These were briefly the events which with their causes and consequences formed the subject matter of the Committee’s enquiry.

4. The next point to which the Government of India wish to advert is the decision of the All-India Congress Committee to abstain from presenting evidence before the Committee of Enquiry. As explained by Lord Hunter in his letter of the 8th March forwarding the Report of the Committee, all persons desirous of giving evidence were invited to submit their names and addresses, together with a brief memorandum of the points on which they desired to give evidence, and it was left to the Committee to decide what evidence they would hear. Lord Hunter has described the circumstances in which the Congress Committee declined after the 12th November further to assist the Committee of Enquiry by appearing before it and tendering evidence, the offer which the same body made on the 30th December to produce their evidence and reopen the enquiry, and the reasons which led Lord Hunter to reject that offer. We believe that Lord Hunter’s account of the matter will convince all reasonable people that his decision was fully justified. The point, however, which we wish to emphasize—and it is one which was present to Lord Hunter’s mind also—is this, that the material placed at the disposal of the Committee and the evidence laid before it covered the whole field of enquiry. The official witnesses fully disclosed all they knew regarding the events in which they had participated and placed before the Committee all correspondence and other documentary evidence which had any bearing on the nature of the outbreak, the suppression of the disturbances, or the administration of Martial Law. It is a matter of regret to Government that this was not supplemented by the additional evidence which the Congress Committee had collected and that the evidence which has since been published by that body has not therefore been subjected to examination by an impartial tribunal. They are doubtful, however, whether it would have made any substantial difference to the general picture placed before the Committee, although it might have thrown further light on particular incidents. With regard to the firing at Jallianwala Bagh, on which the attention of the public both at home and in India has been so largely concentrated since December last, the Committee had the most ample materials for judgment and further evidence would have contributed nothing to their knowledge of the facts.

5. The Committee have now submitted their recommendations in the form of a majority and minority report. The majority report is signed by the President and four members of the Committee, Mr. Justice Rankin, General Barrow, and Messrs Rice and Smith. The minority report is signed by Sir C. H. Setalvad, Pandit Jagat Narayan and Sahibzada Sultan Ahmad Khan. While two reports have been submitted, it is a matter of satisfaction to the Government of India that most of the findings of fact are unanimous and that in spite of differences of opinion as to the conclusions to be deduced therefrom there is considerable common ground in this respect also. That common ground covers the whole of the events in Delhi and the Bombay Presidency. It also covers much of the narrative of events and the causes of the disturbances in the Punjab. Nor is the divergence in the Punjab findings altogether basic. It is partly one of degree, partly one of essential difference. Certain measures adopted in the suppression of the disturbances and the administration of Martial Law are condemned in both reports but with varying degrees of severity. This remark applies in particular to the joint condemnation of the firing at Jallianwala Bagh. The most important point on which there is an essential difference of opinion relates to the introduction of Martial Law in the Punjab. While the majority find that a state of rebellion existed, necessitating or justifying the adoption of that measure, the minority consider that the disorders did not amount to rebellion and that the disturbances might have been suppressed and order restored without abrogating the control of the civil authorities or calling in military force save as auxiliary to the civil power.

6. It will be convenient to explain at this stage the arrangement which has been followed in the reports. The first seven chapters of the majority report are devoted to accounts of the disturbances in Delhi, the Bombay Presidency, and the Punjab districts of Amritsar, Lahore, Gujranwala, Gujrat and Lyallpur. In each case the majority briefly review the disturbances and record their findings on the propriety of the measures adopted to check them and to restore order. In Chapter VIII they describe the widespread attacks on communications which have an important bearing on the general nature of the disorders. In Chapter IX they discuss the causes of the disturbances with more particular reference to the Punjab. Chapter X contains a brief description of the stages in the introduction of Martial Law. In Chapter XI the reasons for the introduction and continuance of Martial Law are considered, while Chapter XII is devoted to a criticism of the administration of Martial Law.

The minority report follows a somewhat different plan of arrangement. Chapter I sets forth the general extent of the minority’s agreement or disagreement with the findings of the majority. The nature and causes of the disorders are discussed in Chapter II. The justification for the introduction and the continuance of Martial Law in the Punjab is examined in Chapter III. Chapter IV is devoted to the firing at Jallianwala Bagh. The administration of Martial Law is discussed in Chapter V, the use of armoured trains and aero-planes in Chapter VI and the working of the Martial Law courts in Chapter VII.

Although it might have been more convenient to review at the outset the findings of the Committee regarding the causes and nature of the disturbances, we are reluctant to depart from the general plan of the majority report, as any such departure would increase the difficulty of comparing its findings with those of the minority. We accordingly propose to examine the report chapter by chapter, to state our conclusions on the findings of the majority and minority, more particularly where these differ, and finally to explain the action which in our judgment should be taken on the report.

7. Chapter I deals with the disturbances at Delhi. The Committee are unanimous in finding that the authorities handled the situation in an adequate and reasonable manner, that there was no provocative or unnecessary display of military force, and that the firing was justified on the three occasions on which it was found necessary to resort to this extreme measure. The actual collisions between the police and mobs are found to be the by-products of the satyagraha movement. The majority recognize that Mr. Gandhi’s visit to Delhi after the first outbreak, if not prevented, would have been a serious embarrassment to the executive authorities there and might well have proved a source of great danger. The minority, while doubtful of the expediency of his exclusion and, while thinking that his presence might have had a beneficial result, do not deny the possibility of developments endangering the public peace. The only criticism passed by the Committee on the measures adopted by the local authorities is that the Deputy Commissioner made a mistake in enrolling a number of leading citizens as special constables, though, as they point out, these persons were not called on to render any services.

We accept these conclusions and have perused with satisfaction the commendation which has been bestowed by the Committee on the handling of the situation by the local officers. We do not consider that any blame attaches to the Deputy Commissioner for his appointment of special constables, as he acted in accordance with the established practice. We have, however, decided to address local Governments on the question whether the orders now obtaining on the subject in the various provinces require modification or revision. This is the more necessary as it appears that leading citizens were enrolled as special constables at other disturbed centres besides Delhi.

The Government of India consider that the events described in this chapter have an important bearing on the rest of the report, for they were the first fruits of the satyagraha movement, the first collision between the forces of order and the adherents of the passive resistance or civil disobedience movement. The behaviour of the crowd on the 30th March, which rendered it necessary for the military and police to fire on two occasions, cannot be ascribed to any action taken against Mr. Gandhi or local politicians. Such action has been pleaded in excuse of later mob excesses, but the internment order against Mr. Gandhi was not passed till ten days after the first outbreak of disorder at Delhi.

8. Chapter II gives an account of the disturbances in the Bombay Presidency. They were confined to Ahmedabad City and Viramgam in the Ahmedabad district, to Nadiad in the Kaira district, and to Bombay City. Viramgam is a town of 20,000 inhabitants 40 miles distant from Ahmedabad, and Nadiad, which has a population of 30,000, is 29 miles from the same city. By far the most serious outbreak of disorder occurred in Ahmedabad which is the home of Mr. Gandhi and may be described as the birth-place of the satyagraha movement. The disturbances began on the 10th April as soon as the people of Ahmedabad heard of the action taken against Mr. Gandhi, and were not finally checked till the 14th, although military assistance was called in from the afternoon of the 10th. It is not necessary to follow the report of the Committee into the details of the disturbances and the measures taken to quell them but it is important to notice that for two days mob law reigned in the city and the excesses committed included two atrocious murders, brutal assaults on Europeans and Government officers, and the total destruction of the courts and other Government buildings. The efforts of the police and the military to protect the city and restore order were not successful till the military commander, with the concurrence of the District magistrate, issued a proclamation on the 12th April warning all people that any gathering of over ten individuals collected at one spot would be fired at, and that any single individual seen outside any house between 7 p.m. and 6 a.m. who did not stop when challenged would be shot. The last occasion on which the troops fired was midday of the 13th April and the Committee find that there was not in fact any firing without warning nor was any person fired on, who was not either rioting or encouraging rioters. The outbreak came to an end abruptly on the 14th April and its cessation is ascribed partly to the effects of this proclamation and partly to the return of Mr. Gandhi who, be it said to his credit, used his influence with the people to assist the authorities in restoring order. During the disturbances telegraph wires were cut at eight places in Ahmedabad and at fourteen places outside, and property to the value of nine lakhs of rupees was destroyed. The number of rounds fired by the armed police and the troops was 748, and the number of ascertained casualties amongst the rioters was 28 killed and 123 wounded. The majority report comments thus on the measures taken to suppress the outbreak: “We are of opinion that the measures taken by the authorities to deal with the disturbances were appropriate. The use of military force was unavoidable and the rioters alone were responsible for the casualties which ensued. The control of the city was in the hands of the military for less than two days and this has been referred to as a period of Martial Law. But beyond maintaining order and issuing the proclamation on the 12th April, the military authorities did not interfere with matters of administration. The so-called Martial Law orders were drastic; but the situation was most serious. The belief that all groups of more than ten men would be fired on without warning did much to restore order, and it appears that this instruction was not in fact literally carried out. We think that the troops behaved with praiseworthy restraint in most trying circumstances, and that the military action taken was not excessive. The Bombay Government have informed us that the behaviour of the military during the period that they were stationed in the city was exemplary. Our investigation leads to the same conclusion.”

9. The outbreak at Viramgam was marked by the same ferocity as in Ahmedabad, by arson, murder, the destruction of Government property, and attacks on railway and telegraph communications. The fury of the mob culminated in the savage murder of Mr. Madhavlal, a magisterial officer, who after a relentless pursuit was dragged from a house, where he had taken refuge, to the public road, soaked in kerosene oil and burnt alive beneath piles of public records, his body being completely incinerated. The outbreak began on the morning of the 12th April and was not finally suppressed till troops arrived from Ahmedabad late on the evening of that day. The Committee find that the total ascertained casualties amongst the rioters were six killed and eleven wounded and that the value of the property destroyed by the mob exceeded two lakhs of rupees. They commend the conduct of the armed police who behaved with spirit and kept off the mob from the public offices for six hours. They consider that the force used against the rioters by the armed police and by the armed peons of the Salt Department under Mr. Caldecott was certainly not excessive, and say indeed that if greater force could have been applied at an earlier stage, an atrocious murder and much destruction of property might have been prevented. They express regret that the murderers of Mr. Madhavlal could not be brought to justice for want of adequate identification.

10. In Nadiad the chief incident was an attempt to wreck a train which was conveying British troops to Ahmedabad. The train was derailed but had a miraculous escape, as it was brought to a stand before running down a steep embankment. Several attacks were made on railway and telegraph communications, but no collision occurred between the people and the troops who were sent there as a precautionary measure.

11. In Bombay City attempts were made to create disturbances when news came of the exclusion of Mr. Gandhi from the Punjab and Delhi, but the situation was well handled by the police and the military, and with the arrival of Mr. Gandhi the disorder subsided. As the Committee were informed by the Bombay Government, “The disturbances were attended by no fatal casualties or extensive destruction of public or private property. There was no suspension of the normal course of administration or of civil control over law and order. Offences committed in the course of the disturbances were dealt with by the permanent magisterial courts. There was no serious dislocation for any considerable time of the normal life of the city.”

12. The minority accept the majority report in respect of all the disturbances in the Bombay Presidency, although they consider it almost certain that the unfortunate events at Ahmedabad and elsewhere would not have taken place but for the orders passed against Mr. Gandhi, and add that according to the official evidence his influence on arrival was fully thrown on the side of law and order. They acknowledge the discretion and judgment displayed by Mr. Chatfield, the Collector of Ahmedabad, in dealing with a sudden and grave outburst of mob fury, and compliment of local Government in the following terms: “The manner in which the Bombay Government, while firmly taking adequate steps for the maintenance of peace and order in the cities of Bombay and Ahmedabad and other places, avoided taking measures likely to cause public irritation and leave bitterness behind, displayed to our mind creditable statesmanship."

13. We accept the unanimous findings of the Committee regarding the disorders in the Bombay Presidency. We also endorse the opinions which have been expressed regarding the valuable services of the local officers and the admirable behaviour of the troops engaged in the suppression of the disturbances. In this despatch it is impossible to review in detail the various outrages recorded in the report. A perusal of that document is necessary to appreciate correctly the cruelty of the mob, which was immediately directed against Europeans and Government servants. We desire to place on record our deep sympathy with all those who suffered at the hands of the mob and in particular with the relations of the magistrate and two police officers who were done to death in so dastardly a manner. Steps have already been taken to make provision for the dependents of these persons and to ensure adequate recognition of the services of those officers and others who rendered valuable assistance in this serious outbreak.

14. In Chapter III the Committee turn to the Punjab and deal first with the disturbances in the Amritsar district. They begin by describing the unrest and ferment which prevailed in Amritsar city prior to the 10th of April, on which date the first outbreak of disorder occurred. On the 9th the Deputy Commissioner received the orders of the local Government for the deportation of Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal to Dharmshala. The action of the Deputy Commissioner in carrying out these orders quickly and quietly is approved and the precaution of concentrating seventy-five armed police at the kotwali (police station) is commended as wise. The subsequent breakdown of this arrangement is not held to be due to any want of foresight on the part of the local officers. The Committee comment, however, on the failure to warn the European residents in the city of the danger of their position, observing that this omission seems inconsistent with the precautions taken for the evacuation of the women and children. At the same time they recognize the impossibility of predicting such an outburst of murderous antipathy against Europeans as actually occurred.

When the news of the deportation of Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal became known, an excited and angry crowd attempted to make their way to the civil lines. The Committee find that the Deputy Commissioner was right in preventing the crowd from proceeding further in this direction, and that the firing which was ordered to secure this object was completely justified and in no way exceeded the requirements of the occasion. Similarly on the second occasion on which firing was ordered at the Hall Bridge they justify the action taken and agree that the necessity of the occasion was not exceeded.
15. The Committee then describe the violent excesses which were committed by the mob in the city. At the National Bank the manager and assistant manager were brutally beaten to death, their bodies were burnt under piles of furniture, and the building itself was sacked, set on fire, and completely gutted, while the bank godowns were looted of their contents. The Alliance Bank was next attacked and its manager was cruelly murdered, being flung from the balcony on the street where his body was burnt under a stack of furniture soaked in kerosene oil. The building itself was spared, presumably because it was Indian-owned. The Committee condemn the police at the kotwali for failing to take steps to prevent these outrages, holding that the officer in charge might have prevented them but failed either to grasp, or to attempt to cope with, their responsibility. The Chartered Bank, which was also attacked, escaped through police intervention. The Town Hall and post office were burnt and the telegraph office attacked but saved by the jemadar of the station guard who fired on the mob. The Committee hold the firing at the telegraph office to be justifiable. They proceed to describe the looting of the goods station, the murders of Guard Robinson and Sergeant Rowlands, the murderous attacks on Mr. Bennett and Miss Sherwood, the determined search for Mrs. Easdon, the burning of various buildings including the Indian Christian Church, and the persistent efforts to injure communications and isolate Amritsar. The mob violence is described as anti-Government and anti-European and the gravity of the situation is made abundantly clear. In the course of a single day property to the value of seventeen lakhs of rupees was destroyed.

16. Later that day reinforcements in the shape of troops arrived and in the evening the Commissioner of the Division gave verbal instructions to the commanding officer that as the situation was beyond civil control, he, as senior military officer, should take such steps as the military situation demanded. On the evening of the 11th the Commissioner left for Lahore and General Dyer arrived at Amritsar where he took over charge of the troops. The Deputy Commissioner made over formal charge to him at midnight of that day. Generally speaking the Committee find no serious ground for criticism in regard to the action taken before the 13th April. The general conclusion of the Committee is that between the 10th and the 12th the civil authorities had become powerless, and that the state of affairs on the 11th was inevitably leading to a state of de facto Martial Law, that the authorities were justified in the measures which they took to suppress disorder, including the cutting off of light and water supplies and that they acted wisely in not attempting to take sterner and more resolute action to regain control within the city on the 11th and 12th.

17. The minority say that they are in general agreement with the statement of facts set out in Chapter III of the majority report, except where they specifically differ. They agree that all the firing which took place on the 10th April was justified.
and they differ on one point only. While the majority say that the firing at the bridge was in no sense the cause of the mob excesses of the 10th, the minority hold that, although the excesses were altogether inexcusable and without justification, the mob had not any previous fixed intention of committing excesses, but after the firing lost their heads and were seized by a mad frenzy to commit nefarious deeds.

18. We desire at this point to review the situation and the measures taken at Amritsar up to and including the 12th April. We endorse the finding of the Committee that the situation was one of great difficulty and consider that the action taken by the authorities was generally justified. We think, however, it is to be regretted that the civil authorities considered it incumbent upon them, before the proclamation of Martial Law, to hand over control to the military in such terms as to suggest that they did not intend to exercise supervision or guidance over the action of the military commander. The result was to place the latter in a position of great difficulty and to impose upon him a grave responsibility which, in the opinion of the Government of India, should have continued to be shared by the civil authorities up to a later stage. It is not clear who was actually responsible for the complete abdication of civil authority, but the Government of India propose to make further enquiry into this matter and to pass such orders as may be necessary.

19. The Committee next deal with the events at Jallianwala Bagh on the 13th. They describe the place and give a full account of all the facts and circumstances of the firing, stating the number of rounds fired—1,650, and the extent of the casualties, the dead being estimated at 379 and the wounded at three times that number. They criticize General Dyer adversely on two grounds: (1) that he opened fire without warning; and (2) that he went on firing after the crowd had begun to disperse. On the first point, they say that the only person who can judge whether notice should properly be given on such an occasion is the military officer concerned. The Committee point out however that General Dyer does not suggest the existence of an emergency justifying his decision to fire on the crowd without warning. He stated before the Committee that his mind was made up as he came along that if his orders were disobeyed he was going to fire at once. They think it distinctly improbable that the crowd would have dispersed without being fired on, as most of those present had assembled in direct defiance of a proclamation. Nevertheless they say that notice would have afforded those who had assembled in ignorance of the proclamation and others an opportunity to leave the assembly. In continuing to fire as long as he did, even after the crowd had begun to disperse, General Dyer, in the opinion of the Committee, committed a grave error, though they consider that he honestly believed on the information then before him and his appreciation of the existing military situation that he was called upon to take this step in the discharge of his duty. They find further that it was his intention to create a moral effect throughout the Punjab and they condemn this as mistaken conception of his duty. As regards General Dyer’s failure to attend to the wounded, they say that he had a very small force with him and, as he explained, the hospitals were open and no application was made to him for help. In conclusion, they do not accept the view that General Dyer’s action saved the situation in the Punjab and averted a rebellion on a scale similar to the Mutiny.

20. In dealing with the events of Jallianwala Bagh, the minority find that the notice prohibiting the meeting was not adequately published and they criticize General Dyer Severely: (1) for suggesting that he would have made use of machine-guns if they could have been brought into action; (2) for opening fire without warning and continuing after the crowd had begun to disperse until his ammunition was spent; (3) for firing not merely to disperse the crowd but to punish it and to produce a moral effect in the Punjab; and (4) for assuming that the crowd before him consisted of the persons guilty of the outrages of the 10th. They maintain that it is immaterial whether General Dyer thought he was doing right or not and that the plea of military necessity will not avail him, as this plea is always used in justification of Prussian atrocities. They do not agree with the majority that it was probable that the crowd could not have been dispersed without firing, citing General Dyer himself in support of their opinion, and they describe his action as inhuman and un-British and as having caused great disservice to British rule in India. They attribute his conduct to a fixed idea that India must be ruled by force and they condemn his action in not taking steps for the removal of the dead and the care of the wounded. Finally, they criticize the failure of the Punjab Government to ascertain without delay the number of casualties. It should be here stated that the result of official enquiries which included a careful scrutiny of the information gathered by the Sewa Samiti (a Social Service Society) places the figures at 379 killed and 192 wounded. It is almost certain that the latter figure omits many who were only slightly wounded, but as an estimate of the more serious casualties the combined figure is probably nearer the truth than any estimate based only on a rule of proportion, such as that stated by General Dyer in his evidence before the Committee to be not beyond the bounds of possibility.

21. The difference in the measure of condemnation of General Dyer by the majority and the minority and the attention which has been directed to the events at Jallianwala Bagh both in England and in India, necessitate a careful examination by Government of the extent to which General Dyer should be held to be blameworthy. Looking to the specific findings on which the condemnation of his action is based, we consider that the orders prohibiting assemblies should have been promulgated more widely and in particular that notices might have been posted up at jallianwala Bagh, which has become a favourite assembly ground for political meetings. We think also that notice might have been given at the Baisakhi fair where many people from villages in the vicinity had collected. At the same time it is the case that the proclamation was made by beat of drum in the presence of General Dyer himself, and notices were published at nineteen places in the city; it cannot therefore be doubted that most of the residents of Amritsar present at the meeting were aware of the orders and collected in defiance of them.

The Government of India agree with the Committee that General Dyer should have given warning to the crowd before opening fire. It is true that he had only a small force with him and that in view of this circumstance and the previous successes of the forces of disorder it is most improbable that an excited and defiant mob would have dispersed on a mere warning, but those ignorant of the order, including the villagers who had come to visit the Baisakhi fair, and indeed others would have had an opportunity of leaving the assembly if reasonable notice had been given to them. The Government of India agree that there was not such an emergency existing as to render this precaution impossible.

General Dyer’s action in continuing to fire on the crowd after it had begun to disperse was, in the opinion of the Government of India, indefensible. He fired continuously for ten minutes during which time 1,650 rounds were expended. It is probable that General Dyer’s action so intimidated the lawless elements in the population of Amritsar and neighbouring districts of the Central Punjab as to prevent further manifestations of disorder. The Government of India cannot however accept this as justification of the continued firing which greatly exceeded the necessity of the occasion. The dispersal of the crowd was indeed a matter of vital importance in view of the situation which then existed in Amritsar and stern measures to effect this end were certainly required. In our opinion however much more restricted military force would have sufficed to produce this effect and General Dyer’s action has undoubtedly left behind bitterness of feeling which will take long to pass away. He was no doubt faced with a position of great difficulty: he was apprehensive of Amritsar being isolated and he had before him the danger of allowing mob rule to continue after the terrible events of the 10th. Giving all due weight to these considerations, the deliberate conclusion at which we have arrived is that General Dyer exceeded the reasonable requirements of the case and showed a misconception of his duty which resulted in a lamentable and unnecessary loss of life. Although we are constrained to this decision we are convinced that General Dyer acted honestly in the belief that he was doing what was right and we think that in the result his action at the time checked the spread of the disturbances to an extent which it is difficult now to estimate. This was the opinion of many intelligent observers in the Punjab. There remains the question of the failure to arrange for medical aid after the firing at Jallianwala Bagh. Here too we must express our great regret that no action was taken either by the civil or the military authorities to remove the dead or give aid to the wounded. The minority criticize Sir Michael O’Dwyer for expressing approval of the action taken at Jallianwala Bagh. On this point the Government of India have little to add to the account given by the late Lieutenant-Governor of the circumstances in which his approval was conveyed, but making every allowance for the difficult position in which Sir Michael O’Dwyer was placed, the Government of India think that he would have acted more wisely, if, before expressing any approval of General Dyer’s action on this occasion, he had taken steps to ascertain the facts and circumstances of the firing more fully.

We desire to add here that our Hon’ble colleague Mr. Shafi agrees generally with the minority in their findings of fact as regards Amritsar and the inferences deduced therefrom, where these differ from the findings and conclusions of the majority. He rejects the theory that General Dyer’s action at Jallianwala Bagh saved the situation in the Punjab and averted a rebellion on a scale similar to that of the Mutiny. In his opinion the disturbances on and after the 14th of April in the districts of Gujranwala, Gujrat and Lyallpur were the results of the commotion caused by the Jallianwala Bagh affair.

22. We cannot leave this tragic occurrence without adverting to the charge that a veil of secrecy was deliberately thrown around it, the public being left to infer that the sinister policy of concealment has only been foiled by the revelations made before the Committee of Enquiry in December last. The insinuation is devoid of foundation. When the outbreak of disorder occurred, the immediate necessity was to quell them and restore order. At a very early stage His Excellency the Viceroy decided that it was incumbent upon Government to hold an inquiry into the disturbances and the administration of Martial Law. In this opinion you concurred and in the third week of May in a speech in the House of Commons you made the following announcement:

As regards these troubles which I have been describing, as questions have been asked from time to time and resolutions have been moved demanding an enquiry, the Viceroy has always contemplated an enquiry. You cannot have disturbances of this magnitude without an enquiry into the causes and the measures taken to cope with these disturbances, but no announcement has been made of enquiry up to this moment for this reason: let us talk of an enquiry when we have put the fire out.

This announcement is entirely incompatible with the suggestion of a conspiracy on the part of either the Government of India or the Secretary of State to suppress or conceal the details of the occurrence.

As a result of further communications between us the present Committee was appointed. The question of the composition of the Committee received the most careful consideration, as Government were determined that it should be a body of commanding weight and high judicial experience in which perfect confidence could be reposed by the public, both at home and in India. An announcement of the impending appointment of the Committee was made in the Imperial Legislative Council during its autumn session of September last. Apart from a general enquiry of this character the question whether the investigation of particular incidents should be deferred till the Committee assembled or should form the subject of preliminary proceedings had been carefully considered. Finally, however, we decided with your concurrence that such preliminary enquiries were inadvisable.

In considering whether preliminary enquiries should be held, the case of Jallianwala Bagh had received prominent notice, and after the decision the collection of information continued. The first report of the firing on the crowd at Jallianwala Bagh received by the Government of India on the 14th April placed the casualties at 200. This was supplemented two days later by a report that 200 was the number of killed. These reports were at once repeated to the Secretary of State. Fuller reports were not received till a later date. In the second half of April, General Dyer was fully occupied in marching troops throughout the disturbed area. Very early in May, owing to the outbreak of the Afghan war, he was selected for the command of the Kohat Brigade. From that date till the end of July he was continuously engaged in field operations, and his detailed report on the administration of Martial Law in Amritsar, including the firing at Jallianwala Bagh was not received till the month of August. Meanwhile the local Government had been pursuing enquiries to obtain accurate statistics regarding the extent of the casualties. The information elicited up to the end of August, which was confirmed by a scrutiny of the results of private enquiries made by the Sewa Samiti, showed that the ascertained death roll was then 291 and this was the figure stated at the meeting of the Imperial Legislative Council held in Simla on the 11th September. During this same session of the Council full accounts were given of the happenings in the Punjab and the story of Jallianwala Bagh was discussed in great detail. The proceedings of the debate were fully reported and published in the usual manner and indeed attracted great attention in India. The official enquiries, however, continued, and when the Chief Secretary to the Punjab Government gave evidence before the Committee four months later he stated that the total number of death casualties as then ascertained was 379, while a more recent report of the local Government, based on a scrutiny of the Sewa Samiti’s information, places the number of wounded at 192.

From the time that it was decided to appoint the Committee, Government thought it proper to avoid as far as possible making any public comments on the transactions which it was the duty of the Committee to examine and to refrain from passing any judgment on the conduct of individual officers until they received the report of that body. There is no justification for the allegation that from the date of these occurrences until the publication of General Dyer’s evidence before the Committee, the Government of India had been guilty of following a policy of deliberate suppression of the truth. The facts stated above clearly refute this libel.
It is no doubt a matter for regret that without resort to a formal enquiry full knowledge of what actually occurred should not have become general earlier. But the chapter is closed, and as Government and the public both in India and the United Kingdom are now in complete possession of the facts, recriminations and regrets serve no useful purpose.

23. Chapter IV deals with the disorders in the Lahore district. In the capital itself the agitation against the Rowlatt Bills and the complete hartal of the 6th April had worked the people up to a state of intense excitement, which the news of Mr. Gandhi’s arrest and of the disturbances at Amritsar brought to a head on the afternoon of the 10th. Crowds assembled in the city and endeavoured to overpower the police when the latter opposed their advance towards the civil lines. The Committee have carefully considered the circumstances under which fire was opened on this mob under the orders of the District Magistrate, Mr. Fyson, and the Superintendent of Police, Mr. Broadway, on three occasions in the course of that afternoon and they fully approve the action taken by these two officers. The Government of India are unable to think that any other conclusion is possible. The outrages at Amritsar were known at the time to the mob when it was proceeding to the civil lines and it would have been suicidal to allow it to succeed in its endeavours. The position in Lahore, after these attempts of the crowd to enter the civil lines had been repelled, is thus described by the Committee:

On the night of 10th April and for some days following, the city of Lahore was in a dangerously disturbed condition. Military measures were taken on that night to protect the civil station and its surroundings. No European could safely enter the city, from which the police were temporarily withdrawn. For about two days the city was controlled by the mob.

The Committee then describe the events of the 11th, the inflammatory speeches delivered at the Badshahi Mosque to excited crowds of Hindus and Mohammedans, the organization of the Danda Fauj, a band of hooligans, who marched through the city armed with sticks (lathis) and destroyed pictures of Their Majesties, shouting that King George was dead. Attempts were made on the morning of the 11th to pull down the railings at the Fort, where some of the rioters spat at the British soldiers on guard and called them “white pigs”. On the same day the railway workshop was attacked and determined efforts were made to bring about a strike amongst the workers. On the 12th another meeting was held at the Badshahi Mosque, when an officer of the Criminal Investigation Department was severely beaten by the mob. On the same day a mixed column of police and military was marched through the city in an effort to regain control of the situation. The march was hindered by large crowds, assembled at the Hira Mandi, who refused to disperse when so directed.

1 Literally “Bludgeon Army”
by the District Magistrate and began to stone the small advance force of police which was with him. Mr. Fyson was obliged to open fire with the result that one man was killed and twenty wounded. The Committee consider that it was essential on this day to disperse the crowd and that it would have been the end of all chance of restoring order in Lahore if the police and troops had left without dispersing it. All the firing was done by the police. The fact that the police, armed with buckshot, were made to take the brunt of the collision with the crowd instead of the troops with service ammunition, the small number of shots fired by the police, and the warnings given to the crowd, showed, in the opinion of the Committee, that the greatest care was taken and the least possible degree of force was used.

Special attention is invited by the Committee to the use of inflammatory and seditious posters in Lahore, which in the name of Mahatma Gandhi called upon the brave people of the Punjab to enlist in the Danda Fauj and kill the English who were described as pigs, monkeys and kafirs. On the 13th April the district was proclaimed under the Seditious Meetings Act. On the same date the station of Wagah, about 14 miles off, was burnt and sacked, telegraph lines cut and an armoured train derailed, fortunately without loss of life. On the 14th the Punjab Government deported the local leaders, Rambhuj Dutt, Harkishan Lal and Duni Chand, who had been actively associated with the agitation and the still-continuing hartal; all these men were convicted later of offence of waging war. On the 15th April Martial Law was proclaimed in Lahore.

24. The second portion of Chapter IV describes the very serious disturbances which occurred on the 12th April at Kasur, a sub-divisional town, 37 miles south-east of Lahore. On the morning of that day a violent mob attacked the railway station, and after destroying and burning a considerable quantity of valuable property, turned their attention to three trains which were held up near the station. Murderous attacks were made on a number of Europeans, including a lady and three children, who were travelling by these trains; some of them had miraculous escapes, but three persons were severely injured and two unfortunate warrant officers were beaten to death. Elated by their success, the mob next burnt down the post office and a civil court, and attacked the sub-divisional offices where the police were obliged to fire in defence of Government property with the result that four men were killed and several wounded. The Committee uphold the decision to fire upon the mob and think indeed that it should have been fired on at an earlier stage. Troops arrived from Ferozepore on the afternoon of the 12th and averted further trouble. Outbursts of disorder occurred at two other places in Lahore district, at Khem Karan on the 12th, when the railway station was attacked with some resultant damage, and at Patti, where telegraph wires were cut on the night of the 11th and the post office and railway station were attacked on the 12th.
We accept all the findings of the majority, in which the minority concur, with regard to the disturbances in Lahore district and the measures taken to suppress them. We consider that praise is due to Messrs Fyson and Broadway for their handling of the difficult situation in Lahore city.

25. Chapter V deals with the very serious outbreak at Gujranwala which is a town of 30,000 inhabitants about 36 miles north of Lahore. There had been here as elsewhere the usual agitation against the Rowlatt Bill and a complete hartal was observed on the 6th April but no violence had occurred or was anticipated till the 13th, when the news of the happenings at Amritsar and Lahore on the 10th gave rise to local excitement. That evening the authorities learnt that further demonstrations were intended next day and the acting Deputy Commissioner took such police precautions as seemed to him necessary. The committee describe in detail the outrages which were committed in the town on the 14th including the attack on a train, the setting fire to the Gurukul bridge, the burning of many buildings, and numerous injuries to railway and telegraph communications. The mob had obtained complete mastery and the police were unable to stop the senseless destruction of property which occurred or to secure the safety of the European and loyal population. The post office, the revenue office, the church, and the district court were all burnt down. The jail and the police lines were attacked but were saved by the police firing. The mob then returned to the railway station, set the buildings and goods sheds on fire, and looted their contents. Those European families which had not been sent away as a precautionary measure on the previous evening were collected for safety in the Treasury, which was protected by a small police guard. Communications meanwhile had been interrupted on every side; by the end of the day practically all the wires along the railway in front of the city were cut for a distance of some miles. On account of this interruption of communications, it was impossible to send ordinary military aid to Gujranwala and it was in these circumstances that the use of aeroplanes for the relief of the town was sanctioned. The police were nearly exhausted when about three o’clock in the afternoon three aeroplanes from Lahore arrived over the town. It was not till nine o’clock that night that the first troops arrived.

The important findings of the majority regarding events at Gujranwala are : (1) that Mr. Heron’s action in firing on the mob is entirely approved; (2) that the conduct of the acting Deputy Commissioner in refusing to allow firing when the mob attacked the post office is open to criticism; (3) that the mob was seeking to imitate what had been done at Amritsar; (4) that the decision to use bomb-carrying aeroplanes was justified in the circumstances, though recourse to the use of aeroplanes in civil disorders cannot be defended save in cases of the utmost urgency; and (5) that generally speaking, the action of the aeroplane officer, Major Carberry, was justified but that his instructions were defective. On all these points the Government of India are in entire agreement with the Committee and desire to commend Mr. Heron who... behaved well in circumstances of great difficulty. The Committee find that the dropping of bombs on two outlying villages and on the Khalsa High School cannot be defended but the fault lay chiefly with the instructions given to Major Carberry and they impute no blame to him for a decision taken in the air and at the moment. They observe that the dropping of bombs on the riotous crowds within Gujranwala city was not only justified but, in their view, invaluable, and the fact that the disorders were ended long before troops arrived is in a large measure attributable to this act. They say that no sufficient explanation has been given to justify the use of an aeroplane on the 15th of April for purposes of offensive action, and they conclude by recommending that the instructions to be issued to Air Force officers regarding the procedure to be followed by them on such occasions should form the subject of careful enquiry by the Air Force Headquarters.

The minority discuss the employment of aeroplanes in Chapter IV which is entitled “Armoured Trains and Aeroplanes”. They agree with the majority in saying that the use of aeroplanes to quell civil disorders should as far as possible be deprecated. They condemn Major Carberry for dropping bombs on the Khalsa High School and two outlying villages, and say that though the orders he received were not worded with sufficient care, he did not exercise his discretion wisely in carrying them out. They find also that his action in firing with a machine-gun on the crowd was excessive.

26. So far as the general question of the use of aeroplanes at Gujranwala is concerned, the Government of India accept the finding of the majority which is aptly expressed as follows: “We are not prepared to lay down as a charter for rioters that when they succeed in preventing the ordinary resources of Government from being utilized to suppress them, they are to be exempt from having to reckon with such resources as remain.” We do not consider that it would be right to censure the officers who have been mentioned in connection with individual incidents, as their acts, where condemned, are more to be ascribed to want of clearness in their instructions than to errors of judgment. We think that the despatch of aeroplanes on the 15th under instructions which admitted of their being used for offensive action was not justified but we do not consider that the officer who carried out the instructions was seriously to blame. We note, however, with satisfaction that, so far as known, no casualties resulted from the action taken on this date. Finally, we propose to take steps to give effect to the recommendations of the majority that the instructions to be issued to Air Force officers on such occasions should be carefully prescribed.

27. There were outbreaks of disorder at fourteen other places in the Gujranwala district, but the Committee discuss those only which occurred at Wazirabad, a town of 20,000 inhabitants 20 miles north of Gujranwala, at Akalgarh, and Hafizabad, and in the Sheikhupura sub-division. At Wazirabad a riotous mob was repelled from the railway buildings, but did extensive damage to the telegraph system. It also set fire to railway bridges, sacked and burnt the bungalow of a Scotch missionary, and made an unsuccessful attempt to wreck the mail train. At Akalgarh and Hafizabad extensive damage was done to the telegraph wires, and at the latter place an officer of the Military Farms Department had a fortunate escape from the murderous intentions of a threatening crowd. In the Skeikhupura sub-division persistent and determined attacks on the telegraph and railway systems were made at Chuharkhana, Sheikhupura, Sangla and other places, at least three railway stations being destroyed, while savage assaults were made on certain railway employees and Government servants. An armoured train was sent to the rescue from Lahore, and fire was opened from this at Chuharkhana under the orders of Rai Sahib Lala Sri Ram Sud, Extra Assistant Commissioner of Sharakpur. The Committee find that this officer acted in a difficult situation with promptitude and decision. The minority take a different view and condemn him on the ground that his intention was punishment and that the firing was therefore not justified. The Government of India accept the opinions of the majority in all matters arising out of the disturbances at these places and agree with them that Lala Sri Ram Sud displayed promptitude and decision in the discharge of his duties.

28. Chapters VI and VII describe the events which occurred in the Gujrat and Lyallpur districts respectively. The chief features of the disturbances in these areas were attacks on railway communications and telegraph wires. At Gujrat on the 15th April fire had to be opened on a riotous mob which was dispersed without casualties. At Malakwal a train was derailed on the 17th April and two lives were lost. In Lyallpur a very disquieting and prominent feature was the continued exhibition of posters of an inflammatory and criminal character. Indians were called upon, in the blessed name of Mahatma Gandhi, to fight to the death against English cheats and to dishonour English women. Great tension existed for several days and the situation at Lyallpur was an anxiety to Government on account of the memories of the previous troubles of 1907. The position was so serious that the Europeans in the station were collected for safety in two houses in the civil lines, but no actual violence occurred except the cutting of telegraph wires at a few places in the district. The arrival of troops on the 17th April prevented any further disorder.

The Committee have not described in detail the acts of violence and disorder which occurred in many other towns and places in the Punjab, but these are set forth in the chronological statement annexed to the report and it is necessary to bear them in mind in considering the position as it appeared to the local Government when the proclamation of Martial Law was recommended.

29. Chapter VIII describes the persistent and widespread attacks on the railway and telegraph systems, which continued from the 10th April till about the end of the month. According to a report of the Telegraph Department, the wires were cut or tampered with on 55 occasions, but there were besides numerous attacks on railway telegraphs and the total number of outrages of this class cited by the Home Member at a Council meeting in September last according to a statement of the Punjab Government was 132. The Committee ascribe the attacks on communications partly to anti-Government feeling and partly to the desire to prevent the movement of troops. They also refer to the persistent attempts which were made to incite the railway staff to strike. The unrest prevailing amongst certain sections of the staff was a cause of great anxiety to Government at this critical time.

The importance of this chapter lies in the close bearing it has on the question of the justification for the introduction and continuance of Martial Law. The significance of the statistics of railway and telegraph interruptions is brought forcibly home by the maps attached to the report. These indicate the extended area over which this class of offence was committed, giving rise to a suspicion of preconcerted action.

30. In Chapter IX the Committee discuss the causes of the disturbances and say that an adequate explanation of the general and widespread outbreaks in the Punjab must be sought in the causes of a general state of unrest and discontent amongst the people, particularly the inhabitants of the larger towns. The increased interest in political agitation caused in recent years by the Home Rule movement received a great impetus from the new doctrine of self-determination. Meanwhile, however, the restrictions imposed under the Defence of India Act were becoming more essential, as the War drew to its climax. These restrictions affected the daily life of the ordinary citizen much more lightly in India than in Europe; nevertheless, particularly when imposed on political agitation, they were, however necessary, the more galling to the educated classes, in view of the fact that the political future of India was under consideration. The Punjab was meanwhile doing more than its share to respond to the call of the Empire for recruits for the army, and the strain was falling mainly on the country districts, which the local Government considered it necessary to protect from any anti-Government agitation likely to hamper the work of recruitment. After the conclusion of the Armistice in November 1918 hopes ran high amongst the educated classes that the services rendered by India in the War would receive immediate recognition. But these hopes were not at once fulfilled and disappointment was caused by a combination of circumstances, such as high prices, scarcity, food-stuff restrictions, and the anxieties of the peace settlement, especially as it affected Turkey.

The Committee next consider the agitation against the Rowlatt Bills. They find that this was largely, if not mainly, responsible for creating the feeling against Government which provoked such serious disorders and they cite various false rumours as to the provisions of the Bills which inflamed popular feeling. They next examine the history and progress of the satyagraha movement inaugurated by Mr. Gandhi on the 24th February. After a careful review of this movement in all its aspects, the Committee find that a familiarity and sympathy with disobedience to laws was engendered by it amongst large numbers of people and that the law-abiding instincts which stand between society and outbreaks of violence were undermined at a time when their full strength was required. From its first inception the satyagraha movement was condemned by prominent leaders of moderate opinion in India as likely to promote disorder and breach of the peace, and the organizer himself recognized later that in embarking on a mass movement he had underrated the forces of evil. The Committee expressly find that the recruiting campaign and the action taken in the Punjab to raise subscriptions to the war loans were not responsible for the unrest. They conclude by saying that there is no evidence that the outbreaks in the Punjab were the result of a pre-arranged conspiracy to overthrow the British Government in India by force, but that it was difficult and probably unsafe for Government not to assume that the outbreak was the result of a definite organization. Apart from the existence of any deeply laid scheme to overthrow the British, a movement which has started in rioting and become a rebellion might have rapidly developed into a revolution.

31. In the introductory chapter of their report the minority state that they are in substantial agreement with the findings of the majority as regards the causes of the disturbances, with this reservation that they do not concur in the opinion that the Punjab authorities were justified in assuming that the outbreak was the result of a definite organization. They are unable to agree that the riots were in the nature of a rebellion and they say that it is an unjustifiable exaggeration to suggest that the events might have developed into a revolution. They entirely agree with the majority in their estimate of the satyagraha movement and its offshoot, civil disobedience of laws. They develop their views on the real character of the disorders, including their causes, more fully in Chapter II of their report. Here they refer to the general conditions existing in the beginning of 1919, the strain placed on India by her War efforts, the hardship of high prices, the inconveniences and restraints imposed by War measures, the hope of alleviation excited by the Armistice, and the subsequent disappointment caused by famine, epidemic and a more stringent Income-tax Act, the belief that the proposals of the Government of India as regards the Reform scheme were illiberal and intended to whittle it down, and the delay of the Turkish settlement. They argue that many of the foregoing causes affected the Punjab more than other provinces and they instance other special factors such as war-weariness, food-stuffs and traffic restrictions, Sir Michael O’Dwyer’s speeches, press restrictions, the orders prohibiting the entry into the province of outside politicians, all tending to cause general irritation amongst the educated classes. While refraining from any discussion of the merits of the Rowlatt Act they hold that its introduction and enactment in the face of Indian opinion was a fertile source of discontent which was fostered by misrepresentations in the Punjab. They assert that Indian leaders were not responsible for these misrepresentations, and they condemn Government for failing to explain the Act to the masses until after the hartal of April the 6th, although misrepresentation were current before that date. They accept the estimate of the satyagraha movement formed by the majority, but they disclaim the view that the disorders in the Punjab can be attributed to any active presentation of the satyagraha doctrine by organizations working within the province. They find that there was no organization to bring about disturbances and they quote the evidence of various official witnesses in support of this conclusion. The anti-British and anti-Government outbursts which occurred were in their opinion purely the result of sudden mob frenzy. The minority conclude that although there was thus no evidence of organized conspiracy in the Punjab, the civil and military authorities persuaded themselves that open rebellion existed and took action accordingly.

32. The Government of India accept the finding of the Committee regarding the causes of the disturbances. The minority, as stated above, are in substantial agreement with the majority on this subject. Of the causes specially mentioned by the minority they agree that epidemics and a new Income-tax Act were factors in the unrest, and this latter cause may have accounted in part for the extent to which the movement enlisted the sympathy of the trading classes. The despatches containing the views of the Government of India on the Reform proposals were not published till long after the disturbances, and if, as is suggested by the minority, the supposed attitude of the Government was a cause of unrest this must have been due to deliberate misrepresentation. Moreover, so far as is known, no such allegations were made either in the Press or on the public platform before the disorders actually broke out. The minority assign as one of the causes of the unrest which preceded the outbreak in the Punjab the attitude of Sir Michael O’Dwyer towards the educated classes and the resentment which they allege was produced thereby. The efforts made by the larger landowners and men of leading [sic] in rural areas to promote recruiting during the War had brought these classes into prominence and had secured a generous recognition from the local Government. For this and other reasons a tendency had sprung up towards cleavage between the rural classes and the trading and professional classes from which the intelligentsia is mainly drawn. This may have created amongst the latter an impression that their political influence was being curtailed. The Government of India agree with the Committee that misrepresentations of the Rowlatt Act were an important cause of the outbreak. Such misrepresentations were freely circulated and their harmful effects were incalculable. Government were unaware of the dissemination of these malicious falsehoods until the beginning of April when they at once took action to contradict them. It is unfortunate that neither in the Press nor on the public platform did those who attacked the Act endeavour to remove the effects of these misrepresentations. Whether it is correct or not to say, as the minority do, that the disorders in the Punjab were not due to any active presentation of the satyagraha doctrine within the province, we must place on record our belief that many of those who joined the satyagraha movement did so with the intention of using it for the purpose of promoting disorder. Finally we desire to observe that the opinion of the minority regarding the nature of the disorders is discounted by their findings of fact, while the conclusion of the majority that a movement which started in rioting became a rebellion is supported by the conviction before various tribunals of a large number of persons for the offence of waging war against the King. These convictions, in the opinion of the Government of India, are of great importance in reaching a decision as to the true character of the disorders.

But whatever the truth may be as to the causes which produced these disorders and grave as the outbreak was in its nature and effects, it must not be forgotten that the loyalty of India as a whole remained unshaken and that even in the Punjab the bulk of the population maintained its reputation and did not fall a victim to the infection which so disastrously affected a portion of it.

33. There is one point in the discussion of causes to which the Government of India desire to advert at greater length. It has been represented that the action taken by Government against prominent politicians, such as Mr. Gandhi and Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal, was the cause and not merely the occasion of the disturbances. This is sufficiently disproved by the fact already pointed out that the satyagraha movement had led to grave disorders in Delhi long before any such action was taken. But the circumstances in which Mr. Gandhi was excluded from Delhi and the Punjab deserve fuller examination.

The situation about the end of March has already been described. The acute state of tension which continued in Delhi for some days after the outbreak of the 30th March greatly increased the potentialities of danger of the satyagraha movement in other parts of India, where the news of the Delhi rioting caused great excitement. The events of that date might indeed well have conveyed to the promoters of the movement a warning of the dangers which were attendant on their propaganda, but actually they were far from doing so. The agitation accompanied by increasing excitement continued unchecked all over the country.

It was at this critical juncture that we received information that Mr. Gandhi had vigorously renewed his campaign of civil disobedience to the laws, and on the 9th we heard that he had left Bombay for Delhi on the previous evening. Immediately on receiving this news, we consulted the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab and the Chief Commissioner of Delhi. Both these officers considered that the situation had become serious and that it would be most dangerous to allow Mr. Gandhi to enter their jurisdictions. His avowed intention was to break the law of the land and to secure adherents to the satyagraha movement. His arrest and prosecution in the Punjab would in all probability have been the signal for an outbreak, and the enlistment of any large number of supporters to his movement in that province would almost certainly have led to an immediate campaign of active resistance and outrage. The Chief Commissioner considered that an order merely prohibiting Mr. Gandhi from entering Delhi would be very dangerous, as the only method of enforcing it would be to arrest, detain and prosecute him in that city. On the other hand, if he were allowed to enter Delhi, it was most probable that he would break the law there and would have to be arrested and tried for an offence, with the result that there would almost certainly be a recurrence of the recent serious rioting. In these circumstances the Government of India authorized the local Governments of the Punjab and Delhi to issue orders under rule 3(b) of the Defence of India Rules, directing Mr. Gandhi to remain in the Bombay presidency. The Government of India then considered, and still consider, that this course was amply justified in view of the fact that Mr. Gandhi was the leading spirit of a movement intended to paralyse Government.

34. In the same way it has been suggested that the action of the Punjab Government in ordering the deportation of Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal on the 10th April was a provocative act leading directly to the subsequent outrages. Previous orders had been passed prohibiting them from speaking in public, and it is true that they had not taken an open part in the meetings immediately preceding the hartal of the 6th April. But as the evidence subsequently taken before the Martial Law commission showed, they held secret meetings after that date and continued to direct an agitation which was found to be of the nature of a criminal conspiracy. It was in these circumstances that the local Government decided to remove them from Amritsar to Dharmsala. That outrages followed as soon as the news of the deportation became known is of course the case. But it is always a question of the greatest difficulty to judge whether preventive steps such as those taken will, in a time of great popular excitement, quiet the general atmosphere or precipitate disorder. The probability seemed to be that they would achieve the former result.

35. Chapter X of the report contains a statement of the facts regarding the successive stages in the application of Martial Law. Chapter XI discusses the propriety of its introduction and continuance. The majority of the Committee, as already mentioned, definitely find that a state of rebellion against Government existed. They review the various occurrences, indicate the broad features of the disorders and their significance, point out the danger of criticizing isolated events and examine the whole position as it presented itself to the Punjab Government and the Government of India. Finally they conclude that the situation in the Punjab was one of extreme gravity and that the authorities were justified in declaring Martial Law in those areas where it was proclaimed.
The wisdom of continuing Martial Law is discussed at some length, and the prolongation of it on the railway is examined with special reference to the Afghan war. The conclusion of the majority is that those responsible for the continuance of Martial Law gave careful and considerate judgment to the question and did not prolong it beyond the time during which to the best of their judgment it was necessary for the maintenance and restoration of order in the province. Looking to the problem with which Government was faced, the Committee do not think they would be justified in adversely criticizing the decision. On the question of the enforcement and continuance or Martial Law the minority differ widely from the majority. They find that the introduction of Martial Law was not necessary, because in their opinion order had been restored everywhere and the authority of Government vindicated before Martial Law was applied. They think that order could have been restored by the civil power with the aid of the military, and that the Punjab Government persuaded themselves rather easily that Martial Law was necessary. The reasons for the continuance of Martial Law are also examined and rejected. Assuming that the introduction of Martial Law was necessary, they say that it ought not to have been continued beyond a few days. The Punjab Government, they think, approached the question from a wrong point of view and the Government of India were guided by the local Government.

36. In considering the necessity for the declaration of Martial Law it is difficult for the Government of India to take an entirely detached view. We were necessarily guided by the information forwarded by the local Government; we had already received reports of grave disorders occurring in various places; and we maintain the view that with this information before us, we could not have taken any other course than we actually adopted, when we received from Lahore on the afternoon of the 13th April the wireless message which ran as follows:

Railway stations between Kasur and Amritsar looted. British soldier killed and two British officers injured at Kasur. Bands of rebels reported on move—Kasur and Tarn Taran treasuries attacked. State of open rebellion exists in parts of districts of Lahore and Amritsar. Lieutenant-Governor with concurrence of General Officer Commanding, 16th Division, and Chief Justice of the High Court, requests Governor-General-in-Council to suspend functions of ordinary criminal courts in Amritsar and Lahore districts, to establish Martial Law therein, and to direct trials of offenders under Section 22, Regulation X of 1804. Section 4 will be borne in mind. Situation is critical. Movable column starts on march from Ferozepore to Amritsar through worst tract with guns tomorrow.

The action of the Government of India has now been justified by the findings of the majority of the Committee, who also exonerate the local Government from all blame. The minority accept the findings of fact as to the number of outrages.
committed, the animus of those engaged in the riots, the violence used and the number of times on which it was necessary to resort to firing; they also observe that the acts of some of those who took part in the disorders may have amounted in law to waging war against the King, although it was not rebellion in the sense in which that term is ordinarily used. These findings, in the opinion of the Government of India, detract largely from the force of their conclusion that the introduction of Martial Law was not necessary. In regard to the continuance of Martial Law the Government of India have nothing to add to the findings of the majority beyond stating that although Martial Law was maintained on the railways for a prolonged period owing to the outbreak of the Afghan war it was only employed there after it had been withdrawn from the districts, for the purpose of controlling traffic and protecting the lines.

There is, moreover, one factor in the situation as it presented itself in April 1919 which cannot in the opinion of the Government of India be neglected without prejudice to sound judgment. At that time the British Empire was at war with Germany. Even at the present moment we are not yet at peace with all our enemies; and certainly a year ago when the treaty of peace with Germany had not yet been signed, the existence of a state of war was not a mere technicality. Allusion has already been made to the additional preoccupation which intervened in the shape of war with Afghanistan, and the difficulties thus created were enhanced by the attitude of the frontier tribes. But at the back of and accentuating these more local difficulties was the paramount necessity of maintaining at the call of the Empire, whose needs were abated but not extinguished by the Armistice, the resources of the Indian Dominions of His Majesty. In the face of this necessity it was impossible to contemplate any policy which involved an appreciable risk of delay in the restoration of normal conditions or of the recrudescence of the disorders which appeared to have been suppressed.

We desire to add here that our Hon’ble colleague, Mr. Shafi, dissents from the finding of the majority of the Committee, accepted by us, that the declaration of Martial Law was necessary. In his opinion, there being no organized or preconceived conspiracy to subvert British rule behind these disturbances, the vast rural tract in the five districts concerned having remained tranquil and loyal, there having been disturbances only in a few places in the urban areas, and even in these few places the majority of the residents not having taken any part in the disturbances, there was no open rebellion as alleged, and no justification in consequence for the proclamation of Martial Law. Besides, before the date on which Martial Law in these districts was actually enforced, the disturbances had been quelled with the assistance rendered by the military and, in consequence, there was no justification for enforcement or maintenance of Martial Law on these days and after. This being the case, Mr. Shafi is of opinion that the continuance of Martial Law over such a long period was uncalled for.

37. Chapter XII deals with the administration of Martial Law, in-... working and procedure of the summary courts. The majority of the Committee find that the trials were correctly described as lengthy, detailed and careful, and commend the substitution for courts martial of tribunals similar to those under the Defence of India Act. They find, however, that although arrests were made in the ordinary way, there may have been cases in which individual police officers subjected those arrested to unnecessary severity. They observe that while the number of persons arrested and not brought to trial was regrettably large and the period of detention unusually long, on the whole this difficult work was not done badly or oppressively. The disorder was so widespread and serious that its inevitable result was to strain any improvised system. In regard to the sentences passed by the Martial Law courts, the Committee find that there was a general feeling that they were unnecessarily severe but that this was remedied by commutations effected by the local Government. They suggest that charges for serious offences need not have been pressed in the case of minor offenders. Extensive reductions in the sentences would not then have been necessary. The Committee also find that in certain cases, e.g., those of Drs. Kitchlew and Satyapal, it is a matter for regret that the accused were not tried by the ordinary courts. These views are accepted by the Government of India. The military order prohibiting the employment of counsel from outside the Punjab is criticized as unwise and the action of the Government of India in disapproving it is commended.

38. The Committee examine at considerable length the nature of the Martial Law orders which were promulgated by military commanders in the Punjab. The majority find that some of the orders passed were injudicious and served no useful purpose. They criticize severely the “crawling” order passed by General Dyer (which was disapproved by the Lieutenant-Governor as soon as it came to his notice), the “salaaming” order of General Campbell, and the “roll call” imposed by Colonel Johnson on the students of Lahore. The Government of India agree that in the instances which the Committee cite with disapproval the action of the officers mentioned was unjustifiable and in some cases inflicted unnecessary humiliation, resulting in ill-feeling which has been a serious embarrassment to the administration. The flogging of six persons, the suspected assailants of Miss Sherwood, for a breach of fort discipline on the spot where that lady was assaulted is severely criticized and the Government of India agree that the action taken in this case was highly improper. In dealing with sentences of public flogging the Committee say that under Martial Law administration no flogging should take place in public. They find further the number of flogging sentences was excessive, and though it was regarded as probably the most efficacious and convenient method of dealing summarily with minor breaches of Martial Law regulations, restrictions ought to be placed on the discretion of area officers in awarding sentences of this kind. They say, however, that there is no foundation for the allegation that whipping was inflicted in a cruel fashion and that several persons practically succumbed to it. These findings the Government of India entirely accept. The Committee then refer to the infliction by summary courts of certain punishments not warranted by the law. Though these punishments were unsuitable, they were not generally of a serious nature and were often awarded in place of more severe legal punishments. the Government of India, However, disapprove of such fantastic penalties and have taken steps to prevent their being imposed in future.

39. The minority are more severe in their condemnation of the Martial Law administration. In addition to the criticisms already dealt with, they contend that many of the orders were issued for purely punitive purposes. They cite in particular the orders directing representatives of each ward in Lahore to appear daily before the commanding officer to ascertain his orders for the day. The curfew order, the regulation of prices, and the commandeering of motor-cars, electric lights and fans from Indians are also criticized. We are not prepared to say that all these orders were without justification, but we consider that the administration of Martial Law in Lahore was in some respects unduly severe and exceeded its legitimate limits, that is to say, the requirements of the military situation and the maintenance of law and order. The minority condemn the order imposing on property-owners responsibility for the safety of Martial Law notices pasted on their houses. The Government of India are not prepared to say that in the circumstances this order was improper. The minority express their strong disapproval of the confinement of the professors and students of the Sanatan Dharma College because certain Martial Law notices had been destroyed. The Government of India agree that this order exceeded the necessity of the case. The minority further criticize and condemn the conduct of certain officers, notably Colonel O’Brien, Mr. Bosworth Smith and Mr. Jacob, for various orders passed by them in the administration of Martial Law. The Government of India agree that in the instances cited the officers mentioned acted injudiciously and in some cases improperly. While the findings of the minority report in regard to all these points are very cogent and in some cases fully justified, it must be remembered that officers charged with the administration of Martial Law cannot be expected to act in abnormal condition with that care and circumspection which are possible in normal times, nor can such a standard be rigorously applied for the subsequent examination of their actions in the calm atmosphere of safety after order has been restored.

40. The minority in a separate chapter discuss the working of the courts under Martial Law. The flogging of some members of a marriage party in Lahore by an extra assistant commissioner is rightly condemned. The Punjab Government at once took action against the officer responsible for this abuse of power. The procedure of the summary courts is attacked as unsatisfactory. The Government of India do not think that when Martial Law is enforced summary courts can be required to observe the formalities of procedure which normally obtain. The minority comment more severely than the majority on the large number of persons arrested and dis- charged without trial. In the opinion of the Government of India arrest and detention for short periods are justifiable during a period of Martial Law as preventive measures to preserve the peace; further, many of those arrested were not prosecuted subsequently because, though evidence was available, the necessary deterrent effect had already been secured by the conviction of a large number of persons for similar offences. Nevertheless, the Government of India consider that the arrest and detention for long periods of so many persons, and particularly of Dr. Kedar Nath, Mr. Gurdial Singh, Dr. Manohar Lal and six lawyers of Gurdaspur, were a serious error and while they do not overlook the difficulties of the situation, they are constrained to express their disapproval of the action taken in these cases.

In this connection we cannot pass over in silence the allegations of corruption and ill-treatment of prisoners and witnesses on the part of subordinate officers of the police and other services to which wide currency has been given. We recognize the difficulty of sifting charges made so long after the event, but we will direct the local Government to undertake enquiries and take appropriate action in cases where specific complaints are made and action has not already been taken.

41. We accept the view that the administration of Martial Law in the Punjab was marred in particular instances by a misuse of power, by irregularities, and by injudicious and irresponsible acts. We further agree with the Committee that while the principle of the ultimate supremacy of the military authorities must be kept in view, still, in practice, executive instructions should be given to all officers who may be called upon to administer Martial Law, which will guide them in the discharge of this duty. In our opinion it was the absence of such instructions which was responsible for many of the defects which have been noticed in the administration of Martial Law in the Punjab. It is to inexperience, ignorance of local conditions, and lack of guidance when confronted with an abnormal situation rather than to deliberate misuse of power that most of the mistakes committed must be ascribed. The Government of India consider that in any area in which in future it may be necessary to enforce Martial Law, senior civil officers should be appointed to act as advisers to the various military authorities. The military officer would not be bound in the last resort to follow the advice of his civil adviser but if he decided contrary to that advice, he would do so on his own responsibility. We regard the prevention of any future repetition of mistakes and irregularities as the most important lesson to be learnt from this portion of the report and we have accordingly decided to issue instructions which will secure this object, and will in particular discourage interference by the military authorities with the ordinary administration in excess of the necessities of the case.

42. Before leaving the subject of the working of the courts under Martial Law, the Government of India desire to refer to the action which was taken by the local Government, after order was restored and Martial Law withdrawn, to mitigate the effects of the sentences passed by these courts. Between the months of June and November sentences were reduced in 634 cases, 45 death sentences were commuted and 43 persons were released. In November two High Court Judges were appointed to review all unexpired sentences passed by summary courts and such other cases tried by Martial Law commissions as might be referred to them by Government. In December, as a result of the reviewing Judges’ recommendations, 92 persons convicted by summary courts were released, and further action of the same kind would have been taken, but on the 23rd of that month the Royal Proclamation with its message of amnesty was published, and under it clemency was extended to 657 prisoners who were released. By February, out of a total of 1,779 persons convicted in connection with the disturbances, only 96 worst offenders who had taken part in serious crimes of violence, remained in jail and this number has since been reduced to 88. The extension of clemency to political prisoners in the Punjab has been guided throughout by the generous and sympathetic recommendations of the Lieutenant-Governor, whose efforts to restore a peaceful atmosphere within the province are gratefully acknowledged by the Government of India.

43. It now remains for the Government of India to endeavour to arrive at a just appreciation of the conduct of the officers of the Crown, whether civil or military, who were employed in the areas affected by these disorders and to make certain general remarks which appear to be essential before finally disposing of the Committee’s report. The task of rightly estimating in a calm atmosphere, when order and peace have been restored, the behaviour of those faced with a grave emergency and compelled to arrive promptly at decisions of the greatest moment is one of unusual difficulty. The very qualities of courage and initiative, which are of incalculable value during the early stages of an outbreak, may in its later stages be source of injury, if not tempered by discretion. Moreover, any such estimate, if it is to be just, must not neglect the difficulty of deciding when to act and when to refrain from action, and must endeavour to view the whole position in a right perspective.

It was fortunate that, when the disturbances broke out in April 1919, the Punjab was in charge of a Lieutenant-Governor of great experience and courage. The Government of India consider that Sir Michael O’Dwyer acted with decision and vigour in a time of great danger and that he was largely responsible for quelling a dangerous rising which might have had widespread and disastrous effects on the rest of India.

Reviewing the situation as a whole, desire to express our great appreciation of the admirable conduct of the troops who were employed in the suppression of the outbreak. Leaving aside individual instances, which have already been noticed, both officers and men acted with admirable restraint under most trying circumstances and the Government of India have nothing but praise and gratitude for the services which they rendered in suppressing disorder and restoring the peace of the country.

The officers of the civil administration of all classes and ranks in the affected areas generally maintained that high standard of conduct and devotion to duty which the Government of India would have expected of them. Thanks are due not only to those who were immediately concerned in the restoration of order but also to those who by carrying on their ordinary duties with calmness and fortitude in a time of turmoil did much to restore the confidence of the people. The names of some of those officers who have been specially commended have already been referred to but if local Governments consider that there are other officers whose conduct merits special commendation, their names should be brought to notice at an early date.

To those non-officials who either did their best to stay the agitation which had so sinister a connection with the outbreak, or who by their influence and assistance helped the authorities to restore order, the grateful acknowledgements of the Government of India are due in full measure and local Governments will be asked to see that individual assistance of this kind does not go unacknowledged or unrewarded.

It is a great satisfaction to the Government of India to notice that there were many of all classes and creeds who, in the face of frenzied mobs, and even at the risk of their lives, afforded assistance or showed compassion to the innocent victims of the outrages. Here again it is desired that all such actions shall be marked with a very definite acknowledgement or, in cases where such a course is suitable, be recompensed with a pecuniary reward.

44. The names of officers whose actions have been rightly criticized or condemned have been mentioned in the body of this despatch and local Governments will be requested to take such action as may be necessary to mark in these cases the disapprobation of the Government of India.

The case of General Dyer calls for separate mention. We have given most anxious consideration to the action of this officer at Jallianwala Bagh. We are satisfied that it was bona fide and dictated by a stern though misconceived sense of duty. The facts are abundantly clear. General Dyer has made no attempt to minimize his responsibility for the tragedy or even to put a favourable complexion on his action or purpose. The only justification that could be pleaded for his conduct would be military necessity arising out of the situation before him and in the area under his jurisdiction. In circumstances such as General Dyer was confronted with, an officer must act honestly and vigorously but with as much humanity as the case will permit. We recognize that in the face of a great crisis an officer may be thrown temporarily off the balance of his judgment and that much allowance must be made on this account. We recognize further that, however injurious in its ultimate effect General Dyer’s action may have been, it resulted in an immediate discouragement of the forces of disorder. Nor have we overlooked our Resolution in which we promised full countenance and support to officers engaged in the onerous duty of suppressing disorder. Nevertheless, after carefully weighing all these factors, we can arrive at no other conclusion than that at Jallianwala Bagh General Dyer acted beyond the necessity of the case, beyond what any reasonable man could have thought to be necessary, and that he did not act with as much humanity as the case permitted. It is with pain that we arrive at this conclusion, for we are not forgetful of General Dyer’s distinguished record as a soldier or of his gallant relief of the garrison at Thal during the recent Afghan war. We must however direct that the judgment above pronounced be communicated to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief with the request that he will take appropriate action.

45. We have on several occasions expressed our very great regret for the loss of life, European and Indian, which occurred in the disturbances and our sympathy with those who are left to mourn the victims of these unhappy events. We desire once again to convey regret and sympathy to all who have thus suffered. Compensation, so far as this can be any reparation, has been awarded to those to whom compensation was due under the law, and adequate provision has been or will be made for the dependents of Government servants who have lost their lives in the disturbances. The Punjab Government will also be enjoined to consider the cases of persons who have been left in want through the death or permanent injury of their supporters at Jallianwala Bagh, and to supplement, if necessary, any assistance that may have been rendered to such persons by local charity organization.

46. We have now surveyed all the conclusions of the Committee. There remains, in our opinion, one lesson of supreme importance to be drawn from the events of April 1919. It will be impossible to dissociate memories of these disorders from the civil disobedience movement which was their chief immediate cause. When this movement was initiated, it was apparently not obvious to its promoters, as it was to all thoughtful persons, that in India in its present state of development (whatever may be the case in other countries) the unsettling effect of advice to the public in general to break selected laws was likely to lead to a situation which might involve the overthrow of all law and order. The bitter experience of last year removes this question from the category of doubt, and those who henceforth inaugurate such movements from whatever motives cannot feel uncertain as to the consequences of invoking forces which they can neither direct nor control. We can only hope that this lesson has been learnt once for all, and that in the future all right-thinking persons will set their faces firmly against the deliberate playing with fire which is involved in the promotion of such movements.

Finally, we desire to express here our earnest hope that the lesson to be learnt from these events is not of a merely negative character. Since the period which has formed the subject of this enquiry a new era has been inaugurated in India and the change has given occasion to a gracious proclamation by the King Emperor, which has appealed to the hearts of all his subjects in India. We venture to recall at this time the salient features in this gracious message; we feel confident that the earnest desire expressed by the King Emperor, that any trace of bitterness between his people and those responsible for his Government should be obliterated, will not pass unheeded.

47. In conclusion, we desire to express our thanks to Lord Hunter and the members of his Committee for the great ability and painstaking labour they have bestowed on an enquiry which from its very inception must have been a most difficult and seemingly thankless task, and for their report which has cleared up much that was in doubt and dispute and which has been of the utmost service to us in arriving at just conclusions on the many questions that called for decision.

We have, etc.,

APPENDIX V

MONTAGU’S REPLY TO GOVERNMENT OF INDIA DESPATCH

India Office, London,
May 26, 1920

No. 188 Public

Governor-General of India in Council

My Lord,

His Majesty’s Government have considered the report of Lord Hunter’s Committee upon the disturbances which occurred in the Punjab and other parts of India in the early part of last year. They have further been informed by me of the conclusions at which Your Excellency’s Government had arrived in your own review of the report as expressed in your letter dated the 3rd May, the text of which you have telegraphed to me. The report and your letter naturally cover ground which His Majesty’s Government did not feel called upon to survey in detail, but their consideration of the matter has led them to definite decisions upon certain of the more important questions arising out of the report, and they have desired me to communicate to you in my reply to your letter their considered statement of these decisions. The paragraphs numbered 2 to 8 of this despatch contain accordingly this statement.

2. General—The report of Lord Hunter’s Committee presents the results of a prolonged and patient investigation. Their labours would be of little value if their very complete and careful findings are not put to a practical use. The conclusions here recorded have been inspired in the main by the belief that the chief duty which lies upon His Majesty’s Government and the Government of India in utilizing the report is not primarily to apportion blame to individuals for what has been done amiss or to visit penalties upon them, but rather to prevent the recurrence in the future of occasion for blame or regret should unfortunate circumstances ever produce again a situation such as that which occurred in India in the spring of 1919.

3. The conduct of Brigadier-General Dyer at Amritsar on April the 13th—The main features of the occurrence at Jallianwala Bagh in Amritsar City on the afternoon of April the 13th, 1919, are well known. They are set out at length in Lord Hunter’s report and appear in minute detail in the evidence, both written and oral, given before the Committee by Brigadier-General Dyer himself, the full and authorized text of which is not available to the public. As to the facts, there is no doubt and no dispute, and it is only necessary here to recapitulate them very briefly in their baldest form.

On the morning of April the 13th Brigadier-General Dyer, who had arrived at Amritsar on the night of the 11th, issued a proclamation forbidding inter alia processions to parade in or outside the city and declaring that “any such procession or gathering of four men will be looked upon and treated as unlawful assembly and dispersed by force of arms if necessary.” This proclamation was read out at various places in the city, in the course of the progress through the streets of a column of troops led by Brigadier-General Dyer personally, who left his quarters about 9 a.m. for this purpose and returned to them about 1.30 p.m. About an hour before his return to his quarters in Ram Bagh Brigadier-General Dyer had heard that despite his proclamation it was intended to hold a large meeting at Jallianwala Bagh at 4-30 that afternoon, and at 4 p.m. he received a message that a crowd of about 1,000 had already assembled there. Shortly after 4 p.m. Brigadier-General Dyer marched from Ram Bagh with picketing parties (as he had previously determined to picket the main gates of the city) and with a special party consisting of 50 Indian Infantry armed with rifles, 40 Indian Infantry armed with only “kukris” (type of sword), and two armoured cars. He proceeded straight to Jallianwala Bagh dropping his picket parties en route and on arrival marched his infantry through a narrow lane into the Bagh and deployed them immediately right and left of the entrance. The armoured cars he left outside, as the lane was too narrow to admit them. Having deployed his troops Brigadier-General Dyer at once gave orders to open fire and continued a controlled fire on the dense crowd facing him in the enclosure (which he estimated at about 5,000 persons) for some 10 minutes until his ammunition supply was at the point of exhaustion. 1,650 rounds of .303 mark VI ammunition were fired. The fatal casualties as the result of this action are believed to be 379; the number wounded has not been exactly ascertained, but is estimated by Lord Hunter’s Committee at possibly three times the number of deaths. Immediately after giving orders to cease fire, Brigadier-General Dyer marched his troops back to Ram Bagh. The reasons given by General Dyer for the severity and duration of his fire are stated as follows in his written statement furnished to the General Staff (16th Indian Division) and subsequently laid before Lord Hunter’s Committee: “We cannot be very brave unless we be possessed of a greater fear. I had considered the matter from every point of view. My duty and my military instincts told me to fire. My conscience was also clear on that point. What faced me was what on the morrow would be the ‘Danda Fauj’ (—this, which may be translated as bludgeon army, was the name given to themselves by the rioters in Lahore). I fired and continued to fire until the crowd dispersed, and I consider this is the least amount of firing which would produce the necessary moral and widespread effect it was my duty to produce if I was to justify my action. If more troops had been at hand, the casualties would have been greater in proportion. It was no longer a question of merely dispersing the crowd, but one of producing a sufficient moral effect, from a military point of view, not only on those who were present, but more especially throughout the Punjab. There could be no question of undue severity.”

The principle which has consistently governed the policy of His Majesty’s Government in directing the methods to be employed, when military action in support of the civil authority is required, may be broadly stated as using the minimum force necessary. His Majesty’s Government are determined that this principle shall remain the primary factor of policy whenever circumstances unfortunately necessitate the suppression of civil disorder by military force within the British Empire.

It must be regretfully but without possibility of doubt be concluded that Brigadier-General Dyer’s action at Jallianwala Bagh was in complete violation of this principle. The task which confronted him was to disperse by force if necessary a large but apparently unarmed assembly which had gathered in defiance of his orders. It is possible that considering the strength of the military force at his disposal, the size of the crowd, and the general temper and attitude of the inhabitants of the city, he would have found it impossible to achieve this task effectively and completely without some firing and without causing some loss of life. But it is certain that he made no attempt to ascertain the minimum amount of force which he was compelled to employ, that the force which he actually employed was greatly in excess of that required to achieve the dispersal of the crowd, and that it resulted in lamentable and unnecessary loss of life and suffering. But this is not a full statement of Brigadier-General Dyer’s error. There can be no doubt that large numbers of people in the assembly, many of whom were visitors to the city from surrounding villages, were ignorant of the existence of his proclamation and the danger which they ran by attending the gathering. The proclamation was published in only a portion of the city, that portion being some distance from the scene of the meeting, and no warning of any kind was given before fire was opened. It would be unfair, considering the state of the city, the heat of the weather and the strain to which the troops under General Dyer’s command had been subjected since their arrival in the city, to lay too great stress upon the first point, but the omission to give warning before fire was opened is inexcusable. Further, that Brigadier-General Dyer should have taken no steps to see that some attempt was made to give medical assistance to the dying and the wounded was an omission from his obvious duty. But the gravest feature of the case against Brigadier-General Dyer is his avowed conception of his duty in the circumstances which confronted him.

His Majesty’s Government repudiate emphatically the doctrine upon which Brigadier-General Dyer based his action—action which, to judge from his own statement, might have taken an even more drastic form had he had a larger force at his disposal and had a physical accident not prevented him from using his armoured cars. They have not overlooked the extreme gravity of the situation as it presented itself to the authorities in India generally and to Brigadier-General Dyer in particular on April the 13th, nor have they failed to appreciate the immensity of the responsibility which Brigadier-General Dyer felt and rightly felt to be imposed upon him by that situation. They think it is possible that the danger to the lives of Europeans and to the safety of the British and Indian troops was greater than appears from the Committee’s report. In Amritsar itself violent murder and arson of the most savage description had occurred three days previously and the city was still practically in possession of the mob. From the surrounding country-side reports were hourly being received of similar violent outbreaks and attacks upon communications, and the deficiencies in these reports (due to the success of the attacks on communications) were supplemented by rumours which there was little means of verifying and as little ground for disbelieving. In discharging this responsibility with the small force at his disposal Brigadier-General Dyer naturally could not dismiss from his mind the conditions in the Punjab generally and he was entitled to lay his plans with reference to those conditions. But he was not entitled to select for condign punishment an unarmed crowd which, when he inflicted that punishment, had committed no act of violence, had made no attempt to oppose him by force, and many members of which must have been unaware that they were disobeying his commands.

In passing judgment upon Brigadier-General Dyer for his action on April the 13th, it is impossible to disregard an order which he passed some six days later, and which has become generally known as the “crawling order”. It is unnecessary here to repeat the nature of this order or the circumstances out of which it arose. Had the order been carried out as a punishment upon the persons actually guilty of the crime, which it was designed to stigmatize, it would have been difficult to defend; inflicted as it was upon persons who had no connection with that crime, with the object of impressing upon the public of Amritsar through the humiliation of those persons the enormity of the crime committed by certain individuals of the public, that order offended against every canon of civilized government.

Upon a military commander administering Martial Law in a hostile country there lies a grave responsibility; when he is compelled to exercise this responsibility over a population which owes allegiance and looks for protection to the Government which he himself is serving this burden is immeasurably enhanced. It would prejudice the public safety, with the preservation of which he is charged, to fetter his free judgment or action either by the prescription of rigid rules before the event or by over-censorious criticism when the crisis is past. A situation which is essentially military must be dealt with in the light of military considerations, which postulate breadth of view and due appreciation of all the possible contingencies. There are certain standards of conduct which no civilized government can with impunity neglect, and which His Majesty’s Government are determined to uphold. Subject to the due observance of those standards, an officer administering Martial Law must, and will, remain free to carry out the task imposed upon him in the manner which his judgment dictates to him as best and most effective, and may rely upon the unqualified support of his superiors when his task has been accomplished.

That Brigadier-General Dyer displayed honesty of purpose and unflinching adherence to his conception of his duty cannot for a moment be questioned. But his conception of his duty in the circumstances in which he was placed was so fundamentally at variance with that which His Majesty’s Government have a right to expect from and a duty to enforce upon officers who hold His Majesty’s commission, that it is impossible to regard him as fitted to remain entrusted with the responsibilities which his rank and position impose upon him. You have reported to me that the Commander-in-Chief has directed Brigadier-General Dyer to resign his appointment as Brigade Commander and has informed him that he would receive no further employment in India, and that you have concurred. I approve this decision and the circumstances of the case have been referred to the Army Council.

4. The justification for the declaration and continuance of Martial Law—There are no grounds for questioning the decision of the majority of Lord Hunter’s Committee that the declaration of Martial Law and the partial supersession of the ordinary tribunals in the districts of the Punjab in which Martial Law was applied were justified (Chapter XI, paragraph 17). As regards the dates to which it was prolonged, it is obvious that the institution of Martial Law involves the responsibility of deciding when it is to be revoked. The general principle is clear that Martial Law should remain in force no longer than the public safety demands, but beyond this there are no hard and fast criteria which can govern this decision, and a retrospective judgment in the light of after-events is not permissible. The fact that open disorder had ceased some time before Martial Law was revoked may have been due to the existence of Martial Law and its earlier abrogation might have been followed by a recrudescence. Looking back in the light of events, it is permissible to argue that an earlier abrogation was possible, though His Majesty’s Government can feel little doubt that this argument would have been less pressed than it has been, had there been no grounds for complaint of the manner in which in some cases Martial Law was administered. But it is not permissible to condemn the authorities responsible for the decisions taken, who had to rely only on their anticipation of the future.

5. The justification for Ordinance IV of 1919 giving the Martial Law Commissions jurisdiction to try any offence committed on or after March the 30th—

The legality of this ordinance is not a point at issue; that question has been recently determined by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Nor is there any valid reason to question the propriety, when (as was the case here) it can legally be done, of ante-dating the effect of an enactment setting up special Martial Law tribunals and procedure, so as to bring within their jurisdiction persons charged with overt acts of violence, which were the immediate cause of and justification for the declaration of Martial Law. The original ordinance setting up Martial Law Commissions in the Lahore and Amritsar districts gave the Commissions jurisdiction to try offences committed on or after April the 13th. Had this date remained unamended, it would have been impossible to try by Commission persons charged with actual participation in the murders, incendiarism and destruction of property which occurred on April the 10th at Amritsar, or persons charged with participation in the riots at Lahore on April the 10th, 11th and 12th, and in the murders at Kasur on the 12th; and if the Government of India with the legal power at their disposal, had neglected to correct the anomaly to this extent, they would have omitted an obvious and necessary step towards the rapid restoration of normal conditions. But the use of the power which the ordinance gave in order to apply the special Martial Law method of trial to persons whose offence consisted in newspaper articles and speeches which were not demonstrably and immediately the cause of the outbreak of open disorder, stands on an entirely different footing and the terms “unfortunate” and “imprudent” which the majority of Lord Hunter’s Committee applied to this policy are at all events not exaggerated criticism.

Taking into consideration the acts committed under Ordinance IV of 1919, which it is impossible not to disavow, His Majesty’s Government can feel little doubt that the terms of the ordinance itself were too wide, and that the drafting of any future ordinance of a similar kind should ensure due limits to its application.

6. Administration of Martial Law—There is one question with regard to which it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the majority of Lord Hunter’s Committee have failed to express themselves in terms which, unfortunately, the facts not only justify but necessitate. In paragraphs 16 to 25 of Chapter XII of their report the majority have dealt with the “intensive” form generally which Martial Law assumed, and with certain specified instances of undue severity and of improper punishments or orders. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the instances which the Committee have enumerated in detail in both their reports, nor would any useful purpose be served by attempting to assess, with a view to penalties, the culpability of individual officers who were responsible for these orders, but whose conduct in other respects may have been free from blame or actually commendable. But His Majesty’s Government must express strong disapproval of these orders and punishments, and ask me to leave to you the duty of seeing that this disapproval shall be unmistakably marked by censure or other action which seems to you necessary upon those who were responsible for them. The instances cited by the Committee gave justifiable ground for the assertion that the administration of Martial Law in the Punjab was marred by a spirit which promoted—not generally, but unfortunately not uncommonly—the enforcement of punishments and orders calculated if not intended, to humiliate Indians as a race, to cause unwarranted inconvenience amounting on occasions to injustice, and to flout the standards of propriety and humanity, which the inhabitants not only of India in particular but of the civilized world in general have a right to demand of those set in authority over them. It is a matter for regret that, notwithstanding the conduct of the majority, there should have been some officers in the Punjab who appear to have overlooked the fact that they were administering Martial Law, not in order to subdue the population of a hostile country temporarily occupied as an act of war, but in order to deal promptly with those who had disturbed the peace of a population owing allegiance to the King Emperor, and in the main profoundly loyal to that allegiance. It is difficult to believe that this would have occurred had the civil authority been able to retain a larger measure of contact with the administration of Martial Law, and it is of paramount importance, if in the future it should unfortunately be necessary to have recourse to Martial Law, that some system should be devised which will secure such contact effectively.

A review of the methods and results of the trials by the summary procedure of Martial Law tribunals would be uncalled for. It is not, however, improper to observe that marked attention has been directed to its disadvantages, and to the extreme divergence between the sentences required by the charges as presented to those courts and by the dictates of justice as they presented themselves to the reviewing authorities. It is to be hoped that, as a result of the experience thus gained, means will be devised whereby Martial Law tribunals can be improved if they have again to
7. The use of bombing aeroplanes at Gujranwala—With regard to the use of bombing aeroplanes at Gujranwala on April the 14th, the majority of Lord Hunter’s Committee expressed their views as follows: “As to the use of bombs from aeroplanes we do not think that this would be defended by anyone save in cases of urgent need, in the absence of other means, and under the strictest limitations even then. In our opinion the first two of these conditions were present in full force” . . . . “We are not prepared to lay down as a charter for rioters that when they succeed in preventing the ordinary recourses of Government from being utilized to suppress them, they are to be exempt from having to reckon with such recourses as remain.” They then proceed to state that no blame can be imputed to the flying officers concerned for carrying out the instructions given to them, but that the action taken under the instructions given illustrates their defectiveness and they conclude by a recommendation that the formulation of instructions to be given to flying officers in future in similar circumstances should form the subject of careful investigation.

In formulating these conclusions, His Majesty’s Government desire to state clearly that reconnaissance, communications, propaganda-dropping and moral effect summarize the normal and correct use of aircraft under conditions of unrest in normally peaceful countries. But emergencies may occur when, owing to distances, or damage to communications, or both, and the progress of murderous mob violence and arson which there is no other means of checking, exceptions from this general position are not only justified but necessary. It is impossible to guarantee by general or special instructions that machine-guns or bombs will affect only the crowd which would be justifiably fired upon if troops were available on the ground. But in future explicit orders must be required for the employment of armed aircraft in such emergencies; these orders should be issued in writing by a civil authority, and should authorize only a limited amount of bombing and machine-gun fire to be employed to overawe mobs which are, so far as the airman can judge, actually engaged in crimes of violence. The Government will see to it that instructions on these lines are issued as soon as possible. They regretfully agree with Lord Hunter’s Committee that the instructions issued to the airmen who visited Gujranwala on this occasion left much to be desired in precision.

8. Sir Michael O’Dwyer—It follows from what has been said in earlier paragraphs that on certain points arising out of this enquiry His Majesty’s Government do not regard Sir Michael O’Dwyer as immune from criticism. Thus they cannot endorse the unqualified approval which he accorded on insufficient information to the action of Brigadier-General Dyer at Jallianwala Bagh and they think it unfortunate that he did not adhere at the time to his first impulse to withhold both praise and blame on a matter with which as a civil officer he was not in the circumstances directly concerned. The motives which evidently prompted him to adopt another attitude and to maintain that attitude subsequently and in the light of fuller knowledge are less open to criticism.

Secondly, the opinion already expressed on the application of Martial Law procedure to certain trials must be taken as applying to Sir Michael O'Dwyer in so far as he was personally responsible for the action in question. As regards the administration of Martial Law generally sir Michael O'Dwyer had evidently contemplated arrangements by which civil officers would be accorded a recognized position to advise on military administration, and the Martial Law manual which your Government have under consideration should ensure that in future this plan is brought into operation.

With the general question of Sir Michael O'Dwyer’s administration of the Punjab His Majesty’s Government are not now immediately concerned. They recognized that it has formed the subject of much controversy in India and that a widespread impression has been engineered that the Punjab Government under his direction was hostile to the educated classes and was determined to suppress not only illegitimate but also legitimate and constitutional political agitation. While they sincerely trust that this atmosphere may be dispelled, they are fully conscious of the difficulties of the solution with which he was faced. Conspiracy, the activity of enemy agents, the rise in the cost of living and the necessity of furnishing the bulk of the vast number of recruits for the Indian Army which the needs of the Empire required, though fortunately powerless to disturb the loyalty of the province as a whole, caused constant anxiety throughout his term of office. That term is now closed, a long and honoured connection with India is ended, and His Majesty’s Government desire here to pay a tribute to the great energy, decision and courage which Sir Michael O'Dwyer brought to his task through a period of exceptional difficulty and to express their appreciation of his services.

9. As to the conclusions which Your Excellency’s Government have recorded on other matters arising out of this report, I am glad to find that I am in general accord with your views, save in so far as otherwise appears from the foregoing paragraphs and I have little further to add at the present moment. Your Excellency’s Government will, however, understand that the publication of documents in which the public, both in India and in this country, is vitally interested is not necessarily a final settlement of all the large questions involved. In particular I shall expect you to submit for my early approval the draft of the Martial Law manual which you have under consideration. To this matter I attach the utmost importance. I need hardly say that I most earnestly trust that occasion may never arise for the enforcement of such rules. But this enquiry will have served a valuable purpose if it results in the enactment of a code of regulations calculated to ensure, so far as human foresight can serve, a system of administration which is at once adequate to repress disorder, to secure the speedy, just and fitting punishment of its promoters, and which yet subverts no more than the fulfilment of these requirements necessitates the ordinary rights and course of life of the people at large, and adheres to the processes of civil justice and government. For in view of conditions which threaten the existence of the State, Martial Law is a necessary remedy, but it is a remedy which unless applied with wisdom and good judgment loses its value. It is therefore incumbent upon us to do all in our power to prevent the depreciation of its value by misuse. The same observations apply in my judgment to deportation, an expedient which in its present form it is so notoriously difficult to employ and the effects of which are so incapable of exact estimation.

10. His Majesty’s Government found it necessary to criticize in strong terms the conduct of certain officers charged with the administration of Martial Law and Your Excellency’s Government have indicated that all proved cases of abuse of their powers on the part of the subordinate officers of the police and other services will receive due notice. But these exceptions apart His Majesty’s Government desire me to express to you in no uncertain terms their warm endorsement of your appreciation of the conduct of officers and men, both civil and military, both British and Indian, upon whom fell the heavy task of assisting the people of India to recover their fair name for loyalty and orderliness. The burden thus imposed upon officers and men of His Majesty’s British and Indian armies, of his police force and of his civil services who had already borne with fortitude but not without fatigue the trials and strain arising from a long-drawn war, was a heavy one. In setting themselves to their task these men proved true to the great traditions of their services.

His Majesty’s Government wish further to express the profound regret which they, equally with Your Excellency’s Government, feel for the loss of life which these disturbances occasioned, and their deep sympathy with those to whom the events have brought personal bereavement.

11. In conclusion I am glad to have this opportunity of assuring Your Excellency of the sense of obligation which His Majesty’s Government feel to you personally for the manner in which you have fulfilled your high trust. Great as is always the burden borne by the Governor-General of India, world-wide circumstances have combined to lay upon you a degree of anxiety such as has only at long intervals fallen upon any of your illustrious predecessors. His Majesty’s Government desire that you should be fortified by the knowledge that they continue to repose the fullest confidence in Your Excellency’s discretion, inspired as they feel certain it has constantly been by the single aim of the good of the people whose Government is committed to your charge.

I have, etc.

APPENDIX VI

MUSLIM LEADERS’ REPRESENTATION TO VICEROY

BOMBAY,

June 22, 1920

YOUR EXCELLENCY,

We the undersigned claim to represent the largest body of Sunni Muslim opinion. We have most carefully read the Turkish peace terms and we consider them to be in direct violation of the religious sentiments of Mussulmans. They violate obligations imposed upon the Sunnis and wound the susceptibilities of all Mussulmans. They are contrary to pledges of British Ministers on the strength of which it has been admitted it was possible to draw upon India for Muslim recruits during the War. We hold that the British Empire, which is the greatest Mohammedan Power in the world, cannot treat the Turkish Empire which represents the Khilafat in the same manner that it may treat a defeated enemy. Indeed we contend that in certain respects Turkey has been treated worse than other Powers. We respectfully submit that in the treatment of Turkey the British Government are bound to respect Indian Muslim sentiment in so far as it is neither unjust nor unreasonable. In our opinion the position taken up by the Indian Mussulmans in simple. They cannot bear the thought of the temporal power of the Sultan being adversely affected by way of punishment for his having joined Germany under circumstances which need not be examined here, but we have no desire to ask for anything that would interfere with the principle of self-determination. We have no desire to uphold any misrule such as has been attributed to Turkey. Our delegates in Europe have asked for an independent commission of enquiry to investigate the charge of wanton cruelty said to have been practised by Turkish soldiers in Armenia. We cannot look with indifference upon the partition of Turkey and her empire for the sake of punishment for humiliating her. We would, therefore, request Your Excellency and Your Government to ask His Majesty’s Ministers to secure a revision of the peace terms and to tell them that on their failure to do so Your Excellency will make common cause with the people of India. We make this suggestion as Your Excellency has repeatedly declared that Your Government has consistently and often pressed upon the attention of His Majesty’s Ministers the case of Indian Mussulmans in this matter of vital concern to the vast majority of them. We feel, therefore, that we have a right to ask Your Excellency to reassure the Mussulmans of India that they still retain your active co-operation and powerful advocacy in the prosecution of their claims, ever to the point of resignation of your high office should His Majesty’s Ministers fail to secure a revision of the terms consistently with the pledges and sentiment mentioned above. We venture respectfully to suggest that had India been a Dominion enjoying full self-government her responsible Ministers would have as a matter of course resigned as a protest against such a serious breach of pledges and flouting of religious opinion as are involved in the peace terms. If unfortunately Your Excellency will not adopt our humble suggestion we shall be obliged as from the 1st of August next to withdraw co-operation from the Government and ask our co-religionists and Hindu brethren to do likewise. We ask Your Excellency not to regard our statement as a threat or in any way as a mark of disrespect. We claim to be as loyal subjects of the Crown as any in India, but we consider our loyalty to an earthly sovereign to be subservient to our loyalty to Islam. The latter enjoins upon every Mussulman to consider those who want only to injure the status of the Khilafat to be enemies of Islam and to resist them. We recognize that even if we had the power we must not resort to arms so long as any other measures are at our disposal. We feel that the least a Mussulman can do in these circumstances is not to assist those who are guilty of trying to reduce the Khilafat practically to nothingness. It would, therefore, become our painful duty to refuse to co-operate with the Government which accepts the peace terms and advises acceptance thereof by us. We shall hope that such a serious step as non-co-operation will not become necessary, but should it unfortunately happen to be otherwise we assure Your Excellency that we shall strive our utmost to avoid violence. We fully recognize our responsibility. We know that any eruption of violence must check and injure the peaceful demonstration contemplated by us, and, what is more, the sacred cause which is dear to us as life. We shall, therefore, take up non-co-operation in progressive stages so as to cause the least necessary dislocation or embarrassment to the Government and so as to enable us to control and discipline popular feeling.

1 Sent in pursuance of the decision regarding non-co-operation taken at the meeting of the Central Khilafat Committee held at Allahabad on June 3, 1920, this letter was signed by ninety Sunni Muslims from all over India, including Yaqub Hassan, Mazhar-ul-Haq, Maulana Abdul Bari, Hasrat Mohani, Shaukat Ali, Dr. Kitchlew and Mia Mohammed Chhotani.

1. “PATH OF TRUTH FOR THE BRAVE ALONE”

July, 1920

“The path of truth is for the brave alone, never for a coward.” I realize the significance of this poem more and more as days pass. I also see that it is not for grown-ups only to put the idea of this verse into practice; children and students, too, can do so. If we try to know and follow the path of truth right from childhood, then alone, on growing up, shall we be saved from following the path of untruth. Just as a disease, if neglected, becomes chronic and incurable, so also untruth, if permitted to take root in us from childhood, will later grow into a serious disease and, becoming incurable, gradually ruin our health. It is for this reason that we find untruth increasing in us.

So the highest lesson to be learnt during one’s student-life is that one should know truth and act on it.

This path has always been for the brave because a much greater effort is required to go up the steep slope of truth than to climb the Himalayas. If at all, therefore, we want to work in this direction and serve ourselves, we should give the first place to truth and march forward with unshakable faith in it. Truth is God.

2. LETTER TO THE PRESS ON REPATRIATION OF SOUTH AFRICAN INDIANS

July 1, 1920

I have just read the interim report of the South African Commission published in Indian Opinion recently received. As it reads, the report seems to be harmless. Even the word “Repatriation” does not occur in it. It is a cautiously-worded document. And as there seems to be no opposition to the recommendation from the resident Indian population, I am not inclined to oppose the proposal of the Commission. At the same time there is no mistaking its intention. Indeed they have not even attempted to conceal it, for, they ask His Excellency the Governor of South Africa “to appoint an official well acquainted with the Indian mind and their methods to act in a sympathetic manner and lay before the Indians the advantages of immediately returning to India”. The case for the scheme is that the Indians are anxious to return and that the scheme satisfies that anxiety whereas the anxiety seems to be all on the part of the Commission and their return is to be stimulated by placing its advantages before our sorely tried countrymen. The working of the scheme will, however, require ceaseless watching. There should be no compulsion of any kind whatsoever and no forfeiture of rights of domicile. I was pleased to notice absence of any reference to such forfeiture in the interim report. One however never knows what undertaking may not be taken from the poor returning Indians against the grant of a free passage. If the scheme is benevolently intended to relieve the present distress the Union Government will simply facilitate the return of those who are unable to support themselves in South Africa, without bargaining for the forfeiture of domicile. To insist upon the loss of that valuable right would be to take a mean advantage of the distressful condition on some of our countrymen in South Africa.

DEAR MR. KELKAR,

I thank you for your very prompt reply.
I return . . . which you may keep . . .
I shall . . . an alternative of the creed in terms of your suggestion. We certainly ought to make it the broadest possible.
I agree that we need not fix the fees for membership for Congress committees. Perhaps you will agree to a minimum fee.
I accept [your] suggestion as to the advisability of laying down the method of Taluka and District committees.

If you wish to avoid overlapping and want a fairly scientific constitution you will find that there is no room for affiliations. Those who want to be represented must join one of the series of groups.

Whether you accept the limit at 1,000 or will increase it, I think the membership ought to be limited to a manageable figure. Without that the Congress will remain an unwieldy body and we would not be able to carry the weight we otherwise could. In drafting the constitution I have attempted to give the [Congress] a representative character such as would make its demands irresistible. I would therefore ask you to reconsider your views about limiting the number.

I accept your figure for delegate’s fee.

I agree that the other fees may not be fixed by the Congress.

The present rules for the election of the president may remain as they are. I wanted to say so but my letter had already gone. But I would erase the bombastic speeches that are made at the time of the election. Two best speakers may in addition to the chairman of the R.

1 The office copy of the letter has been damaged in many places by termites.
2 The word “Congress” in Gandhiji’s hand indicates the file in which the letter was to go.
3 The constitution referred to in this letter was passed in 1920. Vide also “Letter to N. C. Kelkar and Others”, about 15-6-1920.
4 1872-1947; political leader of Maharashtra; author and journalist.
I value your suggestion as to the treasurer, also as to the payment to British Congress Committee.

I have not understood the raison d’etre of your suggestion regarding elections to the All I.C.C.².

Draft resolutions and suggestions quite sound.

Your time . . . is quite worthy of you and [reasonably].

The demonstrative part I don’t like. The whole Congress must be deliberation and demonstration at the same time. If you divide the two, the demonstration will fall flat. The spectators pay to watch your actual debates. We may here imitate the House of Commons. Call to mind the visitors’ gallery. When we have limited the number of delegates we carefully rope them in and isolate them from the visitors. Today our *pandal*³ is as unbusiness-like as our proceedings. Introduce business in your programme and you will evolve a pandal to suit your new needs, quite effective and much cheaper than at present.

I think I have now touched all your points. I wish the other two would copy your promptness.

Pray excuse my wretched handwriting. Mahadev Desai⁵ is in Bijolia. My other amanuensis had a bereavement in his family.⁶

4. NON-CO-OPERATION

Since there is no reason to hope that, before August 1, either the khilafat issue will have been satisfactorily solved or a revision of the peace terms promised, we must get ready to start non-co-operation. The Committee is making preparations in this behalf. Meantime, the following can be done:

1. Not to subscribe to new loans.
2. Not to register one’s name for recruitment in military or civil service.

The Government has no right to occupy Mesopotamia. Mandate is in fact nothing but occupation. Moreover, according to newspaper reports, the Arabs do not like even the sight of Indian soldiers there. Whether or not this is true, it is the duty of every Indian not to join such service. Those who go to Mesopotamia will be doing so merely for money. We must refuse to do this, if we do no more.

Not only can it never be our duty to rule by force over the Arabs, but we, who do not wish to remain in slavery, cannot wish to make others slaves.

Thus it behoves us not to subscribe to new loans and to refuse, from this very day, to offer ourselves as new recruits for service under the Government, especially for service which requires us to go to Mesopotamia.

In addition, it is hoped that the following things will be done from August 1 onwards:

1. Titles and honorary positions will be renounced.
2. Legislatures will be boycotted.
3. Parents will withdraw their children from Government schools.
4. Lawyers will give up practice and help people to settle their civil disputes among themselves.
5. Invitations to Government functions, parties, etc., will be politely refused, non-co-operation being given as the sole reason for doing so.

It is likely that this programme will be adopted from August 1, if the khilafat question is not settled.

Lala Lajpat Rai\(^1\) has announced non-co-operation in the form of boycott of legislatures if justice is not done in the matter of the Punjab. So we can now take it that the Punjab too has joined the khilafat agitation. Just as on this issue Muslims should take the lead, in the matter of the Punjab the Punjabis themselves should take the lead. If they do not adopt non-co-operation, one may say that the other parts of India cannot do so either.

We shall hope that Lalaji will not stop with boycott of legislatures. Until we win, we shall have to go on extending the scope of non-co-operation, and be ready to take the four steps suggested earlier. I am convinced, however, that we would win if the whole nation joins in boycotting legislatures.

Three different views on the question of [boycotting] legislatures have been expressed:
1. Not to start non-co-operation at all;
2. to adopt non-co-operation after election to legislatures;
3. to boycott legislatures from the very start.

The first position is entirely opposed to non-co-operation. The second alone needs to be examined. I am convinced that it will be a waste of effort to try to enter legislatures and then to refrain from attending their sessions. It is a waste of money and time alike. I do not at all see the point of doing this. What if unworthy people get elected because we do not come forward? If such people enter the legislatures, the Government will not be able to run the government of an awakened people and it will be laughed at. Moreover, if we join in the elections, we shall not be able to show what real boycott can be. Our duty is so to educate public opinion—opinion of the voters—that it will be impossible for anybody to get elected to legislatures as their representatives. So long as there is lack of understanding between the king and the subject, to attend the king’s council is to strengthen his hands. A king cannot govern at all if he is not able to carry any section of his subjects with him. It follows from this that the fewer the subjects who co-operate with him, the less will be his authority. Hence, for those who accept non-co-operation, the total boycott of legislatures is the only right course. And so I hope that those who are busy trying to get elected to legislatures will give up the attempt for the present and address themselves to the more important work, that of educating public opinion on the khilafat and the Punjab issues, and so serve the people that, when the time for entering legislatures comes, they will be better qualified in virtue of their service.

Now remain the other two suggestions which are likely to be severely criticized. The lawyers should, for the time being, give up practice and intending litigants or those who find themselves dragged into litigation should boycott the courts and get their disputes settled through arbitration boards. It is my confirmed belief that every Government masks its brute force and maintains its control over the people through civil and criminal courts, for it is cheaper, simpler and more honourable, for a ruler that instead of his controlling the people through naked force, they themselves, lured into slavery through courts, etc., submit to him of their own accord. If people settle their civil disputes among themselves and the lawyers, unmindful of self-interest, boycott the courts in the interest of the people, the latter can advance in no time. I have believed for many years that every State tries to perpetuate its power through lawyers. Hence, though fully aware that I will be criticized for making this suggestion, I have no hesitation in putting it forward.

What is true of lawyers is true of schools. Even without such momentous issues as those of the khilafat and the Punjab, I would certainly, if I could, see to it that the present schools were completely abandoned and would provide the right kind of education for children on whom the future of India rests. But my purpose at present in calling for a boycott of the schools is different; I want to show the Government by rendering the schools idle that, so long as justice is not done in regard to the Punjab and the khilafat, co-operation with it is distasteful. I know that this suggestion will be visited with a good deal of ridicule. But, with the passing of time, people will realize that if they refused to crowd the Government schools, it would be impossible to run the administration. Look where we will all over the world, we shall find that the education imparted to the children is intended to facilitate smooth running of the Government. Where the Government is concerned solely with public welfare, so is the educational system; where the Government is of a mixed kind—as in India—the educational system is also calculated to confuse the intellect and is positively harmful. While making this suggestion I do not wish that the youth should be left altogether unprovided with education. Not for a moment do I wish people’s education to stop. But I believe that, even when the schools have been deserted, we can look after people’s education all right. I know that the suggestions I have made are quite serious and I do not expect to be able to convince readers all at once. I shall take up these subjects time and again and place my arguments before the public.

5. KHILAFAT AND SWADESHI

Pathan Alamkhan Jivakhan writes\(^1\) from Damnagar\(^2\).

This is really a heartening letter. It is plain that the khilafat agitation will benefit the cause of swadeshi. But the resolve not to use articles made in Europe only so long as the khilafat issue remained unsolved does not seem to me proper. Muslims ought not to use European goods even if they get full justice on the khilafat question. It is, moreover, not enough to boycott European goods alone. No foreign goods, including Japanese goods, should be used. The swadeshi movement is intended as a permanent change. No matter how justly Europe deals with us, it is our duty to use only swadeshi goods so that India may ever get perfect justice. The country, thus, can prosper only through the spinning-wheel and the handloom. Lakhs of Muslims have given up spinning and lakhs of Muslim weavers have given up weaving. If Hindu and Muslim women again take to spinning and Hindu and Muslim weavers to weaving, within a short time the country will be able to produce all the cloth it needs. I wish, therefore, to draw the attention of all, specially of women, to the example that Damnagar has set. But what can women do about it, so long as men do not provide them with spinning-wheels and slivers of cotton by getting cotton carded by the local carders? I trust, therefore, that at least a few public-spirited men will come forward in every village, who at a little trouble to themselves, will undertake to procure cotton, get it carded and turned into cotton rolls and supply them to women who may be prepared to spin. This is a business in which no loss is possible. Only last week we saw the instance of Dhasa\(^3\) where men and women not only spin and weave but for the most part use cloth made in their own village and send out the surplus, if any, to other villages. There is no starvation, there cannot be any, in that village. With a little effort, things can be planned in a similar way in every village in India.

6. HOW “NAVAJIVAN” SHOULD BE RUN

A correspondent, who does not give his name and address but describes himself as “one who regards Navajivan as his own”, says:

I have often pointed out that letters containing serious statements should never be anonymous. It seems to me that we, Indians, are more in the habit of writing such letters than foreigners. We seem afraid or ashamed of expressing our views openly. Why should one be afraid of expressing one’s honest views? Or be ashamed of them? I repeat my advice to anonymous correspondents to give up this habit of anonymity. We have no right to express views or use language for which we are not prepared to accept responsibility.

This letter is reproduced almost literally. Had the writer signed it, perhaps he would not have made the language as bitter as he has. One who claims that he regards Navajivan “as his own” would put his views quite differently. A friend had placed before me the very same views, but there was sweetness and politeness in his way of complaining. I put it to “one who regards Navajivan as his own” that he could have used more polite language, if he had but cared to. It is our duty to speak out our views, if we think them right and conducive to public interest, but we are never free to dispense with politeness.

Lack of politeness is a sign of anger. The people are at present in an angry mood and boiling over, and therefore, pleased with nothing. They are labouring under a mistaken feeling of helplessness, that they are powerless to do anything which may end their suffering. And so they cling to anything that can make them forget their grief for a while, to anything which may provide them with an intoxicant in place of that of anger. That is why we see nowadays an excess of sensational writing in newspapers. Then, again, the craze for reading has increased and with that has grown the habit of reading long articles. All these are signs of a state of intoxication. Some people in Europe are so addicted to reading something or other that they cannot bear being without a book even for a while. It being impossible to go on reading instructive literature the whole day, the plague of “shilling shockers” is on the increase. A “shilling shocker” is a hair-raising

1 The letter which is not given here, complained that Navajivan had not fulfilled the hopes it had raised when it was started but, on the contrary, it had been deteriorating day by day.
novel, costing 8 annas. Novels written in restrained language cannot be thrilling. So writers and publishers, whose sole object is to make money, tempt readers with impossible stories written in language which no decent man can stand. Reading “shilling shockers” has thus become a disease which has affected hundreds of thousands of men and women. Even we in India are now in danger of catching this disease.

It is Navajivan’s effort, among other things, to protect the people against this danger. It will never lose sight of this aim and so the writer of this letter has but to have patience.

All the same, I must admit that there is some substance in the complaint of this correspondent. Our hope of being able to give better articles and getting them better printed has not been fully realized. Though we have the money for it, we have not yet been able to procure a printing machine which can print a large number of copies. Money cannot secure honesty. There has been difficulty in getting honest workers. The prices of paper have gone sky high while, when Navajivan was started, some people feared that they would fall. All these difficulties were unavoidable.

With all that, we do not feel any shame in presenting Navajivan to the public. Not one thoughtless statement appears in it. Anyone who keeps in mind the purpose which Navajivan exists to serve, will never desert it so long as the paper remains loyal to that aim. This aim has been to shed a new light on current affairs, to place before the people new ideas which have passed the test of experience, and to state whatever we think to be right, without fear of the Government or the public. From this pledge, Navajivan has not departed in the slightest degree and, therefore, it is certainly not “wallowing in the dust,” nor is it “a helpless orphan”. There are, indeed, many obstacles in its path but it has always been, and will always be, struggling to surmount them.

The printing mistakes are to be regretted. Sometimes it happens that good articles intended for publication come too late and others of an inferior quality have to be put in. But from all this it cannot be argued that the aim with which Navajivan was started remains unfulfilled. One may also regret the reduction in the number of its pages, but in these days of high cost of paper aman who claims to "regard Navajivan as his own" should excuse the reduction. There is no need, moreover, to jump to the conclusion that, because the pages are fewer, the matter published is necessarily less than before. In fact, since the number of pages was reduced, an attempt is being made to make the articles more concise and there is absolutely no curtailment of the number of topics covered.

1 As alleged in the letter under comment

When all this is said, let it be understood that the letter above is published not for providing an occasion to defend Navajivan, but to invite those who see Navajivan's drawbacks to point them out and, at the same time, to advise intending critics not to give up politeness as also to gather sufficient courage to give their names. Navajivan's prestige cannot be kept up by defending it. It is obvious that Navajivan can survive only if, on the whole, it has intrinsic worth.

8. LETTER TO THE PRESS ON NON-CO-OPERATION

[Before July 7, 1920]

Mr. Gandhi writes to the Press:

Needless to say that I am in entire accord with Lala Lajpat Rai on the question of the boycott of the reformed councils. For me it is but one step in the campaign of non-co-operation and as I feel equally keenly on the Punjab question as on the khilafat, Lala Lajpat Rai’s suggestion is doubly welcome. I have seen the suggestion made in more quarters than one that non-co-operation on the reforms should commence after the process of election has been through. I cannot help saying that it is a mistake to go through the election farce and the expense of it when we clearly do not intend to take part in the proceedings of these Legislative councils. Moreover, a great deal of educative work has to be done among the people. And if I could I would not have the best attention of the country frittered away in electioneering. The populace will not understand the beauty of non-co-operation if we seek election and then resign. But it would be a fine education for them if the electors are not to elect anybody and unanimously to tell whosoever may seek their suffrage that he would not represent them if he so sought election so long as the Punjab and khilafat questions were not satisfactorily settled. I hope, however, that Lala Lajpat Rai does not mean to end with the boycott of the reformed councils. We must take if necessary every one of the four stages of non-co-operation if we are to be regarded as a self-respecting nation. The issue is clear. Both the khilafat terms and the Punjab affairs show that Indian opinion counts for little in the councils of the Empire.

It is a humiliating position, we shall make nothing of the reforms if we quietly swallow the humiliation. In my humble opinion therefore the first condition of real progress is the removal of these difficulties in our path. And unless some better course of action is devised nolens volens non-co-operation must hold the field.

Young India, 7-7-1920

9. STATEMENT BY NON-CO-OPERATION COMMITTEE

[Before July 7, 1920]

The following is a statement issued by the Non-co-operation Committee for public information and guidance:

Many questions have been asked of the Non-co-operation Committee as to its expectation and the methods to be adopted for beginning non-co-operation.

The Committee wish it to be understood that whilst they expect every one to respond to their recommendation to the full, they are desirous of carrying the weakest members also with them. The Committee want to enlist the passive sympathy, if not the active co-operation, of the whole of the country in the method of non-co-operation.

Those, therefore, who cannot undergo physical sacrifice will help by contributing funds or labour to the movement.

Should non-co-operation become necessary, the Committee has decided upon the following as part of the first stage:

1. Surrender of all titles of honour and honorary offices.
3. Suspension by lawyers of practice and settlement of civil disputes by private arbitration.
5. Boycott of the reformed councils.
6. Non-participation in Government parties, and such other functions.
7. Refusal to accept any civil or military post, in Mesopotamia, or to offer as Units for the army especially for service in the Turkish territories now being administered in violation of pledges.

PROPAGATE SWADESHI

8. Vigorous prosecution of swadeshi inducing the people at the time of this national and religious awakening, to appreciate their primary duty to their country, by being satisfied with its own productions and manufactures.

Swadeshi must be pushed forward without waiting for the 1st of August, for it is an eternal rule of conduct not to be interrupted even when the settlement arrives.

In order not to commit themselves, people will refrain now from taking service either civil or military. They will also suspend taking Government loans, new or old.

For the rest, it should be remembered that non-co-operation does not commence before 1st August next.

Every effort is being, and will still be, made to avoid resort to such a serious breach with the Government by urging His Majesty’s Ministers to secure the revision of a treaty which has been so universally condemned.

Those who realize their responsibility and gravity of the cause will not act independently, but in concert with the committee. Success depends entirely upon disciplined and concerted non-co-operation and the latter is dependent upon strict obedience to instructions, calmness and absolute freedom from violence.

Young India, 7-7-1920

10. NOTES

Pure Civil Disobedience

All the readers of Young India may not know that Ahmedabad came under a heavy fine for the misdeeds of the April of last year. The fine was collected from the residents of Ahmedabad but some were exempted at the discretion of the collector. Among those who were called upon to pay the fines were income-tax payers. They had to pay a third of the tax by them. Mr. V.J. Patel1, noted barrister, and Dr. Kanuga, a leading medical practitioner, were among those who were unable to pay. They had admittedly helped the authorities to quell disturbance. No doubt they were satyagrahis but they had endeavoured to still the mob fury even at some risk to their own persons. But the authorities would not exempt them. It was a difficult thing for them to use discretion in individual cases. It was equally difficult for these two gentlemen to pay any fine when they were not to blame at all. They did not wish to embarrass the autho-rities and yet they were anxious to preserve their self-respect. They carried on no agitation but simply notified their inability to pay the fines in the circumstances set forth above. Therefore an attachment was issued. Dr. Kanuga is a very busy practitioner and his box is always full. The watchful attaching official attached his cash box and extracted enough money to discharge the writ of execution. A lawyer’s business cannot be conduc- ed on these lines. Mr. Patel sported no cash box. A sofa of his sitting-room was therefore attached and advertised for sale and duly sold. Both these satyagrahis thus completely saved their consciences.

Wiseacres may laugh at the folly allowing writs of attachment and paying for the collection of fines. Multiply such instances and imagine the consequence to the authorities of executing thousands of writs. Writs are possible when they are confined to a few recalcitrants. They are troublesome when they have to be executed against many high-souled persons who have done no wrong and who refuse payment to vindicate a principle. They may not attract much notice when isolated individuals resort to this method of protest. But clean examples have a curious method of multiplying themselves. They bear publicity and the sufferers instead of incurring odium receive congratulations. Men like Thoreau' brought about the abolition of slavery by their personal examples. Says Thoreau,

\text{I know this well that if one thousand, if one hundred, if ten men whom I could name, \textit{if ten honest men only} aye, if \textit{one honest man}, in this State of Massachusetts \textit{ceasing to hold slaves} were actually to withdraw from this co-partnership and be locked up in the country gaol therefore, it would be the abolition of slavery in America. For it matters not how small the beginning may seem to be, what is once well done is done for ever.}
\]

Again he says,

\text{I have contemplated the imprisonment of the offender rather than seizure of his goods—though both will serve the same purpose, because they who assert the purest right and consequently are most dangerous to a corrupt State, commonly have not spent much time in accumulating property.}
\]

We, therefore, congratulate Mr. Patel and Dr. Kanuga on the excellent example set by them in an excellent spirit and in an excellent cause.

11. CRITICISM OF MUSLIM MANIFESTO

The khilafat representation addressed to the Viceroy and my letter on the same subject have been severely criticized by the Anglo-Indian Press. The Times of India which generally adopts an impartial attitude has taken strong exception to certain statements made in the Muslim manifesto and had devoted a paragraph of its article to an adverse criticism of my suggestion that His Excellency should resign if the peace terms are not revised.

The Times of India excepts to the submission that the British Empire may not treat Turkey like a departed enemy. The signatories have, I think, supplied the best of reasons. They say:

We respectfully submit that in the treatment of Turkey the British Government are bound to respect Indian Muslim sentiment in so far as it is neither unjust nor unreasonable.

If the seven crore Mussulmans are partners in the Empire, I submit that their wish must be held to be all sufficient for refraining from punishing Turkey. It is beside the point to quote what Turkey did during the war. It has suffered for it. The Times inquires wherein Turkey has been treated worse than the other Powers. I thought that the fact was self-evident. Neither Germany nor Austria and Hungary has been treated in the same way that Turkey has been. The whole of the Empire has been reduced to the retention of a portion of its capital, as it were to mock the Sultan and that too has been done under terms so humiliating that no self-respecting person, much less a reigning sovereign can possibly accept.

The Times has endeavoured to make capital out of the fact that the representation does not examine the reason for Turkey not joining the Allies. Well, there was no mystery about it. The fact of Russia being one of the Allies was enough to warn Turkey against joining them. With Russia knocking at the gate at the time of the war it was not an easy matter for Turkey to join the Allies. But Turkey had cause to suspect Great Britain herself. She knew that England had done no friendly turn to her during the Bulgarian War. She was hardly well served at the time of the war with Italy. It was still no doubt a bad choice. With the Mussulmans of India awakened and ready to support her, her statesmen might have relied upon Britain not being allowed to damage Turkey if she had remained with the Allies. But this is all wisdom after event. Turkey made a bad choice and she was punished for it. To humiliate her now is to ignore the Indian Mussulman sentiment. Britain may not do it and retain the loyalty of the awakened Mussulmans of India.

For The Times to say that peace terms strictly follow the principle of self-determination is to throw dust in the eyes of its readers. Is it the principle of self-determination that has caused cessation of Adrianople and Thrace to Greece? By what principle of self-determination has Smyrna been handed to Greece? Have the inhabitants of Thrace and Smyrna asked for Grecian tutelage?

I decline to believe that the Arabs like the disposition that has been made of them. Who is the King of Hedjaj and who is Emir Feisul? Have the Arabs elected these kings and chiefs? Do the Arabs like the Mandate being taken by England? By the time the whole thing is finished, the very name self-determination will stink in one’s nostrils. Already signs are not wanting to show that the Arabs, the Thracians and the Smyrnans are resenting their disposal. They may not like Turkish rule but they like the present arrangements less. They could have made their own honourable terms with Turkey but these self-determining people will now be held down by the “matchless might” of the Allies, i.e., British forces. Britain had the straight course open to her of keeping the Turkish Empire intact and taking sufficient guarantees for good government. But her Prime Minister chose the crooked course of secret treaties, duplicity and hypocritical subterfuges.

There is still a way out. Let her treat India as a real partner. Let her call the true representatives of the Mussulmans. Let them go to Arabia and the other parts of the Turkish Empire and let her devise a scheme in concert with them—a scheme that would not humiliate Turkey, that would satisfy the just Muslim sentiments and that will secure honest self-determination for the races composing that Empire. If it was Canada, Australia or South Africa that had to be placated, Mr. Lloyd George\(^1\) would not have dared to ignore them. They have the power to secede. India has not. Let him no more insult India by calling her a partner, if her feelings count for naught. Times of India to reconsider its position and join an honourable agitation in which a high-souled people are seeking nothing but justice.

I do with all deference still suggest that the least that Lord Chelmsford can do is to resign if the sacred feelings of India’s sons are not to be consulted and respected by the Ministers. The Times is overtaxing the constitution when it suggests that as a constitutional Viceroy it is not open to Lord Chelmsford to go against decisions of His Majesty’s Ministers. It is certainly not open to a Viceroy to retain office and oppose ministerial decisions. But the constitution does allow a Viceroy to resign his office when he is called upon to carry out decisions that are immoral as the peace terms are or like these terms are calculated to stir to their very depths the feelings of those whose affairs he is administering for the time being.

12. THE PRINCE

Mr. Baptista has written to The Bombay Chronicle on the forthcoming visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and has combated views he imputes to me. Much as I should like for the present to observe silence on this delicate subject I cannot allow it to be said of me that I would “visit the sins of ministers on the Prince”. I entirely agree with Mr. Baptista that the Prince has no voice in the Government and that he is not concerned with the acts of the ministers of the Crown much less with their blunders. I am just as keen as anyone could be to give a royal reception to the Prince and it is because I appreciate the constitution and its working that I would boycott the visit under present conditions. It is because I know that the Royalty is above politics that I would not allow the ministers or the Government of India, if I can help it, to use the Prince for their own political purposes. If I can do nothing else, at least I must not become a tool in the hands of the ministers and the Government of India and allow them, under cover of the Prince’s visit, to make their hold of India tighter and to demonstrate to the world that under their benign administration the whole of India is happy and contented. For let there be no mistake that such will be the result if we remained silent and, under a mistaken sense of loyalty of constitution, gave any re-

1 Joseph Baptista; Congress leader from Bombay ception to the Prince. On the contrary, I hope that our loyalty requires us to make it clear to His Majesty’s ministers that if they send the Prince to India, we shall be in no mood to join any receptions they might arrange. I would tell them in no language that we are sick at heart over the khilafat and the Punjab questions and that whilst we are fighting them for very life, we must not be expected to co-operate with them in giving receptions to His Royal Highness. We would be doing a wrong to the public, if we neglected our clear duty of educating them to a truer perception of the meaning of the proposed Royal visit. Let it be known that the Prince will arrive by and with the advice of the ministers, and consent and approval of the Government of India. The visit therefore will be not an act of the Prince but that of the ministers and in boycotting the visit at this juncture we would be visiting their sins upon themselves and not on the Prince. In other words we would not be playing into their hands. Supposing the ministers sent Sir Michael O’ Dwyer to replace Lord Chelmsford and he arranged the reception, would Mr. Baptista have us to fall into Sir Michael’s trap! Suppose further that he insulted the Punjab under the Prince’s nose by ignoring the Punjab leaders, should the Punjab pocket the insult and join the reception because Royalty is above politics! To say so would be to betray a woeful display of ignorance of the meaning of loyalty and politics.

I venture to suggest that if the Australian people were intensely dissatisfied with the acts, or the blunders of the ministers in the sense we are, they would boycott the visit without the slightest hesitation. The ministers want to make political capital out of the proposed visit. It is our duty to refuse to let them do so.

Mr. Baptista says and I agree that we are in mourning. He therefore hopes that the Prince would not be sent but if he is, Mr. Baptista says, we should give him a welcome in spite of the mourning. I want the Prince to come and therefore I would try to remove the cause of mourning and not take it as a settled fact. I would tell the ministers that as we want to give the Prince an enthusiastic welcome, they should remove the khilafat and the Punjab grievances. I should further tell them that if they did not do so and still persisted in sending the Prince to India, they would be responsible for placing the people in the awkward position of having to boycott the visit or the reception.

13. SWADESHI IN THE PUNJAB

The joint secretaries of the Bharat Stri Maha Mandal, Punjab Branch, send a report of the swadeshi activities of Shrimati Saraladevi Chaudhrani ever since her return to Lahore from Bombay. Miss Roy and Mrs. Roshanlal, the secretaries, state that meetings of women were held respectively on the 23rd, 24th and 25th June at three different places in Lahore. All the meetings were attended by hundreds of women who were deeply interested in what Shrimati Saraladevi had to say. The burden of her discourses was India’s deep poverty. She traced the causes and proved that our poverty was primarily due to the abandonment of swadeshi by the people. The remedy therefore lay in reverting to swadeshi.

Saraladevi herself writes to say that her khaddar sari impressed her audiences more than her speeches, and her songs came next, her speeches last. The good ladies of Lahore flocked round her and felt her coarse but beautifully white sari and admired it. Some took pity on her that she who only the other day was dressed in costly thin silk saris now decked herself in hand-woven swadeshi khaddar. Saraladevi wanted no pity and retorted that their thin foreign scarves lay heavier on their shoulders with the weight of their helpless dependence on foreign manufacture whereas her coarse khaddar lay light as a feather on her body with the joy of the knowledge that she was free because she wore garments in the manufacture of which her sisters and her brothers had laboured. This statement so pleased her audience that most of the women present resolved to discard foreign clothes. Saraladevi has now been charged by these ladies to open a shop where they could buy swadeshi goods. She has since addressed more audiences. She spoke at the District Conference at Sialkot and to a meeting exclusively devoted to ladies numbering over one thousand. I hope that the men of Punjab will help Saraladevi in her self-imposed mission. They may harness her talents and her willingness in founding Swadeshi Sabha and organizing swadeshi propaganda on a sound basis. Both men and money are needed to make the work a success. Swadeshi is more than reforms. There is much waste over reforms. There is none in swadeshi. Every yard of yarn spun is so much labour well spent and so much wealth added to the national treasury. Every drop counts. Swadeshi spells first production and then distribution. Distribution without production means the raising of prices without any corresponding benefit. For today demand exceeds the supply. If we will not manufacture more cloth, more foreign imports must continue a painful and sinful necessity.

Punjab has a great opportunity. Punjab grows splendid cotton. The art of spinning has not yet died out. Almost every Punjabi woman knows it. This sacred haunt of the rishis of old has thousands of weavers. Only the leaders need to have faith in their women and themselves. When Saraladevi wrote to me that she might want goods from Bombay, I felt hurt. The Punjab has all the time and all the labour and the material necessary for producing her own cloth. She has brave merchants. She has more than enough capital. She has brains. Has she the will? She can organize her own swadeshi in less than a year, if the leaders will work at this great cause. It is playing with swadeshi for the Punjab to have to import cloth from Bombay.

The Punjab has to right herself by putting her swadeshi on a proper basis and by ridding herself of Messrs Bosworth Smith and Company. She will then be both economically and politically sound. Geographically she stands at the top. She led the way in the older times. Will she again do so? Her men are virile to look at. Have they virility enough to secure without a moment’s delay purity of administration? I have not strayed from swadeshi to politics. My swadeshi spirit makes me impatient of garments that denude India of her wealth and equally impatient of the Smiths, the O’Briens, the Shri Rams and the Maliks who denude her of her self-respect and insolently touch women’s veils with their sticks, chain innocent men as if they were beasts, or shoot them from armoured cars or otherwise terrorize people into subjection.

14. MADNESS IN JUNAGADH

Junagadh is a Moslem State in Kathiawad so named for its having been once the land of brave Kathis. It possesses a well-regulated college called after its founder the Vazeer Bahauddin. The college had attracted a good many Sindhi scholars mostly Mohammedans. This college has the unique distinction of giving free tuition. Suddenly the new Nawab a few days ago issued a ukase expelling all non-Kathiawadi students within twenty-four hours. The poor bewildered students were forcibly entrained the same day and packed away to Sind. No one knows the crime committed by the students. Rumour has it that the khilafat agitation is at the back of this mad order. The Hindu students have been thrown in to cover the shame of the deed. Personally I welcome this expulsion. The barefaced injustice of it would show the people the true nature of the subtly hostile forces arraigned against the khilafat agitation. These States are themselves subjects of the Imperial State and therefore when the latter errs violently they are really worse off than the subjects who possess no sovereign powers. Having much to lose—both power and riches—they become willing instruments of injustice, and the nakedness of the injustice of the Imperial State is better reflected in the acts of Native States than in its own direct act. The subjects of Native States and those who live under their temporary protection therefore often become double sufferers. But I do not wish to diagnose the condition of Native States under British suzerainty.

My purpose is to show an easy way out of the impasse. The Principal of the college is reported to have resigned by way of protest against the extraordinary order. He deserves the warmest congratulations of those who want to see justice and purity in the Empire. But have not the Kathiawadi students a duty by the State and their comrades? In my opinion they should leave the college in a body after lodging a respectful protest. They will buy their free education at too dear a price if they have not the manliness to show their sympathy to their fellow-students by leaving the college. The Nawab Saheb may not still come to his senses. That is a matter of no concern to them. They will have done their duty by withdrawing from the college.

1 Members of a community of Saurashtra
To the expelled students, I would say: “Do not lose heart. You will not beg to be readmitted to a college whose owner has so insulted you. You may even return the little compensation-money and the travelling expenses the Nawab Saheb has given you. Accepting any such compensation would be compromising with the wrong. You can get all the education you need in Sindh itself, without having to go to any college. There is too much idolatry about the education received in our schools and colleges. We must learn to be men before we learn to read and write. Nature has endowed men with the ability to overcome all difficulties in way of their progress literary or otherwise.

15. SPEECH AT WOMEN’S MEETING, BOMBAY

July 7, 1920

Mr. M. K. Gandhi asked the assembly to read the Congress Sub-committee’s report on the Punjab atrocities carefully. He dwelt upon some of the happenings revealed in that report, and said the women of Bombay might perhaps wonder and enquire what he was trying to talk about for they might argue that here in Bombay they could move about with perfect freedom but those who argued in that fashion lost sight of this, that things which had come to pass in the Punjab might happen in Bombay provided circumstances became identical. Besides their duty should not be confined merely to preservation of their own safety but taking a broader view of it, they should try to ensure the safety of others as well. They should feel the wrongs done to their sisters and brothers of the Punjab as if they themselves had been subjected to those wrongs, and it was their duty to protest with all the emphasis at their command, so that a repetition of the Punjab atrocities might be rendered impossible either in that Province or any other part of India. If they wished to maintain their pride in India’s supreme civilization they would have to show to the world that the soul-power of India’s womanhood was greater than the physical strength of those officials who had perpetrated the atrocities in the Punjab. They must stand by the side of their husbands, brothers and sons and insist on their getting the Punjab wrongs redressed.

BHAISHRI NARAHARI.

Experience has convinced me that one cannot pay too much attention to students’ handwriting. It I were to think merely of livelihood, [good] handwriting is valuable enough. For a student, it is an accomplishment.

Why does one fall ill? Everyone should find this out for himself. I keep thinking about it all the time. Merely from considerations of physical health, I find myself drawn at present to some techniques of Hathayoga. I think some of them to be very important from this point of view. It was a vaidya from Baroda who gave these ideas to me. Think this over with Vinoba. With unhealthy bodies, we cannot give of our best in the service of India. I often feel that pranayama and techniques like neti, dhauti, etc., must be of great help in maintaining the internal cleanliness of the body. My only point in saying all this is that you should make your body [as strong] as steel.

In order to be able to get up early, go to bed, if necessary, at eight sharp. I say this because I put the highest value on early rising.

Deepak has very little fat on him. His ribs are visible. I am not happy with this. I simply cannot bear the thought that even one boy should have his ribs visible.

If possible, find out more about Bhaskar’s money. There is no doubt, of course, that we should credit the amount to his account. Could he himself have taken that money?

him alone, by one who was filled with the true spirit of the school. I am perfectly satisfied with it as far as it goes. But, to go further than that, I am sure a student from my school will be able, if he but wants, to earn more in the end. He will have a trained and sharp intellect. His brain will not have been crushed under the burden of a foreign language and of examinations. Even as things are today, the idea that those who have passed examinations earn more is just a myth. The rich in India are still men who have had no English education. They have English-educated men working under them. I leave out of account here barristers and doctors, especially the former, for they are the men who require a stamp. As for medicine, even our children can practise if they have the requisite knowledge. They may take up any service, except under Government, in which B.A.s are employed (if service is to be all their aim). If, having attained that level in their studies, any of them wants to go to England, he may take the matriculation there and may also become a barrister. That is, we leave an opening for him in case he repents. If the education we are giving is really up to our expectations, we can defend it against the entire world.

Forgetting for the moment all about moksha\(^1\), we can certainly persuade every child to aspire to be good. While explaining who is a good man, quite a few things can be taught.

But all this when we meet. I shall go there on Monday and return the same day. It will be good if you can set apart one hour at one o’clock for us. There will be no one then and if anyone turns up, we shall excuse ourselves.

17. MESSAGE TO RAJAKIYA MANDAL MEETING, NADIAD

[Before July 9, 1920]

Mr. Yagnik read out a Gujarati letter addressed to him by Mr. M. K. Gandhi for reading it at the meeting. The letter runs thus:

The Rajakiya Mandal meets at Nadiad. Please see the resolution suggested by me in the [last issue of] Navajivan. I desire that the Mandal should fearlessly adopt a resolution advising non-co-operation in connection with both the Punjab and khilafat questions. I take the boycott of councils as a first step in that direction. To adopt boycott after entering councils is to my mind sheer cowardice. How can we co-operate with those who do not deal justice to the Punjab and who betray us in the khilafat question? I remember to have seen in my childhood players at dice not playing with those who cast their dice dishonestly. In the political game before us the honour of India is at stake. Players on one side appear to resemble Duryodhana. How to play with them? God may help you to arrive at a correct and bold decision.

19. GUJARAT’S DUTY

Many difficult problems are now coming up for the whole of India. The future of the country will largely depend on how these are solved. If, at this juncture, we betray, we shall invite a curse upon ourselves.

I have deliberately given to this article the heading “Gujarat’s Duty”. Not only is Navajivan addressed to Gujarati-speaking readers, but I have been developing before Gujaratis those ideas of which I am especially enamoured and translating them into practice to the limits of my capacity.

And so a special duty arises for Gujaratis. I come into close contact with large numbers of them. I discuss my ideas with them

---

1. Vide the preceding item
2. G. V. Mavlankar, (1888-1956); a political worker of Gujarat, the first Speaker of the Lok Sabha after independence very freely and they can examine my life very minutely. From them I cannot and do not try to conceal my weaknesses.

I claim that the ideas which I place before the people are no product of an undeveloped brain but have taken shape on the anvil of thirty years of ever vigilant experience of life and are, therefore, fully mature. Even so, there may be errors in them. They may even be altogether wrong. There are many errors coming down for generations but, even after sufficient experience, we are unable to recognize them as such. It is possible that obtuseness prevents me from seeing my own errors.

Hence, all I wish is that my ideas should not be rejected before they have been tried out. It is the especial duty of Gujaratis to test them as, being nearer to me, it is easier for them to measure their worth.

It is a sign of cowardice to dismiss these ideas by saying that I have renounced the world, that I have turned a sadhu, that my ideas are good but impracticable. I do not accept the charge of being a sadhu and a man ignorant of the world. Comparing myself with my co-workers, I see my imperfections. I believe myself to be a man of the world. Personally, I think I am a practical man. I am happier, more contented and fearless than my neighbours but with no fewer concerns than they. My neighbours shudder when they see my worries. And yet I remain healthy enough to be able to carry on with my work. I too have a wife and children, like other people. I have not disowned my responsibilities towards them; on the contrary, I have thought carefully over them and have not renounced any of them. I do not live in a forest, but seem to be establishing ever new contacts. I fail to understand how anyone else can be more engrossed than I in this world. To dismiss me as a sadhu is to be unfair to me and to deprive Gujarat of my services.

The present Government is immoral, unjust and arrogant beyond description. It defends one lie with other lies. It does most things under a threat of force. If the people tolerate all these things and do nothing, they will never progress.

If a man, when hungry, merely keeps wailing about his hunger and makes no great effort to procure food, prepared even to die in the attempt, then we shall doubt whether he is at all hungry.

The Times of India commented a few days ago that, if our public men were right in all the adjectives they employed when speaking on the Punjab and other issue, with their feelings so excited the people would surely seek a remedy [for the wrongs]. There is a saying in English, “Necessity is the mother of invention.” Memons have a saying among them, “With a crisis, the hero”; that is, a crisis produces the hero. A crisis means a moment of pressing difficulty. Such a moment shows a man the way out and so makes him a man indeed. If we really feel the pressure, if the adjectives we use truly describe our feelings, why should we not be able to find the remedy?

Countless times have we sung that the sufferings of the Punjab are intolerable. What does a man suffering unbearable pain do? One who is stung by a scorpion tries all manner of remedies and, if they fail to relieve the pain, he dies. We, on the contrary, have lost even the strength to die, though we say that our pain is unbearable. Why should The Times, then, not pour ridicule on us?

Shastras advise that the company of the evil should be shunned. We do not have enough courage even to turn our back on the evil Mr. O’Brien, the evil Mr. Smith and the evil Mr. Shri Ram.

Withdrawing co-operation from a government which breaks its promises is a course followed from immemorial times. The history of our country provides instance after instance of subjects oppressed by a king leaving the kingdom. The subjects have a right to show that they are displeased.

In Europe, they kill a wicked king. In India, the subjects leave the territory of the king when they find things unbearable. The non-co-operation I have suggested is a mild way of boycotting. Total boycott is the ultimate stage in non-co-operation. We have even forgotten how to show that we are displeased.

If that is true, it betokens the depth of our degradation. When the slave forgets that he is a slave, there is no way left to help him win his freedom.

There can hardly be an injustice greater than the two which the Government is obstinately defending today. If we do not find them unbearable, then no blame will attach to the Government; on the contrary, it will be said, to use the language of the rustic, that we deserved all this.

It is the duty of the people of Gujarat, at this difficult time, to examine closely the forms of non-co-operation which I place before them. I hope that in this matter Gujarat will not follow others’ example, but will take the lead and be an example for others to follow.
A little reflection will show that renouncing titles, boycotting legislatures, leaving Government schools and giving up practice are not very difficult tasks. For the present, however, we have to make up our mind to boycott legislatures. If there is not a single candidate for election to the legislatures, this will have no insignificant effect on both the Government and the people.

Let us consider what should be done for boycotting legislatures. Keeping away from them does not mean sitting quiet and doing nothing, but means educating the voters in that direction and making our meaning plain to the Government.

In every important town, therefore, resolutions should be passed advocating boycott of legislatures:

The feelings of the people have been so deeply hurt by the injustice done to the Muslims on the khilafat issue, by the Cabinet’s endorsement of the Prime Minister’s breach of promise and by the terrible and unendurable injustice in the Punjab, that it will not be in keeping with the nation’s self-respect, so long as redress is denied in these two matters, to enter legislatures and help the Government to function. This meeting, therefore, advises that no one should contest elections to the legislatures and appeals to the voters not merely not to vote for anyone who may stand as a candidate but also to write and inform him that they do not wish to elect anyone to represent them in the legislatures.

It is urgently necessary to hold meetings everywhere and pass resolutions to this effect.

We need not wait for the Congress to meet. The Congress is an organ of public opinion, and hardly an instrument of cultivating public opinion. Those to whom their path is clear need not at all wait till the Congress session is over; rather, they should put their decision into effect and, thereby, show to the Congress the direction and intensity of public opinion.

It is not likely that in a great venture like this all will be of one mind on the instant. We shall have patiently to educate those who differ from us. We shall succeed in changing their views by showing our dislike of them or boycotting them; we shall have to win them over to our view with argument and gentle persuasion. This is the only way in which we can cultivate public opinion along right lines.

20. VISIT OF THE PRINCE OF WALES

Mr. Baptista has asked in The [Bombay] Chronicle whether, in our present suffering, we are in a position to accord a cordial reception to the eldest son of King-Emperor George V when he visits India. He has spoken of my views and, therefore, I think it my duty to state them.

I believe that we cannot drag the Prince or any other member of the Royal family into politics. If our differences with the Government are of an ordinary nature, we should welcome the Prince’s visit and receive him with all respect. When, however, the people are in grief and their feeling have been deeply hurt, the Prince’s visit will be ill-timed and the people have the right to express their displeasure at the action of the authorities, if the latter arrange the visit without ascertaining their feelings. The Prince is in no way insulted by such action. To deny this is to demonstrate ignorance of the British Constitution.

It should be remembered that the Prince is not coming of his own accord. If he did, he would be acting contrary to the Constitution. He can come only if the British Cabinet requests him to, after consulting the Indian Government. The Prince is not free to follow his own inclination in meeting Indians or making speeches. His visit, therefore, is not to be considered his own act but that of the Government.

Moreover, if the Government arranges a visit by the Prince to India, it will be to serve its own purpose. So long as there is no great difference dividing the Government and the people, it may be said that the interests of the one are those of the other. If there is such a difference, however, what is in the interest of the Government may be against that of the people. If the Prince comes at this time and if we receive him warmly, the Government will conclude that, in fact, the people have not been hurt and that all this talk of their having been hurt is only the work of a few disgruntled men. It would not be strange if it came to this conclusion.

If, therefore, the Government does arrange a visit by the Prince of Wales at this juncture, I would look upon the visit as a trap and it would be the duty of the people not to walk into it.

What is the position of the people today? The British Cabinet has gone back on the promise it gave to a section of the people and the Government of India has acquiesced in this. The latter has disregarded the religious sentiments of the Muslims. Not only does it show no evidence of regretting the atrocities committed by the officials on the people of the Punjab but, on the contrary, we find it brazen-facedly defending the officials. Many of the officers who were responsible for the atrocities are continued in service and they are still going on in the same old way. In these circumstances, if we welcome the Prince and thereby strengthen the power of the Government, we shall be tightening our chains with our own hands.

By refusing to welcome the Prince, we express our strong displeasure at the misdeeds of the Government. We have a right to do this. If we do not do it, we shall proclaim ourselves cowards. Our petitions and complaints will be proved to have been unfounded.

If the Government wishes to see the people full of joy and enthusiasm at the time of the Prince’s visit and wants them to show respect to him, it is its duty to satisfy them. There is only one way of doing this—a just solution of the khilafat issue and perfect justice in the Punjab. These two issues have created a gulf between the Government and the people and plunged the latter in grief. The people should tell the Government in the clearest possible terms that, while our demands remain unsatisfied, we are unable to welcome the Prince.

21. PURE SWADESHI

A brief report of Shrimati Saraladevi’s work in the Punjab appeared in Navajivan last week. From a telegram received later, it appears that even at the Khilafat Conference which she attended at Jhelum, she spoke on swadeshi. As Muslims are fast taking to swadeshi, it is easy to propagate swadeshi from a khilafat platform.

At this juncture, it is very necessary to understand thoroughly some fundamental principles of swadeshi. Will it advance the cause of swadeshi if Muslims take the swadeshi vow in their hundreds of thousands? I think it will, provided that either there is an increase in the production of swadeshi goods to meet their needs or they and others reduce requirements of cloth.
The cloth which our cotton mills produce is not enough for India’s needs and the mills are not in a position to increase the production of cloth in the immediate future. Their weaving capacity is greater than their spinning capacity. If, therefore, we use mill-yarn for handloom cloth, it will mean that the mills will produce less correspondingly and not that there will be an increase in the total production of cloth. The result will be large imports, not of cloth, but of yarn. That will leave us just where we are. We need not believe that we shall be saving on weaving for yarn will cost more. This is not swadeshi.

The swadeshi of our conception safeguards both dharma and artha. Not to be able to serve our own neighbours, our own kith and kin—to wrest a morsel from their mouths and put it into those of strangers, surely this would not be serving the higher end of life, this would not be compassion. That would only mean our deserting our own field of duty. We are therefore, morally bound to encourage our sisters who spin and our weavers. In the process, we shall be sending 60 crores of rupees to the homes of our starving millions and this will safeguard artha. The swadeshi dharma is thus the royal road for safeguarding both our dharma and artha.

We can follow this only if we take to hand-spinning and hand-weaving. The true and genuine swadeshi movement, therefore, consists in increasing the production of yarn, getting the yarn woven and then marketing the cloth thus produced. It is, therefore my suggestion to all lovers of swadeshi and to all owners of swadeshi stores that they should get women to spin and should popularize the cloth woven out of the yarn they produce. I know that this work is difficult and heart-breaking. But no progress is ever possible without our venturing on a path beset with difficulties. The way to the Dhaulagiri peak is strewn with the bones of countless travellers. The weak of heart lose their enthusiasm right at the foot; there is no way, though, except through hills and valleys. If, therefore, those who take up the swadeshi cause do so after fully understanding the basic principle of swadeshi, they will save themselves from disappointment. It does not matter if every worker does no more than spin and infects a few with his zeal; but there will be great harm, if the swadeshi movement does not make headway, in being satisfied with what goes under the name of swadeshi. No piece of brass, however shining, can serve for gold; nor a bit of glass for a diamond. Just as mistakenly accepting glass as diamond will only delay our getting the latter, in the same way we shall only retard the progress of swadeshi if we accept spurious swadeshi as genuine swadeshi. Some people may wonder why, if the idea is to produce yarn, some 10 or 20 new mills should not be set up instead of trying to persuade millions of women to spin. I have already answered this question in Navajivan.\(^1\) New mills are not easily set up. Nor does anyone need especially to make the effort. The rich make the attempt on their own and keep adding to the number. But the setting up of new mills will mean being permanently dependent on foreigners for machinery. It is, besides, no remedy for the hunger of the millions, nor does it enable us to put 60 crores of rupees in circulation among them every year. India’s population numbering millions and spread over a length of 1900 miles will never be saved from starvation till we introduce a subsidiary occupation into the homes of the millions living on agriculture. Such an occupation can only be hand-spinning and, to some extent, hand-weaving. This industry flourished in India a hundred and fifty years ago and at that time we were not as miserably poor as we are today.

1 Material welfare
2 In the Himalayas

22. SHANTINIKETAN

Mr. Andrews\(^1\) writes saying that buildings are under construction in Shantiniketan and the need for money is pressing. The Poet\(^2\) is not there at present and the burden falls mainly on Mr. Andrews.

I feel that Gujarat did not do its duty fully at the time of the Poet’s visit\(^3\). To welcome a guest with cheers and garlands of flowers is but courtesy; it is the beginning of one’s duty, not the end. If we regard the Poet as a man of exceptional gifts and if we intend really to appreciate his literary genius, it is our duty to help him in his work.

Before we help a man, it is not necessary to be in complete agreement with everything he does. It is quite possible that we see defects or imperfections in the actions of the great. None the less, if their motives are sincere it is our duty to help them.

We know hardly anything about the work of Pandita Ramabai\(^4\). Alone and single-handed, she carries it on with the help of American money. Because she is a Christian, we take no interest in her work. She does not approach us for help, and it is right that she does not. Her object is the propagation of Christianity, which appeals to the people of America. They do not care to look into all her activities, and perhaps would not approve of everything she does. The Pandita’s objects in her work is sufficient for their purpose and, therefore, some from among them meet the very large expenses of her big institution.

In the same way, if we honour the object the Poet has in mind, if we like the experiment of keeping the nation’s education in its own hands and if we want our children to have something of the Poet’s artistic sense, we should help to maintain the institution. The Poet himself has declared that Shantiniketan is his recreation, that it is for recreation that he gathers children around him. The children’s faculties develop best in the environment there. Shantiniketan is the creation of his revered father, Maharshi Devendranath. To honour the Poet but refuse to help his institution is not a consistent attitude.

I appeal to Gujaratis to bear a part of the expenses of this institution, since we had invited the Poet to be our honoured guest. One of his reasons for accepting our invitation was that we might come to know his institution and help it. He gladly accepted help wherever it was offered with love. His tour of Kathiawar, one may say, failed in its purpose. Bhavnagar practically did nothing and the experience in Baroda was the same. Looking to its capacity, Ahmedabad’s response was rather poor. I trust that, even now, we will make amends for this lapse on our part and complete our reception.

Shri Tulsidas Karani of Mangrol1, taking the occasion of a marriage in his family, sent only a few days ago Rs. 1001. It is while acknowledging this gift that Mr. Andrews says that still more help is needed. As we make progress, voluntary taxes on us are bound to increase and we ought to pay what we can within our means. Those who wish to offer anything may send the amounts to the Ashram or to Mr. C. F. Andrews, Shantiniketan, Bolpur, East Indian Railway.

23. MADNESS IN JUNAGADH

The expulsion, by the Nawab Saheb, of Sindhi students from the Bahauddin College at Junagadh is old news now. To expel without cause a whole lot of 60 students from the college and pack them off in a train within 24 hours is nothing but a sign of insanity. Such insanity reminds us of the martial law in the Punjab.

The question immediately occurs whether the step was influenced by the British Government. The Nawab Saheb seems to have given to reason [for his action] and, therefore, nothing can be said definitely on this point.

If the Nawab Saheb has taken the step on his own, it is plain that the subjects of Native States are worse off than people under British rule.

Our princes are in a sorry plight. They are in the position of subjects themselves. Their power and their wealth depend entirely on the British Empire and are safeguarded by it. The people living in dependencies being subjects of subjects are doubly dependent and, often, suffer twice as much as others.

But this is no occasion to consider who is really responsible for the Nawab Saheb’s action, what rights the subjects of Native States have and how to improve their lot. We do not have sufficient data for the purpose.

A big question, however, arises: What is now the duty of the students of Kathiawar towards their fellow-students? The people of Kathiawar have physical strength and are also reputed to be brave. Their capacity for suffering is admirable. Should these students take the insult of their Sindhi friends lying down? I for one feel that, if the Sindhi students are not re-admitted, it is the clear duty of the Kathiawar students to leave the college.

It will perhaps be argued that in that case the education of these students would suffer. I for one will assert rather, that in a situation like this true education for them lies in leaving the college. What use is that education which does not teach self-respect? When the occasion demands, one must uphold the honour of one’s associates even at some cost to oneself. It is one’s duty as a man to defend them against injustice.

The first thing to learn is to be men. Education in the letters is for human beings. What will you gain by education those who have lost their humanity? Book-learning by itself does not make us men. College students, moreover, are not mere children. We cannot say that they are in no position to think for themselves. I trust, therefore, that every single Kathiawari student in the Bahauddin College will leave the college if justice is not done to their Sindhi friends.

“What next?”—some will ask. It is quite possible that no other college will admit them; and, if any college is prepared to do so, they will hardly have the money to pay the fees. But it is in facing these difficulties that the worth of their sacrifice in leaving the college lies. If colleges grew like mushrooms, they would have no value and the Sindhi students would never have been expelled.

Those who leave the college can, working hard, continue their studies at home. And arrangements can be made to provide free coaching to them. It is not difficult, in these days, to find public-spirited teachers who will not mind helping such students. If the students but do their elementary duty, they will know the way of fighting this injustice. Not to think of the future when doing the duty which has fallen to one’s lot—this is nishkama karma\(^1\) and this is dharma.

24. LETTER TO THE PRESS ON SOUTH AFRICAN COURT’S JUDGMENT

July 11, 1920\(^2\)

Mr. M. K. Gandhi writes to the Press:

I have received the following cablegram from Johannesburg: In Deudoo versus Krugersdorp Municipality the legality of Asiatic companies owning fixed property appellate court upheld appeal. Justices Rose-Innes, Solomon, Maarsdorp, Juta and De Villiers composed the bench. Justice De Villiers only dissented.

The cablegram means much relief for our harassed countrymen in South Africa. It would be remembered that the High Court of the Transvaal had decided against Indian companies holding fixed properties as being fraudulent of law. The appellate court has evidently taken a different view and sustained the Indian contention that the transactions of the Asiatic companies were perfectly legal.

CHI. MAGANLAL\(^2\),

I have today asked Anandanand to write to you and tell you that Mr. Kale of Dharwar will be leaving for Ahmedabad by mail and that you should receive him at the station. I have asked him to write to you in detail.

This letter I write for the sake of Ba. I observe that she is not quite happy. She has been ill and works beyond her strength. As Nirmala came away with me, I asked Devdas to stay behind. Consult Gokibehn\(^3\) and Ba, with Devdas present, and do whatever is necessary. Perhaps it will do if you reduce the burden of work in regard to clothes and utensils. I do not understand why there should be any difficulty on account of rotlis\(^4\). If the work in the kitchen is too heavy and if it is possible to make any changes, make them. Are there at present 15 persons who take their meals? I shall return there most probably on Monday.

27. SPEECH ON FIJI AFFAIRS, BOMBAY

July 13, 1920

Under the joint auspices of the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association, the Bombay Presidency Association, the India Merchants' Chamber and Bureau, the Indian Home Rule League, the All-India Home Rule League, the Bombay National Union and the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee, a public meeting of the citizens of Bombay was held at the Excelsior Theatre, Bombay, yesterday to consider the Indian situation in East Africa and Fiji. Sir Narayan Chandavarkar\(^1\) presided and there was a very large attendance. Mr. M. K. Gandhi moved the following resolution:

(a) That this meeting views with alaram and grave apprehensions the growing agitation in the East African Protectorate against the British Indian settlers residing in that Protectorate and hopes that, in view especially of the fact that the Imperial Government has directed control over the Protectorate and that the Indians emigrated to East Africa before the European advent, the Government of India will guard the Indians against any encroachment upon their rights whether by legislative or administrative measures and that the Government will secure complete equality of status for them by requiring the Protectorate to remove all legal and administrative inequality at present existing.

(b) This meeting emphatically protests against the undesirable authority placed in the hands of the administrator of the occupied territory empowering him to deport persons without trial, being power virtually aimed against Indians; and views with great concern the other grievances of Indians resident therein, such as want of police protection, artificial financial disabilities due to the invalidity of pre-war interim German currency notes, the exchange imbroglio, travelling restrictions, and the like. In the opinion of this meeting these disabilities make the position of British Indian settlers worse than during the German regime, and this meeting trusts that the Government of India will secure early relief of the Indian situation from the grievances complained of.

Mr. Gandhi said the resolution was to have been moved by Mr. C. F. Andrews, who, however, was unable to be present on account of an operation having been performed on him. He moved the resolution on behalf of Mr. Andrews who had also asked him to read to them the speech he had prepared for the occasion.

Mr. Gandhi then read Mr. Andrews’ speech. . . .\(^2\)

Mr. M. K. Gandhi moved the following resolution:

This meeting requests the Government of India to publish all the correspondence between the Fiji Government and itself regarding the recent strike of Indians and the firing that took place in connection with it, and calls upon the Government of India, to provide early facilities for the transport of those Indians in Fiji, who are desirous of returning to India. This meeting protests against the order of the Government of Fiji, deporting without trial, Mr. Manilal Doctor\textsuperscript{1}, who is a barrister of long standing in Fiji, and calls upon the Government to secure an early cancellation of the deportation against him.

Mr. Gandhi, in proposing the resolution, said that the resolution did not deal with the condition of the Indians in Fiji during the period of indenture, which was now happily abolished. Those who wanted to study the question should do so by getting hold of the late Mr. Gokhale’s\textsuperscript{2} speeches in the Imperial Legislative Council on the indenture question and the speeches of the Hon. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya\textsuperscript{3} on the same subject in the same place. Both considerably helped in the great effort to secure the abolition of indentured labour. The status of our countrymen outside India shamefully reminded us that they were pariahs on the Empire. The late Mr. Gokhale used to recall our own treatment of our own people, the pariahs, and used to say that in receiving the treatment that our countrymen did in British dominions, we were perhaps paying the penalty of our continued sin against a fifth of our own countrymen. The resolution before the meeting however dealt with the present conditions of Indians in Fiji, and called upon the Government of India to give an open and accurate account of what was done in Fiji during the India strike and during martial law that followed the strike. It also called upon the Government to provide facilities of transport for those Indians who wished to return from Fiji. A shipment had already arrived. The Hon. Pandit Malaviya was advised of it, and had deputed a representative to meet the unfortunate people who had come here and among whom were nearly 500 lepers. He had seen two of the returned Indians who had given a graphic account of the happenings during martial law. If what they said was true, it was a second edition of Amritsar. India had a right to know the position in Fiji accurately. It was necessary to know the Dyers\textsuperscript{4} and the O’Briens and Bosworth Smiths of Fiji. When the full facts were before the country it might be their painful duty to call for proper justice to be meted out to the wrong-doers.

The resolution also asked for information about the deportation of Mr. and \textsuperscript{1} Son-in-law of Dr. Pranjivan Mehta, an old associate of Gandhiji. He went to Fiji in 1912 to take up public work there; \textit{vide} “Letter to Dr. Pranjivan Mehta”, 24-9-1911.

Mrs. Manilal Doctor. They were the leaders of Fiji. Why were they deported? There was no trial. This deportation was more intolerable than the deportation of Lala Harkishan Lal¹ and his friends. For Pandit Motilal Nehru² and Pandit Malaviya were able to go to the Punjab as soon as possible and replace the Punjab leaders who were imprisoned. Who could replace Mr. and Mrs. Manilal Doctor? The country had a right to demand justice in the matter. Mr. Gandhi recalled the reply that late Sir John Gorst gave in connection with the Manipur expedition years ago. Sir John Gorst was a frank and blunt Under-Secretary of State, and he said in the House of Commons that it was the policy of the British Government in India to cut off tall poppies. Could it be that Mr. and Mrs. Manilal Doctor were tall poppies? It was the duty of India to see that the natural leaders of the people were not, unceremoniously and, without any trial whatsoever, snatched away calmly. In concluding his remarks Mr. Gandhi said that the audience need not consider that the question of South Africa had not been brought before them owing to any neglect on the part of the Imperial Citizenship Association, or that the question of South Africa was of any less importance. The Association was in close touch with the Government of India, and the question had not been brought up because the Asiatic Commission has not yet presented its final report. The country knew the Government of India were anxiously watching the events in South Africa. When the moment came, the Association will, the speaker had no doubt, move the country in the South African question as it had done in the East African and Fiji questions.

28. COUNCILS’ BOYCOTT

Pandit Rambhuj Dutt Chaudhary³ has ranged himself against Lala Lajpat Rai in the matter of the proposed boycott of the Councils. Madras is divided, most of the nationalist leaders seem disinclined to boycott the Councils. The Mahratta has pronounced against it in a well-reasoned article. The reasons for disapproval of boycott are mainly two: (1) If the nationalists refrain, the moderates will get all the seats; (2) since through the legislative councils we have made some progress we are likely to make greater progress by reason of larger

³ A leader of the Punjab and a poet, who along with his wife, Saraladevi Chaudhrani, took a leading part in the public affairs of the Punjab powers having been granted to popular representatives.

Now the first reason hardly does credit to a great popular party. If it is harmful to enter the Councils, why should nationalists be jealous of the moderates entering the Councils? Must they participate in the harm because moderates will not refrain? Or, is it contended that the harm can be avoided only if all join the boycott? If the last is the contention it betrays ignorance of the principles of boycott. We boycott an institution because we do not like it or because we do not wish to co-operate with its conductors. In the matter of the Councils the latter is the deciding reason. And I submit that in a sense we co-operate by joining even though the object is obstruction. Most institutions, and a British legislative council most of all, thrive upon obstruction. The disciplined obstruction of the Irish members made practically no impression upon the House of Commons. The Irishmen have not got the Home Rule they wanted. The Mahratta argues that obstruction would be active and aggressive non-co-operation. I venture to deny it. In my opinion it shows want of faith in yourself, i.e., in your doctrine. You doubt and you perish. I do not believe that either the English or the moderate leaders can possibly contemplate with equanimity a nationalist boycott of the Councils. We are now face to face with the reality. Will a single moderate leader care to enter any council if more than half his electorate disapproved of his offering himself as a candidate at all? I hold that it would be unconstitutional for him to do so, because he will not represent his constituency. Boycott contemplated by me presupposes a most active discipline and watchful propaganda and it is based on the assumption that the electors themselves will prefer complete to an incomplete boycott in the form of obstruction. If it is assumed that the people themselves do not want a complete boycott it would be the duty of those who believe in it to educate the electorates to appreciate the superiority of boycott over obstruction. To enter the councils is to submit to the vote of the majority, i.e., to co-operate. If then we want to stop the machinery of Government, as we want to, until we get justice in the khilafat and the Punjab matters, we must put our whole weight against the Government and refuse to accept the vote of the majority in the council, because it will neither represent the wish of the country nor our own which is more to the point on a matter of principle. A minister who refuses to serve is better than one who serves under protest. Service under protest shows that the situation is not intolerable. I contend that the situation created by the Government has become intolerable and therefore the only course left open to a self-respecting person is non-co-operation, i.e., complete abstention. General Botha\(^1\) refused to enter Lord Milner’s\(^2\) Council, because he utterly disapproved of the principle that governed Lord Milner in dealing with the Boers. And General Botha succeeded because he had practically the whole of the Transvaal behind him. Politically considered, success depends upon the country accepting the boycott movement. Religiously considered success is there for the individual as soon as he has \textit{acted} upon the principle he holds and his action has ensured national success because he has laid the foundation by showing the straightest way to it.

The other argument is that we shall succeed by entering the new Councils because we have after all not done quite so badly in having entered less popular bodies before. The answer to the objection is that the dividing line had not then been reached, we had not lost confidence in British honesty and justice or we had not confidence in ourselves then to carry boycott to the successful end or we had not thought of the method in the way we are doing today. Probably all the three reasons operate today. After all, manners and methods change with the times. We must grow with our years. What was good enough food for our babyhood cannot be good enough for manhood.

29. THE LAW OF MAJORITIES

Mrs. Besant\(^1\) having read a report of my speech at the Punjab meeting organized by the Home Rule League and the National Union, Bombay, and having therein seen that I had moved the resolution asking for the prosecution of General Dyer and the impeachment of Sir Michael O’Dwyer, asks how I could move a resolution whose terms I had not approved. Mr. Shastriar\(^2\) has also felt uneasy about the same act. I have not seen any report of my speech. I am unable to say therefore whether I am correctly reported. My speech was in Gujarati and may have suffered at the hands of the translating reporter. I shall endeavour to explain my own position independently of the reports of my speech. And I do so gladly because I recognize that the principle raised by the two great leaders is very important.

I have often been charged with having an unyielding nature. I have been told that I would not bow to the decision of the majority. I have been accused of being autocratic. Now on the occasion of the Punjab meeting, I was pressed to move a resolution which did not commend itself to me. I undertook to do so reserving to myself the right to expressing emphatic opinion to the contrary. And I did so. I have never been able to subscribe to the charge of obstinacy or autocracy. On the contrary I pride myself on my yielding nature in non-vital matters. I detest autocracy. Valuing my freedom and independence I equally cherish them for others. I have no desire to carry a single soul with me, if I cannot appeal to his or her reason. My unconventionality I carry to the point of rejecting the divinity of the oldest Shastras if they cannot convince my reason. But I have found by experience that if I wish to live in society and still retain my independence, I must limit the points of utter independence to matters of first rate importance. In all others which do not involve a departure from one’s personal religion or moral code, one must yield to the majority. In the case in question I had an opportunity of illustrating my position. Of my so-called unyielding nature the country had abundant illustration. It was happy to find a great occasion where I could safely yield. I believe still that the country wrong in asking for General Dyer’s prosecution and Sir Michael O’Dwyer’s impeachment. That is purely the business of the British. My purpose is to secure the removal of the wrongdoers from any office under the Crown. Nothing I have seen since has altered my view. And I pressed it before the very meeting at which I moved the resolution in question.

Yet I moved it because there is nothing immoral in asking for General Dyer’s prosecution. The country has the right to demand it. The Congress Sub-committee has advised that waiver of that right can only do good to India. I thought therefore that I had my position quite clear, namely that I still opposed the idea of prosecution and yet I had no objection in moving the resolution that involved prosecution because it was not bad or harmful per se.

I admit however that during the crisis we are passing through, my moving the resolution was a dangerous experiment. For, whilst we are evolving new codes of public conduct and trying to instruct, influence or lead the masses, it is not safe to do anything that is likely to confuse the mass mind or to appear to be “truckling to the multitude”. I believe that at the present moment it is better to be “dubbed” obstinate and autocratic than even to appear to be influenced by the multitude for the sake of its approbation. Those who claim to lead the masses must resolutely refuse to be led by them, if we want to avoid mob law and desire ordered progress for the country. I believe that mere protestation of one’s opinion and surrender to the mass opinion is not only not enough but in matters of vital importance, leaders must act contrary to the mass of opinion if it does not commend itself to their reason.

30. GENERAL DYER

The Army Council has found General Dyer guilty of error of judgment and advised that he should not receive any office under the Crown. Mr. Montagu\(^1\) has been unsparing in his criticism of General Dyer’s conduct. And yet somehow or other I cannot help feeling that General Dyer is by no means the worst offender. His brutality is unmistakable. His abject and unsoldier-like cowardice is apparent in every line of his amazing defence before the Army Council. He has called an unarmed crowd of men and children—mostly holiday-makers—“a rebel army”. He believes himself to be the saviour of the Punjab in that he was able to shoot down like rabbits men who were penned in an enclosure. Such a man is unworthy of being considered a soldier. There was no bravery in his action. He ran no risk. He shot without the slightest opposition and without warning. This is not an “error of judgment”. It is paralysis of it in the face of fancied danger. It is proof of criminal incapacity and heartlessness. But the fury that has been spent upon General Dyer is, I am sure, largely misdirected. No doubt the shooting was “frightful”, the loss of innocent life deplorable. But the slow torture, degradation and emasculation that followed was much worse, more calculated, malicious and soul killing, and the actors who performed the deeds deserve greater condemnation than General Dyer for the Jallianwala Bagh massacre. The latter merely destroyed a few bodies but the others tried to kill the soul of a nation. Who ever talks of Colonel Frank Johnson\(^2\) who was by far the worst offender? He terrorized guiltless Lahore, and by his merciless orders set the tone to the whole of the martial law officers. But what I am concerned with is not even Colonel Johnson. The first business of the people of the Punjab and of India is to rid the service of Colonel O’Brien, Mr. Bosworth Smith, Rai Shri Ram and Mr. Malik Khan. They are still retained in the service. Their guilt is as much proved as that of General Dyer. We shall have failed in our duty if the condemnation pronounced upon General Dyer produces a sense of satisfaction and the obvious duty of purging the administration in the Punjab is neglected. That task will not be performed by platform rhetoric or resolutions merely. Stern action is required on our part if we are to make any headway with ourselves and make any impression upon the officials that they are not to consider themselves as masters of the people but as their trustees and servants who cannot hold office if they misbehave themselves and prove unworthy of the trust reposed in them.

31. UNCANNY

There is something uncanny about the repatriation scheme of South Africa.¹ I had never dreamt that the interim report had the slightest connection with the Indians' Relief Act of 1914². I have now read the full text of that Act and had a discussion with Mr. Andrews also. Till the latter drew my attention to the fact, I had even forgotten that there was a section³ in the Act itself regarding the granting of free passages against forfeiture of domicile. The Government *communique*⁴ confirms Mr. Andrews' information.

What puzzles me is the fact that it has been found at all necessary to have an interim report in order to enforce the free passage section of the Relief Act. That section takes the place of the several sections of different Acts of the Natal legislation repealed by the Act. These sections provided for the grant of free passage to those who were under liability to pay the £3 tax, if the latter wanted to escape the payment of the tax or re-indenture. The section in question though designed to affect these people was made generally applicable. But the debate in the Assembly made perfectly clear the scope of the section. The contention at the time was that those who paid the £3 tax really did not become domiciled, and if after they ceased to pay the tax, they wanted to take advantage of the free passage section, they should forfeit the right of domicile which was at that time considered to be an equitable settlement of the very hotly debated question of the removal of a tax which had been in vogue for nearly twenty years.

² Vide “The Indian’s Relief Act, 1914”, before 30-6-1914.
⁴ Reproduced in Young India, 14-7-1920
The interim report somewhat alters the scope of the section, but I am personally not afraid because the section requires a written application for a free passage which is a difficult thing to obtain from any Indian in Natal, and it can only happen in the case of those indentured Indians who having become free are at the present moment unable to support themselves. Not many Indians are likely to take advantage of the section and forfeit their domicile; at the same time I cannot help feeling that an illegitimate use is being attempted to be made of the section that was designed not to meet cases of poverty but to meet cases of doubtful domicile. It is against my idea of right that a Government should take advantage of distress of men and seek to deprive them of a precious right. It would be better not to issue the scheme under unequal conditions. However I derive satisfaction from the fact that in spite of the machinery that is being set up not many Indians would take the doubtful advantage of the scheme.

32. A SUPERINTENDENT’S ORDER

Mr. Gandhi writes to the Press:

The Hon’ble Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya has handed to me an order signed by Mr. F. A. Heron, the Superintendent of Police, Gujranwala (Punjab). The Panditji has given it to me for publication with such criticism as I could offer out of my experience of the Gujarnwala district, the whole of which I visited during my stay in the Punjab. The order is dated the 5th June, 1919. It may be recalled that Superintendent Heron it was who directed the firing when one of the railway bridges was set fire to by a Gujranwala crowd on the 14th April, 1919. Here is the order in question:

June 5, 1919

TO

THE SUB-INSPECTOR OF POLICE

It is now practically certain that martial law will be taken off in this district, from those towns upon which it is still in force, in a few days. The result of this will be that only those cases actually at the time of removal of martial law then under trial before the Martial Law Commissions will be allowed to continue to be tried under martial law.

1 This appeared as a letter to the Press in The Bombay Chronicle, 15-7-1920.
All other cases whether under investigation or under trial before a Summary court will have to be dropped and can then only be tried under the ordinary law. This will mean greatly prolonging these cases as under the ordinary law cases will proceed slowly in court and there will be appeals, etc. It is therefore imperative that all cases now ready for trial in the Summary courts should be sent up for trial immediately and that all cases still under investigation which can be completed rapidly should be completed immediately and sent up for trial. In this district so far the police have sent up comparatively few cases for trial and so there must be many persons who are guilty and against whom there is proof available who should be sent for trial without delay.

Great efforts must now be made to complete all pending cases at once. Identification parades should be held immediately and every endeavour must be made to call up new witnesses, etc., who can help in proving the guilt of the accused.

Proper attention has not so far been paid to securing the arrests of absconders. This must now be done. Constables, safedposhes, etc. should now be sent out immediately after absconders and every effort made to capture them at once. It is not sufficient merely to send a ruqua to some police stations for their arrests.

I need not impress upon my officers the great necessity of completing their cases at once and of getting a sufficient number of accused dealt with before martial law is removed. This district in point of view of numbers sent up for trial is far behind other districts and this naturally arouses criticisms in the efficiency and energy shown by the police here. Something can still be done to improve matters and if all my officers put their hearts into the work there is no reason why the reputation of all the investigating staff here should suffer in comparison with those who have investigated in Lahore and Amritsar, but should the numbers sent up for trial continue so small, all concerned will undoubtedly not receive the qadar and respect they are in some instances entitled to.

F. A. Henon
SUPERINTENDENT OF POLICE

Scores of witnesses in the district gave evidence before the Congress Sub-committee that during the last days of martial law, batches after batches of prisoners were hurried to the Summary courts so called. The presiding officers sat late at night and without even examining defence witnesses condemned absolutely innocent men to varying terms of imprisonment. One of the officers who thus conducted trials was Colonel O’Brien, and the other was Mr. Bosworth Smith. The order reproduced above adds emphasis to the evidence recorded by the Congress Committee and throws a lurid light on the way in which prosecutions took place. And it was in this summary and hasty manner that men who were absolutely innocent of any crime were harassed and imprisoned at Akalgarh, Ramanagar and other places, and still these officials retain their offices and the power of doing evil.

33. SPEECH AT JULLUNDUR

July 15, 1920

In a short Hindustani speech he explained fully what non-co-operation meant.

As far as the Mussulmans were concerned . . . all my Mohammedan friends and brothers including Ulmas who command the respect of the whole of India assured me that no believing Muslim could give any help to a Government which had disregarded the religious obligation and occupied sacred places of Islam in spite of their earnest protestations. The Punjab affair is common to both Hindus and Muslims, and even if there were no khilafat question this alone would have given sufficient ground for withholding co-operation from a Government which finally has refused to accept the very modest recommendations of the Congress Committee.

He appealed to all to accept the movement and work it for gaining complete freedom of faith and establishing the good name of the country. He requested the ladies present to take to spinning again as of yore and encourage the weavers to ply their old trade again.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 21-7-1920
34. SPEECH ON NON-CO-OPERATION, AMRITSAR

July 16, 1920

Mr. Gandhi, who on rising was most enthusiastically cheered, stated, he found it impossible to express adequately the pain he felt for the Punjab wrong. He would only ask Punjab Hindus and Mussulmans never to forget that fateful day\(^2\) of April 1919. Whilst he said he wanted to emphasize that the people were also in the wrong, even as the authorities had been, the difference being one of degree. Whilst they had committed a few pound of wrong the authorities were guilty of tons of wrong. But as long as the least amount of wrong had been done by people they should be prepared for hundreds of Jallianwalas and he would not be satisfied by them until people had not the slightest share in violence. When however the wrong was fully Government's, conditions would soon be changed. He would then ask the whole people to stand free and have nothing to do with a Government that outrages their sense of self-respect and honour. Speaking of the Punjab, Mr. Gandhi said he could not but confess to a sense of feeling that, however noted the Punjabis were for their bravery, they had not played well their part in April last. They were terrified, their spirit was broken. He had not the slightest doubt about this. For how else could they consent to such inhumanities as crawling like reptiles rubbing their noses against the ground.\(^3\) How, if they had any sense of self-respect, if they felt that they were men, could they thus consent to be pulled down from man's state. If they had a sense of their manhood, of their self-respect and honour they should have willingly faced death rather than tamely accept such dishonours. But he was not there to cavil at the Punjab. His mortal frame was made of the same stuff as that of Punjabis. He was not sure that his spirit would remain unbroken under similar circumstances. He would only pray that he should never submit to such indignities even if he was faced with death as the only alternative. They were looking forward to the Hunter Committee\(^4\) to end the scandal of these indignities by meeting out proper punishment to the miscreants, but their hopes were in vain and the Punjab wrong was now added to the khilafat wrong. He was sure that they could not get these wrongs righted by an appeal to passions. They could only get them righted by steps coolly and deliberately considered. One sovereign step was non-co-operation. He then explained to them the different stages of non-co-operation and said that if the first of August passed off as a peaceful day of general protest all over India they would be laying a sure foundation of success. In case of violence the movement would automatically come to a standstill. He would most earnestly appeal to them to act truthfully and bravely as the true soldier who prides himself on nobly laying down his life. It is possible, added Mr. Gandhi, many there assembled and many Mussulmans in India for that matter did not readily know what a grave affront had been put upon Islam by the Turkish peace terms. They would have to be shown that by a careful propaganda which was a matter of some time. But as to the scandal of the Punjab, as to the indignities offered by Mr. Bosworth Smith, by Col. O’Brien, by Shri Ram and Malik Khan there was no question of ignorance. They were common ground between all parties and personally known to most of them, and so long as these officers continued to be in the Punjab how could they call themselves men, how could they claim to have any sense of self-respect or honour? They may know nothing about the khilafat question, but the Jallianwala Bagh was engraved ineffaceably in their hearts.

At this stage Mr. Gandhi asked the audience if Mr. Ghulam Jalani\(^1\) was present there—Mr. Ghulam Jalani, the brutalities inflicted on whom no one could forget. The speaker was told that he had gone on \textit{hijrat}\(^2\). Mr. Gandhi said he had honourably left the country, but he had also left his brethren responsible to God to vindicate his honour. Would, then, Punjab do nothing to vindicate that honour? The only remedy before them was non-co-operation. That was the most natural remedy. It was impossible to expect men to co-operate with Government by sitting in its councils and law-courts. How, he was often asked, would they be to maintain themselves if they gave up service under Government, if they gave up their callings which were their only means of livelihood? The speaker was sure that so long as God had given them hands and feet they could surely trust the giver of those hands and feet to hold them. He was not prepared to believe that the whole of Muslim India was prepared for general \textit{hijrat}, but he was confident that they could offer non-co-operation and that they must. They should for ever bear the fact in mind that without this co-operation the machinery of Government would not go on for a single day.

\(^2\) Self-imposed exile, from the Prophet’s flight from Mecca to Medina, 622 A.D.
He explained to them the importance of the observance of the first of August and exhorted them to observe the day in a dignified and in a peaceful manner. He was not prepared to discuss the question of the boycott of councils, as, he said, he was not prepared to create a breach between the people and the leaders. He would leave the people to local leaders. As for himself he had not the slightest doubt that the boycott of councils was an essential step in non-co-operation and he would continue to preach it from his quarters in Bombay. In conclusion Mr. Gandhi emphasized what to his mind was the essence of swadeshi, viz. restricting oneself to the use of hand-woven cloth made out of hand-spun Indian cotton. The bearing of swadeshi on khilafat lay, said the speaker, in the people being able to convince thereby the Englishmen that a nation could do without them for so essential a commodity as cloth and could be independent to that extent. The moment they were so convinced they would be prepared to stand by India in winning the justice she demanded.

A little discussion of the question arising out of the recent Peshawar incident, especially, the one as to what should be done in future for the safe passage of the mahajarin\(^1\) terminated the proceedings.

35. SPEECH ON KHILAFAT AND NON-CO-OPERATION, LAHORE

July 17, 1920

A public meeting of the citizens of Lahore was held outside Delhi Gate on Saturday the 17th July, 1920, under the presidency of Pandit Rambhuj Dutt.

Mr. Gandhi, who on rising to address the meeting received a tremendous ovation, speaking in Hindi, said that he would say only a few words. They were all grieved to hear what M. Zafar Ali Khan\(^2\) had told them about the Peshawar incident. There was nothing to shed tears about. He had heard some people weeping during the speech. It they wished to settle the khilafat question, they should give up weeping. They were fighting not against one Empire but against Christendom. The Europeans were clever, skilful, shrewd and versed in the use of arms. They were also self-sacrificing. In the late War, every English family had given at least one man. He reminded them of the example of their Viceroy whose son was killed in the war, but who outwardly did not grieve even for a single day. In God’s work, they ought to be self-sacrificing and they were not to weep. Even though there was bloodshed they should be patient. If they succeeded in killing a few Europeans they would gain nothing. People in Europe would laugh at him if he were to go there to preach non-co-operation. But physical power was not the only thing in the world. The Europeans were skilled in warfare. In the old days if a man had a sword in hand, he would not fight unless his adversary had a similar sword in his hands. Now they had bombs, aeroplanes and firearms.

It was not courageous to kill a few Europeans. If, on the other hand, some of them stood at a place and refused to move further at any cost, that was real courage. They were to give blood but not to take it. In this way alone would the khilafat question be settled. The speaker had consulted the Ulemas. If his hearers too believed that non-co-operation was a form of jehad they should follow it. They should give up councillorships and even posts like those of cooks, etc. The khilafat was a religious question and if they really grieved over it, they should be self-sacrificing. Regarding hijrat, the speaker advised them to stay in the country and bear and face all the trial. Would they die for councillorships and titles or for God?

In the Punjab, there was first the calamity which befell them the previous year and secondly, worse men than Dyer and O’Dwyer, men like O’Brien, Bosworth Smith, Shri Ram and Malik Sahib Khan were still in office. Were the people prepared to go to the council and send their children to the schools under such circumstances? Only the deserving got justice from God. They were made to crawl because they deserved it. In Europe even a boy would refuse to do it. Could it be possible that a man who had no ticket should be shot dead? That was so because they had no power. But what kind of power? If they had the strength to suffer, all their difficulties would be solved soon.

After referring to Mr. Montagu’s statement about himself and the remarks of M. Shaukat Ali1 and Pandit Rambhuj Dutt, Mr. Gandhi said that by resorting to violence they would spoil the settlement of the khilafat question. Thousands of Jallianwala Baghs might happen but they were not to be excited. Even if it came to hanging although he did not believe Government would do so, they ought to be ready for the gallows. The speaker was not in the Punjab to render them less courageous. That man who was ready to suffer was more courageous than mere soldiers.

On the first of August they were to have total hartal and prayer but it was to be purely voluntary. A resolution was to be passed. But there were to be no processions nor meetings if the latter were prohibited. They were to obey all orders of police and Government. The speaker then detailed the four stages of non-co-operation as announced by the Central Khilafat Committee, Bombay. In the Punjab, continued Mr. Gandhi, there were more than 50 per cent Muslims and the Hindus would do their duty by the Muslims if they felt for them. Even if Hindus and Sikhs separated from them,

1 1873-1938; nationalist Muslim politician who along with his brother, Maulana Mahomed Ali, took a leading part in the khilafat movement
the Muslims should remember their duty to the God within. There were crores of Muslims in the Punjab. What was that which they could not do if they had courage and self-sacrifice? They could shake the whole of India. To the Hindus, the speaker said that he supported the Muslims and went about with them because they wished to protect the Hindus themselves. If the Hindus wished to live peacefully with the Muslims, the former should help the latter. Several people had told him that the Muslims would desert the Hindus after the khilafat question was decided. From his twenty years’ experience, during which period he had been closely associated with the Muslims, he could say it was false.

He wished to protect the cows by appealing to and increasing love between Hindus and Muslims, and not as a return for support of the khilafat.

In conclusion, Mr. Gandhi referred to the necessity of learning discipline. That morning he had noticed the luggage of a passenger at the railway station being trampled under foot. That had grieved him. They should learn the value of discipline and their volunteers should maintain order on all such occasions. They ought to remain outside the railway station instead of crowding inside. He hoped on the 1st August there would be nothing like noise or disorder. They should work under the directions of their sectional leaders. In that way they would find that the Punjab and the khilafat questions are solved within six months.

Dr. Saifuddin Kitchlew¹ in a brief speech thanked on behalf of the Punjab, Maulana Shaukat Ali and their Guru, Mahatma Gandhi for all that they were doing for them.

It was 12.45 a.m. when the meeting dispersed.

_The Tribune_, 20-7-1920

36. BOYCOTT OF COUNCILS

Steadily and surely non-co-operation is taking shape. The most important programme facing the country now is the boycott of councils. I trust that the people will stand firm and carry it out fully.

Can we ever gain anything from one whose intent is evil, who wants deliberately to do us injustice and who, we are convinced, holds the people in contempt?

I see the whole administration today as a poison-tree. How can we ever expect the _kadvi_ creeper to bear sweet fruit? The important question is: Should we take our seats in the councils to offer constant opposition or boycott the elections altogether? No good fighter is ever beaten by the method of obstruction, and the British are born fighters. And what is this programme of “obstruction”, after all? Making long and stinging speeches, calling the Government names even, and refusing our vote when needed. Those who imagine that the Government can be tired out through such methods have not studied the Constitution. It can, indeed, through such harassment, be made to grant small favours but nothing substantial.

Through all our victories till now, we have hardly achieved anything really worthwhile. The drain on India’s wealth continues. The dread of the military has not lessened a bit. Discrimination between whites and non-whites remains the same as ever. Duplicity has increased, rather than otherwise. Government policy shows no change for the better. Who will say that the relations between the Government and the people are growing healthier day by day?

That being so, what does it avail us if a few Indians have become judges, a few have been taken up on the executive councils, some have become members of legislatures and one Indian has been raised to the peerage? To me, all these things are mere baits. They are opium pills for keeping us slumbering. So long as justice is not done, any honour conferred by the British is, in fact, an insult. Why do we not see this very simple thing?

I am hoping for great things from the whole of India but, I believe, I have a right to expect even greater things from Gujarat. I do hope that Gujarat will make a leading contribution in this programme.

The people of Gujarat are known to be clear-headed. They are shrewd calculators. The calculations I have placed before them are simple enough. How can we walk in mud and not be defiled? While the administration remains tainted with injustice, I look upon legislatures as so much mud.

Ireland gained absolutely nothing through the policy of harassment and obstruction; and, remember, it had an able leader like Parnell to fight for it. In despair, it has now taken to the method of violence. This also, I believe, is a mistake. I have cited the instance of Ireland only to show that obstruction leads nowhere. General Botha in South Africa had to choose one of the two courses: either to enter the legislature and agitate for justice there or to boycott it completely. He chose the latter course and won. He got the constitution of his choice and became the Prime Minister of a free people.

Boycott of councils will advance the country. The people will get a good lesson in discipline and the burden of carrying on the administration will fall entirely on the Government. I am convinced that, if only the educated people resist the bait [of the councils] and refuse, as a matter of duty, the seeming benefits the Government may offer, the latter cannot run its administration for a moment. A government always functions through the implicit consent of the people. It simply cannot function when the people oppose it outright. A government generally rules its subjects not by fear but by cajolery. The sanction of fear is there, of course, but to be used in the last resort. There is some justice, but only enough to maintain the Government in being. We get a measure of justice because justice is the best policy. We, on the other hand, demand that justice, and nothing but justice, be done though the heavens fall.

And it is to get this principle accepted that we talk of bringing about a change of heart on the part of the officials. To succeed in this we have to prove to them that we are their equals. A man can attain equality with another through physical or moral force. Equality attained by means of physical force is of the lower kind, it is the way of the beast; for the Hindu, especially, it is a policy ever to be shunned. For thousands of years past, our training has been in a different direction altogether. It is my firm belief that the British can be won over by moral force. I have, indeed, written strongly and bitterly against the injustices perpetrated by British officers but I believe, all the same, that no European nation is more amenable to the pressure of moral force than the British; and a purposeful sacrifice by way of boycott of councils is but the application of a token moral force. It is a sacrifice which is easy to make and yet very effective, since it is to be made by men who will be fit to be people’s representatives.

37. DUTY OF WOMEN

At a meeting held under the presidency of that good lady Mrs. Jaiji Jehangir Petit, the women of Bombay have given expression to their view on the atrocities committed in the Punjab. The meeting has served two purposes. In the first place, the women have joined the country in her suffering and understood what that suffering is. Women ought not to remain unconcerned in the face of such atrocities. They cannot afford to keep silent when events happen which deprive women of their womanhood and men of their manhood. It is not men alone who have been humiliated in the Punjab. Women, too, have been humiliated. That arrogant officer, Mr. Bosworth Smith, left nothing undone in disgracing women in Manianwala in the Punjab. In holding the meeting, therefore, the women of Bombay have done nothing more than their duty. I hope the women of Gujarat, too, will hold similar meetings in the principal cities of the province and pass appropriate resolutions.

Women cannot disown such duties thinking that they are but weak creatures. The soul can never be described as weak; it is the body which may be so described. Even a little girl who has, and knows that she has, a soul of shining purity can stand up to an overbearing Englishman, six-and-a-half foot tall. A woman conscious of her dignity as woman sheds lustre on her womanhood through soul-force. The woman who, knowing that she is weak in body, becomes weak [in mind] cannot do this. Our shastras tell us how Sītā, Druṣpādi and other women filled the wicked with awe. Just as the strength of an elephant’s body is unavailing before the power of human intelligence, so also a man’s intellectual and physical strength is quite helpless before the soul-force either of a man or a woman.

I, therefore, want the women of India not to believe themselves weak and give up their right and privilege of protecting their progeny. It is sheer ignorance to call woman weak, woman who has been the mother of mighty heroes like Hanumān. Maybe she has been so called simply in order to impress upon the male his duty towards her, to tell him that, being physically the stronger, he must not be a monster and, in his pride, oppress woman who is weak, but that, on the contrary, he must do her service by protecting her and providing her with the means through which she may cultivate strength of soul.

Victims of the illusion that this is an age of sheer physical power, we feel perplexed and puzzled and wonder what the weak and miserable people of India can do. Thinking thus, even our menfolk feel themselves quite as helpless as women. If only the country realized that this is not true at all! The day the people of India come to have self-respect, they will be strong and no General Dyer will then remain in the country.

How may we acquire such strength? No elaborate training is necessary. We have only to put our trust in God and stop being afraid of anybody’s physical strength. The physically strong have at the most, the power of destroying our body. When we shed all fear for the safety of our body, we become lions among men. Real power, therefore, consists not in having the physical strength of a giant but in strength of mind, knowledge of the Self and freedom from the fear of death.

38. SWADESHI

I request readers to reflect over what I wrote about pure swadeshi.¹ The news² about the spinning-wheel published in today’s Navajivan will not fail to fill every lover of swadeshi with enthusiasm.

I want to give here some more information which the women of Gujarat, especially, should ponder over.

The Hon’ble Panditji³, giving the information, in the course of an appeal for donations for the Hindu University, that it had been decided to work there for promoting the cause of swadeshi and to install looms, said that even some rani’s in Indian States had agreed to learn spinning. He declared, amidst cheers, that his mind would not be at peace till the ruling princes in the country started weaving.

Why did Panditji say this? He knows that India’s economic freedom depends on the spinning-wheel and the hand-loom, and that, without economic freedom, the very hope of freedom of any other kind is futile or, in the alternative, we should follow England in her round-about methods in order to achieve such freedom.

This same thought has induced Dr. Manekbai Bahadurji to learn spinning and she does a little of it every day. Dr. Manekbai is the wife of a former Advocate-General of Bombay, and daughter of the late renowned Dr. Atmaram Sagun. She has been keeping indifferent health for the past few years. Even at present she is weak. She has decided [all the same] to spin every day during her spare time.

And now Atia Begum¹ and the Begum of Janjira have undertaken to learn spinning.

In the Punjab, Shrimati Saraladevi has been devoting all her time to swadeshi. She says in her latest letter that she had been to Amritsar and set the wives of Shri Ratanchand and Bugga Chau-dhri, who are in jail, on this work, as also Ratandevi, who had cried the whole night over her husband’s dead body in her lap. She has formed a committee there and opened a class to teach spinning to women. In Ludhiana, too, she called a meeting of the women and started this work. We do not know how long this work will go on, but experience teaches us that, while there remains one true worker, any work once begun never stops.

Just now people are increasingly taking to wearing cloth made from hand-spun yarn. It is necessary, at this time, that the women of Gujarat start working. They have ability enough but lack the will. To work for clothing the naked is no ignoble occupation. The scarcity of cloth in India cannot be fully overcome until women start spinning.

_39. LETTER FROM A READER_²

I gladly publish this letter³. I have heard many such objections but I have my reply to them. Who are we to point out its duty to Bengal? It will realize its duty in course of time. But may it not be that each province has its distinctive sphere of service? If Bengal has not contributed in money, it has done so in learning. What Gujarat has done does not seem surprising. Gujarat has much; it knows how to give liberally and does so. Bengal does not know giving and does not give. But is not the very fact that the Poet is in need of money sufficient to show that Bengal has not recognized his worth fully? Should we, on that account, refuse to help him? It is true that our appreciation of the Poet cannot be expressed in terms of money, but this does not mean, either, that we have no obligation to help him. It means, rather, that we cannot give him enough. It is my emphatic view that, after having specially invited the Poet, what Gujarat gave him was too little. The reference to a “taunt”, therefore, is irrelevant. It is just because, in the past, Gujarat has often done its duty that a beggar like myself expects it to do it again on other appropriate occasions. It is not the Poet who stands begging. It is I who drew Gujarat’s attention to its duty in view of the condition of Shantiniketan and after reading the account given by Mr. Andrews. As I write this reply, I learn that from Bombay Rs. 10,000 have been received for Shantiniketan. The amount was collected soon after the Poet’s visit there and so the immediate need has been met. All the same, those who see reason in my appeal should not drop the idea of sending their contributions.

40. SPEECH ON BOYCOTT OF COUNCILS, LAHORE

July 18, 1920

A prolonged informal conference was held on July 18, 1920, when the question of the boycott of reformed councils as a protest against the Punjab martial law atrocities and khilafat settlement was discussed.

Mr. Gandhi said with Indians, non-participation in the councils was a matter of national honour and self-respect and no self-respecting Indian could participate until martial law delinquents were punished. He said the English people were a high-souled race but unfortunately they had been weaned away from the teaching of Jesus Christ by the theories of Bentham, Darwin and other materialistic writers. If Indians wanted to be partners with Englishmen, they had got to cultivate virtues of self-respect and honour, qualities which alone appealed to Englishmen and they should not be subservient weaklings.

Incidentally, Mr. Gandhi said knowing as he did the agriculturists of his country and their love and attachment to home and homestead lands, he thought the consequences of non-payment of taxes might bring them into collision with the authorities. He did not therefore advise them to have recourse to non-payment of taxes which was the last stage in his programme.

41. LETTER TO MAGANLAL GANDHI

[After July 18, 1920]

CHI. MAGANLAL,

I am simply in love with the spinning-wheel and with Kale. You too, should keep thinking about this, and this alone, all the time. You may now entrust the making of the block of the spinning-wheel and of Kale’s photograph to Anandanand. Get to know him personally, too. Collect some facts about Kale’s life. What have been his studies? Take out the patent of the spinning-wheel on your name. If Kale agrees, name the spinning-wheel “Gangabai Spinning-wheel”. He wants it to be named after himself. If that is still his wish, name it accordingly. Inscription the name and other particulars on the spinning-wheel in Devnagari and Urdu scripts. Do not delay the application for the patent. The Trust has not gone out of my mind.

Thursday [After July 18, 1920]

CHI. MAGANLAL,

The more I think about the spinning-wheel, the more I fall in love with Kale’s handiwork. Take care of his health, and also get from him [designs for] machines to prepare slivers, etc.

Inform Chhotalal that Vitthaldas will soon ask for all the khadi to be sent to him. Keep back the samples in which the warp and the woof are both of hand-spun yarn.

Attend to Ramjibhai. He is a fine man. Keep these 18 rupees with you and credit the sum to his account. Send him yarn against it and ask him to weave pieces of greater width. He will do so. We should now have khadi of such width, in which both the warp and the woof are of hand-yarn. If you do not get spinning done in

43. SPEECH AT RAWALPINDI

July 19, 1920

If the Hindus understand that the seven crore Muslims are their fellow-countrymen and that they will not be able to live at enmity with them, they will see that it is their greatest duty to live with the Muslims and die with them. I do not want clapping of hands, I do not want big gatherings, I ask for action. If the Hindus, forgetting their duty, do not join in making sacrifices, I shall tell them that some day even their religion will be in peril just as Islam is today. Ministers of the Allied nations in Europe think that they can drive away the Muslims from Europe; likewise, they may want to enslave the Hindus. It behoves us, for the freedom of India, to stand by our Muslim friends so long as, loyal to their faith and religion, they are ready to make sacrifices . . .

I have known Muslims for the last 30 years. I honour my Muslim friends who are capable of acting with courage, of being brave. I have also observed, however, that they have often done mighty deeds in the heat of anger, and that, when the anger subsides, their strength vanishes. If we are to make sacrifices in this struggle, we must match the efficiency of the Empire which we are fighting. The soldiers forget their anger and fight with discipline, with intelligence and courage. If you want to stand against them, you should be intelligent and cultivate courage and discipline. You will not succeed if, in anger, you fail to obey the orders of your leader. Anger has come in the way of securing justice in many a cause. God dispenses justice only to those who possess resourcefulness, courage and the ability to work in the right way and are free from anger. In

This and similar items which follow are extracted from Mahadev Desai’s account of Gandhiji’s tour.
Rawalpindi, Hindus and Muslims are very strong. They have the strength, too, for quarrells [among themselves]. I request them to acquire the strength to make sacrifices. The sacrifice, I repeat, is not of the kind involved in drawing the sword. Muslims are brave at it. I compliment them on this, but I should like to make them see that, if they would have the strength to employ the sword, they must also have the strength to give up their life. The Punjabis know how to draw the sword, but I call their sword mercenary. One cannot intimidate anybody with such a sword. Your sword is unavailing against anyone who can employ his more skilfully than you, and the moment you lose your grip over the sword you stand helpless. I have found a way by which you can fight while keeping your swords sheathed. It seems to me that you will face defeat if you use your swords; not only that, but your swords will be turned against you people, men and women alike. If you want to understand the beauty of non-co-operation, follow my advice. I do not claim to know the holy Koran, but your own Ulemas say that non-co-operation is a strong form of jehad. One may have to die whether drawing the sword or employing non-co-operation. Why, then, should you not sacrifice yourselves by adopting non-co-operation which does not involve the taking of another’s life?

I have heard that in Peshawar, people have got excited, are boiling over, because of the outrage on the muhajarin. I think the latter were not at fault; it is the British soldiers who were to blame. But even in the face of such misdeeds, we shall have to have patience, bow our heads. If you resolve that rivers of blood may flow that you will not forsake manliness, will not be provoked and will continue courageously, making sacrifices, your success is assured. . . .

Real non-co-operation will be possible if you understand the principle that it consists in breaking off our ties with the Government. . . .

If such persons [title-holders] do not have the requisite strength and sincerity, I shall leave aside highly-placed officials and tell others, even the butlers, that to cook for Government servants is tantamount to helping this tyrannical Government in its tyranny. . . .

I shall ask the soldiers to leave the army but not to turn their arms subsequently against the enemy. I ask them, rather to become soldiers without swords, like me. I have nothing by way of physical strength; but nobody, I think, can make me do anything against my will. By and by I will also ask the peasants not to pay revenue, but I tell both the soldiers and the peasants to take no step without instructions. The beauty of our struggle lies in the discipline it requires, and so I shall ask our unarmed, swordless army not to take up their weapons without orders. They will get their orders at the opportune moment. But so long as we are not sure that we can carry the whole of India with us, we will not ask the soldiers or the peasants to do anything. . . .

Why do these people join the army? For money. The money which robs us of our humanity is so much dust. Have you forgotten the black deeds of Bosworth Smith, Johnson, Shri Ram and others? Have you forgotten the crawling on your stomach? I entreat you not to allow yourselves to yield to the temptation of enlisting in the army. Earn your bread by toil, and tell them plainly that you can supply no recruits. Just think of the tremendous effect that will be produced if the Punjab declares this. Which other part has supplied as many recruits as the Punjab has? If the Punjab now refuses to supply any more, let us see who can get them from elsewhere. . . .

I have also been a soldier of the Government, but the time has now come for me to tell it that the kingdom of God is a thousand times dearer to us than its Empire. In that kingdom, we shall be able to preserve our religion, whereas the Empire is founded on injustice and maintains itself by disobeying God. We cannot be loyal to it.

The Punjab was humiliated under martial law, it lost its honour. To be even with the Government for that, tell it that you want to remain its loyal subjects, but that you can do so only if it mends its ways and does justice to the province. Tell it that, till then, you will have no love for it, will have nothing to do with it. . . .

Montagu has said that I have served the country in the past but that now I have lost my head and may have to be arrested, if necessary. I ask you not to lose your balance of mind if they arrest me. You went mad for the sake of Kitchlew. For Satyapal, too, you lost your head, set fire to houses, and killed innocent people. If you love me, you should keep your patience, should they arrest both of us, even if they hang us on the gallows. I know, my heart tells me, that if I were a Prime Minister and were opposed by any person whom I believed to be a mad Gandhi, I would certainly send such a Gandhi to the Andamans. Montagu thinks I am mad; if he believes this honestly and arrests me, where is the cause for anger? If you do not consider me mad, listen to what I say, do what I have asked you to do and go to jail. Where a tyrant reigns, a prison is a palace and a palace a prison. If you have learnt this equation of prison and palace, do as I tell you. If you believe that what I am telling you is only what God tells me through my inner voice, then give me the assurance, I beg you, that you will restrain your passion and will not boil over even if they sentence me. Proclaim to the Government: “You may hang us on the gallows, you may send us to prison, but you will get no co-operation from us. You will get it in jail or on the gallows, but not in the regiments of the army. You will not get it in legislatures or any departments of Government service.”

1 Medical practitioner and Congress leader of the Punjab; deported on April 10, 1919

No bodily strength or learning is required for this training, nor is it necessary to have a body like that of Shaukat Ali. What is required is just the understanding of one principle, and patience. I pray to God that He may fill you with inspiration, grant you strength, so that India may take up this work, forgetting all else. If they succeed in this, Hindus and Muslims will become one another’s slaves and will be able to command the world to desist from treachery and injustice.

44. SPEECH AT MUNICIPAL GARDENS, GUJARKHAN
July 20, 1920

Mahatma Gandhi rose amidst loud cheers and spoke on unity amongst Hindus, Muhammadans and Sikhs on the khilafat question, which he said, was the only way of regaining the sacred places of the Mussulmans from the hands of the non-Muslims. To attain this object sacrifices would have to be made. The Kacha Garhi incident¹ was an example. He enjoined on the audience not to use any sort of violence towards any Englishman. This was not the way to success, nor were they able to oppose the Government in the manner. Their only weapon lay in the unity of Hindus and Mohammedans. If they possessed genuine unity and had firmness of mind, they should tell the Government that as long as khilafat question was not decided to the satisfaction of the Muslims they would keep aloof from the Government. The speaker went on to say that, as already announced by him, the 1st of August should be observed as a day of fasting and hartal, and prayers should be offered in the mosques and temples. The speaker expressed his determination to sympathize with the Muhammadans until such time as the khilafat question was decided in their favour. The Muhammadans were sometimes found to give way to anger and to the use of their swords. This was not needed at the present juncture and was likely to do more harm than good. He next dwelt on non-co-operation with Government, which, he said, should begin on the 1st of August. Government should be definitely told on the 1st of August that since the khilafat question had not been decided in their favour they were no longer prepared to remain faithful. Titles and honorary posts should be given up. Pleaders should cease to practise, as it was better to live on manual labour than to practise in the courts of this Government. Khansamans', too, should give up their employment, as one who serves oppressors partakes in the oppression exercised by them. The councils should also be avoided. If this failed, the speaker would go to the soldiers and tell them that they should not serve a Government regardless of their religious sentiments. If this too failed, he would go to the peasants and ask them not to pay any land revenue to Government. This however, would be resorted to only when he was satisfied of the unity between them.

Mr. Gandhi went on to say that Mr. Montagu was of opinion that the speaker had done his duty, but his Deputy was of opinion that Gandhi had gone mad. The speaker said that he was firm and resolute in his determination and was not afraid of being hanged or deported. He asked the audience not to create any disturbance if he, Shaukat Ali and Dr. Kitchlew were hanged or deported, as they had done on the occasion of the deportation of Dr. Kitchlew and Satyapal last year. He was always ready to help his brethren, whether in jail or outside it. Jail was after all better than freedom under the oppressors. They should regard their own houses as jails and jails as palaces. All that was wanted was firmness of the mind. He set no store by cheering and the holding of large meetings. It was time for practical work. Mahatma Gandhi delivered his lecture while sitting and, as he was somewhat indisposed, he asked leave of the audience when his speech was finished. On this, four Campbellpore men stood up and said they had come to take him to Campbellpore. The Mahatma asked them to come to the place where he was staying.

45. AT THE CALL OF THE COUNTRY

Dr. Sapru delivered before the Khilafat Conference at Allahabad an impassioned address sympathizing with the Mussulmans in their trouble but dissuaded them from embarking on non-co-operation. He was frankly unable to suggest a substitute but was

1 Waiters, attendants at table
2 Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru (1875-1949); statesman and lawyer emphatically of opinion that whether there was a substitute or not, non-co-operation was a remedy worse than the disease. He said further that Mussulmans will be taking upon their shoulders a serious responsibility, if whilst they appealed to the ignorant masses to join them, they could not appeal to the Indian judges to resign and if they did, they would not succeed.

I acknowledge the force of Dr. Sapru’s last argument. At the back of Dr. Sapru’s mind is the fear that non-co-operation by the ignorant people would lead to distress and chaos and would do no good. In my opinion any non-co-operation is bound to do some good. Even the Viceregal door-keeper saying, “Please Sir, I can serve the Government no longer because it has hurt my national honour,” and resigning is a step mightier and more effective than the mightiest speech declaiming against the Government for its injustice.

Nevertheless it would be wrong to appeal to the door-keeper until one has appealed to the highest in the land. And as I propose, if the necessity arose, to ask the door-keepers of the Government to dissociate themselves from an unjust Government, I propose now to address an appeal to the judges and the executive councillors to join the protest that is rising from all over India against the double wrong done to India, on the khilafat and the Punjab questions. In both, national honour is involved.

I take it that these gentlemen have entered upon their high offices not for the sake of emolument, nor I hope for the sake of fame, but for the sake of serving their country. It was not for money, for, they were earning more than they do now. It must not be for fame, for, they cannot buy fame at the cost of national honour. The only consideration that can at the present moment keep them in office must be service of the country.

When the people have faith in the Government, when it represents the popular will, the judges and the executive officials possibly serve the country. But when that Government does not represent the will of the people, when it supports dishonesty and terrorism, the judges and the executive officials by retaining office become instruments of dishonesty and terrorism. And the least therefore that these holders of high offices can do is to cease to become agents of a dishonest and terrorizing Government.

For the judges the objection will be raised that they are above politics, and so they are and should be. But the doctrine is true only in so far as the Government is on the whole for the benefit of the people and at least represents the will of the majority. Not to take part in politics means not to take sides. But when a whole country has one mind, one will, when a whole country has been denied justice, it is no longer a question of party politics, it is a matter of life and death. It then becomes the duty of every citizen to refuse to serve a Government which misbehaves and flouts national wish. The judges are at that moment bound to follow the nation if they are ultimately its servants.

There remains another argument to be examined. It applies to both the judges and the members of the executive. It will be urged that my appeal could only be meant for the Indians and what good can it do by Indians renouncing offices which have been won for the nation by hard struggle. I wish that I could make an effective appeal to the English as well as the Indians. But I confess that I have written with the mental reservation that the appeal is addressed only to the Indians. I must therefore examine the argument just stated. Whilst it is true that these offices have been secured after a prolonged struggle, they are of use not because of the struggle but because they are intended to serve the nation. The moment they cease to possess that quality, they become useless and as in the present case, harmful, no matter how hard earned and therefore valuable they may have been at the outset.

I would submit too to our distinguished countrymen who occupy high offices that their giving up their offices will bring the struggle to a speedy end and would probably obviate the danger attendant upon the masses being called upon to signify their disapproval by withdrawing co-operation. If the title-holders gave up their titles, if the holders of honorary offices gave up their appointments and if the high officials gave up their posts and the would-be councillors boycotted the councils, the Government would quickly come to its sense and give effect to the people’s will. For the alternative before the Government then would be nothing but despotic rule pure and simple. That would probably mean military dictatorship. The world’s opinion had advanced so far that Britain dare not contemplate such dictatorship with equanimity. Thetaking of the steps suggested by me will constitute the peacefullest revolution the world has ever seen. Once the infallibility of non-co-operation is realized, there is an end to all bloodshed and violence in any shape or form.
Undoubtedly a cause must be grave to warrant the drastic method of national non-co-operation. I do say that the affront such as has been put upon Islam cannot be repeated for a century. Islam must rise now or “be fallen” if not for ever, certainly for a century. And I cannot imagine a graver wrong than the massacre of Jallianwala and the barbarity that followed it, the whitewash by the Hunter Committee, the dispatch of the Government of India. Mr. Montagu’s letter upholding the Viceroy and the then Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab, the refusal to remove officials who made of the lives of the Punjabis “a hell” during the martial law period. These acts constitute a complete series of continuing wrongs against India which if India has any sense of honour, she must right at the sacrifice of all the material wealth she possesses. If she does not, she will have bartered her soul for a “mess of pottage”

46. THE MUSIC OF THE SPINNING-WHEEL

Slowly but surely the music of perhaps the most ancient machine of India is once more permeating society. Pandit Malaviyaji has stated that he is not going to be satisfied until the ranis and the maharanis of India spin yarn for the nation, and the ranas and the maharanas sit behind the handlooms and weave cloth for the nation. They have the example of Aurangzeb who made his own caps. A greater emperor—Kabir—was himself a weaver and has immortalized the art in his poems. The queens of Europe before Europe was caught in Satan’s trap, spun yarn and considered it a noble calling. The very words, spinster and wife, prove the ancient dignity of the art of spinning and weaving. “When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then a gentleman” also reminds one of the same fact. Well may Panditji hope to persuade the royalty of India to return to the ancient calling of this sacred land of ours. Not on theclatter of arms depends the revival of her prosperity and true independence. It depends most largely upon reintroduction, in every home, of the music of the spinning-wheel. It gives sweeter music and is more profitable than the execrable harmonium, concertina and the accordion.

---

4 Mystic-poet and saint of medieval India; disciple of Ramananda

Whilst Panditji is endeavouring in his inimitably suave manner to persuade the Indian royalty to take up the spinning-wheel, Shrimati Saraladevi Chaudhrani, who is herself a member of the Indian nobility, has learnt the art and has thrown herself heart and soul into the movement. From all the accounts received from her and others, swadeshi has become a passion with her. She says she feels uncomfortable in her muslin saris and is content to wear her khaddar saris even in the hot weather. Her khaddar saris continue to preach true swadeshi more eloquently than her tongue. She had spoken to audiences in Amritsar, Ludhiana and elsewhere and has succeeded in enlisting the services, for her spinning committee at Amritsar, of Mrs. Ratanchand and Bugga Chaudhri and the famous Ratandevi who during the frightful night of the 13th April despite the curfew order of General Dyer sat, all alone in the midst of the hundreds of the dead and dying, with her dead husband’s cold head in her lap. I venture to tender my congratulations to these ladies. May they find solace in the music of the spinning-wheel and in the thought that they are doing national work. I hope that the other ladies of Amritsar will help Saraladevi in her efforts and that the men of Amritsar will realize their own duty in the matter.

In Bombay the readers are aware that ladies of noted families have already taken up spinning. Their ranks have been joined by Dr. Mrs. Manekbai Bahadurji who has already learnt the art and who is now trying to introduce it in the Sevasadan. Her Highness the Begum Saheba of Janjira and her sister Mrs. Atia Begum Rahman have also undertaken to learn the art. I trust that these good ladies will, having learnt spinning, religiously contribute to the nation their daily quota of yarn.

I know that there are friends who laugh at this attempt to revive this great art. They remind me that in these days of mills, sewing machines or typewriters, only a lunatic can hope to succeed in reviving the rusticated spinning-wheel. These friends forget that the needle has not yet given place to the sewing machine nor has the hand lost its cunning in spite of the typewriter. There is not the slightest reason why the spinning-wheel may not coexist with the spinning mills even as the domestic kitchen coexists with the hotels. Indeed typewriters and sewing machines may go, but the needle and the reed pen will survive. The mills may suffer destruction. The spinning-wheel is a national necessity. I would ask sceptics to go to the many poor homes where the spinning-wheel is again supplementing their slender resources and ask the inmates whether the spinning-wheel has not brought joy to their homes.

Thank God, the reward issued by Mr. Revashanker Jagjiwan bids fare to bear fruit. In a short time India will possess a renovated spinning-wheel—a wonderful invention of a patient Deccan artisan. It is made out of simple materials. There is no great complication about it. It will be cheap and capable of being easily mended. It will give more yarn than the ordinary wheel and is capable of being worked by a five-year old boy or girl. But whether the new machine proves what it claims to be or it does not, I feel convinced that the revival of hand-spinning and hand-weaving will make the largest contribution to the economic and the moral regeneration of India. The millions must have a simple industry to supplement agriculture. Spinning was the cottage industry years ago and if the millions are to be saved from starvation, they must be enabled to reintroduce spinning in their homes, and every village must repossess its own weaver.

47. MR. ANDREWS’ DIFFICULTY

Mr. Andrews whose love for India is equalled only by his love for England and whose mission in life is to serve God, i.e., humanity through India, has contributed remarkable articles to The Bombay Chronicle on the khilafat movement. He has not spared England, France or Italy. He has shown how Turkey has been most unjustly dealt with and how the Prime Minister’s pledge has been broken. He has devoted the last article to an examination of Mr. Mahomed Ali’s letter to the Sultan and has come to the conclusion that Mr. Mahomed Ali’s statement of claim is at variance with the claim set forth in the latest khilafat representation to the Viceroy which he wholly approves.

Mr. Andrews and I have discussed the question as fully as it was possible. He has asked me publicly to define my own position more fully than I have done. His sole object in inviting discussion is to give strength to a cause which he holds as intrinsically just, and to gather round it the best opinion of Europe so that the allied powers and especially England may for very shame be obliged to revise the terms.

I gladly respond to Mr. Andrews’ invitation. I should clear the ground by stating that I reject any religious doctrine that does not appeal to reason and is in conflict with morality. I tolerate unreasonable religious sentiment when it is not immoral. I hold the khilafat claim to be both just and reasonable and therefore it derives greater force because it has behind it the religious sentiment of the Mussulman world.

In my opinion Mr. Mahomed Ali’s statement is unexceptionable. It is no doubt clothed in diplomatic language. But I am not prepared to quarrel with the language so long as it is sound in substance.

Mr. Andrews considers that Mr. Mahomed Ali’s language goes to show that he would resist Armenian independence against the Armenians and the Arabian against the Arabs. I attach no such meaning to it. What he, the whole [sic] Mussulmans and therefore I think also the Hindus resist is the shameless attempt of England and the other powers under cover of self-determination to emasculate and dismember Turkey. If I understand the spirit of Islam properly, it is essentially republican in the truest sense of the term. Therefore if Armenia or Arabia desired independence of Turkey they should have it. In the case of Arabia, complete Arabian independence would mean transference of the khilafat to an Arab chieftain. Arabia in that sense is a Mussulman trust, not purely Arabian. And the Arabs without ceasing to be Mussulman, could not hold Arabia against Muslim opinion. The khalifa must be the custodian of the holy places and therefore also the routes to them. He must be able to defend them against the whole world. And if an Arab chief arose who could better satisfy that test than the Sultan of Turkey, I have no doubt that he would be recognized as the khalifa.

I have thus discussed the question academically. The fact is that neither the Mussulmans nor the Hindus believe in the English ministerial word. They do not believe that the Arabs or the Armenians want complete independence of Turkey. That they want self-government is beyond doubt. Nobody disputes that claim. But nobody has ever ascertained that either the Arabs or the Armenians desire to do away with all connection, even nominal, with Turkey.
The solution of the question lies not in our academic discussion of the ideal position, it lies in an honest appointment of mixed commission of absolutely independent Indian Mussulmans and Hindus and independent Europeans to investigate the real wish of the Armenians and the Arabs and then to come to a modus vivendi whereby the claims of the nationality and those of Islam may be adjusted and satisfied.

It is common knowledge that Smyrna and Thrace including Adrianople have been dishonestly taken away from Turkey and that mandates have been unscrupulously established in Syria and Mesopotamia and a British nominee has been set up in Hedjaj under the protection of British guns. This is a position that is intolerable and unjust. Apart therefore from the questions of Armenia and Arabia, the dishonesty and hypocrisy that pollute the peace terms require to be instantaneously removed. It paves the way to an equitable solution of the question of Armenian and Arabian independence which in theory no one denies and which in practice may be easily guaranteed if only the wishes of the people concerned could with any degree of certainty be ascertained.

48. INDIANS OVERSEAS

The meeting held at the Excelsior Theatre in Bombay to pass resolutions regarding East Africa and Fiji and presided over by Sir Narayan Chandavarkar was an impressive gathering. The Theatre was filled to overflowing. Mr. Andrews’ speech made clear what is needed. Both the political and civil rights of Indians of East Africa are at stake. Mr. Anantani, himself an East African settler, showed in a forceful speech that the Indians were the pioneer settlers. An Indian sailor named Kane directed the celebrated Vasco da Gama to India. He added amid applause that Stanley’s expedition for the search and relief of Dr. Livingstone was also fitted out by Indians. Indian workmen had built the Uganda Railway at much peril to their lives. An Indian contractor had taken the contract. Indian artisans had supplied the skill. And now their countrymen were in danger of being debarred from its use.

1 Vide “Speech on Fiji Affairs, Bombay”, 13-7-1920.
The uplands of East Africa have been declared a Colony and the lowlands a Protectorate. There is a sinister significance attached to the declaration. The Colonial system gives the Europeans larger powers. It will tax all the resources of the Government of India to prevent the healthy uplands from becoming a whiteman’s preserve and the Indians from being relegated to the swampy lowlands.

The question of franchise will soon become a burning one. It will be suicidal to divide the electorate or to appoint Indians by nomination. There must be one general electoral roll applying the same qualifications to all the voters. This principle, as Mr. Andrews reminded the meeting, had worked well at the Cape.

The second part of the East African resolution shows the condition of our countrymen in the late German East Africa. Indian Soldiers fought there and now the position of Indians is worse than under German rule. H. H. the Aga Khan suggested that German East Africa should be administered from India. Sir Theodore Morison would have cooped up all Indians in German East Africa. The result was that both the proposals went by the board and the expected had happened. The greed of the English speculator has prevailed and he is trying to squeeze out the Indian. What will the Government of India protect? Has it the will to do so? Is not India itself being exploited? Mr. Jehangir Petit recalled the late Mr. Gokhale’s views that we were not to expect a full satisfaction regarding the status of our countrymen across the seas until we had put our own house in order. Helots in our own country, how could we do better outside? Mr. Petit wants systematic and severe retaliation. In my opinion, retaliation is a double-edged weapon. It does not fail to hurt the user if it also hurts the party against whom it is used. And who is to give effect to retaliation? It is too much to expect an English Government to adopt effective retaliation against their own people. They will expostulate, they will remonstrate, but they will not go to war with their own Colonies. For the logical outcome of retaliation must mean war, if retaliation will not answer.

Let us face the facts frankly. The problem is difficult alike for Englishmen and for us. The Englishmen and Indians do not agree in the Colonies. The Englishmen do not want us where they can live. Their civilization is different from ours. The two cannot coalesce until there is mutual respect. The Englishman considers himself to belong to the ruling race. The Indian struggles to think that he does not belong to the subject race and in the very act of thinking admits his subjection. We must then attain equality at home before we can make any real impression abroad.

This is not to say that we must not strive to do better abroad whilst we are ill at ease in our own home. We must preserve, we must help our countrymen who have settled outside India. Only if we recognize the true situation, we and our countrymen abroad will learn to be patient and know that our chief energy must be concentrated on a betterment of our position at home. If we can raise our status here to that of equal partners not in name but in reality so that every Indian might feel it, all else must follow as a matter of course.

The question of Fiji is a different proposition, though it too is affected by the same considerations. There it is no longer a question of status. We simply want to know why there was martial law, why there was shooting, why were Mr. and Mrs. Manilal Doctor deported without trial and without even being heard in their defence. The Government have kept us too long waiting. We must insist on full justice being done and we must bring back as speedily as possible all those who wish to return to the motherland.

Young India, 21-7-1920

49. “HIJRAT” AND ITS MEANING

India is a continent. Its articulate thousands know what its inarticulate millions are doing or thinking. The Government and the educated Indians may think that the khilafat movement is merely a passing phase. The millions of Mussulmans think otherwise. The flight of the Mussulmans is growing apace. The newspapers contain paragraphs in out-of-the-way corners informing the readers that a special train containing a barrister with sixty women, forty children including twenty sucklings, all told 765, have left for Afghanistan. They are cheered en route. They were presented with cash, edibles and other things, and were joined by more muhajarin on the way. No fanatical preaching by a Shaukat Ali can make people break up and leave their homes for an unknown land. There must be an abiding faith in them. That it is better for them to leave a State which has no regard for their religious sentiment and face a beggar’s life than to remain in it even though it may be in a princely manner. Nothing but pride of power can blind the Government of India to the scene that is being enacted before it.
But there is yet another side to the movement. Here are the facts as stated in the following Government communique dated 10th instant:

An unfortunate affair in connection with the muhajarin occurred on the 8th instant at Kacha Garhi between Peshwar and Jamrud. The following are the facts as present reported. Two members of a party of the muhajarin proceeding by train to Jamrud were detected by the British military travelling without tickets. Altercation ensued at Islamia College station, but the train proceeded to Kacha Garhi. An attempt was made to evict these muhajarin, whereupon the military police were attacked by a crowd of some forty muhajarin and the British officer who intervened was seriously wounded with a spade. A detachment of Indian troops at Kacha Garhi thereupon fired two or three shots at the muhajarin for making murderous assault on the British officer. One muhajarin was killed and one wounded and three arrested. Both the military and the police were injured. The body of the muhajarin was despatched to Peshawar and buried on the morning of the 9th. This incident has caused considerable excitement in Peshawar city, and the Khilafat Hijrat Committee are exercising restraining influence. Shops were closed on the morning of the 9th. A full enquiry has been instituted.

Now, Peshawar to Jamrud is a matter of a few miles. It was clearly the duty of the military not to attempt to pull out the ticketless muhajarin for the sake of a few annas. But they actually attempted force. Intervention by the rest of the party was a foregone conclusion. An altercation ensued. A British officer was attacked with a spade. Firing and a death of a muhajarin was the result. Has British prestige been enhanced by the episode? Why have not the Government put tactful officers in charge at the frontier, whilst a great religious emigration is in progress? The action of the military will pass from tongue to tongue throughout India and the Mussulman world around, will no doubt be unconsciously and even consciously exaggerated in the passage and the feeling bitter as it already is will grow in bitterness. The communique says that the Government are making further inquiry. Let us hope that it will be full and that better arrangements will be made to prevent a repetition of what appears to have been a thoughtless act on the part of the military.

And may I draw the attention of those who are opposing non-co-operation that unless they find out a substitute they should either join the non-co-operation movement or prepare to face a disorganized subterranean upheaval whose effect no one can foresee and whose spread it would be impossible to check or regulate?

Young India, 21-7-1920
50. HARTAL ON FIRST AUGUST

The Central Khilafat Committee, Bombay, has issued the following instructions:

Although every effort is being made to secure revision of the Peace Terms, it appears to be almost certain that it will not come before the first of August next. The Committee desires to mark the sacred character of the forthcoming demonstration of non-co-operation in a fitting manner. It also wishes to gauge the public feeling in the matter. The Committee, therefore, seeks the cooperation of Hindus and other non-Muslim communities in making the inauguration a complete success:

1. The Committee advises full hartal on the first of August. Mill-hands, however, are requested not to abstain from work, unless they receive permission from their employers, nor should all those abstain who are required for absolutely necessary day-to-day work, viz, hospital men, sanitary men and dock labourers.

2. The day should be devoted to prayer. All those, who can, should fast for the day.

3. Meetings should be held all over the country not excluding the smallest village at which the following resolution should be adopted with or without speeches:

THE RESOLUTION

“This meeting held at . . . of the inhabitants records its full sympathy with the movement of the Central Khilafat Committee in order to secure revision of the Turkish Peace Terms, consistently with Muslim sentiment and Islamic law and approves of non-co-operation adopted by the Central Khilafat Committee to be continued till the Peace Terms are revised. This meeting respectfully urges the Imperial Government in the interest of the Empire which they are supposed to represent to secure a just revision of the Terms which have been universally condemned as unjust and manifestly in breach of ministerial declarations.” The resolution should be sent to His Excellency the Viceroy with a covering letter requesting him to forward the same to the Imperial Government. The Central Khilafat Committee should be advised of the passing of the resolution and of its despatch.
M O V E M E N T N O T C I V I L D I S O B E D I E N C E

N.B. There should be no processions. Speeches should be restrained. It is expected that meetings everywhere will be very largely attended. All police and other Governmental instructions or regulations should be strictly and scrupulously obeyed. No meetings should be held where there is any written prohibition. It cannot be too often urged that the whole success of the movement depends upon perfect peace being observed by the community and complete obedience being rendered to police instructions in connection with the movement. It should be clearly understood that this is not a movement of civil disobedience. What should be done when unreasonable orders are issued interfering with the liberty of the subject will be considered on the merits by the Committee.

R E N O U N C E T I T L E S

It is expected that all title-holders, Honorary Magistrates, Justices of Peace, Members of the Legislative Councils, who feel about this important question affecting the well-being of millions of Muslims, and who are in sympathy with the movement, will surrender their titles or honorary posts on this day.

51. SPEECH AT IDGAH, KARACHI

July 22, 1920

The caliphate meeting at Karachi was held on the 22nd July at the Idgah, with Professor Vaswani as president. The following spoke: Professor Vaswani, Gandhi, Dr. Kitchlew, Shaukat Ali and Lokamal Chellaram Seth of Karachi. Vaswani opened the proceedings and was followed by Gandhi, who, feeling unwell, spoke sitting down.

Before coming to the reasons of my visit to Karachi, I wish to refer to the scene at the railway station. We were to arrive this morning, but owing to an unfortunate railway accident and subsequent blocking of the line, we did not arrive till 9 p.m. The Karachi City station was overcrowded; many were in the sheds and many were whistling. What impression did I get from this? I realized your affection for me, but affection does not mean obstructing the platform and preventing me, the one you love, getting out. This is the result of lack of education and knowledge. What is the use of volunteers if they are unable to control crowds and do not obey the orders of their officers? Work cannot proceed under these circumstances. The railway station incident being finished, I bring to your notice the fact that our Muhammadan brothers are suffering for the caliphate. The British Parliament and the Viceroy have forgotten their pledges. I ask all Hindus to help Muhammadans in this time of trouble. If this is not done then the Hindus must bear in mind that slavery will be at the door of not only seven crores of Muhammadans but at the door of twenty-two crores of Hindus also. We have held meetings, delivered speeches, passed resolutions, and sent deputations to request that the feelings of Muhammadans be respected. Nothing has resulted from this. Turkey has been forced to face difficulties and hardships. To obtain a decision on the caliphate question, you will have to give your own blood. What do you understand by giving blood? It does not mean that you should kill the British in whose hands the caliphate decision is, but that you should be ready silently to sacrifice your own lives. To attain this, manly power is necessary. What is manly power? The power full of spiritual strength. What is spiritual strength? To become a khatri. What is a khatri? A sepoy. We do not want to become Vaswanis or professors, but soldiers with spiritual power; soldiers who stand their ground and do not run away. I want you all to be soldiers with such force of will that you will stand in your place and never retire. All pressure should be firmly but silently opposed. The killing of others, burning of Government buildings, is not bravery. Government buildings are as your own houses. The shedding of your own blood is true bravery. My brother, Shaukat Ali, says that he comes of a martial family. His father and grandfather and he himself is [sic] a soldier, but I am ready to pit my soldiers against theirs. One lakh of British govern 30 crores of Indians. If you prove this manly power, you can free the motherland. This is necessary to obtain (1) freedom for the motherland, (2) justice for the oppression of the Punjab and (3) revision of the caliphate decisions. If you have no spirit then you are weaker than women. If you have it, make use of it and you will be able to secure these three things; otherwise it means slavery for ever. By shedding English blood, the caliphate agitation will never succeed. We cannot oppose them. They have arms, aeroplanes and machine-guns. If you have the spirit then non-co-operation can be properly carried out. Hindus should not think that Mussulmans will afterwards oppose them. Islam is a pure religion and will never mislead Hindus. Non-co-operation is a weapon above all others. The only way of meeting the unjust terms of such a Government is by non-co-operation. Non-co-operation begins from the 1st of August, and it is the duty of every Indian, man, woman and child, to make it successful. Shops should be closed, prayers offered in the mosques and temples and every man should fast. Huge meetings should be organized; not meetings like this. No force should be used.

55. SPEECH AT KHILAFAT CONFERENCE, HYDERABAD (SIND)

July 23, 1920

Gandhi advised 23 crores of Hindus to help 7 crores of Muslims as the latter’s religion was in danger. Union between them should exist. No physical assistance or power would help but soul-power. They would live faithful to a Government only when religion is not endangered. Government had more physical power and a heavier sword. They must not assist a tyrannical Government.

He advocated non-co-operation and explained it. He knew Moslems would be violent and use the sword; but General Dyer had proved he could be more violent and use a heavier sword. He advocated unconditional sacrifice, when Government with guns and aeroplanes would be helpless. The Secretary of State had said that he, Gandhi, had become a great fool and would not have the freedom he had last year but he did not feel free. The khilafat and Punjab disturbances made him feel in prison. He preferred to die for Mussulmans, and if he was sent to the gallows, they should congratulate him. Use no violence, do not resist, follow non-co-operation which was to begin on August 1st. If too weak to follow non-co-operation, do hijrat.

57. SPEECH AT SIND NATIONAL COLLEGE

July 24, 1920

The Sind National College received a visit from Mahatma Gandhi early this morning (Saturday, 24th). He was received at the gate by the staff and the students, and was shown round the various departments. Returning to the hall in company with Shrimati Saraladevi Chaudhrani he was presented with an address in Hindi. The Mahatma replied in Hindi. He said he was gratified to receive the Hindi address, as Hindi was one of the things that he had at heart and which he had been preaching from the platform and the Press. The best way of showing respect to a man, he said, was to do as he tells one to do, not to clap and cheer him. It filled his heart with great pain when he thought over the system of education that was in vogue in the country.
Those who had been brought up under that system could not see its many defects and the great harm that it had done to the spirit of nationality. He himself had received his fair share of it and recognized that it had done some good, but nothing filled him with greater pain than to see his countrymen ridden by that veneer of English polish.
He had lived in England long enough, and knew that no Englishman ever talked to another Englishman except in their common mother tongue. It gave him immense pain when he heard Indians talking with their brother Indians in a foreign tongue. He quoted Prof. Jadunath Sarkar and Mr. Sidgwick as saying that the burden of English People’s Famine Relief Committee, Puri.

2 1870-1958; historian; author of *A Short History of Aurangzeb and Fall of the
over the head of the Indian student was so heavy as to crush out all original thinking. For the Sindhi student, he would advise the study of Sindhi first and that of Hindi after it. Hindi was to be the language of the whole of India, and therefore its study was incumbent on the other provinces, so that all might come together on a common platform. For these among other reasons in which he could not enter then, he was gratified to find that Hindi was being encouraged in the Sind National College.

He then passed on to the other subject that he had equally at heart viz., swadeshi. The mainstay of the people of India was agriculture. But they wanted also a subsidiary occupation to fall back upon in times of difficulty and drought. that occupation must be weaving. Indian fabrics were once the glory of the land and were sought all over the world for their fineness. That brought the wealth of the world to India and made her sons happy and contented. At the present hour this and other similar industries had fallen on evil days. It was the duty of the young men imbued with a spirit of patriotism to help in the revival of weaving. This they could do by using swadeshi cloth in preference to foreign cloth and goods, however attractive in appearance. That will give work to thousands of women. It will bring bread to an immense number of their countrymen who now could hardly make the two ends meet, and get two square meals a day. He was glad to see that carpet-weaving was being taught in the Sind National College along with agriculture. He hoped that when he happened to visit Hyderabad next, he would find cloth-weaving being taught, too.

In conclusion, Mahatmaji expressed great pleasure at being able to see the students and the staff of the College, and his gratitude for the hearty reception that they had given him.

He was sorry that the time at his disposal was short, he could not speak as long as he would have wished. He wished the College all prosperity, and hoped that it would be largely patronized by those for whose good it was intended.

The party then left amidst shouts of “Vandemataram” and “Mahatma ki jai”.

58. SPEECH AT KHILAFAT CONFERENCE, HYDERABAD (SIND)
July 24, 1920

Resolution 5 moved by Haji Abdulla Haroon:

This conference accepts the non-co-operation policy of Gandhi and is prepared to follow the instructions of the Central Khilafat Committee in regard to it.

Gandhi supported it in strong terms. He explained the four stages of non-co-operation in all its aspects, enjoined on all khilafatists to put into practice all the commandments of the first stage on the 1st of August 1920. He advised hartal, fasting and convening of a meeting on that day. He enjoined union between the Hindus and Mussulmans. He explained that hijrat was the last stage of non-co-operation, and that those who were prepared to leave the country could also non-co-operate or else their hijrat was a sham, an expression of weakness.

60. SPEECH AT CITIZENS’ MEETING, HYDERABAD (SIND)
July 25, 1920

On the 25th July in a public lecture at the Citizens’ Association, Hyderabad, Mahatma Gandhi recommended swadeshism as a weapon for the protection of the caliphate, as thereby the Lancashire mills will sustain great losses and consequently these influential mill-owners will enquire into the cause of the boycott of their manufactures. When they learn the true facts of the unrest, in the interest of their trade they will take steps in England towards the satisfactory settlement of the caliphate and Jallianwala affairs.

1 Regarding the extension of the application of Seditious Meetings Act
2 This telegram was intercepted on July 27 but Gandhiji was in Hyderabad (Sind) on July 23, 24 and 25
He went even to the extent of recommending the boycott of Indian mill textiles as they were hampering his cottage spinning industries, for the welfare of which he was so anxious. He said that all women should sit in their cottages with their spinning-wheels to earn a respectable living, and those women who resorted to mills should not be married [sic] as they, in many cases, lose their chastity under the influence of immoral overseers. He complained of his wife for using cloth manufactured in mills instead of entirely sticking to home-spun materials.

He said that he was taking Saraladevi all over India with him as she had better understood his swadeshi principles than his wife, though he complained that she too did not practise the use of swadeshi cloth to his entire satisfaction.

[BOMBAY CITY,

July 26, 1920]

GOD IS GREAT

In the name of God the merciful and compassionate.

One who becomes the friend of the enemy of Islam he may be considered as one of them.

Third day of khilafat has come.

Come along, the field of work is before us. Give the testimony of our strength of faith.

The work of non-co-operation is open and this is the first stage of test. Keep regard and reputation of Islam, God and His Prophet and never do any such work by which weakness of faith might come to light and thereby the enemies of Islam will be overpowered.

1st August, 1920 is the beginning day of the non-co-operation movement. On that day offer prayer to God, observe fast, stop business, hold committees and promise to God that you will suffer every sort of trouble for the sake of righteousness. Renounce the titles and honorary posts. Remember this also, that disturbances and breach of peace are not in any way profitable to you. Be aside from disturbances; but stick to the right path.

Detailed instructions are being published separately. Obtain further information from your district or provincial Khilafat

62. MR. MONTAGU ON THE KHILAFAT AGITATION

Mr. Montagu does not like the khilafat agitation that is daily gathering force. In answer to questions put in the House of Commons, he is reported to have said that whilst he acknowledged that I had rendered distinguished services to the country in the past, he could not look upon my present attitude with equanimity and that it was not to be expected that I could now be treated as leniently as I was during the Rowlatt Act agitation. He added that he had every confidence in the central and the local Governments, that they were carefully watching the movement and that they had full power to deal with the situation.

This statement of Mr. Montagu has been regarded in some quarters as a threat. It has even been considered to be a blank cheque for the Government of India to re-establish the reign of terror if they chose. It is certainly inconsistent with his desire to base the Government on the goodwill of the people. At the same time if the Hunter Committee’s finding be true and if I was the cause of the disturbances last year, I was undoubtedly treated with exceptional leniency. I admit too that my activity this year is fraught with greater peril to the Empire as it is being conducted today than was last year’s activity. Non-co-operation in itself is more harmless than civil disobedience, but in its effect it is far more dangerous for the Government than civil disobedience. Non-co-operation is intended so far to paralyse the Government, as to compel justice from it. If it is carried to the extreme point, it can bring the Government to a standstill.

A friend who has been listening to my speeches once asked me whether I did not come under the sedition section of the Indian Penal Code. Though I had not fully considered it, I told him that very probably I did and that I could not plead “not guilty” if I was charged under it. For I must admit that I can pretend to no “affection” for the present Government. And my speeches are intended to create “disaffection” such that the people might consider it a shame to assist or co-operate with a Government that had forfeited all title to confidence, respect or support.

I draw no distinction between the Imperial and the Indian Government. The latter has accepted, on the khilafat, the policy imposed upon it by the former. And in the Punjab case the former has endorsed the policy of terrorism and emasculation of a brave people initiated by the latter. British ministers have broken their pledged word and wantonly wounded the feelings of the seventy million Mussulmans of India. Innocent men and women were insulted by the insolent officers of the Punjab Government. Their wrongs not only remain unrighted, but the very officers who so cruelly subjected them to barbarous humiliation retain office under the Government.

When at Amritsar last year I pleaded1 with all the earnestness I could command for co-operation with the Government and for response to the wishes expressed in the Royal Proclamation, I did so because I honestly believed that a new era was about to begin, and that the old spirit of fear, distrust and consequent terrorism was about to give place to the new spirit of respect, trust and goodwill. I sincerely believed that the Mussulman sentiment would be placated and that the officers that had misbehaved during the martial law regime in the Punjab would be at least dismissed and the people would be otherwise made to feel that a Government that had always been found quick (and rightly) to punish popular excesses would not fail to punish its agents’ misdeeds. But to my amazement and dismay, I have discovered that the present representatives of the Empire have become dishonest and unscrupulous. They have no regard for the wishes of the people of India and they count Indian honour as of little consequence.

I can no longer retain affection for a Government so evilly manned as it is now-a-days. And for me, it is humiliating to retain my freedom and be witness to the continuing wrong. Mr. Montagu however is certainly right in threatening me with deprivation of my liberty if I persist in endangering the existence of the Government. For that must be the result if my activity bears fruit. My only regret is that inasmuch as Mr. Montagu admits my past services, he might have perceived that there must be something exceptionally bad in the Government if a well-wisher like me could no longer give his affection to it. It was simpler to insist on justice being done to the Mussulmans and to the Punjab than threaten me with punishment so that the injustice might be perpetuated. Indeed I fully expect it will be found that even in promoting disaffection towards an unjust Government I had rendered greater services to the Empire than I am already credited with.

At the present moment, however, the duty of those who approve of my activity is clear. They ought on no account to resent the deprivation of my liberty, should the Government of India deem it to be their duty to take it away. A citizen has no right to resist such restriction imposed in accordance with the laws of the State to which he belongs. Much less have those who sympathize with him. In my case there can be no question of sympathy. For I deliberately oppose the Government to the extent of trying to put its very existence in jeopardy. For my supporters, therefore, it must be a moment of joy when I am imprisoned. It means the beginning of success if only the supporters continue the policy for which I stand. If the Government arrest me, they would do so in order to stop the progress of non-co-operation which I preach. It follows that if non-co-operation continues with unabated vigour, even after my arrest the Government must imprison others or grant the people’s wish in order to gain their cooperation. Any eruption of violence on the part of the people even under provocation would end in disaster. Whether therefore it is I or anyone else who is arrested during the campaign, the first condition of success is that there must be no resentment shown against it. We cannot imperil the very existence of a Government and quarrel with its attempt to save itself by punishing those who place it in danger.

63. A NOTED RESIGNATION

During the eventful tour of the khilafat party in the Punjab, I was given a copy of a letter of resignation by a sub-divisional officer over the khilafat question. It is printed elsewhere in this issue. The letter shows clearly how different classes of Mussulmans are being affected by the Turkish Peace Terms. It is an unforgettable wrong that England has been primarily responsible for doing to the Mussulman world. And as time passes, the movement for compelling its undoing will gain instead of losing strength. When an official of twenty years’ standing and considered to be almost indispensable decides to leave a Government in respect of great wrong to which it has been a party, it is time for it to review the act that has prompted a resignation such as Mr. Mohamed Azam has felt called upon to tender.

But my purpose in publishing the resignation is not so much to draw the Government’s attention to it (for they have it already) but to congratulate Mr. Mohamed Azam and to present the public with an example worthy of copying. Mr. Mohamed Azam from a purely worldly standpoint has sacrificed a position which many would covet. From the standpoint of religion or honour, he has gained by his resignation. What are position and money at the sacrifice of one’s conscience? His superior officers, be it said to their credit, have recommended it for acceptance because it has been tendered for conscience’ sake. If the higher branches of the Government service were to copy Mr. Mohamed Azam’s brave example, the movement might attain the goal without the lowest ranks having to give up their employment.

Mr. Mohamed Azam’s is an instance of positive courage. It is always difficult to find positive courage. But I hope there is enough negative courage in India to ensure that nobody applies for the post vacated by Mr. Mohamed Azam. It is almost certain that no Mohammedan will. But I hope that Hindus will be equally staunch and testify to their Mussulman brethren that they are fully alive to the difficulty in which they find themselves and that they will not be behind in giving them their active support.

The critics may say, it will be unnecessary for any Indian to apply because it is a post which any Englishman will be glad to fill. I do not doubt it for a moment. Only the condition is somewhat different from the ordinary when a post is voluntarily relinquished by way of protest and when no one belonging to the protestant class applies for it. The only thing needful is to cease to make of Government employment a fetish. There are many other avenues open to an honest man of ability to earn a decent livelihood. After all Government servants represent a microscopic minority of the population.

64. THE FIRST OF AUGUST

It is hardly likely that before the 1st August there will be on the part of His Majesty’s ministers promise of a revision of the Peace Terms and the consequent suspension of the inauguration of non-co-operation. The first of August next will be as important an event in the history of India as was the 6th of April last year. The sixth of April marked the beginning of the end of the Rowlatt Act. No one can consider, the Rowlatt Act can possibly live in the face of the agitation that has only been suspended—never given up. It must be clear to anyone that the power that wrests justice from an unwilling Government in the matter of the Punjab and the khilafat will be the power that will secure repeal of the Rowlatt Act. And that power is the power of satyagraha whether it is known by the name of civil disobedience or non-co-operation.

Many people dread the advent of non-co-operation, because of the events of last year. They fear madness from the mob and consequent repetition of last year’s reprisals almost unsurpassed in their ferocity in the history of modern times. Personally I do not mind Governmental fury as I mind mob fury. The latter is a sign of national distemper and therefore more difficult to deal with than the former which is confined to a small corporation. It is easier to oust a Government that has rendered itself unfit to govern than it is to cure unknown people in a mob of their madness. But great movements cannot be stopped altogether because a Government or a people or both go wrong. We learn to profit through our mistakes and failures. No general worth the name gives up a battle because he has suffered reverses, or which is the same thing, made mistakes. And so we must approach non-co-operation with confidence and hope. As in the past, the commencement is to be marked by fasting and prayer a sign of the religious character of the demonstration. There should also be on that day suspension of business, and meetings to pass resolutions praying for revision of the Peace Terms and justice for the Punjab and inculcating non-co-operation until justice has been done.

The giving up of titles and honorary posts should also commence from the first of August. Doubt has been expressed as to the sufficiency of notice regarding surrender of titles and honorary posts. It is however quickly dispelled by bearing in mind that the first of August marks the commencement of the surrender of titles. It is not the only day on which surrender has to take place. Indeed I do not expect a very large response on the first day. A vigorous propaganda will have to be carried on and the message delivered to every title or post-holder and the argument presented to him proving the duty of such surrender.

But the greatest thing in this campaign of non-co-operation is to evolve order, discipline, co-operation among the people, co-ordination among the workers. Effective non-co-operation depends upon complete organization. Thousands of men who have filled meetings throughout the Punjab have convinced me that the people want to withdraw co-operation from the Government but they must know how. Most people do not understand the complicated machinery of the Government. They do not realize that every citizen silently but nonetheless certainly sustains the Government of the day in ways of which he has no knowledge. Every citizen therefore renders himself responsible for every act of his Government. And it is quite proper to support it so long as the actions of the Government are bearable. But when they hurt him and his nation, it becomes his duty to withdraw his support.

But as I have said, every citizen does not know how to do so in an orderly manner. Disorderliness comes from anger, orderliness out of intelligent resistance. The first condition therefore of real success is to ensure entire absence of violence. Violence done to persons representing the Government or to persons who do not join our ranks, i.e., the supporters of the Government, means in every case retrogression in our case, cessation of non-co-operation and useless waste of innocent lives. Those therefore who wish to make non-cooperation a success in the quickest possible time will consider it their first duty to see that in their neighbourhood complete order is kept.

65. MORE ABOUT THE BULLETTED “MUHAJARIN”

Last week I dealt with the muhajarin who was shot. During the khilafat party’s tour in the Punjab I was handed a signed statement giving particulars about the incident on which the Government have issued a communiqué. As the statement purports to come from responsible parties and as it contains a version at variance with that of the communiqué, I deem it to be my duty to place it before the public and invite the Government’s attention to it. If the facts set forth in the statement are true, they reflect the greatest discredit on the so-called soldiers who took wanton delight in killing a man who was endeavouring to protect the honour of women.

I understand that the N.W. Frontier Administration are holding a judicial inquiry into the matter. But the public has become so suspicious even about inquiries described as judicial, that unless it is a really independent and honest inquiry, no weight will be attached to its findings. If therefore the Government do not wish to lay themselves open to the charge of having hushed up an unmanly act on the part of the British soldiers they will not dread publicity and they will invite the most trusted men to investigate the matter. No local men merely can possibly be considered sufficient to ensure impartiality.

The incident is of no small importance. General Dyer unfortunately talked of the lives and honour of English women being held sacred in India. I hope that India holds the honour and life of every woman dear and sacred. There is therefore the question of woman’s honour involved in the incident. Then again there is the question of the Indian soldiers—having refused to fire. If it is a fact and if the refusal was due to the causes narrated in the statement, it reflects the highest credit on them. The affair again derives importance from the fact that the tragedy has occurred in connection with an emigration of a sacred character. I assure the Government that the matter is being warmly talked about among thousands of men throughout the Punjab. Fullest and swiftest inquiry is essential if they do not intend that an unverified version should be current among the masses.

I wish that the narrative reproduced by me was free from passion and rhetoric. A narrative of events gains by being free from adjectives and expression of the narrator’s opinion. But perhaps it is too much to expect perfect narrations from inexperienced men especially when they are taken down in English by people who are indifferent translators and are often eager to interpolate their own opinions. In any case I would advise the readers to suspend judgment till they have had the Government version before them.

This incident moreover shows the necessity of the Government laying down their policy about hijrat. If they do not wish to prevent this peaceful and religious protest they should say so. The petty officers not knowing the Government policy may act foolishly and rashly and precipitate events in a manner not desired by the Government. A movement, which is attaining the dimensions that this bids fair to do, cannot be left to itself. An open declaration of the Government policy is most desirable for the sake of every interest.

66. TELEGRAM ON THIRD KHILAFAT DAY

BOMBAY,
July 29, 1920

WE HOPE THE MADRAS PRESIDENCY WILL RESPOND FULLY ON THE 1ST OF AUGUST BY OBSERVING COMPLETE PEACE AND ORDER, COMPLETE HARTAL, OFFERING HEARTFELT PRAYER, BY ORDERLY BUT LARGE MEETINGS AND SURRENDER OF TITLES BY AS MANY AS POSSIBLE. ALL GOVERNMENT ORDERS SHOULD BE STRICTLY CARRIED OUT. IN FIRM WITHDRAWAL OF CO-OPERATION AND OBEDIENCE TO ORDERS LIES THE SOLUTION TO THE KHILAFAT QUESTION, CONSERVATION OF NATIONAL HONOUR AND PROMOTION OF HINDU-MUSLIM UNITY.

67. SPEECH AT BOMBAY

July 29, 1920

Before a crowded meeting of Mussulmans in Muzaffarabad at Bombay held on the 29th July, speaking on the impending non-co-operation which commenced on the 1st of August, Mr. Gandhi said the time for speeches on non-co-operation was past and the time for practise had arrived. But two things were needful for complete success, an environment free from any violence on the part of the people and a spirit of self-sacrifice. Non-co-operation, as the speaker had conceived it, was an impossibility in an atmosphere surcharged with the spirit of violence. Violence was an exhibition of anger and any such exhibition was dissipation of valuable energy. Subduing of one’s anger was a storing up of national energy, which, when set free in an ordered manner, would produce astounding results. His conception of non-co-operation did not involve rapine, plunder, incendiarism and all the concomitants of mass madness. His scheme presupposed ability on their part to control all the forces of evil. If, therefore, any disorderliness was found on the part of the people which they could not control, he for one would certainly help the Government to control them. In the presence of disorder it would be for him a choice of evil, and evil though he considered the present Government to be, he would not hesitate for the time being to help the Government to control disorder. But he had faith in the people. He believed that they knew that the cause could only be won by non-violent methods. To put it at the lowest the people had not the power, even if they had the will, to resist with brute strength the unjust Governments of Europe who had, in the intoxication of their success disregarding every canon of justice dealt so cruelly by the only Islamic Power in Europe.

MATCHLESS WEAPON

In non-co-operation they had a matchless and powerful weapon. It was a sign of religious atrophy to sustain an unjust Government that supported an injustice by resorting to untruth and camouflage. So long therefore as the Government did not purge itself of the canker of injustice and untruth, it was their duty to withdraw all help from it consistently with their ability to preserve order in the social structure. The first stage of non-co-operation was, therefore, arranged so as to involve minimum of danger to public peace and minimum of sacrifice on the part of those who participated in the movement. And if they might not help an evil Government nor receive any favours from it, it followed that they must give up all titles of honour which were no longer a proud possession. Lawyers who were in reality honorary officers of the court, should cease to support courts that upheld the prestige of an unjust Government and the people must be able to settle their disputes and quarrels by private arbitration. Similarly parents should withdraw their children from the public schools and they must evolve a system of national education or private education totally independent of the Government. An insolent Government conscious of its brute strength, might laugh at such withdrawals by the people especially as the law-courts and schools were supposed to help the people, but he had not a shadow of doubt that the moral effect of such a step could not possibly be lost even upon a Government whose conscience had become stifled by the intoxication of power.

Swadeshi

He had hesitation in accepting swadeshi as a plank in non-co-operation. To him swadeshi was as dear as life itself. But he had no desire to smuggle in swadeshi through the khilafat movement, if it could not legitimately help that movement. But conceived as non-co-operation was in a spirit of self-sacrifice, swadeshi had a legitimate place in the movement. Pure swadeshi meant sacrifice of their liking for fineries. He asked the nation to sacrifice its liking for the fineries of Europe and Japan and be satisfied with the coarse but beautiful fabrics woven on their handlooms out of yarn spun by millions of their sisters. If the nation had become really awakened to a sense of the danger to its religions and its self-respect, it could not but perceive the absolute and immediate necessity of the adoption of swadeshi in its intense form and if the people of India adopted swadeshi with the religious zeal he begged to assure them that its adoption would arm them with a new power and would produce an unmistakable impression throughout the whole world. He, therefore, expected the Mussulmans to give the lead by giving up all the fineries they were so fond of and adopt the simple cloth that could be produced by the manual labour of their sisters and brethren in their own cottages. And he hoped that the Hindus would follow suit. It was a sacrifice in which the whole nation, every man, woman and child could take part.

68. TELEGRAM ON THIRD KHILAFAT DAY

BOMBAY,
July 31, 1920

THE NON-CO-OPERATION COMMITTEE HAS ISSUED THE FOLLOWING DIRECTIONS REGARDING THE THIRD KHILAFAT DAY: “THE FIRST OF AUGUST IS ON US WITH ITS GRAVE RESPONSIBILITY AND IMPORTANT CONSEQUENCES. WE BELIEVE THAT SUCCESS FOR OUR JUST CAUSE IS CERTAIN IF WE EXERCISE GREATEST SELF-RESTRAINT AND SHOW AMPLE MEASURE OF SELF-SACRIFICE. IF WE CEASE TO HELP GOVERNMENT AND CEASE TO TAKE HELF FROM IT WE MUST BE CAPABLE OF PRESERVING ORDER IN THE COUNTRY. WE SHOULD THEREFORE AVOID COLLISION WITH AUTHORITY AND THUS ALSO OCCASION FOR SUDDEN RESENTMENT. OBEY ALL ORDERS AND GOVERNMENT NOTICES. WE HOPE THERE WILL BE COMPLETE HARTAL ON SUNDAY. NO PRESSURE SHOULD BE USED AGAINST ANYONE REFUSING TO CLOSE SHOP. THE COMMITTEE ATTACHES GREATEST IMPORTANCE TO PRAYER AND FASTING FOR INWARD STRENGTH AND PURIFICATION. WE HOPE TOO THAT LARGEST MEETINGS EVER HELD WILL BE CONVENED ON SUNDAY BUT THERE SHOULD BE NO PROCESSIONS. SPECIAL EFFORT SHOULD BE MADE AND CONTINUED TO SECURE SURRENDER OF TITLES AND HONORARY POSTS AND PARENTS ARE REQUESTED TO WITHDRAW THEIR CHILDREN FROM SCHOOLS RECOGNIZED BY OR UNDER GOVERNMENT CONTROL. LAWYERS ARE REQUESTED TO SUSPEND PRACTICE. WE HAVE NO DOUBT ABOUT THE MORAL EFFECT OF THESE STEPS. WE HOPE ALSO THAT FULL SWADESHI WILL BE INAUGURATED ON SUNDAY IT ENABLES EVERY MAN, WOMAN AND CHILD TO EXHIBIT IN THEIR OWN PERSONS THE SPIRIT OF SACRIFICE. IT WILL BE AT ONCE AN EARNEST OF OUR DESIRE FOR SACRIFICE FOR THE SAKE OF OUR RELIGION AND HONOUR AND A PREPARATION FOR FURTHER SACRIFICE. AGITATION FOR SECURING COMPLETE BOYCOTT OF COUNCILS SHOULD BE CONTINUED UNABATED. FINALLY THE COMMITTEE EXPECTS MUSLIMS TO LEAD AS WELL IN PRESERVING PEACE AND ORDER AS IN SACRIFICE AND WE FEEL SURE THAT OUR HINDU BRETHREN WILL NOT FAIL TO RESPOND AND JOIN THE MUSLIMS.”

69. OUR DUTY

August I is already upon us. All manner of objections are being raised against non-co-operation, the most important being that it is bound to lead to violent disturbances.

It is quite easy to save ourselves from this possible danger. There should be no difficulty at all in preserving peace if there are even a few persons at every place working towards that end. The very first requirement of non-co-operation is to preserve peace. If we do not know how to do this, we have no right to start non-co-operation.

Some people cite the example of the Sinn Fein movement in Ireland and say that non-co-operation and assassinations go on simultaneously there. This is quite true, but Ireland will not get Home Rule that way. There is, moreover, an important difference between us and Ireland. We can very easily gain our object by non-violent non-co-operation and, if violence breaks out, non-co-operation will stop that very moment. Through the method of violence and bloodshed, the people can get nothing in big country like India; likewise, no power in the world can rule over such a vast country as ours if there is peaceful non-co-operation.

That is why our best success lies in preventing the outbreak of violence. If violence does break out, we ourselves would, and we ought to, rush immediately to the help of the Government to stop it. Breaking out of riots can only mean that we have failed to acquire control over our own people. The second objection to non-co-operation is that the people are not at all ready for it. This really means that the people have no capacity for self-sacrifice.

If we regard it as an honour to be honoured by a Government that has gone to the last limits of injustice, if we receive education in its schools and continue to practise as lawyers in its courts, how can we demonstrate that we have felt hurt by its actions?

Some others ask me what effect can be produced on the Government if a few men renounce their titles, a few others withdraw their children from schools and a handful of lawyers stop practising in lawcourts. This objection is not valid. If we think it a sin to help an unjust Government or to receive any favour from it, then, whether we be few or many, it becomes our duty to give up helping it or receiving favours from it, and this is also the only straightforward way of making others in larger numbers do likewise.
No reform anywhere in the world has ever been immediately accepted by all the people. It is always a few who make a beginning and, when others see the firmness of those few, they follow in the footsteps of the latter. Often reforms make no progress because people take up the attitude that they will adopt them when others do likewise. This attitude always results in delay and does much harm sometimes. Moreover, waiting for all the others or a majority of them bespeaks our want of faith in our duty. I trust, therefore, that those who are convinced that it is their duty to stop helping the Government will begin non-co-operation forthwith, no matter whether they are few or many.

70. MR. MONTAGU’S THREAT

There is no need at all to get excited over the threat which Mr. Montagu held out while replying to a question about the khilafat. Regarding the ultimate aim, there is no difference between the views of Mr. Montagu and of others in authority. It is the usual way of these, when they want to do something in opposition to public opinion, to leave nothing undone in putting down the people. How can we expect Mr. Montagu to be free from this mentality? The people are raising their heads against the injustices in the Punjab and about the khilafat. If they are allowed to follow their way, authority will have to yield. This they do not want to do. So it is left with no alternative but to go all out to bend the people.

If, in this situation, the people are behind me and follow my advice, what else can the Government do but arrest me?

The Government can have one of three aims in arresting me:

1. To frighten me into changing my views.
2. To separate me from the people and thus weaken public opinion.
3. By removing me from their midst, to test the people and see whether they are really agitated over the injustices.

I suppose that it cannot be their object to frighten me. The 1 Montagu had declared in the House of Commons that “if Mr. Gandhi persisted in ‘non-co-operation’, it would be absolutely impossible to take the same view of his action as was taken last year”.

VOL. 21 : 1 JULY, 1920 - 21 NOVEMBER, 1920
Government will certainly want to weaken public opinion, but it is more reasonable to believe that it wants to test the people. It has a right to do so. If the people, however, stand the test and show their mettle, that very day they will win. We cannot complain against being tested in this way.

What, then, should the people do if I am arrested? The very nature of our fight requires us to be always ready for jail. My imprisonment, therefore, should be welcome to the people. At any rate, it should not make them angry. If I do things which invite imprisonment and then run away from it, or if the people feel aggrieved over my arrest, then the fault lies not with the Government but with us. In an oppressive and unjust State, a prison is the only place where a subject is really free.

I, therefore, hope that, if I am arrested, the people will go ahead with non-co-operation with still greater vigour.

Perhaps the Government would welcome the people losing their self-control. That would give it a chance to use force. Even if the Government does not want this, the result would be the same, namely, that it would subject the people to repression.

If, therefore, the people have understood the meaning of non-co-operation, they should not abandon it, even if I or any others should be arrested but show to the Government that it cannot rule the people without their consent.

But the question will naturally be asked why Mr. Montagu should be doubly guilty by taking the wrong road of repression over people. He has already one crime to his credit, of being a party to the injustice [done to India]. Repression of the people in order to perpetuate that injustice would now be the second crime. The right course would be, seeing that the people are ready to go to the length of adopting non-co-operation, to bow to public opinion and, by undoing the injustice, remove the root-cause of non-co-operation.

Mr. Montagu admits that, through my activities till now, I have rendered nothing but service to the Empire. That service naturally includes the satyagraha which I have launched on different occasions. As a matter of fact, my chief services to the Empire lie in securing redress of grievances by means of satyagraha. I am sure that what I am doing at present is my greatest service. Even this time, all I am doing is to offer satyagraha. Non-co-operation is but a branch of the big tree of satyagraha. The regret is that, regardless of this, Mr.
Montagu thinks me mistaken in my present activity. When a friend of the Empire like myself takes up the extreme weapon of non-co-operation, Mr. Montagu should have realized that the people must have been seriously aggrieved and ought to have striven hard to secure justice for us. If, then, his efforts had failed, he could have resigned. But he has chosen the wrong course. I now hope that the public will answer Mr. Montagu’s threat by remaining peaceful and carrying out the non-co-operation programme.

71. VISIT OF THE PRINCE OF WALES

The view which I have expressed, that in our present state of feelings we cannot join in welcoming the Prince of Wales, should he pay a visit, is considered by Mr. Montagu to be a disloyal suggestion.

This is a sign of changed times. Not only o I not see any disloyalty in refusing to welcome the Prince but I consider it disloyalty towards the people to act otherwise in this difficult predicament.

The Prime Minister says that the Prince of Wales will be coming as the representative of the Crown. We know that his visit will be to demonstrate the might and glory of the Empire. To associate ourselves in the welcome will be to honour all officials, from the Viceroy downwards, including the officers of the Punjab who have brought disgrace to their administration.

A people, whose feelings have been hurt, whose wounds still remain unhealed, and whom the House of Lords, in its utter ignorance and arrogance, has hurt still more painfully by whitewashing the crime of General Dyer, how can they associate themselves in the welcome to the Prince of Wales? To do so would be to give a certificate to the bureaucracy. The latter wants the unrest among the people to be taken as peace. Even if the people have courage for nothing else and not prepared to make any other sacrifice, everybody would at least expect them to give expression to their hurt feelings by keeping away from functions arranged to welcome the Prince.

We are certainly not insulting anybody by not taking part in the welcome. There is no insult to the Prince of Wales at all, and there can be no such intention either. If anybody is insulted, it can only be the bureaucracy, but we shall not be insulting even the bureaucracy. We merely refuse to obey it, and it is our clear duty to do this. I hope, therefore, that despite anything Mr. Montagu may say, we will not join, it is our duty not to join, in the welcome.

72. NOTES

LOKAMANYA’S ILLNESS

The hearts of hundreds of thousands of Indians flutter with anxiety at the sad news that the Lokamanya’s illness has taken a serious turn. His contribution to the national awakening, his fearless spirit of independence and his sacrifices have made him the idol of the people. To millions, his word is law. Swaraj for this country is the mission of his life. At this critical time, the people are in no condition to bear the pain of separation from him. They are, themselves, afflicted at present with a serious disease. In the diagnosis and treatment of their disease, the Lokamanya has taken a leading part. Today the people are looking up to all their leaders to have their service and guidance. Among these, the Lokamanya belongs to the first rank. So great is his optimism that he has hoped for swaraj during his own lifetime. May God help him to recover, grant him a long life and make him a witness to the attainment of swaraj!

FAMINE IN ORISSA

The latest letter from Shri Amritlal Thakkar is heart-rending. I quote the following sentences from it. 2

In another letter he writes:

Rs. 40,000 in all have been received from Gujarat. But worse months still are ahead. Money will be needed in plenty. I earnestly request you to issue one more appeal. Not less than one-and-a-half lakhs will be required. Including contributions from all other parts, a total of Rs. 80,000 has been received till now.

1 Bal Gangadhar Tilak (1856-1920); patriot, politician and scholar. This note was obviously written before his death.

2 Not given here. The part quoted by Gandhiji described the near starvation conditions prevailing among the residents of Piplithana.
There is nothing I need add to this letter. The rains have been good, but we see that Orissa’s suffering will not end soon. The more closely Shri Amritlal examines the situation, the more misery he finds. In this unhappy province, the suffering people have lost even the strength to cry for help in their suffering. I trust that everyone will join in the holy effort of sharing in the suffering of Orissa.

73. LETTER TO VICEROY

[August 1, 1920]

SIR,

It is not without a pang that I return the Kaiser-i-Hind gold medal, granted to me by your predecessor for my humanitarian work in South Africa, the Zulu War medal granted in South Africa for my war services as officer in charge of the Indian Volunteers Service Corps in 1906 and the Boer War medal for my services as Assistant Superintendent of the Indian Volunteer Stretcher-Bearer Corps during the Boer War of 1899. I venture to return these medals in pursuance of the scheme of non-co-operation, inaugurated today in connection with the khilafat movement. Valuable as these honours have been to me, I cannot wear them with an easy conscience so long as my Mussulman countrymen have to labour under a wrong done to their religious sentiments. Events, which have happened during the past month, have confirmed me in the opinion that the Imperial Government have acted in the khilafat matter in an unscrupulous, immoral and unjust manner and have been moving from wrong to wrong in order to defend their immorality. I can retain neither respect nor affection for such a Government. The attitude of the Imperial and Your Excellency’s Governments on the Punjab question has given me an additional sense for grave dissatisfaction. I had the honour as Your Excellency is aware as one of the Congress

4 Lord Hardinge
Commissioners to investigate the cause of disorder in the Punjab during April of 1919 and it is my deliberate conviction that Sir Michael O'Dwyer was totally unfit to hold the office of Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab and that his policy was primarily responsible for infuriating the mob at Amritsar. No doubt the mob excesses were unpardonable. Incendiaryism, the murder of the five innocent Englishmen and the cowardly assault on Miss Sherwood\(^1\) were most deplorable and uncalled for but the punitive measures taken by General Dyer, Col. Frank Johnson, Col. O'Brien, Mr. Bosworth Smith, Rai Shri Ram Sud, Mr. Malik Khan and other officers were out of all proportion to the crime of the people and amounted to a wanton cruelty and inhumanity, almost unparalleled in modern times.

Yours Excellency’s light-hearted treatment of the official crime, your exoneration of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, Mr. Montagu’s dispatch and above all the shameful ignorance of the Punjab events and the callous disregard of the feelings of the Indians betrayed by the House of Lords, have filled me with the gravest misgivings regarding the future of the Empire, have estranged me completely from the present Government and have disabled me from tendering as I have hitherto whole-heartedly tendered my loyal co-operation. In my humble opinion, the ordinary method of agitating by way of petitions, deputation and the like, is no remedy for moving to repentence a Government, so hopelessly indifferent to the welfare of its charge as the Government of India has proved to be.

In European countries, the condonation of such grievous wrongs as the khilafat and the Punjab would have resulted in a bloody revolution by the people. They would have resisted at all cost the national emasculation such as the said wrongs imply. But one half of India is too weak to offer a violent resistance and the other half is unwilling to do so. I have therefore ventured to suggest a remedy of non-co-operation, which enables those who wish to dissociate themselves from the Government and which, if it is unattended by violence and undertaken in an ordered manner must compel it to retrace its steps and undo the wrongs committed. But whilst I pursue the policy of non-co-operation in so far as I can carry the people

74. LETTER TO DAYALJI

August 1, 1920

BHAISHRI DAYALJI,

I have your letter. I don’t at all like the idea of a three-day hartal. I can understand a hartal for one day. If we would really show our venera-tion, my preference is for some constructive work. We should, therefore, reflect over his good qualities and try to cultivate them in ourselves. He was a man of extreme simplicity; so in memory of him we should take a vow of simplicity. We should all give up, in his name, something we hold dear. He loved courage, we should, therefore, give up every kind of fear and try to become courageous. He wanted the people to be physically strong. We should all cherish his memory and try to be so. The country was dear to him as his very life; we, too, thinking of him, should give up love of self and cultivate, day by day, in increasing measure, pure love for the country. He was devoted to learning and had a wonderful command over his mother tongue and Sanskrit; we, too, if we do not love or know our mother tongue well enough, should love and know it better. We should improve our proficiency in the mother tongue and in Sanskrit. There are a good many other gifts of his which we can note. Let us cultivate as many of them as appeal to us and immortalize him. Finally, those who can do nothing else may spend anything from a pice onwards on national work.

Mahadevbhaini Diary, Vol. V

75. SPEECH ON KHILAFAT DAY, BOMBAY

August 1, 1920

Mr. M. K. Gandhi moved the following resolution:

This meeting records its full sympathy with the movement of the Central Khilafat Committee in order to secure revision of the Turkish Peace Terms consistently with Muslim sentiment and Islamic Law, and approves of non-co-operation adopted by the Central Khilafat Committee to be continued till the Peace Terms are revised. This meeting respectfully urges the Imperial Government, in the interest of the Empire which they are supposed to represent, to secure a just revision of the Terms which have been universally condemned as unjust and manifestly in breach of ministerial declaration.

Mr. Gandhi said he read in newspapers Government and others telling him that India was not at one with him in this question of non-co-operation and that the movement of non-co-operation would end in the country’s ruin. Now those who joined in the non-co-operation movement could best refute those assertions not by merely attending such meetings and passing such resolutions but by actually practising non-co-operation. The first thing they could do in this connection was to renounce all titles, medals and honorary posts. He would like to inquire how many of them that attended the meeting had done so. Perhaps very few of those that were present there were possessors of such titles and posts. But this did not mean that those who possessed no titles or medals themselves had no duty to perform in this connection. For it should be their duty to ask with due respect those, who did hold the titles and honorary posts, to give them up. First of all they should ask Honorary Magistrates to resign their posts; secondly, they should ask their friends to withdraw their children from Government schools and ask teachers to resign their posts. This would have the effect of showing Government that the people were determined to do without their educational institutions. The parents could send their children to schools conducted by non-official agencies and even if they went without the sort of education that they were having at school he did not see how it could harm them so much if they did not go to school for a year or so. Thirdly, he would ask men of the legal profession to give up their practice. He entirely repudiated the suggestion that legal practitioners would be doing a public service by continuing to practise in courts of law. For he believed they would be doing a greater service to their country if they did the khilafat and other work for the public good instead. Some people had expressed a doubt if they could do altogether without going to courts of law for having their cases decided. He thought they could do without having recourse to the courts if they instituted their own panchas, where they could hope to get much speedier and cheaper justice. Then he would ask them not to accept any civil post in Mesopotamia for they would be acting against the interests of the khilafat if they accepted such posts under a Government which wanted to rule over a country which formed part of the Jazirat-ul-Arab, which was sacred to Islam.

1 At Mastanshah Tank, under the auspices of the Central Khilafat Committee; Mia Mohmed Chotani presided.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI

Proceeding, Mr. Gandhi said this was the first thing they had to do to achieve their object. The second was a vigorous prosecution of swadeshi. This, as he had said at the Muzaffarabad Hall meeting, was one of the two things essential to the success of their movement. He had said then and would repeat now, that the two conditions which should be rigorously adhered to in their prosecution of non-co-operation were non-violence and swadeshi. Any violence on their part would defeat non-co-operation, and he asked them all to refrain from violence. They should refrain from anger. Then, they should be prepared to make sacrifice if they wanted their movement to succeed. They could make sacrifice by giving up among other things their predilection for fine clothes. Mr. Hasrat Mohani told him when he advocated swadeshi, that the people of northern India could not possibly do without thin clothes made out of fine-spun cotton. Now he (the speaker) could not understand this inability on the part of the people mentioned by Mr. Mohani. Twenty-five years ago the people of India could do very well with the home-spun, coarse cloth, but Manchester cloth had changed their taste and ideas. At the present stage of the industry in India, the cotton mills were not in a position to produce fine cloth and the people must be content with the coarser quality of it. The remedy for the present lay in a revival of the handloom industry. If they had handlooms in every Indian home they could spin a sufficient quantity of cotton for the indigenous weavers to weave into cloth and when these found that their countrymen were prepared to give up foreign clothes and pay good prices for good, thin cloth they would take to producing that quality of cloth. If they practised swadeshi with vigour and enthusiasm they would save crores of rupees to India. The practice of swadeshi undoubtedly involved a sacrifice on their part but they ought to be prepared to make that sacrifice. It would show to the world that they were prepared to undergo all inconveniences and suffer so long as the khilafat question was not satisfactorily settled.

In conclusion, Mr. Gandhi said the chief things essential to the success of the non-co-operation movement were, as he had pointed out, non-violence, renouncing of titles and honourary posts, and a vigorous prosecution of swadeshi. If they did this and prayed to God, their cause, being just, was bound to succeed.

Dr. Kitchlew, Mr. Shaukat Ali and others supported the resolution, which was carried.

77. SPEECH AT RECEPTION TO KHILAFAT DELEGATION, BOMBAY

August 2, 1920

To welcome Maulana Mahomed Ali and his colleagues of the Indian khilafat delegation who arrived in Bombay on Monday, a public meeting was held that night at the Mastanshah Tank. Mahatma Gandhi was voted to the chair in the absence of Mr. Chotani who was indisposed.

The proceedings began with the recitation of a hymn from the Quran. Afterwards the chairman, addressing the audience, said that he was sorry Mr. Chotani could not take part in the meeting but he hoped Mr. Chotani would soon get better and begin the work of the Khilafat Committee in right earnest as before. Continuing he said that that was a very happy day for him and them all as their brother Mahomed Ali and his colleagues, after arduous work in connection with the khilafat question, returned to their motherland safe and sound.

He could not express what affection he harboured towards Maulana Mahomed Ali. Since he had met the Ali Brothers in Delhi in the year 1915 and later in Aligarh, 1 From the reference to “the endless procession of yesterday”, this appears to have been written on August 2.

he was much impressed, and thought that one day the two Brothers would be among the Mahomedans what Mr. Gokhale was among the Hindus, and he was glad that what he had then surmised, has come true now.

Mahatma Gandhi then requested Maulana Mahomed Ali to lay, before the audience, the account of his work in Europe, in connection with the khilafat question.

78. LOKAMANYA

Lokamanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak is no more. It is difficult to believe of him as dead. He was so much part of the people. No man of our times had the hold on the masses that Mr. Tilak had. The devotion that he commanded from thousands of his countrymen was extraordinary. He was unquestionably the idol of his people. His word was law among thousands. A giant among men has fallen. The voice of the lion is hushed.

What was the reason for his hold upon his countrymen? I think the answer is simple. His patriotism was a passion with him. He knew no religion but love of his country. He was a born democrat. He believed in the rule of majority with an intensity that fairly frightened me. But that gave him his hold. He had an iron will which he used for his country. His life was an open book. His tastes were simple. His private life was spotlessly clean. He had dedicated his wonderful talents to his country. No man preached the gospel of swaraj with the consistency and the insistence of Lokamanya. His countrymen therefore implicitly believed in him. His courage never failed him. His optimism was irrepressible. He had hoped to see swaraj fully established during his life time. If he failed, it was not his fault. He certainly brought it nearer by many a year. It is for us, who remain behind, to put forth redoubled effort to make it a reality in the shortest possible time.

Lokamanya was an implacable foe of the bureaucracy, but this is not to say that he was a hater of Englishmen or English rule. I warn Englishmen against making the mistake of thinking that he was their enemy.

I had the privilege of listening to an impromptu, learned discourse by him, at the time of the last Calcutta Congress, on Hindi being the national language. He had just returned from the Congress _pandal_. It was a treat to listen to his calm discourse on Hindi. In the course of his address he paid a glowing tribute to the English for their care of the vernaculars. His English visit, in spite of his sad experience of English juries, made him a staunch believer in British democracy and he even seriously made the amazing suggestion that India should instruct it on the Punjab through the cinematograph. I relate this incident not because I share his belief (for I do not), but in order to show that he entertained no hatred for Englishmen. But he could not and would not put up with an inferior status for India in the Empire. He wanted immediate equality which he believed was his country’s birthright. And in his struggle for India’s freedom he did not spare the Government. In the battle for freedom he gave no quarter and asked for none. I hope that Englishmen will recognize the worth of the man whom India has adored.

For us, he will go down to the generations yet unborn as a maker of modern India. They will revere his memory as of a man who lived for them and died for them. It is blasphemy to talk of such a man as dead. The permanent essence of him abides with us for ever. Let us erect for the only Lokamanya of India an imperishable monument by weaving into our own lives his bravery, his simplicity, his wonderful industry and his love of his country. May God grant his soul peace.

79. THE CONGRESS AND NON-CO-OPERATION

The Hon’ble Pundit Malaviyaji, for whom I entertain the highest regard and whom I have so often described as dharmatma, has appealed to me both publicly and privately to suspend non-co-operation till the Congress has pronounced upon it. The Mahratta has also done likewise. These appeals have made me pause and think, but I regret to say that I have not been able to respond to them. I would do much and give much to please Punditji. I am anxious to receive his approbation and blessing for all my actions. But a higher duty requires me not to turn from the course mapped out by the Non-co-operation Committee. There are moments in your life when you must act, even though you cannot carry your best friends with you. The

1 The source here has: “of India and the Empire”.
2 The very soul of dharma
“still small voice” within you must always be the final arbiter when there is a conflict of duty.

The reason for asking me to suspend action is that the Congress will presently meet and consider the whole question of non-co-operation and give its verdict. It would therefore be better (says Punditiji) to await the Congress decision. In my humble opinion it is no Congressman’s duty to consult the Congress before taking an action in a matter in which he has no doubts. To do otherwise may mean stagnation.

The Congress is after all the mouthpiece of the nation. And when one has a policy or a programme which one would like to see adopted, but on which one wants to cultivate public opinion, one naturally asks the Congress to discuss it and form an opinion. But when one has an unshakable faith in a particular policy or action, it would be folly to wait for the Congress pronouncement. On the contrary one must act and demonstrate its efficacy so as to command acceptance by the nation.

My loyalty to the Congress requires me to carry out its policy when it is not contrary to my conscience. If I am in a minority I may not pursue my policy in the name of the Congress. The decision of the Congress on any given question therefore does not mean that it prevents a Congressman from any action to the contrary, but if he acts, he does so at his own risk and with the knowledge that the Congress is not with him. Every Congressman, every public body has the right, it is sometimes their duty, to express their own opinion, act upon it even and thus anticipate the verdict of the Congress. Indeed it is the best way of serving the nation. By initiating well-thought-out policies, we furnish data for a great deliberative body like the Congress to enable it to form a well-informed opinion. The Congress cannot express national opinion with any definiteness, unless at least some of us have already firm views about a particular course of conduct. If all suspended their opinion, the Congress must necessarily suspend its own.

There are always three classes of people in an institution: Those who have favourable views on a given policy, those who have fixed but unfavourable views on it and those who hold no fixed views. The Congress decides for this third and large group. I hold fixed views on non-co-operation. I believe that if we are to make anything of the reforms we will have to create a pure, clean and elevating atmosphere instead of the present foetid, unclean and debasing atmosphere to work them in. I believe that our first duty is to compel justice from the Imperial Government in regard to the khilafat and the Punjab. In both these matters injustice is being sustained by untruth and insolence. I therefore consider it to be the duty of the nation to purge the Government of the uncleanness before they can co-operate with each other. Even opposition or obstruction is possible where there is mutual respect and confidence. At the present moment the governing authority has no respect for us or our feelings. We have no faith in it. In these circumstances co-operation is a crime. Holding these strong views I can serve the Congress and the country only by reducing them to practice and thus affording to the Congress material for forming an opinion.

For me to suspend non-co-operation would be to prove untrue to the Mussulman brethren. They have their own religious duty to perform. Their religious sentiment has been deeply hurt by a total disregard of laws of justice and their own promises by British ministers. The Mussulmans must take action now. They cannot await the Congress decision. They can only expect the Congress to ratify their action and share their sorrows and their burdens. Their action cannot be delayed till the Congress has decided on a policy nor can their course be altered by an adverse decision of the Congress unless their action is otherwise found to be an error. The khilafat is a matter of conscience with them. And in matters of conscience the Law of Majority has no place.

Young India, 4-8-1920

80. WHO IS DISLOYAL?

Mr. Montagu has discovered a new definition of disloyalty. He considers my suggestion to boycott the visit of the Prince of Wales to be disloyal and some newspapers taking the cue from him have called persons who have made the suggestion “unmannerly”. They have even attributed to these “unmannerly” persons the suggestion of “boycotting the Prince”. I draw a sharp and fundamental distinction between boycotting the Prince and boycotting any welcome arranged for him. Personally I would extend the heartiest welcome to His Royal Highness if he came or could come without official patronage and the protecting wings of the Government of the day. Being the heir to constitutional monarch, the Prince’s movements are regulated and dictated by the ministers, no matter how much the dictation may be concealed beneath diplomatically polite language. In suggesting the boycott therefore the promoters have suggested boycott of an insolent bureaucracy and dishonest ministers of His Majesty.

You cannot have it both ways. It is true that under a constitutional monarchy, the Royalty is above politics. But you cannot send the Prince on a political visit for the purpose of making political capital out of him, and then complain that those, who will not play your game and, in order to checkmate you, proclaim a boycott of the Royal visit, do not know constitutional usage. For the Prince's visit is not for pleasure. His Royal Highness is to come in Mr. Lloyd George’s words, as the “Ambassador of the British Nation”, in other words, his own ambassador in order to issue a certificate of merit to him and possibly to give the ministers a new lease of life. The wish is designed to consolidate and strengthen a power that spells mischief for India. Even as it is, Mr. Montagu has foreseen that the welcome will probably be excelled by any hitherto extended to Royalty, meaning that the people are not really and deeply affected and stirred by the official atrocities in the Punjab and the manifestly dishonest breach of official declarations on the khilafat. With the knowledge that India was bleeding at heart, the Government of India should have told His Majesty’s ministers that the moment was inopportune for sending the Prince. I venture to submit that it is adding insult to injury to bring the Prince and through his visit to steal honours and further prestige for a Government that deserves to be dismissed with disgrace. I claim that I prove my loyalty by saying that India is in no mood, is too deeply in mourning, to take part in any welcome to His Royal Highness, and that the ministers and the Indian Government show their disloyalty by making the Prince a cat’s paw of their deep political game. If they persist, it is the clear duty of India to have nothing to do with the visit.

Young India, 4-8-1920
81. CRUSADE AGAINST NON-CO-OPERATION

I have most carefully read the manifesto addressed by Sir Narayan Chandavarkar and others dissuading the people from joining the non-co-operation movement. I had expected to find some solid argument against non-co-operation, but to my great regret I have found in it nothing but distortion (no doubt unconscious) of the great religions and history. The manifesto says that “non-co-operation is deprecated by the religious tenets and traditions of our motherland, nay, of all the religions that have saved and elevated the human race.” I venture to submit that the Bhagavad Gita is a gospel of non-co-operation between forces of darkness and those of light. If it is to be literally interpreted, Arjuna representing a just cause was enjoined to engage in bloody warfare with the unjust Kauravas. Tulsidas advises the Sant (the good) to shun the Asant (the evil-doers). The Zend-Avesta represents a perpetual duel between Ormuzd and Ahriman, between whom there is no compromise. To say of the Bible that it taboos non-co-operation is not to know Jesus, a prince among passive resisters, who uncompromisingly challenged the might of the Sadducees and the Pharisees and for the sake of truth did not hesitate to divide sons from their parents. And what did the Prophet of Islam do? He non-co-operated in Mecca in a most active manner so long as his life was not in danger and wiped the dust of Mecca off his feet when he found that he and his followers might have uselessly to perish, and fled to Medina and returned when he was strong enough to give battle to his opponents. The duty of non-co-operation with unjust men and king is as strictly enjoined by all the religions as is the duty of co-operation with just men and kings. Indeed most of the scriptures of the world seem even to go beyond non-co-operation and prefer violence to effeminate submission to a wrong. The Hindu religious tradition, of which the manifesto speaks, clearly proves the duty of non-co-operation. Prahlad dissociated himself from his

3 The great Hindi poet; author of Ramcharitamanasa, a Hindi version of the Ramayana
4 Devotee of Vishnu, was persecuted by his disbelieving father, the demon father, Meerabai from her husband, Bibhishan from his brutal brother.

The manifesto speaking of the secular aspect says, “The history of nations affords no instance to show that it (meaning non-co-operation) has, when employed, succeeded and done good.” One most recent instance of brilliant success of non-co-operation is that of General Botha who boycotted Lord Milner’s reformed councils and thereby procured a perfect constitution for his country. The Dukhobours of Russia offered non-co-operation, and a handful though they were, their grievances so deeply moved the civilized world that Canada offered them a home where they form a prosperous community. In India instances can be given by the dozen, in which in little principalities the raiyats when deeply grieved by their chiefs have cut off all connection with them and bent them to their will. I know of no instance in history where well managed non-co-operation has failed.

Hitherto I have given historical instances of bloodless non-co-operation. I will not insult the intelligence of the reader by citing historical instances of non-co-operation combined with violence, but I am free to confess that there are on record as many successes as failures in violent non-co-operation. And it is because I know this fact that I have placed before the country a non-violent scheme in which, if at all worked satisfactorily, success is a certainty and in which non-response means no harm. For if even one man non-co-operates, say, by resigning some office, he has gained, not lost. That is its ethical or religious aspect. For its political result naturally it requires polymerico support. I fear therefore no disastrous result from non-co-operation save for an outbreak of violence on the part of the people whether under provocation or otherwise. I would risk violence a thousand times than risk emasculation of a whole race.

Cow protection is an article of faith in Hinduism. Apart from its religious sanctity, it is an ennobling creed. But we, Hindus, have today little regard for the cow and her progeny. In no country in the world are cattle so ill-fed and ill-kept as in India. In beef-eating England it would be difficult to find cattle with bones sticking out of their flesh. Most of our pinjrapoles\textsuperscript{1} are ill-managed and ill-kept. Instead of being a real blessing to the animal world, they are perhaps simply receiving-depots for dying animals. We say nothing to the English in India for whose sake hundreds of cows are slaughtered daily. Our rajas do not hesitate to provide beef for their English guests. Our protection of the cow, therefore, extends to rescuing her from Mussulman hands. This reverse method of cow protection has led to endless feuds and bad blood between Hindus and Mussulmans. It has probably caused greater slaughter of cows than otherwise would have been the case if we had begun the propaganda in the right order. We should have commenced, as we ought now to commence, with ourselves and cover the land with useful propaganda leading to kindness in the treatment of cattle and scientific knowledge in the management of cattle farms, dairies and pinjrapoles. We should devote our attention to propaganda among Englishmen in the shape of inducing them voluntarily to abandon beef, or, if they will not do so, at least be satisfied with imported beef. We should secure prohibition of export of cattle from India and we should adopt means of increasing and purifying our milk supply. I have not a shadow of doubt that if we proceed along these sane lines, we would secure voluntary Mussulman support, and when we have ceased to compel them to stop killing cows on their festival days, we would find that they have no occasion for insisting on killing them. Any show of force on our part must lead to retaliation and exacerbation of feeling. We may not make Mussulmans or anybody respect our feelings religious or otherwise by force. We can really do so only by exciting their fellow-feeling.

Hence it is that I have declined, and I am sure quite wisely, to enter into any bargain on the khilafat question. I consider myself to be among the staunchest of Hindus. I am as eager to save the cow from the Mussulman’s knife as any Hindu. But on that very account I refuse to make my support of the Mussulman claim on the khilafat conditional upon his saving the cow. The Mussulman is my neighbour. He is in distress. His grievance is legitimate and it is my bounden duty to help him to secure redress by every legitimate means in my power even to the extent of losing my life and property. That is the way I can win permanent friendship with Mussulmans. I refuse to suspect human nature. It will, is bound to, respond to any noble and friendly action. The nobility of the help will be rendered nugatory if it was rendered conditionally. That the result will be the saving of the cow is a certainty. But should it turn out to be otherwise, my view will not be affected in any manner whatsoever. The test of friendship is a spirit of love and sacrifice independent of expectation of any return.

But one observes a spirit of impatience on the part of the Hindus. In our eagerness to protect the cow we seek to legislate through munici-palities and get the resolutions passed by Mussulman meetings. I would urge my Hindu countrymen to be patient. Our Mussulman countrymen are themselves doing most handsomely in the matter. I remind the read-ers of Maulana Abdul Bari’s\(^1\) declaration that he would not take any pro-ferred aid unless he, a devout Mussulman, could see his way clear to ask-ing his followers to protect the cow. He has been as good as his word. He has been unremittingly attempting to create a favourable atmosphere for receiving the doctrine of cow protection on humanitarian and utilitarian grounds. Hakimjee Ajmalkhan\(^2\) as President of the Muslim League last year carried his resolution of abstention from cow-killing on festival days in the teeth of opposition members. The Ali Brothers have stopped beef-eating in their household. We must feel deeply grateful to those noble-hearted Mussulmans for their unsolicited response. We must let them solve the difficult problem in their own way. My advice to my Hindu brethren is, “simply help the Mussulmans in their sorrow in a generous and self-sacrificing spirit without counting the cost and you will auto-matically save the cow”. Islam is a noble faith. Trust it and its followers.

84. LETTER TO MOHANLAL

ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

August 7, 1920

Bhai Mohanlal,

I do not approve of deception anywhere. The question whether corruption will increase or decrease day by day has nothing to do with the removal of untouchability. Dharma lies in removing it. I believe the national school in Wadhwan can look after the education of small children. The only way for removing unemployment among the middle classes is to teach them vocations which will require them to use their hands and feet. I have had no contact with Shri Arvind Babu.

86. PASSING AWAY OF THE LOKAMANYA

The Lokamanya was in a class by himself. The country has proved that the title which the people gave to Tilak Maharaj was a hundred thousand times more precious than any that could be conferred by a king. It is no exaggeration to say that the whole of Bombay turned out on that Sunday to give him a final farewell.

The scenes I witnessed during his last days on earth are unforgettable. People’s profound love for him was beyond description.

In France it is the practice to say: “The King is dead; long live the King.” That idea spread to Britain and other countries and, whenever a king dies, they proclaim: “The King is dead; long live the King.” It means much in substance that the King never dies and the State machine never stops even for a second.

In quite the same way, the mammoth meeting in Bombay has shown that Tilak Maharaj can never die, is not dead, that he is living and will live for ever. His relatives, indeed, may have been stricken with grief and their eyes may have dropped pearls, but the villagers from the Ghats who went out with their musical instruments did by no means go weeping and lamenting. They had gathered to celebrate a festival. Their musical instruments and their bhajans² reminded the people that Tilak Maharaj was not dead. The place resounded with loud cries of “Tilak Maharaj ki jai” \(^1\) and the very idea that his body was to be cremated was quite forgotten. The people thus came to the right conclusion and proved that the doctors’ bulletins were wrong.

² Devotional songs

I had felt some uneasiness on Saturday night when I heard the news but, on hearing the cry of jai the feeling disappeared and I, too, felt that Tilak Maharaj was still alive. The transient body has perished, but his immortal soul is enthroned for ever in the hearts of millions.

An English writer has said that even two bosom-friends, while they live, are separated in body. They may even feel that they are different from each other. If they are real friends, the one who dies first breaks down the barriers. He lives in the body of the friend who survives and is not dead to him. In the same way, Tilak Maharaj lives today in the bodies of millions. On Saturday, in particular, he was alive in his own body.

No leader of the people has had such a glorious death in modern times. Dadabhai\(^2\) passed away and so did Gokhale and Pherozeshah\(^3\). Thousands had followed them on their last journey but, with Tilak, the very limit was reached. He was followed by a whole people. On Sunday, Bombay was not itself.

What miracle, this! There is nothing like a miracle in this world, or, better still, the world itself is a great miracle. The rule that there is no effect without a cause has no exception. The Lokamanya’s love for India knew no bounds and, therefore, the people’s love for him was equally boundless. No one else has chanted the mantra\(^4\) of swaraj as continually as he did. While others sincerely believed that India would presently be fit for swaraj, he believed equally sincerely that India was already fit and ready for it. This conviction won him the love of the people. But he was not satisfied merely with believing this; he spent his whole life acting on this conviction and that fired the people with a new spirit. He infected them with his impatience for swaraj and, as the infection was caught, more and more people were drawn towards him.

He never gave up chanting this mantra of swaraj through all the dangers he had to face and all the suffering he had to bear. He thus emerged successful from this difficult test as well and as a result, the people put all the greater trust in him and his word became a law to them.

Such a great life never ends with the passing away of the body. It really begins then.

A friend has written to me saying that something special ought to be done for Tilak Maharaj and asking for my advice in the matter. He wonders if a three-day hartal would not be the right thing. I elaborate here the suggestion I have made in my reply to him.

The right way of expressing our veneration for a man is to emulate his good qualities. I would, therefore, prefer some constructive work to a hartal. It is certainly necessary to observe a hartal, keep a fast and do similar things on that day, but the "specialness" lies in emulating his virtues. He was a man of extreme simplicity; so in memory of him we should take to simplicity ourselves and give up using certain things to the point of being put to discomfort. He was a man of courage; let us be brave likewise, and do only that which our conscience approves and never swerve from our aim. He was a thoughtful man; we, too, must learn to think before we speak or act. He was a learned man and had a wonderful command over his mother tongue and Sanskrit; let us take pains to be scholars like him. Let us give up using a foreign language in the conduct of our affairs, be proficient in our mother tongues and learn to express all our thoughts in them. Let us study Sanskrit and discover the beauties of spiritual wisdom which lie hidden in our Shastras. He was a lover of swadeshi; we also should understand the meaning of swadeshi and adopt swadeshi in practice. He had unbounded love for the country; let us, too, cultivate the same love for it in our hearts and, to the best of our ability, be daily more devoted to national service. This is the right way to venerate him. Those who cannot do even these things may contribute anything, from a pice onwards, for perpetuating his memory, and the money so donated may be used for founding national schools, for giving scholarships to deserving students to enable them to receive the right kind of education and for such other public purposes.

The Lokamanya was certainly a bitter enemy of the present administrative set-up, but the belief some persons entertain that he disliked the British is mistaken. I have often heard praises of the British from his own lips. He was not opposed to the British connection in all circumstances, but he wanted himself and his people to be recognized as equals of the British. He hated to be subject to the British or to any other power.

He had so much faith in the common people of Britain that he once made the rather unusual suggestion that we should use the medium of the cinema to tell them of the Punjab atrocities.

We are mourning the passing away of such a veteran among patriots. There is no denying that it would have been all to our gain if he had continued to live in the body in which we knew him. But a man such as he was continues to serve the country and lead it, whether or not he lives in the body. A man, who had thought out his plan of action and followed it for forty-five years, who wore out his body in the service of the nation, is never forgotten after his death, he never dies. Let us, then, tell ourselves that the Lokamanya, even in his death, has taught us the secret of living.

87. POSITION OF THE CONGRESS

I have always entertained the highest regard for the Honourable Pandit Malaviya and know him to be the very soul of dharma. He has advised me to suspend non-co-operation till after the special session of the Congress is over. The editor of The Mahratta and others have also given this advice. It is painful for me not to listen to the advice of Panditji. I would normally honour his advice at any cost to myself. When, however, the still small voice within me suggests otherwise, I become helpless and cannot meekly submit even to his advice. Just such an occasion has arisen for me now.

My suspending non-co-operation means that the Muslims also should do likewise. For them, after the announcement of the khilafat terms non-co-operation has become a religious duty. How can they co-operate with those who have insulted their religion and endangered its existence? How can they accept any gift from them? Moreover, how can I suspend non-co-operation without some strong reasons after having, with full deliberation, advised the nation to follow a particular course of action? It has become my inescapable dharma to continue non-co-operation on the khilafat issue.

I must say this having regard to the present situation. But let us examine the position of the Congress. In my humble opinion the Congress takes stock annually of people’s feelings and thoughts. Generally, it does not show a new path to the people. That is not its function. The prestige the Congress enjoys results from its being the organ of public opinion. Hence, it is not our duty, before taking up a new programme, to wait for the Congress to meet. If we so wait, the Congress can make no progress. If everybody suspends non-co-operation till after the opinion of the Congress is known, it will remain suspended for ever. If all people do not have an opinion of their own, the Congress is not something entirely apart from the people so that one might supplicate it for the gift of opinions. The Congress cannot pronounce an opinion unless a majority view has been formed on a particular question. This only means that those in the minority should carry on their work despite this handicap. The Congress does not, cannot wish to, and has no right to, come in their way. Hence anyone who likes a certain reform, who has faith in his capacity and who is a supporter of the Congress owes it to the latter to place his idea before the people so that the Congress may act upon it, can have the material on which to form an opinion. All reforms which have come about have done so in this manner. Nobody waited for the opinion of the Congress when opposing the Rowlatt Act.

The advice which Panditji has given me with much love only means that he has not formed a final opinion regarding non-co-operation. That I cannot accept this advice means that I have come to a firm decision. It is my sincere belief that we are committing a sin in delaying non-co-operation. So long as I had even a little faith in the Government’s sense of justice, I co-operated with it and advised the people to do likewise. At the Amritsar Congress, I had very emphatically advised co-operation with the Government because I sincerely believed that the Punjab and the Muslims would get justice. When my belief proved to have been wrong, I turned to non-co-operation. For me, the Government’s favours and its reforms are as much to be shunned as poisoned milk. Hence, even if I am in a minority of one, I shall keep proclaiming that we must not enter its legislatures.

Delegates to the Congress are of three types: Those who are positively in favour of a given policy, those who are positively opposed to it and those who hold no fixed views. It is the duty of those belonging to the first category to try to influence those who belong to the last, and what else can have a greater impact than action? My own judgment, therefore, tells me that it is the duty of those who see India’s good in non-co-operation, who see a possibility of getting justice in regard to the khilafat and the Punjab only through non-co-operation, to go ahead with it and advise others to do likewise and create public opinion in this way. That is the way to honour the Congress and help it to go forward. No reformer waits for anybody else before implementing his ideas. The eternal law is that one should not delay virtuous action by waiting for advice and should not commit a wrong even if advised to do so. In the present circumstances, I look upon non-co-operation as virtuous action.

88. WHAT THE SCRIPTURES SAY

Sir Narayan Chandavarkar and other friends have written an article in which they have condemned non-co-operation in strong terms and said that the scriptures and history are against it. The signatories have stated that the Gita, the Koran, the Bible and the Zend-Avesta of the Parsis, all hold non-co-operation to be wrong. They have cited no texts.

I think I too have been a student of the Gita in my own way. I have seen in it the principle of non-co-operation. The Gita speaks of the war between the divine and the demoniac. It makes it quite clear that good and evil can never be reconciled. If we interpret its teaching literally, we see that when Arjuna refused to fight the wicked Kauravas, Shri Krishna urged him to do so. Thus, literally interpreted, the Gita teaches us not only to refuse co-operation with the tyrant but even to punish him. Though the spirit of the Gita certainly does not teach this latter course, every line of it speaks of the war between good and evil.

Just as light and darkness are ever opposed to each other, just as cold and heat can never exist together, so also justice and injustice are incompatible. This is the reason for the age-old practice among us of a person leaving another when hurt. When the subjects can bear a tyrant-king no longer, they keep aloof from him to express their displeasure. When things become unbearable, the subjects even used to leave the king’s territory. Such instances have been quite frequent. Even today, the thing is happening in two countries. Prahlad non-co-operated with his wicked father, Mirabai with her husband and Narasinh Mehta\(^1\) with fellow-members of his community. Today we revere all three. Tulsidas described the difference between the good man and the evil and showed the impossibility of association between the two. Hinduism, thus, teaches that the association of good with evil is ever undersirable. In the Zend-Avesta, Ormuzd and Ahriman are ever at war and, in the Bible, God and Satan. Ormuzd—God—is the perfection of goodness, Ahriman—Satan—is an embodiment of evil. Jesus Christ was nothing if not a heroic satyagrahi. He employed non-co-operation against the hypocrites, the liars and men drunk with pride. He did not hesitate to introduce divisions in families for the sake of moral principles and he himself opposed, all alone, the mighty Roman Empire. What remains is Koran-e-Sharif. People have written about Islam as if they were ignorant of the life of the Prophet. While he lived in Mecca, he followed the way of non-co-operation with the evil-doers. When the Muslims themselves cite support for non-co-operation in their religion, how very strange it is to tell them that their religion is against it!

The evidence of history, too, endorses non-co-operation. By and large, history is a story of war, and war is merely an extreme example of non-co-operation. One side breaking off ties with another is but a form of non-co-operation. War is an example of demoniac non-co-operation. I do not think I am being guilty of presumption in claiming that the non-co-operation I am placing before the country is of the divine type. Non-co-operation which involves violence may succeed or fail, but that non-co-operation which requires nothing but self-sacrifice can end only in success. It simply passes my understanding how anyone can oppose such non-co-operation, for the man who resorts to non-co-operation of the divine type will not resume co-operation till he gets justice. The Germans employed the non-co-operation of armed conflict and so, when defeated, they surrendered. The Dukhobours, in Russia employed unarmed non-co-operation and, therefore, met with no defeat. When it became impossible for them to continue to live in Russia, they left the country rather than submit to its oppressive rulers. Today, they live as a highly respected community in Canada. When an individual employs non-co-operation, the individual wins; when a community employs it, the community wins. Thus, in non-co-operation of the divine type, effort is never fruitless nor is there any question of moral taint. Its practice even to a limited extent is beneficial and saves the man who resorts to it from great danger. By renouncing the title conferred by a tyrant, the man who practises this renunciation ensures, through such non-co-operation, his happiness. By renouncing his courts, the man wins his own satisfaction to that extent. If a majority of the people perform this act of renunciation, society as a whole will have given up co-operation with injustice, washed itself clean and, to that extent, grown healthier.

\(^{1}\) 1414-1479; saint-poet of Gujarat and devotee of Krishna; freely mixed with the so-called untouchables in devotional gatherings

Co-operation and non-co-operation have been accepted policies in use since times immemorial—co-operation, always, with the just and non-co-operation with the unjust. Both the Government of India and the Imperial Government have been doing, recently, one injustice after another. The former has been trying to cover up its original injustice with numberless wrongs. Co-operation with it is a sin, non-co-operation a duty.

Separation from the one [the good] kills, while a chance meeting with the other [the wicked] causes the severest pain.¹

That is why the Shastras enjoin the rule of non-co-operation with the wicked. It cannot be invalidated by any number of manifestos.

89. COW PROTECTION

The cause of cow protection is very dear to me. If someone were to ask me what the most important outward manifestation of Hinduism was, I would suggest that it was the idea of cow protection. It has been clear to me for many years past that we have forsaken this duty. I have seen no country in the world where the progeny of the cow is so ill-fed and ill-cared for as in India. We do not find anywhere else such large number of cattle with bones sticking out of their flesh as we do in India. In England the people actually eat beef, but I did not see in that country cattle which were ill-fed and ill-kept.

We are as weak as our cattle are. It is not surprising to find three crores dying of hunger where the cattle are in similar plight.

Look at the condition of our pinjrapoles. I have respect for the kindness of the managers, but I have very little respect for their capacity for managing things. I do not believe that the pinjrapoles protect cows and their progeny. They should not be places where ill-fed and ill-kept cattle may be looked after and allowed to die peacefully. I would expect to see in them ideal cows and bulls. Pinjrapoles should be located, not in the heart of cities but in big fields and they should bring, instead of consuming, plenty of money.

How do the Hindus look after the cattle in the country? Are they not Hindus who goad them with sharpened nails on sticks, who put unbearable loads on them, keep them without enough fodder and make them work more than they can?

It is my firm conviction that the Hindus’ first duty is to put their own house in order. I would, if I could and had the necessary time at my disposal, engage the various cow protection bodies in reforming the pinjrapoles, in imparting to the people scientific knowledge of cattle-breeding, in teaching cruel Hindus to have compassion for their cattle and in making available pure milk to the poorest child and to the sick. And I would first ask the Hindus to take charge of the gigantic task of organizing such bodies.

And then I would request the Englishmen to give up beef-eating. The princes forget, when entertaining English guests, the duty [of cow protection] which is especially theirs and do not hesitate to order beef for them; I would request them to save themselves from this violation of their dharma, I would shame them into doing so.

Only after I have done this may I be entitled to ask my Muslim friends to stop cow-slaughter. Our duty, thus, is clear enough, but we have taken up the last thing first. We seem to think that all we need to do by way of cow protection is to save cows from the hands of Muslims, either with their goodwill or with force. As a result, the hostility between Hindus and Muslims has increased, a cause for discord has been created and the effort [to save cows in this manner] has led to their slaughter in increased numbers, for the thing became a point of honour with the Muslims. Our supreme duty is to lay down our lives for saving the cow.

Today, however, we have an invaluable opportunity and I have embraced it. Every Hindu can do the same thing and easily ensure the protection of cows. A great misfortune has befallen the Muslims, their religion has been slighted. At such a time, we should help them unconditionally, without asking for anything in return. It is our duty as neighbours to do this. The man who does his duty gets his reward, whether he hopes for it or not. By doing our duty to the Muslims, we challenge their nobility.

Friendship which asks for a reward is no friendship; it is bargaining. If, at this juncture, we give up all thought of bargaining and help the Muslims, we shall ensure [cow] protection of their own free will.

Some persons argue that in this matter Muslims cannot be trusted. I, for one, believe in human nature; I have faith in Islam. It is a divine law that nobility will be answered by nobility. It is only when our motives are mixed that we see contrary results. Even today, Muslims on their own have been doing much. Maulana Abdul Bari accepted my help only when he could find in his religion sanction for refraining from killing cows. Hakim Ajmal Khan is working hard for their protection. The Ali Brothers have banished beef from their homes altogether.

Let us not, by our suspicions or our impatience, endanger the change which is taking place.

I observe at some places a movement for legislation to ban cow-slaughter. Everywhere I hear people suggesting that we make conditions with the Muslims. In both these, I see nothing but harm. Orthodox Hindus have only one thing to do at present and that is, to discharge, quietly, the duty, which is morally theirs, of helping Muslims. That is the way to ensure complete protection of the religion and honour of either.

90. LETTER TO H. KALLENBACH

August 10, 1920

MY DEAR LOWER HOUSE,

After how long a time have I the good fortune to write to you? After the greatest search, I have now got your address. Never has a day passed but I have thought of you. The first information imparted to me about you was by a lady in Johannesburg. Miss Winterbottom and Polak could tell me nothing. P. K. Naidu could tell me nothing. Dr. Mehta sent me a cable to give me your address. I have also a letter from Jamnadas whom I have asked to see you in Berlin if you could at all be seen. Jamnadas tells either he or Dr. Mehta will try to see you. How I wish I could go over to see you and hug you. For me you have risen from the dead. I had taken it for granted that you were dead. I could not believe that you would keep me without a letter for so long. The alternative was that you had written but your letters were not delivered to me at all. I wrote to your camp and there was no reply. I still think that you have written but your letter has not been delivered to me. I am cabling to Dr. Mehta to see you. What shall I say of me? I shall forbear for the time being. Devdas is with me, ever growing in every way and every direction. I am just now travelling with Devdas and another faithful companion on whom you would dote. I have come in closest touch with a lady who often travels with me. Our relationship is indefinable. I call her my spiritual wife. A friend has called it an intellectual wedding. I want you to see her. It was under her roof that I passed several months at Manilal\(^2\) and Ramdas\(^3\) are in Phoenix looking after Indian Opinion. Harilal\(^4\) is in Calcutta doing his business.

He has lost his wife. And Mrs. G. is looking after his children. Chhaganlal\(^5\) and Maganlal are with me. Medh\(^6\) and Pragji\(^7\) are in India. Pragji remains in touch with me, not Medh so much. Maganbhai is not with me. You now know something about most members of the family that you know. Oh! I must not omit Imam saheb\(^8\). He and his are with me, his loyalty is wonderful. I gave away Fatima\(^9\) in marriage the other day. And this has made him happy. Andrews I see often. He lives in Bengal. Anandlal\(^10\) too is with me. I am editing two weeklies. Both are doing well. I am engaged in a fierce struggle with the Government. No one can foretell the issue.

And now I shall stop. I was two years ago in death’s grip. If you are free I want you to resume correspondence. My life is simpler than ever. My food is not fruit and nuts. I am living on goat’s milk and bread and raisins. I am under a vow not to take more than five things. Cow’s milk I would not like because of the vows I took in London. Salt I do not abjure because I find that we take inorganic salt in water and inhale it from the sea.

With love and expectation of seeing your own writing soon.

91. THE DOCTRINE OF THE SWORD

In this age of the rule of brute force, it is almost impossible for anyone to believe that anyone else could possibly reject the law of the final supremacy of brute force. And so I receive anonymous letters advising me that I must not interfere with the progress of non-co-operation even though popular violence may break out. Others come to me and assuming that secretly I must be plotting violence, inquire when the happy moment for declaring open violence will arrive. They assure me that the English will never yield to anything but violence secret or open. Yet others, I am informed, believe that I am the most rascally person living in India because I never give out my real intention and that they have not a shadow of a doubt that I believe in violence just as much as most people do.

Such being the hold that the doctrine of the sword has on the majority of mankind, and as success of non-co-operation depends principally on absence of violence during its pendency and as my views in this matter affect the conduct of a large number of people, I am anxious to state them as clearly as possible.

I do believe that where there is only a choice between cowardice and violence I would advise violence. Thus when my eldest son asked me what he should have done, had he been present when I was almost fatally assaulted in 1908,\(^1\) whether he should have run away and seen me killed or whether he should have used his physical force which he could and wanted to use, and defended me, I told him that it was his duty to defend me even by using violence. Hence it was that I took part in the Boer War, the so-called Zulu rebellion and the late War. Hence also do I advocate training in arms for those who believe in the method of violence. I would rather have India resort to arms in order to defend her honour than that she should in a cowardly manner become or remain a helpless witness to her own dishonour.

But I believe that non-violence is infinitely superior to violence, forgiveness is more manly than punishment. Forgiveness adorns a soldier. But abstinence is forgiveness only when proceed from a helpless creature. A mouse hardly forgives a cat when it allows itself to be torn to pieces by her. I, therefore, appreciate the sentiment of those who cry out for the condign punishment of General Dyer and his like. They would tear him to pieces if they could. But I do not believe India to be helpless. I do not believe myself to be a helpless creature. Only I want to use India’s and my strength for a better purpose.

Let me not be misunderstood. Strength does not come from physical capacity. It comes from an indomitable will. An average Zulu is any way more than a match for an average Englishman in bodily capacity. But he flees from an English boy, because he fears the boy’s revolver or those who will use it for him. He fears death and is nerveless in spite of his burly figure. We in India may in a moment realize that one hundred thousand Englishmen need not frighten three hundred million human beings. A definite forgiveness would therefore mean a definite recognition of our strength. With enlightened forgiveness must come a mighty wave of strength in us, which would make it impossible for a Dyer and a Frank Johnson to heap affront upon India’s devoted head. It matters little to me that for the moment I do not drive my point home. We feel too downtrodden not to be angry and revengeful. But I must not refrain from saying that India can gain more by waiving the right of punishment. We have better work to do, a better mission to deliver to the world.

I am not a visionary. I claim to be a practical idealist. The religion of non-violence is not meant merely for the rishis and saints. It is meant for the common people as well. Non-violence is the law of our species as violence is the law of the brute. The spirit lies dormant in the brute and he knows no law but that of physical might. The dignity of man requires obedience to a higher law—to the strength of the spirit.

I have therefore ventured to place before India the ancient law of self-sacrifice. For satyagraha and its off-shoots, non-co-operation and civil resistance, are nothing but new names for the law of suffering. The rishis, who discovered the law of non-violence in the midst of violence, were greater geniuses than Newton. They were themselves greater warriors than Wellington. Having themselves known the use of arms, they realized their uselessness and taught a weary world that its salvation lay not through violence but through non-violence.

Non-violence in its dynamic condition means conscious suffering. It does not mean meek submission to the will of the evildoer, but it means the putting of one’s soul against the will of the tyrant. Working under this law of our being, it is possible for a single individual to defy the whole might of an unjust empire to save his honour, his religion, his soul and lay the foundation for that empire’s fall or its regeneration.

And so I am not pleading for India to practise non-violence because it is weak. I want her to practise non-violence being conscious of her strength and power. No training in arms is required for realization of her strength. We seem to need it because we seem to think that we are but a lump of flesh. I want India to recognize that she has a soul that cannot perish and that can rise triumphant above every physical weakness and defy the physical combination of whole world. What is the meaning of Rama, a mere human being, with his host of monkeys, pitting himself against the insolent strength of ten-headed Ravana surrounded in supposed safety by the raging waters on all sides of Lanka? Does it not mean the conquest of physical might by spiritual strength? However, being a practical man, I do not wait till India recognizes the practicability of the spiritual life in the political world. India considers herself to be powerless and paralysed before the machineguns, the tanks and the aeroplanes of the English. And she takes up non-co-operation out of her weakness. It must still serve the same purpose, namely, bring her delivery from the crushing weight of British injustice if a sufficient number of people practise it.

I isolate this non-co-operation from Sinn Feinism, for, it is so conceived as to be incapable of being offered side by side with violence. But I invite even the school of violence to give this peaceful non-co-operation a trial. It will not fail through its inherent weakness. It may fail because of poverty of response. Then will be the time for real danger. The high-souled men, who are unable to suffer national humiliation any longer, will want to vent their wrath. They will take to violence. So far as I know, they must perish without delivering themselves or their country from the wrong. If India takes up the doctrine of the sword, she may gain momentary victory. Then India will cease to be pride of my heart. I am wedded to India because I owe my all to her. I believe absolutely that she has a mission for the world. She is not to copy Europe blindly. India’s acceptance of the doctrine of the sword will be the hour of my trial. I hope I shall not be found wanting. My religion has no geographical Limits. If I have a living faith in it, it will transcend my love for India herself. My life is dedicated to service of India through the religion of non-violence which I believe to be the root of Hinduism.

Meanwhile I urge those who distrust me, not to disturb the even working of the struggle that has just commenced, by inciting to violence in the belief that I want violence. I detest secrecy as a sin. Let them give non-violent non-co-operation a trial and they will find that I had no mental reservation whatsoever.

Young India, 11-8-1920
92. COURTS AND SCHOOLS

The Non-co-operation Committee has included, in the first stage, boycott of law-courts by lawyers and of Government schools and colleges by parents or scholars as the case may be. I know that, it is only my reputation as a worker and fighter, which has saved me from an open charge of lunacy for having given the advice about boycott of courts and schools.

I venture however to claim some method about my madness. It does not require much reflection to see that it is through courts that a government establishes its authority and it is through schools that it manufactures clerks and other employees. They are both healthy institutions when the government in charge of them is on the whole just. They are death-traps when the government is unjust.

FIRST AS TO LAWYERS

No newspaper has combated my views on non-co-operation with so much pertinacity and ability as the Allahabad Leader. It has ridiculed my views on lawyers expressed in my booklet, Indian Home Rule, written by me in 1908. I adhere to the views then expressed. And if I find time I hope to elaborate them in these columns. But I refrain from so doing for the time being as my special views have nothing to do with my advice on the necessity of lawyers suspending practice. I submit that national non-co-operation requires suspension of their practice by lawyers. Perhaps no one co-operates with a government more than lawyers through its law-courts. Lawyers interpret laws to the people and thus support authority. It is for that reason that they are styled officers of the court. They may be called honorary office-holders. It is said that it is the lawyers who have put up the most stubborn fight against the Government. This is no doubt partly true. But that does not undo the mischief that is inherent in the profession. So when the nation wishes to paralyse the Government, that profession, if it wishes to help the nation to bend the Government to its will, must suspend practice. But, say the critics, the Government will be too pleased, if the pleaders and barristers fell into the trap laid by me. I do not believe it. What is true in ordinary times is not true in extraordinary times. In normal times the Government may resent fierce criticism of their manners and methods by lawyers, but in the face of fierce action they would be loath to part with a single lawyer’s support through his practice in the courts.

Moreover, in my scheme, suspension does not mean stagnation. The lawyers are not to suspend practice and enjoy rest. They will be expected to induce their clients to boycott courts. They will improvise arbitration boards in order to settle disputes. A nation, that is bent on forcing justice from an unwilling Government, has little time for engaging in mutual quarrels. This truth the lawyers will be expected to bring home to their clients. The readers may not know that many of the most noted lawyers of England suspended their work during the late war. The lawyers, then, upon temporarily leaving their profession, became whole-time workers instead of being workers only during their recreation hours. Real politics are not a game. The late Mr. Gokhale used to deplore that we had not gone beyond treating politics as a pastime. We have no notion as to how much the country has lost by reason of amateurs having managed its battles with the serious-minded, trained and wholetime-working bureaucracy.

The critics then argue that the lawyers will starve, if they leave their profession. This cannot be said of the Sinhas of the profession. They do at times suspend work for visiting Europe or otherwise. Of those who live from hand to mouth, if they are honest men, each local Khilafat Committee can pay them an honorarium against full-time service.

Lastly, for Mohammedan lawyers, it has been suggested that if they stop their practice, Hindus will take it up. I am hoping Hindus will at least show the negative courage of not touching their Muslim brethren’s clients, even if they do not suspend their own practice. But I am sure no religiously minded Mussulman will be found to say that they can carry on the fight only if the Hindus stand side by side with them in sacrifice. If the Hindus do as they must, it will be to their honour and for the common good of both. But the Mussulmans must go forward whether the Hindus join them or not. If it is a matter of life and death with them, they must not count the cost. No cost is too heavy for the preservation of one’s honour, especially religious honour. Only they will sacrifice who cannot abstain. Forced sacrifice is no sacrifice. It will not last. A movement lacks sincerity when it is supported by unwilling workers under pressure. The khilafat movement will become an irresistible force when every Mussulman treats the Peace Terms as an individual wrong. No one waits for others’ help or sacrifice in matters of private personal wrong. He seeks help no doubt, but his battle against the wrong goes on whether he gains help or not. If he has justice on his side, the divine law is that he does get help. God is the help of the helpless. When the Pandava brothers\textsuperscript{1} were unable to help Draupadi, God came to the rescue and saved her honour. The Prophet was helped by God when he seemed to be forsaken by men.

NOW FOR THE SCHOOLS

I feel that if we have not the courage to suspend the education to our children, we do not deserve to win the battle.

The first stage includes renunciation of honours or favours. As a matter of fact no government bestows favours without taking more than the favours are worth. It would be a bad and extravagant government which threw away its favours. In a government broad-based upon a people’s will, we give our lives to secure a trinket which is a symbol of service. Under an unjust government which defies a people’s will, rich jaighrs become a sign of servitude and dishonour. Thus considered, the school must be given up without a moment’s thought.

For me the whole scheme of non-co-operation is among other things a test of the intensity and extent of our feeling. Are we genuine? Are we prepared to suffer? It has been said that we may not expect much response from title-holders, for they have never taken part in national affairs and have bought their honours at too great a price easily to sacrifice them. I make a present of the argument to the objectors, and ask, what about the parents of school children and the grown-up college students? They have no such intimate connection with the Government as the title-holders. Do they or do they not feel enough to enable them to sacrifice the schooling?

But I contend that there is no sacrifice involved in emptying the schools. We must be specially unfit for non-co-operation if we are so helpless as to be unable to manage our own education in total independence of the Government. Every village should manage the education of its own children. I would not depend upon Government aid. If there is a real awakening the schooling need not be interrupted for a single day. The very schoolmasters who are now conducting

\textsuperscript{1} The five sons of Pandu and heroes of the Mahabharata Government schools, if they are good enough to resign their office, could take charge of national schools and teach our children the things they need, and not make of the majority of them indifferent clerks. I do look to the Aligarh College to give the lead in this matter. The moral effect created by the emptying of our madrasahs will be tremendous. I doubt not that the Hindu parents and scholars would not fail to copy their Mussulman brethren.

Indeed what could be grander education than that the parents and scholars should put religious sentiment before a knowledge of letters? If therefore no arrangement could be immediately made for the literary instruction of youths who might be withdrawn, it would be most profitable training for them to be able to work as volunteers for the cause which may necessitate their withdrawal from Government schools. For as in the case of the lawyers, so in the case of boys, my notion of withdrawal does not mean an indolent life. The withdrawing boys will, each according to his worth, be expected to take their share in the agitation.

93. INTERVIEW TO “THE MADRAS MAIL” ON NON-CO-OPERATION

August 12, 1920

A representative of this journal¹ called on Mr. M. K. Gandhi yesterdaay. . . . Mr. Gandhi, who has come to Madras on a tour to some of the principal Muslim centres in Southern India, was busy with a number of workers discussing his programme; but he expressed his readiness to answer questions on the chief topic which is agitating Muslims and Hindus.

[REPRESENTATIVE :] After your experience of the satyagraha agitation last year, Mr. Gandhi, are you still hopeful and convinced of the wisdom of advising non-co-operation?

[GANDHII :] Certainly.

How do you consider conditions have altered since the satyagraha movement of last year?

I consider that people are better disciplined now than they were

² The Madras Mail
before. In this I include even the masses whom I have had opportunities of seeing in large numbers in various parts of the country.

And you are satisfied that the masses understand the spirit of sayagraha?

Yes.

And that is why you are pressing on with the programme of non-co-operation?

Yes. Moreover, the danger that attended the civil disobedience part of satyagraha does not apply to non-co-operation, because in non-co-operation we are not taking up civil disobedience of laws as a mass movement. The result hitherto has been most encouraging. For instance, people in Sind and Delhi, in spite of the irritating restrictions upon their liberty by the authorities, have carried out the committee’s instructions in regard to the Seditious Meetings Proclamation and to the prohibition of posting placards on the walls which we hold to be inoffensive but which the authorities consider to be offensive.

What is the pressure which you expect to bring to bear on the authorities if co-operation is withdrawn?

I believe, and everybody must grant, that no Government can exist for a single moment without the co-operation of the people, willing or forced, and if people suddenly withdraw their co-operation in every detail, the Government will come to a standstill.

But is there not a big “if” in it?

Certainly, there is.

And how do you propose to succeed against the big “if”?

In my plan of campaign, expediency has no room. If the khilafat movement has really permeated the masses and the classes, there must be adequate response from the people.

But are you not begging the question?

I am not begging the question, because so far as data before me go, I believe that the Muslims keenly feel the khilafat grievance. It remains to be seen whether their feeling is intense enough to evoke in them the measure of sacrifice adequate for successful non-co-operation.

That is, your survey of the conditions, you think, justifies your advising non-co-operation in the full conviction that you have behind you the support of the vast masses of the Mussulman population?

Yes.

This non-co-operation, you are satisfied, will extend to complete severance of co-operation with the Government?
No; nor is it the present moment my desire that it should. I am simply practising non-co-operation to the extent that is necessary to make the Government realize the depth of popular feeling in the matter and the dissatisfaction with the Government that all that could be done has not been done either by the Government of India or by the Imperial Government whether on the khilafat question or on the Punjab question.

Do you, Mr. Gandhi, realize that even amongst Mohammedans there are sections of people who are not enthusiastic over non-co-operation however much they may feel the wrong that has been done to their community?

Yes. But their number is smaller than those who are prepared to adopt non-co-operation.

And yet does not the fact that there has not been an adequate response to your appeal for resignation of titles and offices and for boycott of elections of the councils indicate that you may be placing more faith in their strength of conviction than is warranted?

I think not; for the reason that the stage has only just come into operation and our people are always most cautious and slow to move. Moreover, the first stage largely affects the uppermost strata of society, who represent a microscopic minority though they are undoubtedly an influential body of people.

This upper class, you think, has sufficiently responded to your appeal?

I am unable to say either one way or the other at present. I shall be able to give a definite answer at the end of this month . . .

Do you think that without one’s loyalty to the King and the royal family being questioned, one can advocate non-co-operation in connection with the royal visit?

Most decidedly; for the simple reason that if there is any disloyalty about the proposed boycott of the Prince’s visit, it is disloyalty to the Government of the day and not to the person of His Royal Highness.

What do you think is to be gained by promoting this boycott in connection with the royal visit?

Because I want to show that the people of India are not in sympathy with the Government of the day and that they strongly disapprove of the policy of the Government in regard to the Punjab and khilafat, and even in respect of other important administrative measures. I consider that the visit of the Prince of Wales is a singularly good opportunity to the people to show their disapproval of the present Government. After all, the visit is calculated to have tremendous political results. It is not to be a non-political event, and seeing that the Government of India and the Imperial Government want to make the visit a political event of first-class importance, namely, for the purpose of strengthening their hold upon India, I for one, consider that it is the bounden duty of the people to boycott the visit which is being engineered by the two Governments in their own interest which at the present moment is totally antagonistic to the people.

Do you mean that you want this boycott promoted because you feel that the strengthening of the hold upon India is not desirable in the best interests of the country?

Yes. The strengthening of the hold of a Government so wicked as the present one is not desirable for the best interests of the people. Not that I want the bond between England and India to become loosened for the sake of loosening it but I want that bond to become strengthened only in so far as it adds to the welfare of India.

Do you think that non-co-operation and the non-boycott of the legislative councils [are] consistent?

No; because a person who takes up the programme of non-co-operation cannot consistently stand for councils.

Is non-co-operation, in your opinion, an end in itself or a means to an end, and if so, what is the end?

It is a means to an end, the end being to make the present Government just, whereas it has become mostly unjust. Co-operation with a just government is a duty; non-co-operation with an unjust government is equally a duty.

Will you look with favour upon the proposal to enter the councils and to carry on either obstructive tactics or to decline to take the oath of allegiance as consistent with your non-co-operation?

No; as an accurate student of non-co-operation, I consider that such a proposal is inconsistent with the true spirit of non-co-operation. I have often said that a Government really thrives on obstruction, and so far as the proposal not to take the oath of allegiance is concerned, I can really see no meaning in it; it amounts to a useless waste of valuable time and money.

In other words, obstruction is no stage in non-co-operation?
No. . . .

Are you satisfied that all efforts at constitutional agitation have been exhausted and that, non-co-operation is the only course left us?

I do not consider non-co-operation to be unconstitutional, but I do believe that of all the constitutional remedies now left open to us, non-co-operation is the only one left for us.

Do you consider it constitutional to adopt it with a view merely to paralyse Government?

Certainly, it is not unconstitutional, but a prudent man will not take all the steps that are constitutional if they are otherwise undesirable, nor do I advise that course. I am resorting to non-co-operation in progressive stages because I want to evolve true order out of untrue order. I am not going to take a single step in non-co-operation unless I am satisfied that the country is ready for that step, namely, non-co-operation will not be followed by anarchy or disorder.

How will you satisfy yourself that anarchy will not follow?

For instance, if I advise the police to lay down their arms, I shall have satisfied myself that we are able by voluntary assistance to protect ourselves against thieves and robbers. That was precisely what was done in Lahore and Amritsar last year by the citizens by means of volunteers when the military and the police had withdrawn. Even where Government had not taken such measures in a place, for want of adequate force, I know people have successfully protected themselves.

You have advised lawyers to non-co-operate by suspending their practice. What is your experience? Has the lawyers’ response to your appeal encouraged you to hope that you will be able to carry through all stages of non-co-operation with the help of such people?

I cannot say that a large number has yet responded to my appeal. It is too early to say how many will respond. But I may say that I do not rely merely upon the lawyer class or highly educated men to enable the Committee to carry out all the stages of non-co-operation. My hope lies more with the masses so far as the later stages of non-co-operation are concerned.

Young India, 18-8-1920
MR. CHAIRMAN AND FRIENDS.

Like last year, I have to ask your forgiveness that I should have to speak being seated. Whilst my voice has become stronger than it was last year, my body is still weak; and if I were to attempt to speak to you standing, I could not hold on for very many minutes before the whole frame would shake. I hope, therefore, that you will grant me permission to speak seated. I have sat here to address you on a most important question, probably a question whose importance we have not measured up to now.

But before I approach that question on this dear old beach of Madras, you will expect me—you will want me to offer my tribute to the great departed, Lokamanya Tilak Maharaj. (Loud and prolonged cheers.) I would ask this great assembly to listen to me in silence. I have come to make an appeal to your heart and to your reason and I could not do so unless you were prepared to listen to whatever I have to say in absolute silence. I wish to offer my tribute to the departed patriot and I think that I cannot do better than say that his death, as his life, has poured new vigour into the country. If you were present as I was present at that great funeral procession, you would realize with me the meaning of my words. Mr. Tilak lived for his country. The inspiration of his life was freedom for his country which he called swaraj; the inspiration of his deathbed was also freedom for his country. And it was that which gave him such marvellous hold upon his countrymen; it was that which commanded the adoration not of a few chosen Indians belonging to the upper strata of society but of millions of his countrymen. His life was one long sustained piece of self-sacrifice. He began that life of discipline and self-sacrifice in 1879 and he continued that life up to the end of his day, and that was the secret of his hold upon his country. He not only knew what he wanted for his country but also how to live for his country and how to die for his country. I hope then that whatever I say this evening to this vast mass of people, will bear fruit in that same sacrifice for which the life of Lokamanya Tilak Maharaj stands. His life, if it teaches us anything whatsoever, teaches one supreme lesson; that if we want to do anything whatsoever for our country, we can do so not by speeches,

1 At a public meeting, on the beach opposite the Presidency College
however grand, eloquent and convincing they may be, but only by sacrifice at the back of every word and at the back of every act of our life. I have come to ask everyone of you whether you are ready and willing to give sufficiently for your country’s sake, for your country’s honour and for religion. I have boundless faith in you, the citizens of Madras, and the people of this great presidency, a faith which I began to cultivate in the year 1893 when I first made acquaintance with the Tamil labourers in South Africa; and I hope that, in these hours of our trial, this province will not be second to any other in India, and that it will lead in this spirit of self-sacrifice and will translate every word into action.¹

NEED FOR NON-CO-OPERATION

What is this non-co-operation about which you have heard much, and why do we want to offer this non-co-operation? I wish to go for the time being into the why. There are two things before this country. The first and the foremost is the khilafat question. On this the heart of the Mussulmans of India has become lacerated. British pledges, given after the greatest deliberation by the Prime Minister of England in the name of the English nation, have been dragged into the mire. The promises given to moslem India, on the strength of which the consideration that was accepted by the British nation was exacted, have been broken and the great religion of Islam has been placed in danger. The Mussulmans hold—and I venture to think they rightly hold—that so long as British promises remain unfulfilled so long is it impossible for them to tender whole-hearted fealty and loyalty to the British connection; and if it is to be a choice for a devout Mussulman between loyalty to the British connection and loyalty to his Code and Prophet, he will not require a second to make his choice and he has declared his choice. The Mussulmans say frankly, openly and honourably to the whole world that if the British ministers and the British nation do not fulfil the pledges given to them and do not wish to regard with respect the sentiments of 70 millions of the inhabitants of India who profess the faith of Islam, it will be impossible for them to retain Islamic loyalty. It is a question, then, for the rest of the Indian population to consider whether they want to perform a neighbourly duty by their Mussulman countrymen and if they do, they have an opportunity of a lifetime which will not occur for another hundred years, to show their goodwill, fellowship and friendship and to prove what they have been saying for all these long years that the Mussulman is the brother of the Hindu. If the Hindu regards that before the connection with the British nation comes his natural connection with his Moslem brother, then I say to you that if you find that the Moslem claim is just, that it is based upon real sentiment, and that at its background is this great religious feeling, you cannot do otherwise than help the Mussulmans through and through so long as their cause remains just and the means for attaining the end remains equally just, honourable and free from harm to India. These are the plain conditions which the Indian Mussulmans have accepted and it was when they saw that they could accept the proffered aid of the Hindus, that they could always justify the cause and the means before the whole world, that they decided to accept the proffered hand of fellowship. It is then for Hindus and Mussulmans to offer a united front to the whole of the Christian powers of Europe and tell them that weak as India is, India has still got the capacity of preserving her self-respect.

That is the khilafat in a nutshell; but you have also got the Punjab. The Punjab has wounded the heart of India as no other question has for the past century. I do not exclude from my calculation the Mutiny of 1857. Whatever hardships India had to suffer during the Mutiny, the insult that was attempted to be offered to her during the passage of the Rowlatt legislation, and that which was offered after its passage, were unparalleled in Indian history. It is because you want justice from the British nation in connection with the Punjab atrocities, you have to devise ways and means as to how you can get this justice. The House of Commons, the House of Lords, Mr. Montagu, the Viceroy of India, everyone of them knows what the feeling of India is on this khilafat question and on that of the Punjab; the debates in both the Houses of Parliament, the action of Mr. Montagu and that of the Viceroy have demonstrated to you completely that they are not willing to give the justice which is India’s due and which she demands. I suggest that our leaders have got to find a way out of this great difficulty and unless we have made ourselves even with the British rulers in India, and unless we have gained a measures of self-respect at the hands of the British rulers in India, no connection and no friendly intercourse is possible between them and ourselves. I, therefore venture to suggest this beautiful unanswerable method of non-co-operation.

IS IT UNCONSTITUTIONAL?

I have been told that non-co-operation is unconstitutional. I venture to deny that it is unconstitutional. On the contrary, I hold that non-co-operation is a just and religious doctrine; it is the inherent right of every human being and it is perfectly constitutional. A great lover of the British Empire has said that under the British Constitution, even a successful rebellion is perfectly constitutional and he quotes historical instances which I cannot deny in support of his claim. I do not claim any constitutionality for a rebellion successful or otherwise so long as that rebellion means in the ordinary sense of the term what it does mean, namely, wresting justice by violent means. On the contrary, I have said it repeatedly to my countrymen that violence, whatever end it may serve in Europe, will never serve us in India. My brother and friend Shaukat Ali believes in methods of violence; and if it was in his power to draw the sword against the British Empire, I know that he has got the courage of a man and he has got also the wisdom to see that he should offer that battle to the British Empire. But because he recognizes as a true soldier that means of violence are not open to India, he sides with me accepting my humble assistance and pledges his word that so long as I am with him and so long as he believes in the doctrine so long will he not harbour even the idea of violence against any single Englishman or any single man on earth. I am here to tell you that he has been as true as his word and has kept it religiously. I am here to bear witness that he has been following out this plan of non-violent non-co-operation to the very letter and I am asking India to follow this non-violent non-co-operation. I tell you that there is not a better soldier living in our ranks in British India than Shaukat Ali. When the time for the drawing of the sword comes, if it ever comes, you will find him drawing that sword and you will find me retiring to the jungle of Hindustan. As soon as India accepts the doctrine of the sword, my life as an Indian is finished. It is because I believe in a mission special to India, and it is because I believe that the ancients of India, after centuries of experience, have found out that the true thing for any human being on earth is not justice based on violence but justice based on sacrifice of self, justice based on yajna and kurbani—I cling to that doctrine and I shall cling to it for ever—it is for that reason I tell you that whilst my friend believes also in the doctrine of violence and has adopted the doctrine of non-violence as a weapon of the weak, I believe in the doctrine of non-violence as a weapon of the strongest. I believe that a man is the strongest soldier for daring to die unarmed with his breast bare before the enemy. So much for the non-violent part of non-co-operation. I, therefore, venture to suggest to my learned countrymen that so long as the doctrine of non-co-operation remains non-violent so long there is nothing unconstitutional in the doctrine.

1. Sacrifice
2. ibid

I ask further, is it unconstitutional for me to say to the British Government, “I refuse to serve you”? Is it unconstitutional for our worthy chairman to return with every respect all the titles that he has ever held from the Government? Is it unconstitutional for any parent to withdraw his children from a Government or aided school? Is it unconstitutional for a lawyer to say, “I shall no longer support the arm of the law so long as that arm of law is used not to raise me but to debase me”? Is it unconstitutional for a civil servant or for a judge to say, “I refuse to serve a Government which does not wish to respect the wishes of the whole people”? I ask, is it unconstitutional for a policeman or for a soldier to tender his resignation when he knows that he is called to serve a Government which traduces its own countrymen? Is it unconstitutional for me to go to the “krishak”, to the agriculturist, and say to him, “It is not wise for you to pay any taxes, if these taxes are used by the Government not to raise you but to weaken you”? I hold and I venture to submit that there is nothing unconstitutional in it. What is more, I have done everyone of these things in my life and nobody has questioned the constitutional character of it. I was in Kaira working in the midst of seven lakhs of agriculturists. They had all suspended the payment of taxes and the whole of India was at one with me. Nobody considered that it was unconstitutional. I submit that in the whole plan of non-co-operation there is nothing unconstitutional. But I do venture to suggest that it will be highly unconstitutional in the midst of this unconstitutional Government—in the midst of a nation which has built up its magnificent constitution—for the people of India to become weak and to crawl on their belly—it will be highly unconstitutional for the people of India to pocket every insult that is offered to them; it is highly unconstitutional for the 70 millions of Mohammedans of India to submit to a violent wrong done to their religion; it is highly unconstitutional for the whole of India to sit still and co-operate with an unjust Government which has trodden under its feet the honour of the Punjab; I say to my countrymen: “So long as you have a sense of honour and so long as you wish to remain the descendants and defenders of the noble traditions that have been handed to you for generations after generations, it is unconstitutional for you not to non-co-operate and unconstitutional for you to co-operate with a Government which has become so unjust as our Government has become. I am not anti-English; I am not anti-British; I am not anti-any government; but I am anti-untruth—anti-humbug and anti-injustice. So long as the Government spells injustice, it may regard me as its enemy, implacable enemy. I had hoped at the Congress at Amritsar—I am speaking God’s truth before you—when I pleaded on knees before some of you for co-operation with the Government, I had full hope that the British ministers, who are wise as a rule, would placate the Mussulman sentiment, that they would do full justice in the matter of the Punjab atrocities, and, therefore, I said: Let us return goodwill to the hand of fellowship that has been extended to us, which, I then believed, was extended to us through the Royal Proclamation. It was on that account that I pleaded for co-operation. But today that faith having gone and [been] obliterated by the acts of the British ministers, I am here to plead not for futile obstruction in the legislative council but for real substantial non-co-operation which would paralyse the mightiest government on earth. That is what I stand for today. Until we have wrung justice and until we have wrong our self-respect from unwilling hands and from unwilling pens, there can be no co-operation. Our Shastras say and I say so with the greatest deference to all the greatest religious preceptors of India but without fear of contradiction that our Shastras teach us that there shall be no co-operation between injustice and justice, between an unjust man and a justice-loving man, between truth and untruth. Co-operation is a duty only so long as Government protects your honour, and non-co-operation is an equal duty when the Government, instead of protecting robs you of your honour. That is the doctrine of non-co-operation.

I have been told that I should have waited for the declaration of the special Congress which is the mouthpiece of the whole nation. I know that it is the mouthpiece of the whole nation. If it was for me, individual Gandhi, to wait, I would have waited for eternity. But I had in my hands a sacred trust. I was advising my Mussulman countrymen and for the time being I hold their honour in my hands. I dare not ask them to wait for any verdict but the verdict of their own conscience. Do you suppose that Mussulmans can eat their own words, can withdraw from the honourable position they have taken up? If perchance—and God forbid that it should happen—the special Congress decides against them, I would still advise my countrymen, the Mussulmans, to stand single-handed and fight rather than yield to the attempted dishonour to their religion. It is, therefore, given to the Mussulmans to go to the Congress on bended knees and plead for support. But support or no support, it was not possible for them to wait for the Congress to give them the lead. They had to choose between futile violence, drawing of the naked sword and peaceful non-violent but effective non-co-operation, and they have made their choice. I venture further to say to you that if there is any body of men who feel as I do, the sacred character of non-co-operation, it is for you and me not to wait for the Congress but to act and to make it impossible for the Congress to give any other verdict. After all what is the Congress? The Congress is the collected voice of individuals who form it, and if the individuals go to the Congress with a united voice, that will be the verdict you will gain from the Congress. But if we go to the Congress with no opinion because we have none or because we are afraid to express it, then naturally we await the verdict of the Congress. To those who are unable to make up their mind, I say, by all means wait. But for those who have seen the clear light as they see the lights in front of them, for them to wait is a sin. The Congress does not expect you to wait but it expects you to act so that the Congress can gauge properly the national feeling. So much for the Congress.

BOYCOTT OF THE COUNCILS

Among the details of non-co-operation I have placed in the foremost rank the boycott of the councils. Friends have quarrelled with me for the use of the word boycott, because I have disapproved—as I disapprove even now—boycott of British goods or any goods for that matter. But there, boycott has its own meaning and here boycott has its own meaning. I not only do not disapprove but approve of the boycott of the councils that are going to be formed next year. And why do I do it? The people—the masses—require from us, the leaders, a clear lead. They do not want any equivocation from us. The suggestion that we should seek election and then refuse to take the oath of allegiance would only make the nation distrust the leaders. It is not a clear lead to the nation. So I say to you, my countrymen, not to fall into this trap. We shall sell our country by adopting the methods of seeking election and then not taking the oath of allegiance. We may find it difficult and I frankly confess to you that I have not that trust in so many Indians making that declaration and standing by it. Today I suggest to those who honestly hold the view viz., that we should seek election and then refuse to take the oath of allegiance—I suggest to them that they will fall into a trap which they are preparing for themselves and for the nation. That is my view. I hold that if we want to give the nation the clearest possible lead and if we want not to play with this great nation, we must make it clear to this nation that we cannot take any favours, no matter how great they may be, so long as those favours are accompanied by an injustice, a double wrong done to India not yet redressed. The first indispensable thing before we can receive any favours from them is, that they should redress this double wrong. There is a Greek proverb which used to say: “Beware of the Greeks but especially beware of them when they bring gifts to you”. Today from those ministers who are bent upon perpetuating the wrong to Islam and to the Punjab, I say we cannot accept gifts but we should be doubly careful lest we may not fall into the trap that they may have devised. I therefore suggest that we must not coquet with the councils and must not have anything whatsoever to do with them. I am told that if we, who represent the national sentiment, do not seek election, the Moderates who do not represent that sentiment will. I do not agree. I do not know what the Moderates represent and I do not know what the Nationalists represent. I know that there are good sheep and black sheep among the Moderates. I know that there are good sheep and black sheep amongst the Nationalists. I know that many Moderates hold honestly the view that it is a sin to resort to non-co-operation. I respectfully agree to differ from them. I do say to them also that they will fall into a trap which they will have devised if they seek election. But that does not affect my situation. If I feel in my heart of hearts that I ought not to go to the councils, I ought at least to abide by this decision and it does not matter if ninety-nine other countrymen seek election. That is the only way in which public work can be done and public opinion can be built. That is the only way in which reforms can be achieved and religion can be conserved. If it is a question of religious honour, whether I am one or among many, I must stand upon my doctrine. Even if I should die in the attempt, it is worth dying for than that I should live and deny my own doctrine. I suggest that it will be wrong on the part of anyone to seek election to these councils. If once we feel that we cannot co-operate with this Government, we have to commence from the top. We are the natural leaders of the people and we have acquired the right and the power to go to the nation and speak to it with the voice of non-co-operation. I, therefore, do suggest that it is inconsistent with non-co-operation to seek election to the councils on any terms whatsoever.

Lawyers and Non-co-operation

I have suggested another difficult matter, viz, that the lawyers should suspend their practice. How should I do otherwise knowing so well how the Government had always been able to retain this power through the instrumentality of lawyers? It is perfectly true that it is the lawyers of today who are leading us, who are fighting the country’s battles, but when it comes to a matter of action against the Government, when it comes to a matter of paralysing the activity of the Government, I know that the Government always looks to the lawyers, however fine fighters they may have been, to preserve their dignity and their self-respect. I, therefore, suggest to my lawyer friends that it is their duty to suspend their practice and to show to the Government that they will no longer retain their offices, because lawyers are considered to be honorary officers of the courts and, therefore, subject to their disciplinary jurisdiction. They must no longer retain these honorary offices if they want to withdraw co-operation from Government. But what will happen to law and order? We shall evolve law and order through the instrumentality of these very lawyers. We shall promote arbitration courts and dispense justice, pure, simple, home-made justice, swadeshi justice to our countrymen. That is what suspension of practice means.

Parents and Non-co-operation

I have suggested yet another difficulty—to withdraw our children from the Government schools and to ask collegiate students to withdraw from the college and to empty Government-aided schools. How could I do otherwise? I want to gauge the national sentiment. I want to know whether the Mohammedans feel deeply. If they feel deeply, they will understand in the twinkling of an eye that it is not right for them to receive schooling from a Government in which they have lost all faith; and which they do not trust at all. How can I, if I do not want to help this Government, receive any help from that Government? I think that the schools and colleges are factories for making clerks and Government servants. I would not help this great factory for manufacturing clerks and servants if I want to withdraw co-operation from that Government. Look at it from any point of view you like. It is not possible for you to send your children to the schools and still believe in the doctrine of non-co-operation.

The Duty of Title-holders

I have gone further. I have suggested that our title-holders should give up their titles. How can they hold on to the titles and honours bestowed by this Government? They were at one time badges of honour when we believed that national honour was safe in their hands. But now they are no longer badges of honour but badges of dishonour and disgrace when we really believe that we cannot get justice from this Government. Every title-holder holds his title and honours as trustee for the nation and in this first step in the withdrawal of co-operation from the Government, they should surrender their titles without a moment’s consideration. I suggest to my Mohammedan countrymen that, if they fail in this primary duty, they will certainly fail in non-co-operation unless the masses themselves reject the classes and take up non-co-operation in their own hands and are able to fight that battle even as the men of the French Revolution were able to take the reins of Government in their own hands leaving aside the leaders and marched to the banner of victory. I want no revolution. I want ordered progress. I want no disordered order. I want no chaos. I want real order to be evolved out of this chaos which is misrepresented to me as order. If it is order established by a tyrant in order to get hold of the tyrannical reins of Government I say that it is no order for me but it is disorder. I want to evolve justice out of this injustice. Therefore, I suggest to you the passive non-co-operation. If we would only realize the secret of this peaceful and infallible doctrine, you will know and you will find that you will not want to use even an angry word when they lift the sword at you and you will not want even to lift your little finger, let alone a stick or a sword.

A Service to the Empire

You may consider that I have spoken these words in anger because I have considered the ways of this Government immoral, unjust, debasing and untruthful. I use these adjectives with the greatest deliberation. I have used them for my own true brother with whom I was engaged in a battle of non-co-operation for full 13 years and although the ashes cover the remains of my brother, I tell you that I used to tell him that he was unjust when his plans were based upon immoral foundation. I used to tell him that he did not stand for truth. There was no anger in me. I told him this home truth because I loved him. In the same manner I tell the British people that I love them and that I want their association but I want that association on conditions well defined. I want my self-respect and I want my absolute equality with them. If I cannot gain that equality from the British people, I do not want the British connection. If I have to let the British people go and import temporary disorder and dislocation of national business, I will rather favour that disorder and dislocation than that I should have injustice from the hands of a great nation such as the British nation.
You will find that by the time the whole chapter is closed that the successors of Mr. Montagu will give me the credit for having rendered the most distinguished service that I have yet rendered to the Empire, in having offered this non-co-operation and in having suggested the boycott, not of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, but of boycott of a visit engineered by the Government in order to tighten its hold on the national neck. I will not allow it even if I stand alone, if I cannot persuade this nation not to welcome that visit, but will boycott that visit with all the power at my command. It is for that reason I stand before you and implore you to offer this religious battle, but it is not a battle offered to you by a visionary or a saint. I deny being a visionary. I do not accept the claim of saintliness. I am of the earth, earthly, a common gardener man as much as anyone of you, probably much more than you are. I am prone to as many weaknesses as you are. But I have seen the world. I have lived in the world with my eyes open. I have gone through the most fiery ordeals that have fallen to the lot of man. I have gone through this discipline. I have understood the secret of my own sacred Hinduism. I have learnt the lesson that non-cooperation is the duty not merely of the saint but it is the duty of every ordinary citizen, who not knowing much, not caring to know much, but wants to perform his ordinary household functions. The people of Europe teach even their masses, the poor people, the doctrine of the sword. But the rishis of India, those who have held the traditions of India, have preached to the masses of India the doctrine, not of the sword, not of violence but of suffering, of self-suffering. And unless you and I are prepared to go through the primary lesson, we are not ready even to offer the sword and that is the lesson my brother Shaukat Ali has imbibed to teach and that is why he today accepts my advice tendered to him in all prayerfulness and in all humility and says: “Long live non-co-operation”. Please remember that even in England the little children were withdrawn from the schools; and colleges in Cambridge and Oxford were closed. Lawyers had left their desks and were fighting in the trenches. I do not present to you the trenches but I do ask you to go through the sacrifice that the men, women and the brave lads of England went through. Remember that you are offering battle to a nation which is saturated with the spirit of sacrifice whenever the occasion arises. Remember that the little band of Boers offered stubborn resistance to a mighty nation. But their lawyers had left their desks. Their mothers had withdrawn their children from the schools and colleges and the children had become the volunteers of the nation. I have seen them with these naked eyes of mine. I am asking my countrymen in India to follow no other gospel than the gospel of self-sacrifice which precedes every battle. Whether you belong to the school of violence or non-violence, you will still have to go through the fire of sacrifice and of discipline. May God grant you, may God grant our leaders the wisdom, the courage and the true knowledge to lead the nation to its cherished goal! May God grant the people of India the right path, the true vision and the ability and the courage to follow this path, difficult and yet easy, of sacrifice.

95. SPEECH ON NON-CO-OPERATION, MADRAS
August 13, 1920

While discussing titles, Gandhi wished the chairman, Hakeem Abdul Aziz, would give up his.

He explained the second step in non-co-operation, i.e., resigning Government appointments.

Then he went to the third and fourth steps—withdrawal from military service and refusal to pay taxes respectively.

He said that by the time they got to the third stage they will be practically the rulers of India; but unless the title-holders give up their titles and the Honorary Magistrates give up their posts, and lawyers their practices and children are withdrawn from Government and aided institutions, councils boycotted and swadeshism practically encouraged, and the leaders go to the people like fakirs in hand-made clothes and walking bare-footed after giving up their motor cars, they cannot request Government servants and sepoys to resign their posts or the ryot to refuse to pay taxes. They should not think that if they give up their appointments

1 At Juma Mosque, Triplicane
they will become helpless. The Khilafat Committee would come to their aid. . . . If non-co-operation is successfully worked up, it will be impossible for Government to carry on its administration.

96. LETTER TO SHANKERLAL BANKER

AMBUR,

Saturday [August 14, 1920]

DEAR SHANKERLAL,

I think a lot about you. I shall await your letter.

I would particularly suggest that you should consider how much we harm ourselves and the country by anger. I am not writing this to find fault with you. I agree that you are under a nervous strain. But it is a mental trouble and so you can acquire control over your mind.

Would you make it a point to read the last stanzas in chapter II of the Gita which have been spoken by Krishna in reply to a question by Arjuna! These stanzas contain the remedy for all ailments.

97. DOCTRINE OF THE SWORD

I have no dearth of advisers. They send me letters, signed and unsigned, and some visit me to proffer their advice in person. Some write to me to say that I am a coward, afraid of the sword, and, therefore, I shall achieve nothing in this world; that it is my fear which makes me prate about non-violence without knowing what it means. Some others tell me that I have violence enough in my heart, that I approve of killing, but that I am such a “shrewd fellow” and so “cunning” that I do not let people know what I think and, though talking about non-violence, at heart want to instigate violence. Besides these, there is another class of men who think that I am not a rogue but am only waiting for my opportunity and, when it comes, I shall advise people to use the sword. These people think that the time for this is ripe and that now I should wait no longer.

1 Gandhiji was in Ambur on this date which fell on a Saturday.

Ordinarily, it should not be necessary for me to occupy myself with answering the points these advisers make. Where is the harm, or what is there to be exercised about, if some people think me cunning? What right, besides, have I to take up the time of Navajivan’s readers with a defence of my saintliness or a rebuttal of the charge of being “cunning”? Certainly, I ought not to enter into any discussion of this matter with a view to defending myself, but I know that, my present position being what it is, the common people are eager to know my views and I know, further, that my actions proceed from my views. I think it necessary, for the sake of these, to clarify my position and so I take the liberty to place once again before readers my views on brute force.

Sword-force is brute force. Killing people requires no intelligence. We may, indeed, by misdirecting our intelligence employ it in the service of brute force but, though aided by intelligence, brute force remains brute force and the law of the sword remains the law of the beast. In the latter, the self is in a state of nescience and can have no knowledge of itself. That is why we know the animal world as enveloped in darkness. The activities of eating, drinking, sleeping, feeling afraid, etc., are common to man and beast. But man has the power of distinguishing between good and evil and can also know the self. One animal subdues another simply by its physical might. Its world is ruled by that law, but not so the human world. The law which is most in harmony with human nature is that of winning over others by the power of love—by soul-force. When, therefore, a man wins over an enemy through love, he simply follows the law of his nature. He has not become a god in doing so. Gods have no physical body. They behave sometimes like beasts and sometimes like men. There are white gods as also black gods. Man is, at times, seen acting like an animal. He is endowed with brute force as well, and, so long as he has not developed awareness of his spiritual nature he remains an intelligent animal. Though human in body, instead of obeying the law of his kind he follows the law of the animal. This, however, should not be regarded as his true nature. I believe, therefore, that if we wake up to the consciousness of our true nature, we would, that very moment, renounce the law of the jungle.

But the sages saw that the passions of the beast had not died out in most persons, though they possessed human bodies. They recognized, therefore, that there was scope for the use of brute force even by human beings and showed under what circumstances it could be employed.

When a man submits to another through fear, he does not follow his nature but yields to brute force. He who has no desire to dominate others by brute force will not himself submit to such force either. Recognizing, therefore, that a man who fears brute force has not attained self-knowledge at all, our Shastras allowed him the use of brute force while he remains in this state.

A Pathan made a murderous attack on me in 1908. My eldest son was not present then. He possessed fairly good physical strength. I did not have the Pathan prosecuted since I held the same views then as I do now. I was educating my sons too in the ideas of forgiveness and love, and so at our very first meeting [after the assault], my son said to me: “I want to know what my duty would have been if I had been with you at the time. You have taught us that we may not strike back nor tamely submit to the other man. I understand this principle but I have not the strength to act upon it. I could not remain a silent spectator while you were being beaten to death. I would consider it my duty to protect you if you should be assaulted. But I could not do this by laying down my own life [instead of striking back]. I must, therefore, either protect you by attacking the man who would strike you, or be passive witness to the attack on you, or run away.” I told him: “It would be a sign of cowardice if you ran away or did nothing to protect me. If you could not protect me by taking the danger upon yourself, you should undoubtedly do so by attacking the other man. It is any day better to use brute force than to betray cowardice.” I hold this view even now. It is better that India should arm itself and take the risk than that it should refuse to take up arms out of fear. It was for this reason that I had joined the Boer War and did my bit in helping the Government during the Zulu rebellion. It was for this same reason that, during the last War, I gave my help in England and in India, too. I engaged myself in recruiting work.

Forgiveness is the virtue of brave. He alone who is strong to avenge a wrong knows how to love [and forgive]. He alone who is capable of enjoying pleasures can qualify to be a brahmachari by

1 Harilal Gandhi
2 One who observes brahmacharya. Literally, brahmacharya means living in the Brahman, the Absolute. In ordinary usage, the term has come to signify celibacy, which is considered essential for attainment of that state; vide also “In Confidence”, 13-10-1920.
restraining his desires. There is no question of the mouse forgiving the cat. It will be evidence of India’s soul-force only if it refuses to fight when it has the strength to do so.

It is necessary to understand what the phrase, “strength to fight” means in this context. It does not mean only physical strength.
Everyone who has courage in him can have the strength to fight, and everyone who has given up fear of death has such strength. I have seen sturdy Negroes cowering before white boys, because they were afraid of the white man’s revolver. I have also seen weaklings holding out against robust persons. Thus, the day India gives up fear we shall be able to say that she has the strength to fight. It is not at all true to say that, to be able to fight, it is essential to acquire the ability to use arms; the moment, therefore, a man wakes up to the power of the soul, that very moment he comes to know the strength he has for fighting.
That is why I believe that he is the true warrior who does not die killing but who has mastered the mantra of living by dying.

The sages who discovered the never-failing law of non-violence were themselves great warriors. When they discovered the ignoble nature of armed strength and realized the true nature of man, they discerned the law of non-violence pervading this world all full of violence. They then taught us that the atman\(^1\) can conquer the whole world, that the greatest danger to the atman comes from itself and that conquest over it brings us the strength to conquer the entire world.

But they did not think, nor have affirmed or taught anywhere, that because they had discovered that law they alone could live according to it. On the contrary, they declared that even for a child the law is the same, and that it can act upon it too. It is not true that only sannyasis abide by it; all of us do so more or less, and a law which can be followed partially can be followed perfectly.

I have been striving to live according to this law. For many years past, I have been consciously trying to do so and have been exhorting India to do the same.

I believe myself to be an idealist and also a practical man. I do not think that a man can be said to have lived in accordance with this law only if he does so conciously and purposefully. Therefore, like a va\(\text{id}\) [his medicine], I place it before all, whether or no they have faith

\(^1\) The Self
in it. To prove that it is not necessary to have the higher knowledge to be able to recognize the importance of this law, I have joined hands with those who hold views contrary to mine. My friend Shaukat Ali seems to attach prime importance to violence, to believe that it is man’s dharma to kill his enemy. Consequently, he follows the law of non-violence with hatred in his heart. He thinks non-co-operation is a weapon of the weak, and, therefore, inferior to resistance by force. Even so, he has joined me because he has seen that, except non-co-operation, there is no other effective method of upholding the honour of his faith.

I appeal even to those who have no faith in me to follow my friend Shaukat Ali. They need not believe in the purity of my motive, but must clearly recognize that there can be no violence simultaneously with non-co-operation. The greatest obstacle to the launching of all-out non-co-operation is the fear of violence breaking out. Those who are ready with arms or are eager to be so should also put them by while non-co-operation is going on.

To me, on the day when brute force gains ascendancy in India, all distinctions of East and West, of ancient and modern, will have disappeared. That day will be the day of my test. I take pride in looking upon India as my country because I believe that she has it in her to demonstrate to the world the supremacy of soul-force. When India accepts the supremacy of brute force, I should no longer be happy to call her my mother-land. It is my belief that my dharma recognizes no limits of spheres of duty or of geographical boundaries. I pray to God that I may then be able to prove that my dharma takes no thought of my person or is not restricted to a particular field.

98. COURTS AND SCHOOLS

The Khilafat Non-co-operation Committee has, under my advice, called upon lawyers to give up practice, parents to withdraw their children from schools and college students to leave their colleges. I know that some people will think me mad for giving such advice. It is possible, though, that my work in South Africa and elsewhere is saving me from public ridicule. Nevertheless, I see wisdom in my madness. I seriously believe that at present it is the duty of lawyers to give up practice and of the people to withdraw their wards from Government schools. If lawyers leave courts and Government colleges and schools are abandoned, the effect will be very powerful.

Let us first consider the case of lawyers. The power of a government depends on its courts. Through courts it punishes the guilty and it is through them that civil disputes are settled and in this way the Government acquires control over the people. Since the courts cannot run without lawyers, the latter, too, are deemed officials of the courts. When the Government rules justly, the courts and lawyers are perhaps of some service but, when the Government resorts to injustice, helping its courts to run is to further the injustice. It is almost impossible to run courts without the co-operation of lawyers. When I call upon the lawyers to give up practice, my intention is not that they should sit idle at home; it is rather that they should start working whole time for the cause of the khilafat or the Punjab, and also that they influence their clients and prevail upon them not to go to the courts. These lawyers should set up panchas
\(^1\) and help their clients to settle their disputes among themselves. In this way, the courts will be left without work and the people will learn to become independent of the State.

Some argue that the Government will be only too pleased if the lawyers give up practice. This is a delusion. It is true that generally lawyers are found to be most severe critics of the Government but, when there is a movement for bringing the machinery of Government to a halt, the Government seeks the help of lawyers and the latter, believing that their livelihood depends on that machinery, go to the help of the Government. At such times, therefore, the lawyers too are put to a test.

\(^1\) Literally, “the five”; here a board of arbitrators
Some people raise the question what the lawyers would do for their livelihood if they gave up practice. One reply is that no such question can arise for eminent lawyers. For small lawyers, the Khilafat Committee can afford to pay them enough for a living and engage their full-time service for the khilafat movement, or appoint them to plead before panchas set up by the people and pay them. Moreover, lawyers are not the people to sit idle after giving up practice. They are, ought to be, capable of earning their livelihood honestly in some other way. During the last War, many lawyers in England gave up practice and joined the army.

Finally, the suggestion is not that the lawyers should surrender their registration but only stop practising for the duration of the movement.

The late Shri Gokhale used to say that the work of fighting an intelligent, determined and united bureaucracy, that is political work, is ill-done because it is taken up as spare-time hobby by the people. The way out of this evil, too, is for lawyers to stop practice and take up public work as their main work rather than as a hobby. They certainly cannot attend to public work in this way unless they give up practice. If the lawyers themselves are not prepared to make sacrifices, how can they ask the people to do so? It is no easy thing to secure justice on the khilafat and the Punjab issues. Thus, from every point of view, lawyers who really feel concerned about the khilafat or the Punjab cannot continue to practise.

Let us now turn to schools and colleges.

The Government uses our schools and colleges to produce servants. If we stop this important help to the Government, it will have no negligible effect. So long as we believe that the Government is a beneficent one, we need have no shame in helping its schools and preparing qualified men for Government service. When, however, the Government has set itself against the people, to let the school remain under its control is to tighten its stranglehold.

Even if we consider school to be a favour granted by the Government, we may not accept even a favour from an unjust Government.

There is no reason to fear that, as a result of the closing down of schools, our children will have to go without education. If a school closes down completely, it can then be run by the people. If people lack even this capacity, it will only mean that they do not have the strength to fight the Government. If all or most parents withdraw their children, the teachers will resign of their own accord and, in that case, we shall be able to run the schools with the help of the very same teachers. If the expendi-ture is somewhat in excess of the fees [collected], the local Committee should find the balance. Parents should bear this increased burden.

Moreover, what is the harm if education is interrupted for some time? I rather maintain that, far from their education being interrupted, it is real education for children to be withdrawn from schools and for college students to leave their colleges. When we withdraw our children from schools or, being grown up, they leave schools and colleges on their own, for the sake of dharma or justice, the understanding of these which they acquire is no mean education. I would myself look upon that as the right education. It will be a further advantage, besides, that the pupils who have thus left schools and colleges may enrol as volunteers.

Our Muslim brethren say that they have been deeply hurt over the khilafat issue. This is really a matter of religious sentiment. This question of [leaving] schools and colleges will test the religious sentiment of Muslim parents and the Hindus’ brotherly feelings for Muslims. The test, though easy to pass, will have a powerful effect. If millions of pupils leave schools and colleges, what conclusion will the Government draw? What a fine means for measuring public feeling will this provide? And what degree of popular awakening does it betoken that the people should take their education in their own hands in order to protect themselves?

During the last War, a number of schools had closed down in England. During the Boer War, all Boer schools were closed down.

For these reasons, I believe that it is the duty of Hindus and Muslims to withdraw their children from every Government school and of college students to leave their colleges. What needs to be done is worth doing even if there is only one person to do it. A good deed done by one person will bear fruit for that person at any rate. If all the people do it, all will reap the fruit.

99. FORTHCOMING GUJARAT POLITICAL CONFERENCE

It is a momentous Conference which will be meeting at the end of this month. It will decide on the great question of non-co-operation. The aim behind calling the Conference hurriedly is to educate public opinion and place Gujarat’s view before the Congress session. Non-co-operation with a mighty empire requires great firmness, courage, sagacity, capacity for self-sacrifice, unity, discipline, etc. The present policy of the British Government is so wicked that to me it becomes clearer every moment that it is a sin to co-operate with it so long as that policy continues. It is no easy thing, however, to get it changed. Non-co-operation, therefore, is not likely to be an easy affair. Hence I do not wish to secure Gujarat’s vote in favour of non-co-operation anyhow, keeping people in the dark, but I want that the delegates should weigh the pros and cons carefully and give their considered opinion.

I hope that those who are opposed to non-co-operation will attend it in full strength and argue their case with firmness. I also take it, likewise, that the supporters of non-co-operation will come well-prepared. It is the duty of both sides to see that the audience listens to the arguments of either with courtesy and restraint and without making any noise. This is an essential condition if we are to obtain a clear verdict at such conferences. The irresponsible behaviour, bad manners and rowdyism in the House of Commons need not be copied by us. To go to a conference with settled views and get excited at the arguments of the opposite side is certainly not the way to arrive at a well-considered decision. It will, therefore, be profitable and facilitate the proceedings of the Conference if the organizers issue circulars for this purpose and make the necessary suggestion to the delegates in advance.

If it is necessary that order be maintained, it is likewise the people’s duty to elect intelligent delegates. It is desirable that they attend the Conference in sufficient strength.

It is necessary that the Conference should be attended by delegates representing all occupations and all classes of society. It will be more in keeping with the dignity of the country if the distinction between the educated and the uneducated is replaced by other suitable distinctions such as those based on occupations, etc. We do not find in the world that the educated have a monopoly of intelligence and wisdom. An illiterate farmer can represent the difficulties of the agricultural classes much better than an Indian learned but without experience in that particular field. I wish, therefore, to see an ever-increasing number of delegates from among farmers, weavers, carpenters, blacksmiths, shoe-makers and other such groups. I, for one, think that no substantial progress in the country is possible so long as patriotic farmers do not attend our political and social conferences in numbers proportionate to their numerical strength. The understanding of farmers’ conditions which, through direct experience, I acquired in few months in Champaran\(^1\) and Kheda\(^2\) cannot be had from any number of books.

If, again, we really welcome the presence of delegates from among farmers and others, chairs and other ostentations have no place in our conferences. In our climate, chairs, curtains, etc., are so much of a nuisance. I am quite sure that we can go through the business of the Conference far more efficiently and at much less expense with carpets spread on clean ground. I believe that, as long as three crores of men in India starve for want of food and a larger number than that have little to cover their bodies with, as long as a frightful number of living human beings in Orissa look like mere skeletons, with ribs sticking out, when there is no compelling reason why this should be so, we have no right to erect gaudy \textit{pandals} and be comfortable in chairs. Our people do not usually sit in chairs. I would, therefore, request the organizers to provide only as many chairs, if any, as are absolutely necessary and to make seating arrangements on the ground for all others. This will save public money and accommodate a large number in a small space. I have just returned from the Khilafat Conference held at Hyderabad. Thousands of Muslims, including \textit{Pirs}, lawyers and barristers, landlords and others simply squatted on the ground and presented a very impressive scene. Temporary clay platforms were improvised and the leaders and dignitaries sat cross-legged on them. The chairman, too, sat on a similar platform. It was made with rough poles and these were sufficiently long. The chairman sat towards the back, and therefore, remained in full view of the audience. The speakers delivered their speeches, standing on one side of the dais. This \textit{pandal} accommodating thousands of men had been erected in one day.

\(^1\) During 1917
\(^2\) During 1918

Volunteers should be trained beforehand in organizing things well so that there may be no noise or crowding anywhere in the Conference. Order can be maintained if all of them do not crowd together and keep standing at one place but keep to their appointed spots. They ought to be taught signalling with flags and fingers to communicate with one another from a distance when they cannot make themselves heard.

100. SPEECH ON RIGHTS AND DUTIES OF LABOUR, MADRAS

August 15, 1920

MR. CHAIRMAN AND FRIENDS,

I hope that you will excuse me for not standing whilst speaking. Though my voice has become stronger than it was over a year ago, my body has not become as strong as I should like to be so as to enable me to stand up and speak. It gives me very great pleasure to renew your acquaintance a second time. I think I told you last year, when I had privilege of addressing some of you that I considered myself a fellow-labourer with you. Perhaps you are labourers not by choice, but somewhat by compulsion. But I entertain such high regard for labour. I entertain such great respect for the dignity of labour that I have thrown in my lot with the labourers. And for many many years now, I have lived in their midst like them labouring with my hands and with my feet. I believe that it is the lot of life for every sentient being that before he or she eats, he or she must use hands and feet. In labouring therefore with your bodies you are simply following the law of your being and there is not the slightest reason for you to feel dissatisfied with your lot. On the contrary I would ask to regard yourselves as trustees for the nation for which you are labouring. A nation may do without its millionaires, without its capitalists, but a nation can never do without its labour. There is one fundamental distinction between your labour and my labour. You are labouring for someone else. In a natural state perhaps we would expect everyone to be his own master, viz, to be his own labourer. You are not your own

1 At a meeting at Madras Beach under the auspices of the Central Labour Board, B. P. Wadia presiding labourer. I consider that I am labouring for myself, i.e., I am my own master. In a natural state, we should all find ourselves our own masters. But such a state of things, cannot be reached in a day. It therefore becomes a very serious question for you to consider how you are to conduct yourselves as labourers serving for others. Just as there is no shame in being a labourer, so also there is no shame in labouring for others. It becomes necessary to find the true relation between master and servant. What are your duties? What are your responsibilities? And what are your rights? It is simple enough to understand that your right is to receive the hire for your labour and it is equally simple to know that your duty is to work to the best of your ability for the wages you receive. And it is my universal experience that as a rule labour discharges its obligations more effectively and more conscientiously. The master have corresponding duties towards the labourers. It therefore becomes necessary for labour to find out how far labour can impose its will upon the masters. If we find that we are not adequately paid, or adequately housed, how are we to claim and receive enough wages and good accommodation? Who is to determine the standard of wages and the standard of comfort required by the labourers? The best way, no doubt, is that you labourers understand your own rights, understand the method of enforcing those rights and enforce them. For that you require a little previous training and education. You have been brought to a central point from various parts of the country, and find yourselves duly congregated together and it was in the stress of circumstances perhaps you did not earn enough on your fields, or in your previous occupation, that you found yourselves in the hands of a particular master. But later you find that you are not getting enough and that you are not properly housed. But you do not know how to go about your work. I therefore venture to suggest to Mr. Wadia and those who are leading you and advising you that their first business is to guide you, not by giving you a knowledge of letters, but a knowledge of human affairs and human relations. I make this suggestion respectfully and in all humility, because my survey of labour in India, in so far as I have been able to undertake it, and my long experience of conditions of labour in South Africa led me to the conclusion that in a large majority of cases, leaders consider that they have to give labour a knowledge of the three R’s. That undoubtedly is a necessity of the case. But it is to be preceded by a proper knowledge of your own rights and a way of enforcing them. In conducting many a strike I have found that it is possible to give this fundamental education to the labourers within a day. That brings me to the subject of strikes.

Strikes are in the air today throughout the world. On the slightest pretext, the labourer goes in for strikes. My own experience of the last six months is that many strikes have done harm to labour rather than good. I have studied in so far as I could the strike in Bombay, the strike at the Tata Iron Works, the strike in Gorakhpur twice, and the celebrated strike of the Railway labourers in the Punjab. In all these four strikes I was more or less in connection with the labourers and what I am about to tell is derived from the labourers themselves. There was partial failure in all these strikes. Labour was not able to make good its points to the fullest extent. What was the reason? Labour was badly led. I want you to distinguish between two classes of leaders, you have leaders derived from yourselves and they are in their turn advised and led by those who are not themselves labourers, but who are in sympathy or expected to be in sympathy with labour. You do not require me to tell you that unless there is correspondence between yourselves, your own leaders, and those who are above you, unless there is perfect correspondence between these three there is bound to be failure. Now in all these four strikes, that perfect correspondence was lacking. There is another substantial reason which I discovered. The labourers looked at pecuniary support from their unions for the maintenance. No labour can prolong a strike indefinitely so long as labour depends upon the resources of its union. No strike can absolutely succeed which cannot be indefinitely prolonged. In all the strikes that I have ever conducted, I have laid down one indispensable rule, that labourers must find their own support. Therein lies the secret of success. And therein consists your education. You should be able to perceive that if you are able to serve one master and command a particular wage your labour must be worth and must be fit to receive that wage anywhere else. Strikers therefore cannot be expected to be idlers and to succeed. Your demands must be just and there should be no pressure exerted upon those whom you call blacklegs, any force of this kind exerted against your own fellow-labourers is bound to react upon yourselves. I think your advisers will tell you that these three conditions being fulfilled no strike need ever fail. That at once demonstrates to you the necessity of thinking a hundred times, before undertaking a strike. So much for your rights and the method of enforcing it. you on this point any further
But as labour becomes organized, strikes must become few and far between and as your mental development progresses further you will find immediately that the principle of arbitration replaces the principle of strikes. Time has now arrived when we should reach this stage. I will not detain

I would now venture to say a few words in connection with your national responsibilities. Just as you have to understand obligations amongst yourselves with reference to your own masters, so also it is necessary to understand your obligations to the nation to which you belong. Then your primary education is complete. If you sufficiently realize the dignity of labour, you will realize that you have a duty to discharge by your country. You must therefore find out the affairs of our country in the best manner you can. You must find it out without having to wade through a cartful of books, who are your governors, what are your duties in relation to them, what they can do to you and what you can do to them. I do not propose to go into the existing conditions. I have not come here to give you a long address. It is impossible for me to interest you in the intricate questions that are now agitating the country. It is enough for me to tell you that it is your bounden duty to understand your responsibilities and your duties as citizens of this great land. In my humble opinion it is not possible for you to live up to your religion fully until you undertake to understand these things. My task this evening is finished, if I have stimulated your desire after a knowledge of the affairs of your country and I hope that you will not rest content until you have found out through your advisers and leaders—the principal affairs of this country. I thank the controllers of labour here for extending this invitation to me and I thank you all for having come and given me patient hearing. I wish to give you my assurance that whenever you find that, you need any advice from me, it is yours. It therefore grieves me very much that when you invited me at one time to come to Madras, I was unable, because I was preoccupied, to respond to your invitation to come to Madras. But you will accept my assurance that it was not due to want of will, it was due to want of ability. I wish you all the prosperity that you may deserve and I hope that you will discharge yourselves as good citizens of this country.

101. SPEECH ON NON-CO-OPERATION, KUMBAKONAM

August 16, 1920

Messrs Gandhi and Shaukat Ali spoke in English and Urdu respectively, their speeches being rendered into Tamil sentence by sentence. Acknowledging address of welcome presented at Kumbakonam and addressing a huge mass meeting, Mahatma Gandhi while regretting his insufficient knowledge of Tamil exhorted the people to learn the national lingua franca, Hindi or Urdu, as an essential condition of national progress and wished some of the addresses had been presented in Tamil instead of English. He next asked the country to remember that the khilafat cause cannot thrive without large funds and though money in itself was neither of high importance nor of as much consequence as self-sacrifice, appealed to people to contribute their mite to the Khilafat Fund, especially those who could not actively take part in non-co-operation. He emphasized the time for speeches and mere deliberations or demonstrations had gone and the time had now come for organized, continuous and sustained work. Action must be the watchword of the people. It had become the imperative duty of the people, obligatory on everyone of them to withdraw co-operation from the wicked, immoral and unjust Government, as khilafat and the Punjab questions had proved the present Government to be. If the Turkish Terms really affronted Islam it was a religious duty of Muslims to take up non-co-operation in all its stages. Hindus considered Muslims to be their brethren as sons of Mother India and they wish to be true to their religion and preserve their self-respect and honour. They must also resort to non-violent non-co-operation as laid down by him. Ordinary methods of agitating as memorializing, etc., have failed. The principle of non-co-operation was the only course open to them and whosoever approved of it in principle must also recognize that surrender of titles, boycott of proposed visit of Prince of Wales and vigorous prosecution of swadeshi, were the chief essentials of any effective programme of non-co-operation. All Government-managed, aided or recognized educational institutions must be emptied as they were mainly manufacturing clerks and servants for the Government. As regards councils the policy of co-operating to the extent of securing seats in councils, with a view to obstruct Government might be half non-co-operation but not a full one. In the present situation where they wanted to offer non-co-operation to an insolent and strong Government which was able to protect itself well against popular will and persist in its unjust policy, no half measures will suffice. Candidates must refuse to stand for election and constituencies to send any representatives. Mr. Gandhi next explained why lawyers must suspend their practice and the Prince’s visit must be boycotted and said several steps which he had enumerated and which formed the first stage in Central Khilafat Committee’s non-co-operation programme were so arranged as to enable men in higher rungs of society to lead in the matter by practising self-sacrifice on their own part. The last stage would give opportunity to the masses for practice of non-co-operation. Holders of titles must unhesitatingly renounce them now that they have become badges of dishonour. Concluding with impassioned appeal to the audience Mr. Gandhi said the Jain Sabha in their welcome address have wrongly described him as a Jain. He was a Vaishnavite and Prahlad who non-co-operated with his own father was the prince of non-co-operators showing by his conduct the paramount duty of man if he believed God to be greater than all men to non-co-operate with even one’s own father. All Vaishnavites cannot at this critical juncture fail to non-co-operate without failing to act up to their religion. As Thoreau has said, loss of liberty, wealth and intense suffering were the only course of honourable conduct under unjust government. Mr. Shaukat Ali was whole-heartedly co-operating with him in non-violent non-co-operation because he thought India was weak to offer armed resistance but it was his (Mr. Gandhi’s) firm conviction that it required greater strength to offer non-violent resistance as the proposed non-co-operation.

Mr. Shaukat Ali next addressing the meeting . . . appealed for Hindus’ support and pointed to the Muslim choice of Gandhiji as their leader as the greatest triumph of Hindu-Muslim unity. For Muslims, if it was good to kill in the cause of Islam, it was equally good to be killed and to invite self-suffering.

102. SPEECH AT NAGORE

August 16, 1920

At the mass meeting at Nagore the special feature was the very large number of Muslim ladies. Mr. Shaukat Ali said he took courage from their presence . . .

Mr. Gandhi said the presence of so many Muslim ladies was a sign of the intensity of Muslim feeling on the khilafat question and it showed how the movement had appealed to the core of their heart. He emphasized the importance of Hindu-Muslim unity and in his opinion it was of more vital importance than the British connection.

103. SPEECH AT TRICHINOPOLY

August 17, 1920

I thank you on behalf of my brother Shaukat Ali and myself for the magnificent reception that the citizens of Trichinopoly have given to us. I thank you also for the many addresses that you have been good enough to present to us, but I must come to business.

It is a great pleasure to me to renew your acquaintance for reasons that I need not give you. I expect great things from Trichinopoly, Madura and [a] few places I could name. I take it that you have read my address on the Madras Beach on non-co-operation. Without taking up your time in this great assembly, I wish to deal with one or two matters that arise out of Mr. S. Kasturi Ranga Iyengar’s speech. He says in effect that I should have waited for the Congress mandate on non-co-operation. That was impossible, because the Mussulmans had and still have a duty, irrespective of the Hindus, to perform in reference to their own religion. It was impossible for them to wait for any mandate, says the mandate of their own religion, in a matter that vitally concerned the honour of Islam. It is therefore possible for them only to go to the Congress on bended knees with a clear-cut programme of their own and ask the Congress to pronounce its blessing upon that programme and if they are not so fortunate as to secure the blessings of the national assembly, without meaning any disrespect to that assembly, it is their bounden duty to go on with their programme, and so it is the duty of every Hindu, who considers his Mussulman brother as a brother who has a just cause which he wishes to vindicate, to throw in his lot with his Mussulman brother. Our leader does not quarrel with the principle of non-co-operation by itself, but he objects to the three principal details of non-co-operation.

He considers that it is our duty to seek election to the councils and fight our battle on the floor of the council hall. I do not deny the possibility of a fight and a royal fight on the council floor. We have done it for the last 35 years, but I venture to suggest to you and to him, with all due respect, that it is not non-co-operation and it is not half as successful as non-co-operation can be. You cannot go to a class of people with a view to convince them by any fight—call it even obstruction—who have got a settled conviction and a settled policy to follow. It is in medical language an incompatible mixture out of which you can gain nothing, but if you totally boycott the council, you create a public opinion in the country with reference to the khilafat wrong and the Punjab wrong, which feeling will become totally irresistible. The first advantage of going to the councils must be goodwill on the part of the rulers. It is absolutely lacking. In the place of goodwill, you have got nothing but injustice, but I must move on.

I come now to the second objection of Mr. Kasturi Ranga Iyengar with reference to the suspension by lawyers of their practice. Milk is good in itself, but it becomes absolutely poisonous immediately a little bit of arsenic is added to it. Law-courts are similarly good when justice is distilled through them on behalf of a sovereign power, which wants to do justice to its people. Law-courts are one of the greatest symbols of power and in the battle of non-co-operation, you may not leave law-courts untouched and claim to offer non-co-operation, but if you will read that objection carefully, you will find in that objection the great fear that the lawyers will not respond to the call that the country makes upon them, and it is just there that the beauty of non-co-operation comes in. If one lawyer alone suspends practice, it is so much to the good of the country and so if we are sure to deprive the Government of the power that it possesses through its law-courts, whether one lawyer takes it up or many, we must adopt that step.

He objects also to the plan of boycotting Government schools. I can only say what I have said with reference to lawyers that if we mean non-co-operation, we may not receive any favours from the Government, no matter how advantageous by themselves they may be. In a great struggle like this, it is not open to us to count how many schools will respond and how many parents will respond and just as a geometrical problem is difficult, because it does not admit of easy proof, so also because a certain stage in national evolution is difficult, you may not avoid that step without making the whole of that evolution a farce.

At this stage there was some disturbance in one part of the assembly and after a few minutes pause the Mahatma continued.

We have had a great lesson in non-co-operation and co-operation. (laughter.) We had a lesson in non-co-operation when some young men began to fight there, and it is a dangerous weapon.
I have not the slightest doubt about it. One man with a determined will to non-co-operate can disturb a whole meeting (Laughter.) and we had a physical demonstration of it to-night (Renewed laughter.) but ours is non-violent non-co-operation in which there can be no mistake whatsoever if the fundamental conditions are observed. If non-co-operation fails, it will not be for want of any inherent strength in it, but it will fail because there is no response to it, or because people have not sufficiently grasped its simple principles. You had also a practical demonstration of co-operation just now. (Laughter.) That heavy chair went over the heads of so many people, because all wanted to lift their little hand to move that chair away from them and so was that heavier dome also removed from our sight by the co-operation of man, woman and child. Everybody believes and knows that this Government of ours exists only by the co-operation of the people and not by the force of arms it can wield (“Hear, hear!”) and every man with a sense of logic will tell you that the converse of that also is equally true (Laughter.) that Government cannot stand if this co-operation on which it exists is withdrawn. Difficulties undoubtedly there are, we have hitherto learned how to sacrifice our voice and make speeches. We must also learn to sacrifice ease, money, comfort and that we may learn from the Englishmen themselves. Everyone who has studied English history know that we are now engaged in a battle with a nation which is capable of great sacrifice and the three hundred millions of India cannot make their mark upon the world, or gain their self-respect without any adequate measure of sacrifice.

Our friend has suggested the boycott of British or foreign goods. Boycott of all foreign goods is another name for swadeshi. He thinks that there will be a greater response in the boycott of all foreign goods. With the experience of years behind me and with an intimate knowledge of the merchantile classes, I venture to tell you that boycott of foreign goods, or boycott of merely British goods is more impracticable than any of the steps I have suggested, whereas in all the steps that I have ventured to suggest there is practically no sacrifice of money involved. In the boycott of British or foreign goods you are inviting your merchant princes to sacrifice their millions. It has got to be done, but it is an exceedingly slow process. The same may be said of the steps that I have ventured to suggest, I know, but boycott of goods is conceived as punishment and punishment is only effective when it is inflicted. What I have ventured to suggest is not a punishment, but the performance of a sacred duty, a measure of self-denial from ourselves, and therefore it is effective from its very inception when it is undertaken even by one man and a substantial duty performed even by one single man lays the foundation of a nation’s liberty.

I am most anxious for my nation, for my Mussulman brethren also to understand that if they want to vindicate national honour, or the honour of Islam, it will be vindicated without a shadow of doubt, not by conceiving a punishment or a series of punishments, but by an adequate measure of self-sacrifice. I wish to speak of all our leaders in terms of the greatest respect, but whatever respect we wish to pay to them may not stop or arrest the progress of the country, and I am most anxious that the country at this very critical period of its history should make its choice. The choice clearly does not lie before you and me in wresting by force of arms the sceptre from the British nation, but the choice lies in suffering this double wrong of the khilafat and the Punjab, in pocketing humiliation and in accepting national emasculation or vindication of India’s honour by sacrifice today by every man, woman and child and those who feel convinced that this is the only choice left open to us may not wait for the verdict of the Congress, of for any other verdict save the verdict of their own conscience. You and I may not wait till the nation itself has made the choice, but if we are convinced of the rightness of things, we should make that choice to-night. So, citizens of Trichinopoly, you may not wait for the whole of India but you can enforce the first step of non-co-operation and begin your operations even from tomorrow, if you have not done so already. You can surrender all your titles tomorrow; (Cheers.) all the lawyers may surrender their practice tomorrow; those who cannot sustain body and soul by any other means can be easily supported by the Kilafat Committee, if they will give their whole time and attention to the work of that Committee, and if the lawyers will kindly do that, you will find that there is no difficulty in settling your disputes by private arbitration. You can nationalize your schools from tomorrow if you have got the will and the determination. It is difficult, I know, when only a few of you think these things. It is as easy as we are sitting here when the whole of this vast audience is of one mind and as it was easy for you to carry that chair, so is it easy for you to enforce this programme from tomorrow if you have one will, one determination and love for your country, love for the honour of your country and religion. (Loud and prolonged cheers.)

104. MORE OBJECTIONS ANSWERED

Swadeshamitran is one of the most influential Tamil dailies of Madras. It is widely read. Everything appearing in its columns is entitled to respect. The editor has suggested some practical difficulties in the way of non-co-operation. I would therefore like, to the best of my ability, to deal with them.

I do not know where the information has been derived from that I have given up the last two stages of non-co-operation. What I have said is that they are a distant goal. I abide by it. I admit that all the stages are fraught with some danger, but the last two are fraught with the greatest—the last most of all. The stages have been fixed with a view to running the least possible risk. The last two stages will not be taken up unless the Committee has attained sufficient control over the people to warrant the beliefs that the laying down of arms or suspension of taxes will, humanly speaking, be free from an outbreak of violence on the part of the people. I do entertain the belief that it is possible for the people to attain the discipline necessary for taking the two steps. When once they realize that violence is totally unnecessary to bend an unwilling Government to their will and that the results can be obtained with certainty by dignified non-co-operation, they will cease to think of violence even by way of retaliation. The fact is that hitherto we have not attempted to take concerted and disciplined action from the masses. Some day, if we are to become truly a self-governing nation, that attempt has to be made. The present, in my opinion, is a propitious movement. Every Indian feels the insult to the Punjab as a personal wrong, every Mussulman resents the wrong done to the khilafat. There is therefore a favourable atmosphere for expecting cohesive and restrained movement on the part of the masses.

So far as response is concerned, I agree with the editor that the quickest and the largest response is to be expected in the matter of suspension of payment of taxes, but as I have said, so long as the masses are not educated to appreciate the value of non-violence even whilst their holdings are being sold, so long must it be difficult to take up the last stage into any appreciable extent.

I agree too that a sudden withdrawal of the military and the police will be a disaster if we have not acquired the ability to protect ourselves against robbers and thieves. But I suggest that when we are ready to call out the military and the police on an extensive scale, we would find ourselves in a position to defend ourselves. If the police and the military resign from patriotic motives, I would certainly expect them to perform the same duty as national volunteers, not as hirelings but as willing protectors of the life and liberty of their compatriots. The movement of non-co-operation is one of automatic adjustment. If the Government schools are emptied, I would certainly expect national schools to come into being. If the lawyers as a whole suspended practice, they would devise arbitration courts and the nation will have expeditious and cheaper method of settling private disputes and awarding punishment to the wrongdoer. I may add that the Khilafat Committee is fully alive to the difficulty of the task and is taking all the necessary steps to meet the contingencies as they arise.

Regarding the leaving of civil employment, no danger is feared, because no one will leave his employment, unless he is in a position to find support for himself and family either through friends or otherwise.

Disapproval of the proposed withdrawal of students betrays, in my humble opinion, lack of appreciation of the true nature of non-co-operation. It is true enough that we pay the money wherewith our children are educated. But when the agency imparting the education has become corrupt, we may not employ it without partaking of the agent’s corruption. When students leave schools or colleges I hardly imagine that the teachers will fail to perceive the advisability of themselves resigning. But even if they do not, money can hardly be allowed to count where honour or religion are at stake.

As to the boycott of the councils, it is not the entry of the Moderates or any other persons that matters so much as the entry of those who believe in non-co-operation. You may not co-operate at the top and non-co-operate at the bottom. A councillor cannot remain in the council and ask the gumasta who cleans the council table to resign.

Young India, 18-8-1920
105. SWADESHI

In criticizing my article entitled “The Music of the Spinning-Wheel”, the Leader the other day attributed to me the ideas that I have never entertained. And it is necessary for the purpose of understanding the true value of swadeshi, to correct some of the current fallacies. The Leader considers that I am putting back the hands of the clock of progress by attempting to replace mill-made cloth and mill-spun yarn by hand-woven and hand-spun yarn. Now, I am making no such attempt at all. I have no quarrel with the mill. My views are incredibly simple. India requires nearly 13 yards of cloth per head per year. She produces, I believe, less than half the amount. India grows all the cotton she needs. She exports several million bales of cotton to Japan and Lancashire and receives much of it back in manufactured calico although she is capable of producing all the cloth and all the yarn necessary for supplying her wants by hand-weaving and hand-spinning. India needs to supplement her main occupation, agriculture, with some other employment. Hand-spinning is the only such employment for millions. It was the national employment a century ago. It is not true to say that economic pressure and modern machinery destroyed hand-spinning and hand-weaving. This great industry was destroyed or almost destroyed by extraordinary and immoral means adopted by the East India Company. This national industry is capable of being revived by exertion and a change in the national taste without damaging the mill industry. Increase of mills is no present remedy for supplying the deficiency. The deficiency can be easily supplied only by hand-spinning and hand-weaving. If this employment were revived, it would prevent sixty million rupees from being annually drained from the country and distribute the amount among lakhs of poor women in their own cottages. I therefore consider swadeshi as an automatic, though partial, solution of the problem of India’s grinding poverty. It also constitutes a ready-made insurance policy in times of scarcity of rain.

But two things are needful to bring about the needed revival—to create a taste for khaddar and to provide an organization for the distribution of carded cotton and collection of yarn against payment.

In one year, by the silent labour of a few men, several thousands rupees have been distributed in Gujarat among several thousand poor women.

1 Of July 21, 1920
women who are glad enough to earn a few pice per day to buy milk for their children, etc.

The argument does not apply to the sugar industry as the Leader has attempted. There is not sufficient cane grown in India to supply India’s wants. Sugar was never a national and supplementary industry. Foreign sugar has not supplanted Indian sugar. India’s wants of sugar have grown and she therefore imports more sugar. But this importation does not institute a drain in the sense in which importation of foreign cloth does. Production of more sugar means more scientific agriculture, more and better machinery for crushing and refining. The sugar industry therefore stands on a different platform. Swadeshi in sugar is desirable, swadeshi in cloth is an urgent necessity.

106. SPEECH AT CALICUT

August 18, 1920

MR. CHAIRMAN AND FRIENDS.

On behalf of my brother Shaukat Ali and myself I wish to thank you most sincerely for the warm welcome you have extended to us. Before I begin to explain the purpose of our mission I have to give you the information that Pir Mahboob Shah who was being tried in Sind for sedition has been sentenced to two years’ simple imprisonment. I do not know exactly what the offence was with which the Pir was charged. I do not know whether the words attributed to him were ever spoken by him. But I do know that the Pir Saheb declined to offer any defence and with perfect resignation he has accepted his penalty. For me it is a matter of sincere pleasure that the Pir Saheb who exercises great influence over his followers has understood the spirit of the struggle upon which we have embarked. It is not by resisting the authority of Government that we expect to succeed in the great task before us. But I do expect that we shall succeed if we understand the spirit of non-co-operation. The Lieutenant-Governor of Burma himself has told us that the British retain their hold on India not by the force of arms but by the force of co-operation of the people. Thus he has given us the remedy for any wrong that the Government may do to the people, whether knowingly or unknowingly. And so long as we co-operate with the Government, so long as we support that Government we become to that extent sharers in the wrong. I admit that in ordinary circumstances a wise subject will tolerate the wrongs of a Government, but a wise subject never tolerates a wrong that a Government imposes on the declared will of a people. And I venture to submit to this great meeting that the Government of India and the Imperial Government have done a double wrong to India, and if we are a nation of self-respecting people conscious of its dignity, conscious of its right, it is not just and proper that we should stand the double humiliation that the Government has heaped upon us. By shaping and by becoming a predominant partner in the Peace Terms imposed on the helpless Sultan of Turkey, the Imperial Government have intentionally flouted the cherished sentiment of the Mussulman subjects of the Empire. The present Prime Minister gave a deliberate pledge after consultation with his colleagues when it was necessary for him to conciliate the Mussulmans of India. I claim to have studied this khilafat question in a special manner. I claim to understand the Mussulman feeling on the khilafat question and I am here to declare for the tenth time that on the khilafat matter the Government has wounded the Mussulman sentiment as they had never done before. And I say without fear of contradiction that if the Mussulmans of India had not exercised great self-restraint and if there was not the gospel of non-co-operation preached to them and if they had not accepted it, there would have been bloodshed in India by this time. I am free to confess that spilling of blood would not have availed their cause. But a man who is in a state of rage whose heart has become lacerated does not count the cost of his action. So much for the khilafat wrong.

I propose to take you for a minute to the Punjab, the northern end of India. And what have both Governments done for the Punjab? I am free to confess again that the crowds in Amritsar went mad for a moment. They were goaded to madness by a wicked administration. But no madness on the part of a people can justify the shedding of innocent blood, and what have they paid for it? I venture to submit that no civilized Government could ever have made the people pay the penalty and retribution that they have paid. Innocent men were tried through mock-tribunals and imprisoned for life. Amnesty granted to them after; I count of no consequence. Innocent, unarmed men, who knew nothing of what was to happen, were butchered in cold blood without the slightest notice. Modesty of women in Manianwala, women who had done no wrong to any individual, was outraged by insolent officers. I want you to understand what I mean by outrage of their modesty. Their veils were opened with his stick by an officer.
Men who were declared to be utterly innocent by the Hunter Committee were made to crawl on their bellies. And all these wrongs totally undeserved remain unavenged. If it was the duty of the Government of India to punish those who were guilty of incendiarism and murder, as I hold it was their duty, it was doubly their duty to punish officers who insulted and oppressed innocent people. But in the face of these official wrongs we have the debate in the House of Lords supporting official terrorism. It is this double wrong, the affront to Islam and the injury to the manhood of the Punjab, that we feel bound to wipe out by non-co-operation. We have prayed, petitioned, agitated, we have passed resolutions. Mr. Mahomed Ali supported by his friends is now waiting on the British public. He has pleaded the cause of Islam in a most manful manner, but his pleading has fallen on deaf ears and we have his word for it that whilst France and Italy have shown great sympathy for the cause of Islam, it is the British ministers who have shown no sympathy. This shows which way the British ministers and the present holders of office in India mean to deal by the people. There is no goodwill, there is no desire to placate the people of India. The people of India must therefore have a remedy to redress the double wrong. The method of the West is violence. Wherever the people of the West have felt a wrong either justly or unjustly, they have rebelled and shed blood. As I have said in my letter to the Viceroy of India, half of India does not believe in the remedy of violence. The other half is too weak to offer it. But the whole of India is deeply hurt and stirred by this wrong, and it is for that reason that I have suggested to the people of India the remedy of non-co-operation, I consider it perfectly harmless, absolutely constitutional and yet perfectly efficacious. It is a remedy in which, if it is properly adopted, victory is certain, and it is the age-old remedy of self-sacrifice. Are the Mussulmans of India who feel the great wrong done to Islam ready to make an adequate self-sacrifice? All the scriptures of the world teach us that there can be no compromise between justice and injustice. Co-operation on the part of a justice-loving man with an unjust man is a crime. And if we desire to compel this great Government to the will of the people, as we must, we must adopt this great remedy of non-co-operation. And if the Mussulmans of India offer non-co-operation to Government in order to secure justice in the khilafat matter, I believe it is the duty of the Hindus to help them so long as their means are just. I consider the eternal friendship between the Hindus and Mussulmans is more important than the British connection. I would prefer any day anarchy and chaos in India to an armed peace brought about by the bayonet between the Hindus and Mussulmans. I have therefore ventured to suggest to my Hindu brethren that if they wanted to live at peace with Mussulmans, there is an opportunity which is not going to recur for the next hundred years. And I venture to assure you that if the Government of India and the Imperial Government come to know that there is a determination on the part of the people to redress this double wrong they would not hesitate to do what is needed. But the Mussulmans of India will have to take the lead in the matter. You will have to commence the first stage of non-co-operation in right earnest. And if you may not help this Government, you may not receive help from it. Titles which were the other day titles of honour are today in my opinion badges of our disgrace. We must therefore surrender all titles of honour, all honorary offices. It will constitute an emphatic demonstration of the disapproval by the leaders of the people of the acts of the Government. Lawyers must suspend their practice and must resist the power of the Government which has chosen to flout public opinion. Nor may we receive instruction from schools controlled by the Government and aided by it. Emptying of the schools will constitute a demonstration of the will of the middle class of India. It is far better for the nation even to neglect the literary instruction of the children than to co-operate with a Government that has striven to maintain an unjustic and untruth on the khilafat and Punjab matters. Similar have I ventured to suggest a complete boycott of reformed councils. That will be an emphatic declaration on the part of the representatives of the people that they do not desire to associate with the Government so long as the two wrongs continue. We must equally decline to offer ourselves as recruits of the police or military. It is impossible for us to go to Mesopotamia or to offer to police that country or to offer military assistance and to help the Government in that blood-guiltiness. The last plank in the first stage is swadeshi. Swadeshi is intended not so much to bring pressure upon the Government as to demonstrate the capacity for sacrifice on the part of the men and women of India. When one-fourth of India has its religion at stake and when the whole of India has its honour at stake, we can be in no mood to bedeck ourselves with French calico or silks from Japan. We must resolve to be satisfied with cloth woven by the humble weavers of India in their own cottages out of yarn spun by their sisters in their own homes. When a hundred years ago our tastes were not debased and we were not lured by all the fineries from the foreign countries, we were satisfied with the cloth produced by the men and women in India, and if I could but in a moment revolutionize the tastes of India and make it return to its original simplicity, I assure you that the Gods would descend to rejoice at the great act of renunciation. That is the first stage in non-co-operation.

I hope it is as easy for you as it is easy for me to see that if India is capable of taking the first step in anything like a full measure that step will bring the redress we want. I therefore do not intend to take you to the other stages of non-co-operation. I would like you to rivet your attention upon the plans in the first stage. You will have noticed that but two things are necessary in going through the first stage:

(1) Perfect spirit of non-violence is indispensable for non-co-operation,

(2) only a little self-sacrifice. I pray to God that He will give the people of India sufficient courage and wisdom and patience to go through this experiment of non-co-operation. I thank you for the great reception that you have given us. And I also thank you for the great patience and exemplary silence with which you have listened to my remarks.

107. SPEECH AT MANGALORE

_August 19, 1920_

MR. CHAIRMAN AND FRIENDS,

To my brother Shaukat Ali and me it was a pleasure to go to this beautiful garden of India. The great reception that you gave us this afternoon, and this great assembly are most welcome to us, if they are a demonstration of your sympathy with the cause which you have the honour to represent. I assure you that we have not undertaken this incessant travelling in order to have receptions and addresses, no matter how cordial they may be. But we have undertaken this travelling throughout the length and breadth of this dear motherland to place before you the position that faces us today. It is our privilege, as it is our duty, to place that position before the country and let her make the choice.
Throughout our tour we have received many addresses, but in my humble opinion no address was more truly worded than the address that was presented to us at Kasargod. It addressed both of us as “dear revered brothers”. I am unable to accept the second adjective “revered”. The word “dear” is dear to me I must confess. But dearer than that is the expression “brothers”. The signatories to that address recognized the true significance of this travel. No blood-brothers can possibly be more intimately related, can possibly be more united in one purpose, one aim than my brother Shaukat Ali and I. And I considered it a proud privilege and honour to be addressed as blood-brother to Shaukat Ali. The contents of that address were as equally significant. It stated that in our united work was represented the essence of the unity between the Mussulmans and Hindus in India. If we two cannot represent that very desirable unity, if we two cannot cement the relation between the two communities, I do not know who can. Then without any rhetoric and without any flowery language the address went on to describe the inwardness of the Punjab and the khilafat struggle; and then in simple and beautiful language it described the spiritual significance of satyagraha and non-co-operation. This was followed by a frank and simple promise. Although the signatories to the address realized the momentous nature of the struggle on which we have embarked, and although they sympathize with the struggle with their whole heart, they wound up by saying that even if they could not follow non-co-operation in all its details, they would do as much as they could to help the struggle. And lastly, in eloquent, and true language, they said, “if we cannot rise equal to the occasion it will not be due to want of effort but to want of ability”. I can desire no better address, no better promise, and if you, the citizens of Mangalore, can come up to the level of the signatories, and give us just the assurance that you consider the struggle to be right and that it commands your entire approval, I am certain you will make all sacrifice that lies in your power. For we are face to face with a peril greater than plagues, greater than influenza, greater than earthquakes and mighty floods, which sometimes overwhelm this land. These physical calamities can rob us of so many Indian bodies. But the calamity that has at the present moment overtaken India touches the religious honour of a fourth of her children and the self-respect of the whole nation. The khilafat wrong affects the Mussulmans of India, and the Punjab calamity very nearly overwhelms the manhood of India. Shall we in the face of this danger be weak or rise to our full height? The remedy for both the wrongs is the spiritual solvent of non-co-operation. I call it a spiritual weapon, because it demands discipline and sacrifice from us. It demands sacrifice from every individual irrespective of the rest. And the promise that is behind this performance of duty, the promise given by every religion that I have studied, is sure and certain. It is that there is no spotless sacrifice that has been yet offered on earth, which has not carried with it its absolute adequate reward. It is a spiritual weapon, because it waits for no mandate from anybody except one’s own conscience. It is a spiritual weapon because it brings out the best in the nation and it absolutely satisfies national honour if the whole nation takes it up. And therefore it is that I have called non-co-operation—in opposition to the opinion of many of my distinguished countrymen and leaders—a weapon that is infallible and absolutely practicable. It is infallible and practicable, because it satisfies the demands of individual conscience. God above cannot, will not expect Maulana Shaukat Ali to do more than he has been doing, for he has surrendered and placed at the disposal of God whom he believes to be the Almighty ruler of everyone, he has delivered all in the service of God. And we stand before the citizens of Mangalore and ask them to make their choice either to accept this precious gift that we lay at their feet or to reject it. And after having listened to my message if you come to the conclusion that you have no other remedy than non-co-operation for the conservation of Islam and the honour of India, you will accept that remedy. I ask you not to be confused by so many bewildering issues that are placed before you, not to be shaken from your purpose because you see divided counsels amongst your leaders. This is one of the necessary limitations of any spiritual or any other struggle that has ever been fought on this earth. It is because it comes so suddenly that it confuses the mind if the heart is not tuned properly. And we would be perfect human beings on this earth if in all of us was found absolutely perfect correspondence between the mind and the heart. But those of you who have been following the newspaper controversy, will find that no matter what division of opinion exists amongst our journals and leaders there is unanimity that the remedy is efficacious if it can be kept free from violence, and if it is adopted on a large scale. I admit the difficulty, the virtue however lies in surmounting it. We cannot possibly combine violence with a spiritual weapon like non-co-operation. We do not offer spotless sacrifice it we take the lives of others in offering our own.
Absolute freedom from violence is therefore a condition precedent to non-co-operation. But I have faith in my country to know that when it has assimilated the principle of the doctrine to the fullest extent, it will respond to it. And in no case will India make any headway whatsoever until she has learnt the lesson of self-sacrifice. Even if this country were to take up the doctrine of the sword, which God forbid, it will have to learn the lesson of self-sacrifice. The second difficulty suggested is the want of solidarity of the nation. I accept it too. But that difficulty I have already answered by saying that it is a remedy that can be taken up by individuals for individual and by the nation for national satisfaction; and therefore even if the whole nation does not take up non-co-operation, the individual successes, which may be obtained by individuals taking up non-co-operation, will stand to their own credit as of the nation to which they belong.

The first stage in my humble opinion is incredibly easy inasmuch as it does not involve any very great sacrifice. If your Khan Bahadurs and other title-holders were to renounce their titles I venture to submit that whilst the renunciation will stand to the credit and honour of the nation it will involve a little or no sacrifice. On the contrary, they will not only have surrendered no earthly riches, but they will have gained the applause of the nation. Let us see what it means, this first step. The able editor of The Hindu, Mr. Kasturi Ranga Iyengar, and almost every journalist in the country are agreed that the renunciation of titles is a necessary and a desirable step. And if these chosen people of the Government were without exception to surrender their titles to Government giving notice that the heart of India is doubly wounded in that the honour of India and of Muslim religion is at stake and that therefore they can no longer retain their titles I venture to suggest that this step which costs not a single penny either to them or to the nation will be an effective demonstration of the national will.

Take the second step or the second item of non-co-operation. I know there is strong opposition to the boycott of councils. The opposition when you begin to analyse it means not that the step is faulty or that it is not likely to succeed, but it is due to the belief that the whole country will not respond to it and that the Moderates will steal into the councils. I ask the citizens of Mangalore to dispel that fear from your hearts. United, the voters of Mangalore can make it impossible for either a Moderate or an Extremist or any other form of leader to enter the councils as your representative. This step involves no sacrifice of money, no sacrifice of honour but the gaining of prestige for the whole nation. And I venture to suggest to you that this one step alone if it is taken with any degree of unanimity even by the Extremists can bring about the desired relief, but if all do not respond the individual need not be afraid. He at least will have laid the foundation for true set progress, let him have the comfort that he at least has washed his hands clean of the guilt of the Government.

Then I come to the members of the profession which one time I used to carry on. I have ventured to ask the lawyers of India to suspend their practice and withdraw their support from a Government which no longer stands for justice, pure and unadulterated, for the nation. And the step is good for the individual lawyer who takes it and is good for the nation if all the lawyers take it.

And so for the Government and the Government-aided schools, I must confess that I cannot reconcile my conscience to my children going to Government schools and to the programme of non-co-operation which is intended to withdraw all support from the Government and to decline all help from it.

I will not tax your patience by taking you through the other items of non-co-operation important as they are. But I have ventured to place before you four very important and forcible steps any one of which if fully taken up contains in it possibilities of success. Swadeshi is prea-ched as an item of non-co-operation, as a demonstration of the spirit of sacrifice and it is an item which every man, woman and child can take up.

108. SPEECH ON NON-CO-OPERATION, BANGALORE

August 21, 1920

Mahatmaji spoke in Urdu and at first apologized for his inability to stand. Mr. Gandhi after reiterating the two national grievances and explaining at length various items in the first stage of non-co-operation declared that should India elect to remain for ever to be the slave of this Government machinery, should her people continue to frequent law-courts for justice, should they continue to fill Government schools with their children and continue to go to councils, he would no longer be in a position, conscientiously to accept flowers and garlands from them. Until the wrongs remain unredressed the help given to the Government in any shape or form would serve to tighten the chains that bind India at present. He could not consistently utter verses from holy Koran and help the Government at the same time while they were convinced that the Government had imperilled Islam. Muslims consider it their religious duty to draw sword to save the khilafat. He has always been against the doctrine of the sword and Maulana Abdul Bari assured him that non-co-operation had been practised by the great Prophet. He (the speaker) was convinced that the country was not strong enough to draw the sword. Hence it shrank to the simple item of the first stage of non-co-operation. He felt that Mr. Shaukat Ali had understood that it was a fact that there was sacrifice in lifting the sword but it was also a fact that sacrifice demanded in non-co-operation was greater and yet a child could adopt it. He warned the Mussulmans to deter against such weakness as shown by Pir Mahboob Shah. Indians by their own habits had spoiled Pirs and Pujaris. He therefore did not expect Pirs to perform an amount of sacrifice that he wanted from the people. In his South African struggle one of his first fellow-workers was a Pujari, but the success came through masses.

109. ADDRESS TO STUDENTS OF LAW COLLEGE, MADRAS

August 21, 1920

Mr. Gandhi began by saying that he wanted to occupy the students in a heart-to-heart conversation, that he would explain to them how a pair, composed of Maulana Shaukat Ali and himself, living at opposite poles about some fundamentals of life—particularly in one fundamental of life, inasmuch as to the speaker non-violence was the final arbiter and to Shaukat Ali the sword was the final arbiter—how such a pair could engage hand in hand in the struggle in question. He could do no better than read to them a letter he had received that very morning from a Christian lady who said among other things that she was convinced by the speaker’s Madras speech of the necessity of non-co-operation and that though she had no particular sympathy with Turkey she could not help feeling that in a struggle carried on solely for the honour and prestige of Islam, not only the Hindus but the Christians also should render full assistance to the Mussulmans, and that in a matter of conscience, as the one in question, no nation should be called upon to hang its decision on the mandate of its Congress. She also expressed her hearty approval of the boycott of councils and of Government and Government-aided schools as also other steps in the first stage of non-co-operation. The speaker read out the letter to the audience and said that it was a magnificent letter, and that he read it not to produce a certificate of non-co-operation or about his Madras address, but as the testimony of an impartial Christian observer who was convinced of the spirituality of the struggle, and who thought it was therefore a struggle in which Hindus and Christians ought to have their share no less than the Mussulmans.

Mr. Gandhi next went on to offer his remarks on the Viceroy’s speech at the opening of the legislative council. He said that the paragraph on non-co-operation demonstrated the triumph of non-co-operation, it involved a confession that the authorities had learnt a lesson, viz, the wisdom of not precipitating violence and to allow a movement to die out by simply ridiculing it. That was, said the speaker, the chosen method of Government in its own home, and it was for the people of India to convert that ridicule into approval. Lord Chelmsford had said that he was a lawyer, and that as such he was offering advice to the members of the bar, but that took them no step further. At the one end was the Viceroy asking the lawyers to hold on to the courts like grim death, at the other end was the speaker, also a lawyer, who had seen several years’ active practice and given it up, who was born of the people and for the people, asking them to shun the law-courts, and it was for the legal profession to make their choice. Throughout the world, went on the speaker, the Government had their hold on the necks of the people through the agency of the law-courts. These law-courts, in times other than the present, a lesser evil inasmuch as they preserved so-called order as opposed to anarchy. In times as the present, they were an unmitigated evil, and he had no doubt that if the lawyers boycotted law-courts they would paralyse the arm of Government which means force. If the lawyers leading public movement in the country were not willing to respond to the call of sacrifice, he, the speaker, would not have the gumption to go and advise the country. If the lawyers were not prepared for acts of sacrifice their appeals would fall flat on the masses, indeed they would have to go asking the people not to engage in a struggle of the present nature, in which case they would have to eat their own words and say that the injustice of which they were talking till now was not so glaring or rankling in their breast as to ask them to go beyond the orthodox methods of agitation. There may be, said the speaker, governments as diabolical, even more diabolical than the British Government, but for Indians it was the most diabolical. It was going downhill. What a shocking document was the Viceregal pronouncement! The Viceroy said that the Punjab chapter was closed. From a Government who could thus add insult to injury, no gifts, however valuable they may be, could be accepted so long as they do not repent for what they had done. Khilafat, the Government might say, would kill itself, but it would not kill itself so long as the Indians had not killed themselves. It would close only over their ashes.

The speaker then carried the audience through some of the episodes in his life which revealed how he, a staunch Hindu, who had imbibed the best of Hinduism from his Shastras, from his fore-fathers and his studies, how he was brought together with a man like Shaukat Ali, than whom he knew no more deeply religious man. It was the common feeling that the salvation of India lay in the union of hearts between the Hindus and the Mussulmans that brought them together. The Mussulmans were not too arrogant, too haughty to do without the help of the Hindus and others, and there was no alternative before Shaukat Ali to accept the aid offered by the speaker, as a Hindu who had represented the best of what he had assimilated of Hinduism and for no other motive but that of showing the nobility of his faith. To illustrate the spirit in which his assistance was accepted the speaker harked back to a meeting that took place between him and Maulana Abdul Bari Saheb, narrating in vivid detail the talk between the Maulana and him. The gist of the story was that whilst Mr. Gandhi insisted that he was not going to render aid in any bargaining spirit, the Maulana insisted that it would be the denial of Islam if the Mussulmans accepted the aid without any thought of reciprocating it. Thus were two staunch faithful ones, viz, the speaker and Mr. Shaukat Ali, united more than a brother to brother on a mission to save the honour of Islam and India.

The speaker proceeded to say that the lawyers with their trained minds ought to be able to see the core of the question. It meant, in spiritual terms, not a battle between races, but a battle between the forces of light and darkness, between the forces of devil and God. The devil was today incarnate in the wretched Western civilization. Having given years of study to the Western civilization the speaker had come to the deliberate conclusion that it represented evil clothed in the robes of Satan and that the Indians had to be engaged in fighting the powers of that evil. The force that were moulding the masses of Europe were devilry incarnate and Christianity had to grapple with those forces more and more as the evil ever darkened and thickened. The speaker would not hesitate to say that God (Truth) was represented by the Indians, by the non-co-operationists because they approached God in the humblest spirit, they were asking God not to give them arms but a spirit of self-sacrifice. The British people, said the speaker, whilst they bragged, blustered, whilst they used in turn honeyed phrases and bitter ones, deep down in them was the spirit to appreciate courage. But the Viceroy today was coquetting with them. He saw that there was an atmosphere of sycophancy and he wanted to avail himself of it. He presented to show that he could tolerate opposition. It was good enough this cajoling, but it was wicked because behind it were not just motives as the Viceroy represented today a double wrong, as he had heaped insult on insult. The khilafat wrong he laid at the door of Europe. Well, the Indians were offering non-co-operation to all the powers, not only to the British powers, they were non-co-operating with the evil regarding the khilafat and the Punjab in each and every corner of the world wherever it was represented.

Mr. Gandhi appealed to the audience to leave law-courts, emphasizing that nobody served the country and did not serve himself. He for one could say that by giving up law he had to sacrifice none of the comforts that he used to enjoy, because they came multiplied a hundred-fold out of the kindness of the people who repaid their services in more than a full measure. But they must be prepared to say that they were all for the country, every hour of their time, even their recreation hours, were to be for the country. If they wanted to pit themselves against the mighty corporation, i.e., the Government, who had got all the arts and crafts of Government, all the powers of sweet speech, all the powers of bribery and even of sacrifice, they must be prepared for greater powers of sacrifice. He wanted them to realize that in going to the law-courts they were strengthening the arm of Government which represented evil.

Incidentally, the speaker said that the reluctance to cast in their lot with Mussulmans was engendered by the craven fear that India would be deluged by the Mussulmans and that the Hindus would be terrorized over by them, in case the latter were victorious. This fear, said the speaker was degrading to Hinduism, whose land was dotted, as Col. Tod said, with a thousand Thermopaelies. The death of a martyr is far more preferable to the death of a coward. Immediately a sword fell upon an innocent neck that religion was disgraced, and the speaker had no doubt that Islam was not a religion of disgrace. The nobility of Hinduism consisted in unconditionally going to the aid of the Mussulmans, when they were in peril. He would assure them that God would send a fresh command to Islam that Hindus should be regarded as the partners of the Mussulmans and that they might never quarrel with them. The speaker was prepared to give the same aid to Christendom in its peril; he would give the same aid to Gen. Dyer if he was in danger; but not if he was going on a similar errand as the Jallianwala Bagh. He asked them to go out to Islam, trusting not the followers of Islam but trusting goodness, and asking the heavens to witness. Every Mussulman would then be their protector, and there would be an imperishable union between the two. The Hindu would then offer his prayers with more impunity than he did today. Today he did not offer his prayers with impunity as he had to do so with fear of Satan hanging on him in the guise of a saint.

Mr. Gandhi went on to say that the attempt to revise the Peace Terms was an attempt to revive Islam. The Mussulmans adored no Caliph, and none who had a rotten character; they adored Islam and they adored the Caliph as representing the essence of Islam. They were not fighting for a Sultan who has signed the Peace Terms; they were fighting for an ideal, pure and simple, and the Hindus had the choice ready before them of defending their hearts and homes, and it would be the eternal disgrace of Hinduism if they could not prepare themselves to stand by Islam. The speaker emphasized with the force and humility he could command that in trying to die for Islam, they were trying to die for their own faith, and for their own hearts and homes.

MR. CHAIRMAN AND FRIENDS,

I am glad that I have been able to come in your midst so soon after my visit. You will remember, those of you who were present on the last occasion, what I said to you then and I hope that those who listened to my remarks and understood them explained them to those who were not present. And if none of you has done it already I would ask you on my behalf to explain those remarks to other friends. I told you then what some of your duties were and I told you also that if you performed all those duties you could gain not only your immediate end, namely, a positive relationship with your employers, but you could command...

Indeed, I went so far as to say that when labour became fully conscious of its own strength and perfectly disciplined, labour became the predominant partner and not money. But what I said to you on the last occasion had reference only to relation between labour and capital. I would like this afternoon to address a few remarks on your duties as citizens and part of the community to which you belong. For if you follow my humble advice and begin to think about yourselves, think alone of your duties and begin to train your minds by proper education. You will presently know your status not only as labourers but your status as part of the whole community. Your Union is an extension of the idea of family. You are now not members of your family which is naturally comparatively small but you are members of your Union which is a much bigger family. You have only to extend the idea to understand that you are not only members of the Union but members of the whole body of people that live in Madras and therefore you owe certain duties to the people of Madras as a whole and they owe certain duties to you. But Madras after all is part of a big place called the Madras Presidency. And Madras Presidency is but a part, though a very big part, of what we know as India. So if you have a large heart you will understand that your birthplace is not your little village and not Madras Presidency but yours is the land of India or Bharat Varsha, and therefore you are brothers of your 33 crores of fellow-men. And you owe certain duties to them and they to you, even as you owe certain duties to the members of the Union and they to you. And if any one of them lives 2,000 miles away from you in the Punjab you should feel the same for [him]. If any of them is starving you should feel like going and feeding him before you feed yourselves. But you cannot know how you are to discharge your duties unless you try to understand what the expression India means, what this land of 33 crore people means, also what are their grievances and what are their needs and before you can understand this it is necessary to know what is the form of government in the country. In other words you should understand the politics of the country in the real sense of the term. There are so many movements going on in the country in connection with politics. It is your duty to understand them and find your place in them. And I hope that your curiosity will not end with your obligations to your personal family and to the Union but that you will extend your curiosity to the uttermost bounds of India, and I hope that Mr. T. V. K[alyana] S[undaram] and all friends who are doing such good and valuable work for you will arrange a course of lectures for you and tell you what your duties as citizens of this Great Empire are. They will give you, I hope, the necessary knowledge of the geography of India, that is, of India both political and commercial. You will not consider that all this is beyond your capacity. Nothing is impossible for a man who tries, and I do hope sincerely that you will try. I thank you for inviting me again to come and see you. I thank you for listening to me so patiently. God bless you.

111. TALK AT LAW COLLEGE, MADRAS

August 22, 1920

Mr. Gandhi in the course of an informal talk with the students of the Law College, referring to the non-Brahmin movement of this Presidency said as follows:

I am prepared to say that it is the duty of the Brahmins to surrender at every stage of the fight to the demands of the non-Brahmins and grant them all the seats if demanded, and if it is in my power, I will give them some more. This demand of the non-Brahmins is the result of their distrust towards the Brahmins. The Brahmins have for long contributed their best, but in their arrogance, the distinction they have drawn between themselves and the other castes is most diabolical and is as diabolical as the distinction we are fighting against, i.e., the distinction the European races have drawn between themselves and the darker races.

112. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

BEZWADA,
August 23, 1920

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

I complete today my exhausting tour in the Madras Presidency. It has been incessant travelling. My experience has confirmed me in the rightness of the struggle and in my belief in the greatness and goodness of Shaukat Ali. He is really one of the most sincere of men I have met. He is generous, frank, brave and gentle. He believes in his mission and in himself. Having an implicit faith in God, he is refreshingly optimistic. The response of the common people is wonderful. The non-violence part of the programme is making great headway. There was a dense crowd in Bangalore covering a vast area as far as the eye could reach. There was a solitary Englishman and an Englishwoman amongst it. But the crowd did not so much as jostle them. From everywhere I get testimony regarding non-violent behaviour of the crowds. You must have noticed the reluctant testimony of the Government regarding the trying circumstances of the Muhajarins. All this is, in my opinion good. On the other hand, I see poor response from the leading class. They do not want to sacrifice anything at all. They expect to gain everything by speeches and resolutions. They [are] keeping back a nation which is ready for sacrifice.

113. LETTER TO SARALADEVI CHAUDHRANI

BEZWADA,
August 23, 1920

Either the night or the day has been passed each day in the train. The nights have been always disturbed by crowds. Thank God we have nearly finished this exhausting tour. Considering everything I have kept remarkably fit and strong.

Your letters have your usual self. Some of them decidedly despondent and sceptical and suspicious.

You still do not understand Mathuradas¹. He and the others who surround me are superior to us, if you will allow me to include you. They are certainly superior to me. And it is as should be. It is my claim that I have selected as my companions my superiors in character, superiors, that is to say, in their possibility. My progress can only be little. Theirs is still illimitable. They are jealous of their ideal which is my character. I and (if you are mine in the purest sense of the term) you must give everything to retain or deserve their love and affection. There can be no yielding only on principle. For that we must forsake all and everything. But I would surrender all the world to deserve love so pure and unselfish. Their love uplifts me and keeps me on the square. They are my sheet-anchor as I am theirs. You should be proud of their jealousy and watchfulness. They want to run no risks and they are right. You and I are in duty bound to satisfy every lawful requirement. And we shall have well met.

Yes, if you remain at your post in Lahore it would be quite all right. You can gain little by coming to Calcutta during the week of turmoil and stress. The pilgrimage to your mother may take place in quieter time and after you have perfected your spinning-wheel and Hindi and put our Lahore work on a sound footing. You see I say Lahore in preference to the Punjab. I want you to lay the surest foundation and therefore I want intensity rather than extent.

You ask for a reward of your great surrender. Well, it is its own reward.

With deep love,

Yours,

L. G.²

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
114. SPEECH AT BEZWADA

August 23, 1920

Proceedings of the meeting held in connection with the visit of Messrs M. K. Gandhi and Maulana Shaukat Ali, on the evening of 23rd August 1920 at Bezwada in the compound of the Municipal Travellers’ Bungalow:

India will commit suicide if we do not appreciate and understand the forces that are arrayed against us. We have got a mighty Government, with all the power, with all the forces of arms arrayed against us. It is composed of men who are able, courageous, willing and capable of making sacrifices. It is a Government which does not scruple to use means fair or foul in order to gain its ends. (Cries of “shame!”) No craft is above that Government. It resorts to frightfulness, terrorism. It resorts to bribery in the shape of titles, honours and high offices. (Cries of “shame!”) It administers opiates in the form of reforms. In any sense it is autocracy doubly distilled, appearing in the guise of democracy for the greatest gifts of a crafty, cunning man are worthless so long as cunning resides in his heart. It is a Government which represents a civilization which is purely material and godless. (Cries of “shame!”) I have given to you these qualities of this Government not in order to excite your angry passions but in order that you may appreciate fully the forces that are matched against you. Anger will serve no purpose. But we shall have to meet the godlessness by godliness. We shall have to meet their untruth by truth. We shall have to meet terrorism, their frightfulness by bravery, and it is an unbending bravery which is, today, demanded from every man, woman and child.

And I ask you, the citizens of Bezwada, to consider well before you set your eyes upon the loaves and fishes that are ready for you in Government employment, set them in one scale and set your religious and national honours in the other and make your choice.

It passes my comprehension how we, who have known this Government, who have read the Viceregal pronouncement, who have understood the determination of this Government not to grant justice either in the matter of the Punjab or in the matter of the khilafat; it passes my comprehension how can we expect any real blessing, any real freedom for India from any association, constructive or obstructive, with this Government.

Moderates believe in the possibility of justice being obtained at the hands of this Government. Nationalists with firmness, on the other hand, have wrung with denunciation unadulterated of this Government and of its measures. How can a Nationalist ever hope to gain anything by entering into these councils holding people that they do. But if they really represent popular will and if they want to retain their hold on the popular mind, I venture to suggest to them that it is their business to remain out of the councils, consolidate public opinion and wring justice from unwilling hands.

115. LETTER TO SARLADEVI CHAUDHRANI

ON THE WAY TO MANMAD FOR BOMBAY,

August 24, 1920

MY DEAREST S.,

Your letters have caused me distress. You do not like my sermons. And yet so long as you remain a school girl, what should I do except giving you sermons? If my love is true it must express itself in sermons so long as you do not realize the ideal accepted by you as worthy. I do not at all like your doubting the necessity of the life adopted by you or the life you are trying to adopt. What can be the reward of always speaking and doing Truth even at the peril of one’s life? What can be the reward of dying for one’s country? What is the reward of your having given years to acquiring perfection in piano-playing? You give all for the cause you represent because you cannot do otherwise. Your satisfaction must depend upon complete surrender. A surrender that gives not satisfaction is compulsory surrender, unworthy of a self-respecting person. And if your association with me does not teach you this simple truth, I must be unworthy of your love. For, if my life has not taught you this much, I am a worthless being. There is no worth in me except the capacity for unlimited self-surrender and truthfulness. All have noticed these two qualities in me and there must be something wrong in me if you who have penetrated my life so deeply have failed to notice them. And what can I give you to share except my richest possessions? And so, you must not resent my giving you sermons but receive them in the same loving manner in which they are delivered. If I am your Law-giver and if I do not always lay down the law, surely I must at least reason with you on things of eternity or supreme importance for the country for which we live and which we love so well.
But this does not mean that you must not write nasty things if you think them. My plea is that you must cease to think nasty thoughts.

With love,

Yours,
L. G.

116. RELIGIOUS AUTHORITY FOR NON-CO-OPERATION

It is not without the greatest reluctance that I engage in a controversy with so learned a leader like Sir Narayan Chandavarkar. But in view of the fact that I am the author of the movement of non-co-operation, it becomes my painful duty to state my views even though they are opposed to those of the leaders whom I look upon with respect. I have just read during my travels in Malabar Sir Narayan’s rejoinder to my answer to the Bombay Manifesto against non-co-operation. I regret to have to say that the rejoinder leaves me unconvinced. He and I seem to read the teachings of the Bible, the Gita and the Koran from different standpoints or we put different interpretations on them. We seem to understand the words ahimsa, politics and religion differently. I shall try my best to make clear my meaning of the common terms and my reading of the different religions.

At the outset let me assure Sir Narayan that I have not changed my views on ahimsa. I still believe that man not having been given the power of creation does not possess the right of destroying the meanest creature that lives. The prerogative of destruction belongs solely to the Creator of all that lives. I accept the interpretation of ahimsa, namely, that it is not merely a negative state of harmlessness but it is a positive state of love, of doing good even to the evil-doer. But it does not mean helping the evil-doer to continue the wrong or tolerating it by passive acquiescence—on the contrary, love, the active state of ahimsa, requires you to resist the wrong-doer by dissociating yourself from him even though it may offend him or injure him physically. Thus if my son lives a life of shame, I may not help him to do so by continuing to support him; on the contrary, my love for him requires me to withdraw all support from him although it may mean even his death. And the same love imposes on me the obligation of welcoming him to my bosom when he repents. But I may not by physical force compel my son to become good—that in my opinion is the moral of the story of the Prodigal Son.

Non-co-operation is not a passive state, it is an intensely active state—more active than physical resistance or violence. Passive resistance is a misnomer. Non-co-operation in the sense used by me must be non-violent and therefore neither punitive nor vindictive nor based on malice, ill will or hatred. It follows therefore that it would be sin for me to serve General Dyer and co-operate with him to shoot innocent men. But it will be an exercise of forgiveness or love for me to nurse him back to life, if he was suffering from a physical malady. I cannot use in this context the word co-operation as Sir Narayan would perhaps use it. I would co-operate a thousand times with this Government to wean it from its career of crime, but I will not for a single moment co-operate with it to continue that career. And I would be guilty of wrong doing if I retained a title from it or “as service under it or supported its law-courts or schools”. Better for me a beggar’s bowl than the richest possession from hands stained with the blood of the innocents of Jallianwala. Better by far a warrant of imprisonment than honeyed words from those who have wantonly wounded the religious sentiment of my seventy million brothers.

My reading of the Gita is diametrically opposed to Sir Narayan’s. I do not believe that the Gita teaches violence for doing good. It is pre-eminently a description of the duel that goes on in our own hearts. The divine author has used a historical incident for inculcating the lesson of doing one’s duty even at the peril of one’s life. It inculcates performance of duty irrespective of the consequences, for, we mortals, limited by our physical frames, are incapable of controlling actions save our own. The Gita distinguishes between the powers of light and darkness and demonstrates their incompatibility.

Jesus, in my humble opinion, was a prince among politicians. He did render unto Caesar that which was Caesar’s. He gave the devil his due. He ever shunned him and is reported never once to have yielded to his incantations. The politics of his time consisted in securing the welfare of the people by teaching them not to be seduced by the trinkets of the priests and the pharisees. The latter then controlled and moulded the life of the people. Today the system of Government is so devised as to affect every department of our life. It threatens our very existence. If therefore we want to conserve the welfare of the nation, we must religiously interest ourselves in the doings of the governors and exert a moral influence on them by insisting on their obeying the laws of morality. General Dyer did produce a “moral effect” by an act of butchery. Those who are engaged in forwarding the movement of non-co-operation, hope to produce a moral effect by a process of self-denial, self-sacrifice and self-purification. It surprises me that Sir Narayan should speak of General Dyer’s massacre in the same breath as acts of non-co-operation. I have done my best to understand his meaning, but I am sorry to confess that I have failed.

117. KHILAFAT AND SWADESHI

It was not without much misgiving that I consented to include swadeshi as a plank in non-co-operation. But Maulana Hasrat Mohani by his sheer earnestness bore me down. I fear however that his reasons for including swadeshi are different from mine. He is a protagonist of boycott of British goods. I cannot reconcile myself to the doctrine as I have explained elsewhere in this issue. But having failed to popularize boycott, Mohani Saheb has accepted swadeshi as the lesser good. It is however necessary for me to explain how I have come to include swadeshi in the programme of non-co-operation.

Non-co-operation is nothing but discipline in self-sacrifice. And I believe that a nation that is capable of limitless sacrifice is capable of rising to limitless heights. The purer the sacrifice the quicker the progress. Swadeshi offers man, woman and child an occasion to make a beginning in self-sacrifice of pure type. It therefore presents an opportunity for testing our capacity for sacrifice. It is the measure for gauging the depth of national feeling on the khilafat wrong. Does the nation feel sufficiently to move it to go through even the preliminary process of sacrifice? Will the nation revise its taste for the Japanese silk, the Manchester calico or the French lace and find all its decoration out of hand-spun and hand-woven cloth, i.e., khadi? If crores of people will refuse to wear or use foreign cloth and be satisfied with the simple cloth that we can produce in our homes, it will be proof of our organizing ability, energy, co-operation and self-sacrifice that will enable us to secure all we need. It will be a striking demonstration of national solidarity.

Such a consummation cannot be achieved for the mere wish. It cannot be achieved by one man, no matter how capable and sincere he may be. It cannot be achieved by dotting India with swadeshi stores. It can only be achieved by new production and judicious distribution. Production means lakhs of women spinning in their own homes. This requires earnest men to be engaged in honestly distributing carded cotton and collecting yarn and paying for it. It means manufacture of thousands of spinning-wheels. It means inducing the hereditary weavers to return to their noble calling and distributing home-spun yarn amongst them and setting their manufactures. It is thus only as an energizing agent that I can think of swadeshi as a plank in non-co-operation. But it is not to be despised in that capacity. And I hope that every worker for the cause, even if he can do nothing else, will have done something if he can advance swadeshi first by increasing production and then distribution. He would be simply moving in a circle if he is satisfied with distributing cloth that is already being manufactured in India.

118. BOYCOTT OF GOODS V. NON-CO-OPERATION PROGRAMME

Mr. Kasturi Ranga Iyengar was pleased to answer my argument in favour of the details of the first stage of non-co-operation that I had the honour of explaining at the great Madras Beach meeting. He expressed his dissent from all but the renunciation of titles. He suggested boycott of foreign goods in the place of the other items. Even at the risk of repeating arguments familiar to the readers of Young India, I must deal with the question of boycott which has now received the imprimatur of so able a publicist as Mr. Kasturi Ranga Iyengar.

In the first place, boycott of British goods has been conceived as a punishment and can have no place in non-co-operation which is conceived in a spirit of self-sacrifice and is a matter of sacred duty.

Secondly, any measure of punishment must be swift, certain and adequate for the effect intended to be produced. Resorted to by individuals, therefore, boycott is ineffectual, for, it can give no satisfaction unless it is productive of effect, whereas every act of non-co-operation is its own satisfaction.

Thirdly, boycott of British goods is thoroughly unpractical, for, it involves sacrifice of their millions by millionaires. It is in my opinion infinitely more difficult for a merchant to sacrifice his millions than for a lawyer to suspend his practice or for a title-holder to give up his title, or for a parent to sacrifice, if need be, the literary instruction of his children. Add to this the important fact that merchants have only lately begun to interest themselves in politics. They are therefore yet timid and cautious. But the class, to which the first stage of non-co-operation is intended to appeal, is the political class which has devoted years to politics and is not mentally unprepared for communal sacrifice.

Boycott of British goods to be effective must be taken up by the whole country at once or not at all. It is like a siege. You can carry out a siege only when you have the requisite men and instruments of destruction. One man scratching a wall with his finger nails may hurt his fingers but will produce no effect upon the walls. One title-holder giving up his title has the supreme satisfaction of having washed his hands clean of the guilt of the donor and is unaffected by the refusal of his fellows to give up theirs. The motive of boycott being punitive lacks the inherent practicability of non-co-operation. The spirit of punishment is a sign of weakness. A strengthening of that spirit will retard the process of regeneration. The spirit of sacrifice is a determination to rid ourselves of our weakness. It is therefore an invigorating and purifying process and is therefore also calculated to do good both to us and to those who evoke the spirit of sacrifice in us. Above all, if India has a mission of her own, she will not fulfill it by copying the doubtful example of the West and making even her sacrifice materialistically utilitarian instead of offering a sacrifice, spotless and pleasing even in the sight of God.

120. LETTER TO HERMANN KALLENBACH

SABARMATI, NEAR AHMEDABAD,
August 27 [1920]

MY DEAR LOWER HOUSE,

I hope you have my letters. Jamnadas has sent me a cable asking me in your name to go to Germany to have Just's cure. But it cannot be. I have no leisure for anything but the struggle going on here. If I was free, I would have run down not for the earth cure but most decidedly to meet you, hug you and once more look you in the face. For me you have risen from the dead. Not having heard from or of you and all my inquiries having failed, I had decided that you had left this little globe of ours. You cannot imagine the joy of the thought I may yet see you in the flesh and meanwhile begin to receive your love letters.

I know you will not rebuke me when I tell you that like many of my things, your clothes have become moth-eaten. With all the changes life with me has undergone, I have been unable to overhaul things in my custody. For months when we shifted to where we are at present, all the things had to be stored away in a place. We were living in tents in what was practically a wilderness. So when you come, you will see a skeleton of what at one time used to be a good wardrobe. Most of your books remain in a fair condition.

Our friend Omar has gone through much grief. Parsi Rustomji is in Durban and thriving. West is his own printer in Durban.

I am now off to a conference.¹

With love,

Yours,

121. SPEECH AT GUJARAT POLITICAL CONFERENCE, AHMEDABAD

August 27, 1920

I consider it an honour to discharge the duty which has been assigned to me. I am not, however, altogether disinterested in the matter. Electing a president is easy and yet difficult. This is a critical time for India. On this occasion, with the eyes of the whole country turned on us, we need to elect as president an old and experienced captain who will steer the ship well. Several names were suggested in the meeting of the Reception Committee. I voted for Shri Abbas Tyabji. I felt that, with him in charge, many of our difficulties would be overcome and that I, too, could help in solving them since I knew Shri Tyabji quite intimately. He is advanced in age and weak, but the moment he received my telegram about the Punjab matter he came running to Lahore. He was taken ill there; as he was making a list of the people who had suffered, his heart started beating faster. He was so ill that, since he looked upon me as his younger brother, he sent for me and made his will. We should pay careful attention to what the other side has to say. It was difficult for Shri Abbas Tyabji to accept the invitation to be president. As he is weak, he will not be able to take full part in the discussion. We should, therefore, make his task as easy as we can.

122. SPEECH ON NON-CO-OPERATION AT GUJARAT POLITICAL CONFERENCE

August 28, 1920

There has been no occasion in the history of the Congress to move a resolution of this kind. Hence all of us should give the most careful consideration to it and hear respectfully what the leaders who oppose it have to say about it. If we would have the weapon of non-co-operation employed in the right manner, we should win over our opponents by love instead of trying to impose our views on them. Non-co-operation is no weapon of coercion. In using this beautiful

weapon, there should be no impatience or discourtesy. If the resolution is rejected, I would be unhappy but would certainly not lose heart, nor would I give up non-co-operation. We should hear what leaders who have served the people want to say. If we refuse to give a hearing to those who wish to warn us, I do not know what work we are fit to do. It is our duty to listen with courtesy even to a child’s protest. Courtesy is both the first and the last step in non-co-operation. This is not a weapon to be used in anger. Maulana Shaukat Ali, who acts in complete unity of purpose with me, has held his anger in check. Those who have joined the movement out of anger will be disappointed. The friends who advise against non-co-operation mention two things: one, that it involves a risk and, two, that the people of our country are not fit to employ this weapon, since using it against a Government which commands ample resources, which is united and does not lose heart all too soon, certainly involves a risk. But, then, without using such a weapon, it is impossible to bring it to its knees. There is no task attempted by the British people which may not have involved a risk. Is it without venturing anything that a handful of them rule 32 crores of Indians? Would there be any risk they may not have faced, these people who fought the Germans, unprepared as they were? Without taking risks, you will achieve nothing; only, we should see that the risk bears some proportion to the end we have in view. A weapon which will serve our purpose and at the same time involve the least risk—such a weapon, I think, you will find in non-co-operation. No one is able to suggest a practicable alternative, involving less risk. We should not forget the services which the Congress has been rendering for 35 years. It is thanks to the Congress that we have this weapon. This does not mean, of course, that we should be content to be drowned in a well simply because it has come down to us from our forefathers. He is the real son who adds to his inheritance. Some persons argue that non-co-operation will violate the Congress constitution. There is nothing in it, however, in virtue of which we can say this. Of course, the Government will be put to harassment. An alcoholic is bound to feel when the wine-bottle is snatched away from his hands, and non-co-operation is a far more serious affair for the Government than the snatching away of his bottle is to the alcoholic. It is morally wrong to co-operate with the Government. If it had known that the people of India were opposed to it, the khilafat issue would not have been settled as it was. I do not believe that the settlement was the work of other nations. Our powerful ministers are a match for them all. It would be morally wrong, and an act of injustice, to keep company with those who have been unjust to Turkey and we should keep away from such an evil course at any cost. A mere child like Prahlad could understand non-co-operation and one like me also can adopt it. What some persons say, then, that the people are not fit to employ non-co-operation, is not true. If my sons and my wife have used non-co-operation against me, I do not believe that the people of India cannot understand this idea. Non-co-operation is quite a practical weapon. The nation as a whole could employ it to its great advantage. If we employ it, we would not be the first people to do so. We need not believe, either, that if we start non-co-operation others will necessarily follow. Our waiting for the decision of the Congress will be no sign of progress [of the cause]. We should start it right now and present it in action to the Congress. I am going to Calcutta to get non-co-operation accepted by it. History furnishes innumerable instances of non-co-operation. We have before us the example of the Boers. General Botha was not satisfied with the rights granted to his people and resorted to non-co-operation. In the event, they called him to England and the Boers now enjoy freedom. They had boycotted the councils. Let the Moderates enter the councils if they will; but what will Nationalists do there, I should like to ask them. Personally, I do not believe they will be in a majority there. They will not succeed in their aim unless they secure every vote. The authorities hold dice which lend themselves to foul play, and against these the genuine dice of the Nationalists will not avail them. The latter’s dice are hollow, whereas the Government’s are weighted with lead. Their entering the councils, therefore, will serve no purpose. If, in the Transvaal, 10,000 Indians could succeed against a hundred and fifty thousand whites, there is no reason to suppose that the weapon [of non-co-operation] will be ineffective in India. R. B. Ramanbhai says that, once the people’s heads are turned with this weapon and they get out of control, there is no knowing what excesses they will not commit in future. When the check over them has disappeared [he says], they will not be held within limits. However, we wish to begin with the educated classes. If we proceed gradually and systematically, there will be no danger of chaos. If the weapon is put to wrong use by anyone, the movement will not last even for 15 days. No matter into whose hands this stainless weapon falls, there will be no excesses. For a people rendered important and growing impatient, non-co-operation is the only way. As Shri Wamanrao has pointed out, we would be savages if we struck with any weapon that came to hand. We have, thus, no right to employ any and every weapon. If any of you feel that I have advised you to take up this weapon without any experience of it and without giving thought to the matter, they should abandon me. If we were to take up any weapon [that came to hand], there would be utter chaos in the country and we would be reduced to the condition of beasts. In the funeral procession on the death of Tilak Maharaj, I witnessed scenes which were painful to me. I felt that people had not been able to restrain themselves within limits of propriety. As the tears over his death have not yet dried, I have not discussed the matter in public. The weapon of non-co-operation is not to be employed as we please. It would not be worthy of us to do so. We should take up non-co-operation only after we have had full training in it. It is a weapon not for spreading violence, but for reducing it. In Kheda district, they say, satyagraha has been followed by robberies, but there were robberies even before. When appealing to the people to enlist in the army, I told them that robberies would remain, and that the only way of preventing them was for the people to have arms or, following me, to keep nothing with them except a few clothes. I told them that their looking up to the Government for protection against robbers proved their lack of fitness for swaraj, that they should win over the robbers by love. The tree of non-co-operation will not grow in a day. It will bring you the gift of a good many powers. We need not boycott municipalities, since they are of benefit to our towns. We do not propose to start full non-co-operation all at once, but will proceed gradually. We shall have to wait, but not long. This is not a resolution to be implemented by the Government; it is to be implemented by us. If you think it cannot be implemented, please drop it. If, on the other hand, you feel that the country has been humiliated and our religion slighted, welcome this resolution enthusiastically; go home and think over it and employ the weapon of non-co-operation only if you are convinced.

123. TO HINDUS

I see that the Hindus have still mental reservations about going all out to make sacrifices on the khilafat issue. I decided many years ago that India’s good lay in unity of heart between Hindus and Muslims. That is why on the Satyagraha Day, i.e., April 6¹, special stress was laid on Hindu-Muslim unity.

I attach far more importance to Hindu-Muslim unity than to the British connection. This latter is not indispensable for the prosperity of India, whereas Hindu-Muslim unity is. Three-fourths of India can never enjoy freedom if they remain hostile to the remaining one-fourth. Extermination of seven crore Muslims is equally impossible.

Many Hindus believe that British rule serves at any rate to protect Hinduism, and, therefore, whatever other harm it may do, the protection of Hinduism is a sufficient compensation. I can think of no more humiliating idea which can occur to a Hindu. If twenty-three crore Hindus are not strong enough to defend themselves against seven crore Muslims, either the Hindu religion is false or those who believe in it are cowardly and wicked.

I would rather that the Hindus and the Muslims settled their accounts by means of the sword than that the British Government maintained artificial peace between them.

If, however, we do not wish to fight it out with the Muslims, if we wish to live with them as with our own brothers, if we would ensure protection of cows, of our temples and our women by winning over their hearts and through a friendly approach, we should welcome the opportunity we have today. The like of it will not come again for a hundred years.

It is wrong to believe that Muslims and Hindus can never get along together. To be sure, you will find in history cases of injustice done by Muslims. But their religion is a noble one and Muslims are a noble people. I do not believe that they have no respect for people of other faiths, or that they have no compassion in them. They know how to repay obligations. I, therefore, advise every Hindu to place full trust in his Muslim brethren. Man by nature is pure in his heart and Muslims are no exception to this law.

So far, we have made no sincere efforts to bring about unity. Such an attempt expects no reward. Sincerity is not a matter for a

The shop-keeper’s calculations. To help Muslims on certain conditions is as good as not helping them. The hearts of seven crores cannot be changed by making conditions. Their trust and their respect can be won only by helping them in their time of need. Reward should be asked only of God. My Hindu religion teaches me not to expect a reward while doing any good deed and to trust that good always produces good. Knowing that this is an unalterable law, if we come across an instance which seems to contradict it, we should think that, with our limited understanding, we are unable to explain the contradiction. We have no ground for taking it to be an exception. God always puts man to a severe test. He helps him who does not forget Him in the direst adversity, i.e., who keeps up his faith in truth. That is why He has been called the Protector of the weak.

But suppose that Muslims betray Hindus despite the latter’s generous behaviour. Will Hindus, in that case, remain cowards? Are they not strong enough to protect their religion? If Hindus want to acquire strength to protect their religion, this too they will acquire by helping Muslims because, in the process, Hindus will have to display the great qualities of determination, courage, truthfulness, capacity for self-sacrifice, unity, organizing ability, etc.

I do not mean that Hindus should help because of their own weakness, but rather that it has become our duty to help the Muslims as neighbours since their case is just and the means they are employing are also just. If they do not do this duty, they will strengthen their bonds of slavery and lose for ever the opportunity of winning the friendship of Muslims. Doing it, they will shake off slavery and win over Muslims.

Looking at the matter in this way, [we see that] it is the highest duty of every Hindu to help Muslims since, in doing so, he will be saving India and protecting his religion. There can be no thought of reward or fear in discharging such a duty. Bringing about so good and great a result requires a yajna—a supreme yajna. Offering up, in this yajna, our titles, our practice and our education for material gain is, in my opinion, but a small sacrifice. Whether the Hindus make this sacrifice or not, every Hindu should try and understand the true meaning of this war.

124. OUR DUTY

Pir Mahboob Shah has fallen. He was a strong man, and had been under no pressure not to defend himself. His religion meant much to him. And yet, when he found himself in jail, he took fright. Even two years’ simple imprisonment was too much for him. He tendered an apology and came out. How could we explain the fact that even strong-minded people are not ready for a little suffering?

We have not always been cowards. The people of India could stand some suffering, indeed, and can do so even today. Why then are we afraid of some ordinary hardship?—for I do not look upon imprisonment as any great hardship. I attribute this abjectness to our slavery. We have been, for a long time, in so wretched a condition that we have forgotten what it is to be really free. And so, outside jail, whether or not we enjoy any respect and our dharma remains inviolate, we are content if we can have some freedom of person and desire no more. The result is that when we are asked to submit to physical suffering and win freedom of the soul, we prove ourselves cowards.

It is not merely that we have lived in slavery for a long time, luxuries have also found their way among us during this time. It is undoubtedly true that under British rule a few people have opportunities of comfortable living. As a mouse is lured into a trap by a piece of bread and a fish into a net by a small ball of flour, so we, lured by opportunities for luxurious living for a few, sacrifice our real freedom.

We need not be disheartened by the case of Pir Mahboob Shah, but we should, rather, redouble our efforts to change the atmosphere in which even the stoutest of men may fall. We should recognize our condition of slavery, should forgo bodily comfort, in other words, pleasures, to win our freedom and refuse to be frightened by the hardships of jail life.

Besides, if one of the bullocks yoked to a cart is taken ill or gets exhausted, the other bears the whole weight; likewise, if one Mahboob Shah falls, we should have the courage to take upon ourselves the burden which he should have carried.

It is no ordinary victory we aim at and no ordinary Government which we are up against. It has its strong points and weak. It is brave;

1  Sentenced for sedition in Sind; vide “Speech at Calicut”, 18-8-1920.
its supporters are united, have knowledge, power of organization and capacity for self-sacrifice. It denies God, is hypocritical and deceitful. It lures people, dupes them, intimidates them; being brave, it recognizes bravery and yields to it. If, therefore, we would triumph over it, we should be more brave and more united than it is, should have knowledge of a purer kind than it has, power of organization which would put it to shame and a superior capacity for self-sacrifice. We should conquer its atheism by our faith, its hypocrisy by our plainness and its deceitfulness by our truth; we should keep miles away from its baits in the form of titles, refuse to be duped by its reforms or offer of high positions and not stand in awe of its Dyers and Johnsons.

There is no reason at all to feel that we shall never be capable of doing these things and so be disheartened. To win freedom means to acquire the strength for doing them. If we ask when it will be possible for the whole nation to have such strength, our heads would simply begin to reel; if, on the other hand, each one of us asks himself whether he can have the strength, everything will be easy. We should take it that what we ourselves can do, others too can do. It would be arrogance on our part to believe otherwise.

To be brave and truthful, to make sacrifices and be fearless, to have faith in God, to refuse to be tempted by the Government’s baits or be taken in by its legislatures—this will not be difficult for the reader. He will be free when he can do so much, and his freedom cannot but infect others. When the nation has caught the infection, it will be free. There is the same law both for individuals and for a nation. Though all the people in the country, when they suffer from a disease, may not know the remedy, it is the duty of the man who knows it to apply it; in the same manner, any person who knows the remedies for this disease of slavery ought to apply them, even if he is the only one.

Navajivan, 29-8-1920
125. THREE INFATUATIONS

As I tour the country, I realize more and more that the people are greatly in love with Government schools, practice in law-courts and legislatures. Neither the issue of khilafat nor that of the Punjab will be settled while people continue under the delusions that without schools children will remain uneducated, that unless lawyers practise they will go hungry and people will not get justice, that without legislatures the people’s affairs cannot be managed. And the Government will go on increasing its control.

We must acquire the ability to get for ourselves the knowledge which is available in the Government schools. The lure of degrees must go. We must know how to settle our disputes among ourselves. It is not as if we always get justice in Government courts. Judges and others are even known to accept bribes and to do injustice through error or ignorance. Cases of injustice are known to have remained unredressed even in the Privy Council. By abandoning courts, then we are not likely to suffer any very great loss except that we might fail to get justice in settling disputes among ourselves. Moreover, lawyers, knowing that others are able to make a living all right, should have patience and maintain themselves in some other way. Though the lure of legislatures is the strongest, it is difficult to understand it. I can say nothing to those who hope for justice from the Government. It is in vain that one tries to persuade a man who believes wine to be beneficial to give up drinking. But many have even less faith in the Government than I. They never had any nor do they have it today. It passes my understanding why they should be attracted by legislatures.

So long as the ruling class is not sincere, its intentions not honest, so long as it has not atoned for its sins in the Punjab and has not made amends for its betrayal of the Muslims, all reforms, however splendid, are, in my opinion, to be shunned like milk mixed with arsenic. Mr. Sharma¹ and Dr. [T. B.] Sapru² have been appointed to the Executive Council. So what? I look upon it a studied attempt to deceive the people. Lord Sinha³ may become a Governor, so what? Who are those people making all these gifts? What is their intention

² S. P. Sinha (1864-1928); presided over Bombay session of the Indian National Congress in 1915 in doing so? To strengthen their power, to make the people forget the wounds of the Punjab and the khilafat. What epithet shall we give to a doctor who so treats the wound that it becomes septic within but seems to heal up on the surface?

Consider the Viceroy’s speech. He says that he can answer the critics of the Government on the Punjab question, but would rather not do so. He leaves the final judgment to the future historian. He forgets that he has already pronounced this final judgement. He has absolved Sir Michael O’Dwyer; General Dyer [he has said] committed no crime, but only an error of judgment; the other officials are guilty of nothing; Col. O’Brien and others have been totally absolved and are known to be respected officials; the Rowlatt Act remains; this is the final judgment on the Punjab affair. What remains now for history to say? Perhaps in future, it will hold them unfit to have been officers, will call Sir Michael O’Dwyer a Nero; so what? Will that end the people’s sufferings today? What shall it profit a patient if a correct diagnosis of his disease is made after his death? We demand justice for the Punjab today. If we are one people, the fact that even one Punjabi had to crawl on his stomach should mean for us that the whole nation had to do. The Government has no right to ask for the people’s co-operation without atoning for its sins. The people will accept no favours from the Government.

Now examine the reference to the khilafat in his speech. That he has conveyed the feelings of the Muslims to the Allies means that he admits the justice of their demand. But he wants to absolve himself by saying that our Government cannot dictate to the Allies. This is an untruth. The whole world knows, as does the Indian Government, that the British Government took the main part in drafting the peace treaty with Turkey and ensuring its acceptance. They know that, if Mr.
Lloyd George had wished, he could have kept his promise and respected the feelings of the Muslims. But it was his intention to destroy Turkey and weaken the roots of Islam. Despite this, the Viceroy says that he did his best in the matter of the khilafat and wants thereby to disown his res-ponsibility; in other words, he is misleading the people.

When the people are striving to end these injustices by employing the harmless weapon of non-co-operation, His excellency ridicules them. He has given up the idea of arresting me and Maulana Shaukat Ali and decided to laugh at non-co-operation. I would have congratulated His Excellency if this decision had not been vitiated by hypocrisy. The massacre inflicted by General Dyer was a barbarous method; to try to weaken a movement by ridiculing it is a refined method. And the people will certainly invite ridicule if they do not start non-co-operation and swallow the humiliation of having had to crawl on their stomach. It must be a principle with a people who love their religion and their self-respect that they cannot accept even a throne from hands stained with the blood of innocent people or from pens which have been instrumental in insulting Islam.

It is my hope, therefore, that the people will take the first step in non-co-operation with firmness and uphold their self-respect, give up the triple infatuation and see that the Viceroy regrets this mockery.

126. MADRAS TOUR
FAITH OF MADRAS

I have not been able to write an account of my tour of the Punjab. Mahadev Desai has reported it. I also wanted to write of my experiences in Sind, but I have not been able to find time for that. The morale of the Sindhis was not less. It is difficult to say where I saw it higher. However, the people of Madras have always produced a different effect on my mind. In Madras, my friend and I have had to address the meetings in English. In some meetings, where the Muslims were in a majority, Shaukat Ali often spoke in Hindustani. Even then the people heard him in complete silence. This used to have a profound effect on my mind. The faith of the people of Madras is boundless. The people’s sincerity is extreme.

EVEN THEN DISAPPOINTMENT

And yet the immediate result of our tour cannot be said to have been much. At every place some lawyers have given up practice, some parents have decided to withdraw their children from schools, some persons have resigned their jobs and some have abandoned the idea of entering legislatures. Even so, the result has not come up to one’s expectations, considering the people’s love [for me].

REASONS

The reasons are easy to understand. Some of the leaders have no faith in non-co-operation. Those who have it lack the capacity for self-sacrifice. The third category consists of persons who are not sincere. They believe one thing and say another. This being the condition of the leaders, it is natural that the people are unable to act promptly. This experience suggests that the atmosphere will be purified as a result of this purifying movement of non-co-operation; hypocrisy will be a little less and the dross will come to the surface. The progress of the people is impossible without such purification.

MAULANA SHAUKAT ALI

My experience of Shaukat Ali in the course of this tour was enough to help me get over my disappointment in other matters. His firmness, straightforwardness, truthfulness, honesty, his unbounded faith in himself and in the people, his generosity, his friendliness, his courage, his humility—all these qualities illuminate his life. I believe his love for India is great. He wishes that Hindus and Muslims should ever live as blood-brothers. He always tells Muslims, in private and in public, that they should make every possible sacrifice to please the Hindus. Even if a Hindu has hurt the feelings of any Muslim [he tells them], the latter should not go to court but settle the matter through a panch.

WHERE WE DIFFER

There is one point on which we differ, and we have known it from the very beginning. If, despite this, we can live together as blood-brothers, it is because both of us are perfectly loyal to our respective ideals as well as to each other personally. He believes that one can kill an enemy and, for doing so, even deceit can be employed. I believe, on the contrary, that in killing an enemy, one falls from one’s true nature as a human being, that the act is degrading; and also that deceit never pays at any time. In fact, it is soul-killing. Despite this, we have joined hands, since he has understood that the people have no strength of arms; that they lack unity and qualities like firmness, courage, and capacity for self-sacrifice; and that till they acquire them they cannot wield the sword. He says that, whereas his car needs good roads, my cart can move, whatever their condition. Hence, for the present, he has accepted my way. Certain things are necessary in following either way. Not only has he, therefore, not hesitated to accept my way, but, having accepted it, he is trying to cultivate the qualifications necessary for success in it and pleads with the people to do likewise. I see no deceit in him. He tells the people frankly that, at the present time, my way is the best for them. If the Muslims are peaceful, it is because of his firmness.

His Influence

His influence over the Muslims is great. Their regard for him is unselfish and most wonderful to behold. There is no exaggeration in saying that he is the life and soul of the Muslims.

Government’s Ill-fortune

The Government proves its own ill-fortune by looking upon such a man as its enemy. He has served the Government for seventeen years and, during that period, he came into contact with many Englishmen. What kind of a Government it must be which could not retain the loyalty of such a brave man? He has no unreasoning hatred of the Government. If the latter would bow an inch, he would bow an ell. Only, he can stand no insult to his religion and his community. He runs away from hypocrisy. There is a possibility that the Government may imprison this man who, in any country outside India, would have become a commander-in-chief. I cannot but feel that to co-operate with such a Government is a sin.

Gujaratis’ Love

If my experience of Shaukat Ali helps me to get over my disappointment in other matters, my experience of Gujaratis in Madras Presidency has been similar. Like other communities, Gujaratis, too, at every place, have taken part in the khilafat movement. In Calicut and Mangalore, they were simply wonderful. At both these places, they took a leading part. We were put up at a Bhatia’s gentleman’s place in either of these towns. This was a most pleasant surprise to me. It does not mean that either of these two families had given up its religion. Though they keep up their Vaishnava way of life, they saw no difficulty in putting up a Muslim in their houses. Even otherwise, they have been helping the Muslim residents there, who are, comparatively, an ignorant people. Women also joined in this public work with interest. The train leaves Mangalore early in the morning. When we arrived at the station, we found a Gujarati sister with kumkum, rice, coconut and a leaf-bowl of sugar-candy in her hands. She welcomed us as adopted brothers, put a tilak on our forehead, offered us the coconut and the leaf-bowl, wished us success and blessed us. The radiant face of Shaukat Ali at the time was a happy sight. I was happy that, even far away from their homes, Gujaratis maintain their traditional courtesy, good sense and love, and play their part in public life.

Swadeshi

Gujaratis have been giving good encouragement to the swadeshi movement. They have taught even little girls in Calicut to spin. These girls also sang before us, as they plied the spinning-wheels, a song about the wheel. This movement and the awakening, in some measure, among the Gujaratis of Calicut and Cochin are due to the enterprise of but one man. I was very pleased to see some wealthy Gujaratis wearing khadi.

An Intelligent Gujarati

All the Gujaratis may not be filled with pride by the fact that some of them, so far away from their homes, are working to promote the movement for swadeshi, but I am sure they will all be delighted at the incident I shall describe. In Calicut, my speech was translated by a Malayali friend. The people were not quite satisfied with his translation. Those who had followed my speech pointed out some mistakes. When it was the turn of Shaukat Ali to speak, Mathuradas came forward to translate his speech. Everybody knew him. The audience cheered him. Shaukat Ali’s speech which was in English, he translated so well into Malayalam that everybody was immensely pleased with him. It is said that Mathuradas did not miss in his translation a single shade of meaning expressed in the English speech. Mathuradas knows Gujarati, Malayalam and English, all three, very well, and all his study has been the little he had learnt in an ordinary school in Cochin, the rest having been picked up in actual life. He is a business man, but is well informed on political issues. Most of the Gujaratis living in this part of the country have settled here with their families for the last two or three generations. Many of them were born in these parts. They keep in contact with their home-towns by visiting them from time to time and, in the places where they have settled, they do not keep aloof but are found to mix with the people. Mostly, one finds Bhatias and Vanias from Kutch and Saurashtra.

We could not stay continuously for twenty-four hours at any place except Madras. Even in Madras, we did so only when we first arrived there. Thereafter, it being the central place, we used to spend there a few hours whenever we passed through it. The 125-mile journey from Salem to Bangalore was made by car. Touring at this pace was rather too much. But invitations poured in from all over and we did not feel it proper to reject any. There was also the desire, of course, to convey our message to as many places as we could manage.

127. SPEECH ON BOYCOTT AT GUJARAT POLITICAL CONFERENCE

August 29, 1920

I am of the view that boycott will prove a hindrance. Perhaps you will not understand this. Much has been said about the injustices done to us, and it is no longer doubted that injustices have been done. Nor is there any argument about the need to take some action in the matter. Since we have the weapon of non-co-operation for the

1 A resolution advocating boycott of British goods was moved by G. V. Mavlankar on the third day of the Conference.
purpose, why should we think of the additional weapon of boycott? I shall not refer here to my ideas about boycott from an ethical point of view and the moral objections against it; just now I shall only try to prove to you that the policy of boycott has been shown to be impracticable. The movement of boycott which followed the Bengal partition could not be kept up with the same spirit. Shri Jivanlal¹, Mr. Baptista, Shri Gangadharrao Deshpande² and others were against satyagraha and were advocates of boycott. They were simply in love with the idea. They had even administered a pledge of boycott at a conference in Ahmednagar, and also issued public statements to refute my views. It was announced that boycott would start within three months, but nothing of the kind happened. You will hardly come across a worker like Hasrat Mohani. I had pleaded with him earnestly at the Delhi meeting on non-co-operation and requested him not to move the resolution on boycott. But, with his influence on the Muslims, who would listen to me there? They heard me all right, some even felt that there was substance in what I said, but the resolution advocating boycot was finally passed. However, it remained ineffective, for the people are in love with foreign goods, and a lover has eyes only for the thing he loves. Hasrat Mohani pleaded with Muslim business men and requested them not to import goods manufactured by British firms. The business men, however, could not bring themselves to sacrifice their profits running into crores. I have met innumerable people in places like Calcutta and Bombay and I have come to the conclusion that boycott is not possible. And now Hasrat Mohani also has given up the idea. I have, thus, seen the failure of the policy. Why, then, cling to a stand which puts you in an awkward situation? Gujarat has voted for non-co-operation; where then, is the need for a further resolution on boycott? If it has been a proper course to follow, I would have taken up the idea long ago. I must admit that the [Prime] Minister of England is Lancashire, and also that, if we refuse to patronize it, this Prime Minister would lose his strength. But there is vindictiveness and anger in this attitude and hence I reject it. I do so not only because the idea is morally wrong, but also because it is impracticable and, therefore, unworthy of consideration. Besides, you have adopted swadeshi as your dharma; how, then, can you accept boycott? One who has understood the idea of swadeshi, how can he use foreign goods manufactured, if not in England, in Japan or America or any other country? Is it your idea that we should retaliate against England through boycott? You will not succeed, unless you boycott all goods from England. How is this possible? A good English book, I would certainly keep in a sacred spot and offer my worship to it. It is when I fall in love with paper made in a foreign country, though paper made in my country is available, that I disgrace myself. You may resort to boycott when India has taken to the sword and the atmosphere has turned to poison. But consider this. Even the general of an army does not go to battle without first getting the army ready. What preparations have you made for boycott? Non-co-operation and boycott will ever remain as different from each other as light is from darkness. I appeal to you to reject the idea of boycott.

129. Ridicule Replacing Repression

Had His Excellency the Viceroy not made it impossible by his defiant attitude on the Punjab and the khilafat, I would have tendered him hearty congratulation for substituting ridicule for repression in order to kill a movement distasteful to him. For, torn from its context and read by itself His Excellency’s discourse on non-co-operation is unexceptionable. It is a symptom of translation from savagery to civilization. Pouring ridicule on one’s opponent is an approved method in civilized politics. And if the method is consistently continued, it will mark an important improvement upon the official barbarity of the Punjab. His interpretation of Mr. Montagu’s statement about the movement is also not open to any objection whatsoever. Without doubt a government has the right to use sufficient force to put down an actual outbreak of violence.

But I regret to have to confess that this attempt to pour ridicule on the movement, read in conjunction with the sentiments on the Punjab and the khilafat preceding the ridicule, seems to show that His Excellency has made it a virtue of necessity. He has not finally abandoned the method of terrorism and frightfulness, but he finds the movement being conducted in such an open and truthful manner that any attempt to kill it by violent repression would expose him not only to ridicule but contempt of all right-thinking men.

Let us however examine the adjective used by His Excellency to kill the movement by laughing at it. It is “futile”, “ill-advised”, “intrinsically inane”, “unpractical”, “visionary”. He has rounded off the adjectives by describing the movement as “most foolish of all foolish schemes”. His Excellency has become so impatient of it that he has used all his vocabulary for showing the magnitude of the ridiculous nature of non-co-operation.

Unfortunately for His excellency the movement is likely to grow with ridicule as it is certain to flourish on repression. No vital movement can be killed except by the impatience, ignorance or laziness of its authors. A movement cannot be “inane” that is conducted by men of action as I claim the members of the Non-co-operation Committee are. It is hardly “unpractical”, seeing that if the people respond, everyone admits that it will achieve the end. At the same time it is perfectly true that if there is no response from the people, the movement will be popularly described as “visionary”. It is for the nation to return an effective answer by organized non-co-operation and change ridicule into respect. Ridicule is like repression. Both give place to respect when they fail to produce the intended effect.

222  THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
130. THE VICEREGAL PRONOUNCEMENT

It may be that having lost faith in His Excellency’s probity and capacity to hold the high office of Viceroy of India, I now read his speeches with a biased mind, but the speech His Excellency delivered at the time of opening of the council shows to me a mental attitude which makes association with him or his Government impossible for self-respecting men.

The remarks on the Punjab mean a flat refusal to grant redress. He would have us to “concentrate on the problems of the immediate future”! The immediate future is to compel repentance on the part of the Government on the Punjab matter. Of this there is no sign. On the contrary, His Excellency resists the temptation to reply to his critics, meaning thereby that he has not changed his opinion on the many vital matters affecting the honour of India. He is “content to leave the issues to the verdict of history”. Now this kind of language, in my opinion, is calculated further to inflame the Indian mind. Of what use can a favourable verdict of history be to men who have been wronged and who are still under the heels of officers who have shown themselves utterly unfit to hold offices of trust and responsibility? The plea for co-operation is, to say the least, hypocritical in the face of the determination to refuse justice to the Punjab. Can a patient who is suffering from an intolerable ache be soothed by the most tempting dishes placed before him? Will he not consider it mockery on the part of the physician who so tempted him without curing him of his pain?

His Excellency is, if possible, even less happy on the khilafat. “So far as any Government could”, says this trustee for the nation, “we pressed upon the Peace Conference the views of Indian Moslems. But notwithstanding our efforts on their behalf we are threatened with a campaign of non-co-operation because, forsooth, the allied Powers found themselves unable to accept the contentions advanced by Indian Moslems.” This is most misleading if not untruthful. His Excellency knows that the Peace Terms are not the work of the allied Powers. He knows that Mr. Lloyd George is the prime author of Terms and that the latter has never repudiated his responsibility for them. He has with amazing audacity justified them in spite of his considered pledge to the Moslems of India regarding Constantinople, Thrace and the rich and renowned lands of Asia Minor. It is not truthful to saddle responsibility for the Terms on the allied Powers when Great Britain alone has promoted them. The offence of the Viceroy becomes greater when we remember that he admits the justness of the Muslim claim. He could not have “pressed” it if he did not admit its justice.

I venture to think that His Excellency by his pronouncement on the Punjab has strengthened the nation in its effort to seek a remedy to compel redress of the two wrongs before it can make anything of the so-called Reforms.

131. ASSASSINATION OF A DEPUTY COMMISSIONER

The assassination of Mr. Willoughby is a most unfortunate event which has naturally evoked public sympathy and indignation. The murder was a cruel, thoughtless and fanatical act. It has not advanced but retarded the cause of khilafat. Mr. Willoughby had no hand in the Turkish Terms. As is quite probable, he was himself a popular officer. It can only be counted as madness to kill an innocent man for a crime committed by a member of his race. And yet the fact must not be disguised that the murder will be regarded by many Mohammedans as a pious act worthy of martyr. I have heard Mohammedans calmly arguing that such murders are not only justifiable but meritorious. I have known many Hindus who have argued that it was the throwing of bombs which brought about the removal of the Partition of Bengal. I know that many consider Dhingra to have been a martyr. The Sinn Feiners openly practise murder and other forms of violence for the purpose of freeing their country from the English connection. Every assassin or incendiary is considered by them a hero. It is because I feared such a result in our midst, that I advised non-violent non-co-operation regarding the khilafat. In my opinion, it is the active and open preaching of non-co-operation which has prevented murders and assassinations in the land. The murder of Mr. Willoughby proves that the propaganda of nonviolence and non-co-operation has not proved sufficient to control individual fanatics and that it is not an easy thing to do so. It proves further that the khilafat wrong is a deep-seated grievance which with the passage of time will sink deeper still instead of being forgotten.

I observe that The Times of India credits the khilafat propaganda with the murder and calls it the “first fruits”. I realize that the language used is cautious. It connects “certain aspects of the agitation” with the crime. But I venture to suggest that no aspect of the agitation is responsible for the unfortunate murder. It is the grievous wrong, done by the British ministers, which has evoked the cruel deed.

The Times of India is on safer ground when it says that the tragedy “is a special call to Islam, for, all thoughtful Mohammedans must realize that the honour of their religion is at stake”. I wish to emphasize that warning. It must be the special duty of every khilafat worker to be more careful than hitherto in insisting on complete freedom from violence as the condition precedent to successful non-co-operation. I am sure it is possible to cite texts from the Koran in condemnation of murder of innocent men. I can understand violence being done to wrongdoers in order to compel justice. It is unfortunately the chosen method of the civilized world. It has scriptural authority. Islam is said openly to preach violence to the wrongdoer. The so-called votaries of Christianity justify organized warfare for the removal of wrongs, fancied or real. Thousands of Hindus interpret the Gita to be a certificate for war in the cause of justice. It is only a minority (daily growing in numbers) which religiously believes that violence is wrong in itself and cannot be justified even to vindicate truth. But it cannot be religious (it may be civilized) to murder innocent unarmed men without warning. It is not enough for khilafat workers to be satisfied with public condemnations (necessary as they are) or for the sake of decorum to join them. It is necessary for us to preach privately, publicly and incessantly the necessity of refraining from violence especially when an active campaign of non-co-operation full of promise is going on. We must feel in every fibre of our own being that every murder, every deed of violence must retard the progress of the movement.

This is an opportunity for distinguishing the Sinn Fein or the Egyptian non-co-operation from ours. The former does not and did not depend for success on non-violence. The Sinn Feiners resort to violence in every shape and form. Theirs is a “frightfulness” not unlike General Dyer’s. We may pardon it if we choose, because we sympathize with their cause. But it does not on that account differ in quality from General Dyer’s act. The Central Khilafat Committee has openly and deliberately accepted non-violence for its creed so long as non-co-operation is being carried on. We must therefore seek to guard English life as our own. We must constitute ourselves as self-appointed volunteers guarding English life from violent hands. And our success depends upon our ability to control all the violent and fanatical forces in our midst.

132. THE GUJARAT POLITICAL CONFERENCE

The Gujarat Political Conference has made its choice. The terse, able and firm addresses, both of the chairman of the Reception Committee and the honorary president of the Conference, left little room for doubting its verdict. But perhaps no one was prepared for the acceptance in detail of the programme of non-co-operation. The resolutions of the Conference, which were naturally in Gujarati, are being translated specially for Young India.¹ I venture to invite the attention of the readers to them.

The Conference had burned the boats. It has deliberately refrained from waiting for the Congress mandate. The Gujaratis consider that they hold sufficiently decided views to warrant their taking definite action. I tender my congratulations to them. They had full warning given to them. The opposition was led by Rao Bahadur Ramanbhai. But he was in a hopeless minority. His warning may be stated in one sentence. The agitation for non-co-operation is calculated to evoke a spirit of lawlessness which in a nation composed of millions may be impossible to keep under control. It is the warning of a leader who has devoted his whole life to political and social reform and is therefore entitled to respect. The Gujarat Conference has fully weighed the consequences and given vote for non-co-operation. Mr. Abbas Tyabji in his closing words said in moving tones that he was reluctantly driven to adopt non-co-operation because he saw no other choice left open but to take up non-co-operation if he was to keep his self-respect and leave any healthy tradition to his children. He who once implicitly believed in British justice no longer believed in it. And with his belief in it so rudely shattered, he could not support the British Government until it had purged itself of the injustice.

The Conference has laid emphasis on the necessity of the boycott of titles and honorary offices, law-courts, Government schools and councils. It has a separate resolution advising would-be recruits from offering themselves as soldiers, clerks or labourers for service in Mesopotamia. It has suggested boycott of any welcome to H. R. H. the Duke of Connaught. It views his visit in the same light as that of the Prince of Wales. It has approved of swadeshi and has by an overwhelming majority thrown out the proposition of boycott of British goods as being unpractical and inconsistent with true swadeshi and non-co-operation. By way of constructive proposals it has suggested private arbitration courts, national schools and university and formation of volunteers corps and boy scouts in the villages for defence against dacoits and robbers.

It has altered the phraseology of the resolutions reciting other grievances. Thus the programme is clear, unequivocal, drastic and thoroughgoing. But it will tax the Gujaratis to their utmost. The mere passing of resolutions sufficed when the Government were expected to give effect to them. The new resolutions will stand to our shame if they remain unenforced by us who have whole-heartedly and after full deliberation voted for them.

There is no mistaking the awakening among the masses. A strong Executive Committee has been appointed by the Conference. Much will depend upon its earnestness and patriotism to make non-co-operation a reality in Gujarat.

133. OUR BURDEN

Pir Mahboob Shah has fallen. He was a brave man. I am not concerned with his guilt or innocence. If he used the language attributed to him, it certainly constituted an incitement to violence. In that case the punishment of two years’ simple imprisonment awarded to him was certainly light. Not even the highest in the land, whether belonging to the official class or to the people, can be exempt from punishment for proved guilt. What however commanded my admiration was the fortitude with which the Pir Saheb decided to refrain from offering any defence and patiently to bear the penalty imposed upon him by a lawfully appointed tribunal. I thought that he had understood the spirit of the struggle. The manner in which his followers seemed to have borne the imprisonment of their leader was also most satisfactory.

But the later news to the effect that the Pir Saheb secured his release by an apology shows our weakness. Having been brought up in debilitating atmosphere of servility, the tallest of us often bend before a very simple storm. The temptation of Western civilization, without its hard discipline which the nations of the west undergo, has made us almost incapable of suffering the physical discomfort entailed by even simple imprisonment. But Pir Mahboob Shah’s surrender need not dishearten us. When a number of horses are carrying a burden and one becomes fatigued or otherwise incapacitated, the rest if they are spirited animals take up their companion’s burden, put forth greater effort and pull up the load. How much more should we intelligent human beings bear our comrades’ burden when he gives in?

Let us therefore see what that burden exactly means. He is an indifferent soldier who ignores his opponent’s strength. We must therefore know the strength of the Government with which we are engaged in a fierce struggle. The Government represents a corporation that is crafty in the main, godless, untruthful, but courageous, able, self-sacrificing and possessing great powers of organization. We must therefore meet its craftiness by simplicity and openness, godlessness by godliness, untruthfulness by truthfulness. We must match its courage with greater ability, sacrifice with greater self-sacrifice, and its organizing powers with greater organizing powers. It has almost match-less weapons of violence. We must meet them with non-violence. Unless we are able to satisfy the test, we must be content to occupy a status of servility. Non-co-operation affords the nation an opportunity of showing all the qualities required for sustaining its honour.

ON THE WAY TO CALCUTTA,

[September 2, 1920]¹

MY DEAR CHILD,

I had your first long letter from home. I was delighted.

I had four very pleasant days with Menon. He is frank, honest and clean. He is unassuming. I have invited him to come to the Ashram any time he likes. I have told him too that both you and he could stay at the Ashram and make it your home there.

He has still difficulties. Pressure is being put upon him to own Christianity for your sake. I consider that unworthy of both of you. Your religion must be above everything. It is not a mechanical thing to be changed at will. Therefore in my opinion you must keep your respective faiths.

Then what about your children if you decide to bear them? It is a tremendous question for a godfearing person.

The solution I can see is that though you may marry, you may not see each other carnally. But you will both do as God directs you. Menon wished me to write to you what we talked and I have done. The solution appealed to him then. But that signifies nothing. Your connection is too sacred to tamper with.

Anne Marie⁴, that is Miss Petersen, [as she] insists on my calling her, [and] I have fallen in love with each other. Of course I had nothing to forgive. But I must not describe the interview. She must have done it.

Ba, Devdas, Mahadev, Imam Saheb, Shankerlal Banker, Anasuya Behn are with me among many others. These however you know. Harilal I shall meet tonight in Calcutta.

135. SPEECH AT CALCUTTA CONGRESS

September 4, 1920

Mahatma Gandhi then stood up on the chair supported by a gentleman and there were loud and continued cheers. He was given a patient hearing as he appealed in English to the audience to hear Mrs. Besant. He with folded hands said that he liked to say a few words to those who to their shame and to the shame of the great assembly were trying to prevent an authorized speaker from addressing the audience. Mr. Gandhi wanted to appeal to everyone in the assembly that if they gathered together in order to demand justice it was their first and sacred duty to render justice. (Cheers.)

“Do not mistake the position”, continued Mr. Gandhi, “that Mrs. Besant had taken up (Cries of ‘shame! shame!’) as a position which is wilfully inimical to the interests of the country. You will have to forget the difference (‘Hear! hear!’) on the part of your men and women. That will be the first test (‘Order! order!’) of your ability to govern yourselves (‘Hear! hear!’) and if you are about to inaugurate non-co-operation (‘Hear! hear!’) you will be making a bad and a sad beginning.”

The speaker then appealed to every one of them not merely to listen to Mrs. Besant in silence but with the respect for her age and her magnificent services to India. (“Hear! hear!”)

Mr. Gandhi yielded to no one in the position he had taken up and that if he could not agree with her he yielded also to none even of her best admirers in his respect for her (“Hear! hear!”) which she could rightly claim from everyone in India for the services that she had rendered to the country. In the name of the country, in the name of the great cause on which they were about to embark Mr. Gandhi asked them kindly and prayerfully to give Mrs. Besant and every one of those they might consider to be their opponents a respectful hearing. (“Hear! hear!” Shouts of “Vandemataram!”)

136. “NAVAJIVAN” ENTERS A NEW YEAR

Navajivan has completed one year. It has had to face many difficulties but, despite them all, it has been able to complete one year. I have not succeeded in all my intentions. Thanks to the difficulties about the printing press, high-prices of newsprint, defects in management, etc., we have not been able to give as many pages as we wanted to.

The subscribers have to suffer because of harassment by some honorary agents. I was pained by the failure of this experiment. Honorary work, done out of love, should be far better than paid work, but we have not attained that level yet. The desire for service has spread but we have not yet developed the capacity for it.

Besides these, I have my personal difficulties too. Thanks to them, I have not been able to give readers all that I wished to. To edit a paper and to travel are, if not impossible, difficult to do at the same time. For this reason, I have not been able to write some articles I had wanted to. I know how to guide correspondents, but I have not been able to satisfy my wish to encourage them.

It is no small satisfaction to know that, despite these and many other shortcomings, Navajivan is read eagerly. I should like the ideas presented in it to be put into practice even by the illiterate. Hence I request those readers who share Navajivan’s views to read out its issues to the illiterate as well. I will continue my efforts to make it more deserving of readers’ interest.

137. GUJARAT MAKES ITS CHOICE

Gujarat has played its part well. The Conference has never in the past had to face, and it will not have for a hundred years more to face, an issue as serious as the one on which it took a decision. We needed at this critical time a leader with an iron will and we found one. Everyone who reads the speeches of Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel and the venerable old gentleman, Abbas Tyabji, will readily acknowledge that they were resolute and unambiguous, but polite. The chairman of the Reception Committee stated his views in a brief but impressive

1 The Gujarat Political Conference held on August 27, 28 and 29 speech, in the simplest Gujarati. We cannot say anything about Mr. Abbas Ali’s style, since his speech was originally written in English. Other speeches were short and easy to follow. I have rarely come across or listened to presidential addresses so brief but direct as those speeches.

The Conference was worthy of the president. The resolutions it has passed leave nothing to be desired. They are categorical and are to be implemented forthwith.

The resolutions passed before now called upon the Government to do something or other; now, it is we who are to act.

The Conference has been sufficiently warned. The leaders told it of all possible dangers. It was made very clear that the people would lose their good name if they were found lacking the strength to carry out their decisions. The Conference has accepted non-co-operation unanimously, regardless of whether the special Congress votes against non-co-operation as such or against the actual programme suggested.

Gujaratis are reputed to be practical; they do not pass resolutions, carried away by emotion. If Gujarat fails to act on the resolution, it will fall in the esteem of others as much as it has risen by passing it. If Gujarat weakens in its resolve, even the country as a whole may suffer. It is a sign of wisdom, in the first instance, not to embark upon a task but, once a task is undertaken, it is one’s duty always to see it through.

Gujaratis have become the trustees of Mother India’s honour. May God grant them firmness.

The Conference has decided on the boycott of legislative bodies, Government schools and law-courts. It has requested title-holders to renounce their titles. While it has accepted swadeshi unanimously, it has by large majority rejected the proposal for the boycott of British goods. It has opposed a welcome being given to the Duke of Connaught when he pays a visit and advised people against offering themselves as recruits or clerks or labourers for in Mesopotamia.

The resolution means the following things:

1. Title-holders and persons holding medals should renounce the titles and return the medals.

2. Lawyers should give up practice in law-courts and work out arrangements for settling disputes privately.

3. Parents should withdraw their children from schools which have any connection with the Government. Grown-up students should leave schools and colleges on their own.

4. Voters should refuse to vote for any one of the candidates seeking election to a council and the candidates should withdraw their candidature.

5. Every man, woman and child should follow the rule of perfect swadeshi and, in order that they may do so, spinning and weaving should be started in every home.

This shows that it is no small responsibility which the people have taken upon themselves. Even so, there is no possible danger of harassment in discharging it. The danger comes from the people’s own timidity and lethargy. The loss of money which the programme entails is also negligible.

“What will be the substitute for law-courts? And for schools?” In answer to these questions, the Conference has suggested a scheme for securing settlement of disputes through panchas and another for starting new schools and converting the present schools into national schools.

All this looks nice on paper. But nothing can be done without a good number of workers and these must be brave, of sound morals, sober, courteous and persevering. If we can get such workers, Gujarat which seems enslaved today will be free tomorrow and, if Gujarat is free, to that extent India can be said to be free.

This programme contains something for everyone to do. Nothing will be achieved if everyone waits for someone else to begin; whoever can do anything should start doing it forthwith.

138. DEPUTY COMMISSIONER’S ASSASSINATION

When I heard of the assassination, by a Muslim, of Mr. Wil-loughby, a Deputy commissioner, how I wished I had been present on the spot; if it had been possible for me to take that blow upon myself, I would have rendered a service to Islam and to India which I can do in no other way. My dying in such circumstances would have had the result of convincing the whole world of the purity of our struggle; in such conviction lie the seeds of our victory.

This assassination has harmed our cause. An element of violence has entered the struggle, which had been peaceful so far. The freedom from fear which individual Englishmen enjoyed has in a measure dimini-shed. This will lead to vindictiveness and severer repression. Increase in repression brought on by our own mistakes cannot but harm us.

In our struggle, nothing is kept secret. What we think, we speak out. Since we certainly do not want to use violence in our non-co-operation movement, we should condemn this murder, condemn it not only in newspapers and meetings but in our private conversations too, and even in our thoughts.

It is not that what I am saying is relevant only to non-violence of my conception; I say it from the point of view of the generally accepted principles of moral conduct.

If we really wish to keep non-co-operation free from violence, we should realize that it was our first duty to stop violence [if it occurred]. Welcoming violence, openly or secretly, while claiming to have renounced it, would be nothing but duplicity.

If violence broke out, the people would not be able to keep up non-co-operation. There would be a reign of terror all over the country and the people themselves would get panicky; no one would then go on with non-co-operation. This is plain enough and those in charge of the movement have realized it; that is why non-co-operation has generally remained free from violence.

I know, however, that there are Muslims, and Hindus too, who welcome such assassinations. A good many people read with interest accounts of murders in Ireland. Quite a few believe that, were it not for bomb-throwing, the partition of Bengal would not have been undone. There are some who believe that the assassination [of Sir William Curzon Wyllie] by Dhingra did some good. I myself am emphatically of the view that assassinations never do any good, and that, if sometimes for a while good seems to have followed, in the end there is harm. I regard the victory of the British to be their defeat. Evil has increased in them. Greed, hypocrisy, anger, lying, injustice—these are rapidly increasing. There is no limit to their arrogance. The Germans have no scope for these evil impulses. On whom should they perpetrate injustice? What will anger avail them?

I would make this appeal even to those who believe in the creed of violence, that they may not ride two horses at a time. Either we should have non-violent non-co-operation or abandon non-co-operation altogether.

In saying this, it is not my purpose to suggest that we should now abandon non-co-operation; I only wish to alert those in charge of the movement, to point out to them where the real danger lies. Probably, the assassin of Mr. Willoughby does not even know what the term “non-co-operation” means; the key to our success, however, lies in our acquiring control over every person in the country. If we are not strong enough to prevent even sporadic attempts at assassination, our movement simply cannot go on.

What is the way to prevent them? By changing the atmosphere. The atmosphere can change only when those who are conducting the non-co-operation movement fully understand its true nature and the conditions for its success. The first condition is that we appoint ourselves policemen for the protection of Englishmen’s life; if we do so, we would reason with all around us and explain to them that our success depended wholly on our eschewing violence.

139. THE NON-CO-OPERATION RESOLUTION

September 5, 1920

In view of the fact that on the khilafat question both the Indian and Imperial Government have signally failed in their duty towards the Mussulmans of India, and the Prime Minister has deliberately broken his pledged word given to them and that it is the duty of every non-Moslem Indian in every legitimate manner to assist his Mussulman brother in his attempt to remove the religious calamity that has overtaken him:

And in view of the fact that in the matter of the events of the April of 1919 both the said Governments have grossly neglected or failed to protect the innocent people of the Punjab and punish officers guilty of unsoldierly and barbarous behaviour towards them and have exonerated Sir Michael O’Dwyer who proved himself directly or indirectly responsible for most of the official crimes and callous to the sufferings of the people placed under his administration, and that the debate in the House of Lords betrayed a woeful lack of sympathy with the people of India and showed virtual support of the systematic terrorism and frightfulness adopted in the Punjab and that the latest Viceregal pronouncement is proof of entire absence of repentance in the matters of the khilafat and the Punjab:

This Congress is of opinion that there can be no contentment in India without redress of the two aforementioned wrongs and that the only effectual means to vindicate national honour and to prevent a repetition of similar wrongs in future is the establishment of swarajya. This Congress is further of opinion that there is no course left open for the people of India but to approve of and adopt the policy of progressive non-violent non-co-operation until the said wrongs are righted and swarajya is established.

And inasmuch as a beginning should be made by the classes who have hitherto moulded and represented opinion and inasmuch as Government consolidates its power through titles and honours bestowed on the people, through schools controlled by it, its lawcourts and its legislative councils, and inasmuch as it is desirable in the prosecution of the movement to take the minimum risk and to call for the least sacrifice compatible with the attainment of the desired object, this Congress earnestly advises

(a) surrender of titles and honorary offices and resignation from nominated seats in local bodies;

(b) refusal to attend Government levees, durbars, and other official and semi-official functions held by Government officials or in their honour;

(c) gradual withdrawal of children from schools and colleges owned, aided or controlled by Government and in place of such schools and colleges establishment of national schools and colleges in the various Provinces;

(d) gradual boycott of British courts by lawyers and litigants and establishment of private arbitration courts by their aid for the settlement of private disputes;

(e) refusal on the part of the military, clerical and labouring classes to offer themselves as recruits for service in Mesopotamia;

(f) withdrawal by candidates of their candidature for election to the reformed councils and refusal on the part of the voters to vote for any candidate who may despite the Congress advice offer himself for election;

(g) the boycott of foreign goods.

And inasmuch as non-co-operation has been conceived as a measure of discipline and self-sacrifice without which no nation can make real progress, and inasmuch as an opportunity should be given in the very first stage of non-co-operation to every man, woman, and child, for such discipline and self-sacrifice, this Congress advises adoption of swadeshi in piece-goods on a vast scale, and inasmuch as the existing mills of India with indigenous capital and control do not manufacture sufficient yarn and sufficient cloth for the requirements of the nation, and are not likely to do so for a long time to come, this Congress advises immediate stimulation of further manufacture on a large scale by means of revising hand-spinning in every home and hand-weaving on the part of the millions of weavers who have abandoned their ancient and honourable calling for want of encouragement.

140. SPEECH AT SUBJECTS COMMITTEE MEETING, CALCUTTA

September 5, 1920

Mr. Gandhi spoke in support of his motions. He expressed his utter distrust of the bureaucracy and stated that as British people were past masters in the art of diplomacy he felt convinced now, though he felt otherwise in Amritsar, that these reforms were a dangerous trap which concealed gilded chains that enslaved the country. He warned his hearers not to fall in that trap. He assured them that if they would only start the movement in the right spirit and carry it out as he desired, he was sure that they would secure full independence for the country within a year. He also stated that the masses were still backward in political action and had no initiation in the working of the electoral machinery. The electorate in his view had not yet the ability to discriminate on complicated political issues and were unable to understand the objective they had in view. They would be at the mercy of unscrupulous men and he wound up by saying that boycott of elections was the pivot upon which the programme in his resolution turned and therefore he was not prepared to yield to any appeal made in the name of unity. On this head, patriots like Mr. Tilak would not have been able to do even the small part of work they had done if they had got into councils. He again reiterated that he was not afraid of Moderates getting into the councils and he wished well to them because they believed that non-co-operation was dangerous. He claimed that his was a religious movement, that to true Mohammedans, non-co-operation including boycott of councils was an obligation enjoined as their faith, which they may not break. He described the state of excitement in the Mussulman community, such that, for very safety and peace, no less for brotherhood and unity, they should go with them non-co-operating with Government and that Mr. Das’s plan won’t do.

By this time a number of amendments were handed to the president including amendments by Mr. Vijayaraghavachariar to both motions, by Swami Shraddhananda, by Shri Prakasa, by Pandit Nehru and others. Mr. Jinnah then enquired as to the procedure to be adopted in further discussion of motion and amendments, pointing out the issues raised in deciding between the two principles of the motions of Mr. Das and Mr. Gandhi.

Mr. Gandhi at this stage agreed, so far as the preamble was concerned, he was prepared to accept the Das preamble defining the aim of non-co-operation to be the attainment of complete swaraj.

141. SPEECH AT SUBJECTS COMMITTEE MEETING, CALCUTTA

September 7, 1920

This is Gandhiji’s speech delivered before the Subjects Committee held at Calcutta on 7-9-1920, while answering his critics when he won by a narrow majority.

He said he had agreed to graduality of the withdrawal of school children and lawyers on the ground that that was how it had actually happened in his practical experiences. He said that non-co-operation was gradually gathering force. “Gradual” did not mean eternity. He was only giving shelter and dispensation to those lawyers who had...¹ and to those who, on account of their circumstances, could not immediately renounce practice. Similarly in regard to schools.

Next referring to the question of allegiance and full responsible Government he desired to dispel the illusion both upon Mohammedans and Hindus as regards his position. He accepted the amendment regarding full self-government in his proposal not on the ground that the khilafat question was subservient to the question of swaraj. To him the khilafat and the Punjab were greater than swaraj. Pressure had been put upon him to accept Mr. Pal’s amendment but he had come to the conclusion that he should reject it, not only on a matter of conscience, but also on the ground of practical expediency as well. He had been told that he would prove by his action to be the evil genius of the Congress and other things. Such statements did not appeal to him, if in the interests of the country, the Congress deserves to be split up, he did not mind the consequences. He did not care about the creation of a great split among Nationalists. The Congress was to him a national and not a Nationalist or Moderate organization. The old creed of the Congress, according to him, provided a platform for every shade of opinion in the country. He for one felt that the Congress should continue to do so. It was wrong at any time to put pressure on anybody of any kind in this matter he and [sic] give his assurance to Mr. C. Vijayaraghavachari who had grieved him by his observations which amounted to saying that he, Mr. Gandhi, was trading on his past reputation. He asked to be judged as a practical man before the Congress. His amendment embodied both a political and a religious principle because he considered that in politics, conscience and honourable dealing were as important as in private affairs, though consequences had to be judged and expediency adopted. He asked them to discard all prejudices and vote upon this question. Whatever the result, his view was that the minority in the Congress should not secede, put stay and use its best endeavours to convert itself into the majority. If he was defeated, he would not secede and so long as he could find in the Congress a platform to reach the hearts of men of all shades of opinion he would continue to stay in it, but, if he could not find it, he would go away. In his view the function of the Congress was not one of acceptance and action, but one of the expression of the verdict of the people. The Congress resolution, as he conceived it, was not a party resolution and he considered it was not right to make a fetish of the Congress resolution. The Congress did not issue a command as the Central Khilafat Committee did and so it was, he used the word “advised”, in the resolution. If the Congress found within the next few months that the opinion expressed by it now, was not the opinion of the country, it shall change it. There was, therefore, no reason to introduce or impute conscience in this matter.

In regard to boycott of councils, he reiterated his view that the councils were a trap in which they should not enter. They were a death trap. He acknowledged that there were substantial improvements in Mr. Pal’s resolution over the Das resolution, but on the boycott of elections, he was clear he wanted to go to every elector and ask him to boycott elections for the insult offered to the country by the Punjab and the khilafat questions. He would not base his appeal to them on the question of swaraj. To him swaraj was only a means to an end and he for his part was prepared to exchange swaraj for any other system of Government if, in his opinion, it was for the good of the country.

On the creed, he was clear, he should support Mr. Shaukat Ali in everything he said and he himself felt that, in the circumstances in which they were placed, he was unable to tender his loyalty to the Government. He was prepared to seek his objects with or without British connection if necessary, so long as the methods were peaceful and the object was the good of the country. Mentally at least he owed no allegiance now to the British connection. He finally appealed to his hearers to affirm their belief one way or other and he reiterated that they should not go and run into the danger of the death traps provided and offer themselves as sacrifices to the God mammon. He believed in the ancient and pacific ideals of the East and not in the modern and advanced ideals of the West as he only too well knew that the choice of India lay before them and he asked them to give a new gospel to the world based on their ancient ideals.

The Hindu, 8-9-1920
I commend to the attention the readers of Young India the thoughtful letter received from Miss Anne Marie Petersen. Miss Petersen is a lady who has been in India for some years and has closely followed Indian affairs. She is about to sever her connection with her Mission for the purpose of giving herself to education that is truly national.

I have not given the letter in full. I have omitted all personal references. But her argument has been left entirely untouched. The letter was not meant to be printed. It was written just after my Vellore speech. But it being intrinsically important, I asked the writer for her permission, which she gladly gave, for printing it.

I publish it all the more gladly in that it enables me to show that the movement of non-co-operation is neither anti-Christian nor anti-English nor anti-European. It is a struggle between religion and irreligion, powers of light and powers of darkness.

It is my firm opinion that Europe today represents not the spirit of God or Christianity but the spirit of Satan. And Satan’s successes are the greatest when he appears with the name of God on his lips. Europe is today only nominally Christian. In reality it is worshipping mammon. “It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom.” Thus really spoke Jesus Christ. His so-called followers measure their moral progress by their material possessions. The very national anthem of England is anti-Christian. Jesus, who asked his followers to love their enemies even as themselves, could not have sung of his enemies, “Confound his enemies, frustrate their knavish tricks”. The last book that Dr. Wallace wrote set his deliberate conviction that the much vaunted advance of science had added not an inch to the moral stature of Europe. The last War however has shown, as nothing else has, the Satanic nature of the civilization that dominates Europe today. Every canon of public morality has been broken by the victors in the name of virtue. No lie has been considered too foul to be uttered. The motive behind every crime is not religious or spiritual but grossly material. But the Mussulmans and the Hindus who are struggling against the Government have religion and honour as their motive. Even the cruel assassination which has just shocked the country is reported to have a religious motive behind it. It is certainly necessary to purge religion of its excrescences, but it is equally necessary to expose the hollowness of moral pretensions on the part of those who prefer material wealth to moral gain. It is easier to wean an ignorant fanatic from his error than a confirmed scoundrel from his scoundrelism.

This however is no indictment against individuals or even nations. Thousands of individual Europeans are rising above their environment. I write of the tendency in Europe as reflected in her present leaders. England through her leaders is absolutely crushing Indian religious and national sentiment under her heels. England under the false plea of self-determination is trying to exploit the oilfields of Mesopotamia which she is almost to leave because she has probably no choice. France through her leaders is lending her name to training cannibals as soldiers and is shamelessly betraying her trust as a mandatory power by trying to kill the spirit of the Syrians. President Wilson' has thrown on the scrap-heap his precious fourteen points.

It is this combination of evil forces which India is really fighting through non-violent non-co-operation. And those like Miss Petersen, whether Christian or European, who feel that this error must be dethroned can exercise the privilege of doing so by joining the non-co-operation movement. With the honour of Islam is bound up the safety of religion itself and with the honour of India is bound up the honour of every nation known to be weak.

143. PARIAHS OF THE EMPIRE

The memorable Conference at Gujarat in its resolution on the status of Indians abroad has given it as its opinion that even this question may become one more reason for non-co-operation. And so it may. Nowhere has there been such open defiance of every canon of justice and propriety as in the shameless decision of confiscation of Indian rights in Kenya Colony announced by its Governor. This decision has been supported by Lord Milner and Mr. Montagu. And his Indian colleagues are satisfied with the decisions. Indians, who have made East Africa, who outnumber the English, are deprived practically of the right of representation on the council. They are to be segregated in parts not habitable by the English. They are to have neither the political nor the material comfort. They are to become Pariahs in a country made by their own labour, wealth and intelligence. The Viceroy is pleased to say that he does not like the outlook and is considering the steps to be taken to vindicate the justice. He is not met with a new situation. The Indians of East Africa had warned him of the impending doom. And if His Excellency has not yet found the means of ensuring redress, he is not likely to do it in future. I would respectfully ask his Indian colleagues whether they can stand this robbery of their countrymen’s rights.

In South Africa the situation is no less disquieting. My misgivings seem to be proving true, and repatriation is more likely to prove compulsory than voluntary. It is a response to the anti-Asiatic agitation, not a measure of relief for indignant Indians. It looks very like a trap laid for the unwary Indian. The Union Government appears to be taking an unlawful advantage of a section of a relieving law designed for purpose totally different from the one now intended.

As for Fiji, the crime against humanity is evidently to be hushed up. I do hope that unless an inquiry is to be made into the Fiji martial law doings, no Indian member will undertake to go to Fiji. The Government of India appear to have given an undertaking to send Indian labour to Fiji provided the commission that was to proceed there in order to investigate the condition on the spot returns with a favourable report.

For British Guiana I observe, from the papers received from that quarter, that the mission that came here is already declaring that Indian labour will be forthcoming from India. There seems to me to be no real prospect for Indian enterprise in that part of the world. We are not wanted in any part of the British Dominions except as Pariahs to do the scavenging for the European settlers.

The situation is clear. We are Pariahs in our own home. We get only what Government intend to give, not what we demand and have a right to. We may get the crumbs, never the loaf. I have seen large and tempting crumbs from a lavish table. And I have seen the eyes of our Pariahs, the shame of Hinduism—brightening to see those heavy crumbs filling their baskets. But the superior Hindu, who is filling the basket from a safe distance, knows that they are unfit for his own consumption. And so we in our turn may receive even Governorships which the real rulers no longer require or which they cannot retain with safety for their material interest—the political and material hold on India. It is time we realized our true status.

Young India, 8-9-1920
144. SWADESHI

The swadeshi propaganda has been going on in a more or less organized manner now for the past eighteen months. Some of its results are surprising and gratifying. It has taken a fairly firm hold in the Punjab, Madras and the Bombay Presidency. Hand-spinning and hand-weaving are steadily increasing in these parts. Several thousand rupees have been distributed in homes where women never did any work before. And if more work of this kind has not been done, it is due to want of workers.

This is however written more to note the mistakes of the past than to sum up the bright side. My observations lead me to the conclusion that whilst the inauguration of the three vows and swadeshi stores have greatly stimulated the swadeshi spirit, it is no longer possible to advocate the taking of any of the three vows or the opening of new swadeshi stores for the sale of mill-made cloth. The result of the propaganda has been to send up the prices of yarn and cloth rather than increase production. It is clear that the purpose of swadeshi is not served until the quantity of yarn and cloth produced is increased. The gain therefore is merely moral and not material. The people have begun to perceive the desirability of wearing only swadeshi cloth if the real interest of the country is to be advanced.

But it is clear that we must take practical steps for meeting the growing demand for swadeshi cloth. One way, no doubt, is to increase the mills. But it is obvious that capitalists do not need popular encouragements. They know that India needs much more cloth than is manufactured by our mills. But mills do not spring up like mushrooms. It is a matter of getting machinery from outside, let alone the difficulty of getting labour. And after all, India cannot become truly and economically independent so long as she must rely on the supply of machinery from outside for the manufacture of her cloth.

The cleanest and the most popular form of swadeshi, therefore, is to stimulate hand-spinning and hand-weaving and to arrange for a judicious distribution of yarn and cloth so manufactured. With a little talent and a little industry this thing is easy. Even as each home cooks its own food without difficulty, so may each home weave its own yarn. And just as in spite of every home having its own kitchen, restaurants continue to flourish, so will mills continue to supply our additional wants. But even as because of our private kitchens we would not starve if every restaurant was through some accident closed, so would we, by reason of domestic spinning, not have to go naked even if every mill, by a blockade from the West, had to stop work. Not long ago, we knew this secret of our own economic independence and it is possible for us to regain that independence by a little effort, a little organizing agency and a little sacrifice.

Therefore true swadeshi consists in introducing the spinning-wheel in every household and every household spinning its own yarn. Many a Punjabi woman does it today. And though we may not supply our own cloth entirely, we shall be saving yearly crores of rupees. In any event there is no other swadeshi than increased manufacture by hand-spinning and hand-weaving. Whether we take up hand-spinning and hand-weaving or we do not, it is at least necessary to understand what true swadeshi is.

145. DEMOCRACY “VERSUS” MOBOCRACY

Looking at the surface there is but a thin dividing line between mob-law and the people’s law. And yet the division is complete and will persist for all time.

India is today quickly passing through the mob-law stage. The use of the adverb signifies my hope. It may be our misfortune to have to pass through that process even in slow stages. But it is wisdom to adopt every means at our disposal to have done with that stage as quickly as possible.

There is much tendency on our part to yield to the rule of the mob. There was mob rule at Amritsar on the 10th April 1919. There was mob rule at Ahmedabad on the same fateful day. It represented undisciplined destruction and therefore it was thoughtless, profitless, wicked and harmful. War is disciplined destruction, much more bloody than any yet committed by mobs. And yet war has been apostrophized, because we have been deceived by the temporary but brilliant results achieved by some wars. So, if India has to achieve her freedom by violence, it will have to be by disciplined and honourable (insofar as it is possible to associate honour with violence) violence, named war. It will then be an act not of mobocracy but democracy.

But my purpose today is not to write mobocracy of the Ahmedabad type. I intend to deal with the type with which I am more familiar. The Congress is a demonstration for the mob and in that sense and that only. Though organized by thoughtful men and women it may be called a mob-demonstration. During the memorable tour of the khilafat mission through the Punjab, Sind and Madras, I have had a surfeit of such demonstrations. I have been ashamed to witness at railway stations, thoughtless though unwitting destruction of passengers’ luggage by demonstrators who in their adoration of their heroes have ignored everything else and everybody else. They have made, much to the discomfort of their heroes, unmusical and harsh noises. They have trampled upon one another. They have elbowed out one another. All have shouted, all at the same time, in the holy name of order and peace. Ten volunteers have been heard to give the same order at the same time. Volunteers often become demonstrators instead of remaining people’s policemen. It is a task often dangerous, always uncomfortable, for the heroes to be escorted through a broken chain of volunteers from the platform to the coach intended for them. Often it is a process which although it should occupy no more than five minutes, has occupied, one hour. The crowd instead of pressing back, presses towards the heroes and who therefore require to be protected. The coach is taken possession of by anybody who dares, volunteers being the greatest sinners. The heroes and other lawful occupants have to reason with the intruders that they may not mount the foot-boards in that summary fashion. The hood of the coach is roughly handled by the processionists. It is not often that I have seen hoods of motors left undamaged by crowds. On the route instead of crowds lining the streets, they follow the coach. The result is confusion worse confounded. Every moment there is danger of accidents. That there is rarely any accident at such demonstrations in not due to the skill of the organizers, but the crowd is determined to put up with all jostling and retain its perfect good humour. In spite of everyone jostling everyone else, one has not the slightest wish to inconvenience one’s neighbour. To finish the picture, there is the meeting, an ever-growing cause of anxiety. You face nothing but disorder, din, pressing, yelling and shouting there. A good speaker arrests the attention of the audience and there is order such that you can hear a pin drop.

All the same this is mobocracy. You are at the mercy of the mob. So long as there is sympathy between you and the mob, everything goes well. Immediately that cord is broken, there is horror. An Ahmedabad episode now and then gives you the mob psychology.
We must then evolve order out of chaos. And I have no doubt that the best and the speediest method is to introduce the people’s law instead of mob-law.

One great stumbling block is that we have neglected music. Music means rhythm, order. Its effect is electrical. It immediately soothes. I have seen, in European countries, a resourceful superintendent of police by starting a popular song controlling the mischievous tendencies of mobs. Unfortunately like our Shastras, music has been the prerogative of the few, either the barter of prostitutes or high class religious devotees. It has never become nationalized in the modern sense. If I had any influence with volunteer boy scouts and Seva Samiti organizations, I would make compulsory a proper singing in company of national songs. And to that end I should have great musicians attending every Congress or Conference and teaching mass music.

Much greater discipline, method and knowledge must be exacted from volunteers and no chance comer should be accepted as a full-fledged volunteer. He only hinders rather than helping. Imagine the consequence of the introduction of one untrained soldier finding his way into an army at war. He can disorganize it in a second. My greatest anxiety about non-co-operation is not the slow response of the leaders, certainly not the well-meant and even ill-meant criticism, never unadulterated repression. The movement will overcome these obstacles. It will gain even strength from them. But the greatest obstacle is that we have not yet emerged from the mobocratic stage. But my consolation lies in the fact that nothing is so easy as to train mobs, for the simple reason that they have no mind, no premeditation. They act in a frenzy. They repent quickly. Our organized Government does not repent of its fiendish crimes at Jallianwala, Lahore, Kasur, Akalgarh, Ram Nagar, etc. But I have drawn tears from repentant mobs at Gujranwala and everywhere a frank acknowledgment of repentance from those who formed the mob during that eventful month of April. Non-co-operation I am therefore now using in order to evolve democracy. And I respectfully invite all the doubting leaders to help by refusing to condemn, in anticipation of a process of national purification, training and sacrifice.

1 The reference is to Alexander, who saved Gandhiji in this manner from an attack by the mob.
Next week I hope to give some illustrations of how in a moment order was evolved out of mob disorder. My faith in the people is boundless. Theirs is an amazingly responsive nature. Let not the leaders distrust them. This chorus of condemnation of non-co-operation when properly analysed means nothing less than distrust of the people’s ability to control themselves. For the present I conclude this somewhat lengthy article by suggesting some rules for guidance and immediate execution.

1. There should be no raw volunteers accepted for big demonstrations. Therefore none but the most experienced should be at the head.

2. Volunteers should have a general instructions book on their persons.

3. At the time of demonstrations there must be a review of volunteers at which special instructions should be given.

4. At stations, volunteers should not all be centred at one point, namely, where the reception committee should be. But they should be posted at different points in the crowd.

5. Large crowds should never enter the station. They cannot but inconvenience traffic. There is as much honour in staying out as in entering the station.

6. The first duty of the volunteers should be to see that other passengers’ luggage is not trampled upon.

7. Demonstrators ought not to enter the station long before the notified time for arrival.

8. There should be a clear passage left in front of the train for the passengers.

9. There should be another passage if possible half way through the demonstrators for the heroes to pass.

10. There should be no chain formed. It is humiliating.

11. The demonstrators must not move till the heroes have reached their coach or till they receive a pre-arranged signal from an authorized volunteer.

12. National cries must be fixed and must be raised not anyhow, at any time or all the time, but just on the arrival of the train, on the heroes reaching the coach and on the route at fair intervals. No objections need be raised to this on the score of the demonstration.

\[1\] Vide “Some Illustrations”, 22-9-1920.
becoming mechanical and not spontaneous. The spontaneity will depend upon numbers, the response to the cries above all the general look of the demonstrators, not in the greatest number of noises or the loudest. It is the training that a nation receives which characterizes the nature of its demonstrations. A Mohammedan silently worshipping in his mosque is no less demonstrative than a Hindu temple-goer making a noise either through his voice or his gong or both.

13. On the route the crowd must line and not follow the carriages. If pedestrians form part of the moving procession, they must noiselessly and in an orderly manner take their places and not at their own will join or abstain.

14. A crowd should never press towards the heroes but should move away from them.

15. Those on the last line or the circumference should never press forward but give way when pressure is directed towards them.

16. If there are women in the crowd they should be specially protected.

17. Little children should never be brought out in the midst of crowds.

18. At meetings volunteers should be dispersed among the crowd. They should learn flag and whistle signalling in order to pass instructions from one to another when it is impossible for the voice to carry.

19. It is no part of the audience to preserve order. They do so by keeping motionless and silent.

20. Above all, everyone should obey volunteers’ instructions without question.

This list does not pretend to be exhaustive. It is merely illustrative and designed to stimulate thought and discussion. I hope that all the vernacular papers will translate this article.

Young India, 8-9-1920
146. THREE NATIONAL CRIES

During the Madras tour, at Bezwada I had occasion to remark upon the national cries and I suggested that it would be better to have cries about ideals than men. I asked the audience to replace “Mahatma Gandhi ki jai” and “Mahomed Ali-Shaukat Ali ki jai” by “Hindu-Mussulman ki jai”. Brother Shaukat Ali, who followed, positively laid down the law. In spite of the Hindu-Muslim unity he had observed that if Hindus shouted “Vandemataram”, the Muslims rang out with “Allah-o-Akbar” and vice versa. This he rightly said jarred on the ear and still showed that the people did not act with one mind. There should be therefore only three cries recognized, “Allah-o-Akbar” to be joyously sung out by Hindus and Muslims showing that God alone was great and no other. The second should be “Vandemataram” (Hail Motherland) or “Bharat Mata ki jai” (Victory to Mother Hind). The third should be “Hindu-Mussulman ki jai” without which there was no victory for India, and no true demonstration to the greatness of God. I do wish that the newspapers and public men would take up the Maulana’s suggestion and lead the people only to use the three cries. They are full of meaning. The first is a prayer and a confession of our littleness and therefore a sign of humility. It is a cry in which all Hindus and Muslims should join in reverence and prayerfulness. Hindus may not fight shy of Arabic words when their meaning is not only totally inoffensive but even ennobling. God is no respecter of any particular tongue. “Vandemataram”, apart from its wonderful associations, expresses the one national wish—the rise of India to her full height. And I should prefer “Vandemataram” to “Bharat Mata ki jai” as it would be a graceful recognition of the intellectual and emotional superiority of Bengal. Since India can be nothing without the union of the Hindu and the Muslim heart, “Hindu-Mussulman ki jai” is a cry which we may never forget.

There should be no discordance in these cries. Immediately some one has taken up any of the three cries the rest should take it up and not attempt to yell out their favourite. Those who do not wish to join may refrain, but they should consider it a breach of etiquette to interpolate their own when a cry has already been raised. It would be better too, always to follow out the three cries in the order given above. Nor should cries be incessantly shouted. One often hears an incessant yell when a popular leader is passing through a station. I doubt if this incessant noise does the slightest good to the nation except to provide an indifferent exercise for one’s lungs. Moreover, it is necessary to think of our hero’s nerves and time. It is a national waste to keep him occupied in gazing at a crowd and hearing a cry in his praise or any other for full thirty minutes. We must cultivate the sense of proportion.

147. SPEECH ON NON-CO-OPERATION RESOLUTION, CALCUTTA CONGRESS

September 8, 1920

Mr. Gandhi moved his resolution on non-co-operation with the following speech:

I am aware, more than aware, of the grave responsibility that rests on my shoulders in being privileged to move this resolution before this great assembly. I am aware that my difficulties, as also yours, increase if you are able to adopt this resolution. I am also aware that the adoption of any resolution will mark a definite change in the policy which the country has hitherto adopted for the vindication of the rights that belong to it, and its honour. I am aware that a large number of our leaders who have given the time and attention to the affairs of my motherland, which I have not been able to give, are ranged against me. They think it a duty to resist the policy of revolutionizing the Government policy at any cost. Knowing this I stand before you in fear of God and a sense of duty to put this before you for your hearty acceptance.

THINK IMPARTIALLY

I ask you to dismiss me, for the time being from your consideration. I have been charged of saintliness and a desire for dictatorship. I venture to say that I do not stand before you either as a saint or a candidate for dictatorship. I stand before you to present to you the results of my many years’ practical experience in non-co-operation. I deny the charge that it is a new thing in the country. It has been accepted at hundreds of meetings attended by thousands of men, and has been placed in working order since the first of August by the Mussulmans, and many of the things in the programme are being enforced in a more or less intense form. I ask you again to dismiss personalities in the consideration of this important question, and bring to bear patient and calm judgment on it. But a mere acceptance of the resolution does not end the work. Every individual has to enforce the items of the resolution in so far as they apply to him. I beseech you to give me a patient hearing. I ask you neither to clap nor to hiss. I do not mind them so far as I am concerned, but clapping hinders the flow of thought, clapping and hissing hinder the process of correspondence between a speaker and his audience. You will not hiss out of the stage any single speaker. For non-co-operation is a measure of discipline and sacrifice and it demands patience and respect for opposite views. And unless we were able to evolve a spirit of mutual toleration for diametrically opposite views, non-co-operation is an impossibility. Non-co-operation in an angry atmosphere is an impossibility. I have learnt through bitter experience the one supreme lesson to conserve my anger and as heat conserved is transmuted into energy, even so our anger controlled can be transmuted into a power which can move the world. To those who have been attending the Congress, as brothers in arms I ask what can be better discipline than that, which we should exercise between ourselves.

I have been told that I have been doing nothing but wreckage and that by bringing forward the resolution I am breaking up the political life of the country. The Congress is not a party organization. It ought to provide a platform for all shades of opinions, and a minority need not leave this organization, but may look forward to translate itself into a majority, in course of time, if its opinion commended itself to the country. Only let no man in the name of the Congress advocate a policy which has been condemned by the Congress. And if you condemn my policy I shall not go away from the Congress, but shall plead with them to convert the minority into majority.

ENFORCE CLEAR REPENTANCE

There are no two opinions as to the wrong done to the khilafat. Mussulmans cannot remain as honourable men and follow their Prophet if they do not vindicate their honour at any cost. The Punjab has been cruelly, brutally treated, and inasmuch as one man in the Punjab was made to crawl on his belly the whole of India crawled on her belly, and if we are worthy sons and daughters of India we should be pledged to remove these wrongs. It is in order to remove these wrongs that the country is agitating itself. But we have not been able to bend the Government to our will. We cannot rest satisfied with a mere expression of angry feeling. You could not have heard a more passionate denunciation of the Punjab wrongs than in the pages of the presidential address. If the Congress cannot wring justice from unwilling hands how can it vindicate its existence and its honour? How can it do so if it cannot enforce clear repentance, before receiving a single gift, however rich, from those blood-stained hands?

EXTEND THE SPIRIT OF SACRIFICE

I have therefore placed before you my scheme of non-co-operation to achieve this end and want you to reject any other scheme unless you have deliberately come to the conclusion that it is a better scheme than mine. If there is a sufficient response to my scheme, I make bold to reiterate my statement that you can gain swarajya in the course of a year. Not the passing of the resolution will bring swarajya, but the enforcement of the resolution from day to day in a progressive manner, due regard being had to conditions in the country. There is another remedy before the country, and that is drawing of the sword. If that was possible India would not have listened to the gospel of non-co-operation. I want to suggest to you that even if you want to arrest injustice by methods of violence, discipline and self-sacrifice are necessary. I have not known of a war gained by a rabble, but I have known of wars gained by disciplined armies and if you want to give battle to the British Government and to the combined power of Europe we must train ourselves in discipline and self-sacrifice. I confess I have become impatient, I have seen that we deserve swarajya today, but we have not got the spirit of national sacrifice. We have evolved this spirit in domestic affairs, and I have come to ask you to extend it to other affairs. I have been travelling from one end to the other of the country to see whether the country has evolved the national spirit, whether at the altar of the nation it is ready to dedicate its riches, children, its all, if it was ready to make the initiatory sacrifice. Is the country ready? Are the title-holders ready to surrender their titles? Are parents ready to sacrifice literary education of their children for the sake of the country? The schools and colleges are really a factory for turning out clerks for Government. If the parents are not ready for the sacrifice, if title-holders are not ready, swarajya is very nearly an impossibility. No nation being under another nation can accept gifts and kick at the responsibility attaching to those gifts, imposed by the conquering nation. Immediately the conquered country realized instinctively that any gift which might come to it is not for the benefit of the conquered, but for the benefit of the conqueror, that moment it should reject every form of voluntary assistance to it. These are the fundamental essentials of success in the struggle for the independence for the country, whether within the Empire or without the Empire. I hold a real substantial unity between Hindus and Mussulmans infinitely superior to the British connection and if I had to make a choice between that unity and the British connection, I would have the first and reject the other. If I had to choose between the honour of the Punjab, anarchy, neglect of education, shutting out of all legislative activity, and British connection, I would choose the honour of the Punjab and all it meant, even anarchy, shutting out of all schools, etc., without slightest hesitation.

If you have the same feeling burning in you as in me for the honour of Islam and the Punjab then you will unreservedly accept my resolution.

BOYCOTT OF COUNCILS

I now come to the burning topic, viz, the boycott of the councils. Sharpest difference of opinion existed regarding this, and if the house has to divide on it, it must divide. If it must divide you will consider that it must divide on one issue, viz, whether swarajya has to be gained through the councils or without the councils. If we utterly distrust the British Government and we know that they are utterly unrepentant how can you believe that the councils will lead to swarajya and not tighten the British hold on India?

SWADESHI

I now come to swadeshi. The boycott of foreign goods is included in the resolution. You have got here, I confess, an anomaly for which I am not originally responsible. But I have consented to it. I will not go into the history of how it found a place into the resolution, of which the essence is discipline and self-sacrifice. Swadeshi means permanent boycott of foreign goods. It is therefore a matter of redundancy. But I have taken it in, because I could not reject it as a matter of conscience. I know, however, it is a physical impossibility. So long as we have to rely on the pins and needles—figurative and literal both—we cannot bring about a complete boycott of foreign goods. I do not hesitate to say this clause mars the musical harmony, if I may claim it without vanity, of the programme. I feel that those words do mar the symmetry of the programme. But I am not here for symmetry of the programme as for its workability.
I again ask you not to be influenced by personality. Reject out of your consideration any service that I have done. Two things only I claim. Laborious industry, great thought behind any programme, and unflinching determination to bring it about. You may take only those things from me, and bring them to bear on any programme that you adopt.

148. SPEECH REPLYING ON NON-CO-OPERATION RESOLUTION, CALCUTTA

September 8, 1920

This is the full text of Mr. Gandhi’s speech in reply to the criticisms of the opposite party.

I know that I have got to perform a duty by you and answer some of the many objections that have been raised against the points in the proposition. You have now listened to all speeches but one, with respectful attention. I am exceedingly sorry that you refused to hear Mr. Jamnadas Dwarakadas. You have heard Pandit Malaviya, Mr. Jinnah, and Mrs. Besant—a host in themselves. You have heard the arguments advanced by Mrs. Besant and several other speakers. They have all a splendid record of service behind them. They have hitherto led the Congress for a number of years and have given you their best services and I know that you will give all arguments that have been advanced against my resolution the respect that they are entitled to. But at the same time I am here to tell you that with all my anxiety to be convinced of any error of judgment or otherwise that I have committed, I stand unconvinced.

It has been suggested by Mr. Jinnah and Mr. Das that this programme is impracticable. Is it not capable of being practised? I venture to suggest to you that it is capable of being practised today by everyone who is affected by the several items. There is the introduction of the word “gradual” and Mr. Das has very properly laid emphasis upon that word in order to show that it is in recognition of the impracticable nature of at least two items, those relating to schools and law-courts. I respectfully differ from him. The introduction of that adjective is a concession to our weakness and recognition of our unreadiness. I admit that with the introduction of the adjective, these two items may be absolutely whittled down. It would depend largely upon the sense of indignation that has really fired the nation and it will still more largely depend upon the work that may be put into the programme by real workers. You may depend upon it that so long as the Non-co-operation Committee started by the Central Khilafat Committee is in existence, so long will you find these items, and many more, continuously placed before you for acceptance and every argument and every inducement will be held out to you—not pecuniary but every inducement in the interest of the nation—and every appeal will be made to your patriotic spirit in order that you may be stimulated to action. I have not the slightest doubt, even with the experience of only one and a half months behind me, that we shall have a fairly good response from the country. I contend that this programme is not unpracticable, in the sense that anybody who wishes to enforce those items can do so today. It is not a physical impossibility with him as it is practical if he wanted really to enforce complete boycott of foreign goods.

In my humble opinion this item is a practical impossibility as other items are undoubtedly not. I have given you my reasons for accepting this item in my programme though in theory this is sound. I was most anxious to place before the nation only those things which the nation, if it was willing and ready, could put it into practice today.

Let me not conceal one great fact from you. I do suggest to you that if you want to carry out the programme of non-co-operation as sketched by me it is expected of you—and you will find in the course of our peregrinations that we shall be continually dinning the thing into your ears,—it is expected of you that if it is at all possible for you, you will withdraw your children from schools tomorrow and lawyers will suspend their practice from tomorrow. But, as I have said, if you have not the ability, if you have not immediate readiness, the introduction of the adjective gives you thinking time. I declined to accept the interpretation that some in the audience placed upon these two items, when they questioned that they are to withdraw their children only when national schools are ready, and that lawyers should suspend practice when arbitration courts are established. That in my opinion is building before foundation. I cannot put a handsome pile of buildings or ever erect a straw cottage without having children to educate. When a nation is at war, whether non-violent, or violent, it is an indispensable condition that it stops its schools and law-courts. I have gone through two wars myself. In them schools remained in suspended animation and so were the law-courts closed, rather because litigants had no time to think of their private quarrels and parents came to the conclusion that the best education that their children could receive at a critical time in their history was that they should understand that it was better for them to have their children’s education suspended for a time than that they should remain in a state of evil. These two items are undoubtedly tests of our feelings in the matter and if the nation feels it will act up to these two things.

Much has been made of want of notice and, if facts were as they are supposed to be, I think, it would be a sound argument. But perhaps this has escaped even Mr. Pal’s notice, even Mr. Jinnah’s notice, that really this question of notice arises only because of the introduction of new elements in the programme, namely the demand for swaraj. If we were making a new demand for swaraj, the argument will be final; they, as an honourable nation, ought to give a clear emphatic notice to the British people, but in my programme it is not put in that fashion. I have said that without swaraj it would be impossible to prevent repetition of wrongs such as have been inflicted in the Punjab and therefore in this programme swaraj is no independent demand but has been made a demand because in the opinion of the Congress it is necessary in order to guard against a future contingency to have swaraj. In my humble opinion, there is absolutely nothing wrong in it. But I go forward. Both Messrs Jinnah and Malaviya have accepted Mr. Pal’s programme. You will find therein that some of the items are to be enforced from tomorrow and what the amendment states is that the other items will be reduced to practice later on and that while the mission is conducting its affairs, some operation of non-co-operation programme is to be enforced from the population of India. I think the Congress may well hold that notice sufficient for its purpose without in any way damaging the prestige of the whole nation which are convertible terms.

I come to the final point namely boycott of councils. I must confess that I have not yet heard a single argument in favour of going to councils. All the argument that has up to now been advanced is seeing that we have done something through these councils during 35 years, seeing that the reformed council is really in response to our agitation—which I admit—and seeing that there is greater scope for obstruction as we can command a majority by influencing voters—which too I admit—, we may be able by going to councils, to paralyse Government, or the administration, as the case may be. In my humble opinion, as a student of English history, I have found, and it is a practical maxim adopted in English public life, that every institution thrives on obstruction. When we seek elections to councils, I assure you that Government will not be pleased to see Nationalists outside the councils. Government are eager today to have Nationalists in the councils. You will take my evidence for what it is worth. It may be bad evidence, but it is there. It is my firm opinion that the services public men want to render can be rendered outside the councils, rather than inside and such services will be infinitely greater than the services they render in the councils. What is the secret of the great power of the late and the only Lokamanya of the country? Do you suppose that if he had gone to the council he would have exercised the unrivalled influence that he exercised over all the millions of India?

You have had evidence given before you in connection with his opinion. I am exceedingly sorry that you had not evidence brought before you as to what he considered in connection with the programme. But as the matter has been brought before you, it has become my painful duty to give you evidence, that is in my possession. I happened at his wish to wait upon him in company with Mr. Shaukat Ali a fortnight before his demise and he said: “I personally believe that it will be better to go to councils and obstruct where it was necessary and co-operate where also it was necessary.” But when Mr. Shaukat Ali told him, “What about your promise to Mussulmans in Delhi?”, at which also I was present, he immediately added, “Oh, yes, if the Mussulmans do the thing”. He laid emphasis on it and did not merely speak, of the boycott of councils. He said: “I give you my word that my party will stand with you.” I do not want you to exaggerate the value of this evidence. As I know his name is a name to conjure with and his opinion must carry great weight with those of us who believe that he was unrivalled in his continued prosecutions for the attainment of swaraj and naturally any opinion that might be cited as having come from him must carry weight.

What do these councils mean? A simple test I venture to present to you and leaders is that these two wrongs that we are to consider are the khilafat and the Punjab. Do you believe that by going to the council and engaging in debates there, you can produce a direct impression upon British ministers and secure a revision of the Turkish Terms and repentance on account of the Punjab affair? Our revered brother and leader Pandit Malaviya has said that very soon all that the Congress Sub-committee asked for will be granted, because some or most of the officers are already gone or will be presently going and in April even the Viceroy will have gone. I respectfully suggest that it is not what I at least intended when I put my pen to that report. I said emphatically, even at our discussion, that the dismissal of the officers be based upon their incapacity and the atrocity, that they were guilty of and not by efflux of time and that the Viceroy should be compulsorily retired if he does not tender his resignation before his time. It does not serve my purpose when the Viceroy goes by efflux of time; and so also the officers. If the officers are retired compulsorily but not retired on these specific grounds, it does not serve my purpose at all. I want a repentant clean heart, a change of heart, and I miss any repentance, any change of heart and the hand of fellowship which I had thought was extended at the time of the Amritsar Congress—and that is my reason for having then suggested co-operation with Government, but having found out afterwards that there was no redress of the khilafat and the Punjab wrongs, the painful revelation has dawned on me that the British ministers or the Government of India never meant well by the people of India. Instead of repentance, a challenge is given to India, that if you want to be ruled by British, the price is terrorism. Therefore I want to make this party of terrorists, a present of these law-courts, a present of the education of my children if I cannot bring them into national schools.

But I certainly decline to wait for establishment of these schools. Necessity is the mother of invention. When there are children without schools, I promise that our revered leader Pandit Malaviya will himself go from place to place and collect subscriptions for opening national schools. I do not want to starve the Indian mind. I want every Indian to be educated along proper lines, educated to understand the dignity of his nation and not receive the education that makes him a slave.

There are many other points but I would reiterate two things. The public will not understand our fine distinctions. It will mean that non-co-operation must commence at the top, viz, in a body miscalled representative body, namely the reformed council and, if the best mind of the country refuses to associate with that Government, I promise that that Government’s eyes will be opened. The condition is that those who refrain will not go to sleep, but move from one end of the country to the other and bring every grievance to the notice not of Government but of the public and, if my programme is carried out, the Congress will be going on growing from year to year and give public expression to those grievances, so that the volume of wrong, ever increasing as it rolls, will inflame the great nation and enable the nation to harbour, to conserve all its anger and its heat and transmute it into irresistible energy.

Please recognize one fundamental settled fact, that the Muslim League has passed a resolution that they are going to boycott councils entirely. Do you believe that one fourth of our body may pull one way and three fourths in another way? If these were running along parallel lines I can understand it, but here they will be pulling in opposite ways and is it right they should do so? Can Hindus gain anything even by a policy of obstruction, if every believer in Islam boycotts the council, as he could boycott sin? That is the religious position in Islam. They consider it is sinful for them to go to the councils and take the oath of allegiance. Let not practical India and practical politicians who gather here from year to year forget this settled fact. If they believe that they will be able to change the Mussulman mind and that those resolutions of the Mussulmans are pious wishes then certainly the argument that I have now advanced falls to pieces. But if you believe that Mussulmans are in earnest, that they feel the wrong, and as time goes on, the wrong instead of dying out, and being forgotten, will gather force day after day, then you will understand that as time goes forward, the energy of Mussulmans will increase, whether Hindus help them or do not help them. That is the choice that lies before the whole of this national assembly. I, therefore respectfully submit to you that I have not embarked upon this thing without careful thought and it is not a matter of pleasure or joy to me to put myself, a humble, single individual, always liable to err, against the best leaders of the country. But here it is a matter of duty. Whereas I see clearly before me that if we want to cement the relations between Hindus and Mussulmans, and we want them to endure for ever, there is no escape for us but a complete association with them, so long as they remain on the right path and adopt honourable means and do not over-reach themselves in forming their demands and so long as they do not resort to violence.

There are many other things which have been said and to which I might have given a reply. But I have tried your patience unduly. My business is finished when I have placed every argument in a dispassionate manner and not as an advocate, but if it is at all possible for me to speak as a judge, and I assure you I have endeavoured to place the whole argument pure and simple as a judge, I owe a great deal to Pandit Malaviya. The relations that subsist between him and me the country does not know. I would give life to placate him, to please him and follow him, at a respectful distance. But when it becomes a matter of sacred duty and conviction I hold that I am absolved from any obligation to follow him. I know that he absolves me from any such obligation of following him and if I, who venerate him, adopt a course different from his, you will understand that I am absolutely serious and sincere when I ask everyone in this pandal to use his own individual judgment and not to be carried away in the slightest degree by my personality. Finally, if you pass this resolution, you will do so with your eyes open. If you think everyone of you individually has the capacity and willingness to offer this small measure of sacrifice in the name of the nation, for the name of the nation and for the sake of securing lasting friendship with Mussulmans you will not hesitate to adopt the resolution, but if you cannot satisfy these conditions you will not hesitate to reject this resolution. (Cheers).

149. INTERVIEW ON INDIANS ABROAD

[September 9, 1920]

Mr. Gandhi, interviewed on questions of Indians abroad, made a definite statement of his views. He said the despatch of the Government of Fiji was one-sided and meant to whitewash official crime. He disapproved the idea of sending out a commission to Fiji to see labour conditions unless the commission is armed with power to investigate the causes of the unrest. He would oppose any attempt to encourage emigration to Fiji. He would advise Indians in Fiji to return to India.

As regards East Africa, Mr. Gandhi said the Government of that place was prejudiced, pro-white, and anti-Asiatic. The Indians in East Africa were numerous and influential. They must organize themselves. They were powerful enough to resist the influence of the white residents.

Mr. Gandhi was now not in favour of a single Indian labourer going to British Guiana. Being asked as to how he proposed to work for Indians abroad now that he had taken up non-co-operation, he said his faith in British statesmen had been shattered. Till they had obtained complete responsible Government they would bring more prominently than hitherto to the notice of the public in India the grievances of their countrymen abroad, and the volume of indignation of the country would be such that Government cannot resist its pressure and would be compelled to take effective steps, because any wrong brought to their notice would speed the process of non-co-operation and to that extent the process of disintegration of the force of anarchy, injustice, and exploitation which dominated the Government of India and the Imperial Government at the present moment. They would continue to call public meetings and frame protests, but they will all be by way of arming themselves with power that would compel the Government to do its duty.

150. SPEECH AT A.I.C.C. MEETING, CALCUTTA

September 9, 1920

In bringing the meeting to a close Pandit Malaviya said . . . that although he had the greatest regard and affection for Mr. Gandhi, it was his most painful duty to differ from him entirely in regard to the resolution of the Congress on non-co-operation . . . he was therefore determined . . . to pursue a course of action different from that adopted by the Congress . . . to remain in the Congress and at the same time seek election to the Legislative Council.

Mr. Kasturi Ranga Iyengar said that he felt relieved to hear the statement from the Panditji because a number of friends who were standing as candidates and who were also Congressmen had doubts as to whether they should continue to be the members of the Congress seeking elections to the councils . . . Panditji’s example would be a precedent to them and may be acted upon by others who were in similar position with regard to the resolution . . . Members would like to hear Mr. Gandhi’s views on the matter.

Mr. Gandhi said that as he had expressed his opinion in the Press, the Subjects Committee and elsewhere, he would state it again that it was perfectly competent for the minority to continue to be members of the Congress and to be free to act or not to act on the resolution of the Congress according to their convictions and conscience and said that he agreed with Mr. Malaviya in the view he took as regards this matter.

Mrs. Besant observed that as she was totally opposed to non-co-operation, she as a member of the All-India Congress Committee felt she ought not to act in the Committee and she would cease to attend further meetings of the Committee till the next Congress.

1 The words that follow are from The Hindu, 13-9-1920.
Mr. Malaviya, however, said that as an ex-officio member of the Committee, he would continue to attend the meetings of the Committee till he was forced to leave. . . . Mr. Malaviya finally adjured all those present not to take any hasty action.

151. LETTER TO RENUKA MUKERJEE

[After September 9, 1920]

DEAR MISS MUKERJEE,

The only advice I can give you is that you should think fifty times before you take any serious step. You should argue out the position with your parents and convince them or feel stronger in your own conviction. And then you may take the step you may think is best. I am not in love with education in England. I can understand grown-up people with formed ideas going to England to test them. The atmosphere in which education is given there tends to endear our own slavery to us in a most insidious manner. But you may not act upon these ideas unless they are part of your own being. The very fact that you need my advice is a sound reason for your waiting, praying and discussing with those that are near and dear to you.

152. INTERVIEW WITH MOTILAL GHOSE

September 10, 1920

Mahatma Gandhi was accompanied by Babu Giridhari Lal, Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru and Sreemati Saraladevi. After mutual greetings Mahatma Gandhi opened the conversation by inquiring if it were a fact that Babu Motilal had written to the president of the special Congress opposing the boycott of councils.

MOTI BABU: It is not a fact. I only sent a message to the Congress and its Subjects Committee through the president suggesting that the non-co-operation resolution should not be disposed of in a hurry but its consideration should be postponed till the Nagpur Congress was held.

MAHATMA: What is your opinion about the boycott of councils and other items in the resolution passed by the Congress?

I have been a non-co-operationist for the last fifty years. As regards the councils I have always regarded them as a farce, a delusion and a snare. I myself have never sought to enter any of them and have always counselled our public men to do the same. But I must say both this and other items in the resolution affected only an infinitesimally small number of people. It mattered little whether the handful of title-holders give up their titles or not or the few men, who go to the council, do or do not go. The all-important question is how to rouse the masses. You must raise a cry which the masses will understand.

Will you kindly be a little more explicit?

I shall explain my position by citing two instances. You have no doubt heard of the great combination of the indigo raiyats of Bengal in 1866 to expel the planters from this province?

Oh yes.

Do you know how this was effected, the unity of six millions of people in the course of six months which has no parallel in the history of any country in the world? It was only by raising a cry of a great wrong felt keenly by all the raiyats equally and which went straight into the heart of every one of them as soon as it was raised.

Yes, I have heard of it.

It happened in this wise. The raiyats were groaning under the oppression of the planters. They came to see that their deliverance lay in not sowing indigo. So a

---

1 Editor, Amrita Bazar Patrika, Calcutta
2 Lala Girdhari Lal; deputy chairman, Punjab Chamber of Commerce; managing director, Amritsar Flour and General Mills few intelligent among them took a vow in some sacred place that they would have nothing to do with indigo-sowing. They then persuaded others to take the same vow. The cry was “no raiyat should touch the indigo even if he was tortured to death”. And though they were tortured in a most brutal way by the planters they did not yield. When the planters failed, the authorities interfered and coerced them both by threats and entreaties. They remained as firm as the rock. “Saheb, you say you will put us in jail. Do it, but this hand shall never again touch indigo.” “Sow it for this season only and you will be free to do what you like afterwards.” “Saheb, we have taken the vow in the name of God. We can never break it.”—that was the bold and spirited reply of the downtrodden and illiterate raiyats.

Moti Babu next referred to the cry of “land” by Ireland to bring about unity among Irishmen. He said, “You know the Irish leaders failed to rouse the Irish masses till Parnell raised the cry of ‘land’ which affected every Irishman. The Irish understood it because it was a common grievance. And the Land League was the result which formed the nucleus for Irish nationality.”

Moti Babu addressing the Mahatma said : “Dear friend, you should think of a common cry for the masses which will appeal to their heart directly. It seems to me that there are two things which sit like a dread nightmare on the breast of both the masses and the educated class. One is the police zulum\(^1\) and the other is the pitiless character of the criminal administration. Can’t these go to make a common cry?” Mahatma Gandhi said that he would think over the matter.

Mahatma Gandhi next gave his view on the boycott of councils. He said that councils demoralized most of those who went there. These our representative men can do greater service outside the council than inside it. Moti Babu agreed.

Next came the question of boycotting British courts. Mahatma Gandhi said, that the courts, as much as the councils are the great instrument to keep our people under moral and intellectual domination. We must get rid of these evils.

Moti Babu replied that he agreed with him but the evil must be struck at very root. The vast majority of the lawyers won’t give up their practice which enables them to keep motor cars, etc., and indulge in other luxuries. You must go to the people and advise them to stop litigation. Mahatma Gandhi replied that he knew of many lawyers who were prepared to give up their practice. Moti Babu said it was very hard for him to believe that story. However, if there be some willing to do it, the great majority will not. We are to stop the evil at the very source.

In regard to the question of the withdrawal of children from schools Mahatma Gandhi said that the boys get their mentality in the school. On being pressed to say what the boys would do if they were withdrawn from schools Mahatma Gandhi said that if the boys were withdrawn new schools would be started. So long as our boys, who are the makers of the future of the country, continue to be intellectually fed in the present-day schools there is little hope for the country.

Babu Motilal replied that as the existing schools and colleges are maintained by our money and not by money brought from England he did not see why should not our boys avail themselves of the education imparted in those institutions till we have got our national educational institutions established. Of course we must be on our guard that our boys are not in any way demoralized in the Government schools and colleges.

The last question discussed was the deletion of that part of Babu Bipin Chandra Pal’s amendment which contemplated the raising of a fund in the name of Lokamanya Tilak. Babu Motilal regretted that this should have been dropped and was not added to Mr. Gandhi’s resolution. The first thing we want now is propaganda not only in this country but also in England and America. We also need funds for starting national schools and colleges and establish arbitration courts. Babu Motilal appealed to the Mahatma to start such a fund at the Nagpur Congress.

The interview ended by Moti Babu’s warmly embracing Mahatma Gandhi and giving him his blessings.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 17-9-1920

153. THE CONGRESS

Never has the Congress been called upon to decide an issue so momentous as the one it was called upon to decide at its special session presided over by Lala Lajpatrai. Never perhaps has the Congress witnessed such determined opposition as was offered to the non-co-operation resolution. And yet never, within my experience, has a decisive majority listened with such respect and attention to the opposition argument as it did at the last session. Again never has there been such united opposition shown to a Subjects Committee resolution by the noted leaders of the people.

Mrs. Besant has a fine record of service to India. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviyaji is a name to conjure with. He has to his credit an unbroken record of many years’ brilliant service to the country and an unblemished character. Mr. Das leads a party ever growing in influence and strength. I felt the late Lokmanya Bal Gangadhar Tilak’s absence most keenly at such a juncture. Mr. Baptista led the Deccan. Mr. Kasturi Ranga Iyengar, the talented editor of The Hindu, led the Madras Nationalist Party. All these and many other leaders strenuously opposed the non-co-operation resolution. I warned that great audience against accepting my proposal unless they were prepared to suffer and were convinced that true non-co-operation was possible only through the programme submitted by me. But the audience wanted action, wanted suffering. The voting was elaborately registered. The Congress pandal was cleared for the purpose of evoting. Lala Lajpatrai personally superin-tended the operation. It lasted for six hours. All the provinces but the Central Provinces and the Berar voted in favour of my resolution. The Central Provinces gave for my proposition 30 votes as against 33 for Babu Bipin Chandra Pal’s. I give the figures below:

My resolution adopted the principle of the whole of the khilafat programme, even non-payment of taxes, and advised for immediate adop-tion, boycott of titles and honorary offices, law-courts by litigants, scho-ols and colleges and reformed councils. Babu Bipin Chandra Pal proposed a mission to England to present our demands and meanwhile to establish national schools, formulate arbitration courts and not to boycott the councils. His resolution would have meant in effect seeking election to the councils and these probably adopting obstructive tactics. This meant a virtual postponement of the real struggle to the next general election. The opposition therefore chiefly centred on the boycott of councils. And the Congress has decided by an overwhelming majority that the councils must be abandoned. I hope that those who do not believe that boycot of councils would postpone the attainment of swarajya (let alone hastening it) will work with all their might to advance the purpose of the Congress.

An analysis of the votes shows that the country wants non-co-operation. Mrs. Besant who consistently, fearlessly and frankly opposed it had very few adherents. I do not propose to examine the merits of the case at the present moment. My argument is before the country in favour of boycott of councils, schools and courts. Nothing I heard on the Congress platform has shaken my belief in the necessity or the efficacy of these steps. But I would respectfully address a few words to the majority and to the minority.

To the majority I would say: The hour of the greatest triumph is the hour of the greatest humility. The majority has taken upon its shoulders a tremendous responsibility. Every individual voter in favour of my proposal has certainly bound himself, if he is a parent, to withdraw his children from schools or colleges subject in any way to Government control. Every voter being a lawyer is bound at the earliest opportunity to suspend his practice and promote the cause of settlement of disputes by private arbitration. Every candidate for the councils, who has voted with the majority, has undertaken to withdraw his candidature, every such voter to refrain from voting at the elections. Every delegate voting with the majority has bound himself to stimulate hand-spinning and hand-weaving and in his own person to use only hand-spun and hand-woven cloth. Everyone of the majority having accepted the principle of non-violence, self-sacrifice and discipline in regard to non-co-operation is bound to treat the minority with respect and fairness. We may not use physical or wordy violence against them. We must endeavour by our intensive practice and by scrupulously honourable methods to convert it to our views. Those who voted with the minority were either weak or not ready. Some few doubted the rightness of withdrawing children from schools for instance. But when they see schools being emptied, national schools springing into being, lawyers suspending practice and yet not starving, and the councils deserted at least by the best of nationalists, they will soon begin to believe in the programme, lose their weakness and be themselves ready to adopt it. We need not therefore be impatient with the minority because it does not see eye to eye with us.

To the minority I would say, they have lost in a fair fight. Unless now therefore it is a matter of conscience with them, they must come forward to prosecute the programme of non-co-operation in a most vigorous manner. Those who think that majority has grievously erred are no doubt entitled to carry on a campaign of conversion of the majority to their views. By far the largest number in the minority however have accepted the principle of establishment of private arbitration courts and national schools. They wanted only a postponement of the consideration of the boycott of councils. I venture to suggest to them that minority should accept the verdict and help to make the programme a success.

Boycott of foreign goods finds a place in my resolution. I am sorry for it. I may not state how it came to find a place there. But as it did not conflict with my conscience, and in order to show my reasonableness, I undertook to move a resolution whose musical harmony was marred by a false note. Boycott of foreign cloth is included in swadeshi. Boycott of all other foreign goods is a senseless proposition if only because it is a virtual impossibility. But if the introduction of the addendum stimulates us to sacrifice our luxuries and superfluities, it would have served a good purpose. It is certainly our right and duty to discard everything foreign that is superfluous and even everything foreign that is necessary if we can produce or manufacture it in our country.

154. A FOREWORD

[About September 15, 1920]

It is not [an] easy thing for me to write a foreword to a life-sketch of Mr. Andrews between whom and me there exists a tie closer than between blood-brothers. But if I may say without presumptions, I would like to note down my conviction that there does not exist in India a more truthful, more humble and more devoted servant of hers than C. F. Andrews. May the lesson of his life prove to the youth of India an encouragement for greater devotion to the motherland.

155. LETTER TO N. C. SINHA

BOLPUR,
[Before September 17, 1920]

DEAR MR. SINHA,

I am glad you have written about the lawyers. We shall never fight our way to swaraj without taking any risks and without causing some disturbance in the ordinary life. I agree with you that we lawyers have been the bete noir of the magistracy, but that was when in their opinion, we caused the greatest trouble. But you will see that when we ourselves abandon the courts, the process will not be relished by the bureaucracy. What does it matter if temporarily the Santhal Parganas and such other districts are deprived of the assistance the lawyers have only just begun to render to them, and I can conceive hundreds of ways of helping them without pleading their cause before biased or ignorant magistrates. The lawyers today lead public opinion, and conduct all political activity. This they do during the few leisure hours they get from their tennis and billiards. I do not expect that by dividing their leisure hours between billiards and politics, lawyers will bring us substantially near swaraj. I want at least the public workers among them to be whole-timers, and when that happy day comes, I promise a different outlook before the country.

Yours sincerely,

157. SPEECH TO INMATES OF SHANTINIKETAN

September 17, 1920

SISTERS AND BROTHERS,

The happiness I have found in your company these few days is beyond words. I came here to improve my broken health and you will be glad to know that I shall be returning from here, though not altogether restored to health, much improved.

It is a painful thought to me that I cannot speak to you in Bengali. Though my hope to be able, one day, to talk with you in Bengali may be a forlorn one, I think I am not unjustified in hoping that you will come to understand my Hindustani. Your education will be incomplete till Hindustani has become a compulsory subject in your school and you pick up the language. There is another thing, moreover, which I should not like to keep back from you and that is that I want to see your school, by and by, become a beautiful hive swarming with most industrious bees. The life we live will not be a real life until a beautiful harmony between our hearts and hands has been established.

I think the meaning of the work in which I am at present absorbed can be explained even to young children, though, of course, what I am going to say is not meant for them alone. I have kept back nothing from my own children or, in South Africa, from children whom I regarded as my own.

For me, personally, there is only one religion and that is Hinduism. I take pride in calling myself a Hindu, but I am no dogmatic, ritual-bound Hindu. As I understand Hinduism, it is an extremely comprehensive faith. It has tolerance and respect for other faiths. That is why you see me engaged in defending Islam with the same energy and passion with which I would defend my faith. Defending Islam is a great happiness to me since I feel that in the process I am acquiring fitness to defend my religion. The European Powers, which rely on brute force, pose a threat to Hinduism as much as they do to Islam. Today, it is Islam’s turn, tomorrow it may be that of Hinduism. I think the threat to Hinduism has been there, a very subtle threat, ever since British power was established in this land. I have seen that Western influences have shaken the very foundations of our thinking. Western civilization is the work of Satan. For many years now, we have been under a strange spell.

My eyes really opened only last year. When the Allies declared war, it was ostensibly for the defence of weak nations but under cover of this aim they practised no end of scheming. Even then, at the last Congress at Amritsar, I pleaded earnestly and sincerely with the country to extend co-operation to the Government, for till then it was my faith that the British people would feel penitent for their misdeeds and that the British [Prime] Minister would honour his promises. But the closing of the Punjab chapter and the announcement of Peace Terms with Turkey destroyed all my faith. I came to the conclusion that every man is faced, once in his life, with a choice between God and Satan. From my experience of co-operation with the British Government for these many years, I have seen that association with the British rulers has a demoralizing effect. I am convinced that until India realizes her mission and the whole nation is awakened to a consciousness of their equality with the British, the continuation of the British connection will only mean our continued degradation. I also saw that unity with the Muslims was of far greater value than keeping up the British connection. This unity would be difficult to maintain if we did not help them in their hour of need. Moreover, with one-fourth of the body politic suffering from paralysis, development of the spirit of patriotism among us would be impossible.

Hence, I cultivated friendship with Shaukat Ali and became a brother to him. My association with him is a source of joy and pride to me. We have differences on some matters. I believe in the principle of non-violence. He seems to believe in violence. He believes that in certain circumstances a man may be another’s enemy and that killing one’s enemy is justified. If, nonetheless, I continue to work with him, the reason is that I have seen in him some qualities of sterling worth. He is a man of his word, is a perfectly loyal friend and is extraordinarily brave. He has great faith in God. I immediately saw that only a devoted man could have all these qualities and I sought association with him, attracted only by his devoutness. I have, besides, always trusted that my success in employing non-violence will convince him of its beauty.

No other English term can express all the meanings of ahimsa which the word innocence expresses. Hence ahimsa and innocence may be re-garded as equivalents. It is my faith that everything will be well with the man who follows the path of non-violence. The weapons at the disposal of the votary of non-violence are much more potent than those available to the votary of violence. I may describe organized violence as a barbar-ous thing. It is most certainly beastly. Only a perfect practitioner of non-violence can display perfect courage. Even one man ready to live a life of non-violence to perfection will be able to subdue the entire world. Let me say, in all humility, that, if I have, with this broken body of mine, some little strength to conduct a struggle of such great magnitude, it is because of my practice of non-violence. If the Hindus understand their religion and follow it, they are bound to produce an impact on the world. The day on which India accords primacy to violence, my life will have been emptied of its meaning.

But my faith remains unshaken. And you, children of Hindu parents, if you understand your duty as Hindus, you will never co-operate with the unjust and the wicked. The immortal verses of Tulsidas in which he advises against association with the wicked are beautiful beyond comparison. For India to hope for any good from British rule as it is today is like trying to hug empty space. I, for one, have offered my closest co-operation to this Government for a number of years and, at the end of it all, I had some bitter experiences. It is owing to them that I have undertaken this terrible, but noble and glorious fight and have been trying to induce you all to join it. In this holy temple, I only ask you to pray that, in my struggle for spiritual growth, God may grant me good health and wisdom and for ever keep me from error and cowaridice.

158. Pure Swadeshi

I grow more convinced every day that swadeshi can mean only one thing. I have declared open swadeshi stores and formulated vows of swadeshi; this may have served some purpose and developed the spirit of swadeshi, but I do not think India has gained any economic benefits thereby. The swadeshi movement has benefited to the extent that hand-woven cloth has been produced out of hand-spun yarn and that such cloth has been popularized.

The mills need no incentives. They are able to market all their production. They are hardly in a position to spin the yarn they need. In this situation, producing hand-woven cloth with mill yarn is of no benefit to the country; on the contrary, it increases the burden on the poor. One disadvantage of doing so is that it will increase the price of yarn and cloth and the other is that, whereas now the poor content themselves with wearing cloth produced by our mills, they will by and by start wearing foreign cloth. The latter will prove more harmful, for once the poor have fallen into the habit of using foreign cloth it will be difficult to bring them back to the use of swadeshi cloth. Hence I put down here some rules and principles of the swadeshi movement:

1. Only hand-spun yarn and hand-woven cloth should be used.
2. The utmost efforts should be made to promote the spinning and weaving of such yarn.
3. All possible improvements should be effected in the spining-wheel and the handloom.
4. We should find out where hand-spinning and hand-weaving are carried on.
5. At present, the main variety of cloth so produced is khadi. We should work to popularize it.
6. Steps should be taken to promote love of simplicity among the people.
7. Stores should be opened for selling hand-spun yarn and hand-woven cloth made from such yarn.

In the course of my tours, I have been observing that swadeshi of this type is being quietly but steadily propagated in many places. In a village in Madras Province, Shri Hanumant Rao of the Servants of India Society has been working very hard with the help of friends. A widow is helping him with money and also by working herself. His own wife, too, has joined in the effort. There is a technical school in Masulipattam, where also work is going on. I saw some yarn, very much finer and of better texture than what we get in Gujarat. This fine yarn was spun by some rich women for the love of the thing. I saw some dhotis, too, made of such yarn. The people also succeed well in dyeing clothes with swadeshi material. Thus, in some isolated spots, even without capital the enterprise is making progress.

To open a khadi store requires hardly five hundred rupees. It can be managed by one person provided he is hard-working. He may have a small shop, just large enough to hold what he can afford to stock. Till he has acquired enough custom for khadi, he should go round hawking. In this way, with a small capital a large number of people can subsist and pure swadeshi will be popularized. The main purpose of this article, however, is to warn those who take the vow of wearing [Indian] mill cloth and those who open stores for such cloth. It may not be necessary to close down all the stores which exist, but their owners should gradually stock them with khadi. They may, if they wish, invest money in other swadeshi goods besides cloth but it is clear that the country will not profit at all by their storing mill-made cloth or cloth woven by hand from mill yarn.

159. NOTES

Theft on Railways

I have been receiving complaints from many poor people that the goods they send by railway are stolen in transit. A person sends yarn and it is stolen. There is no end to the pilfering of fruits. Who is to blame for this? Certainly not the Government. We have no regard for honesty, no contempt for dishonesty. I do not know how much Navajivan is read among railway servants. I would, however, request those who read it to see that others read this article. Railway servants should realize that they are the servants of the public. They must not steal. If they are not paid enough for their living, they should try for an increase in pay, but on no account should they steal.

Railway workers have formed their own unions. I put it to their leaders that it is as much their duty to bring about internal reform as to secure rights in regard to their wages. If we merely insist on our rights and fail in our duties, we shall lose whatever rights we secure.
No very profound principle of honesty is involved in this. If we do not display even practical honesty, public administration just cannot be carried on. I place a simple idea before the railway workers: “You, too, take interest in the national movement; you, too, raise your voice against the injustice of British rule. But how are people to protest against the injustice you do by stealing? Has an unjust man any right to demand justice? To the extent you are dishonest, you strengthen British rule, for people will lose faith in you. You will make them say, by your behaviour, that British administration is better, such as it is.” So long as a subject people do not make themselves better than their rulers in point of moral strength, they cannot shake off subjection. Therefore, if the railway workers wish well both of themselves and the people, they must resolve to shake off this immoral practice of stealing.

SABARMATI,
September 20 [1920]

DEAR MR. TEMBE,

I have your letter. The portion sent by you has been reproduced in Marathi also. It certainly substantially expresses my views in the matter. The paragraph however has been torn from its context. I was speaking to a meeting\(^1\) largely composed of Brahmin students. If the Brahmans and the non-Brahmins are prevented from coming to blows only by Government intervention, is it not time to yield everything to the non-Brahmins and end the quarrel? I fear that the parallel is exact, but my speech was certainly not designed for exploitation by non-Brahmins of resentment by Brahmans. What will you have me do in order to prevent an illegitimate use being made of the extract? That the non-Brahmins are pro-Government and anti-Congress does not really matter. They deserve to be justly treated in spite of it, and before they are able to extort justice by force. All

SATYAGRAHA ASHRAM,

September 21 [1920]

DEAR MR. KELKAR,

May I thank you for the splendid response the nationalists of Maharashtra are making to the Congress resolution. I am sure that your great resolve brings swarajya nearer and if Maharashtra will enthusiastically take up all the items outlined in the n.c.o, the rest of India will follow. And if she does, swaraj within a year is not unlikely to be a reality. I have sent you a further amendment of the 1st article of the Congress constitution which I hope you have received. I would very much like to see our draft in print if it is possible even before the All-India Committee meets. If you think that any minor details are left out they can be incorporated when the Committee consider the draft. If you generally approve of the draft and the report will you please telegraph?

Yours sincerely,

164. SWARAJ IN ONE YEAR

Much laughter has been indulged in at my expense for having told the Congress audience at Calcutta that if there was sufficient response to my programme of non-co-operation, swaraj would be attained in one year. Some have ignored my condition and laughed because of the impossibility of getting swaraj anyhow within one year. Others have spelt the “if” in capitals and suggested that if “ifs” were permissible in argument, any absurdity could be proved to be a possibility. My proposition however is based on a mathematical calculation. And I venture to say that true swaraj is a practical

1 This was in reply to Shaukat Ali’s telegram of September 21, 1920, from Bombay regarding the trial of the editor of Zamindar. It read: “Khilafat Lahore wires trial begins today, Section 124-A 153-A Special Magistrate Maulana cheerful offence Hazro speeches. impossibility without due fulfilment of my conditions. Swaraj means a state such that we can maintain our separate existence without the presence of the English. If it is to be partnership, it must be a partnership at will. There can be no swaraj without our feeling and being the equals of Englishmen. Today we feel that we are dependent upon them for our internal and external security, for an armed peace between the Hindus and the Mussulmans, for our education and for the supply of daily wants, nay, even for the settlement of our religious squabbles. The rajas are dependent upon the British for their powers and the millionaires for their millions. The British know our helplessness and Sir Thomas Holland cracks jokes quite legitimately at the expense of non-co-operationists. To get swaraj then is to get rid of our helplessness. The problem is no doubt stupendous even as it is for the fabled lion who having been brought up in the company of goats found it impossible to feel that he was a lion. As Tolstoy used to put it, mankind often laboured under hypnotism. The British themselves cannot be expected to help us out of it. On the contrary, they din into our ears that we shall be fit to govern ourselves only by slow educative processes. The Times suggested that if we boycott the councils we shall lose the opportunity of a training in swaraj. I have no doubt that there are many who believe what the Times says. It even resorts to a falsehood. It audaciously says that Lord Milner’s mission listened to the Egyptians only when they were ready to lift the boycott of the Egyptian council. For me the only training in swaraj we need is the ability to defend ourselves against the whole world and to live our natural life in perfect freedom even though it may be full of defects. Good government is no substitute for self-government. The Afghans have a bad Government but it is self-Government. I envy them. The Japanese learnt the art through a sea of blood. And if we today had the power to drive out the English by superior brute force, we would be counted their superiors, and in spite of our inexperience in debating at the council table or in holding executive offices, we would be held fit to govern ourselves. For brute force is the only test the West has hitherto recognized. The Germans were defeated not because they were necessarily in the wrong, but because the allied Powers were found to possess greater brute strength. In the end therefore India must either learn the art of war which the British will not teach her or, she must follow her own way of discipline and self-sacrifice through non-co-operation. It is as amazing as it is humiliating that less than one hundred thousand white men should be able to rule three hundred and fifteen million Indians. They do so somewhat undoubtedly by force but more by securing our co-operation in a thousand ways and making us more and more helpless and dependent on them as time goes forward. Let us not mistake reformed councils, mere law-courts and even governorships for real freedom or power. They are but subtler methods of emasculation. The British cannot rule us by mere force. And so they resort to all means, honourable and dishonourable, in order to retain their hold on India. They want India’s billions and they want India’s manpower for their imperialistic greed. If we refuse to supply them with men and money, we achieve our goal, namely, swaraj, equality, manliness.

The cup of our humiliation was filled during the closing scenes in the Viceregal council. Mr. Shastri could not move his resolution on the Punjab. The Indian victims of Jallianwala [Bagh] received Rs. 1250, the English victims of mob-frenzy received lakhs. The officials who were guilty of crimes against those whose servants they were, were reprimanded. And the councillors were satisfied. If India were powerful, India would not have stood this addition of insult to her injury.

I do not blame the British. If we were weak in numbers as they are, we too would perhaps have resorted to the same methods as they are now employing. Terrorism and deception are weapons not of the strong but of the weak. The British are weak in numbers, we are weak in spite of our numbers. The result is that each is dragging the other down. It is common experience that Englishmen lose in character after residence in India and that Indians lose in courage and manliness by contact with Englishmen. This process of weakening is good neither for us, two nations, nor for the world.

But if we Indians take care of ourselves the English and the rest of the world would take care of themselves. Our contribution to the world’s progress must therefore consist in setting our own house in order.

Training in arms for the present is out of the question. I go a step further and believe that India has a better mission for the world. It is within her power to show that she can achieve her destiny by pure self-sacrifice, i.e., self-purification. This can be done only by non-co-operation. And non-co-operation is possible only when those who commenced to co-operate begin the process of withdrawal. If we can but free ourselves from the threefold maya of Government-controlled schools, Government law-courts and legislative councils, and truly control our own education, regulate our disputes and be indifferent to their legislation, we are ready to govern ourselves and we are only then ready to ask the Government servants, whether civil or military, to resign and the tax-payers to suspend payment of taxes.

And is it such an impracticable proposition to expect parents to withdraw their children from schools and colleges and establish their own institutions or to ask lawyers to suspend their practice and devote their whole time and attention to national service against payment, where necessary, of their maintenance, or to ask candidates for councils not to enter councils and lend their passive or active assistance to the legislative machinery through which all control is exercised? The movement of non-co-operation is nothing but an attempt to isolate the brute force of the British from all the trappings under which it is hidden and to show that brute force by itself cannot for one single moment hold India.

But I frankly confess that, until the three conditions mentioned by me are fulfilled, there is no swaraj. We may not go on taking our college degrees, taking thousands of rupees monthly from clients for cases which can be finished in five minutes and taking the keenest delight in wasting national time on the council floor and still expect to gain national self-respect.

The last though not the least important part of the maya still remains to be considered. That is swadeshi. Had we not abandoned swadeshi, we need not have been in the present fallen state. If we would get rid of the economic slavery, we must manufacture our own cloth and at the present moment only by hand-spinning and hand-weaving.

All this means discipline, self-denial, self-sacrifice, organizing ability, confidence and courage. If we show this in one year among the classes that today count, and make public opinion, we certainly gain swaraj within one year. If I am told that even we who lead have not the qualities in us, there certainly will never be swaraj for India, but then we shall have no right to blame the English for what they are doing. Our salvation and its time are solely dependent upon us.

1 A Vedantic concept, seeking to explain phenomenal existence describing it as illusion
I promised in my article on “Democracy versus Mobocracy”¹ to give some illustrations of my meaning out of my own experiences. I was however unable, owing to the protracted Congress proceedings, to give those illustrations last week. I do so now. When we reached Madras, a huge crowd waited us at the station. Our compartment was detached and fortunately drawn up in front of a reserved platform. What would have happened, if we had to alight together with the other passengers can be better imagined than described. But even on the reserved platform we were not able to get out for some time. The volunteers were in the way. Instead of dispersing themselves among the crowd and keeping it back, they clustered together to do us honour as they thought. The result was that the pressure was all directed towards where they and we were standing. And “form a ring” has become the usual word of command. This forming a ring is a humiliating spectacle and yet it has become such an institution that even when there is no one else but volunteers, “a ring” is formed round the leader to be “honoured”.

To proceed with my description, the crowd was large, the noises they made were so terrific that the directions given by the volunteers could not be heard at all. All was chaos. My poor toes were every moment in danger of being crushed to a pulp. I often very nearly lost my balance through the jostling of the very volunteers who were trying to protect me. And but for the very great care with which they guarded me and the assistance rendered to them by the stalwart Maulana Shaukat Ali, I would have fared much worse than I did. The atmosphere was suffocating. Thus struggling it took us nearly three quarters of an hour to reach the motor car, whereas ordinarily it need not have taken three minutes to walk out of the station to the porch. Having reached the car it was no easy job to get into it. I had to be shoved into it in the best manner possible. I certainly heaved a sigh of relief when I found myself in the car, and I thought that both the Maulana and I deserved the ovation we received from the crowd after the dangerous exercise we had gone through. With a little forethought this mobocracy, for such it was, could have been changed into a splendidly organized and educative demonstration. And it could have been rendered free of all risk to life. The experience of Madras was typical of many. We had an extraordinary experience at Erode on our way to Salem. I was fairly fagged out. My voice had become hoarse with speaking. As at many stations there was here too a surging crowd.

It was thoroughly disorganized, though like everywhere else perfectly good humoured and respectful. I appealed to them not to make all kinds of unmusical noises, told them to disperse in an orderly manner as they had already seen us. I told them too that if they intended to take their share in the khilafat and the Punjab struggle, they were expected to undergo discipline. I was able to reach my voice to the most intelligent amongst them. I suggested that they should quietly rise, turn towards the station entrance and noiselessly retire. They listened, the rest followed and the station was cleared in two minutes’ time. If the friends, who heard me, had haggled, argued, objected and insisted on shouting and remaining, the whole crowd would have done likewise and there would have been a pandemonium throughout the long time that the train stopped there.

I shall finish this description by giving the reverse of our experience at Jalarpet. We were travelling to Madras by the night train leaving Bangalore. We had been taking meetings at Salem during the day, motoring to Bangalore, a distance of 125 miles from Salem, taking there a meeting in drenching rain and thereafter we had to entain. We needed night’s rest but there was none to be had. At almost every station of importance, large crowds had gathered to greet us. About midnight we reached Jalarpet junction. The train had to stop there nearly forty minutes or stopped that night all those terrible minutes. Maulana Shaukat Ali requested the crowd to disperse. But the more he argued, the more they shouted “Maulana Shaukat Ali ki Jai”, evidently thinking that the Maulana could not mean what he said. They had come from twenty miles’ distance, they were waiting there for hours, they must have their satisfaction. The Maulana gave up the struggle, he pretended to sleep. The adorers thereuponmounted the footboards to have a peep at the Maulana. As the light in our compartment was put out they brought in lanterns. At last I thought I would try. I rose, went to the door. It was a signal for a great shout of joy. The noise tore me to pieces. I was so tired. All my appeals proved fruitless in the end. They would stop for a while to renew the noise again. I shut the windows. But the crowd was not to be baffled. They tried to open the windows from outside. They must see us both. And so the tussle went on till my son took it up. He harangued them, appealed to them for the sake of the other passengers. He produced some effect and there was a little less noise. Peeping however went on to the last minute. It was all well-meant, it was all an exhibition of boundless love, yet how cruel, how unreasonable! It was a mob without a mind. There were no intelligent men of influence among them and so nobody listened to anybody.

Before we can make real headway, we must train these masses of men who have a heart of gold, who feel for the country, who want to be taught and led. But a few intelligent, sincere, local workers are needed, and the whole nation can be organized to act intelligently, and democracy can be evolved out of mobocracy. This evolution is really the first step to successful, national non-co-operation.

166. SWADESHI STORES

In a previous issue¹ I endeavoured to show how stores for the sake of selling mill-manufactures did not advance swadeshi in any way whatsoever, but on the contrary tended to send up the price of cloth. I propose to show in this article how with a small capital, it is possible to advance true swadeshi and earn a modest livelihood.

Suppose that there is a family consisting of husband, wife and two children one of whom is ten years old and the other five. If they have a capital of Rs. 500, they can manage a khaddar *bhandar*² in a small way. They can hire, say in a place with a population of 20,000 inhabitants, a shop with dwelling rooms for Rs. 10 per month. If they sell the whole of the stock at 10 per cent profit they can have Rs. 50 per month. They have no servants. The wife and the children in their spare time would be expected to help in keeping the shop tidy and looking after it when the husband is out. The wife and children can also devote their spare time to spinning.

In the initial stages the khaddar may not sell at the shop. In that case the husband is expected to hawk the khaddar from door to door and popularize it. He will soon find a custom for it.

The reader must not be surprised at my suggesting 10 percent profits. The khaddar bhandars are not designed for the poorest. The use of khaddar saves at least half the cost not necessarily because the khaddar is more durable (though that it certainly is) but because its use revolutionizes our tastes. I know what saving of money its use has meant to me. Those who buy khaddar from patriotic motives merely can easily afford to pay 10 percent profits on khaddar. Lastly the popularizing of khaddar means much care, devotion and labour. And the owner of a khaddar bhandar does not buy it at a wholesale shop but he must wander to get the best khaddar, he must meet the local weavers and induce them to weave hand-spun yarn. He must stimulate in his own district hand-spinning among its women. He must come in touch with the carders and get them to card cotton. All this means intelligence, organization and great ability. A man who can exhibit these qualities has a right to take 10 per cent profits. And a swadeshi bhandar conducted on these lines becomes a true centre of swadeshi activity. I commend my remarks to the attention of the managers of swadeshi stores that are already in existence. They may not revolutionize their method at once but I have no doubt that they will advance swadeshi only to the extent that they sell khaddar.

Young India, 22-9-1920

167. THE DISTRESS IN PURI

I invite the attention of the readers to the latest report of the Puri distress.

The response made hitherto has been generous but not enough to cope with the distress in full. Volunteers are becoming scarce owing to the prolongation of the distress. They have to be replaced by paid workers. The committee\(^1\) has been obliged for want of funds to cut down the number relieved and the Government of Bihar and Orissa will not relieve “economic” distress. The committee needs at least Rs. 50,000. I take that the generous readers who see the appeal will not be slow to respond. An eyewitness who chanced to go to Puri from Calcutta told me that he saw a hungry man die in his presence. He had walked to the place where relief was being given. He was too exhausted to live to get relief. Only the other day an Oriya was found in the act of committing suicide because he was unable to bear the pangs of hunger. He was charged with the crime of attempting to commit suicide. The presiding magistrate practically discharged him and gave him Rs. 20 from the poor-box.

\(^1\) The People’s Famine Relief Committee, Puri
What do these incidents teach us? Distress is chronic in the land. We hear something of Puri because there it has become acute. But in India, it must be held to be a crime to spend money on dinner and marriage parties, tamashas and other luxuries so long as millions of people are starving. We would not have a feast in a family if a member was about to die of starvation. If India is one family, we should have the same feeling as we would have in a private family. But whether we connect ourselves generally with every Indian as with a member of our own family or whether we do not, let me hope that everyone will help to relieve the acute distress that is now going on in Puri.

Nor, let me hope, will the death of Mr. Krishnachandra Naik from snake-bite discourage volunteers from offering their assistance. Mr. Naik has died well in dying in harness. Any day such a death is better than a death from disease. In India it is an article of faith even with the most ignorant person that the soul survives the body and weaves for itself a better one or worse according to its karma, death ought not to matter so much as it seems to do. Mr. Naik will return to the earth with a body better equipped for the work before him. And with that faith in us we must refuse to mourn over his death and rejoice that he had the good fortune of meeting his death whilst engaged in relieving distress among fellow-beings.

168. TERRORISM IN FIJI

I had in view all the three alternatives when I gave the answer I did. Let us hope no self-respecting Indian would go to Fiji on the proposed commission to inquire into the prospects of further emigration. An independent commission of our own to inquire into the grievance will be hampered in its progress. How was Mr. Andrews himself treated by some of the white men of Fiji? Pamphlets if we may publish, broadcast in India, we should. But that cannot solve the present troubles of those who are in Fiji who are in prison or being imprisoned. It is clearly a matter of terrorizing the present Indian population into slavish submission to the white exploiters. The esteemed correspondent forgets that these men are cooped up in Fiji. They have no facilities for coming back to India. Let us remember that the white men of Fiji do not want to drive out the Indians from Fiji as they do in South Africa or East Africa. The Fiji whites intend to keep those that are there and want more. It is therefore clearly our first duty to tell all who are weary and heavy laden in Fiji that they are free to return to India and to provide transport, for Mr. Manilal Doctor himself suggested the same remedy. The cables received by me from Fiji have said the same thing. The least we can do is to provide facilities for return.

Young India, 22-9-1920

1 This was in reply to a correspondent’s letter to the editor, Young India, which in part said: “In the interview that you kindly gave me on the 9th September in Calcutta, you told me that you would advise Fiji Indians to return to India even if they had to sell out all their possessions... They have built their houses there. Thousands of them have been born in Fiji... Surely, you will not ask these all to return to India... What shall we do for these fifty thousand Indians... I would suggest three things for favour of consideration: 1. We must make it clear to the public here that the Government of India is going to add insult to injury by sending a commission to Fiji to enquire into the labour condition in Fiji after their refusal to press for an independent enquiry into the Fiji Tragedy. No Indian worth the name should go to Fiji in that commission of the Government of India. 2. We should send a commission of our own to enquire into the causes and consequences of the recent disturbances in Fiji.
169. REPORT ON DRAFT INSTRUCTIONS FOR CONGRESS ORGANIZATIONS

September 22, 1920

Report on draft instructions for Congress organizations and those who approve of the resolutions on non-co-operation of the special Congress Session prepared by the Sub-committee appointed by the All-India Congress Committee.

The Congress has advised:
(a) boycott of titles and honorary offices,
(b) boycott of Government functions such as parties, levees and durbars,
(c) gradual boycott of Government or Government-controlled schools and colleges and establishment of national schools and colleges,
(d) gradual boycott of law-courts by lawyers and litigants and establishment by the aid of such lawyers of private arbitration courts,
(e) boycott of reformed councils by candidates and electors,
(f) boycott of recruiting for soldiers, clerks and labourers for service in Mesopotamia (meaning Turkish dominions) as on the outbreak of the war,
(g) boycott of foreign goods,
(h) promotion of swadeshi by stimulating manufacture and distribution of hand-spun yarn and hand-woven cloth out of such yarn.

The Congress has approved of Mr. Gandhi’s full programme of progressive non-violent non-co-operation but has adopted for immediate use the items above mentioned.

The question is how to enforce these items.

BOYCOTT OF TITLES

This is the most difficult part of the programme. But it is the most necessary part. It is difficult because it applies to those who have not as a body hitherto taken part in active public life and have prized their titles or honours as life itself. It is a necessary item in non-co-operation because even this class must be disillusioned and educated to consider gifts from an unrighteous government as a dishonour to

--

be religiously shunned.

Workers therefore in every town, taluka and district should compile a list of such holders of titles and honorary offices and a small deputation of the leading non-co-operationists should wait upon such holders and with all respect and humility urge upon them the necessity of surrendering their titles and honorary offices for the good of the country. No undue pressure of any kind whatsoever should be exercised. Violence of language should be scrupulously avoided, and lists of those who have not should be furnished to the provincial headquarters for publication. Those who have already surrendered their titles and honorary offices will be expected to induce others to do likewise. Those who hold such titles and offices and who have voted for non-co-operation are naturally expected immediately to surrender their titles and offices, mentioning the purpose, viz, the resolution of the Congress.

Boycott of Schools and Colleges Owned or Controlled by the Government

The step ought really to be the easiest because the parents of children receiving education, as also grown-up boys and girls receiving education have taken keen interest in the politics of the country. And yet this step has been considered by many to be almost impossible of accomplishment because of the rooted bias in favour of these schools and colleges. It must however be clear to anyone who is anxious to attain swaraj within a measurable period that unless we are able to dispense with Government employment which the college degrees promise we cannot reach our goal for generations to come. The only way to become independent of Government employ and to evolve a truly national culture is to create a want for national schools by emptying the present Government schools, which give but an indifferent education, teach us false history and take no note of the national want. We advise gradual withdrawal of boys and girls from schools and colleges, and meanwhile reliance should be placed upon private education and where even that is not available or possible for want of means boys should be apprenticed to patriotic merchants or artisans. Vigorous propaganda should be organized and carried amongst the parents, schoolmasters, and school-boys who are over the age of 18 years. Canvassing should go on for volunteer-teachers, and where parents and schoolmasters of schools other than those under direct Government control agree, those schools should give immediate notice to the Government dispensing with all control or aid by way of inspection or otherwise. They should be conducted as national schools with such modification in the training as local circumstances may require. If men of education take interest in this movement of truly nationalizing our education, local committees of inspection and guidance may be formed ultimately resulting in provincial or district universities. The introduction of the adjective “gradual” in the item regarding schools in the resolution simply means that immediate results are not expected because of the existing infatuation about Government schools. It does not mean that propaganda should be so carried out as to bring about only a gradual withdrawal of boys and girls from schools and colleges. Lists of parents who have withdrawn their children, of boys who have themselves withdrawn and of schoolmasters who have resigned and lists of local schools established as also of volunteer-teachers should be sent to the provincial headquarters and should be published.

BOYCOTT OF LAW-COURTS

The increase of litigation is an acknowledged evil. That litigation keeps pace with the increase of lawyers is also a fairly established fact. That a government wields tremendous powers through its law-courts and its system of punishments is also equally true. When there is a real national awakening amongst the masses it must be reflected in the statistics of crime and civil suits. A nation which has set its heart upon gaining self-determination can have little time for private quarrels civil or criminal and it must be the duty of everyone and specially of those who are versed in law to bring about such a state of things. Moreover, hitherto lawyers have controlled (and that very properly) public agitation in the country. If they do not give their whole time and attention to the immediate establishment of swaraj and devote only a portion of their leisure to public affairs, and assuming that the lawyers remained in charge of public movements the establishment of swaraj must be indefinitely postponed. Therefore it is absolutely necessary for reaching our goal in the immediate future that lawyers should suspend their practice. Those who do so and who require to be supported should be supported by the nation either by utilizing their services for the national schools or in connection with private arbitration or for propaganda work. A deputation such as has been suggested for holders of titles, etc., should also wait upon lawyers and ascertain their wishes. Lists of lawyers in each town or district should be prepared marking out those who may suspend their practice and forwarded to the provincial headquarters for publication.

Lawyers should help in inducing parties not only to refer future disputes to arbitration but also to withdraw cases now pending in the British courts and submit them to the national arbitration courts. District Committees should make lists of lawyers and other prominent citizens commanding public confidence who are to preside over arbitration courts. As there is at present no machinery to enforce the orders of arbitration courts some kind of social boycott should be imposed on parties who fail to carry out such orders.

It has been pointed out that certain lawyers who are ready and willing to suspend their practice immediately are not in a position to do so completely at a moment’s notice as they have already entered into engagements from which as honourable men cannot withdraw without the consent of their clients. In these cases the lawyers will be expected to attend only to such engagements and to make every endeavour to cease to practice completely at the earliest possible date.

COUNCILS

The boycott of councils is of the greatest moment and the greatest concentration of energy. People at large cannot understand the meaning of non-co-operation if the best workers seek election to the councils. The reform act has not been framed so as to grant immediate swaraj. Whenever swaraj comes it will not come as a free will offering from the British people but it will come when the demand becomes irresistible. A force of an irresistible character, we contend, cannot be generated on the floor of the reformed councils. It will have to be generated by an incessant education of the electorate and those who are outside the electoral rolls. Candidates who have already come forward should be approached by deputations requesting them to withdraw their candidature, and electors should be approached to sign the following form:

In view and in virtue of the resolution of the special session of the national Congress and the All-India Moslem League we being voters in the electoral district of . . . for election to the reformed councils hereby place on record our desire that we do not wish to be represented at the Provincial Legislative Council (or the Legislative Assembly or the Council of State) and hereby inform all candidates for election that if they seek election in spite of our wish to the contrary, they will not, represent us. We do not desire to be represented in the reformed councils till justice has been granted in the matters of khilafat and the Punjab and swaraj is established in India.

If more than one half of the number of electors in a particular district can be induced to sign this form we consider that it is impossible for any candidate to persist in his candidature after such an emphatic declaration. Lists of those who have withdrawn their candidature and those who persist should be taken to put the pros and cons before the voters prior to asking them to sign the above-mentioned form which should be translated in the vernacular of the district concerned.

RECRUITING FOR LABOUR, ETC., FOR MESOPOTAMIA

The least that a nation which feels the cruel wrong of the khilafat and the Punjab can do is to refuse to swell the ranks of recruits as sepoys, clerks and labourers for service in Mesopotamia and the other parts of the Turkish Dominions as they existed on the outbreak of the War. Propaganda should be carried by workers among those who are likely to offer themselves for such service placing before them the true situation and then letting them make their choice.

BOYCOTT OF FOREIGN GOODS

This clause was an unfortunate interpolation due to a misapprehension. Every non-co-operator is in duty bound to simplify his or her wants and dispense with all luxuries that are dependent on the use of foreign articles.

SWADESHI

This part of the resolution contains all that is immediately possible in the way of boycott of foreign cloth. The use of foreign cloth whether from Lancashire or Japan or France has taken the bread out of millions of mouths, has all but killed the ancient art of home-spinning which supplemented the resources of millions of agriculturists and constituted a kind of insurance against famine. It has robbed thousands of weavers of an honourable and lucrative occupation. Our mills do not manufacture sufficient for our wants. Any pressure on mill-manufacture by those who are in the habit of using foreign cloths can only result in increasing prices, depriving the poor of the cloth they buy without in any way promoting swadeshi. Resort therefore to hand-spinning and hand-weaving is at the present day a national necessity and before it becomes fairly universal it will require discipline, sacrifice and organizing ability all of which are qualities also required for gaining swaraj. We attach great importance to swadeshi in the form of a revival of hand-spinning and hand-weaving and distribution of cloth so manufactured. Thousands of workers need special training for this work. Ladies of high station should be induced to take up hand-spinning and to use only such cloth as can be woven out of hand-spun yarn. Classes should be formed in every street. Spinning-wheels can be manufactured by any ordinary carpenter if a model is placed before him. Those who are desirous of taking up this branch of work should communicate with the manager of Satyagraha Ashram, Sabarmati, near Ahmedabad.

SWARAJ FUND

It is very necessary that a national fund should be established for the purpose of carrying into effect the Congress resolution. Fund will be required for propaganda work, for encouraging swadeshi for establishing national schools and for supporting lawyers who have suspended their practice and are unable to support themselves. Provincial with the help of district organizations should therefore make every endeavour to collect funds and submit monthly reports of receipts and expenditure.

VOLUNTEER CORPS

Provincial, district and town organizations should form volunteer corps for the purpose of disciplining the people and maintaining order.

Finally we would advise that where there is a sufficient number of workers, a batch should specialize in order to make one particular item successful. Where the workers are not sufficient, precedence should be given to the boycott of councils because results must be shown in this item of non-co-operation before the middle of December next.

BOMBAY,

[Before September 25, 1920]

TO THE PRESIDENT AND SECRETARIES, BRANCH,
HOME RULE LEAGUE

DEAR SIRS,

In accordance with the resolution passed at the general meeting of the All-India Home Rule League at Calcutta, we beg to send the following instructions for carrying out the non-co-operation resolution passed by the special session of the Congress:

All Branches of the All-India Home Rule League are requested in accordance with its object to enforce the non-co-operation resolution of the special session of the Congress in so far as it advises action on the part of the people. And with a view to effective action all the Branches are for the time being requested to concentrate their attention for the next two months principally upon complete boycott of the reformed councils. For that purpose all the Branches are requested to canvass signatures on the following form on the part of the voters:

In view and in virtue of the resolution of the special session of

1 This was in reply to Shaukat Ali’s telegram of September 23, 1920 from Bombay which read: “Punjab khilafat wants your presence urgent Lahore twenty-seventh Zafaralikhan’s trial. Delegates here will join Baroda. If you start Express twenty-fifth evening reaching Lahore twenty-seventh morning wire reply.”
the national Congress and the All-India Moslem League, we, being voters in the electoral district of . . . for election to the reformed councils, hereby place on record our desire that we do not wish to be represented at the Provincial Legislative Council (or the legislative Assembly or the Council of State) and hereby inform all candidates for election that if they seek election in spite of our wish to the contrary, they will not represent us. We do not desire to be represented in the reformed councils till justice has been granted in the matters of the khilafat and the Punjab and swaraj is established in India.

Too much stress cannot be laid on the fact that before the signatures are taken the voters should be made to understand clearly what they are doing. No pressure of any kind should be exercised upon the voters. Candidates too should be requested to withdraw their candidature in obedience to the expressed wish of the voters, wherever more than half the number of voters have signified their wish in writing.

Further instructions as to the other adopted by the Congress for immediate enforcement will be forwarded in due course.

172. LETTER TO EVERY VOTER ON DUTY OF VOTERS

ALL-INDIA HOME RULE LEAGUE, MASJID BUNDER ROAD, MANDVI,
BOMBAY,

[Before September 25, 1920]

The special session of the Congress by an overwhelming majority has decided in favour of complete boycott of the reformed councils. It is therefore your duty not to vote for any candidate for election to the reformed councils. It is however necessary for any candidate who wished to stand in your name to know that you do not wish him or anybody else to represent you. For that purpose you should sign the form that has been prepared for your signature. It is your duty also to tell your co-voters, what they should do.

You know why it is wrong to enter the councils. The Government have declined to grant justice to the Punjab. British ministers have broken their pledged word to the Mussulmans and otherwise ignored the deepest Mussulman sentiments regarding the khilafat.

We must get these wrongs righted and in order to prevent a recurrence of such injustice or bad faith we must obtain full swaraj and must get rid of the badge of inferiority. We cannot do this by going to the councils, nor can we gain swaraj by going there. On the contrary, although our representatives may vote against unjust Government measures they will still be regarded as authors of those measures and thus be unwilling instruments of injustice. The best way therefore for conserving our honour, hastening the advent of swaraj and righting those wrongs is for the voters not to send any representatives to the councils.

The Bombay Chronicle, 25-9-1920

1 According to Bombay Secret Abstracts, 1920, this was issued as a leaflet by Gandhiji and was being freely distributed in Sind in English and vernacular.

\(^{3}\) Aurobindo Ghosh (1872-1950); mystic, poet and philosopher; settled at Pondichery from 1910 onwards

\(^{4}\) The original draft is in Gandhiji’s hand.
We have not been able to agree to the principle of fixing the number of delegates to the Congress. Mr. Gandhi is alone responsible for the suggestion. The majority of us consider that the Congress will lose its demonstrative and influential character if the number is restricted. The majority admit the unwieldy nature of the present Congresses. But in their opinion the benefit of having an unlimited number outweighs the difficulty of the problem. Mr. Gandhi on the other hand considers that the restriction is essential in order to give the Congress a truly representative character and to make it a proper deliberative body. He thinks too that the Congress demands will become irresistible when it scientifically represents the whole people of India with an effective and proportionate voice in its deliberations and when every resolution has been considered with precision. He thinks that its demonstrative character will remain unimpaired by reason of the admission of visitors and guests in an unrestricted manner. The draft hereto attached embodies Mr. Gandhi’s suggestions. If therefore the All-India Congress Committee rejects Mr. Gandhi’s proposal the section dealing with the restriction of the number of delegates will have [to] be deleted. If Mr. Gandhi’s proposal for restriction is accepted, we approve of the principle of proportional representation known as the single transferable vote.

The All-India Congress Committee will note the change we have made in the Congress creed. The most noteworthy change proposed by us is the substitution of the adjective constitutional by legitimate and honourable in reference to the methods to be adopted. We think that the work constitutional having a double meaning—popular and legal—causes embarrassment. We have also removed the clause “a steady reform of the existing system of administration” in order to bring the article more in accordance with the recent resolutions of the Congress on reforms.

Another noteworthy change we have made is to redistribute the provinces on a linguistic basis. We believe that the present distribution made from time to time to meet the exigencies of a conquering power is unscientific and is calculated to retard the political and social progress of the respective communities speaking a common vernacular and therefore the growth of India as a whole. We therefore feel that so far as the Congress is concerned, we should re-divide India into provinces on a linguistic basis. This would also strengthen the movement for securing such a redistribution by the Government.
We have made no special provision for Mussulman representation in the Congress. In view of the happy relations existing between the two races, we do not consider it necessary to make any special provision for their representation. But we wish to state that if the Mussulmans desire any special provision or protection, it should be made or granted for the asking. So far as recognition of Urdu is concerned we have used the common term Hindustani which includes both Hindi and Urdu and we have recognized both scripts, Devnagari and Persian.

We present no separate draft rules. We consider that the ordinary recognized procedure for such assemblies like the Congress and its offshoots should be applicable where no special mention to the contrary is made in the Constitution.

We remain,
Sir,
Yours truly,

175. UNUSUAL CIRCULAR

The Education Department has issued a circular which, translated, reads as under:¹

The reason which has prompted this circular is not difficult to understand. It is dated September 1. Even the man who trusts to his rifle must admit that, faced with non-co-operation, brute force is unavailing and the rifle ineffective. When we get the strength for non-co-operation, rifles will be covered with rust, there will be grass growing over them and our children will play where they lie buried.

When one side talks of non-co-operation, the other side has no choice but to talk of co-operation. There is no doubt of it that the Empire depends on friendship, on co-operation. It was only when I saw that the friendship was not genuine, that it was a friendship between the strong and the weak, that I advised non-co-operation. Friendship is possible only between equals and, since we want to be friends with the whole world, we wish to be the equals of all; we wish to give up all fear of others and to conquer their brute force by our moral strength.

It is our non-co-operation which will create the basis for friendship. The foregoing circular is sheer hypocrisy, no more than make-believe. The effort will be as futile as trying to make a rope out of sand.¹ If the Government really means to treat us as friends, it must undo the injustices, its ways must change and its heart should melt. If the heart melts, it will repent for its innumerable sins, do justice to the Punjab, heal the Muslims’ wound, will look upon Tilak Maharaj, not as an enemy, but as a pillar of the Empire and the Viceroy will apologize for the crime of refusing even to mention his name. The greatest crime of Tilak Maharaj was that, with his foresight, he saw that, so long as the British officers looked down upon us, associating with them would do us harm. It is for this reason that the British officers seem to think that they would be polluted if they so much as mentioned his name.

So long as, inwardly, they have contempt for us, such circulars for promoting friendship are but a salve for our wounds. But we can hope for a change of heart in the officials only when we have conquered their hostility by our strength of character. We ourselves credit them with superior strength and want to be what they are. The truth of the matter is that acquiring an empire constitutes no superiority. It requires brute force and the ability to use cunning methods of persuasion, bribery and coercion and to creat divisions among the opponents. This provides no measure of moral worth. Superiority can be measured only in terms of moral worth and an empire based on moral strength is the only true empire. In adopting non-co-operation, India has chosen the way which will help it to win such an empire. All that the foregoing circular tells us is that even our adversary admits our path to be the right one.

176. GUJARAT’S DUTY

The question naturally arises what Gujarat will do now. Gujarat had decided, even before the Congress session was held, to boycott legislatures, schools and courts and the Congress has now approved this programme; Gujarat is, therefore, under a double obligation now.

However, it seems to have done nothing of much consequence so far.

It seems that legislatures will be boycotted by and large. But this certainly will not suffice.

How many schools have we rendered vacant? How many lawyers have given up practice? How many people have given up wearing foreign cloth entirely? How many have taken up, and induced others to take up, hand-spinning and hand-weaving?

These are no idle questions. We shall be tested by how we answer them. Our attending meetings and raising hands for voting will not get us swaraj or justice for the Punjab; nor will it prevent the humiliation of Islam.

Moreover, the Viceroy has made it clear by his action that we are not to expect any justice. Officers have been reprimanded. India has demanded not merely that the guilty officers be reprimanded but that they be discharged from service or suitably punished. Nothing like this has been done.

In Fiji, innocent and helpless Indians were subjected to atrocities similar to those in Amritsar. Gujaratis must have read the report of an example of arrogance in New Zealand. The rights of Indians living in Africa are being attacked. Indians in South Africa are being befooled and driven out. When these are the policies which prevail, how is co-operation possible?

We have taken upon ourselves to get this policy changed, to be the equals of the British, to uphold our self-respect, to prevent the country from ruination and show our culture (if we have any).

The Congress has concluded that we cannot achieve all this by arranging, gathering or making petitions. Gujarat had decided so even earlier.

How, then, can we succeed in this task? Our reply was: By non-co-operation. Non co-operation with British rule means co-operation among ourselves. This task can never be accomplished without self-sacrifice, determination, efficiency, planning, training, etc. It seems that legislatures will be boycotted by and large. But this certainly will not suffice.

How many schools have we rendered vacant? How many lawyers have given up practice? How many people have given up wearing foreign cloth entirely? How many have taken up, and induced others to take up, hand-spinning and hand-weaving?

How, then, can we succeed in this task? Our reply was: By non-co-operation. Non-co-operation with British rule means cooperation among ourselves. This task can never be accomplished without self-sacrifice, determination, efficiency, planning, training, etc.

If we must look to the British Government for our education, for settling our disputes, for our laws and the cloth we need, how can we ever start non-co-operation with it?

Can the children of a man sunk in immorality non-co-operate with him while he provides their education, settles their disputes and lays down rules for their future conduct and they receive these benefits from him? Does not the very first step towards non-co-operation lie in renouncing these three benefits? And when the children straight- taway give up these favours, what will be the effect on their father? Will he not change his ways and try to win them back?

If, however, the children think that they cannot do without the benefit of education, that it is for the best that the father should settle their disputes and he alone can lay down the law for their guidance and ask how it could be non-co-operation to renounce these benefits, then not only will they fail to put a stop to their father’s immorality but will be a party to it and take to immoral ways themselves.

The same is true of our relations with the Government. If, tempted by tangible benefits like schools, etc. we make compromises, swaraj will be ever receding from us. For we shall always feel that schools, courts, etc., can be run only by the Government. Just as a person who always moves in a vehicle loses his ability to walk, one who passively receives education and such other benefits can never be independent.

When we are able to educate our children and settle our disputes ourselves, we shall feel new strength in us and shall know what it means to be independent.

In Agra, there was a dispute between Hindus and Muslims. The English official said: “Well, send for your Maulana Shaukat Ali and Gandhi.” He obliged us by saying this. Maulana or Gandhi did not have to go, but the well-known Hakim Ajmal Khan and others went there from Delhi and restored peace between the two communities. The people were convinced that they could do without the service of the army and the officials. To that extent the people made progress, became independent and qualified themselves for swaraj.

In this way, as the people gradually learn to manage their own affairs, they will become more and more free.

It is the essence of non-co-operation to awaken people to their strength. People must realize that without their consent and co-operation, the Government can never be carried on. In this realization lie the seeds of swaraj. The people will be subject only so long as, yielding to temptations or out of ignorance or fear, they cooperate [with the Government]. If people emancipate themselves from the lure of titles, etc., from the ignorant belief that knowledge can be acquired only in Government schools and from the fear of the Government’s physical might, they will be independent.
Gujaratis should understand this simple idea and everybody should realize his duty.

It is mainly workers that we lack. If honest, sincere and alert workers who have unshakable faith in every item in the non-co-operation programme come forward, people will not take long to get ready. So the first thing to do, for ensuring the success of non-co-operation, is to find workers. There can be no lack of such workers. I hope that they will be found in every village.

177. FAMINE IN ORISSA

The distress in Orissa is getting more acute, not less. Readers of Navajivan have contributed much towards relief but what they have given is not enough. Shri Amritlal Thakkar has asked for Rs. 50,000. If we fail to collect this amount, some are bound to die of starvation.

Anyone may go there and see people starving. One gentleman was there recently. He saw with his own eyes a man dying of hunger. This latter had gone to the place to receive doles being distributed among famine-stricken people, but did not live to get his share.

Another such starving man, unable to bear his suffering, went away to commit suicide. Since the attempt to commit suicide is a crime, he was arrested by the police. The magistrate passed a nominal sentence on him and set him free; he was given Rs. 20 from the charity box.

In Puri, now, they are short of volunteers. Those who were enrolled got overworked. So paid servants have had to be employed, and this has meant additional expenditure. It is our duty to meet this.

As long as millions are starving in India, we have no right to arrange parties and dinners, to indulge in rhetoric and spend money on luxuries. We cannot even enjoy good dishes.

I have stated our duty in regard to the chronic poverty of India. You may accept or reject it. But we cannot escape the duty to end the present starvation in Puri and it is my hope that everybody will contribute to the fund to the best of his ability.

I also wish to draw the reader’s attention to another fact mentioned by Amritlal Thakkar. He writes about a young man named Krishnachandra Naik, and says that he died of a serpent bite while doing his duty. We may offer consolation to the family of this friend. Personally, however, I would offer congratulations.

I would rather die of a serpent bite while trying to satisfy the hunger of a starving man, than of dysentery. The dysentery may be the result of my sins. The serpent bite may also be due to my sins even so, if I die of such an accident while doing good, I cannot but fare well after death. I would, consider it my good fortune [to meet such a death].

Instead of being pained by the death of friend Naik, everyone should rejoice over it and not turn away from such work as risky.

We find there is greater fear of death in India, where it should be less. We believe the atman to be immortal. We know the body to be liable to perish any moment. The atman goes from body to body, according to its actions. If so, why fear or mourn death? If a child dies, why should we not believe that it has died after paying its debt and, therefore, feel no terror at its death? Is it not a delusion to believe that a child’s death is untimely? Does not our dharma teach us that all deaths occur at their appointed hour? We indeed need to shake off our delusions about death.

This certainly does not rule out manly effort. Whether death comes today or tomorrow, true human effort consists in adhering to our dharma and doing our duty without fearing death, for, in this way, we remain free from the weakness of impatience and are saved from many sins. And, at the same time, believing that there is no room for slackness in matters of dharma, we go on working ceaselessly and take no thought of death.

180. LETTER TO K. G. KRISHNAMURTI

THE ASHRAM,
September 28, 1920

DEAR MR. KRISHNAMURTI,

I am glad you have revised your views on non-co-operation. I think it is better to bear in mind that the primary object of the movement is not paralysis of the Government but putting ourselves in the right. Since the Government is in the wrong our action must necessarily result in its paralysis. The millions who do not assist the Government by any direct action assist it by giving it passive co-operation. they do not actively desire to dissociate themselves from the Government. Anyway swadeshi gives everyone a chance of partaking in the movement. And, after all, it it not enough that those who are actively co-operating with the Government, i.e., title-holders, parents of school-going children and lawyers, withdraw their support? The moral force of a Government depends upon these volunteers and immediately the moral force goes, the very foundation is undermined. I am not opposed to boycott of foreign goods on principle. I have opposed it because it is physically impossible. I have suggested a definite special boycott, i.e., of foreign cloth. This is possible today, and if we achieve that we make India economically independent. I think this answers all the questions raised by you.

Yours sincerely,

181. SPEECH AT STUDENTS’ MEETING AHMEDABAD

Sep

In the Punjab, students being forced to march sixteen to eighteen miles, and children being whipped, were not the only indignities; some students were even called out to salute the Union Jack. I leave it to the students to judge how, if people are forced to salute the Union Jack, or even God, those who are so forced—and God Himself—would feel. Then, again, some were expelled from college. I used to get letters from such students. They felt that they were ruined and that their future was bleak.

If there is any lesson that students should learn from the events in the Punjab, it is that they should not be enamoured of colleges any longer, should drive out of their minds the idea that if they did not go to college, they would lose their bread.

When I went to Lahore, I could see from the joy on the faces of students that their fascination for college had considerably waned. Had I been frightened along with them and given way to false concern as if, unless they went to college, they would not be men, their infatuation would have increased. Had these students not been enrolled in Government colleges, what could the Government have done to them? I am sure it could have done them no harm it could not have forced them to salute the Union Jack. Above everything else, they were afraid that they would face dire consequences if they refused to salute the Union Jack. These students would have been quite safe had they been attending private colleges over which the Government had no control. But, as the students attended Government colleges, it could exercise greater control over them and through them humiliated our people. It is only through students that we can achieve independence, and it is only because of their weakness that we shall continue to be under foreign domination. It is true that I have laid great stress on the boycott of councils. Each one of us is prone to hero-worship and, therefore, when leaders who are fit to be our representatives give up the idea of entering the councils, I know that the immediate effect would be tremendous. This can be done right now and it should be done. It would also have a powerful effect. If, however, all Government schools are left empty I promise that you will see the face of India changed within a month. Nothing else will have the same impact on the public and our rulers as that produced by every student leaving his or her school or college forthwith in a day. Even lawyers giving up practice would not have the same effect as students leaving their schools. When students stop attending Government schools, the Government will realize that their Tansa Water Works\(^1\) —why go so far, the Dudheshvar Water Works\(^2\) —has stopped its supply [of Government servants]. India depends on its students for winning its freedom because they are young. Lawyers are men of affairs and as such seasoned in the ways of the world. But students lead an innocent life. It is difficult to make lawyers give up practice as they have their interests to consider; but, as students have no such interests, it would be easy for them to boycott their colleges if only they would give up their fascination for them.

Some of you may ask why students should do this, why they should leave schools. Our great leader, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, a profoundly religious man with long experience in public service, Shri Shastriar, one of the ablest thinkers in the country, and some of our other leaders including Lala Lajpat Rai argue against this movement and say that this step of asking the students to leave schools is fraught with great danger. I certainly cannot wish that you should be guarded against being influenced by their ideas and, therefore,

1 Source of water-supply to Bombay 2 Source of water-supply to Ahmedabad request you, students, to give the fullest consideration to the views of these patriotic leaders of ours. If having done so, you still feel that what I say is true, only then must you leave schools and colleges.

Some of you may ask how the education we have been receiving has suddenly become vicious. However bad the Government, why should we leave the schools which we attend if they are well managed and staffed with good teachers and professors? This is a question which will naturally trouble each one of us.

When the Punjab and the khilafat issues arose, the policies of the Government were bearable. I give you my word that, when I was there [in the Punjab], I was confident that we were bound to get justice. I also assured our Muslim brethren that they would get at least what had been promised by the Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George. However, we received a slap in the face over the Punjab issue and the most ingenious means were employed to cover up the injustice. Regarding the khilafat, even a child can see that the promise given has been broken.

The victims of the atrocities in the Punjab were no ordinary persons; it was the educated class, educated by the Government which was subjected to the most wanton cruelties.

The Government has robbed India of its self-respect. Were a robber to rob us of our belongings and then come and ask us to attend a school founded with money from out of what he had seized from us, I am sure we would tell the robber that we did not want the education provided by him. I can tolerate a robber robbing me of my belongings, but how am I robbed of it? Could I have my nose whole again if it were to be cut off? Rob-bers in Kathiawad used to cut off people’s noses, and then a doctor came along who offered to stitch them up. But there is no surgeon who can restore its shapeliness to India’s nose which has been cut and disfigured. It is we alone who can effect this. Just as we would not touch the best of milk if it is poisoned with arsenic, so we should keep away from education which is polluted even though it be the best. I doubt if Pandit Malaviya or Shri Shastriar has been pained as much as I have been by these two issues. If they also feel as I do that the Government, by its policies, has turned into poison what otherwise was as beneficial as milk—they would say the same thing that I have said. I would say that these great men of our country fail to recognize the position which infected the education provided by the Government.

If, in this situation, we do nothing, we shall be disgraced for ever. For ages to come, our people will be unfit to hold up their heads before the rest of the world. You, students, cannot be called children any longer. You should, therefore, boycott your colleges and schools right from tomorrow after courteously informing your parents and elders. But I want you to understand fully the conditions under which the freedom that boys and girls over sixteen have may be used.

Those alone, who are both mentally and physically sick of our present condition and are convinced that they cannot even for a moment tolerate this Empire, that it is humiliating to live in such an Empire permeated by the position of injustice, have the right to leave schools and colleges. Just as we cannot accept alms from the robber who has robbed us of our all, likewise we should refuse the education provided by the Government; this is the only right way of showing our respect for our parents and leaders. If you hear the voice of conscience telling you to do a certain thing, you have the right to obey it. If you are convinced of all this, I would like you to give up your colleges right from tomorrow.

“To which schools do we go then?” To those students who ask this question, my reply is that they should yet wait for a while and consult their parents, for they are still undecided. Would I have any doubt about leaving a room inhabited by a snake? If you want to know the meaning of the resolution passed by the National Congress, I tell you that it does not make the leaving of schools conditional on new schools being provided. Whether we have new schools or not, it is necessary to boycott the present ones which have become like poison to us.

Let no one conclude, from what I have said above, that I am opposed to education or that I wish to propagate my own ideas on education. I am trying to spread my ideas through the National School and, when I wish to spread them more effectively, I shall find the appropriate means. But today it is as a soldier that I advise the boycott of schools and colleges. When a war breaks out, students give up studies, law-courts are closed and even prisons emptied. Even prisoners who have made jail their home turn a new leaf in their lives and go out to the battle-field. Similarly, this is a time of war for us. Had ours been a warlike nation, long before now thousands of swords would have been unsheathed, but the way of the sword is not possible in India today. At present, it is from the ordinary, worldly point of view that I put this issue before the public—that we cannot accept gifts, we cannot accept assistance from a Government which has humiliated us to this extent. If this principle is accepted, the question whether there are any alternative schools does not arise at all. You have, therefore, to consider the issue only from this point of view, whether or not it is your duty now to leave schools and colleges forthwith. What should the students do after leaving their institution? What should those who are rendered idle during the intervening period do? You may ask all these questions. The principle is the same that I have put forward. I do not put before you the corollaries which follow from this. Consistently with this main principle, one may, unwaveringly, follow any course which appeals to one’s heart. It is, at the same time, my duty to add that no student is justified in continuing to attend school or college out of weakness, once his doubts have been resolved. This is no time for the nation to show weakness.

Then followed questions by students and Gandhiji’s replies.

Q: Mahatmaji, what should we do if the Congres meeting in Nagpur postpones the implementation of this resolution?

I think that the Congres session in Nagpur cannot pass a resolution to that effect. This question—what the Nagpur session of the Congress will do or will not do—has no meaning for one who has really understood the principle advanced here. The awakening among students in Gujarat could make it impossible for the Congress to pass such a resolution.

Mahatmaji, do you wish students to commit suicide or to sacrifice their interests?

I wish students to do the latter and thereby protect themselves.

The Gujarat College was founded by funds collected from Gujarat and the Government merely accepted its management when handed over to it. Should we, then, give up that which truly belongs to us or should we take back its management in our hands?

Should a person misuse something that has been entrusted to him, even in law such a person is said to have committed breach of trust. If a dhobi puts to some other use garment which has been given to him for washing, he is accused of theft. In the same manner, I accuse the Government of theft, of a breach of trust. When we entrusted the Government with the management of the College, we did not anticipate the injustice it would do in the Punjab and with regard to the khilafat. Secondly, as the chairman has said, Gujarat College is not going to be converted into a zoo. It will, in the end, be ours. In order to take complete and proper possession of our property, which at the moment is under the control of the Government, it is necessary that we should even give up its improper use. As we would abandon our house if there has been a plague case in it, so we should abandon this College as it is no longer truly ours. Should one’s arm become gangrenous, Dr. Kanuga would amputate it since gangrene is incurable. During a storm, sailors jettison their cargo into the sea, but there by they do not commit suicide. In the same manner, it is necessary that we boycott today the schools which once belonged to us and it is only through such a boycott that we shall regain our ownership.

Mahatmaji, should one leave schools which are private and not run by the Government?

Those private schools which are affiliated to the Government [to the university] are in fact controlled by the Government, are under its moral government and should, therefore, be boycotted. In my opinion, all those colleges which have even the very slightest trace of Government influence should be boycotted.

Would the Government be affected if only a few students gave up their colleges?

We are not concerned with the effect but with the question whether to accept or not to accept the gift of injustice. It is our duty to uphold our self-respect. A boy or girl who gives up college has done his or her duty and served the world to that extent. Even a single person making a sacrifice will produce some effect.

As far as I can see, the Government never wanted to educate us. Do we not then help the Government by leaving colleges?

I do not think the Government wants us to do so. It has even issued a circular in this connection. The Government is very much afraid that, if schools and colleges are vacated, it would lose what control it has over the people. We should do the right thing irrespective of the wishes of the Government.

Should we give up even those schools or colleges which are to become national institutions?

You should write to the managers of such schools and colleges congratulating them on their intention to make them national institutions and requesting them to notify the Government immediately of their intentions so that you would be reassured.

What should we do if our parents do not agree to this?
Try and reason with your parents. We must be respectful and polite to our parents. We should not forget that we must obey their wishes, but we may politely refuse to comply with them whenever we find them unreasonable.

What should we do if national schools are banned as seditious?

In that case, every student in a Government school must walk out of it. If, in such a situation, the people continue to patronize Government schools, they will be fit only to be a nation of slaves. The Government cannot stop people’s education along national lines, it cannot prevent private tutors and volunteer workers from going to people’s homes.

Mahatma Gandhi, you said that the Dudheshwar Water Works would be shut down if Government schools and colleges were boycotted. What do you mean by this?

We supply to the Government water in the form of Government servants and it is with this water that the Government quenches its thirst. So, then, the Government will perish of thirst if this source of water is dried up. Lord Macaulay also said that schools and colleges alone could provide the Government with the servants it needed.

Some people believe that this movement will collapse like the one against the partition of Bengal. What would you say to this?

There are bound to be, among the people, such bubbles which arise and burst. If all the babies born could live, what more could the world ask for? We should embark on this task only after taking our weakness into account. There were two weaknesses in the movement against the partition of Bengal: (1) The students were not made to leave Government schools and (2) the leaders continued to send their own children to colleges and such institutions. These two weaknesses are being overcome to the extent possible. I am always prepared to be cursed by the students. One who wishes to serve the public must, from the very beginning, be prepared for curses. Both the public and I must be prepared to suffer the consequences of this course. That alone will raise the future generations.

Do all war-time requirements hold in this movement?

All war-time requirements are being adhered to in this movement and, most certainly, this is a war.

Navajivan, 3-10-1920
THE KACHA GARHI INCIDENT

My attention has been drawn by Lieutenant Hewett of the 37th Dogras to certain statements which appeared in the issue of this paper on the 28th July last under the heading, “More about the Bulletted Muhajarin.” The report in question which deals with the Kacha Garhi incident was communicated by Mr. H. J. Mohamed as the opening words showed. Lieutenant Hewett denies the truth of various statements in the report and complains in particular of the following specific allegations, which he characterizes as false and malicious:

The officer kneeled upon the body and cut deep in the neck;

and

They (i.e. the British soldiers and the officers) were bent on murder and murder in a cruel manner, for this alone could satisfy their lust for blood and appease their anger.

Lieutenant Hewett informs me that he was the only officer travelling by the train referred to in this report or present on the occasion referred to therein, and he denies that there is any truth whatever in these allegations which he says clearly refer to him. On another page of the same issue of Young India, there appeared an article by me in which I said that “If the facts set forth in the statement are true they reflect the greatest discredit on the so-called soldiers who took wanton delight in killing a man who was endeavouring to protect the honour of women”, but I was careful to advise my readers to suspend their judgement till they had the Government version before them.

I gladly publish the repudiation by Lieutenant Hewett. The public thus have the original statement and a contradiction by the officer concerned. There is now all the greater reason for suspension of judgment till the result of the inquiry is before the public.

183. REPRESSION IN THE PUNJAB

Mr. Zafar Ali Khan, the editor and proprietor of the Zamindar of Lahore, is on his trial. Probably by the time this appears in print, his fate will have been decided. The reader will see the charge-sheet against Mr. Zafar Ali Khan. It is worth studying from the political standpoint. The judicial must for the time being rest with the judges. He has been accused of having made use of sentiments amounting to an attempt to create disaffection towards the Government established by law in British India and to promote feeling of enmity between different classes of His Majesty’s subjects.

The statements attributed to Mr. Z. A. Khan undoubtedly constitute the crime, if they were actually made and are not true. For to state facts cannot by any stretch of the canon of interpretation amount to an attempt to excite disaffection or to promote enmity. To speak of General Dyer’s performances, of Mr. Lloyd George’s breach of promises or of the Viceroy’s and Mr. Montagu’s defence of O’Dwyerism, would be to speak the truth; and yet it cannot but excite disaffection towards a Government that is guilty of condonation of crimes or breaches of deliberate pledges. And if it be a crime to speak the truth, it is a virtue and a duty to promote disaffection. Similarly if the telling of truth promotes feelings of enmity between classes, it has to be risked if truth may not be sacrificed. Suppression of material but damaging facts cannot promote friendship but can only make the enmity more deadly for its secrecy.

In Mr. Zafar Ali Khan’s case there are two statements which are, so far as I am aware, unsupportable by evidence. Mecca was never set on fire. And there seems to be no warrant for the statement that virgin girls were outraged in Baghdad. I do not know whether Mr. Zafar Ali Khan made the two statements imputed to him. I should be sorry if he did. Khilafat workers in particular, and all other workers in general, cannot be too strongly urged to avoid all exaggeration. Facts are always stronger than fiction. The latter hurts a cause in the long run and discredits the speaker. The case against the Government based on proved facts is invulnerably strong. And public movements will gain greatly when no charge of exaggeration can be sustained against workers.

1 For making statements at Hazro in August 1920 against the British Government on khilafat and other issues; vide Young India, 29-9-1920.
But the charges that will be and must be admitted by Mr. Khan are really from the Government’s point of view far more serious, and yet of those charges I am guilty with Mr. Khan. For instance, the conditions laid down for a hearty reception to H. R. H. the Prince of Wales would be mine as they are stated to be Mr. Khan’s. It is but too true, if the conditions laid down are not fulfilled, that this Empire must perish.

Hitherto the Government has taken no notice of speeches advising non-co-operation and containing such demands as are said to have been made or advice as is said to have been given by Mr. Zafar Ali Khan. And I had begun to think that the Government were adopting the healthy method of allowing such agitation to go on so long as it did not result in violence. I had thought that the Government had ceased to think of punishing a man for expressing his views however extreme they might be so long as they did not incite the people to violence.

But the policy is evidently to be changed. Mr. Zafar Ali Khan’s speech must have told. He preached against recruiting in the District which provided recruits. And if such preaching is wrong, the Congress itself has done wrong. Yet surely it is the right of a citizen to warn people against accepting an occupation that is harmful to the people’s self-respect or religious honour.

Mr. Habib Shah of Siasat had his security forfeited, I suppose, for much the same reasons. This kind of repression we must expect as non-co-operation begins to produce its effect. It is clear that success depends entirely upon our ability to carry on our campaign in spite of repression by way of prosecution of speakers and suppression of newspapers. Such repression must simply nerve us for further effort. And the demands must be repeated not by one man but thousands. Newspapermen need not feel concerned if their activity is stopped. Door to door propaganda, circulars written by the hand and multiplied after the snowball process by voluntary workers will result in more concentrated work than newspapers. When the struggle reaches the effective stage even in spite of peace reigning in the land, we must be prepared for prosecutions and internments and the like. And the victory will be ours, only when the struggle survives the repressive stage and makes non-co-operation more popular than ever. For will it not be a conclusive proof of the necessity of non-co-operation with a Government that will suppress even the legitimate aspiration of the people and a legitimate and truthful narrative of facts, however distasteful they may be to the Government?

Only we dare not be impatient. Sentences like the following do betray impatience.

I have heard that in Baghdad a father and son were in the Indian army. They were fighting against the Turks. The son was killed in action, the father carried his body to Baghdad. In the way he noticed that his son’s face had turned into that of a pig!

These sentences have been put into Mr. Khan’s mouth. It is an appeal to superstition. I hope that Mr. Zafar Ali Khan did not appeal to the superstition of his audience. The khilafat agitation is a religious movement. It must be free from untruth, exaggeration, violence of speech or action, and superstition or prejudice. The cause itself is truthful, and truth, when self-sacrifice and courage have been applied for its vindication, has never yet been known to fail.

Young India, 29-9-1920

184. THE HALLUCINATION OF SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

Much is being said and written against the proposed boycott of Government-controlled schools and colleges. The proposal has been described as “mischievous”, “harmful”, “opposed to the best interest of the country”, etc. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviyaji is among its most uncompromising opponents.

I have been taxing myself to the best of my capacity in order to discover my error. But the effort has resulted in deepening my conviction that it is sinful to receive any education under the control of the present Government, no matter how high its quality may be, even as it would be to take the richest milk when it is tainted with poison.

I ask myself why some see the truth of the proposition quite clearly whilst others, the accepted leaders, condemn it as an error. The answer I have been able to find is that the latter do not consider the present system of Government as an unmixed evil as the former do. In other words, the opponents do not sufficiently realize the significance of the Punjab and the khilafat wrongs. They do not feel as others do that the activity of the present Government is injurious to national growth. I know that this is a serious statement to make. It is unthinkable that Malaviyaji and Shastriar cannot feel the wrongs even as I do. And yet that is precisely my meaning. I am positive that they will not put their children in a school where there was any likelihood of their becoming degraded instead of being elevated. I am equally positive that they would not send their children to a school managed, controlled or even influenced by a robber who had robbed them of their possessions. I feel that the nation’s children suffer degradation in the Government schools. I feel that these schools and colleges are under the influence of a Government that has deliberately robbed the nation of its honour, and therefore the nation must withdraw its children from such schools. It may be that some learning even in such schools may be able to resist the progress of degradation. But it cannot be right to countenance national humiliation going on in the schools because some have risen above their environment. In my opinion it is self-evident that the honoured leaders of the nations today do not realize that the Government-controlled schools are tainted in the manner described by me.

It may be urged that the schools are no worse today than they were before the Punjab wrong or the khilafat breach, and that we tolerated them before these events. I admit that the schools are not much worse now than before. But so far as I am concerned, the knowledge of the Punjab and the khilafat betrayal has revolutionized my view of the existing system of Government. My ignorance of its inherent wickedness made the system tolerable to the extent of my not rising against the schools. And that is just the reason why I fear that those who oppose boycott of the schools on the ground of its harmfulness, do not put the same valuation on the Punjab and the khilafat wrong that I do.

And so I congratulate Messrs S. B. Tilak, Patel, Tripathi and others on their having given up their colleges even as they were on the point of finishing their education. That is also why I congratulate Misses Desai and Patel for their having left their high school. It is perhaps not generally known that these high-spirited girls left the schools of their own accord as have the young men.

I have no hesitation in wishing that the youth of India, both boys and girls, will, if they have felt personally the deep humiliation of atrocities of the Punjab, or understood the meaning of the violation of the khilafat pledge, without any further reflection, empty the Government controlled schools and colleges. The moral education that they will gain in a moment when they take that step will more than make up for the temporary loss of literary education. For the day that the boys and the girls empty the Government-controlled schools will be the day that will mark a very definite advance towards the goal.

It will mark a revolution in the national thought. It will mark our freedom from the hallucination of schools and colleges. Is not the nation able to take charge of its own education without any Government intervention, protection, advice or grant? Abandonment of the present schools means consciousness of our ability to educate ourselves in spite of Himalayan difficulties.

Young India, 29-9-1920

185. THE MEANING OF THE EMPIRE

The following circular has been issued by the Education Department:

Teachers and educational officers of this Presidency should be asked to co-operate in bringing about a right understanding of the meaning of the Empire and in dispelling the idea that the Empire is based on force and militarism, by encouraging the parties concerned to look upon each other as brethren in advancement of the liberal aims and mutual friendship and sympathy particularly in India where a contrary feeling is gaining ground.

It is dated at Poona the 1st instant.

The circular in my opinion is a triumph of non-co-operation. We have been often told authoritatively that the Empire is based finally on force. When an attempt is being made to isolate this force, and to show by not meeting it by force that it is utterly useless when it is not backed by co-operation, conscious or unconscious, of the people, we have a circular calling upon the teachers to co-operate in showing that the Empire is based not on force or militarism but that it is based on mutual friendship. This I consider a triumph of non-co-operation because force recedes into the background. Sir Michael O'Dwyer flaunted his brute force in the face of the nation, and terrorism reigned supreme for a time. It did not answer. Now it is to be covered under soft-sounding phrases. It too must fail.

The circular is hypocritical. To talk of friendship and sympathy between terrorist and their victims is to add deception to tyranny. The way out is through non-co-operation.

It is a vain attempt to expect to secure friendship by false pretensions. The best and only way to secure the real friendship of the people and to prove to them that the Empire is not based on force and militarism, is to withdraw the superflous military force even at the risk of losing the Empire to trust the people, and for Englishmen in general to regard us in every way their equals in thought and in deed. This presupposes righting the khilafat wrong in accordance with the Mussulman sentiment and to give full reparation regarding the Punjab.

But this seems impossible for the general body of Englishmen to do. They have been brought up to work upon us as mere chattels. I invite the attention of the reader for the account of the treatment of our countrymen in New Zealand. I cannot conceive anything more wantonly brutal than the doings of the white men of New Zealand. It is not as if the colonists are depraved people. They are brave, generous, charitable and cultured in their own sphere. But they are thrown off their balance immediately they come in contact with us. We are their natural prey. And culture is no bar to their maltreatment of us even as culture is no bar to the killing even say of snakes by the majority of mankind. I have not used a far-fetched illustration. Thousands of Englishmen cannot bear the idea of an Indian claiming or living on terms of equality with them. White superiority, as Mr. Andrews has shown, has become a religion. President Kruger¹ used to say that God had ordained Asiatics to be white men’s slaves. He even introduced the idea in his statute-book. He was frank and he avowed it. Others believe it, practise it, but would fain break its force by using euphemistic language or worse.

It is not possible to blame anybody but ourselves for this badge of inferiority and we alone can remove it by supreme effort.

¹ 1825-1904 Boer leader and State President of the South African Republic.
I gladly publish Mr. Pennington’s letter with its enclosure just as I have received them. Evidently Mr. Pennington is not a regular reader of Young India, or he would have noticed that no one has condemned mob-outrages more than I have. He seems to think that the article he has objected to was the only thing I have ever written on General Dyer. He does not seem to know that I have endeavoured with the utmost impartiality to examine the Jallianwala massacre. And he can see any day all the proof adduced by my fellow-commissioners and myself in support of our findings on the massacre. The ordinary readers of Young India knew all the facts and therefore it was unnecessary for me to support my assertions otherwise. But unfortunately Mr. Pennington represents the typical Englishman. He does not want to be unjust, nevertheless he is rarely just in his appreciation of world events because he has no time to study them except cursorily and that through a press whose business is to air only party views. The average Englishman therefore except in parochial matters is perhaps the least informed though he claims to be well informed about every variety of interest. Mr. Pennington’s ignorance is thus typical of the others and affords the best reason for securing control of our own affairs in our own hands. Ability will come with use and not by waiting to be trained by those whose natural interest is to prolong the period of tutelage as much as possible.

But to return to Mr. Pennington’s letter he complains that there has been no “proper trial of anyone”. The fault is not ours. India has consistently and insistently demanded a trial of all the officers concerned in the crimes against the Punjab.

He next objects to the “violence” of my language. If truth is violent, I plead guilty to the charge of violence of language. But I could not, without doing violence to truth, refrain from using the language I have regarding General Dyer’s action. It has been proved out of his own mouth or hostile witnesses:

1. That the crowd was unarmed.
2. That it contained children.
3. That the 13th was the day of Vaisakhi fair.

1 J. R. Pennington, a retired I.C.S. officer
2 Defending General Dyer
3 Entitled “Is India Worth Keeping?”
4 Vide “General Dyer”, 14-7-1920.
4. That thousand had come to the fair.
5. That there was no rebellion.
6. That during the intervening two days before the “massacre” there was peace in Amritsar.
7. That the proclamation of the meeting was made the same day as General Dyer’s proclamation.
8. That General Dyer’s proclamation prohibited not meetings but processions or gatherings of 4 men on the streets and not in private or public places.
9. That General Dyer ran no risk whether outside or inside the city.
10. That he admitted himself that many in the crowd did not know anything of his proclamation.
11. That he fired without warning the crowd and even after it had begun to disperse. He fired in the backs of the people who were in flight.
12. That the men were practically penned in an enclosure.

In the face of these admitted facts I do call the deed a “massacre”. The action amounted not to “an error of judgment” but its “paralysis in the face of fancied danger”.

I am sorry to have to say that Mr. Pennigton’s notes, which too the reader will find published elsewhere, betray as much ignorance as his letter.

Whatever was adopted on paper in the days of Canning was certainly not translated into action in its full sense. “Promises made to the ear were broken to the hope” was said by a reactionary Viceroy. Military expenditure has grown enormously since the days of Canning.

The demonstration in favour of General Dyer is practically a myth.

No trace was found of the so-called Danda Fauj dignified by the name of bludgeon-army by Mr. Pennington. There was no rebel army in Amritsar. The crowd that committed the horrible murders and incendiaryism contained no one community exclusively. The sheet was found posted only in Lahore and not in Amritsar. Mr. Pennington should moreover have known by this time that the meeting held on the 13th was held, among other things, for the purpose of condemning mob excesses. This was brought out at the Amritsar trial. Those who surrounded him could not stop General Dyer. He says he made up this mind to shoot in a moment. He consulted nobody. When the correspondent says that the troops would have objected to being considered in “what might in that case be not unfairly called a massacre,” he writes as if he had never lived in India. I wish the Indian troops had the moral courage to refuse to shoot innocent, unarmed men in full flight. But the Indian troops have been brought in too slavish an atmosphere to dare do any such correct act.
