One sees sometimes in the public Press criticism on the temple-entry question. It is double-barrelled, being directed on the one hand by Harijans and on the other by sanatanists. Some of the Harijans say, “We do not want temple-entry; do not build temples, but use all you receive for economic uplift.” Some sanatanists say, “Give up the temple-entry question altogether. You are hurting our feelings by forcing Harijans into temples.” Both are wrong in substance. Not one single pice out of the purse has been or will be spent for building temples. Attempt is being made only to have public temples opened to Harijans on the same terms on which they are open to the other Hindus. It is a matter of choice for the Harijans to visit or not to visit them; savarna Hindus have to lift the bar against Harijans. For those millions who regard temples as treasure-chests of spiritual wealth, they are living realities which they hold dear as life itself. If they are truly repentant towards Harijans, they must share these treasures with the latter. I know what the opening of temples means to Harijans. Only last week, between Dharwar and Belgaum, I opened three temples to Harijans in the presence of crowds of savarna Hindus and Harijans. If critics had been present at the opening and noticed the pleasure on the countenances of the Harijans present as they bowed before the image and received the prasad, their criticism would have been silenced. Harijan critics would have realized that, apart from themselves, Harijans at large did desire temple-entry. Sanatanist critics would have realized that temples, wherever they were opened, were being opened with the fullest concurrence of the temple-goers concerned and in the presence of crowds of them. No hole-and-corner opening can do any good whatsoever to Hinduism. To be of spiritual or any value at all, the opening has to be performed with due publicity, solemnity and the willing consent of the existing temple-goers, and not of such self-styled reformers as have no faith or interest in temples and for whom temples may even be a superstition. Temple-entry agitation requires no financial outlay, it does not lend itself to agitation except by a few workers who have faith in temples and whose word would command attention from the mass savarna mind. It is, therefore, a question that can only be and is being gently and cautiously handled. The only insistence is on the right and the duty of the believing reformer advocating temple-entry and showing that without it the reformation will not only be incomplete but fruitless. For, without temples being freely open to Harijans, untouchability could not be said to have been removed root and branch.

As for the economic uplift, it is altogether wrong to put it in opposition to temple-entry. Temple-entry can only help such uplift. For, when Harijans are freely admitted to temples, all the avenues to economic betterment must be automatically open to Harijans as to others. So far as the moneys received are concerned, they will all be used only for economic uplift, if it is admitted that educational uplift also means economic, in that it makes the educated Harijan fitter for running life’s race. I am aware that education among the savarnas has often rendered them less fit for the race. But that has been so, because their education has meant contempt for labour. There is not much danger of such a mishap with the general body of Harijans for some time to come at least. And the danger can be averted altogether, if those who are in charge of the movement will take care to purge Harijan education of the evils of the current method, which ignores the technical side for the most part, if not altogether.

319. HARIJAN FINANCE

Correspondents sometimes ask why the public do not know what moneys are being received during the tour and how they are being spent. Those who thus ask or write in the columns of the Press evidently do not care to look at the _Harijan_. Accounts have been and are being published from time to time in these columns giving as full details as possible of the receipts. The reader will find therein all the purses, individual donations and prices realized for jewellery. Three account-keepers travel with the party and work day and night under the direct control of Thakkar Bapa, the ever vigilant secretary of the Central Board. More often than not, they have to burn midnight oil in order to cope with thousands of copper and silver pieces and to tally cash from day to day. These moneys are all sent to the Central Board at Delhi and there safely banked. Of course, an accurate system of account-keeping has been devised at Delhi and every pice received or spent is to be found in the account books. Accounts are audited and produced before the Board meetings from time to time. All the transactions of the Board are public and duly recorded. In other words, the Board follows the accurate methods of banks and regards itself as a public institution responsible to the public regarding its financial and other management.

The public will be interested to know that up to 2nd March Rs. 3,52,130-9-7 had been received during the tour.

As to expenses, they will be largely regulated by the provinces which have produced the moneys, subject to sanction by the Central Board. The draft rules\(^1\) for the disposal of the funds were published the week before last and criticism has been invited. More than this it is humanly impossible, and even unnecessary, to do.

320. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, MUZAFFARPUR\(^2\)

Gandhiji said that was not the time to speak to them at any length. It might be possible to do so next time, if he found time and if Rajendrababu thought it desirable to bring him to Muzaffarpur. But at the present moment he would like to tell them that it was not at all desirable for any able-bodied man or woman to take advantage of the present situation and benefit himself or herself by begging. Begging was against one’s self-respect and according to the _Gita_, an able-bodied man or woman, capable of earning his or her living, if he or she begged, committed the sin of thieving. Gandhiji desired that none of them should be held guilty of having committed that sin. Secondly, they must bow to the will of God and see to it that even out of this calamity came some good by their doing away once for all with the curse of untouchability. They must realize that the distinction of high and low between one man and another, or between one woman and another—who were all equally the creatures of one God—which this curse of untouchability involved was a great sin and could never be enjoined by the Vedas, for nothing that was not based on truth could be a _vedavakya_. He, therefore, wanted all of them to realize the true significance of the great calamity that providence had chosen to inflict on them and profit by it.

321. INTERVIEW TO “THE SEARCHLIGHT”

PATNA,
[March 16, 1934]¹

My impressions are that what used to be for me a fair land I witnessed as a land of desolation. Motihari, Haripore, Lalganj and Muzaffarpore are places which I had visited before. Other places, which I visited this time I have no recollection of having visited before. In Motihari I lived for several months, that being my headquarters during my stay in Champaran in 1917. To see in these places house after house, some of which I knew so well, in a dilapidated condition or a heap of ruins was a heart-rending sight to me. Field after field covered with sand showed how difficult life must have become for the peasantry of several thousand acres of land. The problem of restoring conditions to anything like pre-earthquake days is calculated to baffle the combined efforts of the best workers in the land. In the midst, however, of this desert, it was a matter of joy to me to meet representatives of different relief societies, including those representing the Government Relief Department, and to find that they were working more or less in consultation with one another, all having one end in view, namely, relief to the distressed people to the best of their ability.

The Searchlight, 18-3-1934

322. SPEECH AT BIHAR CENTRAL RELIEF COMMITTEE, PATNA²

March 18, 1934

I must tell you that this resolution³ has been drafted by me. The author of non-co-operation as I am, I have recommended cooperation in the task before us without the slightest hesitation. On the very first occasion when I spoke on the earthquake disaster in Tinnevelly,⁴ I said that such a catastrophe imperatively demanded the co-operation of India as a whole and that we must offer our co-operation to Government. The whole country has evinced its sympathy with

When a death occurs, we forget all dissensions for the moment, apply ourselves to the reverential performance of the last rites and follow the bier as a mark of respect. But thousands have died in Bihar and many cities and villages have been razed to the ground. The earthquake has taken a toll of about 25,000 lives according to our records, while the Government figure is about 10,000. Whatever may be the correct figure, the need of the hour undoubtedly is that we should try our utmost to succour the distressed people of Bihar, and while doing so put all distinctions out of the account. The disaster is so tremendous that the wounds it has inflicted cannot be healed by the mere collection and distribution of funds; it is only the consciousness of the world’s sympathy that can carry comfort to the lacerated hearts of the sufferers.

Let us, in the face of this calamity, forget the distinction between Hindus and Mussalmans as well as between Indians and Englishmen. And the same principle should impel us to cooperation between the Government and the people and, therefore, it is our duty to offer our respectful co-operation to Government in the prosecution of the common object. The Government has a number of experts and has control over lands and other facilities; while our resources are insignificant in these respects. In such circumstances it would be impossible to make the best use of the funds at our disposal in the absence of co-operation between Government and ourselves and I am certain that Government would equally fail to render full assistance to the sufferers without the whole-hearted co-operation of the people. Let us not be afraid of the bogey that we would be strengthening the hands of the Government by our co-operation. If the Government has an accession of strength through the common attempt to succour the distressed, it is entitled to it. We are offering to co-operate with a view to the protection and relief of the people, and not to their injury.

I have been to Motihari, where I met and learnt a good deal from the representatives of a number of relief organizations as well as two Government officers. The latter showed me the plans of new houses in contemplation and explained to me how Government was going to help, with the result that I had a clearer idea of the scope of our activities. I also met some members of the middle classes whose problem is so much more difficult of solution and who could not receive the assistance they require without co-operation between the Government and the people.¹

If the Congressmen fear that the prestige of the Congress will suffer through such co-operation, I submit that the fear is purely imaginary. The thing is that we are going to work not as Congressmen but as humanitarians. The question, therefore, of Congress prestige being enhanced or diminished does not arise. The prestige of the Congress must depend upon the Congressmen’s purity and capacity for service. We do not cease to be Congressmen because we co-operate with the Government in a humane task. Has Rajendrababu ceased to be a Congressman? Or have I ceased to be one because I am sponsoring this resolution?

It would be sinful on our part to import any other extraneous considerations into the all-important question of alleviating human suffering. When in Champaran I did not need to name and did not name the Congress even once. The country has contributed over 20 lakhs of rupees today at Rajendrababu’s call. The people know Rajendrababu alone and rely upon his sincerity. They remember the great sacrifices he has made for the country. It is now our duty to ensure that these funds are utilized in the purest possible way. It was with this end in view that Rajendrababu constituted a mixed committee, and wrote to the Government offering his co-operation.

I would therefore adjure Congressmen to decide in the first instance whether or not we should take up this task of reconstructing Bihar. If yes, we ought to sincerely co-operate with all workers in the field, including the Government. And we should do so whole-heartedly. In prosecuting the common object, we must forget non-co-operation, or else leave Bihar relief severely alone. Therefore, if you adopt this resolution you must adopt it in all sincerity on its merits, not for my sake but certainly for the sake of the millions who are in distress and expect your help. The servant must think only of his master, and the millions of afflicted people are our masters today.

Of course the resolution must not be supposed to imply that we may not criticize the Government where, in our opinion, its policy is wrong or measures inadequate.

Finally, not as president² but as an old fellow-worker and servant, I would request you, if possible, not to raise discussion on this resolution.

324. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, PATNA:

Gandhiji said he had no doubt in his mind that they must regard the calamity as in the nature of a gift from God and as punishment for their sins. It would be true to say that these cataclysms visited as a result of their own actions and they would be wise if they took the right lessons to be drawn from the disaster to their heart. Which action of theirs had brought on their heads the dire calamity he would not specify but he wished them to remember that the people in this country constituted one large human family so that the evil acts of any section profoundly acted and reacted on the whole. The eyes not only of India but of the world were for the moment focussed on Bihar and contribution to the relief funds had poured in from far and near. Many people had sent small sums and he had received from a sympathizer a shilling but it was of far greater value as it represented all that the sender had. It was not unlikely, he felt, that the collections might reach a crore of rupees.

This response, however, made their responsibility greater and more onerous. The more support they had from the country and outside, the greater became their responsibility and the greater the challenge to their own sense of duty. He therefore wished them to consider what their duty was in the crisis they were in. Their first duty was to see to it that proper account was kept of every cowrie contributed to their funds and, what is more, they should see to it that every cowrie so contributed reached the 1 A word here is illegible.

2 Newspaper reports stated that this was the largest meeting ever seen in Patna. About thirty to fifty thousand people attended the meeting. Other speakers were M. M. Malaviya and Maulana Azad. hands of the suffering people for whom it was meant. It was their duty to work in a spirit of service and to beware lest a single pie was wasted. Secondly, proceeded Mahatmaji, those who had escaped damage or had suffered less must do their duty by those who had suffered more. Bihar must not depend entirely on outside help. Those who had suffered must have all the aid they were entitled to but large parts of the province had either not suffered at all or very partially. Those present that evening could not pretend that they had all suffered so badly as not to be able to contribute their mite to the relief of the suffering people. It was incumbent on each one of them to consider their duty and their means in that light before God as witness. He appealed to them not as a stranger hailing from Bombay. He was of Bihar or, more correctly speaking, of Champaran. Champaran was the first to recognize him on his return to his country from South Africa. He owed the same duty to Bihar as to Gujarat. For him there were no geographical demarcations in India. In appealing to them to do their duty he addressed them as one of them. He was aware that Patna had suffered severely.
Eighty-four men had lost their lives and many times more had been injured. Yet they had on the whole escaped lightly as compared to the other devastated parts and it behoved all of them to search their hearts and consider what was obligatory on them to do for their suffering brethren.

In the third place Gandhiji asked them to consider if untouchability should not go even now. God had made no distinctions between the savarna or the avarna, between the Hindu and the Mussalman, in respect of the sweep of the havoc. For Hindus there was no crime more hideous than that of untouchability. If they did not give up this age-old sin, blot out all distinctions between the high and the low, and thereby purify themselves, he for one had no doubt that worse disaster was in store for them in the future. The sin of untouchability had corroded their entire social system.
It was the spirit and the mentality behind this curse of untouchability that was responsible for the countless divisions that divided them and separated them into so many warring groups. To root out this sense of high and low and universalize the principle of human brotherhood was their solemn duty in the crisis that confronted them. If they did that they would have truly learnt from the earthquake.

Lastly, Gandhiji warned the suffering people against demoralizing themselves by begging in this hour of their destitution. Those who were helpless could not but depend on gratuitous relief. In their case it would not be begging just as a true sannyasi did not beg in the real sense of the term, for he gave back in other ways what he took by asking. But those who were able to work must earn the relief they sought by working for it. Let each suffering individual earn his relief by working for it. In proportion to the work they put forth in lieu of what they received, they would vindicate the dignity of human labour and enhance their reputation in the eyes of the country and the world.

325. LETTER TO KASTURBA GANDHI

PATNA,
March 20/21, 1934

BA.

I have still not received your letter this time. I am writing this on Tuesday after morning prayer. I am in Patna. By my side is Satisbabu, spinning on the takli. There is Rajendrababu’s sister. Prabhavati too. Om and Kisan are preparing to go to bed. Swami also is sitting near me. Mirabehn has gone to get the milk ready. Malaviyaji, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, Dr. Mahmud, etc., are here just now. There was a meeting of all of them on Sunday. At that meeting a new committee was appointed for relief work in Bihar. Jnmnalalji also is a member of it. The work is progressing well. I visited Motihari and other places. Even big mansions have been reduced to heaps of brick and mortar. Everywhere in the streets we saw heaps of bricks and ruins of buildings. The fields are covered with sand ejected with water from the bowels of the earth. Till this sand is removed, no crops can grow, and removing it is no easy work. For it is not only one or two bighas that are so covered. Thousands of bighas have been covered and in some places the layers are six inches thick or even thicker. The people’s misery, therefore, is beyond measure. But even then life is so dear that people, dizzy with the thought of having escaped death, can forget their hardships and keep smiling faces. They have no food in their homes and no clothes to wear, but they do not seem to worry much about that. Such is the scene here. What can we do to help them? Those who are working in the midst of the people may serve them humbly and unostentatiously. They may plead with the idle to start working, and teach sensualists self-control by their own example. They may teach people Ramadhun and turn them Godward. There are such silent workers, too, at many places. God’s ways are beyond our understanding. He erased the difference between birth and death in a matter of two minutes. Who was born and who is dead? Whether human beings are born or die, His play goes on. Why then rejoice and grieve? The Lord’s name is the only truth. He who is aware of Him and serves Him, that is, His creation, as well as he may, lives. Those who do not do this are as good as dead, though living. Well, having started to write a letter I have given you this week’s discourse. There may be a few words which you may not understand. But Dahibehn or Shanta or Lalita, one of them will surely be able to understand them.
If, however, there is any word which none of you can understand, ask me its meaning.

After writing the above yesterday, I could not go on further. I have resumed the letter today, Wednesday, in the morning (8.45). I shall soon be called to a meeting. There was another letter from Madhavdas. His health has improved so much that he sees no need now to go to Porbandar. He will remain in Bombay and start some business. Devdas and Lakshmi are quite happy. Rajaji has still not gone to Delhi. Most probably he will come here and meet me before going there.

Blessings to you all from

PATNA,
March 21, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

Your letter has given me great joy. I take you at your word. Come, see the afflicted area and tell us:

(1) how best and cheaply we can clean our choked wells;
(2) how we can house the homeless;
(3) how drain water-logged areas;
(4) how remove the sand which covers our fair fields.

These are but samples of the work in front of us. Of course the Government and the people are working in unison. But you know my regard for your expert knowledge. Even if you do not show us anything new, I personally will have the satisfaction of knowing that you have seen the area. If you come please let the Central Relief office, Patna, know in time. Someone will meet you at the station and arrange a tour programme of five days after your reaching here.

I leave tomorrow morning with Rajendrababu to visit balance of the area yet unseen by me. But you may come independently of me. You will cross me at some point. I return to Patna on 4th proximo evening and leave for Purnea and thence for Assam on 7th proximo.

My regards to you and Mrs. Higginbottom.

328. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

March 21, 1934

Bhai Vallabhbhai,

I suppose I shouldn’t expect any letter from you just now. It is 9 o’clock now on Wednesday morning. A meeting of the Bihar Committee is going on in the adjoining room. I may be called any time. If I don’t write just now, I can’t finish this letter today. Everything seems to be going well. You must have read the resolutions in the papers. Maulana, Malaviyaji and Bidhan were present. I have put Jamnalalji exclusively on this work. If I didn’t do that, I myself would have to stay on here. Personally I wish to complete as much of the Harijan tour as I can. Raja is ill. He has got an attack of asthma. He will go to Delhi in the beginning of April. Lakshmi will not feel easy in mind without him. Since the meeting of the Spinners’ Association is to be held here, he will go to Delhi via this place. I will leave here on the 7th and go to Assam. I shall be there for about two weeks. From there I will come back to this place and, after spending a few days here, proceed to Utkal. I will again return here. The programme after that has not been fixed. But I still wish to give a few days to every province.

329. SPEECH AT THE MEETING OF THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE RELIEF SOCIETIES, PATNA

Gandhiji addressed them at length, emphasizing at the outset the absolute necessity of all societies working in co-operation in deciding upon a plan of action, in consultation with the Central Relief Committee. He deprecated strongly any distinction of class, sect or religion being introduced or maintained in the matter of relief. Gandhiji insisted that the construction of huts and semi-permanent houses should not be undertaken on any haphazard plan. They should be prepared to accept the advice of Government experts and should refrain from building houses on condemned lands. It was really a very difficult question and the advice of experts must be scrupulously followed. In Mothiart and Muzaffarpur, he would advise people not to build on those sites which had been declared unsafe and would ask them to wait until the monsoon was over. He appealed to them to alleviate suffering, even where the sufferer was unwilling to ask for help. Relief should reach the old, the destitute and the lame at their places and the ant and elephant should not be judged by the same measure of relief. Workers should not be guided by any other test but that of pure sufferings.

BHAI THAKKAR BAPA,

I got your letters. I sent a wire to you yesterday. I started working at 2 this morning, and that is why I am able to take up this letter at 3. There was no other way. I wanted to write to you yesterday but could not find the time for it.

I will give you the 5th and 6th. I hope Ghanshyamdas will be able to come.

I must go to Purnea in connection with the Bihar tour. Rajendrababu has fixed a programme according to which the visit to Purnea would be postponed for the present and I would spend one day there on my way to Assam. You can go to Assam a day earlier. We may start together from here and I would get down at Purnea, spend Monday there and, leaving the place on Tuesday, reach Gauhati on Wednesday. My plan is that after finishing the Assam trip we should return to Bihar, spend a week here, during which we should complete the Harijan tour in Chhota Nagpur, and then go to Orissa. From there we should return to Bihar again. After spending a few days here, we should draw up another programme. This is how my mind is working. We should give some time to every province. By doing so we shall be able to do something at least, if not much. We shall be able to meet the local workers. But we can plan all this only when we meet.

I will start from here on the 27th to go to the North, and return on the 4th. You can come here on the 4th if you wish. Ramnarayan complains that he has not heard from you. He is pressing me to tour Rajputana.

Lakshmidas Shrikant has asked for help for the Bhil Seva Mandal. What reply can we give to him? We shall discuss the matter when you come here. Please note down all such points in your diary. Otherwise we might forget about them.

Please send the two hundred rupees to Chidambaram.

BAPU

[PS.] We must pay the railway fare to Bijapur. We can’t spend a single pie from the Harijan Fund. If we spend any money from it, we would be stealing it from the Fund. I am returning the letter concerning Assam as also the one concerning Chidambaram.
Lakshman Shastri’s letter is enclosed. I think we should give him the help which he has asked for. If you also feel that way, send him what you think right for that purpose. Bring the letter with you and note down the point in your diary.¹

Vamanrao’s letter is enclosed.

333. TALK WITH ASHRAM INMATES²

PATNA,
March 22, 1934

I have called you all here today particularly to tell you something about not courting imprisonment. Many of you may be having many questions and doubts on that point to be solved. Only those people should now court imprisonment who feel independently that they would not be at peace without going to jail. And those who go to prison must be sure that they are leaving everything behind. I have felt from the beginning that this would go on for long. Now my belief is confirmed that it is bound to be a prolonged affair. Hence, only those who are willing to die and get buried in jail should go there. Otherwise they should start earning. This point should be well understood. I had a letter from Godse\(^1\). He wrote saying that Narandas had, stopped, the money he had been sending to his mother and asked, instead, why she needed so much money. He wanted to know why he should be questioned on this point. He found it very humiliating. I myself did not think so. But I wrote to him: “You can never benefit by doing something which you feel is humiliating”. Self-respect is an imaginary thing, but for a person living in the world of imagination that alone is the real thing. Man rises and falls in the world of imagination. When one feels that one has been humiliated, one’s soul is, as it were, crushed. And so it is only here that one can rise and fall. It is one’s ladder. Once one has ascended or descended it, the ladder collapses by itself. That is why I wrote to him:

“Your duty lies in finding some occupation suited to you and making a living. For that purpose, enter the market and know your worth. You are a capable man. You would find some work. Your expectation would not be fulfilled if you want me to look out for work for you. You may get Rs. 20 or 30 at the most. You must completely give up the idea of going to jail. I shall not blame you for it. That is the path Devdas and Ramdas have taken. You too must follow their example and achieve success.”

JAMNALALJI But it involves the question of breaking a vow. What about it?

GANDHIJI Without understanding the full implications people decide impulsively to join the struggle and court imprisonment. It is not as if the struggle would go on for ten or twenty years! I do not insist that one who has taken the vow under such an impression should honour the vow. For he has not taken it in full knowledge. If such persons do not go to jail, they will not go down in my estimate. A man has to decide for himself the importance of a vow. If he faces a situation which he had not dreamt of at the time he took the vow, how can I hold him bound by it?

But do not be under the impression that the people who are out today, earning money and living a life of indulgence will for ever remain in that condition and that their turn will not come. Their opportunity will surely come and then they will plunge into it of their own accord. After all, how long can one indulge in worldly pleasures?

Say for one, two or at the most next five years. Ultimately one is bound to flee, saying ‘Oh, what is it I am doing’. Mrityunjaya met me only yesterday. He said his feeling was increasing day by day that he was slipping away from me. I however said to him, “The very fact that you have such a feeling shows that you are coming closer to me. In a few years your father, I and everybody will be dead and you and others will succeed us. Today I feel as if I had lost the three of you: Devdas, Govind [Malaviya] and you.” I do not say that what you have been doing is the right thing. But I do not blame you even in my thoughts. For were it not so you would become conceited. I am sure that ultimately you are going to take the plunge by yourselves. And only then would your taking the plunge do you credit. Who else have I except persons like you? Surely, I am not going to produce new workers. Those who are in touch with me and have faith in me are carrying on the struggle with my attitudes and ideas in view. They will carry on the struggle independently when I am gone. Today I do not find them acting spontaneously. They have to depend ultimately on my judgment at some point or the other.

Today I wish to prevent you from doing what you do not on your own feel inclined to do. That is why those who say they want to go to jail, those who even show a certain amount of enthusiasm, should not even think of going to jail. Yes, anyone who has in addition to enthusiasm, such zeal and faith and passion, who feels that he would go mad if he did not go to jail should certainly go to jail and remain sane. You may find this condition strict, but it is not so. Only the rupee which fetches sixteen annas is a real rupee. If a rupee worth fourteen annas mixes with it, the value of the real rupee also declines. Therefore, anyone who has the slightest doubt about himself or is slack about observing the rules of satyagraha, should give up the idea of going to jail. That is why I am beginning to feel that I am sufficient by myself.

Satyagraha is a complete dharma. I have acquired that science from family relationships. As I see it more and more, I see with the heart what I formerly saw with the mind. Satyagraha is a beautiful word. A satyagrahi does not claim to do more than hold fast to Truth. Satyagraha is a matter of religion. And if that is so, it should be sufficient even if one person resorts to it. But satyagraha is so much mixed up with asatyagraha1 that it does not make an impact. Satyagraha cannot be a matter of politics as far as you are concerned. It can only be a matter of religion. The true face of religion is revealed only when there is despair everywhere. But what appeals to me may not be your religion. Only what appeals to you can be your religion. Anyone who is permeated by satyagraha filled with religious emotion would melt the hearts of people even in jail. If we are thus made, the closer we come to the British, the more we would be able to persuade them. This is self-evident.

Kevalram is pure-hearted but he has not yet overcome his desire for indulgence. He had not yet fully recovered from illness and suddenly felt that he should positively go to prison. But his friends told him that if he went to jail in his state of health, he should know that he would die in jail, and, in that case, his going to jail would amount to suicide. They asked him to consult me and so he came to me. He said he had not come to ask me whether he should or should not go to jail. But would it be suicide if he died there? I said: “Not at all!” Living or dying is in the hands of God. If one went to prison with the intention of dying, it would be suicide. Whoever goes to prison should do it intending to live. As for me I would say even from my death-bed that I am alive and I do not wish to die. If anyone says that he wishes to go to jail but adds that it is only so long as Bapu wants it, it has no meaning. What matters is what one feels from within. This is not the time to go to jail just because Bapu says so. Anyone who has the slightest doubt, who has still something to ask me, whose faith depends on my faith should not go to jail. I have no intention of sending those people to jail who feel that they should do it for the welfare of the country. For such persons may not be able to stand satyagraha or bring any credit to it. I am covering such persons for the time being. Let them also not go to prison thinking that they cannot stay out so long as Sardar is in prison. Nor should they think that because they are the colleagues of Jugatram it would be improper for them to stay out while he is in prison. It is enough if I alone uphold this kind of friendly sentiment. I represent all of them. All of you must be kept out even for the release of Sardar and others. Welfare of the country is certainly included in the welfare of the world, and individual welfare is included in the welfare of the country. On the other hand, individual welfare should include the welfare of the world. I start with myself. Individual welfare is no welfare at all. If you start with your own self, you would never make a mistake anywhere. Let people who understand this go to jail. Satyagraha has not really entered our hearts so that we would always say that we recognized only the welfare of the country. We desire to achieve the general welfare through the welfare of an individual.

SWAMI: Should not a striving satyagrahi endeavour to be a more perfect satyagrahi by going to jail?
BAPU: I do not wish to suggest that the endeavour should consist only in going to jail. He will even mount the gallows when the time comes. I would expect total sacrifice from such persons. But those satyagrahis who feel that they would go mad if they remained out may as well go to jail.

SWAMI: It is known from experience that the courage and faith of a striving satyagrahi are strengthened by going to prison. It does not happen in the case of every one. But how can we stop the few who have had this experience from going to jail?

BAPU: I am not stopping such people. There are two kinds of people: those who can do introspection only when in jail, and others for whom the test they have already undergone is sufficient. People of the first type go to jail of their own free will for the sake of spiritual uplift, where as the second type of people have no such independent will. When they have reached their limit, one cannot insist on their going to jail. A satyagrahi would strengthen his faith in satyagraha by going to jail only if he has spiritual confidence. The question of course arises as to what you should do after I have gone to prison. I had publicly stated that no one should follow me. Sardar followed the instruction to the letter and I saw salvation only in that. An English newspaper commented that when Gandhi was arrested not even a dog barked. I consider it a compliment. Had it been just a question of making dogs bark or of raising a din, Sardar alone and many others would have been able to do that to a certain extent. Still, they realized the situation and swallowed the bitter pill. The result was that people did not volunteer to go to prison. But it was a good thing that happened. I do not know what the situation would be when I go to jail again this time. I would be going to jail after four months. Some adjustment may have to be made if something happens at that time. For instance, there may be another such earthquake right at that moment, or the Viceroy may call me for negotiations on the 2nd of August. This is just a possibility. And I am merely talking to you of a hypothetical situation, that some such development may lead to my reconsidering courting imprisonment. It is not possible to stay out any more on the ground of the Harijan work. I can do that work even if I am in prison. Then supposing I am gone to jail; your duty would occur to you when the time comes.

SWAMI: If you go to jail now after doing Harijan work for a year, it is probably not necessary to fight for the old permission for the work. You even stated once that you felt that whatever was necessary had been done. Is this not right?

BAPU: No. If I did say anything like that it must have been in my sleep. Even this time I am going to ask for permission to continue Harijan work and the Government will have to grant the permission. Having brought the work to this point, it cannot be abandoned. Today untouchability has become weak and limp. So much material is now ready as a result of my tours that I must continue to work from prison in order to give a final burial to untouchability. So it is unthinkable that the work should come to a halt and the campaign should become slack by my disappearance from the Hindu world.

Questioned what should be done in the event of his having to fast to secure permission for working in jail, Gandhiji said:

Even if I am released, the fast would continue, for it would be an unconditional fast unto death. I would no doubt meet you if I am released. And I would continue to say something or the other during the period I should be alive. And you would be a witness to it. And at that moment, if I am in the right, I would be repeating only Truth as the Gita enjoins. This would show you the way. If not, you would follow the dictates of your own hearts. You would get together and interpret my words. But I would not be present at the time.

In reply to a question from Jamnalal, Gandhiji said:

If I am in prison and my fast is continued, I would say that your task would be to go from house to house, explain things to the people and do whatever you think proper.

Pointing out the difference between 1922 and 1934, he said:

From the political point of view and in view of a blunder like Chauri Chaura it was necessary in 1922 that we should refrain from fighting. It would have been a mistake to fight when we were not prepared. Today only the spiritual view-point is left. If satyagraha is carried on from a spiritual point of view, it will be pure and if it is carried on with purity, you can rest assured that it will become widespread. Even a single pure-hearted satyagrahi would be sufficient for this purpose. A satyagrahi should observe complete discipline in jail. If he does not, his purity will suffer and satyagraha will decline in value.

When asked what a person should do who believed in civil disobedience as the only appropriate political programme, as it was the only effective policy, he said:

This is citing the example of Jawaharlal. But I am not talking about that point of view just now. However, I would ask even such persons to stay out. Just as I was the only representative at the R.T.C, it is enough if I am the only one in the present political programme. It would be fully accomplished thereby.

Q. Why, in that case, should the Congress adhere to the satyagraha programme?
Yes, it should, because without it the Congress would be wiped out of existence. Externally, the Congress has no organization at all today. It is in a state of anarchy. Hence, this is the only way if the light of the Congress is to continue to shine. Those who have no faith in C. D., may do any other work for the national uplift, but not in the name of the Congress. They may do it as individual Congressmen.

334. HARIJAN TOUR AND BIHAR

It was a matter of sorrow to me to interrupt the Harijan tour. It had to be, because it was a clear duty to answer the call from Shri Rajendra Prasad, who had postponed it as long as he could. Whilst anti-untouchability work is undoubtedly greater and its message of a permanent character, like all chronic diseases it can dispense with personal attention in the face of an acute case, which that of Bihar is. He who is called by Rajendrababu, the physician in charge, has to answer the call when made or not at all. When, therefore, the call came, I had to suspend the tour. But I want to assure anti-untouchability workers in the provinces not visited that I hope to resume the tour as soon as circumstances will permit and that Rajendrababu feels about untouchability no less keenly than I do. He will disengage me at the earliest possible moment. I hope to take Utkal and Assam first, and of these two that will have preference which for climatic reasons demands it. Let the workers beware!

Harijan, 23-3-1 934

335. IMPLICATIONS OF ANTI-UNTOUCHABILITY

A Hubli correspondent asks the following questions:

Is untouchability natural or artificial? Does it not depend upon the moral and intellectual development, mode of life, etc., of the people composing the society? Can you give a picture of a society where untouchability is completely removed?

In my opinion, untouchability is a wholly artificial product. It has no connection with moral or intellectual development of people, for the simple reason that in Hindu society there are to be seen men described as untouchable who are in every way equal in moral and intellectual development to the highest among caste Hindus and yet who are treated as untouchables. My picture of a society free from untouchability is one in which no one will consider himself superior to another. It is obvious that in a society so composed there will be no unseemly rivalry or quarrelling.

The correspondent next asks:

Are inter-dining and intermarriage necessary for the removal of untouchability?

My answer is no and yes. No, because it is no part of the programme of the Harijan Sevak Sangh. Generally, too, marrying and dining are matters of individual concern. No one has a right to ask another to choose a girl for wife or to dine with anybody against his will. But my answer is at the same time yes, because if a person refuses to take food touched by another person on the ground of untouchability or inferiority, he is observing untouchability. In other words, untouch-ability cannot constitute any ground for restraint on inter-dining or inter-marriage.

The correspondent next asks:

Can an imperfect person be a competent authority for introducing changes in the religious observances or customs?

Imperfection is a relative term. All mortals are more or less imperfect. But an imperfect person may not be so imperfect regarding a particular change as to be incompetent to make it. A person, however imperfect otherwise, may have fairly fixed notions about the use of intoxicating drugs and liquors. He has then every right to propose and bring about changes in the drink habits of people, although they may be based on religious grounds.

338. LETTER TO LILAVATI ASAR

CHI. LILAVATI,

I got your letter. What shall I write to you? How can it be that you don’t get my letters? You should not harass Prema in that manner. You may try to copy her self-sacrifice and her hard work. If she wants any personal service from you, by all means render it. But how can you insist on giving such service if she doesn’t want it? Now that Narandas is there, follow his advice. Get well anyhow and become steady in mind.

339. LETTER TO NARASINHARAO B. DIVATIA

PATNA,
March 23, 1934

SUJNA BHAISHRI,

It is my misfortune that I have to write only letters of condolence to you.

I have just received a letter from Gokulbhai from which I learn

1 From the G.N. Register that your daughter`s son, Premal, has passed away and left you to a lonely existence. Poor boy, how was he to know that you could not be lonely? Anybody who has a living faith in God, who can call him lonely? Gokulbhai writes that both of you comfort those who come to comfort you. I was filled with joy and pride to read it. May your faith in God increase. Premal himself has passed to a blessed state. Perhaps you remember that I met him once in the blue bungalow.

Yours,
Mohanandas

340. LETTER TO BHAGWANJI A. MEHTA

March 23, 1934

Bhaishri Bhagwanji,

I have always welcomed your letter. Your frank words always please me.

You have mixed up two or three issues.

My own experience of Prabhashankar has been different from yours. But I needn`t dwell on that, since my experience doesn`t count.

I agree with your views about Wills. According to the rule that one can be certain only of that which is in one`s hands, I think it best for parents to make in their own lifetime any arrangements that they wish. But in this case I must consider the situation as it exists. From a moral point of view, I look upon the document drawn up by Doctor as a Will. Everybody who wants to accept a legacy should also observe its conditions. One of the two sisters is in such a condition that it would have been the duty of the brothers to support her even if there had been no Will. Ratilal himself is not capable of looking after himself. Hence, if my voice could have any effect, I would see that his sister, who is more incapable of looking after herself than Ratilal is of looking after himself, got some share. Who knows, such a noble act may bring greater benefit to Ratilal. In any case it cannot harm his interests. Whether or not the sister gets a regular share, my sense of duty to the departed friend and to his family, and especially to Ratilal and Champa with whom I have maintained a special relation, will urge me to insist that the sisters should get a proportionate share each from Ratilal`s share, even if he pays it in instalments. You are not right when you generalize from Narbheram`s case. I am sure you know the saying in English “Hard cases make bad law.” I hope you also know that Narbheram does not accept your charge as true.

The resort to civil marriage in the case of Devdas and Lakshmi was to satisfy Rajaji. All of us wanted a religious ceremony. But there was no difference between civil marriage and religious ceremony as we understood its significance. According to the meaning which we attach to religious ceremony, its purpose was served by civil marriage. According to me the Hindu law requires many reforms.

I think I have now replied to all your questions. I am doing what I can about Bihar. I think you have sent a handsome amount.

341. MESSAGE TO THE PRESS

Patna,
March 23, 1934

In the course of a special message to Amrita Bazar Patrika,1 Gandhiji lays down the following rules for the guidance of the relief workers:

(1) Overlapping should be scrupulously avoided.
(2) Not an anna should be spent for advertisement or to produce any spectacular effect.
(3) There should be no unseemly rivalry between relief organizations, whether Government or popular. There should be rivalry in doing silent timely service.
(4) Every organization should know what others are doing.
(5) Expenses of management should be minimized as much as possible, consistently with efficiency and accurate account-keeping.
(6) All distinctions of high and low should be altogether abolished.
(7) Those in receipt of relief should be induced to do some productive work.
(8) Relief centres should be kept in perfect sanitary condition.
(9) All volunteers should know how to render first aid and teach the villagers the rules of elementary sanitation.

344. LETTER TO HARIBHAU UPADHYAYA

March 24, 1934

BHAJ HARIBHAU,

I have just read your article on non-violence. It is good that you think that way. But the article is not worth publishing. You should go still deeper. Non-violence is not such a simple thing as it would appear. Instead of writing an article about it, it would be better to note down the thoughts that come to you and the difficulties you face while practising it. Your statement that non-violence is universally accepted as a religious principle is not quite correct either. It has been so accepted only to a certain extent. Some people consider it right to kill wild animals. Others consider it right to kill evil-doers.

Of course there can be no harm in writing such articles again and again in order to clarify your own thoughts.

1 Gandhiji made the statement in connection with a report published in some Madras and Bombay papers that Mahatma Gandhi favoured Council entry.

2 The document having been overwritten by someone, the year and contents are not clear.

3 Gandhiji probably meant that he had met Hariprasad during his halt at Wardha en route to Allahabad.
How is your health now? I am returning the article.

345. SPEECH AT DANAPORE

This is my second visit to Danapore. In your address you have remarked that on account of the havoc caused by the recent earthquake the Harijan uplift movement has been thrown into the background. This is all right. Whatever I told you during the course of my speech at Patna, I will again say that almost everybody in this world has suffered and even then the public will soon forget this great disaster caused by it. As we have completely forgotten the previous earthquakes in the history of this old world and consider them as historical incidents, we will hold the same view about this earthquake also after due course of time. But so long as untouchability exists, we are reminded of our miseries. Some people consider untouchability as their religion and if it disappears it would be some sort of calamity to them. But if you look at it dispassionately it cannot be defended. Those also who call themselves sanatanists understand that untouchability is indefensible, and I think it is the staunchest class among sanatanists who hold this view. After this earthquake we ought to be more humble, as death is inevitable. Therefore those who feel sorry for this disaster may become humbler. God has warned us in this manner and if we do not pay heed to this warning some greater disaster is in store for us. Shastras lay down that complete destruction will overtake the whole creation some time. In the light of all these divine lessons we ought to become more humble and do away with this sin of untouchability.

Those affected by the earthquake are more than a crore but there are others in this province who have escaped this disaster, and who have lost nothing. Therefore they should subscribe as generously as people from outside the province have done. In fact it is your duty as neighbours to subscribe to the relief funds.

\(^1\) From Chandulal Dalal’s Gandhijini Dinwari
Yesterday we were discussing the budget of the Relief Committee. The whole sum amounted to forty lakhs and yet certain things were left out. The total collection up to date is just about 20 lakhs. The distressed must get help from the people and you must give your proper share by subscribing generously. Another thing I would draw your attention to is that workers are to be brought from outside. In my opinion that is not the proper course. Biharis must supply enough number of workers. Only if it is impossible shall we call outside workers to assist us.

Making an earnest appeal to the Bihar students, Mahatmaji said:

I have to say few words to the students also. They have not come forward as they ought to do. This has really grieved me. If you can show cause why students are unable to come forward I shall understand it. But in fact there is little cause why they should not come. In my Harijan tour I had many opportunities to come into contact with students. They have expressed their intention to give their spare time to whatever humanitarian [work] may be shown to them. The student community is everywhere alike. Therefore, I hope that they will even now come forward and give their names to Rajendra babu. There are students from Calcutta who have come here after leaving their own work simply to help us in this disaster.

Now as regards the relief problem. It is our determination to help those who have been struck hard but you may remember that we are not out to make beggars of them. Those who will work will get help in return. This is all that I have to say. The purse which has been given to me I think does not contain subscription from all those who are present here. Therefore I would appeal to them to pay their share also. I may make it clear that half of the entire money collected on the spot and given to me in the shape of a purse will go to the Harijan movement and half of it for Bihar Relief.¹

The Indian Nation, 28-3-1934

¹ At the end of the meeting, in response to Gandhiji's appeal Rs. 252 was collected and the address, which was auctioned, fetched Rs. 401.
346. LETTER TO N. R. MALKANI
March 25, 1934

MY DEAR MALKANI,

I have just finished studying your memorandum on the two Bills. You are prolix. The note is not revised. The argument is weak in places. You have not before your mind’s eye the audience whom you are addressing. The Speaker’s rulings have no validity in law or before the knowing public. We have to convince the opponent—our friend the sanatanist. If I was one, you would not convince me. But that is neither here nor there. What you want is some lead to our Sanghs. In this I have anticipated you. If that is not enough you must tell me.

Your note may help Munshi. But it is not a brief. A brief would contain a chronology of events and no argument.

I hope you got my programme.

PATNA,
March 26, 1934

CHI. DUDHIBEHN,

After careful thinking and for more reasons than one, I have come to the conclusion that it is best that Valji should tour with me at present, that it is his dharma to do so. I know that you and the children will feel the separation from him. But you should derive joy from such separation. If Valji did not keep good health with me, I would not let him accompany me. He certainly keeps good health. And he is also useful to me. You need not, therefore, think more about him. The present programme is up to the end of July. After that, God will lead us as He wills. I hope that you and the children will take the same view as I do and remain happy.

I hope the weather there has now improved.

March 26, 1934

CHI. MANILAL AND SUSHILA,

I got the letters from you both. Give up all hopes about Shanti.
If Sushila steadily improves her efficiency, she will be able to shoulder more responsibility. Satisbabu’s wife does not know English, but she shoulders the whole burden of Khadi Pratishthan and its Prakshran Mandir and has released Satisbabu for Harijan work. The truth of the matter is that both of them think only of service.

I understand what you say regarding West1. I think his services have been so valuable that, even if he has come to feel aversion now towards us, we should not forget all that he has done in the past.
However, you may act as you like. I don’t want you to do anything

350. LETTER TO CHHAGANLAL JOSHI

March 26, 1934

CHI. CHHAGANLAL,

I have sent you a wire today, and am waiting for a reply. I hope you were able to complete your fast successfully. A seven-day fast should not be hard for anybody. It can do nothing but good. But one must know how to end it. Food must be light and should be increased gradually. One must pass stools regularly. Let me know what effect the fast has had on your body and mind.

1 A. H. West

Please don’t expect frequent letters from me these days. I can with great difficulty write any. The letters which my companions may write are all that are possible. The companions are constantly changing, and that is another reason why I can’t dictate many letters. Though I know your keen desire for letters from me, I am not able to satisfy it.

I don’t wish to ask you to come over—it wouldn’t be proper for me to do that. But if you can’t restrain your desire to come, then do come. I have written to Narandas and Vasumati, and said the same to them. I wrote the same thing to Gangabehn too. She didn’t come. But you need not follow anybody’s example. Follow the promptings of your own heart. One may not obey one’s nature for committing a sin, but it will not be a sin to come to see me.

Chimanlal\(^1\) had written to me about your request for money. Since you had made the request, I have asked him to send you the sum. What remains does not belong to any one person; it belongs to all of us. If it was in your charge and if I was in jail, would you not have used it according to your discretion? It is only by accident that I am outside. My being outside makes no difference to our intention at the time of taking the decision to sacrifice the Ashram. It was indeed a difficult one to act upon: “Nobody should draw any money from the Ashram funds; everybody should return to jail as soon as he is released and should do without money even in jail.” But this has remained so only in theory. Thanks to my coming out of jail, the thing broke down still further. But the fact remains that that was the intention. All of us should adhere to it to the best of our ability. It will be enough if we bear this in mind. No other check on you is necessary. Please let me know if you see any error in this reasoning.

Miss Harrison has joined us. Pyarelal came with her. Miss Lester also has been with me. I am going out again tomorrow to visit the affected areas. Don’t read too much meaning in Miss Harrison’s

351. LETTER TO RAMABEHN JOSHI

March 26, 1934

CHI. RAMA,

I got your letters. If you have not taken your decision to go to jail as a matter of dharma, you should revise it. We have discussed the issue at great length here. As a result of the discussions, some have changed their minds. A summary of the discussions' will probably be sent to everybody. If you two wish, you may wait till you have read it. Apart from this, however, jail is our home. To be out of jail is to be homeless. But this is so only for those who regard going to jail as their dharma. To such persons, the hardships of jail life are a source of joy whereas comforts outside jail give pain. If you clearly understand this and the reasons behind it, you may by all means go to jail. If not, you ought not to go. Your not going will not displease me. I would love to write more, but I cannot do so for want of time. I hope Vimu is all right. Dhiru must have gone to Bhavnagar.

352. LETTER TO AMBUJAMMAL

PATNA,

March 26, 1934

CHI. AMBUJAM,

I was glad to know that you too are accompanying the Hindi squad, along with Gomati and Sarasvati. You must have received both my letters. I hope you are tranquil and that the climate suits you. I also hope that you will meet me some day somewhere. Do write to me all your experiences.

PATNA,
March 27, 1934

CHI. AMALA,

Your letter is before me. Do not try to do too many things at a time. If you will serve Harijans, then do not think of the meningitis patients. They will be nursed otherwise. Whatever is needed to qualify you for your task, you will certainly do. You must not fear me. I am not going to drive you out unless you drive yourself out. You have need to fear yourself rather than any other person. I am well.

Love.

354. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, CHAPRA¹

March 27, 1934

Today a terrible calamity has overwhelmed us all alike Hindus, Mussalmans, Christians and the rest, the so-called highborn and the low-born, without favour or distinction. If even this terrible blow does not enable us to purge ourselves of ‘pride of place and blood’, to obliterate all arbitrary, man-made distinctions between man and man, then I would only say that there is none so ill-fated as we. The conviction is growing upon me day after day that human intellect is incapable of fully understanding God’s ways. God in His wisdom has circumscribed man’s vision, and rightly too, for, otherwise man’s conceit would know no bounds. But whilst I believe that God’s ways cannot be comprehended fully by man, I have firm faith that not a leaf falls without His will, and not a leaf falls but it subserves His purpose. If only we had enough humility, we would have no hesitation in accepting the recent earthquake as a just retribution for our sins. This is not to say that we can with certainty attribute a particular calamity to a particular human action. Very often we are unconscious of our worst sins. All that I mean to say is that every visitation of Nature does and should mean to us Nature’s call to introspection, repentance and self-purification. Today, more than ever, our hearts need a thorough cleansing and I would go so far as to say that even the recent earthquake would not be too great a price to pay, if it enabled India to cast out the canker of untouchability.

355. SPEECH AT MEETING OF RELIEF WORKERS, CHAPRA¹

_March 27, 1934_

Gandhiji said he had offered his respectful co-operation to the authorities on the present occasion. He explained that there was no other way of saving the masses from the overwhelming calamity that had befallen them. The issue before them was not of co-operation versus non-co-operation or Congress versus Government, but simply of how best to serve the suffering masses in the face of an unparalleled calamity. What was really needed was food, clothing, shelter and above all water. Mr. Gandhi warned the residents against feeling sore because they found that adequate relief was not forthcoming or justice was not done in individual cases. They should cease to think in personal terms and learn to think impersonally in terms of collective good. They should not forget that the extent of the calamity was so great that Government or any other agency, however well inclined, could not afford complete relief. He would therefore reiterate to them what he had previously said that the healing balm that could cure Nature’s wound like the present one must come not from without but from within themselves. That saving sovereign balm was human sympathy and human love, which would enable them to forget their misfortune in a glow of mutual co-operation and service.

356. LETTER TO SIR GEORGE SCHUSTER

Patna,
March 28, 1934

Dear Sir George,

Nothing, in the wreckage of Irwin-Gandhi contract, has pained me so much as the wreckage of the free salt for the poor. A friend reminds me that the notifications about it have never been withdrawn. Is this true? You know the history of the adoption of that clause. It was inserted on purely humanitarian grounds. Can salt be salved? Can it be removed from the purview of civil resistance and ordinances? I had no difficulty in tendering co-operation in combating the Bihar disaster. There was something to tender in that matter. In the matter of the poor man’s salt I can but invite co-operation. Can you help me? No, not me, the poor man?

Yours sincerely,

357. SPEECH AT SONEPUR

March 28, 1934

I know what this part of Bihar has gone through. The sufferings of the people have drawn the attention and sympathy of the whole world. In spite of the liberal response to the Viceregal appeal and that of Babu Rajendra Prasad, it will be impossible to make good the tremendous losses suffered by North Bihar. But even if they were made good, it would be a very poor result of Nature’s terrible warning, if nothing more substantial were to come out of it. The donors of the two funds and the numerous other societies have perhaps satisfied

1 Finance Member of the Viceregal Council
2 Officials saw in this letter “another attempt by Mr. Gandhi to establish relations with Government”, a policy which they thought they had “got very definitely to discourage”. Schuster accordingly wrote to Gandhiji on April 6, saying there was no change in “the Government’s decision to give concessions about the collection and manufacture of salt to local residents” but that there was such abuse of the concession in some areas “that it became necessary to withdraw it.” For further correspondence on the subject.

their consciences by sending in their donations. Will the recipients be satisfied with merely receiving their share of the timely gifts? What is your reaction to the Divine wrath? If you and I do not learn the moral lesson which the calamity teaches us, then, that neglect will be worse than the calamity itself. Yesterday, as the motor was passing along the Gandak embankment, I received a note from the Doms of a village close by, telling me that they were suffering terribly from want of water, as the villagers would not allow them to take water from the common well. I drew the attention of the Headman to the note and he promised to put the thing right, if it was found that the Doms’ complaint was justified. God’s wrath was felt equally by the rich and the poor, the Hindu and the Mussalman, the caste man and the outcaste. Shall we not learn God’s terrible impartiality that it is criminal to consider any human being untouchable or lower than ourselves? If a single Dom or any other human being is denied the use of village wells, surely, the lesson of the fifteenth of January will have been lost upon us. I want to test you this very minute. I know you are all poor, earning your bread by the sweat of your brow, but I know that there is in this vast crowd none so poor as not to be able to afford a pice. I want every one of you to contribute your coppers as a sign that you have repented of the sin of untouchability, that you do not consider anyone lower than yourselves and that in your own persons you are determined to abolish all distinctions of high and low. I do not want any of you to give me anything except on the condition I have made.¹

358. SPEECH AT HAJIPUR²

I have been visiting the quake-affected areas. This is for the second time that I have come to Hajipur after the terrible catastrophe. The houses have been seriously damaged and people have been beset by untold miseries. It is indeed very gratifying to see that the Government is giving relief to the affected persons. Attempts are also being made for giving relief from other agencies. The people have been involved in trouble no doubt, but all of us should face them with courage. Do not be professional beggars. Relief is intended for needy

² This was delivered at the station where Gandhiji and party made a brief halt on their way to Muzaffarpur.
persons. So help should be given only to those who are badly in need of it. Healthy persons should earn their wages instead of begging. Up till now, as I learn, the Bihar Central Relief Committee has been able to collect about twenty-five lacs of rupees while thirty-two lacs of rupees have been deposited with the Viceroy’s Earthquake Relief Fund. The volunteers and workers of the relief agencies should give a correct estimate of the losses. Exaggerated reports should not be given.

We are committing sin. Throw off the shackles of untouchability. Our body is impure. We should try to be pure. No body should be looked down upon, since all are creatures of God. I am a Bihari, since I have lived for many months in Bihar. The Biharis should do away with untouchability. It is folly to consider oneself to be exalted in rank or dignity. We should have pity for all human beings.

I have learnt from the Chapra Collectorate that about two thousand wells are badly needed in Saran District. I think the most important problem is that of water supply. Nobody can live without water. I would therefore lay special stress on the necessity of wells in the affected areas. Wells should be sunk so that people may drink water without any distinction of caste or creed.

Finally, I appeal to the audience for giving their contributions to the Harijan fund. Any amount, however trifling it may be, will be welcome. If people will not give contributions, I will think that they are not ready to support the cause of Harijans. The people at Sonepur gave some contributions. I have been favourably impressed with the people for being quiet all along and I thank you all for the patient hearing you gave me. But I would yet request you to be quiet and avoid demonstrations.

359. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

MUZAFFARPUR,
March 29, 1934

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

Please don’t get angry with me. I am writing this letter at 2.45 a.m. I had set the alarm for 3 a.m. It went off before 12 and I got up. I cleaned my teeth and sat down to write. After a while my eyes fell on the clock and I saw that it was only twelve. So much work had accumulated that I didn’t have the courage to go back to sleep, and so I decided to finish as much as I could. I have almost finished the articles for Harijan and am writing this letter to you. After finishing this I will write a letter to Ba. I will send you her letter the next time. I
I have yet to get a copy made.

You made me wait a long time for your last letter. I hope you will write regularly now. Miss Harrison is a strong-willed woman, and so is Miss Lester. The former is maturer. Her sincerity and humility are boundless. Miss Lester is slightly ill and has stayed on in Patna. Miss Harrison has come along with me, We are in Muzaffarpur just now. In the morning we shall leave for Belsand. Some Ashram workers are camping there. Pyarelal is with me. He will remain with me for a few days only. I shall see. Valji and Himmatlal are attending on Miss Lester. We were in Chapra yesterday. We stayed there with Dr. Mahmud.1 We find everywhere houses which have been completely destroyed. Dr. Mahmud is doing good relief work in co-operation with the Collector. I met the head of the Relief Department. What you were able to do (at the time of the Gujarat floods) is not possible here at all. Even so, the work will be done well. Whatever money is given will reach the right people.

Jamnalal will remain in Bihar for the present. Lakshmidas has practically recovered. He also will remain here and look after the manufacture of khadi. Jamnalal will fix up the others, too, in suitable work. Bhulabhai came and saw me. He had gone to Gaya in connection with some case. From there he came to see me. He could discuss a few things only.

It seems Mani is being tested fairly severely (in the Belgaum jail). That is as it should be. God will protect her.

Ba will be released in May.

I shall be able to go to Gujarat only in July. Chandrasankar will come on the 3rd or the 4th. Don’t worry about me or about the developments outside. Our faith in God is not merely an intellectual pastime. He really exists. Rather, He alone exists. We think of Him before taking any step. We should, therefore, let Him lead us as He wills. I hope I am not assuming too much in thus including you also.

Have you got any company?²
I will not write more now.

360. LETTER TO KASTURBA GANDHI

March 29, 1934

BA,

It is 3.30 in the morning, and Thursday. I got your letter only yesterday evening. We are in Muzaffarpur today. Panditji, Swami and Kripalani are here. Madhavdas also is here. I shall meet Bal at 11. I am going to visit the place where Maganbhai, Raojibhai, Soman and others are working. I will ask Raojibhai to write to you. I will try to give you all the news that you want from me. But if anything is left out, ask me again. Prabhavati accompanies me these days wherever I go. Kunvarji is in Bombay. Rami also has gone there. Manu is better now. Madhavdas also is better. Vasumati has gone to Wardha. Chhaganlal and Rama have gone to Dwarka. Chhaganlal fasted for seven days just for self-purification. The fast ended on Monday. He is all right. Dudhibehn and Junior Kusum are in Bhavnagar. Kusum Desai has gone on a visit to Santiniketan. Her problem is not yet wholly solved. She is in search of suitable work. There was a letter from Manilal and Sushila. They are quite well. Chandrashankar will be returning in four days now. In Ahmedabad children get headaches, lose power of thinking, get fever and die. It is on the decline now. The disease is caused by going to cinemas, etc. Bad air is the chief cause. Yes, they have started a hospital in the Vidyapith building. I do not know where Kanti will go or stay after his release. I am going to write to him. Anandi and the other children are with Anasuyabehn and are quite happy. Anandi had mild fever. She is better now. Lakshmidas also is better. He is in Patna. Parvati visited Pragji. The latter is quite well. Devas and Lakshmi are still in Delhi. Rajagopalachari will go there in a few days’ time. Manibehn seems to be doing fairly well. I have had no letter from her. Nagini has gone to America and Amala is quite happy at Sabarmati. Janakibehn, Madalasa and others are in Wardha. Raojibhai’s Vidya is in Wardha. She has grown up and wishes to marry. They are in search of a suitable young man for her. Laksh-mibehn Khare is looking after the work at Wardha. The number of girls has gone up very much. It has exceeded fifty. Dwarkanathji also is there. Brijkrishna is in Delhi. He is better now. Pyarelal is with me.

The lady who was helping me in England is with me just now. It has not been decided what to do about the person who has come with her. It will be decided now. For the present she is here. Padmaja is all right. Mrs. Naidu did come to see me at Hyderabad. Panditji was not present on the Ramanavami day. The bhajan “Jaya Rama Rama” was sung by Somanji. We shall be leaving Bihar on the 10th to go to Assam. I will spend ten days in Assam and then return to Bihar. From there I will go to Orissa. I will reach that province in May. Yesterday I met Rajendrababu’s wife and Vidyavati. I am not sending a discourse this time. It is nearing prayer time now.

Blessings to you all from

361. LETTER TO MARGARETE SPIEGEL

March 29, 1934

CHI. AMALA,
I have been trying to write to you in reply to your letters but of late I have had no time.

I shall not drive you away when your year is over. Why should I do so? Can you not see that when I call you an idiot, I do so out of affection. And why should you worry how I describe you? You ought to restrain yourself. Can you not see that it is impossible for all who love me to be physically with me? But all can be with me through my work. You are doing my work. You should find satisfaction in that. When God wills it we shall meet.

I have told you that you need not think of nursing meningitis patients.

My weight is 108 and b.p. 160/120.

362. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, BHARTHUA CHAUR

March 29, 1934

Bapu, replying, mentioned Dr. Soft and Satyadevaji as workers who had worked strenuously for draining out the Chaur that was destroying the villages and 48 thousand bighas of land which the inhabitants possessed. Money could not help in removing the decaying inhabitants to other areas. Government and Rajendrababu were trying to find an outlet for draining out the water which would save lives and property worth lacs but they did not know what engineers, who were making contour survey, would advise; nothing possible would be left undone. Rajendrababu had decided to move the Committee for spending funds for this work.

If with all this, success is not ours, God only knows what is best. During rains there will be floods and houses will collapse, lives may be lost. So something must be done without delay. Your distress is some years old. The earthquake has multiplied it greatly. Have courage and faith. The matter is in good and capable hands. Remove the curse of untouchability. Love Harijans. Remove the distinction between high and low, touchable and untouchable. Why treat Doms as out castes when they do work like your mothers in childhood.

To women Bapu said:

363. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, SITAMARHI

[March 29, 1934]

Is it not shocking to regard the touch of a Mussalman or a Christian as unclean, even though he may be truthful, godfearing, pure, brave and self-sacrificing as any? God has created different faiths just as he has the votaries thereof. How can I even secretly harbour the thought that my neighbour’s faith is inferior to mine and wish that he should give up his faith and embrace mine? As a true and loyal friend, I can only wish and pray that he may live and grow perfect in his own faith. In God’s house there are many mansions and they are all equally holy. All the great religions of the world inculcate the equality and brotherhood of mankind and the virtue of toleration. The ‘touch-me-not’ism that disfigures the present-day Hinduism is a morbid growth. It only betrays a woodenness of the mind, a blind selfconceit. It is abhorrent alike to the spirit of religion and morality. The real untouchables were the impure thoughts that lurked in the mind: the lying, the covetousness and the deceit which marred our daily dealings. It was these whose contact was contaminating and ought to be shunned.

Harijan, 20-4-1934

3 A Muslim relief worker had brought to the notice of Gandhiji the difficulty he was facing because of the custom prevalent among the Hindus of considering food or water touched by any non-Hindu as polluted.
364. WANTED A MANIFESTATION OF CHRIST IN DAILY LIFE

I have no hesitation whatsoever in publishing this talk I by Miss Lester with missionaries. She handed it to me apologetically, asking me whether I would publish it as a supplement to Harijan, so that she could have a few copies for distribution among her friends, and, I suppose, at the same time give a few coppers in an enterprise devoted solely to the Harijan cause. When she put this talk among my papers with the introductory remark I have referred to, I had decided that I would either print it in the body of the paper or not at all. Let not the non-Christian readers be afraid of “a manifestation of Christ” in daily life. Whatever it may mean to Miss Lester, the word Christ is a common name, an attribute not to be attached merely to one single historical person. Each one, therefore, according to his taste may think of his own beloved teacher and guide, or, better, of the only infallible teacher and guide—Truth—and call it Christ. Let him read the conversation in the light of my interpretation and I promise the reader that he will profit by the reading. Many persons have written like Miss Lester before now. The value of her conversation lies in the fact that she endeavours every moment of her life to practise what she professes and preaches in her writing.

... Language is the means by which human beings misunderstand one another. Words are inadequate as vehicles for the conveyance of spiritual truth. ...

Neither can men be argued into Christianity.

What was it that converted the adulteress, who a few minutes before had been doggedly facing her judges, despising them but hardening herself to accept her fate at their hands? ...

Her conversion was the result of Jesus’ way of looking at things. His way of looking at people, at sinners....

Is it likely that this infectious thing, this knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ can be communicated academically?

By all means let us train the mind; let us dig deeper and ever deeper into all branches of knowledge, science and philosophy; let us bend our energies to exploring the whole realm of truth. But let us always remember how easily knowledge can be perverted to base uses. What mankind needs is to know how to live, what is the perennial source of joy, the peace that the world can’t give and can’t take away....

Jesus propounded His ideas in maxims such as the Beatitudes. Then He would re-clothe the same idea in a tale, knowing that thus it would stick in our minds better. But even thus, well-taught doctrines would not have moulded men’s lives, made and remade institutions and become the way of health and joy for millions, if He had not also embodied it in life, in His own life.

1 Only extracts are reproduced here.
Following the usual rough and ready method of punishing those who have harmed us, we do not pay overmuch attention to Jesus’ clearly enunciated maxim “Love your enemies.” But we are haunted by the memory of His attitude towards His executioners and His words: “Father, they don’t understand. Forgive them.”

“He that would be great, let him be the servant of all.” In clear enough words He proclaimed this rather startling doctrine. Throughout the centuries, its meaning has been distorted and explained away successfully enough. But its power to make us increasingly uncomfortable and at length to thrust us out from the narrowness of our privileged, selfish lives lies in the picture that lovers of Christ have enshrined in their minds, the scene where He took a bowl of water, knelt before each of His men—workmen some of them—and performed for them the servants’ work of washing the feet. . . . The Ashram set up by Verrier Elwin among Gonds has a special significance. The inmates live and work with the people, relying on their service alone whereby to commend to them the person and the power of Jesus Christ. . . .

I know nothing that brings me closer to reality, closer to God, than to be among a crowd of my neighbours in Bow at the end of a party, which perhaps they have organized for themselves instead of going round the corner to the Rose and Crown public house. . . .

Compromises have so dulled the sensibilities of Christians that young people often find little or nothing to challenge them in the religion presented to them. Their tendency is to turn either to money-making, sport or the barren habit of criticizing—none of them very creative activities.

The world cannot go on very long as it is now. A precarious balance is being sustained, certainly, but over an abyss. War can only be averted if peace lovers adopt as much vigour and earnestness as is shown by armament firms. We, Christians, can only overcome what is regarded as communist materialism, if our efforts to set up an equitable social order entail as much service and sacrifice as party members have to render as a matter of course in Russia.

As the love that incites us to serve our fellows is a part of the love we feel towards God, how can we shrink from suffering?

When God in man was manifest
He bowed beneath the rod;
The felon’s death, the lonely quest
Was good enough for God.

Perhaps it is good enough for any of us . . . to have the honour of living in a poor district, where people have that toleration that comes from facing day after day the stark-naked realities of life, death and hunger; where astounding generosity is scarcely noticed because it is so natural . . . where Christ is daily manifested through suffering, love and service.

_Harijan, 30-3-1934_

365. THE TEMPLE-ENTRY BILL

The Hon. Secretary, Harijan Sevak Sangh, Bombay Provincial Board, has addressed the Secretary to the Government of India, Legis-
I have the honour to communicate hereunder the views of the Bombay Provincial Board of the Harijan Sevak Sangh on the Temple-entry Disabilities Removal Bill, which has been circulated for public opinion under the orders of the Legislative Assembly.

At the outset I have the honour to observe that my Board are entirely in sympathy with the aims and objects of the Bill and are of opinion that it should be passed into law at the earliest opportunity. It is our firm belief that legislation of the type contemplated in the Bill is essential, if Government and Legislature desire to implement the pledges which have been held out, on more occasions than one, that all possible steps will be taken to remove the disabilities under which Harijans labour at present.

One of the main objections that has been taken against the proposed legislation is that it involves an element of compulsion and that it is proposed that either Government or the Legislature should not compel any individual or individuals or a religious organization to act in a manner which is opposed to so-called religious customs and usages. It is pertinent here to examine what these customs are and how they have developed in Hindu society.

At some time beyond living memory, a custom grew up of treating certain sections of the Hindu community as the excluded classes, and in the development of that custom certain rights as Hindus were denied to the members of such excluded classes. Objection was taken if they entered the temples on the ground that they were unclean and their touch or mere shadow would pollute the devout Hindus who were visiting the temples for darshan. Gradually, the members of the excluded classes were thus completely debarred from entering the temples. This has, in the course of time, come to be recognized as custom and usage, and this having obtained legal sanction, the Hindu community is obliged, whatever its present views may be, to exclude the untouchables from the temples.

The real position, therefore, is that compulsion is already there in the shape of the recognition given by British Courts of Justice to the custom and usage by which members of the excluded classes have been treated as untouchables and denied the rights of temple-entry. In Madras, such custom and usage has been specifically recognized by the Madras Religious Endowments Act II of 1927, Section 40 of which accords full legal sanction to it.

With the change of times and circumstances and with ideas developing from day to day, several customs and usages have undergone material changes. In some cases, the Government, relying on the opinion of leading Hindus, have thought fit to legislate against well-established and well-recognized customs and usages in face of the opposition of a majority of Hindus, with a view to bring the state of Hindu society in line with modern ideas. In other cases, the opinion of the majority of Hindus has either thrown custom overboard, where the sanction of law was not necessary for such action, or got the Government to pass legislation to set aside such custom.

Apart from the strictly legal and technical attitude, to argue, therefore, that the Bill involves an element of compulsion, without considering what that compulsion consists of and how such compulsion is for the removal of a greater compulsion which already exists, would not be correct. The Trustees and beneficiaries are now by law compelled to exclude the Harijans from darshan at Hindu temples. If the prevalent opinion amongst the Hindus of today is that this element of compulsion should be done away with and it be left open to the Hindus to decide for themselves as to how far the excluded classes should be allowed to be treated as members of the Hindu community and to enjoy the rights or privileges of darshan, a state of circumstances must be brought into existence which would leave the door open for necessary action in that behalf. It does not necessarily follow that, on the passing of the Bill, a rush will be made at all the temples by the excluded classes to assert their rights of darshan. The disqualification being removed, it will then be a matter for adjustment between Hindus and the members of the excluded classes to adjust affairs without friction and without bringing themselves under the provisions of the criminal law of the land. The view that the passing of the Bill would upset all principles and tenets of the Hindu religion would be erroneous. In fact, even after the passing of the Bill, the excluded classes will not be able to have darshan at the temples without the goodwill and the tacit consent of the Hindus. That the entry of the excluded classes into the temples for darshan is not so abhorrent to the mind of the Hindus is apparent from the fact that on certain days of the year some very important temples observing the most orthodox and rigid rules are thrown open to all classes of Hindus, including the excluded classes. At all events, going to a temple for darshan is entirely voluntary. In certain circumstances and on certain occasions, even members of the so-called high-class Hindus are prohibited entry into certain parts of the temples. In certain cases, such Hindus themselves observing certain rules refrain from going to temple, believing themselves to be in a state in which their attendance at the temples would pollute the temples as well as those attending there for darshan. The degree of compulsion, therefore, so far as this Bill is concerned, is infinitesimal as compared to the existing compulsion, which has already been imposed by reason of the recognition granted to custom and usage which had grown under circumstances which no longer exist.

The difficulty as regards the removal of custom and usage is all the greater, because in most of the cases there are no specific Trusts. Ordinarily, the Trustees would have the power to exercise their discretion, as prudent men of the world, in considering who should be admitted and to what right. But here the sanction obtained by custom and usage comes in the way. New Trusts cannot be declared. There are no specific Trusts and reliance is placed on custom and usage to shut out the discretion of the Trustees or even the beneficiaries, meaning the Hindus. With the passing of the Bill, the result will be that the power to exercise such discretion is restored to the Trustees and, where necessary, to the beneficiaries, who can by an express vote of majority decide how far the classes of beneficiaries should be extended and, that, too, without in any way interfering with the existing rights, so that it comes to this—that the compulsion and the consequent disability from which those in control of temples are at present suffering is sought to be removed and the door thrown open and the power of discretion restored to them to act according to the circumstances and according to the wishes of those immediately concerned. It does not, as is apprehended in some quarters, direct the Trustees to commit breaches of Trust. In fact, the whole difficulty is created by the absence of specific Trusts. It only creates a situation where the Trustees, as prudent men and with the sanction of the majority, can extend the privilege of darshan, etc., to the members of the excluded classes on such terms and under circumstances which may be acceptable to Hindus.

Under these circumstances, the element of compulsion, if any, involved in the Bill is really and substantively to eliminate the greater degree of compulsion which is at present extant.

The second objection is (as to) whether the Bill seeks to interfere with any person’s religious practice or conscience. My Board hold the view that, having regard to the fact that the entry of members of the excluded classes on certain days of festival during the year in the most orthodox Hindu temples is not objected to by the Hindus and is not considered as interference with the religious practice or conscience of a high-class Hindu, the extending of that privilege to members of the excluded classes on other days in the year cannot, in substance, amount to any interference with the religious practice or conscience of a high-caste Hindu. Apart from this, every Hindu in going to temples submits to various customary restrictions and interference, and no pious Hindu complains, as his sole aim and object in attending the temple on any particular occasion is to have darshan and perform puja and that aim and object is not in any way interfered with by the permissive legislation now sought to be put on the Statute-Book. The statutory recognition of the existing custom and usage in this respect serves, however, as a solid obstacle or bar against any modification of the existing state of things, and this is what makes legislation necessary, not with a view to hit or counter the religious practice or conscience of Hindus but to give those in authority over Hindu temples a right to give the members of the excluded classes their due status as Hindus and thereby prevent a cleavage in the community.

In effect, therefore, it merely amounts to a variation in the practice of worship hitherto observed, but such variation cannot be regarded as interference with the inherent or vested right of persons. In fact, the right is one which, in the ordinary course, would have been modified in the larger interests of Hindu society or in the interests of certain classes but for the legal sanction accorded to custom and usage. Interference, therefore, as used, does not amount to or mean an objectionable tampering with the vested rights of any person or persons, but is a mere statement of fact that, in the existing conditions as compared to what is proposed to be done, there would be a variation which may technically be called interference.

Experience shows that, in spite of the willingness of the Trustees as well as the worshippers of a particular Hindu temple, it is well-nigh impossible for a public Hindu temple to throw its doors open to Harijans, in view of the English Law of Trusts and the known decisions of the High Courts in India. It is for this reason that my Board hold that the recognition of the custom and usage by the High Courts of India and the Privy Council makes legislation absolutely necessary, as the effect of the decisions of these Tribunals cannot be overcome in any other manner. The legislation now sought to be enacted is permissive, and with the provisions of criminal law now in force, it cannot be actively enforced without the goodwill of those vitally concerned, namely, the caste Hindus.

The foregoing views are expressed purely from a legal point of view. The question of throwing open a temple to excluded classes is one of great public and practical importance. If a substantial majority of Hindus at a particular centre are in favour of admitting the excluded classes to the local public temples, the element of compulsion mentioned above need not stand in the way of the proposed legislation, as such element of compulsion would be found in the conduct of all human affairs.

But the compulsion involved in the Bill is, as above indicated, of a type which may be described as vox populi, vox Dei, and to ask a body of people to act according to the opinion of the majority of that body cannot truly or partly be said to be compulsion. The effect of the Bill is actually to remove the compulsion resting on the Trustees to act according to a custom or usage, even if it has received judicial recognition, if such custom or usage does not find favour with the majority of the people any longer. The law, as it stands at present, may be utilized as an engine of oppression even by a single caste-Hindu worshipper at a temple to impose his will, not only on the Trustees of that temple, but on all the other worshippers at that temple who may be willing to allow a Harijan to worship at that temple. The real effect of the Bill is to deprive a caste Hindu of the engine of oppression which judicial decisions have provided him with. To put it in another form, it will deprive the caste Hindu of the power given to him by judicial decisions to compel the Harijans to submit for all time to the disabilities imposed on him. Though the proposed legislation involves compulsion in theory, in practice, if the proposed Bill becomes law, it will give liberty to the worshippers at a temple to conduct their worship in accordance with the prevailing views and wishes of the majority.

On the grounds set forth above, my Board are emphatically of opinion that not only are the aims and objects of the proposed measure unexceptionable, but the method by which it seeks to achieve them are such as to cause the minimum extent of inconvenience, hardship or social disturbances.

They, therefore, request that the Legislative Assembly will enact legislation on the lines proposed at an early date in the interest of the Hindu community as a whole, apart from the duty that Government and Legislature themselves owe to the depressed classes.

I disclose no secret when I inform the reader that this representation has been drawn up by an eminent lawyer of Bombay. It is an able and dispassionate examination of the legal position. But like all documents drawn up purely from the legal standpoint, this suffers from the usual limitations.

It was open to the Board to combine with the legal, the moral and religious argument. For, the representation is addressed not to a court of law but to a Government and through it, to a Legislative Assembly, both of which are bound to take note, as they have done, of extra-legal matters. These often become decisive factors with bodies that are not hidebound by legal procedure and other legal limitations.

Thus, in my opinion, the Board might have embodied in their document their composition and their capacity to voice Hindu public opinion. It might have told the Assembly that the Bill was necessary, both in fulfilment of the Yeravda Pact and of the broad policy of the Government in respect of Harijans.

The Bombay lead can be well followed by the other provincial boards. They may examine the question with particular reference to their provinces, taking care always to understate rather than overstate the evidence as to Hindu public opinion.

The question might be asked why during the Harijan tour I did not myself take the vote of the public on the question of the proposed legislation. It presented itself to me in the beginning stages of the tour, and I came to the conclusion that, if I took the vote, it was highly likely that the people would give their votes because I was asking for it. I should not mind receiving co-operation of people in simple faith, where faith could be legitimately exercised. In this instance, faith had no play. People had to decide on a highly technical issue in which knowledge of parliamentary procedure and function would be presumed. I had no time nor inclination to give that kind of training to the vast mass of mankind that appeared at meetings. And if I had attempted any such thing, I would have strayed far away from my mission, which I had claimed to be purely spiritual. Then, if I had begun to take votes on the propriety or otherwise of temple-entry legislation, there would have been danger of my being engaged in a hot controversy with sanatanists. This was the last thing in the world that I would do. I, therefore, deliberately refrained from putting the question of legislation to the vote of my audiences.

Whenever, therefore, I spoke on the question, I contented myself with giving my opinion that it was the duty of every Hindu reformer to press for legislation, if the pledge given at Bombay in 1932 was to be redeemed. But if the vote of the savarna Hindus in general was not to be taken, what was to be done? I came to the conclusion that those only could properly have any opinion on the question who were conversant with parliamentary procedure and functions. They could appreciate how, under certain circumstances, for the very preservation of religious neutrality and freedom of conscience, on which sanatanists very properly insist, legislation might be imperatively necessary. Such bodies were, first of all, lawyers’ associations and, then, societies of Shastris, Harijan Sevak Boards and other representative bodies who could claim to have a say in such matters. I hope, therefore, that all associations who are interested in the removal of untouchability and who have a right to be heard will make their opinion known to the public and the authorities concerned.

But I have no desire to force legislation upon an unwilling public. Nevertheless, it cannot be educated nor its opinion ascertained, without reasoned public discussion and legitimate canvassing. If in the end it is found that enlightened caste-Hindu opinion is against legislation, I, for one, would not desire to see it carried by a mixed majority vote. All that I contend is that Hindus who have faith in temples have the right and owe it as a duty to enforce their opinion, wherever an overwhelming majority wants to open public Hindu temples to Harijans. And if there is a legal hindrance, as lawyers say there is, it can only be, and therefore should be, removed by law.

366. SPEECH AT WORKERS’ MEETING, SITAMARHI

Gandhiji said that he wanted to tell them that they should mind the work before them. If they wanted _seva_ they should forget politics. For a while they should forget the name of the Congress which had got work to do and not to earn name. The waving of flags or raising of cries did not bring name or fame. Work alone could give prestige and prestige had got to be maintained. Government, he said, had got to help people in distress.

But we cannot compel Government to do so. Neither should we stand in the way of help. The hungry will eat and the thirsty will drink from whatever hands they get it. Let them receive help from all. We must co-operate with Government in our work of relief. It is our dharma to see that things are given and taken. We have to clean and dig as many wells as we can immediately, but the number of workers is small.

The population here is large and everybody has not got sufficient work on his hands. We have to take workers from the ranks. Thousands of workers from outside can do nothing. Work in the wells is full of danger and involves labour. Workers must be local. If they want wages or pay, we have to give them. If this work is neglected by anybody, even Rajendrababu, who is my fellow-worker, it is no good. If we are unable to do this, we cannot ask people to contribute to our funds. Money will flow in only if Bihar is efficient in duty. He who does not command confidence and respect cannot get anything, not even a cowrie. Rajendrababu’s reputation is established in the country and every part of India has sent money to him, for they have full confidence in him. Rajendrababu has got a fine band of workers which ensures the right use of the people’s money. So they pay. You have got to prepare more and more workers. Prepare the figures of wells damaged and we shall settle how many we can restore or give. It will be very painful if even one man suffers and remains thirsty through our neglect. People can go on for some time without food, but want of drinking water kills soon. I have experience of the Boer War, where people drank any water they could get hold of. I have seen the water of the Bharthua Chaur. It is poisonous. I was trying to go over the water in a boat, so dirty and poisonous it was. How could people drink that? The question of medical relief is also now before them. Outside doctors cannot avail. You have to organize medical relief locally. Get together workers, work efficiently in co-operation with other societies, associations and the Administration. Consult local Government officers. They can help greatly if they take up work openly like what they are doing in Chapra, where there is co-operation between the District Magistrate and our workers and all are working together and very well.

367. SPEECH AT PRAYER MEETING, SITAMARHI

This is a terrible earthquake, perhaps, the most extensive in its destruction of any known to us in history. We must strive to overcome the devastation. But if we merely build up our fallen houses, dig out our blocked up wells, and clean our sanded fields, we shall not have done enough, if we do not learn and benefit by the moral (spiritual) lesson of the earthquake. It will be of no use even if we repair all the material damage and even if we get all the crores of rupees needed. Matter is nothing; spirit is all that lasts. The bodies of Sita-Rama, Radha-Krishna have all gone long ago. Nobody knows now even what they were like, but their spirit remains even now. We, in Bihar, have got to build up out of this disaster not merely material structures but a spiritual structure which will live through the centuries to come.

We have to realize how God made no distinction in his destruction between the high and the low, between the Hindu and the Muslim and so on and in the work of reparation we too must forget all distinctions. We must build up a unity and brotherhood amongst ourselves, which will purify and strengthen us. We must also remember that the whole world is looking at us and is watching to see what we shall do, and how we shall use the money collected from all over the world. Shall we eat it up like beggars without trying to help ourselves? No, we must not let this sacred land of Sita become a beggar-land, but we must work to earn money collected and must help one another. I know, the old sin of untouchability has been deep-rooted in Bihar. But it has now got to go for ever, if we are to be able to say that we have learnt the lesson of the earthquake.

Proceeding, he said that he was now going to ask them to give him a pice or even a cowrie and he would accept that pice or cowrie as a token of the removal of untouchability from their hearts and then he could find that untouchability was leaving Bihar.

368. LETTER TO DR. M. A. ANSARI

[Before March 31, 1934]

My emphatic opinion is that the paralysis of the intelligentsia must be removed. However much, therefore, I may differ as to the Council-entry programme, I would welcome a party of Congressmen pursuing that programme rather than [that they] should be made sullen, discontented and utterly inactive. I still retain the view that the Congress cannot, without committing suicide, give up the Poona resolution, but if the majority of the Congressmen do not feel like carrying on this, I would welcome a meeting of the A.I.C.C. at which it should express its opinion and withdraw the Poona resolution. I am sure that the country would agree with their courageous behaviour.

371. LETTER TO F. MARY-BARR

AS AT PATNA,
March 31, 1934

CHI. MARY,

I was wondering why you had not written earlier. I was agreeably surprised when Narmada agreed to put herself under your charge. I know that it would have been her making if she could have held on. But it was too great a change for her. Without any company, without a knowledge of English and finding herself in a hut instead of a palatial house, she will collapse. But I quite agree with you that you have unexpectedly an opportunity of being all by yourself. I have no doubt that you will make the best use possible of it. I am glad to find that Duncan is getting on.

I have undoubtedly thought often of living with Harijans. But it is no easy matter without injuring the cause. To live with them is certainly not a troublesome thing, but it is a matter of joy. But living with them would shut out the sanatamists. And my purpose today is to work on the latter rather than the former, because my mission just now is to call caste Hindus to repentance. I have therefore left the matter in the hands of local men. In a place in C.P. I was able thus to stay in a Harijan boarding [house]. I think that the velocity with which the Hindus are responding to the call for repentance is satisfactory. The progress will be still greater when caste Hindus have realized the enormity of the sin of untouchability.

The tamarind water you mention is quite all right. It does not give you any rheumatism. In order to counteract any such effect it might possibly have I would suggest your adding 10 grains of soda to every drink of tamarind water. I hope that you are keeping good health.

I am just now touring the affected areas. Some of the destructions wrought by Nature defy description. For instance I cannot give you an adequate picture of a house whose walls have sunk actually three feet deep in the ground. There are cracks everywhere in its massive walls which could not be less than 18 in. in width. Most of the fair lands are covered with two or three feet of sand where it was impossible to get any sand at all before the earthquake. How far will the twenty lakhs of the Committee and the 30 lakhs of the Viceroy take the people? The damage is so enormous.

Love.

372. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 30/31, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS,

I didn’t get any letter from you from Wardha. I received the first one from Rajkot yesterday evening. I am writing this letter before the morning prayer.

The calamity in Bihar is too awful for words. I feel like asking you to come over, but I have been exercising control over myself. This does not mean that I don’t want you to come. If you wish to come or have anything special to discuss, you may certainly come. I have merely left the decision to you.

I was surprised to read about your nose trouble. You should draw in cold water through the nostrils. Take complete rest in bed and get the head massaged with oil. Put a mud pack on the head at noon and drink as much milk and eat as much fruit as you can. For fruits, you may eat oranges, fresh grapes or raisins, and also pomegranates, if good ones are available. There is a good variety from Kathiawar. I expect to receive at Madhubani a reply to my wire.

The idea of bringing the children to Rajkot seems good. However, if Jamnadas does not keep good health and Purushottam’s condition is no better, nor Jamna very strong, it doesn’t seem proper to keep the boys and girls there. If the plan is carried out, it means that I will have to keep you in Rajkot. If the children cannot be kept in Ahmedabad, why cannot they be kept at Wardha? Is language the reason?
A churning is going on in my heart at present. But I have come to no conclusion so far. I shall know in a day or two what the result is.

I was interrupted yesterday after I had written so far. I am now writing this while preparations for leaving are under way.

It is God’s kindness that Father and Mother are well. Is Jamnadas resolved not to take rest? Neither Chimanlal, nor anybody else for that matter, should interfere with Titus’s work. When we have handed over a thing to somebody to manage, we may give only as much help as he may ask for. To take interest in what we have given away is like sacrificing oneself for the sake of the dead. You have still not given me your opinion about whom we should appoint as the new trustees of the dairy. I have thought of Ambalalbhai, Shankerlal, Ranchhodbhai and Parikshitlal. Shankerlal knows the Ashram rules and observes them to the best of his ability. Chimanlal has suggested the addition of Pannalal’s name. If, however, Pannalal’s is included, he will have to give sufficient time to the dairy. Will he do so?

Regarding Lilavati, it is as you say.

I can’t write more now. My respectful greetings to Father and Mother.

Blessings from

373. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, DARBHANGA

March 31, 1934

Gandhiji said that he had seen sands on lands that used to smile with plenty; he had seen wells destroyed or filled with sand and rivers dried up. None, however hard-hearted he might be, can remain unmoved at the sight that he saw. Not to speak of the palaces of the Maharajadhiraj, which were smashed to pieces, even the poor man’s dwellings had been reduced to heaps of ruins. What could he do? What could the whole world do? The situation presented a hard problem. They could get some relief; they could get money but the real thing needed was sympathy. Monetary help was only a token of such sympathy. Their duty at this juncture was clear. They should

1 About whether the civil disobedience should be withdrawn
2 Extracted from Pyarelal Nayyar’s “Weekly Letter” strive for internal purity.\footnote{This paragraph has been taken from The Searchlight.}

Gandhiji made a fervent appeal for the abolition of the bar sinister, as a measure of self-purification and reform. Referring to the allegorical story of the elephant and the alligator, he reminded the audience that the visitations of Nature were the inevitable—however long delayed they may be—consequence of our sins and were intended to rouse us from our spiritual slumber. The elephant and the alligator, the legend goes, were in their previous birth brothers. But, instead of loving each other like brothers, they hated each other and so were condemned to be born as natural enemies. Still they refused to reform. One day, when the elephant visited the lake, the alligator seized his leg and tried to drag him under water. The deadly struggle lasted for “a thousand aeons”. Finally, when the elephant found his strength failing and only the tip of his trunk remained above the surface of the water, he called upon God and God came to his rescue. His delusion left him and he again loved his brother, both of them being restored to their human form through God’s grace.

Nature utters its warning to us in a voice of thunder. It flashes it before our eyes in letters of flame. But seeing, we see not, and hearing, we do not understand.

He warned the people that, if they failed to pay heed to Nature’s signals, Nature would exact her due with compound interest.

374. TALK TO RELIEF WORKERS, DARBHANGA

March 31, 1934

Gandhiji referring to the problem of middle-class relief, said that he was not unaware of their distress. He did not want them to be neglected. He only wanted the right thing to be done in the right way and in the right order. The question of urban house reconstruction and re-establishing petty crafts, avocations that had been crippled, was a stupendous task, involving expenditure of crores. Only an agency like Government with adequate resources could properly take it up. But the question of water supply in the villages for the time being must wholly engage the attention of the Relief Committee. That alone might take away 20 lakhs of the Committee. He warned them against penny-wise policy in matters of necessary expenditure. They must quickly disburse the funds and complete the programme of well reconstruction before the commencement of the rains. They could then be in a position, with that achievement to their credit, to approach the public for further funds for other work. In the mean time the middle class must not despond but should co-operate with the Relief Committee in the preparation of statistical survey of the extent of disorganization and damage done, the estimate of relief required and a list of deserving incumbents. The Committee could then with their data go to Government and with its help take concerted measures for relief of the middle class. Above all, they should remember that clear thinking, careful planning and energetic and quick execution alone would save the situation. The policy of carelessness, hesitation or doubt would spell disaster.

_The Searchlight, 4-4-1934_

375. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, MADHUBAN

_March 31, 1934_

Gandhiji expressed his deep sense of distress at the disaster and the havoc visible on all sides. It looked as if some powerful enemy had bombed towns, villages, palaces and mud houses but no bombs could shatter the firm surface of the earth like what he saw now. Houses had been swallowed up by yawning chasms. It was terrible. He observed:

As I viewed the picture of ruin spread out before me at Rajnagar, I felt overwhelmed and crushed by the weight of human misery. But then I remembered Kunti’s prayer, ‘O Lord, send me misery and misfortune always, lest I forget Thee!’ It may not be given to us to have Kunti’s Himalayan faith to utter that prayer. But may we not at least learn from it the lesson of using our calamities as a means of self-purification and turning the mind Godward?

Continuing, he said he felt the irony of the situation when man attached himself heart and soul to such ephemeral objects as had been destroyed in a few moments. He could very well understand why _rishis_ and _munis_ advocated renunciation and rejected all attachment, all ease and luxury. The episode of Gajendra Moksha came vividly to him now. It was like the whole elephant being immersed in water drawn in by the Graha, only the tip of the trunk remaining out and enabling the struggling Gaj to invoke the aid of Lord Vishnu by presenting lotus held in that remaining portion of the trunk. They, the sufferers, had likewise to invoke the Lord, to become humble, to look inward so that hope may dawn . . .

Look, there the black-flagwallas are come and they are waving black umbrellas too. Well, let them come and have their say, if they like. I have got to speak in their presence about removal of _chhuachoot_ (untouchability). The demon of untouchability has got to be driven away.

1 The meeting was attended by more than 25,000 people. A summary of the speech was also given in Pyarelal Nayyar’s “Weekly Letter”, _Harijan_, 21-4-1934.
2 This paragraph is taken from _Harijan_, 20-4-1934.
3 At this stage some black flags were demonstrated at the meeting.
Gandhiji categorically reiterated his view on untouchability, which he characterized as contrary to the teachings of the Shastras and abhorrent to the spirit of sanatana dharma, which was the most catholic and tolerant of all religions in the world. He asked:

Is it not ridiculous to regard a Dom as untouchable, when for performing the same function we honour and worship our mother?

While Gandhiji’s speech was in progress, the intruders disappeared as mysteriously as they had come.¹

376. LETTER TO ESTHER MENON

AS AT PATNA,

3.45 a.m. April 1, 1934

MY DEAR CHILD,

I had your long letter after keeping me waiting for a long time. There is not in your letter enough search for truth that is, the hidden purpose of God. When we know that God Himself is the mystery of mysteries, why should anything that He does perplex us? If He acted as we would have Him do or if He acted exactly like us, we would not be His creatures and He our Creator. The impenetrable darkness that surrounds us is not a curse but a blessing. He has given us power to see the steps in front of us and it would be enough if Heavenly Light reveals that step to us. We can then sing with Newman, ‘One step enough for me.’ And we may be sure from our past experience that the next step will always be in view. In other words, the impenetrable darkness is nothing so impenetrable as we may imagine. But it seems impenetrable when in our impatience we want to look beyond that one step. And since God is love, we can say definitely that even the physical catastrophes that He sends now and then must be a blessing in disguise and they can be so only to those who regard them as a warning for introspection and self-purification.

I understand what you say about the children. I am glad that you are in Kodaikanal with the children. You will let me know when Menon gets something. Agatha Harrison is with me. It is rather a trying time for her, not being used to the Indian life. But she is standing it bravely because she wants to learn everything that she can in the shortest time possible. Muriel Lester, I left at Patna. She was not doing well. I return to Patna on the 4th April to leave it on the 7th for Assam. I return again to Bihar about the 25th, pass about a week and

DEAR CHARU PROBHA,

I have your letter.

Why should you lose faith? We do not always get things to happen as we want them to. But we can always look at them with detachment. What we have to do is to do our allotted task from day to day and find joy in the doing of it. There is no other way to peace.

I do not know when the visit to Bengal will come off. Presently I shall be going to Assam and in the first week of May commence the tour in Orissa. I do not yet know when I reach Puri.

You must write again and tell me more definitely what worries you.

378. LETTER TO ABHAYDEV SHARMA

April 1, 1934

Bhai Abhay,

I congratulate you on your being relieved from the Gurukul. I somehow had a feeling that to appoint you Acharya of the Gurukul might be harmful both to the Gurukul and to you. But it was your dharma to stay on there as long as the Sabha was not willing to relieve you. Now your relations with the Sabha and the Gurukul will be on a pure spiritual level, as they ought to be.

Unless there are other reasons for it you should not be hasty in courting imprisonment on account of the inner conflict I am going through. You should await my decision.

I knew nothing about the gut used in carding. I had believed Maganlal was our surety in the matter. Anyway, I shall now enquire. And this is of course true that I had made no special effort in this direction. Animals are not slaughtered for the guts. We use the gut in the same way as innumerable people use shoes made from the hide of slaughtered animals in spite of their devotion to cow-protection. When gut is taken from naturally dead animals we shall use that gut. But for the time being, I do not see any harm in using the gut that is available. So far I have not found any string which can satisfactorily replace catgut. You should keep an open mind on the subject of gut and go on using it considering that it is indispensable.

380. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

April 2, 1934

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I am now in the midst of heart-searching. Maybe before you get this letter, I shall have arrived at a decision. I have received your telegrams. I am trying. I have stopped trying for Panchgani and Matheran. Nasik seems easier to me. I have received your telegram. Hence, I shall try for Nasik.

Miss Harrison is with me, She is a very good lady. Tell the doctor that I have no trouble at all. Doctors had been unduly scared. I am of course taking care. I had sent you a telegram. You must have received it.

I am sending herewith my definition of swadeshi. It can be put into practice if you are in the field. I have sent it to Jalbhai and Lilavati.

381. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

[Monday, April 2, 1934]

CHI. BRIJKRISHNA,

I am writing this at 3.30 on Monday morning from a small village. I had seen the letter about you addressed to Jamnalalji. Your duty is to go and stay in the Ashram. But just now it is almost impossible for you to do so. There is no necessity for you just now to seek imprisonment. I am stopping others too. Write so to Krishna Nair. I am thinking hard. More you will learn later.

It is a good course for you to take up some work of service and your expenses to be borne by your brothers. I see dharma in their continuing to pay you a small sum regularly as long as they are earning even a little. It is also right for the family to spare one brother for the service of the country. Business will be beyond you. In a way service too is business. But all this should be taken up only after you have fully recovered.

You should make up your mind to follow the course I have suggested and be tranquil. You should also, without stirring from your seat, study the Gita and the Ramayana.

I am keeping well. I shall leave Patna on the 7th for Assam.

382. ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

April 2, 1934

Question: Is it not the duty of every Congressman and particularly an inmate of the Ashram to participate in the individual satyagraha?

ANSWER: Not at all, if they do not feel it from within.

Q. Won’t you like those workers to take part in civil disobedience who have dropped out from the movement for some reason or other but are always inclined to associate themselves with it?

A. I would like them to do so if they have understood the full significance of the religion of satyagraha, and they follow the path even at the cost of their life.

Q. Would you accept like Pt. Jawaharlal that the country stands to benefit by resorting to civil disobedience for winning political independence?

A. I would certainly accept it if the civil disobedience is pure.

Q. Is it not desirable that those who have been resorting to satyagraha against the Government with a political motive rather than as a matter of dharma should continue to participate in the civil disobedience movement with the same attitude?

A. I really doubt it.

Q. When on my return from here I meet Kalyanjibhai, Keshavbhai, Khushalbhai, Chunibhai and other workers of the Bardoli Sangh—would it be proper if I convey to them as a gist of my conversation with you on March 22, 1934 that they should join the struggle not for the sake of prestige, not for the sake of following any one of their colleagues but only if they have faith in satyagraha as a weapon and if they fully know the advantages and disadvantages of joining such a struggle?

A. It would be proper.

These replies reflect my mental state on that day. Right now there is conflict in my mind and it remains to be seen what comes out of it.

383. STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

SAHARSA, April 2, 1934

This statement owes its inspiration to a personal chat with the inmates and associates of the Satyagraha Ashram who had just come out of prison and whom at Rajendrababu’s instance I had sent to Bihar. More especially it is due to a revealing information I got in the course of conversation about a valued companion of long standing who was found reluctant to perform the full prison task and preferring his private studies to the allotted task. This was undoubtedly contrary to the rules of satyagraha. More than the imperfection of the friend, whom I love more than ever, it brought home to me my own imperfection. The friend said he had thought that I was aware of his weakness. I was blind. Blindness in a leader is unpardonable. I saw at once that I must for the time being remain the sole representative of civil resistance in action.

During the informal conference week at Poona in July last I had stated that while many individual civil resisters would be welcome, even one was sufficient to keep alive the message of satyagraha. Now after much searching of the heart I have arrived at the conclusion that in the present circumstances only one, and that myself and no other, should for the time being bear the responsibility of civil resistance if it is to succeed as a means of achieving purna swaraj.

I feel that the masses have not received the full message of satyagraha owing to its adulteration in the process of transmission. It has become clear to me that spiritual instruments suffer in their potency when their use is taught through non-spiritual media. Spiritual messages are self-propagating. The reaction of the masses throughout the Harijan tour has been the latest forcible illustration of what I mean. The splendid response of the masses has been spontaneous. The workers themselves were amazed at the attention and the fervour of vast masses whom they had never reached.

Satyagraha is a purely spiritual weapon. It may be used for what may appear to be mundane ends and through men and women who do not understand its spirituality provided the director knows that the weapon is spiritual. Everyone cannot use surgical instruments. Many may use them if there is an expert behind them directing their use. I claim to be a satyagraha expert in the making. I have need to be far more careful than the expert surgeon who is complete master of his science. I am still a humble searcher. The very nature of the science of satyagraha precludes the student from seeing more than the step immediately in front of him.

The introspection prompted by the conversation with the Ashram inmates has led me to the conclusion that I must advise all Congressmen to suspend civil resistance for swaraj as distinguished from specific grievances. They should leave it to me alone. It should be resumed by others in my lifetime only under my direction unless one arises claiming to know the science better than I do and inspires confidence. I give this opinion as the author and initiator of satyagraha. Henceforth, therefore, all who have been impelled to civil resistance for swaraj under my advice directly given or indirectly inferred will please desist from civil resistance. I am quite convinced that this is the best course in the interests of India’s fight for freedom.

I am in dead earnest about this greatest of weapons at the disposal of mankind. It is claimed for satyagraha that it is a complete substitute for violence or war. It is designed, therefore, to reach the hearts both of the so-called “terrorists” and the rulers who seek to root out the “terrorists” by emasculating a whole nation. But the indifferent civil resistance of many, grand as it has been in its results, has not touched the hearts of either the “terrorists” or the rulers as a class. Unadulterated satyagraha must touch the hearts of both. To test the truth of the proposition, satyagraha needs to be confined to one qualified person at a time. The trial has never been made. It must be made now.

Let me caution the reader against mistaking satyagraha for mere civil resistance. It covers much more than civil resistance. It means relentless search for truth and the power that such a search gives to the searcher. The search can only be pursued by strictly non-violent means.

What are the civil resisters, thus freed, to do? If they are to be ready for the call whenever it comes, they must learn the art and the beauty of self-denial and voluntary poverty. They must engage themselves in nation-building activities, the spread of khaddar through personal hand-spinning and hand-weaving, the spread of communal unity of hearts by irreproachable personal conduct towards one another in every walk of life, the banishing of untouchability in every shape or form in one’s own person, the spread of total abstinence from intoxicating drinks and drugs by personal contact with individual addicts and generally by cultivating personal purity. These are services which provide maintenance on a poor man’s scale. Those for whom the poor man’s scale is not feasible should find a place in small unorganized industries of national importance which give a better wage. Let it be understood that civil resistance is for those who know and perform the duty of voluntary obedience to law and authority.

It is hardly necessary to say that in issuing this statement I am in no way usurping the function of the Congress. Mine is mere advice to those who look to me for guidance in matters of satyagraha.

I have been touring in Bihar for the last several days. I have already seen the areas greatly affected by the earthquake. This tour will be over tomorrow evening. The scene was horrible. I can only imagine the actual scene which you all have seen. Palaces and big houses collapsed within a minute or two. Water came out. I do not know what was then the scene at Bhagalpur.

The Central Relief Committee and the Government are cooperating to remove your distress but the relief is for those who have actually suffered. The Gita says that to eat without doing work is to commit theft. If money is to come from Government we should not sit idle. The Government and the Relief Committee should help the deserving people. What help can be given to the Maharaja of Darbhanga and Deep Babu1 for their losses? It is also not possible to help all persons. No matter whether help is given or not, people must do their duty. The complaint on behalf of the middle class has been received, but there are representatives of the middle class in the Central Relief Committee. I pray the middle class should forget their position as such and think that all are equal. All are human beings, God is the same for all. The Central Relief Committee has forgotten the difference but the middle class ought also to be helped. Suppose there are men who are thirsty, hungry, who want cloth, and who want houses to live in, whom to help first? Nobody can take the share of the thirsty. The thirsty ought to be helped first. Let the thirst of the men and animals be quenched first, then help the hungry, then let cloth be given and lastly the houses constructed. We shall forget the earthquake in four months or in a year or two. If I come again I shall be getting money from you all. Even today you give money to me. The people of Bihpur brought money. I told them only if they believed untouchability to be a sin of the Hindu society, should they subscribe for the funds I am raising. They subscribed. Even the women touched my feet and offered subscription. Purify yourselves. Untouchability is a social sin. Nobody is born untouchable. If you want to remove your distress remove untouchability. No Viceroy’s fund, no Central Committee, can help you in this work. This is all that I have to say.

History of the Freedom Movement in Bihar, Vol. II (1928-1941), pp. 221-2 and The Indian Nation, 6-4-1934

1 Deepnarayan Singh
After so many lives were lost and so many houses destroyed, God has roused us from our slumber. All the religions say that when sin accumulates upon the earth, a total cataclysm follows. Untouchability is a great sin. Are we prepared to get rid of it or not is the great question. Someone has said that that sin is not confined only to the fifteen millions of Biharis.

Nothing can be more absurd than to suppose that the Biharis were specially marked by nature for its attention because they are more wicked than the rest. Misfortune is not a proof of an individual’s wickedness. All the same, there is an indissoluble connection between natural calamities and man’s sin. You cannot have an interruption of the moral law in one part without producing a reaction in the entire system. When one limb is afflicted, through it the entire body is punished. Every calamity should, therefore, lead to a thorough cleansing of individual as well as social life.

What sin have the Muslims committed? Shall I tell you their sin? Their sin is that they have kept up the relationship with us in spite of the fact that we observe untouchability. Can it be a divine law that some persons are born untouchables and remain so for generations? Even men do not have such a law. It does not exist anywhere in this world. The plight of Negroes in America is very bad. They are untouchables but they are not considered to have been born so. Treating them as untouchables is not considered a dharma. There are a vast number of people who treat Negroes as untouchables but such behaviour is not considered a part of religion. It is not that Bihar has incurred this punishment because it is more wicked. Bihar is a part of India. It is a part of the world. God alone knows His ways. We only know that God is full of compassion, love and kindness, so the punishment he metes out must have been based on justice. It is beyond my power to comprehend how. It is beyond the power of anyone. We should consider the calamity as an outcome of our sins—not your sins but mine. Everyone should consider Bihar’s calamity as his own and should feel as sad for those who died there as he might have felt at the death of his own relatives. One would be called a human being only if he did that and only then could he claim to know God. We should try to wash off our sins—individual and social—while this tragedy is fresh in our minds. The Earthquake Relief Committee won’t tell you how to do that. I have been a reformer from my childhood. I began that work with children and women. It is therefore not my dharma to ply you with sweet words and then leave you. So wake up if you have not woken up—and ask of God the strength to wash off your sins. The world is watching what the Biharis do in this hour of calamity. You must pass the test. May God give you the strength to grasp what I have said and to accept and implement what is worth accepting and implementing.

DEAR DR. ANSARI,

It was good of you, Bhulabhai and Dr. Bidhan Roy to come all the way to Patna to discuss the resolutions arrived at recently at an informal meeting\(^1\) of some Congressmen and ascertain my opinion on them. I have no hesitation in welcoming the revival of the Swarajya Party and the decision of the meeting to take part in the forthcoming elections to the Assembly, which you tell me is about to be dissolved. My views on the utility of legislatures in the present state are well known. They remain on the whole what they were in 1920, but I feel that it is not only right, but it is the duty of every Congressman, who for some reason or other does not want to or cannot take part in the Poona programme and who has faith in entry into the legislatures to seek entry and form combinations in order to prosecute the programme which he or they believe to be in the interest of the country. Consistently with my view above mentioned, I shall be at the disposal of the Party at all times and render such assistance as it is in my power to give.\(^3\)

Yours sincerely,

1 The letter was released to the Press with the following statement by Dr. Ansari, Dr. B. C. Roy and Bhulabhai Desai: “We arrived at Patna on the morning of the 4th instant and were able to confer with Mahatma Gandhi as regards the conclusions arrived at by the Delhi Conference. Notwithstanding the strain he had gone through, considering the importance of the matter he discussed with us for over three hours the various aspects of the revival of the Swarajya Party. The matter was again discussed today with Mahatmaji in the morning and in the afternoon, and the result of discussions is now embodied in the following letter addressed by Mahatmaji to Dr. Ansari . . .”

2 The meeting, which was held in Delhi on March 31, 1934, was attended by Madan Mohan Malaviya, Dr. B. C. Roy, Khaliquzzaman, G. B. Pant and other Congress leaders. The meeting decided to form a Swarajya Party and take part in the elections for the Central Assembly.

388. NOTES

HOW DO YOU PRAY?

God has blessed me with numerous friends belonging to different faiths. Some of these are anxious to help me in the movement against untouchability. The question is assuming a concrete form and requires a definite answer. My own position is very clear and precise. I need the co-operation of the whole world in this purity movement of gigantic internal reform. I have asked for the prayers of the whole world. But some non-Hindus want to translate their prayer into action, and that they would do, if they could, in co-operation with me. I would love to have it in the closest manner possible. But there is a limitation. Suppose I hand a Harijan child to a Christian or a Muslim friend or institution. What will they do? Will they bring it up as a Hindu or in their own faith? For me all the principal religions are equal in the sense that they are all true. They are supplying a felt want in the spiritual progress of humanity. Hence I have had no difficulty in bringing up Muslim, Parsi and Christian children under my care in their own faith. Indeed, I had to study some literature for their sake when their parents wanted me to teach them particular forms of worship according to special books. The easiest way to find out a man’s position is perhaps through his prayer. I suggest the following two forms:

I

O God! give all Thy creation wisdom, so that each may worship and follow Thee according to his light and grow in his own faith.

II

O God! give Thy creation wisdom, so that each may worship and follow Thee even as I try to do.

It is clear that the first form is all-inclusive and that, therefore, a person or institution that will subscribe to it can conscientiously bring up Hindu wards as Hindus, Muslim as Muslims, etc., whereas one subscribing to the second form can conscientiously take in only those who belong to his denomination, unless he takes others with the declared intention of converting them to his own denomination.

Will friends who read these lines and care write to me for my information which prayer they subscribe to and offer every day?

Harijan, 6-4-1934
389. AN ADI-DRAVIDA’S DIFFICULTIES

A correspondent writes:

(1) Are you really interested in the welfare of Harijans or are you actuated by any ulterior motive so as to show an increase in the population of Hindus?

(2) If you really think that untouchables form a part and parcel of Hindus, will you kindly throw light on the following shlokas of Manusmriti considered holy by the Hindus:

“If any Panchama carries on any trade which a respectable man conducts, and then grows rich, he should be deprived of his wealth and driven out of the country.” (Manusmriti, x. 96)

“Whosoever that affords tuition to a Shudra, will enter Hell along with him (Shudra). Any Shudra endeavouring to impart religious instruction to a Brahmin should be inflicted with the punishment of hot oil being poured into his mouth and ears.” (XIV. 89).

“All Shudra found talking with a loud voice should be branded with red hot iron bars. Any Shudra occupying an equal seat with a Brahmin, Kshatriya and Vaishya should be burnt with a red hot iron.” (VIII. 276, VIII. 271)

Hindus are commanded to observe this book as holy and act according to the injunctions contained therein. If you consider this as unholy, why should you not declare it as such and instead issue a new decree of your own called “Gandhimsmriti”?

(3) Even Arya Samajists are removing this untouchability, and their novel procedure in carrying out this task is to perform the ritual of shuddhi and then to admit the individual into the fold. If the untouchable is really a Hindu, how does this necessity arise? Do you agree with them in this respect?

The correspondent claims to be an Adi-Dravida and, therefore, he has every right to suspect my motive. The best answer, therefore, I can return to his first question is that he should await my death for forming a final judgment. Meanwhile, if he is prepared to accept my word, I would assure him that I set no value upon an increase in the number of Hindus so called. False professors of a creed not only do no service to it but may kill it. The only motive, therefore, that guides me in working for the Harijan cause is to see Hinduism purified of the curse of untouchability. And if, in so becoming, it is represented only by one Hindu, I would have no repentance but real joy that it was not dead.

The correspondent’s second question is very pertinent, only he would not have put that question to me if he had been a constant reader of Harijan and had, therefore, known my definition of Shastras. I hold Manusmriti as part of the Shastras. But that does not mean that I swear by every verse that is printed in the book described as Manusmriti. There are so many contradictions in the printed volume that, if you accept one part, you are bound to reject those parts that are wholly inconsistent with it. I hold Manusmriti as a religious book because of the lofty teachings contained in it. The verses quoted by the correspondent are flatly contradictory to the spirit of its main theme. The correspondent should know that nobody is in possession of the original text. In fact, there is no evidence to prove that a rishi named Manu ever lived. Somehow or other, the genius of Hinduism has made the writers or the givers of the grandest truths efface themselves. Therefore I have suggested to seekers after Truth the only safe rule for their guidance in studying Shastras, namely, that they should reject whatever is contrary to truth and ahimsa, the true foundations of all religions.

The correspondent’s third question should rightly be addressed to Arya Samajists. It is news to me that Harijans are required by the Arya Samajists to perform the ritual of shuddhi before being admitted to the Arya Samaj. But I have seen the shuddhi ceremony performed in order to strengthen the Harijans in the due fulfilment of the vow that they take as to abstention from beef, carrion-eating, drinking intoxicating liquors, etc. The correspondent quite rightly says that, if an untouchable is really a Hindu, no shuddhi is required of him. If any is required, it is required of the caste Hindu who has committed the sin of believing in untouchability.

391. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

PATNA,
April 6, 1934

Bhai Vallabhbhai,

It is about 2.30 a.m. just now. The National Week commences today. This has now become the usual time when I get up. I take a nap during the day. I had your wire inquiring after my health and I replied to it. Ansari saw me. He examined me. The gist of his report was that there was nothing particularly wrong. Everybody of course advises me to take rest. You may be sure that I take as much rest as I can. But the result is in God’s hands.

Ansari, Dr. Bidhan and Bhulabhai have now met me. I have told them in writing that it is the duty of those who have faith in the Councils to enter them. They may, however, do so in their individual capacity and not in the name of the Congress. I think it will not do any good to restrain them. Ansari will go to England in May—for his health and for the Nawab Saheb. Bhulabhai will take charge of the whole work.
I hope you will approve of the step which I have taken after much thinking. I didn’t think it advisable that individuals should offer civil disobedience on their own responsibility and, therefore, I have told co-workers that they also should suspend it. I alone may offer it and I will invite others to do the same when I think it right. If anybody is drawn by my example to court arrest, he will not be regarded to have offered civil disobedience on his own and senior co-workers cannot be prevented from doing that. You will see a statement by me on this subject in two or three days. If you don’t understand my step, please don’t worry. I am sure that you will approve of it on further reflection.

I have read Vithalbhai’s will. Everything seems to be in order. My own attitude is that, if Bose gets the money, we shouldn’t mind. Who is your companion? This is enough for today.

I am asking Swami to write more.

BA,

Today is Friday. I have not received your letter yet. It is about 3 in the morning. I had fully replied to your previous letter. You must have received Raojibhai’s letter. Vasumati has come here. I have not had any talk with her till now. Hemprabhadevi also has come here to discuss with me matters about khadi. Rukhi came here yesterday evening for her eyes. They are watering all the time. I had a letter from Madhavdas. He says that he is completely all right now. There was a letter from Manu. She is all right. I hope you did not worry in the least about me. I am all right. I am being regularly examined by Dr. Ansari. He was here only yesterday. He fears nothing. He does advise me to take rest, of course. I take as much as I can. Ultimately everything depends on God’s will. I have now decided to stop all others from going to jail. I alone should offer satyagraha. Hence, when all of you are released you will not have to offer satyagraha again for the present. You should go on doing khadi work, etc. I will not write more today. You do remember, I hope, that today is a day of fasting. I am starting for Assam tomorrow. Bal will accompany me. Prithuraj also will of course be there.

I had your letter, but owing to other preoccupations could not reply sooner. For the time being it is better to visit Manibehn every time. When you do, tell her that not a day passes when I do not think of her. But I am not worried, for I have full faith in her power of endurance and firmness.

When you meet Father, tell him that I have written to him every week without fail.

I have read Uncle’s will. There is sure to be difficulty in getting a probate for it in Bombay. But I am of opinion that we should not do anything in the matter at all and we should let go anything that passes into Subhas Bose’s hands. I believe he will use it for only public purposes.

394. INTERVIEW TO “THE HINDU”

PATNA,
April 6, 1934

Although I have been credited with a very vivid imagination and although, having known fair Bihar intimately, I had a good mental picture of the havoc caused by the earthquake, the reality went far beyond the imaginary picture I had formed from descriptions received from Rajendrababu.

Although Rajendrababu is a word-painter, he had failed to convey an adequate impression of the ruin that has overtaken Bihar.

1 Vide “Letter to Vallabhbhai Patel”, 6-4-1934
2 Vithalbhai Patel
I have now covered almost all areas of destruction barring Purnea. Practically everywhere, owing to the scarcity of water, there is a real danger of famine.

The rich fields covered with sand, rows upon rows of houses in towns and villages utterly destroyed, water and sand shooting up through stone of cement floors, walls and pillars waist-deep, palaces a heap of bricks, solitary walls or pillars standing as a mournful reminder of the glory that was, improvised huts every moment in danger of catching fire, old sites not capable of being built upon for fear of a subsidence during rains, cattle starving for want of fodder and some dying for want of water, add to this the very real danger of floods reaching areas hitherto untouched by them.

The middle classes have been perhaps the hardest hit. Some of them have lost their all and are reduced to beggary. Those, therefore, who are least able to bear the burden have been the hardest hit.

The combined efforts of the Bihar Central Relief Committee assisted by other organizations will fail to give anything like full relief to these middle-class men.

Nearly twenty lakhs subscribed to the Central Relief and nearly forty lakhs subscribed to the Viceroy’s Fund are utterly inadequate for the minimum requirements. I hope therefore that the public will realize the immensity of the task before the Government and the people and will not in any way relax their efforts to send their donations as liberally as they can to the Central Relief Committee.

I am unable to say how many lakhs will be required to ensure just sufficient supply of water for thirsty men and cattle, let alone the supply of food, medical necessaries and house accommodation, temporary or semi-permanent.

The reclamation of devastated fields has not been altogether overlooked. The Government are engaged in conducting a survey of the devastated area. They have issued elaborate instructions to the peasantry to show how they can renovate their fields for the approaching monsoons.

The latest estimate made by the Government of the area under earthquake sands is over 500,000 acres. The average cost of reclaiming one acre is, at the lowest estimate, calculated at twenty per acre. That means one crore. What relief it would be possible to give the owners of these fields is more than I can say at present. But I think I have given what is undoubtedly an underestimate of the needs one and a half crores of people living in the affected area require. Needless to say all these are not all equally affected. Some have escaped direct loss altogether. But none has escaped the indirect effect of the devastation.

CORRESPONDENT: Why, you have presented such a doleful picture of the Bihar situation and asked for more money, that I should be less than human were I to treat this as an exclusive interview. Should I do so, I shall be denying Bihar all available sources of help.

GANDHIJI: What are you driving at?

CORRESPONDENT: I propose to share this interview with all newspaper men for obvious reasons.

395. OBSERVATIONS AT MEETING OF BIHAR ANTI-UNTACTHABILITY BOARD

_April 5/6, 1934_

As asked regarding the ways to secure entry for Harijans into temples of all-India importance, such as the Vaidyanath Temple at Deoghar and Vishnupur Temple at Gaya, Gandhiji emphasized the importance of winning the heart of caste Hindus by peaceful propaganda without coercion or compulsion of any kind whatsoever. In that way he thought untouchability was bound to disappear in course of time.

Regarding the desirability of persuading Harijans to enter Hindu temples, Gandhiji thought that caste Hindus should throw open the temples, but it was for the Harijans to enter or not. They should create in them a desire to lead pure lives and merely entering the temples will not lead to purity of life.

As asked regarding touchability in the matter of food and water, Gandhiji said that water and food did not necessarily become polluted by touch and it was only impure hands that caused pollution.

As asked whether secondary education alone was desirable for Harijans or whether it should be supplemented by vocational or industrial education, Gandhiji said that all kinds of education should be provided for the Harijans and arrangements should be made for vocational training.

396. LETTER TO MADAN MOHAN MALAVIYA

Bhai saheb,¹

I had a long chat with Dr. Mahmood. He is most anxious to work for and to achieve communal unity. I have given it as my opinion that there is no escape from the communal award if we are to secure Mussalman co-operation and if we are to secure any advantage for the nation. The other alternative is retention of the status quo. Then the question of award does not arise at all. There seems to me to be no via media. There are difficulties in our way in every case. But I do think that we have to take up a decisive attitude one way or the other.

Yours,

Mohanandas²

397. STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

April 7, 1934

This statement¹ was drafted by me on my day of silence at Saharsa, that is Easter Monday, 2nd inst. I passed it on to Rajendra-babu and then it was circulated among the friends who were present. The original draft has undergone considerable revision. It is also abridged. But in essence it remains the same as it was on Monday. I regret that I have not been able to show it to all friends and colleagues with whom I would have been delighted to share it. But as I had no doubt whatsoever about the soundness of my decision and as I knew that the civil resistance of some friends was imminent, I was not prepared to take the risk of delaying publication by waiting for the opinion of friends. The decision and every word of the statement are in answer to intense introspection, searching of the heart and waiting upon God. The decision carries with it reflection upon no single individual. It is a humble admission of my own limitations and a due sense of the tremendous responsibility that I have carried on my shoulders all these long years.

398. INTERVIEW TO THE “HINDU”

PATNA,
April 7, 1934

CORRESPONDENT: Your statement is all too brief for the general reader and is likely to be mistaken by some as a desertion on your part of your fellow prisoners.

GANDHIJI: I knew that I laid myself open to such a charge when I deliberately decided to omit all references to them, for my decision had nothing to do with securing a release of the prisoners. Civil resisters do not march to the prison in order to get out of it the next day. They will come out in their own good time.

My only aim in coming to this decision was to purge the movement of any possibility of internal decay. Such a possibility must always be there when an imperfect man handles imperfect instruments. I therefore felt that the time had come for me to reduce the possibility of decay to the minimum. That could only be secured if civil resistance was confined to one person only, that one being the most versed in the science.

In my opinion the decision will make the movement stronger than before and capable of being easily handled both by the people and by the Government.

Hence the possibility of an early discharge of prisoners is really greater now than before, especially if the Government believe in the sincerity of my decision.

Replying to the question why, having confined civil resistance to himself, he should not go to the whole hog and suspend it altogether, Gandhiji declared:

That is undoubtedly a very proper question. All I can say in answer is that, as the author of satyagraha and as a staunch believer in its efficacy, I may not suspend it in my own person except under circumstances which will discredit the movement itself, as for instance violence by satyagrahis themselves.
Asked how far his decision was prompted by the Delhi decisions, the Mahatma replied:

Not in the slightest degree. It was taken definitely on Easter Monday at Saharsa. I had no knowledge that the Delhi Conference had finished its deliberations and that it had come to a definite conclusion. I came to know on Tuesday that the Conference had concluded its deliberations. What is more, the decision had come to me vaguely some days before it was finally taken when I knew nothing of the Delhi proposals. Therefore, in point of time and fact, my decision to confine civil resistance only to me had no connection whatsoever with the Delhi Conference resolutions. Long before the Delhi Conference took a concrete form I had said in conversations and in letters to friends that it was the duty of Congressmen who believed in Council-entry, and could not or would not offer civil resistance, to form a party and prosecute the Council-entry programme. Thus and only thus, in my opinion, could the situation be clarified and the paralysis of Congressmen removed. Indeed, even when the Poona Conference was meeting I suggested to Messrs Asaf Ali and Satyamurti that if they believed in the Council programme they should follow it and canvass public opinion in its favour.

The decision about civil resistance is only based on ethical grounds and, so far as I know, has no connection whatsoever with external circumstances. I can also tell you that, in the statement as it was drafted on Easter Monday, there was a paragraph regarding Council-entry for those who would not take up the constructive activities mentioned in my statement. I removed that paragraph because I had, before the statement was given to the Press, seen the Delhi friends and given them the letter which is already before the public.

_The Hindu, 8-4-1934_
399. INTERVIEW TO “THE HINDU”

PATNA,
April 7, 1934

Asked what would be the extent of his co-operation with the Swaraj Party, Gandhiji said:

Consistently with my views on Council-entry I will render them all the assistance I can.

Asked if he would assist them in securing election, Gandhiji stated:

I will certainly not interfere in an election, but the electors will be guided, so far as my opinion counts with them, by the knowledge that I would like them to vote for Swarajist candidates if they are otherwise qualified.

As asked as to what extent it will be the duty of Congressmen as a body to help in the elections, Gandhiji said:

Those Congressmen who believe in Council-entry will certainly consider it their duty to take part in the elections.

Q. What will be the position of men like Babu Rajendra Prasad, who do not believe in Council-entry, but whose assistance will be necessary for success at the election?

A. If Rajendrababu does not believe in Council-entry he will not seek election, but there will be nothing to prevent him from advising those Congressmen who may desire to enter the Assembly and guide them.

As asked how far his assistance would be available to the Party, Gandhiji replied:

Whenever they seek assistance and I can legitimately give them, it will be always at their disposal—so long as I am out.

As asked if he would assist the Party in drawing up the Constitution and programme, Gandhiji replied:

If I can spare time and can usefully advise them, I shall certainly do so. But this must not on any account be interpreted as an invitation to come to me for advice on all occasions. For one thing, I shall have no time left to me for shouldering such a burden.

400. LETTER TO DILIP KUMAR ROY

PATNA,
April 8, 1934

MY DEAR DILIP,

I am surprised that you have not received my letter. I wrote to you almost immediately after hearing from you and it was a fairly long letter that I sent you.¹ Your Anami I did glance through but the best use I thought I could make of it was to send it to Mahadev who knows Bengali and who is himself a poet. I am not. But that does not prevent me from reading whatever you write. What you told me about the activity there interested me deeply and the information that H. has become a changed man in Pondicherry. I hope you are keeping well and still singing. I often meet your pupils who sing to me and who always remind me of the beautiful bhajans you used to sing for me.

Yours sincerely,

402. LETTER TO B. R. AMBEDKAR

DEAR DR. AMBEDKAR,

Pray excuse me for the delay in replying to your letter of 29-3-1934. It was not possible to reply earlier owing to incessant travelling.

Whilst I should fall in with your scheme if it was accepted by the provinces, I could not shoulder the burden of pressing the other provinces to reopen the Pact in respect of the number of seats allotted in their cases.

I have been trying to do what I can to placate Bengal, but so far without success. If the Harijan population in Bengal is as was believed at the time of the Pact they have nothing to complain of. If as a matter of fact it is much less than the figure on whose basis the number was fixed, I should think there would be no objection on your part to an amendment bringing the number to the figure required.

Yours sincerely,

403. LETTER TO J. S. HOYLAND

DEAR HOYLAND,

I have been having your notes of affection with due regularity. These I do not acknowledge to save time and money. The postage is a considerable item. At the end of the month I find that it is more than enough to conduct a village school for Harijans or any others. It is enough to provide 1,000 meals for the famine-stricken areas of India.

I am glad you have come to terms with Allen & Unwin about the translations¹. I hope you are not calling them my translations. They are your adaptations from my translations.

Agatha and Muriel passed many useful days with me. I expect

April 9, 1934

MY DEAR KUMARAPPA,

I read Dr. Jesudasan’s letter only yesterday. He should certainly describe to American audiences the condition of Bihar and appeal for help. You will please send him the literature we have published.

From the Doctor’s letter it is clear, I suppose, that he cannot subscribe to the 1st prayer¹ I showed you and that therefore he could not conscientiously bring up a Hindu boy under his charge as a Hindu. I wonder if you are reading Harijan regularly. I sent the two prayers to Harijan with comments for publication. I would like Dr. Jesudasan to deal with the note in Harijan not for publication but for my private information.

406. LETTER TO CHARU PROBHA SEN GUPTA

AS AT PATNA,

April 9, 1934

MY DEAR CHARU PROBHA,

Nonsense, you must not give way to despair like this. Sadhus will only put one interpretation on the Gita. It is an interpretation born of laziness of mind. You should read the 3rd chapter of the Gita again and again. There Krishna says, “I do not stop working for one single moment. If I did, the whole world would perish.” He says again, “No one stops work for a moment, only everyone but the knowing one works helplessly.” Let us work knowingly and voluntarily, not for self but for the whole of humanity and we shall surely see God face to face. Our humanity is India. We may not serve her so as to injure others and [then] it becomes service of God. We must learn to see God in such service. This is the yoga of the Gita and no other.

407. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 9, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS,

Today is silence day. But by some chance we are required to spend two hours in a train. I am, therefore, writing this while waiting at a station.

I have sent you a wire regarding the bleeding from your nose. I hope you have acted upon it. The climate of Bombay is beneficial for such a condition. That of Rajkot, on the other hand, is hot and dry. Also the doctors in Bombay are better.

In view of my decision regarding civil disobedience, you must come and see me once. If you come, we can discuss plans for the future. I have many ideas, but they will require a long time to put in writing and even then I cannot explain them properly.

After I have come to some decision regarding all the arrangements to be made, I will write them down.

I hope you have been able to understand the necessity and propriety from a spiritual point of view, of the latest decision. If you have not been able to understand it, I shall have to explain it. As for myself, the decision has filled me with bliss.

A letter for Vijaya is enclosed. You will also find enclosed a copy of my programme, in case Chandrashankar has not already sent one.

408. LETTER TO BHAGWANJI A. MEHTA

April 9, 1934

BHAISHRI BHAGWANJI,

I have your letter. If you permit me, I intend to send your letter to Narbheram. If you permit, let me have Narbheram’s address.

If you think Ratilal is mad, what value can be attached to any letter he may write? Either Prabhashankar as Champa’s guardian or Champa herself should decide the matter.

After coming to know Ratilal, I had told Prabhashankar before the marriage that he should break off the engagement. I had even obtained Revashankarbhai’s consent for this being done. But Bhai Prabhashankar and his sister and mother insisted on the marriage taking place. I consented to and helped in the money being deposited in Champa’s name.

You seem to think that Maganlal is at fault. I don’t. Maganlal agreed to the property being kept in the joint names of all. But how can the fact of the change effected by the brothers by agreement among themselves be cited as a ground for refusing to give the sisters the money set apart for them, unless they agree to it? If Maganlal pays by instalments, let the other two brothers also pay by instalments. Even if Chhaganlal refuses to pay, why should Champa, who is, and ought to be, eager to do justice, hesitate to do that to the sisters? And Champa means Prabhashankar. I feel most for Jayakunvar, who is reduced to a miserable state.

In case I tour Kathiawar for Harijan work, I shall be content with whatever Rajkot gives me.

409. LETTER TO K. M. MUNSHI

April 9, 1934

BHAISHRI MUNSHI,

I received your letter. I have had a discussion with Bhulabhai. He will bear the burden. If good and dedicated men are available, I am sure it will be possible to achieve something. I have prepared a draft according to my lights. I can’t think of any alternative. You must have seen the draft. You will have to take interest in this matter.

There was no option but to make this experiment. The clouds will now clear up. Had that resolution not been passed, the confusion would have continued. Even if the ship founders, the experiment will have served its purpose. But the ship is not likely to be wrecked, for the Congress will always have a Council party. If so, let them enter the Councils. I have given up even mental opposition to it. I have drawn whatever lesson I could from my opposition. I don’t regret it. It was necessary at that time. Today such opposition seems foolish.

I hope you have approved of my decision regarding civil disobedience. You at any rate should not find it difficult to understand its significance. But let me know if you had any difficulty.

Please take care of your health and get well.

I got your letter. Cling to your duty with unswerving faith without thinking of the fruit of your work.

I, too, could not understand the sentence which you have quoted from my letter\textsuperscript{1} regarding Manibehn. Either a word has been left out by me, or you have not been able to decipher the sentence correctly. May be I scribbled something while dozing. 414. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, PURNEA
April 9, 1934

Mahatmaji replied² in suitable terms expressing heart-felt sympathy with the sufferers in their dire calamity. He said:

God alone can set things right.

To the Municipal Chairman he said that he had as much access to Government as the Central Committee and so the Municipality should approach the Government direct and assured that the Central Relief Committee would do all it can. As regards opening a branch of the Bihar Central Relief Committee he said that it was a matter which should be talked over with Babu Rajendra Prasad and he would certainly do the needful. The subsidence of land was a matter of great danger. The situation must be accurately ascertained and the Government was in the best position to do so with the aid of experts.

You should be forewarned against the dangers of flood and all preparations must be made beforehand to meet the situation in Purnea as elsewhere in other districts. The next rains are sure to bring about a terrible situation and it is the duty of the Government, the Central Relief Committee and the people to make adequate provision to save people from disaster. As to helping people in the present distress, Government and the Central Relief Committee will do all they can but it will not be much. People themselves should gird up their loins and, with faith in God, should work on and fight the calamity that has befallen them. They are sure to succeed. Calamities are a warning against prevalence of sinfulness and people have to purge themselves of their sins, individual and social. This occasion has been furnished for scrutiny of our sins and not for finding fault with others. Untouchability must go.

416. LETTER TO CHHAGANLAL JOSHI

ON WAY TO ASSAM,

April 10, 1934

CHHAGANLAL,

Two letters from you are lying before me. I have read them again. I am writing this in a train which is taking me to Assam. The train has halted at Parvatipur station. The people are shouting outside. (Here I became busy with the collection) My carriage is the last and that makes it difficult to write. Moreover, it has started raining.

You must have read in the papers that you need not go to jail just now. Nor need Rama. This decision I have taken after much thinking and anguish of mind. But I have no doubt that the decision is right and was absolutely necessary. There is bound to be criticism, and even harsh criticism. Let there be. It is a big question now what you,

Rama and the other inmates of the Ashram should do. I have asked Narandas to come over. We can meet in Orissa. Alternatively, I am also trying to go to Bombay. It would be good if you also come at that time. Or you may write and let me have your views from there. In any case we don’t wish to build another Ashram along the same lines as the old one. The struggle is going on still. It has not stopped merely because I am the only one left to carry it on. Nor has it slackened. It has assumed a new and purer form. If you read my statement, everything will be as clear to you as daylight.

For Rama and Vimu I still think that Wardha is the best place. But we should not force them to go there. It is best that they follow their own inclination.

I hope you have regained strength now. There are many other things I can write about, but how can I spare time to do so? Swami writes to you. I hope he gives you plenty of news. Rajendrababu has requisitioned Pyarelal.

417. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, RUPSI

April 11, 1934

I am glad to be again in Assam after a very long period. This time my mission is in connection with the Harijan movement. Untouchability is a great blot on Hinduism, and if we do not efface it in time, we shall ourselves be effaced from the face of the earth. I congratulate you for your purse and address, for both are a promise of your determination to root out untouchability in your daily lives. It is said that there is no considerable untouchability in Assam and Bengal. But I do not think that statement squares with facts. We are guilty of untouchability as soon as we make distinctions between man and man and have grades of high and low. Surely there are distinctions enough in Assam. And those against whom distinctions are drawn feel them just as keenly as any in the other parts of India. Then you look down upon Doms, Bhangis and Chamaris, who come here from other provinces, as lowest among the low. And it is a common thing for almost all castes to consider themselves superior to some other castes and to treat Mussalmans, Christians and others as untouchables in some way or other. Removal of untouchability implies that we shall get rid of all this high-and-lowness and accord equal treatment to all human beings as children of one and the same God, and thus have a real brotherhood of man. I have no hesitation in saying that there is no warrant in our Shastras for the untouchability that I have described to you and that we are practising more or less all over India. I ask your blessings and co-operation in this one of the noblest of all causes.

1 Extracted from Valji Desai’s “Weekly Letter”

_Harijan_, 27-4-1934

418. SPEECH AT PRAYER MEETING, RANGIYA

_April 12, 1934_

I should not as a rule have liked to speak after the morning prayer. But as the mission that has brought me to Assam is for me of a deeply religious character, I have no hesitation in combining the meeting with the prayer. But before I speak on the mission, I should like to ask you all who have gathered here in such large numbers to take to the practice of rising early in the morning and commencing the day with prayer and finishing the day with prayer before retiring. Do it with the members of your family, if you cannot get your neighbours to join, and if you cannot get the members of your family to do so, do it alone. If you will cultivate the practice, you will find for yourselves what a peace giving thing a prayer from the heart is, and you will find that it will steady you. And a day begun under such happy auspices will invariably end well. One of the verses we sang this morning paraphrased means this: “O God, I desire no earthly riches, nor heaven, not even salvation. I desire the alleviation of the sufferings of all Thy creatures.” This is not a verse of modern coinage. It is an ancient orthodox prayer. Do you think that you can truthfully utter that prayer from day to day and yet treat crores of fellow-beings as untouchables, whose very life is crushed out of them and who are treated as less than domestic cattle? You have, therefore, to choose between untouchability and the prayer which is enjoined upon every good Hindu. I suggest that you choose the prayer and banish

1 Extracted from Valji Desai’s “Weekly Letter”. Gandhiji passed Rangiya in the morning on his way from Barpeta to Tejpur.
untouchability from your hearts. Regard untouchability as a heinous sin. But whilst it is sinful to regard a single human being as an untouchable, I can introduce you to some untouchables whom you have to shun at any cost, and these are the evil thoughts which make us do all sorts of evil things from day to day. They need to be banished. And then in Assam, more than in any other part of India, you have the opium curse, a true untouchable. The opium habit dulls the intellect and promotes laziness. I do not believe that it does any good whatever. If, therefore, you will take my advice, I would ask you every day to pray that God may give you strength to remove the untouchability of human beings from your breasts and give you the wisdom to regard every evil thought as an untouchable and to give you strength to exorcize it. If you are an opium addict, ask God’s help to give up the habit.

_Harijan_, 27-4-1934

419. NOTES

LET RECEPTION COMMITTEES BEWARE

In pursuance of a circular letter addressed by Thakkar Bapa to the Provincial Harijan Sevak Sanghs, we have been receiving memoranda of expenses from the respective places visited by me during the Harijan tour in connection with the reception given to me in each place. In a memorandum from Khandwa, where a purse of over RS. 3,000 was presented, I find nearly Rs. 40 shown as the charges for printing the address presented to me and a certain sum for dresses for volunteers. There are other items about which I say nothing, although they appear to me extravagant. But to think that the expenses of the addresses, uniform for volunteers and the like should be debited against the purse makes the reception not only farcical but demoralizing. If a reception has to be given, money for printed or illuminated addresses should be collected separately as such, and that after the purse has been collected. A costly reception should never mar a Harijan tour. It is wholly unnecessary. Some kind of a demonstration, I suppose, is inevitable and necessary. But when it is spontaneous, it ought not to cost a single pice, or if it must, every pice should be separately collected and in such a manner that it in no way affects the collection for the purse. Caskets are unbecoming, addresses are unnecessary. A brief report on their Harijan activities should take the place of the addresses and it should be written in a clear handwriting and handed to me to enable me to deal with it. This mention of the Khandwa expenses is not intended to cast any reflection upon the Reception Committee. Probably many of the Committees have done what the Khandwa Committee has done. They have evidently not realized the impropriety of making the Harijan purse pay for addresses and caskets presented to one who claims to be a true servant of Harijans.

ALL ABOUT A LOST CHAIN

The reader will appreciate the following account of the discovery of a lost chain, which ultimately came to the Harijan cause, and that through the honesty of a Harijan. Sjt. R. M. Kumaraswami of Palladam, Tamil Nad, writes:

REVERED MAHATMAJI,

On your way to Coimbatore from Tirupur during your recent visit, a purse of Rs. 450 was given at Palladam. There my sister’s daughter aged four wanted to give her gold chain to you. But my aunt did not like to give the chain. So she took it and kept it with her. When you arrived at Palladam, somehow my aunt lost the chain in the crowd. I told her that the loss was a fine for her refusing the child’s wish.

After two weeks we got the clue about the chain. A Harijan boy about 10 years old was fortunate enough to get that lost chain. He was from a neighbouring village. After a fortnight, when we approached the boy’s father who was in possession of the chain, he at first denied any knowledge of it. He was under a false fear of his being taken to task. When I explained to him what the object of your tour was and also that there was absolutely nothing wrong in possessing lost property found by his son, he gladly took us into his confidence and willingly returned the chain. I gave him Rs. 25 as a present, which he accepted with gratitude, and he has promised to give up his evil habit of drinking. He is considered to be one of the sincere and trustworthy men among the Harijans here.

All the members of my family wish to send you this chain according to the child’s wish. I also wish, if you would kindly permit, to have the proceeds of the chain earmarked for Harijan work at Palladam. I will consider this a good beginning for doing Harijan uplift work in these parts.
I have assured my correspondent that the proceeds of the chain will be earmarked as he wishes. He is, of course, wrong in thinking that lost property belongs to the finder. It belongs to the state, if the owner cannot be traced. I congratulate the Harijan who restored the chain to the owner, the four-year-old girl for her determination and her relatives on their ultimately respecting the little donor’s wish. Let her, however, know that she is not the first girl of her age to have parted with her chain for the Harijan cause.

THEIR PLAGHT

Sjt. P. Majmudar writes:

For want of work, or more truly speaking, because of untouchability, which debars them from avenues of employment open to the rest, Harijans were reported to be living on the undigested grains picked out from droppings of cattle. I had the pain of recently witnessing such a disgusting scene in Gujarat. I was visiting a village in Bhal district. In the Bhangi quarter, I saw everywhere cattle dung spread for drying. On enquiry into the cause of this, the Harijans residing in the quarters told me that they had so little employment that they had to maintain themselves on grains picked out from cattle dung collected by them. After the dung was dried, they separated the undigested, half-chewed grains from the dung, washed them, dried them and ground them into powder which they eat in the form of chapatis.

I have not seen nor heard of such a practice amongst savarna Hindus anywhere. It is impossible to question the evidence given by Sjt. P. Majmudar of what he has seen through his own eyes. Let caste Hindus understand what untouchability is doing to a portion of Hindu humanity.

420. A REFORMER’S DIFFICULTY

A correspondent writes:

In the course of your drive against untouchability you make some remarks which seem to be inconsistent with your previous writings in the columns of Young India. For instance, you wrote some years ago that the rule about restraint of inter-dining was intended for the evolution of the soul but was no part of varnadharma. Now, if you grant the necessity or the advisability of restraint upon inter-dining for the evolution of the soul, how can you say, as you have now a days been saying, that for anyone to object to dine with an ‘untouchable’ on the ground of untouchability is a sin? I agree with you that restraint upon inter-dining is no part of varnadharma; but I do not understand why inter-dining retards the evolution of the soul.

Here there is a double confusion. In the first instance, restraint upon inter-dining on the ground of untouchability is wholly different from the restraint based on the ground of the evolution of the soul. The first restraint excludes a whole class whose very existence is challenged, the second excludes nobody on the ground of his birth in a particular class, but it may exclude those individuals who are addicted to particular habits. Thus, restraint on the ground of untouchability will persist without reference to the person’s habits, while that on the ground of evolution of the soul will abate immediately the person excluded shedshis objectionable habits. There is, therefore, no inconsistency between the Young India writing referred to and my present position. Secondly, even if my opinion as expressed in Young India is indefensible, the correspondent’s doubt is solved by my showing, as I have shown, that my condemnation of objection to inter-dining on the ground of untouchability has nothing to do with the restraint referred to in Young India, of which I have approved.

The correspondent further asks how I reconcile my attitude with the peremptory restrictions laid down in Vaishnavite literature. The question is pertinent. I must, however, confess my inability to reconcile the two positions. Though I take pride in belonging to the Vaishn-avite faith, my pride does not require my adherence to all the ceremonial observances prescribed in Vaishnavite literature. I cling to the Vaishnavite faith because it inculcates universal love and, therefore, brotherhood; it lays the greatest emphasis on meticulous observance of truth and non-violence and insists on unselfish devotion to God. In Hindu literature, religious and secular, the unadulterated condemnation of narrowness, intolerance and bigotry by Vaishnavite saints and other writers is not to be beaten by any other writing. I need not be disturbed, therefore, by ceremonial observances which are manifestly contrary to the spirit of Vaishnavism.

The correspondent concludes:

We cannot resolve our doubts ourselves. We yield to your better judgment. But when we follow your teaching, we run the risk of being boycotted even by those who are near and dear to us. What is to be done under such circumstances?

This is a difficult question to answer and can only be determined by each one according to his or her individual ability to suffer. Those who feel that untouchability is an evil cannot practise it in any shape or form. In a matter of such grave importance, I should expect every reformer to have the courage of his or her convictions and the ability to brave all the social persecution that they may have to suffer. Such has been the lot of reformers all the world over.

421. THE WRONG WAY

A friend who is interested in the Harijan cause sends me a collection of clippings from sanatanist writings which attribute to me all kinds of opinions and some of which even contain quotations from my writings mutilated in order to prejudice the masses against me. He asks me to reply to this indictment. It is not new to me. Some of the counts in it I have answered from time to time. Those who are prejudiced will not listen to any defence I may offer. Those who are friendly are unaffected by charges, especially when they are wild as those in question undoubtedly are. But, between the critics who will not be convinced and supporters who will not be seduced, there is always a middle class that would be swayed one way or the other. The friend who has sent me the clippings probably belongs to that middle class. His letter, therefore, is such as to demand a reply in these columns. Some of the clippings are as follows:

1. “The Mahabharata is a mass of rubbish from beginning to end.”
2. “I do not regard Shri Krishna as an ‘avatar’ (incarnation) but as an ordinary man.”
3. “I do not believe in morals. I am a breaker of idols.”
4. “The Dharma of Hindus is devilish, the Shastras are godless and rishis and munis are devils.”

The inverted commas are in the original sanatanist writings. There is no reference to Young India or Navajivan writings at the end of any of the quotations. I have not the files of Young India or Navajivan with me. I have, therefore, to rely upon memory.

What I have said of the Mahabharata before and what I believe of it today is that it is like a rich diamond mine from which the deeper you dig the more diamonds you find.

What I have said of Krishna and what I believe of him today is that he is one of the many avatars.

I have never said that Hindu temples are brothels, but I have said and repeat now that some of them are like brothels. I could never say ‘I do not believe in morals’, for with me religion and morality are convertible terms, as can be evidenced by all my writings.

I am, indeed, a breaker of idols, if I am also a worshipper of them. I do not bow my head to false gods.

Quotation 4 is a blasphemy I am incapable of uttering. If I had believed the dharma of the Hindus to be devilish, I should have said good-bye to it long ago.

Sanatana Dharma can gain nothing by distortions or reckless writing in the pages of publications brought out by those who call themselves sanatanists.

422. SOME AMENDMENTS

The following three amendments have been received from the head office of the Harijan Sevak Sangh.

I

A rider clause may be added to Rule (5), para 2:—To fulfil this desire, the 25% quota and 50% quota of the principal cities appropriated by the Central Board will also be devoted to direct welfare work only. A sum of Rs. 25,000 now donated by Mr. Birla shall be earmarked for meeting the establishment and travelling charges of the Central Board and office. The Central Board will make special efforts to take separate collections for paying its share of administrative and propaganda expenses incurred by Provincial Boards now and hereafter.¹

II

The following be substituted for Rule (9): (9) In view of the difficulty of raising additional funds in the provinces soon after the tour, the Provincial Secretary, as also District Secretaries, should cease to be officemen, but should become necessary parts of the welfare schemes. The charges of the provincial staff needed for supervising schemes in the districts will thus be met from the 75% quota and taken from the districts in proportion to their budgets. This rule, however, will operate only for one year from the date when new financial relations arising out of the Purse Fund are established.

III

The following be added as Rule (10):

Welfare schemes must be submitted by Provincial Boards within two months after the expiry of the tour in their respective provinces. Failing this, the grants under the old arrangement will be stopped. Grants under the new arrangement will be paid only after the welfare scheme submitted by the province is approved of by the Central Board.

These amendments should be carefully considered by all concerned, especially Provincial Boards, and their comments sent to the head office without delay. It will be observed that the rider to Rule (5), para 2, carried out to greater perfection the original intention that donations received for Harijan service should be as far as possible devoted solely to welfare work. And this object can be easily fulfilled, if Provincial Boards will heartily co-operate and realize that the most expeditious way of driving out untouchability is to be prepared for, and render, silent, selfless service to Harijans. Such work serves a threefold purpose. Requiring, as it does, purity among the workers, it constitutes the best propaganda amongst the sanatanists. No amount of intellectual argument will ever convince those in whom a false religious belief is deeply seated. But the purity and gentleness of the reformer will undoubtedly do so. Secondly, selfless work amongst Harijans will not only enable the reformers to overcome some, if not all, of the bad customs and habits that are to be seen among them but will also strengthen their faith in Hinduism, which they have hitherto known only as a means of their degradation. Thirdly, the high standard of character required of those who render personal service to Harijans cannot but be a matter of inward joy to the workers.

The second and third amendments do not deserve any comment, except this—that the third has evidently been found necessary because of the negligence on the part of Boards of the Provinces in sending up their schemes of constructive work. I am fully aware that, strange as it may seem, to produce a good constructive scheme and equally good workers who would faithfully carry it out is far more difficult than to collect funds.

423. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

_April 13, 1934_

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

Today is a day of fasting; we are on the deck of a ship sailing from Tezpur to Gauhati. On one side of me is Thakkar Bapa, on the other is Om and all around are sitting the rest of the party. In front is the lavatory. It is not very dirty. The rains have already set in here. There was a heavy downpour yesterday and so it is stuffy today. Deck journey, therefore, is bearable. It is nine in the morning now. We shall reach Gauhati at about twelve. Mirabehn will have arrived there. She had taken ill and so we had left her behind in Patna. My health is good. I allow myself sufficient rest. I don’t overstrain the body. If one were to listen to all the advice that doctors give, one would never leave one’s bed.

In the dispute between the workers and the mill-owners in Ahmedabad, in my view the latter are more at fault. They themselves admit this. The part which Kasturbhai has played this time does him no credit. The mill-owners’ resolution was so utterly absurd that I thought I must write something. I wrote to Kasturbhai and remonstrated with him gently. The resolution was nothing but a threat. But there was a risk of the system [of arbitration] built up through twelve years’ labour breaking down. My letter had an effect. It may be said, rather, that differences arose among the mill-owners themselves.

Chimanbhai\(^1\) and Sakarlal\(^2\), therefore, came to see me. Kastur-bhai did not come as he was preparing to go to Geneva. I told them that wages could not be reduced without evidence to justify such a step; but that, if they were ready to link wages to profits and fix minimum wages, I would agree to whatever relief such an arrangement might give them. They liked this suggestion but told me that it would be difficult to persuade other mill-owners to implement it. That is true, of course. I will see now what can be done.

You must have read about my decision. I am eager to know your view. I have assumed that you will understand without explanation both decisions of mine. I have no doubt at all that both are correct. There will be no danger to satyagraha now, and the party favouring Council-entry will no longer be forced to remain inactive. Their inactivity was painful to them. Let them go ahead. If they maintain purity in their methods of work, they can do some useful work even in the legislature.

Devdas is taking rest in Delhi. Lakshmi is in the last stages of her pregnancy. Raja is in Delhi and will remain there till Lakshmi’s delivery at any rate.

The senior leaders will certainly come and see me again. I am surprised to learn that you do not get Harijan. I am inquiring how this happens.

The trouble in your nostrils is certainly difficult to treat. But it must be cured though I don’t know what should be done to cure it. Ultimately you yourself will have to think about it, for I have seen that in such cases even doctors feel helpless. Improvement takes place only if the patient himself discovers some method. I believe that pranayama and some of the asanas are bound to have an effect. Since in pranayama one inhales twice as much oxygen as in normal breathing, or even more, I believe that the extra oxygen which the affected part will get is bound to have an effect. If you try to do the whole process of pranayama and observe the effect, you will also realize that it has an intimate connection with the functioning of the nostrils. Hence pranayama must have some effect, good or bad, on them. But there is no possibility of a bad effect and so it can only be good. Pranayama must be done in a place where the air is pure. It would be desirable, therefore, to do it in an open plot of ground. I have never asked you where you sleep. But I assume that the doors of your room are kept open.

Dahyabhai had sent me Mani’s letter. It was a brave one, though also painful. I have met Aminbhai. How long will he be there?

424. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, GAUHATI

April 13, 1934

Gandhiji said he could not congratulate Gauhati Municipality on the condition of the Harijan quarters, which were unfit for human habitation. It was no use saying that Harijans were dirty people. It was up to the Municipality to educate them out of their dirty habits. It was all very well for them to state that the famous Kamakhya temple as well as several others had been flung open to Harijans. But they must not rest content until they had broken down the barrier which now divides Harijans from the rest of the community and brought the former in a line with the latter. It was with this spiritual aim in view that at the age of 64, when he might well claim to rest from his labours, he was wandering from place to place in order to deliver his message. It was impossible for him to be at peace so long as the monster of untouchability prevailed in our holy land.

426. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

April 14, 1934

DEAR SATISBABU,

Your letter.

You will on no account overdo things and overtax your energy. I have the evil habit of putting burdens on willing shoulders which they are often ill able to bear. I expect truth from you and truth demands that you give me notice when I expect too much from you.

You are wrong in thinking that my decision on C. D. is in any way a reflection on any single one of you. If it is a reflection it is on me. But I need not plead guilty. I am but a coseeker with you all—primus inter pares. We have lost nothing by the past doings. We would have lost, if I had not had the courage to halt when I saw the clear necessity for it. There was no warrant for a fast. It would have been simple coercion if I had gone for it.

The Mayoral election is an indication. We must go through the fire. The Council-entry decision is sound. We must have a parliamentary party of Congressmen and perhaps part of the Congress machinery when the latter can function legally. Now that Congressmen will act as councilwallas, things will presently shape themselves. We must mount to truth through mistakes.

I shall watch your Bengal programme.

Hemprabha has written to me. No time to write to her separately. She will feel her way and do about khadi what she feels after weighing what I have said. No heroic measure is necessary. And we shall discuss the thing more fully when we meet.

I had Arun’s note. I must not write to him separately. He must build up a strong body.

Love to you all.

427. LETTER TO JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

GAUHATI,
April 14, 1934

MY DEAR JAWAHARLAL,

I got up this morning at 12.15 in order to overtake arrears.

You have been ever in my mind. I hope you will be permitted to receive this letter. I would like a line from you to tell me how you are keeping and what you are doing.

You must have seen my two decisions. That they are almost simultaneous is a mere coincidence. The revival of the Swarajya Party is a right step. There is no doubt that we have in the Congress a body of men who believe in Council-entry and who will do nothing else if they cannot have that programme. Their ambition must be satisfied.

The other decision about confining C. R. to myself so far as the goal is concerned is much the most important. It was inevitable. Having arrived at it, I can see the rightness of the decision for a thousand reasons. I have given the precipitating cause. But the decision was slowly coming to me. I do hope that you have not been upset by it. You were before my mind’s eye the whole time the decision was taking shape. I concluded that, though it might produce a momentary shock, you would ultimately see the truth of it and be glad. I wonder!

We all often talk about you. We are a large party. I was with Mother and the members of the family for nearly two hours when I passed through Allahabad.

Love.

As At Patna,
April 14, 1934

Dear Sir George Schuster,

I thank you for your letter of 6th April just received during my Harijan tour in Assam.

I am glad to learn that by reason of the re-starting of civil disobedience no change was made in the Government decision of 1931 about salt. Am I free to advise workers accordingly? Will you kindly let me know in which areas it was found necessary to withdraw the concession and how the concession can be restored?¹

429. LETTER TO C. RAJAGOPALACHARI

April 14, 1934

My dear C.R.,

I have many things to write but Father Time is a cruel parent. Here is a copy of correspondence between Sir George Schuster and me.

I do not see how the Swarajists are to be bound to our programme. We shall have to suggest these things. Our democracy will follow the ways of all the other democracies that are nurtured on Parliament traditions. A parliamentary party is as inevitable as a khaddar party or prohibition party. All parliamentarians won’t be of the same hue in the Congress. It may be, indeed it is certain, there will be Congressmen fighting Congressmen on different policies. We shall have to do our part in shaping the policy of Congress parliamentarians.

This is written in the midst of disturbances.

Love.

As regards diet Kuhne, Juste, Kellogg and Carrington are good but none of them is perfect. The conclusion I have arrived at is this:

1. Juicy fruit is the most faultless diet.
2. Milk products are most essential for energy. Fresh, unboiled milk is best.
3. Too many articles of food should not be eaten in a day. Each article should be eaten separately.
4. Among the cereals wheat is good.
5. Rice is unnecessary.
6. Pulses are unnecessary.

432. WHY ONLY BIHAR?

A student writes.¹

A science student has no right to disbelieve what is beyond his comprehension. A science student should be humble. Instead of brushing aside whatever he hears, he must give it some thought. There are very few things in this world which we are able to understand. Many things are beyond our understanding. That is exactly why the learned become more humble as they acquire more knowledge, for the knowledge of the learned man consists in realizing his immense ignorance. The deeper he goes, the more he realizes that he knows nothing. Moreover, most of what he knows is just surmise. I have no intention of running down science by writing this. Though infinitesimal, the knowledge we acquire has its uses. But compared to what remains to be acquired, what is already acquired is less than a drop in the ocean.

All life in this world originates from the same root. Hence all are fundamentally one. These include all things from vegetable life to human life. For one who understands, the misery of one living creature is the misery of all, and the happiness of one is the happiness of all. Hence it is sacrifice that has always contained and still contains true happiness. We see this rule working in a family. Everyone is unhappy if the father is unhappy. And everyone is affected by his sinful ways. Hence, if this student accepts the oneness of all living creatures, everyone would be included in the punishment of Bihar. Those who have not felt the earthquake have not remained untouched. If they do not directly experience, they should be considered ignorant to that extent. So, the science student would probably agree that there is not much sense in asking: “Why only Bihar?” Why only Bihar and no other province? Who are we to put this question to God? His ways are inscrutable. Hence, where reason cannot function, it is faith that works.

We can prove with the help of several illustrations that physical events are related to things spiritual. Physical things originate from the same source of energy as spiritual, and so there is no impassable gulf between physical and spiritual things. Rain is a physical phenomenon; it is no doubt related to human happiness and unhappiness; if so, how could it fail to be related to his good and bad deeds? We know of no period in world history when countless people have not related events like earthquakes to sinful deeds of man. Even today, religious-minded people everywhere believe in such a relationship.

It can never be known for which sins of ours such calamities overtake us. The golden rule is for each one of us to regard them as punishment for one’s individual and social sins. It is pride and ignorance if one says, ‘This happened because of your sins’; but it is humility, it is wisdom, if one says, ‘It happened because of my sins.’ I have never tried to convince those who do not consider untouchability a sin that the earthquake is the result of it. They may well believe that it is the result of my sin. Imperfect man can never finally determine what is right and what is wrong in such matters. My job is over if I could convince the reader that the earthquake is the result of our sins. Then the people who regard untouchability as a great sin are bound to connect it with the earthquake and endeavour to expiate and wipe out the blot as soon as possible.

433. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, GOLAGHAT

Gandhiji reiterated the conditions of Harijan service. He said what he particularly wanted of them was a concise and business-like report of Harijan service; addresses were unnecessary, and no expense should be incurred on that account. And if they must present an address, it should be written in a fine hand on good paper and given to him along with a translation into Hindi or English. If it was printed, the printing charges should be privately met and, in any case, should not be charged against the Harijan purse. To recover printing charges from the purse would be nothing short of theft or misappropriation. Conveyance and feeding charges, too, must not be deducted from the purse; if no one came forward to bear the cost of feeding him and his party, he would indent upon friends for it but never touch the Harijan funds. If it was necessary to make some propaganda through hand-bills, etc., workers should not spend upon it more than five per cent of the total collections. The collections should be handed over intact and bills presented to the General Secretary for the expenditure incurred, which should not go beyond the limit of five per cent. He was touring not to have receptions, but to do business on behalf of Harijans, to wake up the people, talk with workers and collect as much money as he could.

438. LETTER TO K. M. MUNSHI

JORHAT,
April 16, 1934

BHAi MUnshi,

I have your letter. It has helped me. Your criticism of the definition is correct. You have shown how the certificates which I have been receiving for the draft are superficial. At present I am working in such a hurry that I get no time for second thoughts. The mistake which you have discovered should have been evident to me. I am returning the draft to you so that it may help you in further scrutiny, and I am also sending a copy of the revised draft. If you notice any mistake in that too, do point it out.

If Lilavati can devote herself blindly to small industries without thinking about other things, the venture may succeed, otherwise they will go around and round like the bullock at the oilpress. The only difference will be that there is an observant oilman following the blind bullock and so some oil is extracted. But in this case the oil-press of swadeshi will go on working and there will be no result at the end.

Mill-cloth, sugar mills, etc., are excluded from my definition, and khadi, jaggery, etc., are protected. We can, and should, manage only these. It is not a small field. Small industries would be crushed if mixed up with big ones. Some change in the definition occurred to me even as I was writing this. I have made it by adding an adjective, intended to exclude intoxicating substances. I do not know whether or not you smoke. My son Harilal does. One day when the matter came up for discussion, he said: “I smoke Madras cheroots, not foreign cigars.” In spite of his generous encouragement, the Madras cheroot would be excluded from my definition. The cheroot will find its way out, as today it is doing.

I too entertain the fear which you do regarding Council-entry. I have other fears too. But I think that the thing has come to stay. The Congress will always have in it a party favouring it. I have come to believe that it would be impossible and improper to ignore it. I, therefore, have made up my mind to give all possible help in strengthening it. But this will not go well with civil disobedience. From prison, I can give little direct help. The strength which it may receive from the fact of my imprisonment itself will be another matter. My hopes are pinned on you and Bhulabhai. I do not know who else might go. I don’t feel inclined to press anybody. Hence, Rajagopalachari, Rajendrababu, Jairamdas, etc., will probably stay out. I have not discussed the subject with anyone. As a result of my decision regarding civil disobedience, they are free for the time being to do as they like. Possibly Jawaharlal also may be tempted. If firm-minded, capable, selfless and devoted workers join, Council-entry may do some good. But most of such people would not be interested in the goings-on of legislatures. The democracy of my conception is a different thing altogether. It can be moulded outside, not inside the legislatures. The latter will take the right shape when such democracy has come into existence outside them. Today everywhere democracy waits on legislatures and nothing is done. I want to have legislatures that will follow the wishes of the people. I do not see at present the right atmosphere for such legislatures. I think that it is being created. Civil disobedience has succeeded in no small measure. I do not regret a single step taken in connection with it. Every step has been taken at the right time for it is my firm conviction that it was not I that took the decision every time but that it was Satyanarayana who prompted my decisions. I let myself be led by Him.

Council-entry will remain a permanent feature of the Congress like civil disobedience and constructive work. It will not receive step-motherly treatment. But I do not know just now how far I shall be able to interest myself in it. Constructive work has already become part of civil disobedience. I can see my way clearly in that sphere. But it is the love of friends and circumstances that has dragged me into the Council-entry programme. I regard myself qualified for the first two. Not for this. Let us see what happens.

439. LETTER TO RAOJIBHAI N. PATEL

JORHAT (ASSAM),
April 16, 1934

CHI. RAOJIBHAI,

I have just received your letter. There is nothing to say about the expenditure once we accept the necessity of your meeting Lalita, Balbhadra and Nathabhai. You are the sole judge of that necessity. The decisions of others in matters that concern us should be rejected if they do not appeal to our hearts, though they may to our reason. Chimanlal’s criticism should be considered, but you need not be in the least upset by it. We should not do anything which may seem blameworthy to us. But how can we take into account if it seems so to others? This is indeed one of the meanings of the passage, “Better is death in the discharge of one’s duty.” What appeals to oneself is one’s dharma.

If you have some time, write a letter to Chimanlal to placate him or to humour him. Don’t be shocked by the verb ‘humour’.

440. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

JORHAT,
April 16, 1934

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I never find time to write at length, whether to you or anyone else. Even now I am scribbling this important letter before it is time for the morning prayer. It being my silence-day, I have got to write myself. Enclosed is a copy of Ceresole’s letter. One of the most ardently devoted men of service in Europe, he is an accomplished engineer. Find out the name of his steamer and meet him. Send him straight to me at Patna. He can meet me at Ranchi. He can spend a few hours there with Bhulabhai or Jalbhai. He is coming for relief work in Bihar. A letter for him is enclosed. Read it.

You seem to have understood most of the implications. I see that my decision has taken the load off the heads of many. Were it not for that decision, they would have gone crazy, that is, broken down completely. Blind faith would not have helped them in the least. My decision is ethically the purest. It would perhaps be better still if the Congress were to expel me. But I have no wishes of my own. I shall let Him pull the string and make me dance as He wills and I shall be happy. You may come to Ranchi if you wish.

Anyone who says that Nasik is too hot knows nothing. Nasik can be considered hot if Deolali is hot. The nights are cool in any case. The air is pure and so is the water. But you may go even to Tithal.

I am sending now the previous letter\(^1\) about salt which had not been sent.

BHAI SHANKARAN,

I have your letter.

The fact is that the work of popularizing the national language must be carried on even in Bombay and Gujarat. And for this the teachers have to come from U.P. and Bihar. This is not a job for you.

The language in which we may converse with the villagers or write ordinary letters may be called workable Hindi.

443. LETTER TO SANTOSH KUMAR BASU

[Before April 17, 1934]

DEAR SANTOSHBABU,

I congratulate you and your Corporation1 upon the passing of the Harijan budget. But that is merely a beginning. To pass the budget is one thing, to actually spend the money is another. I hope that you will personally see to it that, however poor your purse may be, the Harijan will be a first charge on it. Please do not forget water taps in the bastis.

April 17, 1934

CHI. CHHAGANLAL,

I got your letter. Have you regained full strength? You have not sent me your comments on my decision. Do send them. You have done right in deciding to stay on where you are for the present. Study the problems of khadi and Harijan work. See what Ramjibhai and Jivanlal are doing. Give them whatever help you can. Also see how the children fare there. How are Dudhibehn and Kusum? If you add up all these things, you will have sufficient work for the present. I shall be in Bihar up to the 3rd. I shall reach there on the 24th. As you will understand, I cannot spare more time to write about other things.

446. LETTER TO RAOJIBHAI N. PATEL

JORHAT,
April 17, 1934

CHI. RAOJIBHAI,

Please go through my statement again. You don’t seem to have understood it fully. I have said that for the present no one should resort, without my consent, to civil disobedience as a means of achieving swaraj. There are many other causes for which people who know how to use this weapon may do so. Mass civil disobedience for swaraj creates difficulties. You may say that my capacity to lead such a movement is limited.

You must have received my letter. Once you have fulfilled your obligations, work is waiting for you—either khadi or Harijan work. If you cannot choose between these two, I shall do it for you.

If you don’t understand my statement even after reading it again, have patience. You will understand it by and by.

I got your letter only today.

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have your letter. It is good you sent a copy of the resolution. The grumbling is only momentary. It will calm down. My decision is so good that nothing objectionable can be found in it. It is a different matter if the Congress allows them to carry on under its auspices. The full meaning of the satyagraha could not have been shown without this decision. That even now it may not be shown is possible. But that will be my failing, not the failing of satyagraha. Some of the good

What has appeared in *The Sun*¹ is wicked. But what can one do? Nothing can be kept a secret. Miss Lester will be distressed. But that does not matter. I have sent copies to you and others with her permission. Who brings out The Sun?

Your letter this time can be called good. Continue to work hard like this and write.

Do you know geography? You must have heard the name of Assam. We are touring in that area at present. It is raining very heavily here. It has started from today. Therefore the air now is cool. There are lots of trees here. So the place is all green. The great river Brahmaputra flows through Assam. It is very big. Steamers can ply on it. It flows from Tibet.

Most of the women here know weaving. They wear clothes woven by themselves. Some women also sell these clothes.

Assam being in the far east, the sun rises and sets early. There is a difference of one-and-a-quarter hours between the (local) time there and here. Here it is dusk by 5 p.m.

... The resentment that we see is temporary. It will subside. My decision is so good that nobody can find anything to say against it. Whether the Congress will let me offer satyagraha in its name is a different question. Without taking the decision which I have done, I would not have been able to demonstrate the real value of satyagraha. It is possible that I have still not been able to demonstrate it. That will be my deficiency, not that of satyagraha. We can see even today some of the good effects of the decision. But why need I explain all this to you? Jorhat. It is in Assam. Two days remain now for the tour here to end. After that I will spend a little more than a week in South Bihar and then I will go to Utkal, i.e., Orissa. I see that I shall be in Bengal when you are released. If the date of your release has been fixed, let me know it. There was a letter from Manilal specially meant for you. He writes in it about your inquiring after everybody. I have replied saying that I send your original letters to Phoenix, and copies to Ramdas, Devdas and Sardar. I have already written to you about Kanti having been released. He is all right. Since there is to be no jail-going now, it will shortly be decided where he will stay. He will come and meet me somewhere. Jamnalalji is now expected in Bihar. Satisbabu is all right. He is in Calcutta. Raojibhai, Panditji, Parnerkar and others are all working together in Bihar. Madhavdas also is with them. Bal and Prithuraj are with me. Narandas’s nostrils bleed and so he is still at Rajkot. Perhaps he may come and see me at Ranchi. Chhaganlal is in Bhavnagar. He has almost regained the weight which he had lost. He visited Bhansali. There is something the matter with Bhansali’s legs. He cannot move them or walk. He has got his lips stitched up. He drinks flour mixed with water through a tube. He also drinks gram or mung flour mixed with water. He drops me a postcard now and then. Despite the pain, he remains cheerful. Rajendrababu keeps excellent health. Prabhavati and Jayaparakash are better now. My weight is 108. Mirabehn doesn’t make speeches. Sometimes she goes to open khadi exhibitions. I myself am not able to attend such functions. While opening the exhibitions, she says a few words. You see them reported in newspapers. I rarely get time to read newspapers. Ramdas’s mother-in-law and Navanit have gone to Wardha. The epidemic in Ahmedabad has spread to other places too. I had written to Allahabad regarding Shyamlal Nehru. Umabehn has borne the separation from her husband with fortitude. Her daughter wrote a long letter to me. You must have received the slivers. Let me know when you want more. Where do you intend to break the semi-fast of the Purushottam month? I hope you get enough milk and fruit. Ranchhodbhai and others are in Ahmedabad, of course. They did not go out anywhere. Chinmanlal has been having fever, and so he has gone to Veraval. Sharda has accompanied him. Mithubehn stays on in Bombay. Kalyanji and Kunvarji also are there. I did write a letter of condolence to Kunvarji on the death of his wife. Chandrashankar had returned, but he fell ill again and so went back. I will write to Premlilabehn on your behalf. Kishorelal is still ill. He is at Deolali. Radha of course is there. Santok and Gomati also are there. Velanbehn is in Baroda. Om

JORHAT, ASSAM,
April 18, 1934

Bhai Vallabhbhai,

It will soon be time for the prayers. I am in Jorhat just now. The birds are singing. Here the dawn breaks earlier. It is daylight by five.

A copy of Ba’s letter is enclosed.

I hope you have fully understood my decision. I see that it is having a good effect. After observing it, I feel that the decision was absolutely correct. It has been taken neither too late nor too early. I think it has been made at the right time. But why should we think about results? How can one claim to be a student of the Gita and at the same time be concerned with results? Let the results be what they will. A seemingly good result may be a snare and a seemingly bad result may bef or one’s good. How can we know? Daily we sing, too, “Miseries are not what we regard as miseries.”

All will meet in Ranchi. I shall guide them according to my lights. I think it is our duty to give full freedom to Congressmen who favour entering the legislatures. It is but right that those who daily attend legislatures in their thoughts should do so physically as well. Then alone will they be able to judge the relative advantages and disadvantages of that policy. Is it not better that one who daily eats jalebi in his imagination should eat the real thing and know the wisdom or folly of doing so? Most probably Mathuradas also will attend, and so will Perin and others. The company will be in Ranchi for four days. I hope Raja also will come. I see that Raja fully approves of the move. And so does Mathuradas. Rajendrababu has been in favour of it from the beginning. Pyarelal is with him just now.

Pierre Ceresole, a man devoted to social service, is coming here from Geneva. One may say that it is his occupation to go and help wherever there is a natural calamity like an earthquake. He is an expert engineer. He is coming to give help in Bihar and will land in Bombay on the 25th. Mathuradas will bring him or send him to Ranchi. Higginbottom also came and saw me. He also has promised to help. Harrison and Lester will meet me in Patna. I will know from them what they have been able to achieve. Both of them had gone to Calcutta. They have been working very hard indeed. They are sincere and brave. But theirs is a cry in the wilderness.

Bal is still with me. Kaka is fairly well in Hyderabad [jail]. He has been collecting a lot of books there. Mahadev is already buried in books and now Kaka too will get so buried.

I have worked very hard for Obedullah\(^1\) behind the scenes. I think my efforts are bearing fruit now. Probably he will be saved.

The epidemic of children’s disease in Ahmedabad has become fairly widespread. Some say that the cause of the epidemic is the cinema. I wouldn’t be surprised if it was so. Those who see pictures tell me that there is considerable strain on the brain and the eyes.

Chandrashankar had gone [home] and fallen ill. He returned too soon and fell ill again. And so he has gone back. I saw that he could not stand travelling.

Kamala Nehru and Sarup Rani have gone to Calcutta for treatment. It has been decided that I should tour Bengal, too.

453. INTERVIEW TO HARIJAN LEADERS

JORHAT,

Gandhiji, being asked if the present movement would benefit backward classes other than Harijans, replied that they would certainly be benefited indirectly. When law ceased to recognize untouchability, there would be only backward classes, whether touchables or untouchables, to demand state protection. In answer to another question, he said that inter-dining and intermarriage were matters of individual choice, not susceptible of social regulation. These constituted a reform by themselves, which had nothing to do with untouchability. A worker asked if the present movement would not lead to internecine strife among Hindus. Gandhiji replied in the negative, for, he said, it took two to make a quarrel and he himself was working on the lines of least resistance and waiting for public opinion to be ripe on the subject. But they must work away with a will while there was still time. Otherwise, there would be a terrible upheaval, a human earthquake, due not to the present movement, but to the natural effect of the sin of untouchability which it was designed to counteract. Asked if he was not sorry for the part he played in the Khilafat movement, Gandhiji said he was as proud of it as of any event in his life, and it would go down in history as an outstanding instance of unselfish co-operation.

454. INTERVIEW TO AMERICAN MISSIONARY

_Jorhat, [April 18, 1934]^

Gandhiji had an interesting talk with an American missionary who asked for his views about conversion. He repeated the opinion he has often given that he did not believe in conversion by human agency. Seekers after Truth were in the same position as the blind men in the Indian parable who went to see an elephant, or rather in a worse position. For, if the physically blind lacked in sight, they were compensated for it to some extent by the enhanced power of other organs of sense. But seekers after Truth could only see as through a glass, darkly, so far as inward sight was concerned. It would, therefore, be sheer presumption on their part to seek to “convert” others to their own faith. God had as many ways of approaching Him as there were human beings.

Upon the missionary friend attempting a comparison between Jesus and other men revered by humanity, Gandhiji said that such comparison was fruitless. Jesus of history was not the same as the Jesus whom Christians adored. For them He was the living God of their conception. Similarly he himself believed in the Krishna of his own imagination, who was identical with God and had not much to do with the historic Krishna about whom there was a mass of conflicting evidence. Historical persons were dead. The mystical incarnations were living ideas—more real than earthly existences. Religion could never be based on history, for, if it was so based, faith would be undermined. Tulsidas therefore clinched the point by saying that _nama_ (the name) was greater than Rama.

_Harijan, 4-5-1934_

455. INTERVIEW TO THE PRESS

April 18, 1934

That there can be, and should be, co-operation with the Government in the legislatures was the opinion expressed by Mr. Gandhi in an interview today.

Asked whether, in giving his blessing to the formation of the Swaraj Party, he meant that Congressmen should enter the legislatures for the specific purpose of getting “repressive” laws repealed and the White Paper Constitution rejected, Mr. Gandhi said that he could not define the policy of Congress parliamentarians just as he did not define the policy followed by Pandit Malaviya and the late Mr. C. R. Das although he was instrumental in handing the reins of the Congress to the Swaraj Party. If the Swaraj Party was revived and they asked him for advice as to their line of action in the legislatures, he would advise them according to the circumstances that might present themselves at the time his advice was asked for.

Asked whether he did not think that there could be occasions for cooperation with the Government in the legislatures, Mr. Gandhi replied:

Certainly I can conceive many instances in which there can be, and should be, co-operation.

Asked whether members of the old Swaraj Party now in the legislatures, Provincial and Central, should be allowed to rejoin the new Swaraj Party, Mr. Gandhi said:

They will be members for the asking.

Replying to further questions he said:

I am sure the fact that they did not resign their seats in obedience to the Lahore resolution will make no difference. Anyone that adopts the policy of the Swaraj Party will be entitled to membership no matter what his past views may have been. Suppose I become a Congressman now and adopt the programme of the Swaraj Party, I should be entitled to membership.

In reply to another question Mr. Gandhi said:

If the All-India Congress Committee endorse the revival of the Swaraj Party, the party will occupy the same place that it did when a resolution was adopted at Patna just after Mr. C. R. Das’s death.

Q. It would seem from your Patna statement1 that the suspension of civil disobedience is only temporary. Do you mean that it will have to be resorted to at least by those who are sufficiently skilled in it in the near or distant future?

1 Vide “Statement to the Press”, 2-4-1934
A. I have not the vaguest idea of what would happen in the future, for a satyagrahi has no such settled plan. He lives, metaphorically speaking, but quite truly, from hand to mouth, day by day. Therefore, I have no notion when the call will come to me to ask my co-workers to resume the struggle.

Asked what he thought about Mr. Sampurnanand’s remarks appearing in The Statesman of April 14, Mr. Gandhi said:

I fully sympathize with Mr. Sampurnanand in his anger, but when he has read my statement in calmness, I have no doubt he will see I have cast no reflection upon any of my co-workers. I have no regret for all past steps taken in satyagraha. But I have no doubt whatsoever that, in the extraordinary situation the country is facing, it was the wisest thing for me to advise Congressmen to suspend satyagraha, confining it only to me.

With regard to the passage: “Physical non-violence combined with boycott and disobedience is only a mask for spiritual violence and, in depriving it of its outlet and condemning it to use ethical language, it intensified the inward passion of hate” in The Statesman’s editorial on the Patna statement, Mr. Gandhi observed:

If the writer of the editorial had used the expression, “might only be a mask for spiritual violence” instead of saying “is only a mask for spiritual violence”, I should have taken no exception to it. But if my evidence and that of many comrades whom I can name is of any value, I can say with confidence that boycott and disobedience were never a mask for spiritual violence. We never had any hate for a single Briton, not even those like General Dyer who in our opinion had done grave wrong to thousands of innocent men and women. When a dispassionate history of the past fourteen years is written I have no doubt whatsoever that the historian will testify to the fact that physical non-violence coupled with boycott, as defined by the Congress, and civil disobedience did materially check the outbreak of violence and taught people the value of self-restraint. Forces of violence, when they are once let loose, instead of spending themselves continue to grow and with them the underlying hate, whereas civil disobedience, when it is honestly pursued, has been known to transform the passion for hate into a passion for friendship, and this I can say with perfect confidence from personal experience dating back from 1906.

1 Sampurnanand, in his statement, had said: “only a short time back Mr. Gandhi destroyed all vestige of organized Congress life in the country but advocated a truncated variety of satyagraha. Next he extended his blessings to the rejuvenated Swaraj Party, notwithstanding the Lahore Congress resolution.... when he seeks to inject into us the virus of inferiority complex by saying that we as a people, with all our sufferings, have proved ourselves unworthy of satyagraha, we cannot let this statement go unchallenged.... We are neither prepared to appoint Mr. Gandhi our sole champion nor promise not to resume the fight without his bidding. If this particular weapon is unfit for us, we shall simply have to find out another....”

456. LETTER TO S. K. DATTA

*AS AT PATNA,
April 19, 1934*

DEAR DR. DATTA,

Many thanks for your letter and telegrams. All I can suggest is that you should ask the Bishop not to be satisfied till the Khan is released or at least those who have influence with him are permitted to see him without let or hindrance.

Yes, indeed. For me the present is merged in eternity. I may not sacrifice the latter for the present. And that has driven me logically to the statement¹. But I am hoping that this latest decision will bring swaraj nearer than it ever was so long as the people retain the view that it can be had only through nonviolent means. What can be obtained through violence won’t be swaraj of my dream.

Love to you both.

that party? Must your nationalism differ from theirs?

I did indeed read your book on Buddhism with great interest. I do not remember that I had to write to you after my having read it. Your novel I never reached. My views on social reform remain as they were and they have taken active shape in the present campaign against untouchability.

In the first place you must not come to me till your health is proof against disease in this trying tour. Chandrashankar got ill twice and he had finally to go for recuperation. Therefore get well and report. Meanwhile do what khadi and Harijan work you can there and make your knowledge of Hindi better than it is.

The more you read my statement the more you will like it. It is no reflection on anybody. The step was inherent in satyagraha at this stage. More when we meet.

Love.

460. LETTER TO MANSANKAR TRIVEDI

April 19, 1934

CHI. MANU,

Cheerfully accept Father’s final decision. If your and Vimala’s love is pure, you should be able to exercise sufficient self-control to discontinue meeting each other socially. If you do not regard it as your moral duty to exercise such self-control, you should not mind financial help being stopped. No son is entitled to receive help from his father after he has become a major. Any help that the father may give should be regarded as a kindness. Other parents rarely do what yours have done for you. Even now your father has taken the decision in your interest. You should not argue whether it is really in your interest. Even if it does not seem so, it would do you no harm to accept it, for the motive behind Jayashankar’s decision is pure. And in any case it is certainly not against dharma. It will not be a violation of dharma to discontinue social relations with Vimala for the present.

462. INTERVIEW TO THE PRESS

DIBRUGARH,
April 19, 1934

Interviewed this morning by the Associated Press regarding the Home Member’s statement 1 in the Assembly, Mr. Gandhi, who is staying at Gosala Ashram, Dibrugarh said:

I have no views on the Home Member’s statement because, being continuously travelling, I have not been able to see it. It has just come to me, but I have not yet read it. It is, therefore, impossible for me to pronounce an opinion as to whether the statement is cautious or halting or magnanimous.

He added that it was doubtful whether he could make any comment on the statement while he would be touring, having the whole of his mind concentrated upon Harijan work.

Replying to a question whether he suggested that Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru should be allowed to participate in the deliberations of the Ranchi Conference, Mr. Gandhi said:

I can only say that any conclusions that any conference may arrive at can only be inconclusive without the presence of Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru.

463. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

DIBRUGARH,
[On or after April 19, 1934]

BHAI GHANSHYAMDAS.

I have all your letters. What reply can we make to Amrita Bazar Patrika? The articles it carries are heavily spiced. And it is not that one always writes what one believes. If you want to write in order to explain things to friends it can be done in some other way.

The Award problem is very tough indeed. Something is possible

1 Sir Harry Haig, making a statement in the Assembly on the Government’s attitude towards the Congress and the release of civil disobedience prisoners, had said that there would be no obstacle to the meeting of the A.I.C.C. or the Congress.

2 Gandhiji was in Dibrugarh on April 19 and 20.
if the Mussalmans accept the way I have shown. Even if they do not, the path is quite straight. But I am afraid the Swarajists will not approve of it. I do not find today an atmosphere conducive to the achieving of Hindu-Muslim-Sikh unity.

I have independently examined the question of Council-entry. I feel that the Congress will always have in it a group favouring Council-entry. It is this group which should have the reins of the Congress, for it alone needs the label of the Congress. This fact I have accepted for all time. Those very people will boycott the Councils when they find it necessary.

There are many difficulties connected with Council-entry. Decisions on these will be taken when the time comes, mistakes will be committed, some will be rectified, some will not be and things will go on like that.

I for one prefer Ranchi to Calcutta. That it is not convenient for other people is another matter. The peace Ranchi offers is an impossibility in Calcutta. But I have left it to Rajendrababu.

I shall read your address to the Federation and communicate to you my opinion.

If the meeting is held in Ranchi and if you can come, do. It might be for the good though I cannot say definitely. I hope Gopi and Gajanan are getting along well.

Blessings from

464. A HARIJAN’S QUESTIONS ANSWERED

A Harijan sends the following questions for me to answer.

1. Mahatmaji, why are you so much interested in our cause?

2. If all religions are one in your consideration, are the Christians not entitled to combat untouchability?
3. In what way will our people be benefited if untouchability is removed?
4. Why should we enter Hindu temples?
5. Did not the Hindu deities that were incarnated oppress us?
6. Arya and un-Arya are the divisions created for us. What harm is there if we remain separated?
7. Even in untouchables there are many sub-castes. What do you propose to do with this problem?
8. Once you said that swaraj can be attained the day untouchability is removed. Is this present propaganda directed to that end?
9. If so, are you going to give equivalent rights with other Hindus to our crores of untouchables?
10. Instead of opening temples and eradicating untouchability, suffice it if you make provision for our livelihood.

They are good questions. My answers are:

1. I am interested in the Harijan cause for the sake of purifying myself of the taint of untouchability and doing penance for the sin; and, being jealous of the reputation of the faith I profess, I am anxious that fellow-members of the faith should also purge themselves of the same.

2. Not only are the Christians entitled, but it is their duty, to combat untouchability in their own midst. But if the question is that Christians should combat untouchability in Hinduism, my answer is that they simply cannot do it, because untouchables of Hinduism should not be untouchables to Christians. The antiuntouchability movement means weaning Hindus from their error. This cannot be effectively done by non-Hindus, even as Hindus cannot bring about religious reform among Christians or Mussalmans. If the question means that Christians should combat untouchability among Hindus by converting untouchables to Christianity, they do not advance the cause in any shape or form, the cause being reformation among caste Hindus. If the latter repented of their sin, the Harijans would be delivered from the yoke of untouchability in a moment. Conversion can never do it. It can only add to the prevailing bitterness and introduce a disturbing factor in a situation which is already bad but which, owing to the work of the Harijan Sevak Sanghs and other movements of internal reform in Hinduism, is steadily improving, untouchability being daily undermined.
3. In many ways. I enumerate some below:

(i) Caste Hindus will be purified by their repentance.

(ii) The economic, moral, social and political status of Harijans will be improved at a bound by the removal of an artificial barrier which has been stunting their growth all along.

(iii) Untouchability that is imposed on untouchables is such a poison that it has overtaken those living within its zone. And therefore, Hindus, Christians, Mussalmans and others have become untouchables to one another. Real removal of untouchability must bring us all together and thus promote a heart-unity of the different communities of India.

(iv) Removal of untouchability with all its implications must mean a great contribution to the promotion of universal brotherhood.

4. Harijans need not enter Hindu temples, if they do not wish it. But they should, if they have faith in them. The temple-entry movement has for its object, not the entering by Harijans into Hindu temples, but the opening of these temples to all those Harijans who wish to enter them for worship. In other words, it is a movement of repentance and change of heart in caste Hindus.

5. I should be sorry if I found that the Hindu deities oppressed Harijans, and if they did, they were certainly not beneficent deities, but evil ones to be shunned.

6. He would be a bold man who is able to say today with any degree of success who is Arya and who is un-Arya. Historians tell us that a blending of the two took place centuries ago. If now a sharp division is attempted, it will harm not only Hindus, both caste and outcaste, but it will harm the whole of India and, by implication, the whole of humanity.

7. When untouchability practised by caste Hindus is radically removed, its offshoot among untouchables will automatically wither.

8. I should assert the statement again. But the present propaganda is directed only to the purification of caste Hindus and, therefore, of Hindus. And when that purification is demonstrably attained, not only swaraj but many other desirable results will follow, as day follows night. The word “swaraj” as here used does not mean a mere legal status but something far better and more lasting. I would call it an organic status evolved from within.

9. Whatever meaning may be given to the word “swaraj”, removal of untouchability will be a fraud if it does not carry with it the enjoyment by the freed Hindus of precisely the same rights as the other Hindus and all other communities may enjoy under it.

10. It is beyond me, a single, poor mortal, to make provision for the livelihood of millions. That can only be achieved by their whole effort and God’s grace. But, if temples are flung open to Harijans and untouchability is eradicated, the dead weight that is grinding them down will have lifted, and they will have an equal opportunity with the rest of their fellow-men for earning an honest livelihood.

465. HOW THEY SHOULD ACT

The reader is aware that I have dissuaded Harijans from pressing for representation on Harijan boards, for the very simple and complete reason that these boards are meant to be composed of savarna Hindus who regard untouchability as a sin and who would do reparation to Harijans for past wrongs done to them. Savarna Hindus are, therefore, debtors and Harijans creditors. When debtors consider the ways and means of discharging their obligations, it is they alone who have to frame their proposals for the acceptance of creditors, who have their own boards which consider such proposals and accept or reject them or advise amendments before acceptance. I have, therefore, suggested the formation of advisory committees of Harijans to assist Harijan Seva Sangh boards.

Writing on my suggestion, a Harijan correspondent says:

If you will kindly paint a picture of an ideal Harijan advisory committee, what it should do, how it should act and how it should assert itself, I shall certainly be able to have a clear-cut idea of what it should be. I feel also this to be essential, in view of the necessity of establishing such committees.

These are pertinent questions. I should suggest the formation of compact, small representative committees who would truly represent the opinion of local Harijans. They would frame rules for the conduct of their proceedings and formulate their expectations of savarna Hindus and generally watch the proceedings of Harijan boards. These advisory committees, wherever they are formed, would advise Harijan boards of their existence and show their preparedness to help the latter. If the boards are sincere in their desire to discharge their debt, that is, to serve Harijans, they will establish the friendliest contact with the advisory committees, and perfect co-operation and harmony will prevail.

There may be friction in the beginning because of mutual suspicion. Harijan boards, being naturally better organized and better off in every respect, will have to exercise tact in handling what may appear to be extravagant demands. Advisory committees would endeavour to be considerate. The more considerate they are, the better able they will be to help themselves. From their ability to conduct themselves in a dignified manner, they will learn the art of asserting themselves if the occasion ever arises. For they should know that savarna Hindus will never be able to discharge their debt except with the co-operation of Harijans. But the question of asserting themselves does not arise just yet, because the vast mass of Harijans have been rendered so completely helpless that they have no power of resisting injustice, even if they wanted to. Let me explain what I mean. Harijan boards have three functions, to raise the economic, social and religious status of Harijans, or to put it in another way, to remove the difficulties that savarna Hindus have for centuries put in the way of Harijans raising their heads in any department of life. Thus the Harijan boards have to provide wells, scholarships, boarding houses, schools and social amenities, wherever the need arises. In all these, the general body of Harijans simply take the help wherever it is offered. Advisory committees can, therefore, help the cause and themselves by making useful suggestions to the boards and also rendering such help as they themselves can to those whom they represent. Thus only will they acquire the power of asserting themselves. In short, advisory committees will best help the cause by taking up internal reform and causing an awakening among the Harijan masses, so that they may begin to realize that they are men and women entitled to the same rights as are enjoyed by the other members of the society to which they belong.

467. LETTER TO KOTWAL

April 20, 1934

Bhai Kotwal,

I have your letter. In course of time you will realize more clearly the correctness of my decision. Be patient. Everybody will get an opportunity to do what he or she is eager to do. Civil disobedience does not consist in courting imprisonment or mounting the gallows anyhow. Civil disobedience has been completely abused in its spirit. One must cultivate fitness for civil disobedience. It has great destructive power. To cultivate such fitness, one must have voluntarily and scrupulously obeyed all laws and rules. How many people can we find who have done so? Are you one of them? Were you? Would you be now? Don’t send me your replies to these questions. Reply to them to yourself and you will understand my statement rightly and also see your path. Moreover, please remember that I have not suspended civil disobedience in all matters. Apart from the fight for swaraj, there may be countless other situations in which individuals and groups may be required to resort to civil disobedience. Have patience.

Await my call for joining the fight for swaraj. Make yourself fit for it. If you wish to do so, free yourself from all personal bonds. Follow the way of “I left my friends and kinsmen, and my husband as well”¹ and engage yourself in khadi work and in the service of Harijans, Muslims and drink addicts. Be content with what you can earn from such work for your livelihood. You may then be sure that everything will be well.

469. STATEMENT TO ASSOCIATED PRESS

TINSUKHIA,
April 20, 1934

I have not noticed any active opposition from conservative upper classes as you call it and I have certainly had considerable active support in the shape of money, as also promises of constructive work. Strange as it may appear, even in Assam, whilst the Harijans have naturally laid stress upon the necessity of educational and economic betterment, they have bitterly complained of social dis-abilities and bar against entry into temples and Namghars (places of worship). They feel the sting of inferiority underlying the social and religious restrictions. I believe, however, that these are fast melting away and public opinion is gathering in favour of the removal of such restrictions.

I said the problem in Assam was complex, because indigenous Harijans and coolies from provinces are all regarded as Harijans, whether they were so regarded in the provinces or not. Theirs is, therefore, not an enviable lot. They present a problem of peculiar difficulty, because they are settlers in Assam, holding land in their own right and if they are not well looked after, they must present increasingly greater difficulties; but I am hoping that the Assam leaders, as a result of the anti-untouchability campaign, will seriously deal with the problem and help these coolies to become honourable citizens.

470. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, TINSUKHIA

April 20, 1934

Alluding to the incident, Gandhiji said that if anybody had insulted these friends, it was wrong. But those who wanted to serve the cause of religion must learn to rise above all petty considerations of courtesy and discourtesy. Those who could not surmount their pride and become as humble as the very dust under their feet would not be able to render Harijan service.

Proceeding further, Gandhiji said he did not set much store by money as such. It was, therefore, perhaps, that he had the reputation of being an expert beggar. He wanted money only if he could carry with it the hearts of the donors. If a single donor gave him one crore of rupees, he could not abolish untouchability; but he could undertake the task without a single pie, if he could carry with him the hearts of one crore of caste Hindus. Let them know what he meant by the removal of untouchability. It meant complete removal of all distinctions of high and low, not only as to Harijans, but also among caste Hindus themselves. That was sure to lead to heartunity among Hindus, Muslims, Christians and others, for the political causes, for the disunion were superficial. The root cause was the distinction of high and low, i.e., untouchability. They must, in the language of the Gita, learn to treat the Brahmin and the Bhangi with equal regard. No human being could be unclean by birth.

If they would search for unclean things, they had only to dive into their own minds, where they would find a multitude of evil thoughts worthy of being treated as outcastes. Bathing was all very well, but even buffaloes had long daily baths. He only was pure who walked in the fear of God and served His creatures.

Then they had a special untouchable in Assam. That was opium. They must get rid of the curse. It was stunting their growth. Medical evidence went to show that, if the opium habit was not given up, it would extinguish the Assamese. Harijans were a prey to the habit just as much as the others. He implored the cultured men and women of Assam to deal with the curse.

The condition of the labourers from other provinces demanded the special attention of the Assamese, who must devise measures for their uplift and fusion with Assamese society.

In appealing to the Marwaris, of whom there was a fair number in the meeting and whom he described as the bankers of India, Gandhiji said he well knew their humanitarian work. They were ready to find money for the cow, for Hindi propaganda, for relief of the distressed. He wanted them to take their full share in the task of serving the indigenous Harijans and the industrious labourers from the other provinces, who were miscalled coolies and who were treated as worse than Harijans.

Assam was a beautiful country, from whose natural scenery he could not bear to withdraw his eyes. Thanks to the noble Brahmaputra and timely and sufficient rains, Assam was a veritable land of gold. But it required sustained human endeavour to extract the gold. If all the limbs of society were worked efficiently, Assam would be as prosperous and happy as it was beautiful to look at.

474. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, KATIHAR

April 22, 1934

Bapu spoke very touchingly about Gokulbabu’s sudden death. He said that man proposed but the disposal lay in the hands of God. He had not dreamed that he would have to speak about Gokulbabu’s death at Katihar when he toured with him in Forbesganj and mofussil. Gokulbabu driving the car all hale and hearty, with so much enthusiasm and energy. He got acquainted intimately with him at Purnea. In his house, he had become acquainted with Satyavati, alas! now a widow, whose courage and devotion to duty were noticed when she begged for pice in a meeting as a volunteer and tried to protect Mahatmaji in the rush that followed the break-up of a meeting and tried to force a passage through the struggling mass of humanity. But what could physical force avail? Of course the strength of spirit helps and protects. Bapu paid a tribute to her pluck:

She is a virtuous lady and tries with success to follow the footsteps of her lamented husband.

He hoped she would continue the work left by her husband. He had received Rajendrababu’s and Mritunjay’s telegram and had replied that as she had been devoted heart and soul to her dear husband she must follow in his footsteps in the service of the country and tread the path he had shown. Just now Rajendrababu had assured him that she was now taking food. That was well. It was wrong for a loyal wife to immolate herself with her departed husband. Such a death was not fulfilling a duty. The real discharge of duty lay in carrying on the work dear to the heart of the departed and dying in the course of doing it. All die—old, young and child. All of them will travel the same path. Why then mourn for Gokulbabu who, though delicate and nourished in ease, worked like a mazdoor. He had been for three days with him and bore all the dust and the strain courageously and did not think of hardships.

1 Gokul Krishna Roy
2 Telegrams sent to Gandhiji had informed him that she had given up food from grief.

All happens as God wills. They are contemplating an Ashram to be named after Gokulbabu, who had cherished that desire.

All collections at the meeting would be made over to the proposed Ashram. It is said that Gokulbabu was the soul of Purnea. He hoped the Purnea people would show that that was their feeling. Two points were noticeable in Gokulbabu—the absence of untouchability and the absence of distinction between high and low, rich and poor.

The Searchlight, 29-4-1934

475. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

MUZAFFARPUR,

April 23, 1934

Bhai Vallabhbhai,

I got both your letters. I have just sat down to write letters after cleaning my teeth. It is 3.40 a.m. now. I hope you will look upon this as an improvement as regards my hour of rising. We are in Gokhale-puri in Muzaffarpur. We arrived here from Assam at 10.30 last night. A small suburb, named after Gokhale, has been built here by Bajpai of the Gokhale Institute. I have to perform its inauguration ceremony today after the period of silence ends. Rajendrababu saw me in Katihar yesterday.

As Valji felt a little ill, instead of going to bed immediately on arrival here I sent for a doctor and could sleep only after twelve.

Please do not worry about me. I am taking the utmost care of my health. I somehow manage to get my full quota of sleep.

Narandas (Gandhi) has been quite ill after his release. There is profuse bleeding from his nose. But he is a little better now. He will see me in Ranchi.

It seems strange that you feel perplexed. I had told everybody that you would immediately understand my step. But your letters show your pain. Nobody among those who are outside seems to have felt as you do. Jawahar did so, of course, but I thought that he would understand the step after a while. I wonder whether my belief that a person who is in jail cannot correctly understand the situation outside is being proved true in your case also, or whether I am following a completely wrong path. I still don’t feel that I am doing that. To me it is as clear as daylight that the decision I have taken is correct. It is useless to ask me also why I didn’t think of this in Poona. I couldn’t have thought of it then. The right solution occurs only at the right time, and then alone does it work. The decision taken in Poona was the right one at that time and this one is right at the present time. One shouldn’t mind what Aunt¹ says. If we had not taken this decision, we would have invited untold harm.

There are difficulties of course. Not a single one of them was out of my mind. We will overcome them. This step has raised the morale of the people. It will rise still further. We can give a reply to the cultivators, and will do so. We couldn’t have done that if I also had given up civil disobedience. I hope it will not occur to you even in your dream that this is my pride speaking. Since I cannot explain all the reasons to you, who are a prisoner, I leave the matter here. The fruits of patience are sweet. Have patience. Everything will be well.

About the Swaraj Party being revived, the reply is quite simple. It was absolutely necessary that it should be revived. I feel that a party which has survived so many bitter experiences must have a place in the Congress. I don’t think this is a temporary phase; it has come to stay. I know that there are difficulties in that policy too. Personal aspirations and ambitions also are playing a part. And ability is limited. You may say what else you will. But realities cannot be wished away. At the most we can improve them a little. We may exercise control. We can do neither more nor less. You may even say that I have forced them to take courage in both hands. They wanted to take this course but did not have the courage to do so. The suggestion which I had made in Poona is now bearing fruit. It would have been a different matter if we could have kept the Congress completely away from the legislatures. But that would have been coercion. You were the first to show me The Sun². Are the reports in it always of that kind? There is some truth in that one. Poor Lester. She and Agatha will meet me in Patna tomorrow. Both of them liked my decision very much. They are trying hard and doing their best. But nobody is likely to listen to them just now. All the same, it is good that they are trying so hard to understand the situation. Both are sincere and brave. One Ceresole is coming from Switzerland. He is an expert engineer. He is coming to give help in Bihar. He is a lover of peace. I had met him in Villeneuve. He is a good man. If he keeps good health, he will be able to do much useful work. Let us see what he can do.

I got a wire only yesterday about Fulchand Bapuji’s death. A good worker has passed away. It was an excellent death. The accompanying note was published by Narasinhbhai¹. You will like it. He says that Fulchand went to bed that evening as usual. He was working till the last day. There was no trouble. Naturally, there was nobody by his side when he passed away. The clock stopped during the night. Chandrashankar Pandya has sent a wire and asked my advice as to what should be done. What do you think can be done? This is no time to think about a memorial. Do you have any suggestion to make?

Thakkar Bapa had called on Dada² in connection with collections for relief work. Dada is all right. His health is improving fast. He seems to be in no hurry. Be it so. That also is good.

478. LETTER TO KALYANJI V. MEHTA
   MUZAFFARPUR,
   April 23, 1934

Bhai Kalyanjii,

   I have your letter.

   I have no doubt at all that the revenue dues on account of the Ashram must be paid. That no one except me should offer civil disobedience does not mean that the strong must become weak. It means that the strong should become stronger and make up for the weak and the latter should try to overcome their weakness. It, therefore, does not at all mean that anyone should through flattery or through humbling himself try to get back what he has lost. The time to get back what has been lost is bound to come, but that will be when we have acquired real strength. Meanwhile we should adjust our policies to the realities of the situation. No one need be frightened. Everything will settle down after some time and our path will become clear by itself. Let everyone cultivate the utmost selflessness and engage himself in work which he can do best.

You have given detailed news about the family. The body is from its very nature subject to illness and death. One person may be more ill or die earlier than another. Let us employ all possible remedies within certain limits. It would be good if Mithubehn went somewhere for rest as Sardar has suggested. How can Napoleon\(^1\), a brave boy, afford to show weakness?

479. LETTER TO BHAGWANJI P. PANDYA

MUZAFFARPUR, April 23, 1934

CHI BHAGWANJI,

I feel ashamed of my letter. Neither I nor anyone else can derive any sense from it. It is sheer violence to write letters in such bad handwriting. However, I continue to write them because all of you want them. In this particular letter, however, there are other blemishes too. I think I must have written that letter when I was extremely tired or was dozing. Some unconnected sentences, therefore, have crept in. Read it as if the sentences underlined by you were not there. You will then find that both the ideas are complete. Probably I didn’t write that letter with sufficient concentration and so some thoughts then floating in my mind got into it. Your letter will have served its purpose if it makes me more alert. What trouble you must have taken, according to your nature, to read some meaning in sentences which have no meaning!

I got your letter. Do please continue to write to me. But do not expect replies to all letters. Some may not require a reply and to some others I may not get time to reply.

You did well in giving me the information about your spinning. There is no egotism behind it; the information is correct and worth

\(^1\) Chhotubhai, son of addressee’s brother Kunvarji giving, and, therefore, it ought to be given.

Even if our work progresses at a snail’s pace, it will have progressed fast enough, because only what is genuine will endure. All the rest will be sheer waste of energy. Our test lies in being happy even in progressing at such a slow pace.

I shall write to Balram.

480. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI

April 23, 1934

CHI. RAMDAS,

I received your letter. If you resolutely observe the rules of diet, the body will get properly built up. If necessary, undertake another fast. I have found from my experience of all my fasts, except one, that the body must get stronger after a fast. If my health suffered after my 14-days’ fast, the cause was purely my ignorance. Even today, I suffer the ill-effects of that deterioration in health. If my health had not suffered then, today my body would have been much stronger than it is. But that is a past story. My subsequent fasts have wiped out some of those ill-effects. But then, this is looking at my fasts purely from the point of view of their effect on health. What the man in the street or the Government would think about the matter should be irrelevant. Religious decisions should be made independently of all other considerations. The ultimate result of such decisions cannot but be good. However, this is a matter of faith. It is my duty to induce you to think for yourself. Thus, our experience in the individual satyagraha was that one after another the fighters began to weaken. Physically, almost all of them got tired. In that individual satyagraha, all or most of those who took part in it were induced to do so by their faith in me.

Since I myself am imperfect, no other result was possible. If the foregoing reasoning is correct, after knowing all that had happened I ought to have woken up. I did that and braving all risks announced my decision.¹

For the present, digest what I have said here. If you have not understood this reasoning, ask me again. More some other time.

481. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

April 23, 1934

CHI. BRIJKRISHNA,

Your letter. It is not good for you to accompany me on the tour or to come here all the way for a couple of days. Travelling with me is a tough proposition. Almost all fall ill. You cannot even take the trip to Badrinath' and Kedarnath' but, if you can, you may go to Mussoorie or Dalhousie. There is also not any more that urgency about going to the Ashram as existed before my decision. Now Krishna Nair will be able to stay on. I hope you have understood my decision.

482. SPEECH AT OPENING OF GOKHALEPURI, MUZAFFARPUR

April 23, 1934

Gandhiji said Mr. Kunzru had spoken about why he was asked to perform the opening ceremony. He considered it a pleasant duty considering the relations existing between Gokhale and himself. Gokhale, said Gandhiji, was his political guru and continued to be so. Gandhiji considered himself an undeclared member of the Servants of India Society. These cottages, said Gandhiji, were built for housing earthquake sufferers as danger to life and property was absent therein. He knew of the

The area affected was not as large as here but the loss was appalling. Assam possessed small quake-proof houses which were not dangerous to life and property and were less expensive. Gandhiji asked Babu Rajendra Prasad to go to Assam and see designs for construction there. Gandhiji said he could not thank the Chairman of the Muzaffarpur Municipality as Gandhiji being a Bihari he could not thank another Bihari.

Referring to two years’ lease of municipal land for the cottages, Gandhiji said the municipality had acted in a miserly manner in giving two years’ lease only. He asked the municipality to make the lease permanent.

The Library and the Aushadhalaya attached to the cottages would be used by all.

Concluding, he asked all to see that Gokhaelpuri became a permanent ideal colony.

483. LETTER TO BRRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

[After April 23, 1934]

CHI. BRIJKRISHAN,

I was wondering why there was no letter from you so far, but I got your letter today. You should not have the diet you are taking at all the four meals. There is no gain from having too great a variety in your food. It would be better to have plain roti. Going out for walks and the hip-bath are absolutely essential in my opinion. You must in consultation with your elder brother chalk out a regular routine for yourself. I do not see any harm in taking the trip to Badrinath and Kedarnath if your strength is up to it. But I do wish you to get well somehow and have peace of mind.

Tell your mother that I shall have a standing complaint against her. There can be no dharma in refusing to take food at the Ashram.

April 24, 1934

BHAJ CHATURBHUIJ,

I wish success to your Youth Conference. Let the young men remember one thing, namely, that service can be done through self-control. A person of self-restraint does not consider anybody lower than himself and should, therefore, free himself from all sense of high and low. Let the young realize clearly that a practice like untouchability can never be part of religion.

488. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, BUXAR

Mahatma Gandhi referred to the unfortunate incident\(^3\) and offered apology to sanatanists for indiscretion on the part of the Harijan workers.

Religion, the Mahatma continued, had nowhere been promoted by violence and he appealed to the Harijan workers not to take any step hereafter to protect him from violence.

I am prepared to walk alone any distance from this place so that sanatanists may kill me, if they like. I am alone responsible for carrying on the Harijan uplift movement and if any head should be broken it ought to be mine before anybody else’s. I have sufficient faith in God and that is enough protection for my physical body. I need no other protection. I have so far survived five or six attacks on my life. I do not forget for a single moment that everybody has to walk about with death in his pocket consciously or unconsciously. And I would gladly lay down my head on the lap of anybody who may be intent on killing me rather than give up my conviction regarding the Harijan uplift movement under threat from any quarter. I have no quarrel with a single sanatanist. Every sanatanist is free to propagate his own conviction according to his own reading of the Shastras. I am always open to conviction and would be glad if any sanatanist could convince me that there is sanction against untouchability in the Hindu Shastras. God created all men equal and as such every Harijan is entitled as a matter of right to enter the temples. But he should not seek to do it by force as I do not believe in force or violence in such matters.¹

April 25, 1934

It grieves me to have to state that sanatanist friends have given up all sense of self-restraint whether in language or in action. This morning when I alighted at a quarter past two at Jashidih, black flags were being waved prominently with all kinds of shouts. It was with difficulty that I was taken to a car. Lathis rained upon the hood of the car. One lathi or stone, I cannot definitely say which—Shashibabu, who was occupying the same car, is positive that it was a stone—was aimed at the pane at the back of the car. Fortunately I was the only occupant in the back seat and was sitting in a corner when the pane fell just on my side. I would certainly have been seriously hurt if I had been sitting in the centre. And if there had been more occupants, one of us would have been hurt without doubt. That the hood was not broken to pieces was no fault of those who wielded heavy lathis. I was not prepared for this wild demonstration. I would like to appeal to the best minds among sanatanists and suggest that sanatana dharma will be ill served by vulgarity and violence.

In Buxar, though there was a boisterous demonstration, nothing happened to cars but there was a row between sanatanists and reformers. As soon as I saw three broken heads and one injured arm among reformist volunteers and on learning that sanatanists were also hurt, I sent Thakkar Bapa to see how they were and went to hospital myself where injuries were being examined. There were broken heads among them also. I am investigating the Buxar incident and if I find that the reformer volunteers were guilty, I should most decidedly do such penance as lies within my power, for in a struggle essentially religious, there can be no violence on the part of those who want to be guardians of the purity of their faiths. The pity of it all, however, is that demonstration on the part of sanatanists should be at all necessary. They must know that I have no violence in me and I want no compulsion in any shape or form. They know that even with reference to the Temple-entry Bill I have declared in emphatic terms that I should not be guilty of advocating the passage of this Bill if the Hindu majority was against it. This is a movement purely and simply for changing of hearts on the part of caste Hindus. I know that hearts cannot be changed by legislation. Not one single temple, so far as I am aware, has been opened by compulsion or show of it. If any temple can be proved to have been so opened I would move heaven and earth to right the wrong. The whole of this agitation against reformers managed by a few hotheaded men, I fear, and backed by influence behind curtain is wholly unnecessary.

The Hindustan Times, 27-4-1934

490. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, DEOGHAR

April 26, 1934

It is a matter of great pleasure to me to have been able to revisit this holy place. My ancestors had visited it. But I admit that I was not fired with the same kind of motive that they had. You may not also know that this was one of the places where, on my return from South Africa to India in 1915, I was invited to open the Ashram. During my last visit, practically all the Pandas (priests) were volunteers, lavishing their affectionate services on me and my party. They knew that I had the same convictions about untouchability that I have today. They knew, too, that there was hardly a meeting at which I did not speak on untouchability in those days. But, alas! on this occasion they are divided into two camps; one serving me and my party and the other, be it ever so small, resisting me. I know that it is not given to man to retain the affection of all men for all time. I know of myself that such a possibility has existed for me, a very imperfect man, only in imagination. It is, therefore, neither a matter for surprise nor sorrow that some of my old friends, the Pandas, I find in the opposite camp. But the manner of resistance is a matter for deep grief to me. I suppose they are responsible for the circulation of leaflets full of untruths and half-truths about myself designed to wean the people from me. Decency of language has been thrown to the winds. One of the leaflets is supposed to have been issued under the instructions of the Maharaja Saheb of Gidhaur. But unless I had authentic proof, I should refuse to believe that he had lent his name to it.

Black-flag demonstrations took place also at some places during my tour in the South. But they were carried out gracefully. It was merely a demonstration that those who held the black flags were opposed to the movement. Many of them were urchins who did not hesitate to return my greetings, which invariably went to the black-flaggers as to the others, and even to take part in the shouts of joy. And I have little doubt that they should have said with their distinguished ancestors, Drona and Bhishma, that they were doing it for the sake of their bellies. Here, alas! not only has decency of language been thrown away, they have resorted to violence. Early in the morning, at half past two, when I alighted at Jashidih, they filled the air with yells of denunciation. They even became violent. If they could have done so, they would certainly have smashed the hood of the car to pieces. Heavy blows descended on it. The pane at the back was smashed and I had a providential escape from being seriously hurt. I believe that they do not want to do me bodily injury, and by landing lathi blows on the hood and breaking the pane, they had intended merely to make a demonstration of their anger against me. But whatever their intention, their action was undoubtedly violent. It might have ended in a manner which they would themselves have deplored. I should like to contrast the behaviour of [some people] this morning with the very correct behaviour of the Zamorin of Calicut I went to Guruvayur. The Zamorin had certainly some cause for indignation when the battle was raging round that famous temple of the South, and yet he had prohibited any demonstration even the black flags, against me, and he received me with marked cordiality in his palace. He frankly recognized that on each side it was a battle of principle against principle. The Pandas of Deoghar and the local Varnashram Swaraj Sangh have not had even a pretext, which the Zamorin would have had, for making a demonstration against me. And what is this opposition for and why this arrogation of possession of sanatana truth by the self styled sanatanists? I have put forth the same claim that they have of trying to follow sanatana dharma. They have as much or as little right as I have to the exclusive interpretation of what it is. I swear by the same Shastras that they do. There undoubtedly is a difference between them and me. But that is purely in the matter of interpretation. Such differences there always will be. Surely they should be satisfied with the assurance that I do not seek to impose my views on anybody. I utterly disbelieve in methods of compulsion. I seek to bring people round to my view of truth by an appeal to their reason and to their hearts.

Take, for instance, the temple-entry question. In the course of my tour, I have had the privilege of declaring open many temples amidst the acclamations of thousands of people, practically without a dissentient voice. In the single instance where there was an appreciable minority against the opening, I refused to open the temple till the minority was won over or it had at least ample time to act upon the majority. If I discovered that a single temple was opened without such consent or by compulsion in any form, I should move heaven and earth to have the temple re-closed to Harijans. Then, take the Temple-entry Bill. I do believe that it is the bounden duty of every caste Hindu to adopt every legitimate means to redeem the pledge given to Harijans in Bombay during my fast in 1932. That pledge included resort to legislation when it was necessary. I may be allowed to say that the Temple-entry Bill or an equivalent is absolutely necessary if the will of the majority is to prevail. Today, according to legal opinion, even one dissentient voice is enough to keep a temple closed to Harijans. But I would be no party even to such enabling legislation being passed, if there is not a clear majority of caste Hindus in favour of it. What, therefore, the sanatanist opposition means is that I must not even cultivate public opinion in favour of such legislation under self-imposed restriction, which several of my friends and co-workers consider to be ludicrous. For I do not even take the votes at public meetings. Though I know that the majority will vote in favour of such legislation, I refrain, because I believe that it will be wrong to take the votes of the general body of people in technical matters. The question of necessity or advisability of such a law as the Temple-entry Bill is one to be decided by technical experts, that is, in this instance, lawyers. I have said repeatedly that the votes of only caste Hindus should count in the matter of opening temples. For, if they are unwilling to open their temples to Harijans, it shows that they have not cleansed themselves of untouchability. And it would be of little avail to me if all the temples were opened but caste Hindus were against such opening. There is no such thing as bringing about purity by compulsion. I have tried, therefore, to discover the cause of the opposition, and I have failed unless it be that public opinion is fast changing and untouchability is on its last lap and that, therefore, by hook or by crook my tour should be brought to a standstill, no matter how scrupulously fair my means may be of converting Hindu opinion. I have, therefore, no hesitation in saying that by this morning’s behaviour the sanatanists lowered the sanatanist flag in this sacred place, even as the great Yudhishthira lowered it by uttering a half-truth. For, has not the reputed author of the Mahabharata told us that, when Yudhishthira uttered the fateful half-truth, the wheel of his chariot sank some feet into the ground and that he had to make amends even after death? I, therefore, implore the sanatanist friends to repent of their behaviour in the sanctuary of their hearts and resolve never to repeat the violence of this morning. To the reformers I say, you are in an overwhelming majority. Those who are organizing the opposition are to be counted on one’s fingers. You should try to win them over by your patience, gentleness and personal purity. This movement is one of self purification, and only the pure of heart can have place in it. There ought to be no interference with the demonstrators. They have every right to express their resentment by carrying flags, if they like, so that I may know how many are opposed to this movement. The difficulty comes in only when they obstruct my passage or show their resentment by resorting to other species of violence. In any case you must, especially as you are in an overwhelming majority, be gentle and patient with the sanatanist friends, seek to win them over by persuasion and trust that, even if persuasion fails, time will bring them round to the truth if you are really representing it. There should be no retaliation on the part of reformers. You should know that in this movement of self-purification any violence done by the reformers may involve serious penance on my part.

Now, a word to the audience. I understand that there are several lakhs of Santhals, who call themselves Hindus, observe Hindu customs and manners, worship the Hindu deities and yet are regarded as untouchables to all intents and purposes. Those of them who do not call themselves Hindus are not regarded by you as untouchables; but those who do call themselves Hindus are almost punished for doing so.
What is the wrong they have done? They have given up intoxicating liquors. They worship the cow as you do and I do or should do.
They have even adopted vegetarianism. They utter Ramanama with perhaps greater zest and certainly greater faith than you or I do. They utilize their idle hours by spinning and weaving and thus add to the wealth of the country. They deserve to be treated with affectionate consideration, instead of as pariahs of society. There is no warrant in the Shastras for regarding them as untouchables. If there is, the sooner we perish the better it will be for us and the world. And to the Santhals I would say, “If you have faith in Ramanama you will have it in spite of your being rejected by your fellows. That sacred name, and not they, will save you and give you peace and joy, of which no one can rob you.”

_Harijan,_ 4-5-1934

491. _WHOSE OPINION CAN COUNT?_

A sanatanist pandit complained to me the other day that in the matter of the untouchability Bills the opinion of non-Hindus, Arya Samajists, Sikhs and others who did not believe in temples and idol-worship was being taken by magistrates in Benares. If that is so, it is surprising. I have always held the view, and have expressed it in these columns, that, if opinion must be taken, that of non-Hindus, nay even of Hindu Harijans, cannot count either way. For, untouchability is a doctrine with which the caste Hindus alone are concerned, and the Bills have been designed to reflect their opinion. To hold otherwise would be to introduce coercion of caste Hindus by non-caste Hindus and others. The anti-untouchability movement is a movement of internal reform among caste Hindus. It is one of repentance and self-purification. These cannot be imposed from without. If, therefore, I had any influence with the Government and if the sanatanist pandit had given me correct information, I should advise the Government to revise their instructions so as to confine the taking of opinion to caste Hindus only on the question of approval of the Bills.

My fear, however, is not that the Bills are likely to be passed by reason of non-Hindu opinion being given in their favour. My belief is that the so-called sanatanist opinion is not truly representative. For, so far as I am aware, caste Hindu opinion is overwhelmingly in favour of the temples being thrown open to Harijans. As to the advisability of passing the Bills in question, the masses, I hold, are incapable of pronouncing judgment. It is purely a question of law to be decided by lawyers. If caste-Hindu opinion is overwhelmingly in favour of the opening of temples to Harijans, they have to be opened, notwithstanding the opposition of pandits, however eminent they might be. If the existing law is powerless to give effect to that opinion, as lawyers say it is, the legislature ought to correct the existing practice so as to enable caste-Hindu opinion to operate freely.

Indeed, viewed in the light here suggested, the Bills should never have been circulated for opinion. They cannot themselves throw open a single temple to Harijans. They are enabling Bills. The oppositionists hold that, even if there is one caste Hindu against the opening of a single Hindu temple, indeed, even if no one is against the opening, no temple can be opened. The position is no doubt absurd, but such in theory is the opinion held and expressed by those who claim to speak for sanatana dharma. I hold that it is the duty of the Government to hold the scales even and remove the admitted legal obstacle in the way of reform. The Bills are designed to do that and no more. The opening of temples would depend wholly on the will of caste Hindus who are entitled to worship in the existing temples.

492. NOTES

SHAMEFUL, IF TRUE

The same pandit who complained to me about the taking of opinion by magistrates in Benares on the anti-untouchability Bills also complained that some temples had been forcibly opened at the instance of reformers. If that is so, it is certainly shameful and contrary to the wishes of those who, like me, view the movement from the purely religious standpoint and regard it as one of self-purification. Even if all the temples could be compulsorily opened to Harijans, I should not regard it as a welcome event in Hinduism. It would contribute nothing to the promotion of the spirit of brotherhood of man at which the movement aims. Indeed, the compulsory opening of even a single temple to Harijans can only retard the movement in that it must accentuate opposition, instead of weakening it. A change of heart is possible only in a free atmosphere.

The pandit produced no proof in support of his allegation that certain two temples [sic] in the North were forcibly opened. I have asked for proof and referred the allegation to friends for verification. I thought, however, that I should not wait for verification before referring to the subject. If it is true, the sooner the mischief is mended the better it is for the cause itself. Such temples should be closed to Harijans till a better day dawns. If the allegation proves to be false or exaggerated nothing will have been lost by the superfluous warning given by me.

_Harijan_, 27-4-1934

493. HARIJANS’ HANDICAP

One of the addresses presented to me at Gauhati by the Harijans has the following recital of their grievances:

1. We are not allowed entrance into the great Hajo temple and many other devalayas for purposes of worship, nor are we allowed admission into namghars belonging to Mahapurushiya or Damodhoria sects;
2. We are subjected to persecution by the higher castes, if we want to make use of elephants and dolas in marriages;
3. At the time of giving diksha, we have to be satisfied with touching the footprints of our Dharma Gurus, but are never allowed to touch their feet;
4. In some places, people of higher castes prevent us from using public wells, although the local authorities themselves maintain no discriminatory rules regarding them;
5. No Pujari Brahmin would touch us to put sacrificial tilak on our foreheads, and the idols made by us are considered polluted;
6. Oftentimes we cannot perform shraddha for want of priests; and some Brahmins would not perform any pooja for us even in their own houses;
7. In villages the higher-caste Hindus would be polluted if they happen to touch us after their daily bath;
8. Excepting in the Gauhati College hostels, we are not allowed into the common dining-room.

In spite of the galling social persecution, the signatory was able to say on behalf of those whom he represented:

From the enumeration of grievances you must not think that we do this with a view to spite, or out of ill will towards, our more fortunate brethren of the higher castes. We venture to assure you that we have tried to realize the significance of your great doctrine of nonviolence and that we believe that in course of time the more advanced sections of the Hindu community will embrace us as their fellow brethren.

In Assam I noticed no settled conviction about untouchability even among those who might be considered orthodox. A little hard work put in by cultured men and women of purity can bring about a healthy and silent revolution in the unholy custom of untouchability.

I would like to complete the list of the grievances enumerated above by adding those of the so-called ‘coolie’ population imported from the other provinces. The scavengers of Assam are mostly drawn from the neighbouring provinces. These are consigned to ghettos where they have, as they complained, no lights and most inadequate sanitary conveniences. Their plight in the rains must be infinitely worse than I found it to be when everything was comparatively dry. With but a little consideration and very little expense, the grievous defects can be immediately remedied.

Harijan, 27-4-1934

494. SPINNING AND WEAVING FOR HARIJANS

During my peregrinations I have observed that spinning and weaving are among the industries that are supporting thousands of Harijans and, if properly organized, can support many more. Indeed, in some places, there are to be found weavers who are classed as untouchables on account of their occupation. They are mostly weavers of coarsest khadi without any pattern. This class was fast dying out when khadi came to the rescue and there was created a demand for their coarse manufacture. It was then discovered that there were numerous Harijan families that even subsisted on spinning. Thus khadi is doubly the poor man’s staff of life. It helps the poorest, including the Harijans, who are the most helpless among the poorest. They are so because many occupations which are available to the others are not available to the Harijans.

Apart from its great value from the Harijan standpoint, I have not omitted, to the extent I have been able during the Harijan tour, to study the whole problem of khadi. And I have found that the time has come for khadi workers to emphasize more than ever before the necessity of greater concentration on the observance of the laws of khadi economics. Some of them are essentially different from those that govern the general economics. Thus as a rule, articles manufactured in one place are sent or attempted to be sent to all parts of the world. Those who manufacture the articles need not use them at all. Not so with khadi. Its peculiarity is that it has to be used where it is produced and preferably by the spinners and weavers themselves. Thus, the demand for khadi when thus used is automatically assured. No doubt this ideal will never be reached. But the worth of khadi will always be measured by the extent to which the ideal is reached. Khadi is a cottage industry in this special sense in which no other industry is or can be, except agriculture in a restricted sense, if agriculture may be regarded as an industry. Therefore it is necessary to educate the spinners and weavers to appreciate the simple economics of khadi. Where cloth is spun and woven by the spinners and weavers for their own use, it is naturally cheapest for them.

It follows that we must not seek to send khadi for sale far away from its place of manufacture. The surplus khadi should be sold in the village where it is manufactured. If there is still a surplus, it should be sold in the district of its manufacture. Special varieties will no doubt continue to be manufactured by those families which have woven artistic patterns from time immemorial. That sort of khadi will live, no matter what befalls the villagers’ khadi, which is meant as a perennial source of labour and income for them.

The foregoing does not mean a revolution in the immediate administration of the A.I.S.A. Its depots will go on as usual. But it does mean a revolution in the thought world. The best mind of khadi workers will concentrate itself upon the village khadi, upon its style and durability, to suit the taste of the villagers. There will thus have to be a better and more real bond between ginners, carders, spinners and weavers, on the one hand, and the khadi workers on the other. There will be no feverish anxiety to increase the sales in towns. These sales will be regulated according to the demand of town-dwellers and the propaganda conducted by khadi lovers who will not or cannot directly reach the villagers but who will not be satisfied till they have sold some khadi on behalf of the poor spinners and weavers. Let this be borne in mind that khadi can be permanent only when it has obtained a permanent footing as village wear.

495. A GREAT HARIJAN OF ASSAM

The acting Principal of Cotton College, Assam, thus writes to Thakkar Bapa:

The enclosure will speak for itself. Dr. S. B. Mali has left behind him a helpless widow and two sons of the age of 7 and 5 years, respectively. As they belong to the depressed classes (practically untouchables to the orthodox Hindus of higher castes), it will be earning the gratitude of the public of Assam if your Society could sanction an allowance for the widow for the education of her small boys. On receipt of your favourable reply I shall ask the widow to send a formal application to you.

Thakkar Bapa is attending to the widow’s welfare and has sent me the character sketch of the late Dr. B. Mali, which I share with the readers of Harijan. Had Dr. Mali not been an ‘untouchable’, it is difficult to say how high he would have soared. We are so stupid that we do not know even our own interest. In consigning crores of people to untouchability, we criminally waste some of the finest human material we have in our midst, and the pity of it is that we do all that in the sacred name of religion and make religion itself hateful to those whose humane instinct is wounded and who in their wrath are unable to distinguish between religion and its false votaries.

496. LETTER TO MANILAL GANDHI

April 27, 1934

CHI. MANILAL,

Read the accompanying letter from Miss Schlesin. I have replied to her that I could not guide you from here, and that she and Kallenbach should do that. I do hold that, if you have been making racial attacks, you should desist. But I don’t feel inclined to criticize you from this distance.

Two letters from Ba are enclosed.

I feel completely tired as I write this letter at 3.45 a.m. Hence I will not add anything more. Ramdas and Devdas have got daughters. All the four are well.

497. LETTER TO KASTURBA GANDHI

April 27, 1934

BA,

It is nearing four in the morning. My eyes feel heavy. I got your letter. Nimu and Lakshmi have given birth to daughters. The mothers and the daughters are quite well. Now the delivery of Bardoli Lakshmi is awaited. Some news about her also is expected in a few days. It seems Kanti will meet me in Ranchi on the 30th. Narandas also will meet me there. I get news about Rami and Kunvarji. They are both well. Since Madhavdas is all right now, why need I ask him to go to Porbandar? He is eager to start earning. I write to Bhansali from time to time. He is still in Than. His health is not at all good, but he is cheerful. Chhaganlal Joshi went and saw him. Since Bhansali’s legs are not all right, he has stopped travelling. Santok and Radha are all right. Rukhi had been to see me. She had come for treatment of her eyes. Prabhavati, Kisan and Om are with me. Miss Lester also is with me. There is Rajendrababu’s sister too. I don’t remember anything about Lakshmibehn of Shikarpur. Sometimes it does happen that a few lines are scored out in your letters. I suppose I needn’t do anything now about Lakshmibai. Jamnalalji is in Patna. Pyarelal also is there. Vasumati has gone to Wardha. She is better. Vallabhghai is quite well. Yes, Durga and others have again settled down. I thought I had written to you about that. My health is good. There is no cause at all for worry. I am glad that you liked the slivers. They were made with Keshu’s carding-bow, but were sent by Mirabehn. Assam is a small province where there is a large number of tea gardens. Most of them are owned by Englishmen. The labourers in them come from Bihar. Since the rainfall there is heavy, there is greenery everywhere all through the year. Besides, the Brahmaputra flows through the province and so the region is fertile and beautiful. The people there eat too much opium and, therefore, seem lethargic. All the women know how to weave and they weave the cloth for their own requirements. Many of them also spin.

Blessings to all the women from

498. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, GUMIA

Gandhiji said that it gave him great joy to meet them. Referring to the groups of spinners, he said it was a fine thing that they should be producing yarn in large quantities and wearing the cloth woven from it. But this did not fully satisfy him. He wanted all the Santhals to take to it. If they all span, wove and wore their own cloth, they would fulfil the great ideal of khadi and they would be infinitely the better off themselves.

What mothers or sisters are there who would think of giving up making their rotis at home and getting them from the bazaar? Just as we eat our home-made chapatis, so should we wear our homespun cloth. And remember this, too, that our mothers and sisters, who make our chapatis in the home, take care not to give us badly mixed and under-baked bread. They know that, for the good of the family, the bread must be well made. That is exactly how we must regard khadi. We must not be satisfied till we can card, spin and weave well, thus producing good, lasting cloth for the home.

I must confess that the quality of carding and spinning is not half good enough to satisfy me. Your implements are also unwieldy, but could easily be improved if you had the technical knowledge. The rough quality of your khadi and the slowness of your production are simply due to want of knowledge. It is clear that those who have been working amongst you to serve and help you have not been able to impart the full skill of khadi production because they themselves are perhaps not in possession of the art. It is necessary for an instructor to have full mastery over the technique himself.

Gandhiji then went on to explain to them how, if their instruments were improved, they would be able to get the same output as at present in half the time each day. That would give them leisure for other things, or if they needed more cloth, they would produce double the quantity.

Gandhiji then spoke of the curse of drink, describing its awful effect on man’s morality, and urged those of them who were addicted to the habit of drinking this poison to abjure it henceforth.

He then referred to the complaint that they had voiced in their welcome address

1 Extracted from Mirabehn’s report “Gandhiji with Nature’s Children”.
3 The Santhals.
about the hardships they were suffering from. He said:

You must have patience and you must acquire knowledge—the knowledge gained through a pure and devotional life. That spare time which you will gain when you improve your spinning methods can be devoted to the study of the Ramayana and other religious books, to improving your Hindi, to learning Bengali or anything else you like of that kind. If you gain purity and knowledge in this way, your hardships will melt.

Gandhiji then spoke to them of the beauty and power of the name of God:

You must learn to take the name of Rama with full devotion and faith. When you study the Ramayana, you will learn from Tulsidas the divine power of that blessed name.

You might ask me why I tell you to use the word Rama and not one of the many other names of the Creator. True, His names are as many as and more than the leaves on a tree, and I might, for instance, ask you to use the word God. But what meaning, what associations would it have for you here? In order to enable you to feel anything when repeating the word God, I should have to teach you some English. I should have to explain to you the foreign people’s thoughts and associations.

But in telling you to repeat the name of Rama, I am giving you a name worshipped since countless generations by the people of this land—a name familiar to the very animals and birds, the very trees and stones of Hindustan through many thousand years. You know the story of Ahalya? No, I see you don’t. But you will soon learn it when you study the Ramayana—learn how a stone by the road side sprung to life at the touch of Rama’s foot as he passed by. You must learn to repeat the blessed name of Rama with such sweetness and such devotion that the birds will pause in their singing to listen to you—that the very trees will bend their leaves towards you, stirred by the divine melody of that Name.

And when you are able to do this, I tell you I will come all the way on foot from Bombay, as on a pilgrimage, to hear you. In His sweet name lies a power which can cure all our ills.

499. LETTER TO M. S. ANEY

RANCHI,
April 30, 1934

DEAR BAPUJI ANEY,

I have gone through your letter to Nariman.

I agree with you entirely that the A.I.C.C. had to be held at a place and date firstly convenient to the members at large and then to me so long as my presence was necessary.

I also agree that the co-operation of Sjts. Kelkar, Jamnadas and others should be invited.

Of course there can be no settled programme. It will vary with the circumstances as they may arise from time to time.

I am quite clear that it will be wrong for the Congress to abandon C. D. altogether. I would have the Congress an illegal body so long as even the C. D. as restricted by me is objected to by the Government.

But that is my personal view. If the majority do not want it as restricted by me it should be definitely abandoned.

Yours sincerely

April 30, 1934

BHAJ MOOLCHAND,

I have found Swami Dayanand quite different from his writing. The work he did has great value for me. I stick to my views about Satyarthaprakash.¹ I have read it from a religious viewpoint. It shows an imperfect knowledge of other religions, which have not been seen with the eyes of their votaries. But I do not wish to enter into a discussion on this. I hold the Arya Samaj in great esteem.

503. LETTER TO KASTURBA GANDHI

May 1, 1934

I got your letter addressed to Ramdas. I am writing this from Ranchi. We arrived here last evening. At the moment a good many people are here. Sushila from Rajkot also has come. Jamnalalji, Pyarelal, Rajaji, Dr. Ansari, Narandas, Kanti, Lilavati Munshi, Sarojini devi, etc., have all come. Dr. Roy is coming today. We shall be staying here up to Thursday. After that we shall go to Jamshedpur, and from there to Utkal. A son has been born to Maruti and Lakshmi. I keep good health. Please do not worry in the least. I shall be in Patna when you are released and from there I shall be going to Calcutta. Ramdas is pining for you. So go and see him first. From there go to Delhi. You should go to Bardoli too, and from there you may go to Ahmedabad for a few days. About that time I may also go there, in which case you can join me. This is only what occurs to me. Do what you yourself like. Yes, if you go to Wardha, Deolali will be on the way. Therefore break journey there and see Radha, and Kishorelal too. This must be done in any case. I had long talks with Raojibhai about Shanta, Lalita, etc. I will try to send a copy of the Ramagita.

504. CONFERENCE WITH SWARAJIST LEADERS

1 Ranchi, May 1, 1934

GANDHIJI: Sarojini Devi told me that it was generally understood that I had advised the complete suspension of civil disobedience on the part of the Congress. Then I would say it is not so. If this is the interpretation put upon my statement, it is the imperfection of my language, but this is not what I have sought to convey. Dr. Ansari, Bhulabhai and Bidhan know what is at the back of my mind.

1 Among those present were Asaf Ali, C. Rajagopalachari, Dr. Ansari, Rajendra Prasad, Sarojini Naidu, Dr. B. C. Roy, Bhulabhai Desai, Jamnalal Bajaj, K. M. Munshi, Deepnarayan Singh, Mathuradas Trikumji and K. F. Nariman.

BHULABHAI: They do not mean to say that this is what the statement conveys, but that this is what it ought to be.

G. Sarojini Devi observed that the interpretation put upon my statement in Bombay was that there would be a suspension of civil disobedience on behalf of the Congress, and that my civil disobedience would be quite individual. It is not so.

B. The wish is father to the thought. Many people read into it that meaning. The two conceptions are quite distinct. They read that meaning in hope. Please see if it may be possible to remove the wrong impression by another statement.

G. Is it the impression also among those that are here? And is it your desire that the Congress should wash its hands of civil disobedience as restricted to me?

B. Will you offer it in the name of the Congress?

G. Yes.

C. RAJAGOPALACHARI: Is the Congress going to disown him?

B. There is a third, middle course. It may be possible to persuade Gandhiji not to treat it as the Congress disowning him but as his releasing the Congress from it.

G. It would be possible if it was my advice that civil disobedience should be undertaken by me not on behalf of the Congress but on my own account.

B. It may be possible to put it to Gandhiji as the desire of the Congress, 'Will you please relieve us? We are unable to bear the burden.'

ASAF ALI: I have understood your statement to mean that you have relieved the Congressmen; and since you say that civil disobedience should be according to your own conception, you have confined it to yourself. The Congress has faith in civil disobedience, but we cannot say so about the modification of it.

G. Under these circumstances the Congress should free itself altogether from this.

A. A. The civil disobedience must remain in our armoury. But the present is not the time to use it, nor does it seem likely to come in the near future. You should not use that weapon now.

DEEPRANAYAN SINGH: The Congress would wish not to reject it, but to suspend it.

G. I will explain later why I have given this advice. But what I wish to know just now is whether my language is capable of bearing the interpretation I am now putting on it.

D. S. We have taken it to mean complete suspension of civil disobedience.

G. If the people have interpreted it in this way, then it would be a different matter altogether. A sense of relief there is, because they have come to know that they have no longer to offer civil disobedience. ‘He will go to prison. It is enough if one man goes to jail on our behalf.’ If the sense of relief is due to this feeling, it is one thing. But it would be quite a different thing if the sense of relief is due to the feeling that, ‘He will go on offering it himself; but we are free from it.’ After Sarojini Devi spoke to me, I asked myself if there was anything in my statement to justify this interpretation. I read the statement once again at three o’clock last night. I have nowhere said in the statement that the Congress should suspend civil disobedience. In fact, I have assumed that the Congress is not prepared for complete suspension. In Poona it was definitely against it. If the Congressmen wish to get out of it altogether, I must respect their wish, and you may disown me. It would, in my opinion, be detrimental to Congress prestige. I said so at Poona also. If there is violence and it goes on increasing, we can suspend civil disobedience; but we cannot suspend it because our number is small. We should carry on civil disobedience, even if there is one satyagrahi left. If the adviser says, ‘I have nothing left now and even I am unable to offer civil disobedience’, then we can do something else. But I do not feel that I cannot offer civil disobedience. I feel no despondency in me. I do feel that it can be still more powerful in certain circumstances. One of them is that civil disobedience is confined to me. I want to do this as the Congress expert on this subject. The Congress is responsible for civil disobedience. But finally I am responsible. I am not feeling helpless. I cannot suspend it in my own person, nor can the Congress. The Congress dare not suspend it. The Congress must not suspend it, because thousands of persons have ruined themselves in this movement. What answer shall we give to them? And what reward? Are you afraid that the Congress will still be treated as illegal? But there is something much more powerful.

D. S. They will not like to disown you, and yet they want to suspend this civil disobedience for a time.

G. You can’t have both the things together. If the Congressmen have that desire and yet do not want to disown me, I may withdraw from the Congress. There are two instances of a similar nature. I might have become a member of the Servants of India Society. But it came to votes and I withdrew. I said, ‘I don’t want to divide the house.’ The second instance refers to the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad. Some people wanted to elect me as the president of the Parishad in 1926, and there was the controversy over the proposal. Munshi brought the matter to me. I said, ‘I don’t want to enter into any rivalry. It is unthinkable.’

B. Government did not put the two propositions together; it was the newspapers that did so.

MUNSHI: My impression is that they want the A.I.C.C. to do nothing more than endorsing Gandhiji’s statement. If you don’t do so, it will be a vote of censure, whether you wish it or not.

G. There are some Congressmen who want to go further. I have, in my statement, advised the Congress to restrict civil disobedience to me. Now the suggestion is that I should practise it in my own person but not in the name of the Congress. If that is the desire of the bulk of the Congressmen then I would give that advice, without dividing the A.I.C.C. on the question.

B. That is precisely what I want to say.

G. I want to know two things: first, whether I am misunderstood; secondly, whether it is the desire of the bulk of the Congressmen that I should go further than this.

B. If the word ‘effectively’ means endorsing your statement, Congressmen would be too glad.

c. r. ‘Effective’ means something more.

G. It is quite likely that the Government may say that this is not enough.

c. r. They had a doubt as to whether a majority of the Congressmen would accept the advice. Let us only think whether we want to disown Gandhiji.

G. The Congressmen don’t want to disown me. They want this accommodation from me. If that is so, I must give them that accommodation. If there is such a desire on the part of a majority of Congressmen, I must do so.

c. r. Does it not mean that they don’t want civil disobedience?

G. No, I won’t go so far as to say that. An honest man would say, ‘I cannot understand one man doing it. If you have invincible faith, you may do it. If you show results, we shall come to it!’ That many can’t understand it I can see. But my hope is that many don’t have that feeling. Having seen brilliant results, they would say, ‘We can’t possibly give it up.’ If I give up civil disobedience, I would be denying myself. There are some Congressmen who wish to tell me, ‘You should not isolate yourself from the nation; therefore, you too should give up civil disobedience.’ The U.P. Congressmen have said this.

DR. ANSARI: They prohibit you just now, but they say, ‘When you go forward, take us with you.’

JAMNALAL BAJAJ: In any case he is not going to jail just now—at least not till August.

G. The resolution in effect means to say, ‘Your advice is good, but you should go one step further and suspend civil disobedience completely. When in future we go that way, we will all go together.’ Grannie, you were right about those two women, and I was staggered. G. I will explain later why I have given this advice. But what I wish to know just now is whether my language is capable of bearing the interpretation I am now putting on it.

D. S. We have taken it to mean complete suspension of civil disobedience.

G. If the people have interpreted it in this way, then it would be a different matter altogether. ‘Effective’ means something more.

It is quite likely that the Government may say that this is not enough.

They had a doubt as to whether a majority of the Congressmen would accept the advice. Let us only think whether we want to disown Gandhiji.

The Congressmen don’t want to disown me. They want this accommodation from me. If that is so, I must give them that accommodation. If there is such a desire on the part of a majority of Congressmen, I must do so.

Does it not mean that they don’t want civil disobedience?

NARIMAN: I want civil disobedience to be given up as the official programme of the Congress.

BIDHAN ROY: Nariman says that in accordance with your statement, it will be the official programme of the Congress.

Civil disobedience is still the official programme of the Congress.

Can you please give us the formula you will place before the A.I.C.C.?

My formula will be: ‘Having read Gandhi’s statement carefully, and having heard his explanation, the A.I.C.C. endorses the advice tendered by him to restrict civil disobedience to himself, provided that when and if he has the proposal for the extension of the programme of civil disobedience, the A.I.C.C. reserves the right of accepting it or not. The A.I.C.C. asks all other Congressmen to follow his advice and suspend civil disobedience. It will not be a blank card given to me. Every time I have something, I shall come to the Congress. You don’t pledge yourselves as to the future. You reserve your right to accept my advice or reject it. The Congress has a perfect right to offer civil disobedience. I say that you should not do so just now. The Congress may not do so till the expert does not advise. All energy will thus be husbanded, instead of being frittered away and wasted. The nation has got energy of which you have no conception but I have. I do not want to put an undue strain on the energy. Those who want to go to jail may retain the desire and prepare; and if and when I am ready. I shall come to the Congress, if I am alive. Civil disobedience will be wholly unnecessary, if the constructive programme is followed out. The parliamentary programme will also form part of the Congress programme, supposing the members of the Congress who go to the Councils are not going there for their personal ends. If a communal settlement is achieved, if untouchability is removed, if there is an Indian sober instead of an Indian drunk, and if we build up universal cottage industries in India, then there will be no occasion for civil disobedience. My civil disobedience will cover everything. My civil disobedience will be enough even after swaraj is achieved. The only difficulty lies in convincing the people that this way lies swaraj. And your parliamentary programme will be nugatory, if Hindu-Muslim unity is not achieved. You will be in a turmoil.

N. But how will this decision contribute to the parliamentary programme?

G. It will contribute by releasing your energy. I cannot go into the Councils. I am a red rag to the bull. My silence has contributed more than my words. My words have lost their power. I know that I shall give a good account of myself when the time comes.

N. Is this dual programme not inconsistent—civil disobedience confined to one individual on the one hand, and the parliamentary work on the other?

G. It is absolutely consistent. The law-maker is no good, if he is not also a law-breaker.

N. I can understand the same individual doing the two things at different times. But how can an organization do both the things at the same time?

G. Yes, it would be very difficult, but not impossible. If the Congress does not endorse my statement, you will be rendered impotent, and you will be asked to give up position after position. If you say, with your back to the wall, ‘Thus far and no further’, no Government can defy you.

B. You can make a good law and can break a bad one. This distinction is unnecessarily verbal.
N. Are we to have a dual programme with two parts opposite to one another?

G. Are they really opposite?

N. We then shall have two sections—one making and the other breaking laws. Why should there be hurry for Council-entry at this stage?

G. If I were in your place, as lover of the country I would say, ‘We do believe in Council-entry.’ I tried to see if we could have such a strong mentality in the Congress that no one would think of the Councils. But I find that we have a large body of men looking to the Councils. I will not call it a weakness. It is a felt want in the country, I called it a weakness while I was hoping about keeping out this mentality from the Congress. But I could not keep it out. Every time it erupts. I realized the situation. I goaded Dr. Bidhan Roy. I said, ‘I advise you to form a party.’ And I gave similar advice to Asaf Ali, Satyamurti and Abhyankar. I said to them, ‘In the Councils you will be able to swear at the Government.’ ‘But we are swearing at the Government’, they said, ‘when we are in jail.’ ‘But you can’t go to jail’, I answered, ‘because you don’t believe in individual civil disobedience. When mass action comes, you will, of course, be there.’ I am for prosecuting the constructive programme. I am not a believer in Councils. But if I were, I would be the first member of the Swaraj Party.

505. LETTER TO ROMAIN ROLLAND

RANCHI,

May 3, 1934

MY DEAR FRIEND,

I have your two searching letters which Mira has translated for me. Your letter about your personal affairs has touched me deeply. Your utter frankness and your endeavour to let me understand your action as fully as was possible endeared you all the more.

Your exposition of the Soviet system I appreciate. I shall try to find time to understand it more fully from Ceresole.

My love to you and yours.

506. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

RANCHI,
May 3, 1934

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

I got your two letters. I have no remedy for your distress. Time alone can cure it. It shouldn’t be made easy for people to go to jail and enjoy themselves there. What will it avail to run away from difficulties? What is the alternative? I have not snatched away the weapon which I had put into people’s hands. I have suspended its use in order to demonstrate its effectiveness. This can be realized only through experience. Whoever lives will see it.

Chandulal, Kanjibhai, Chhotubhai¹ and Ravishankar² have arrived here. Mridula also has come, and so have Gosibehn³ and Perinbehn. But I have no time to give you all the news. I am writing this letter only to soothe your feelings. Since others have been regularly writing to you, there will be no harm if I stop here. Velanbehn is still there. Kanti and Narandas are here. The latter seems to have grown thin.

507. THREE UNHAPPY INCIDENTS

On the 25th April I commenced the Harijan tour in South Bihar. The first place to be visited was Arrah. On the way I had to motor to visit the temple of a zamindar, who had opened it to Harijans, and to receive a purse from him. As the Reception Committee had feared obstruction by black-flag sanatanists, they suggested that I should go in a lorry, in the hope that it might escape molestation, the sanatanists not suspecting that I would be thus stolen away. But, unfortunately for the members and for me, the black-flaggers had anticipated the ruse, and as soon as the lorry entered the dense crowd which contained them, they made a dash for it. They were but a drop in the ocean and were soon overpowercd and torn away bodily from the lorry wheels to which they were clinging. I could not bear the sight. That nobody was seriously hurt was mere good luck. The crowd was certainly in no mood to tolerate the obstruction. Terrific shouts of “पकड़ो पकड़ो” (seize, seize)” filled the air. The handling was none too gentle. The black-flaggers were determined to court injury, as the leader had assured me even when his party had begun the plan of obstruction. They were, therefore, resisting the seizure of their persons.

² Ravishankar Vyas, popularly known as Ravishankar Maharaj
³ Dadabhai Naoroji’s granddaughter

I was the helpless onlooker of the wretched scene. I had no present method of dealing with the situation, unless I was to turn back from my mission. I had, therefore, to allow the black-flaggers to be bodily removed. The police were on the spot and they, too, were trying to remove the obstructionists without hurting them. But though there was no serious hurt caused to anybody, the sight was enough to move me to the marrow. An indescribable sensation crept over me and I felt like swooning. I began the conscious recital of Ramanama, which unconsciously goes on continually in me. It steadied me. I was able to go through the day’s work without anybody knowing what had happened to me or what was going on in my heart.

We reached the temple, received the purse and motored to Arrah to attend its meeting which, owing to the din and noise, it was impossible to address beyond saying a few words in response to the address and the purse. From Arrah we took the train for Buxar, which we reached at noon. There was a black-flag demonstration at Buxar. My car passed safely, but Mirabehn came in for a lathi blow on the hood of her car. Within 15 minutes of my arrival, I heard that there was a scuffle between the reception volunteers and the black-flaggers, who must have numbered not more than thirty in a vast crowd. This news was followed by three volunteers walking in, two with broken heads. The third had a swollen arm. They told me that they were injured while they were averting the blows of the sanatanists and pacifying the infuriated crowd, which was angry over the boisterous behaviour of the demonstrators. They told me also that some sanatanists were undoubtedly injured.

The time for attending the public meeting was approaching. I was ill at ease. The Arrah incident was still fresh in my mind. In consultation with Thakkar Bapa and Vindhyababu, I decided to walk to the meeting. I felt that the car was a red rag to the bull and that my walking would perhaps disarm the black-flaggers’ anger and sober the crowd of sympathizers and admirers. Vindhyababu went in advance to tell the crowds that I proposed to walk to the meeting and that they should neither shout, nor attempt to touch my feet, nor molest the black-flaggers if they wished to demonstrate. The whole route, less than a mile, was lined on either side by a dense row of people, leaving a clear broad passage for me. The walk for me was a
The meeting was most successful. The enormous crowd listened to me in perfect silence. I described what I had heard and seen and said that my apology was due to the demonstrators if any injury was done to them by the reception volunteers, and gave my assurance that I would inquire further into the happenings.

The meeting over, I walked back to the residence. Immediately on my reaching there, I found a sanatanist volunteer, who showed an injury in his head and told me that there were others hurt, of whom one would surely die. They were all at the hospital. I sent Thakkar Bapa to the hospital, whilst I was preparing for going to the station. On finishing the preparation, I followed him to the hospital and saw the injured men. I saw four in all, of whom the one who was reported to be dying was certainly not in any such condition. He was injured in the head. He was awaiting examination. He was able to carry on a sustained conversation with me and was quite in his senses. I should not describe his injuries as serious. The medical officer entertained no fear about his condition. The other three were not much hurt. All said they could recognize one of their assailants who had the reception committee ribbon. As I was unable to make a detailed enquiry, I asked them to send me the names or description of their assailant and a full account of what had happened. I told them what the injured volunteers had told me and assured them that I would do such penance as was possible for me if I found that the volunteers had assaulted them or had incited others to do so, and that for me they were just as dear as the volunteers. It was a hurried visit to the hospital. I had to hasten to the station to catch the train for Jashidih, the junction for Deoghar, which I was to reach at 2.10 a.m. the next day, i.e., 26th.

The night was disturbed by Pandit Lalnath and his party, who were travelling with us, getting out at every station and vigorously singing out “We shall not let him proceed on his mission” and other slogans. To my knowledge, they were in no way molested whilst they were going through the performance. Indeed, the crowds who had come to greet me, as they did practically at every station, remained still whilst the sanatanists were trying to provoke me into stopping the tour or the public into seriously molesting him and his party. Thus we reached Jashidih which was a seething mass of humanity. The station was ill-lighted. I therefore could not see faces. The police were certainly there. They took part side by side with the volunteers in escorting me.

After we had arrived with difficulty at the station gate where tickets were collected, we passed through a suffocating crowd interspersed with numerous black-flag demonstrators. With the greatest difficulty the police officials and the volunteers showed me into the car. Thakkar Bapa, who was to have got into it with me, simply could not do so, and it was considered dangerous to detain the car for him.
So the car proceeded, making its way very slowly through the crowd.
Heavy blows descended on the hood of the car. I momentarily expected it to break to pieces. Meanwhile came a blow on the pane at the back of the hood. The broken bits fell at my side. Shashibabu, who was occupying the front seat, was sure it was a stone that was aimed at the pane. I was not sure. But I knew that I had escaped serious hurt if not worse.¹

I felt sorry and humiliated to find sanatana dharma so vulgarly and violently represented. I can find no justification for the conduct of the few men who are organizing these demonstrations in the name of Varnashrama Swaraj Sanh

508. LETTER TO CHANDULAL DESAI

RANCHI, May 4, 1934

It is undoubtedly true that the temporary suspension of civil disobedience raises in an acute form the problem of the cultivators who have suffered and lost their farms and homes. Nor is there any doubt that it is the duty of every Gujarati to give whatever help he can to enable those cultivators to stand on their feet again. But it is necessary to remember that in giving them help we do not make them permanently dependent. Great battles have never been fought, and will never be fought, without some individuals suffering. Please also remember that there is no question of compensating the cultivators for their losses. It is a question of rehabilitating them. Those who have lost their lands should have faith that, if not they themselves in their lifetime, their heirs will surely get back one day the lands which they have lost. According to me, this is only one sign, and that too a small one, that we shall get swaraj.

509. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, JAMSHEDPUR

May 4, 1934

Gandhiji said . . . that in a newly-built city like Jamshedpur, taking its name after one of the greatest and the wisest philanthropists of his age, it was a pity that the hovels occupied by its Harijans were not changed into decent tenements. He added that in that cosmopolitan city it was hardly creditable to its population that there had to be separate Harijan bastis at all. It was essentially a labourers’ city. Labour at least should be free from the taint of untouchability.

The speech also dealt with the drink evil which, he had learnt at Jharia, was on the increase. Claiming himself to be a labourer by choice, Gandhiji warned his fellow-labourers that their greatest enemy was not capital but drink and other bad habits. If they did not give up drink, it might finally prove their undoing.

Gandhiji also adverted to goondaism, which was reported to be growing in their midst. It was a disgrace that barbarous methods were employed, no matter by whom. He had heard that ex-labourers were employed in this nefarious traffic. It was a shame if such was the case.

Gandhiji deplored the fact that the labourers could not trust themselves to part with their money for sacred causes when once the cash came into their hands. He, therefore, asked the labourers and their advisers to arrange for payment of their donations on the next pay day. He did not mind how small the donation was, but he wanted to feel that labour was solidly for the removal of untouchability. He cited the example of labour in all the other labour areas he had visited—the last being Chakradharpur—that very day. Labourers there had paid their own quota.

510. INTERVIEW TO THE PRESS

JAMSHEDPUR,
May 4, 1934

Asked as to the results of his Harijan campaign, Mr. Gandhi smilingly said:
Ask Lord Willingdon.

He then added that it had gone forward by leaps and bounds and that there had been a marked mental revolution. It was only a question of when it would be translated into action in every caste-Hindu household.

Asked about the advisability of reconverting the aboriginal Christians, Mr. Gandhi said he could not think of such a course. He, however, thought that there were many among the aborigines who were Christians nominally and would gradually gravitate towards Hinduism without anybody’s efforts. Those who had become sincere converts to Christianity should be allowed to grow in that faith.

514. A FRAGRANT FLOWER

Fulchand Bapuji Shah was a lovely flower in the garden of Gujarat. It has dropped but left its fragrance behind. I had come in intimate contact with Bhāi Fulchand at the time of the Kheda Satyagraha. Ever since I knew him as a silent worker, he was always ready to serve in whatever way the call came to him. Being an honest servant of the Harijans, he had become a Harijan himself. He was a brave man. I have not known of any occasion when he hesitated to make a sacrifice. God has granted him a death worthy of a brave worker. He took this great journey without accepting any service from others. We shall not grieve over his death. Let not the members of his family grieve. Fulchand had a large family. He considered all of us as the members of his family. To emulate his silent service is the true memorial for such a servant. At this moment of selfpurification, let us remember Fulchand and cleanse ourselves of all impurities.

If I had seen eye to eye with the members of the Servants of India Society I would not be merely an unrecognized member. I claim to be a member because the same spirit that fired Gokhale is the spirit that fires me. And who knows in what scales he would have thrown his weight if the events of 1919 and after had taken place in his lifetime?

You must not be a literalist. “The letter killeth, the spirit giveth life” is not only true for Christians, but it is true for the whole world. See how the letter is killing the self-styled sanatanists!

516. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, ANGULI

May 6, 1934

I am very glad to see you all. You all know that I never came to this part of Orissa. Railway communication to this place is not sufficient. For this and for other reasons I had not come to this place. It is a good thing that I get an opportunity of speaking about removal of untouchability here as I do elsewhere.

I wish to say that untouchability as we observe it nowadays has no mention in our religious Shastras. The Dharmashastras do not mention the names of people whom we call untouchables. We cannot show any reason why we call them untouchables.

In matters of religion which concerns crores of people such ignorance is unpardonable. It is a pity that for so long we have been taking darkness for light and ignorance for knowledge. So I ask you all—the old, the young, male and female, who have assembled here—to save yourselves from the darkness of ignorance. If we do not save ourselves from this ignorance, we are sure to lose our existence and our dharma will be wiped out. We are all sons of one Father. God makes no distinction among His own sons. Ordinary parents do not make any distinction among their children and so in the case of God difference is not possible. We should wash off the idea of untouchability. It is not desirable to treat anyone as untouchable. We should have self-purification by forgetting considerations of great and small and high and low.

There have been divisions high and low even among the savarna Hindus. This is the consequence of untouchability. It is also a sin to find differences among the untouchables as high-class and low-class. Parents teach us that there is no difference between a Brahmin and a Chandaia and that they can serve each other. I cannot find any difference between them. The Shastras never teach that illiterate people should be shunned. It is our duty to impart knowledge to the ignorant. To cure the diseased is a good service. Ignorance is a sort of disease. We are establishing schools at places to remove ignorance of people. When we go to school we never think that we are low and the teachers are high. One who thinks himself high and his pupils low is not fit to be a teacher. You should learn from this that to think anyone low is meanness and sin. There is a kind of untouchability in the world; it is evil thought. Removal of real untouchability consists in dismissing all the evil thoughts from our minds. We should all pray to God in the morning daily that He will give us strength to overcome all the evil thoughts that come to our mind. Another kind of untouchability is drinking liquor. Wine is the great untouchability. Those who drink wine should give it up believing that it is a sin. Idleness is an untouchability. It is our great enemy. I know Orissa occupies a prominent place in idleness. It has various reasons and I am not going to make an exposition of them. But I say that whatever be the reason all should give up idleness. We cannot be industrious throughout the year by taking recourse to cultivation only. My advice to Orissa people is that when they have no work in hand they should pick cotton, spin and weave khaddar for their own use. This will not only make you self-dependent but crores of rupees will be saved.

Instruction on spinning-wheel is the best instruction that can be given to our boys. They will learn to earn their livelihood by means of spinning-wheel. I know that thousands of Harijans of Orissa do not get any work in the year. If we want to make the Harijans our own we should train them in cotton cultivation, picking cotton, spinning thread and weaving cloth.

If you realize that it is necessary to remove untouchability then you can contribute a pice or two or whatever you can. Those who contribute and those who do not, should all be peaceful.

CHI. DRAUPADI DEVI,

I have your letter. It is good. Parents should not regard their children a burden even though they may have decided to observe brahmacharya. Their care is essential as a part of one’s accepted duty. Other tasks of service may be undertaken side by side. It will result in the children turning out to be true servants. This is my opinion but if you are still unsatisfied you can follow your inclination. Do write to me.

519. STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

PURI,

May 8, 1934

The idea is growing on me that I should finish the balance of the Harijan tour by walking as far as it may be possible. When the Tamil Nadu tour was being settled by Mr. Thakkar, and pressure was being put upon him and Dr. Rajan to include places which could not

1 The statement was issued through the United Press. It was also published in Harijan, 11-5-1934, under the title “Shall it be on Foot?”
Possibly be done during the time allotted to Tamil Nadu, I suggested to Mr. Thakkar that if he could share my faith, I would gladly cancel the elaborate programme that was then being drawn up and finish the tour by walking from village to village. Latterly, the idea has been revised and it has gripped me especially after the Deoghar incident. I know that those who are resorting to the violent method are to be counted on one’s finger’s ends. But even the fewest can disturb meetings. I would love to demonstrate to them in every way I can that the movement is essentially religious in conception and execution. If the motive is religious, so is the end sought. I am anxious too to show that it does not depend for its spread upon swift locomotion. A suggestion that I should use the aeroplane was dismissed as soon as it was made. Nor need anyone run away with the idea that the tour has been undertaken for the sole purpose of collecting funds. I am sure that both the men, women and money that may be necessary for the cause will be forthcoming even though I may be walking. It is likely that if my message comes from the heart, it will travel faster on foot than by rail or motor. And then I am tired of the terrific noises. Though they are an expression of people’s affection and joy at seeing me, they jar on my nerves which have now become too weak to bear them. I am equally tired of the hustling that has become my daily lot. The pressing towards me of vast crowds and the frantic efforts of volunteers to protect me from these crowds are proving too much for my weak body and I see no use in these shouts and this pressure. The mania for touching my feet is a source of danger to my body. Hardly a day passes when I do not get light scratches from the nails of the merit-seekers. I have made little lasting impression in spite of having strongly disapproved of the shouts, the pressings and the touching of feet. I do produce a local impression when I succeed in being heard. This opportunity cannot occur to me often when I have to rush through space as I have been doing and have to take, during the day, three places far apart from one another. For the essential truth of the message to soak into the people, it has to be delivered to silent and listening crowds. Religious truth, or for that matter any truth, requires a calm and meditative atmosphere for its percolation. I have therefore three suggestions to make to my co-workers for the balance of the tour. I give them in their order of merit:

(1) I should begin the tour on foot wherever I may be on the day the resolution is made, interrupting it for attending the A.I.C.C. meeting at Patna or the like and returning for resumption to the point where the interruption may take place, or choosing a fresh start after interruption.

(2) Choosing a new province after finishing Orissa and finishing the tour in that province or taking as many provinces as possible on foot.

(3) Drawing up a new programme to cover not all as arranged at present but as many provinces as possible and using the railway for going from province to province.

I am sure that if the workers have faith in the spiritual nature of the message, they will not hesitate to adopt the first suggestion. In no case may the workers come to a mechanical decision. Theirs must not be a borrowed faith. If none of my suggestions appeals to their hearts, they must reject them summarily and I shall go through the balance of the tour in the best manner I can. The question may be asked if I am sure of my ground why I do not act independently of the co-workers as I have been known to have done before. The question is appropriate. I do not so act because my own faith is not quite as strong as I would like it to be. I perceive the truth of it but dimly. Then the tour is not of my seeking. It was suggested by Mr. Thakkar and Sheth Ghanshyamdas Birla. It was planned too by them. I have not mooted my suggestion to the latter. The former is not enthusiastic about it. He dreads what he thinks might be a breach of promise to the provinces and in no case will he act without the consent of the provinces concerned. Of course he is right after his own manner.

Will the Chairmen or Secretaries of the remaining provinces after consultation with their co-workers wire briefly their views to me?

522. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, PURI

May 8, 1934

Gandhiji gave the citizens an idea of the new dispensation. He was glad that his walking tour would commence from Jagannathpuri, the Eastern shrine par excellence, where all Hindus received the prasad of the Lord of the Universe on a footing of perfect equality. The walking pilgrimage emphasized the spiritual nature of the Harijan movement. His own experience, fortified by a study of history, had convinced him that all conveyances, even bullock-carts, not only did not help but hampered the free operation of spiritual forces. The work before them was so arduous, and the canker of untouchability had taken such a deep root in their body politic, that all the renunciation and tapas that they were capable of were required for its removal. Hence did the idea grow upon him from day to day that he must give up railway trains and motor-cars and content himself with what he could do on foot, so far as the delivery of the message was concerned. But at Vaidyanath the idea simply gripped him. He had long realized that his body must ever be resigned to the tender mercies of the people, and he also felt that, if God still intended his body as an instrument of service, His arm was long enough to defend it against all designs upon it. It would be painful to him if he had to have resort to conveyances in order to save his skin. Whilst the police did their duty, he could not help feeling ashamed that they had to defend him against possible mischief. All these considerations had weighed with him in coming to the present decision. If there was vital truth in the message he was delivering, it should be self-luminous and selfpropagating and reach millions by the sheer force of thought. If, therefore, the results were not what he expected, he would question his own worthiness for the mission, rather than question the truth of the mission. He would start for the villages on the Puri-Cuttack road the next day, and he asked them to bless the effort.

To the sanatani oppositionists he would give the assurance in sight of the great temple that, so far as he could help it, temples would be thrown open to Harijans only with the consent of the temple-goers and never by force.

People were welcome to join him in his pilgrimage, but they must not try to touch his feet or crowd round him. They must walk behind the pilgrims, never ahead or abreast of them, and obey their instructions. They must not make noises, but march in peace, and they must make their own arrangements for food and shelter. There must not be any burden to the villagers.

525. LETTER TO BALVANTSINHA

May 9, 1934

BHAI BALVANTSINHA,

I have your letter. You will by and by realize the correctness of my decision. There were quite a few simple satyagrahis like you who offered civil disobedience. But there were spiritual reasons too for the decision apart from the shortcomings of co-workers. Experience is confirming every day that the decision was absolutely right. Now more responsibility has fallen on you. You will be tested well in your constructive capabilities, your faith and steadfastness. Do as Narandas says.

You may reply if someone obstructs you in your constructive activity. But endure imprisonment if it comes your way.

Civil disobedience will be the right thing and even a duty if the situation demands it.

Those who are outside should act according to their judgment in the event of my arrest. In this too you have to do as Narandas bids. Remember that in itself going to jail is no dharma and that one has to qualify for it.

I am keeping well but of my weight I am ignorant. The subject of my touring on foot is quite old by now.

STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

May 9, 1934

I am glad to be able to say that when I discussed the proposal this morning with Utkal workers they readily accepted it and realized the spiritual significance of the proposed step. Of course, they had difficulties about the severe disappointment that would be caused to local workers and people in general in places to be omitted but I suggested to them that the disappointment would turn to joy when they would see that the reality of the message dawned upon them more quickly than now.

I hope that co-workers will spread the news in villages and instruct villagers about the solemnity of the mission. All cries should be abandoned. No hustling should take place, and whenever meetings are held people should be prepared to receive my message in perfect silence. The habit of touching my feet should be discountenanced. It would be most embarrassing to me if whilst I was walking people insisted on touching my feet. To workers in places that were to be visited I would suggest that they should bring their purses if they are so inclined to any of the villages I would visit.

Indeed, if the full significance of the pilgrimage is realized I should expect purses from all parts of Orissa if not India. If provincial workers have understood the significance of this step they would absolve me from having to travel in their provinces and let me take the tour as it has come to me in Orissa itself after finishing the A.I.C.C. meeting at Patna. I feel that my touring in Orissa is equal to touring in the whole of India. The effect of the pilgrimage will be marred by constant interruptions. I am quite clear in my mind that continuous walking is far more effective than frequent interruptions followed by a few days’ tour on foot in the remaining provinces. Workers should give up the idea for the sake of the mission itself of having me in their midst. I would like workers in the provinces to consider my proposal and wire their opinion as early as they can.

527. SPEECH AT HAREKRISHNAPUR

Today is a very auspicious day. Up till now the Harijan movement was being carried on by going in motors and vehicles. Thus I had travelled thousands and thousands of miles. Still I am not satisfied with the movement. With much deliberation and thought I have decided to walk on foot and deliver my message as was formerly done by our rishis. This method I have had recourse to consequent upon some medieval [sic] developments. Through experience I have learnt that an atmosphere created by going in motors and vehicles is quite different from the atmosphere made by going on foot. I see that Brahmins and higher-caste Hindus live separately from the Harijans. I also see here distinctions of high and low. It has wounded my feelings. The Brahmins have a pride and they feel that their lineage is the foremost of all the Hindus. It is our duty to look to cleaning of their houses. I have come here for service of the Harijans which we had long neglected. If you have thoroughly understood my teachings, go over to them, call them your brothers and devote yourselves to the service of the Harijans.

As Hindi is our lingua franca, try to learn Hindi as much as possible. It has many advantages. As some of your time is wasted without labour you should take to some other callings, be it hand-spinning, carding and ginning cotton or weaving.

528. LETTER TO AMTUSSALAAM

[After May 9, 1934]

DEAR DAUGHTER AMTUSSALAAM,

I have read all your letters carefully. You are grieved over nothing. On the one hand you await my orders, on the other you imagine all sorts of things. The obedient never indulge in melancholy. You must not even think of undertaking jobs which your health cannot stand. You must visit your mother. You have also to undergo the operation for piles. You must relinquish the temptation of coming to me. Travelling on foot is beyond you. Even the requisite food is not available in the villages. Doing work is as good as living with me. Patience is indispensable for you and your place is in the Ashram. Why do you take it that going to jail has been totally put off? You have to prepare for it. And the preparation consists in being calm, giving up temptation, refraining from obstinacy, etc. Your worrying the doctor is also not good. What more can I write now?

529. LETTER TO KASTURBA GANDHI

CHANDANPUR,
May, 10, 1934

I have still not received your letter this time. The above place, where I am writing this, is ten miles from Puri. It is one o’clock after midnight just now. After cleaning my teeth, I wrote one postcard and have now taken up this letter for you. We decided the day before yesterday that from now on I should tour on foot. One cannot propagate dharma by travelling in trains or cars, nor in bullock-carts. That can be done only on foot. The local leaders and Thakkar Bapa finally agreed. We started the tour on foot the very same day. This has given me new strength. Yesterday we covered more than eight miles, but I felt no fatigue. I have got up quite fresh at this odd hour. People came in huge crowds, but there was complete peace. The pushing and jostling had stopped. Comparatively more work was done. The composition of the party remains the same. Among the women, Sushila, Prabhavati, Om and Mira are there of course. Besides them there are Purbai¹, Sonamani who was in the Ashram, and Ramabai, Gopabandhubabu’s wife. Jivrambhai² also is in the party. And so also are Harakhchand, Purushottam’s father-in-law. All of them will part form us at Cuttack. From there I shall have to go to Patna for three days. The All-India Congress Committee is meeting there. Personally I want to return from there to Orissa and complete the tour. But that will be finally decided when I meet the other co-workers.

Kusum Desai had met me in Puri. She has gone to her relations in Calcutta. She is likely to see me again in Patna. Vasumati is in Wardha. Ramdas, Nimu and the child are quite happy, as also Devdas, Lakshmi and her baby; also Hariji, Lakshmi and her baby. Pyarelal is still with Rajendrababu. Valjbhai, Bal and Prithuraj are with me. Chandrashankar is not in the party. He is still ill. I send with this a copy of the Gita Praveshika or Ramagita. You will have no difficulty in understanding it. If you want another copy, let me know. Leave this one behind you. I have already written to you suggesting what you should do after you are released. However, do what you like. There was a letter from Uttamchand. He has gone to Maroli. His wife too has gone with him.

I have your letter. Whilst I do not mind at all inter-dining and intermarriage on the part of individuals, I am quite sure that for the sake of the cause itself these two things ought not to be included in the movement’s programme. 533. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

I left the bed at one in the morning and feel quite fresh. Please do not get alarmed or angry or start worrying. This is simply God’s greatness. I am sitting on a bed of straw spread on the ground in a small village. On one side are sleeping Mira and others, and on the other Thakkar Bapa and other men. This is a village named Chandanpur. Today is the third day since we started walking. We are ten miles from Puri. Or it may be eight. We started from Puri yesterday in the morning. Thakkar Bapa has planned this march as you had planned the Dandi March.

I got thoroughly upset in Puri. I was tired of travelling by rail and car. I put my difficulties before Bapa and other companions. Everybody recognized the need for doing what I was suggesting, but they were afraid. They got over their fears and we took the decision in Puri itself and implemented it immediately. I went to the Puri meeting on foot. The sanatanists seemed subdued and there was less of noise and other disturbances at the meeting. When we started yesterday in the morning, the news had not spread, but in the first village where we halted more and more people came as the day advanced. When we walked to Chandanpur in the afternoon, the road overflowed with people and the meeting which was held immediately on arrival here was attended by crowds which had poured in from all sides. We are camping in the open air on the outskirts of the village. A hut-like structure has been put up for me, but the thing only looks like a hut. The companions are the same. Harakhchand, Jivram and Purbai have joined the party. The local leaders also have come. With them are the wife of Gopabandhu Chowdhari and Sonamani, who once stayed in the Ashram. This is how we intend to tour Orissa. I have appealed to the other provinces, too, that they should permit me to complete the tour in the same manner and that, if I continue the tour on foot, I should not be pressed to visit them. If they agree, I would complete the remaining period of the tour in Orissa itself. However, when the rains set in we shall have to consider whether this way of touring is possible. If we cannot continue touring on foot, then I personally would prefer to camp in one place. I will see how things shape. I shall be meeting all the co-workers in Patna. I shall have a clearer picture there. I will try my best to persuade them to fall in with me. I hope you will have no difficulty in understanding this step. You know that whenever you approve of a step of mine I feel pleased. But I would not like you to give your approval just to please me.

You must have read about the serious accident to the car soon after we had left Ranchi. “Who can harm him whom Rama guards?” Thus sang Dhiro Bhagat. How well-founded on experience!

Who can persuade the terrorists? And the Government? See to what mad lengths they went in Darjeeling.

Did not I send you a copy of the accompanying Gita Praveshika?

482 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
534. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

May 10, 1934

Bhai Ghanshyamdas,

I am writing this letter from the village Chandanpur, some ten miles from Puri. I am sure you will like the idea of my walking tour. I had had it in mind for a long time but the feeling was never so strong as now. Buxar and Deoghar would appear to have contributed much towards it. There is no doubt that a scholar like Panchanan Tarkaratna was also involved in the Deoghar incident. How can such darkness be dispelled by travelling by train? The very idea of collecting funds has left my mind. This work can hardly be accomplished by money. I find that the change of heart can be brought about more by touring on foot. Now I would like to confine my tour to Utkal if I can persuade the co-workers in other provinces to accept it. I would not like to go even to Patna.

You must have agreed with my opinion about “National Call”. Sahni has addressed a long letter to Rajendrababu assuring that he would act in accordance with the wishes of the latter or of myself. You will have received Rajendrababu’s letter. Ansari too fully concurred.

I have gone through your prosperity plan. The idea is good. But I do not find it as attractive as your other schemes. It contains much material on the necessity of a plan but it is not a plan. A plan should be so devised that it can be put into effect by the Government and the people right from today. That they may not implement it is another matter. Such a plan is not beyond you. Think it over and if possible do something on these lines. In my view charkha should be at the centre of it. If you do not think so, you should produce the arguments against. It should not be left hanging in mid air. Crores of rupees will be saved at one stroke if Government, i.e., State-aid, is forthcoming. It is not necessary that all planning should be on the Western pattern. You know that I hold strong views on the subject. These have become strengthened. You can see that people are becoming lethargic in the absence of the charkha. Our cattle have become a liability owing to our ignorance of animal husbandry. India can beat any other country in prosperity by the study and practice of the charkha and animal husbandry and by solving the problem of small holdings. We shall discuss this when we meet.

Blessings from

I hope you are well. If you find it difficult to read my handwriting I can write in English, i.e., have the letters typed.

535. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS

KADUA, May 10, 1934

This attempt at the murder of Sir John Anderson¹ is undoubtedly most deplorable.

Every minute of life’s experience further confirms me in the belief which I hold that non-violence is the only remedy for all the ills of life to deal with which violence is practised today. It is a great tragedy that some young men will not see that there is no short cut to deliverance from evils. I am not thinking of non-violence as a mere passive state. I do not know a more active force than the force released by the vital adoption of non-violence.

536. SPEECH AT SHIVALICHAK

[May 10, 1934]²

Why do I use the expression “Harijan”? Whom man disowns God owns. All religious books teach us this. Mother Gita tells us the same thing. Ahalya was changed into a stone. Society had repudiated her. Rama touched the stone and she revived and found refuge in Him. Caste Hindus have disowned Harijans. God has therefore taken them under His protection. For this reason they are Harijans, Hari’s people. It is only after we have willingly taken the untouchables to our hearts that we shall all become Hari’s people.

² According to the source, from Shivlichak Gandhiji went on to Virpurushottampur to spend the night. Gandhiji was at the latter place on May 10.
537. SPEECH AT VIRPURUSHOTTAMPUR

Gandhiji said that, according to the Shastras, Brahmans were expected to spend themselves in the service of religion by tapas, social service and the quest of Brahma or truth. It was a pity that modern Brahmans not only paid no attention to the duties which had been laid upon them and did not serve religion, but followed all manner of professions to enrich themselves. A true Brahmin should be the very image of humility, and not be proud of his knowledge or wisdom. A Brahmin would cease to be a Brahmin if he considered himself superior to others, as it was his duty to teach people to look upon a Brahmin and a Bhangi with an equal eye. Again, a Brahmin was hardly worth the name if he did not have the courage of his own convictions. We must fear the Lord and none else. Cowardice was incompatible with divine wisdom.

It would not do to say that sinful people could not be allowed to enter temples. Temples were like spiritual hospitals, and the sinful, who were spiritually diseased, had the first right to be ministered unto by them. Temples were for sinners, not for saints. And who was to judge where no man was without sin? They declared every day in their prayers: पापोंधैं पापकमांहृ (I am sinful, I am a doer of sinful deeds). So, if the temples were intended only for the sinless, they would have to bar their doors in the face of all mankind.

538. NOTES

DISOWNING RESPONSIBILITY

In a letter dated 2nd inst., the Maharaja Bahadur of Gidhour writes to me as follows:

A Press copy of your speech at Deoghar having just been put into my hands, I hasten to inform you that you were right in doubting if the leaflets alleged to have been issued under my instructions were so at all and that I have no knowledge of such leaflets. Certainly there is not the least foundation of truth in the statement that I had lent my name to it in any way.

This is to make my position perfectly clear, and, without troubling to have to let you know my individual views as regards the proposed Temple-entry Bill, I must share with you in expressing regret at the spread of untruths as well as the unseemly demonstrations at Deoghar.

You may publish the letter for the Press if it is worthy of release.

I get some time now after we started touring on foot. I got your postcard today. You do not seem to have received my last one. You can write to the Government immediately, if you wish, and say: “I have read Gandhiji’s statement. Since I was an inmate of the Ashram, I am bound to obey his instructions. Till I get fresh instructions from him, therefore, my civil disobedience will remain suspended. In these circumstances I request you to withdraw the order served on me prohibiting me from entering British territory.” On receiving the reply to this request you may enter British territory. Or you may wait for some time.

I would like it if Rama agreed to go to Wardha. If she does not wish to do that, she may do whatever service she likes at any place selected by her. Discuss the matter further with Narandas. How do you like my decision to tour on foot?

CHI. CHHAGANLAL,

I have your letter.

I can understand your hesitation in making an application for the lifting of the ban on you. But I don’t see any harm in your writing as follows:³

“Being a member of the S. Ashram and therefore subject to G.’s discipline, I have decided to suspend C. R. I was convicted to imprisonment as a C. R. and was deported on . . . from Thana prison. By reason of suspension may I be dispensed from the prohibition to enter British territory?”

One should feel no hesitation in informing the authorities about the decision one has taken as being one’s dharma and enjoying the concessions that one is entitled to in consequence of such decision. If you write such a letter, you would be able to know the Government’s attitude. But of course I don’t press you to take this step. However, till the ban is officially lifted it would not be proper for you to enter British territory and leave it if expelled. That would certainly involve disobedience of the law, and it would not be civil disobedience. If it can be so described, you should not commit it. Voluntary obedience of the law gives tremendous power to civil disobedience. If the Government displays extreme authoritarianism, it may some day become our moral duty to offer civil disobedience in the interests merely of our self-respect. Meanwhile, isn’t there enough work to do in Kathiawar? In doing service, one shouldn’t pay too much attention to one’s likes and dislikes. One should accept whatever work comes to one unsought and whenever it comes. I hope you fully understand the recent change which I have made. You may put to me any question which you may wish to.

Rama may be said to have settled down for the present. I have agreed to come to Kathiawar to meet co-workers like you. I hope Parikshital likes my decision.

546. TELEGRAM TO DR. B. C. ROY

[Before May 12, 1934]

THIS PILGRIMAGE CAN BEAR FULL FRUIT ONLY BY CONTINUING IT IN UTKAL AND ALL INDIA PARTAKING AS IF IT WAS IN EVERY VILLAGE. THAT IS A SPIRITUAL TEST. HENCE SUGGEST ABANDONING BENGAL TOUR AS WALKING TOUR IN UTKAL IS IMPRACTICABLE AFTER THE MIDDLE OF JUNE. CAN THEN COME CALCUTTA FOR COLLECTION AND CONFERRING WITH LEADERS. WIRE CONSENT.¹

¹ The addressee replied: “As physicians Dr. Ansari and myself agreed at Ranchi to your suggestion for a walking tour in Bengal. Appreciating your view-point as explained in the Press and your wire agree to confining walking tour to Utkal.”
547. MESSAGE TO PEOPLE OF GANJAM

I know that the workers and villagers in the place which I was expected to visit will be disappointed by the step that I have taken of carrying on the balance of the Harijan tour on foot. That naturally ruled out all places which could only be reached by rail or road. In order to demonstrate as far as it was possible the religious character of the mission I felt the peremptory necessity of adopting the ancient simple method of walking. There were several other reasons which precipitated the decision. I would like you to appreciate this ancient method and feel that by walking to the few villages I shall be walking spiritually to all the villages of Orissa. Such mental performance was necessary even while I was covering long distances by means of rail or motor. But speed is most probably inimical to spiritual progress. Spiritual messages are better delivered through the natural methods of locomotion. The mental attitude that I have suggested is therefore more easily attainable when a person is walking than when he is speeding through space at the rate of 50 miles per hour.

I am convinced that if I receive the hearty co-operation of the workers and the villagers throughout this province we will see results through this pilgrimage on foot which could not have been attained through the carrying out of the original programme. I would, therefore, ask you to regard this pilgrimage as a greater fulfilment of the programme than its literal carrying out. Some of the co-workers who came from their respective places pressed upon me to alter the decision and to resume the original programme but their argument was wholly unconvincing and the decision taken after incessant prayer and consultation with workers who were available at Puri could not be given up. After all you will not want me to conduct this tour mechanically as I would have been doing after the conviction came clear to me that I should finish this tour on foot. The co-operation that all can give during these precious seven days will be by doing concrete work in Harijan bastis in the way of cleaning up tanks, wells, roads, etc., by inducing the different Municipalities to perform their duties by Harijans, by awakening savarna conscience to a sense of its duty towards Harijans; by opening temples to Harijans where there is a practically unanimous wish on the part of bona fide temple-goers, by making collections of coppers and silver and sending them to me. I know that monies have been collected in anticipation of my visit to particular places. If the donors want to recall the gifts because I shall not be visiting their places the donations should be refunded and if any monies have been legitimately spent in connection with the tour out of the funds collected and if they desire them to be refunded they will be refunded on receipt of authenticated accounts if the expenses incurred are found to be legitimate. But I do hope that the necessity of the step taken will be recognized by all and that therefore not only will the donations not be recalled but that during the pilgrimage substantial additions will be made.

548. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR

May 12, 1934

CHI. MARY,

I have your letter. I have been always thinking of you and Duncan all the time. But I have had no time at all to write to you. I wish I had the time to write to you about the swift and momentous changes that have taken place during the last few days. Each one has given me the keenest satisfaction, and the experience I am daily gaining as a result of these changes proves the correctness of the changes. I hope that you are following whatever I am able to write about them. This walking pilgrimage, if you had been with me, you would have thoroughly enjoyed. I am dictating this after the last march at night. Every time immediately on reaching the village there is a meeting. These meetings are a perfect study—no noise, no stir and every word spoken is certainly heard by the audience. Whether the audience assimilates it or not remains to be seen.

The instance you quote of the Hindu widow nursing a Mussalman sister is certainly very touching. We need have no doubt that they are not only not rare occurrences, but they are frequent in many a place in India. Personal affection overrides all barriers.

You should persistently try to get the weavers to weave the yarn that is spun under your aegis. I am glad the experiment in growing bhaji is proving successful. I do not mind your having wasted a few annas or even more on getting seeds. Next time you would know that the seeds are obtainable in every bazar. You won’t get them by asking for seeds. You have only to get a little local mustard and you will have the mustard leaf growing.

I hope you are getting your Harijan regularly.
My correspondence with Margarete continues. Yesterday or the day before I answered her question about the Gita.¹

pilgrimage and, if you have appreciated the step, I want you to throw yourselves heart and soul into it. If you are in Calcutta, I would like you to collect as if I was in Calcutta and a purse had to be presented to me. That very purse can be sent to me here. I have told Dr. Bidhan that about the middle of June I should come to Calcutta for two purposes: first to talk with those who would wish to about the Poona Pact and secondly for collections. But I am developing a reluctance even for doing that. On the contrary, if nobody would care to come to me to discuss the thing, I need not go to Calcutta for it. It can be attended to in August wherever I may be. There is no hurry about it. As to the collections I should have faith enough that whatever is to come will come whilst I am performing the walking pilgrimage. Every day makes me stake all on this walk. I have discussed the whole thing with Satisbabu. He must give you some of his own experiences. Of course I am having experiences which I would not have on any other account.

I read your letter to Chandrashankar. In the altered circumstances I have given up the idea of having any rest. This easy walk every day obviates the necessity of rest. Therefore we can meet now only at some point in the tour. It is no use thinking of my inviting you to Patna. After finishing Patna, that is on the morning of the 20th or the night of the 19th, I leave for Cuttack or some point in Orissa to resume the walk and to continue it till the middle of June, that is, till the rains set in here. You could easily come and pass one or two days in the pilgrimage or pass a Tuesday with me, because on Mondays there will be no march and on Tuesdays also none except in the evening. The idea is to resume the march at 5.30 on Tuesday.

Here is a letter from Gopi. You can perhaps throw more light upon what she writes.

I have already written to you telling you what action Dr. Ansari and Rajendrababu had taken about the National Call. I would like you to furnish me with all the cuttings that you may come across.

In view of Sahni’s letter I do not despair of his abiding by the instructions that might be given to him. That should be enough for us.

551. LETTER TO MANILAL AND SUSHILA GANDHI

May 14, 1934

CHI. MANILAL AND SUSHILA,

I got your letters. I went through the Press cuttings. The criticism of Andrews’s letter was not convincingly argued. If Manilal says that he had not made any such promise, he should have quoted the exact words. A promise like that couldn’t have been merely an oral one. Manilal has quoted from Andrews’s letter though it appeared in the same issue, whereas he has [not] quoted the exact words of the promise on which his whole case is based and thus has denied the reader an opportunity to judge for himself. How could a person who has a doubt in the matter merely trust Manilal’s word? If, therefore, the promise was in writing, he should even now quote the exact words, so that the charge of violation of pledge may be refuted. If the promise was what Manilal asserts it was, Andrews’s statement is plainly unjustified. He must have arrived there now. Manilal should have a talk with him and try to convince him if he can. There is no need for him to satisfy me. You should follow what seems to be truth to you both, and that should be enough for me.

I agree with Miss Schlesin with regard to Thambi. The views expressed in the article are bound to appear as vilification. There is a saying¹ in Latin, to the effect that one must speak nothing but good of the dead. Tulsidas says: tks lfg nq%[k ijNnz nqj kok A This is described as one of the marks of saintly character. nqj kok means to cover up. A good man will himself suffer but will not expose the weaknesses of others. He might say something for the good of such a person, but that would be a different matter. This cannot be applied in Thambi’s case, for he is dead now. Try to satisfy Miss Schlesin in this matter if you can.

You know that very important changes are taking place in my life. Learn from them what you can. All this is the result merely of devotion to truth. You know that your duty in regard to civil disobedience has now increased a hundredfold. You have to cultivate the fitness to be ready for it when it comes. The same is true about this tour on foot. It is not unlikely that many more people may have to undertake such tours. Make your life straightforward, simple, tough, truthful and self-controlled so that you may be able to take up such duties.

I got your letter.

So long as God wants me to serve, He will save me through every accident no matter how serious. When He has decided to call me back, a mere yawn will suffice.

I am at present wholly engrossed in this tour on foot and cannot think about Maroli or any other place. Let us see now how things shape. At the moment it seems to me that the period of the tour will

I got the annual report which you had sent.

You did right in paying the revenue. Can’t you think of some way of proceeding against Sitaram? It is not necessary to put up with his tyranny. You need not go to a court of law immediately. For the present, it will be enough to make a complaint to the local officer.

Ba will soon be released. She has maintained good health.

foot and if they will disengage me from the obligation of visiting their provinces, I would, after attending the A.I.C.C. meeting at Patna, gladly return to Utkal to resume the pilgrimage; because I feel that if there is truth, as there is, in the original conception, the spiritual value of the tour is enhanced by its continuance at the point where it might be interrupted.

After all, why should not the whole of India identify itself with Utkal and the pilgrimage in Utkal?

556. MESSAGE TO UTKAL WORKERS

[Before May 15, 1934]

In a statement to Utkal workers Mr. Gandhi hopes that they would appreciate Bengal’s magnanimity in giving up the Bengal tour and letting him resume pilgrimage in Orissa after the A.I.C.C. meeting at Patna. This increased the responsibility of the workers. They have to perceive the religious nature of the movement and its implications. Seven days’ experience has showed that hundreds of people came daily from surrounding villages. They should have a message given to them in detail. They should be brought in touch with the Harijans, who should be specially looked after. They should be invited to mix freely with crowds and not keep themselves in isolation as they often do. A detailed survey should be made of villages along the route to ascertain the conditions of the Harijans. If people appreciate the superiority of walking pilgrimage over motor and train journey, collections must be much more than they would have been if he had kept to the original programme.

CHI. AMALA,

Your Hindi transcription is quite good. You are certainly making more rapid progress than Mira in Hindi. The latter has never tried Gujarati. Nor was it necessary for her to do so. The accident produced no effect on any of us and there was nothing more to say about it. Of the attack on the car, I had said so much in public. Instead of thinking of me as a god, why not think that I am more man and less beast? We have only the form of the human being but in manners we are often even less than beasts. Hence it is something to be human in substance as we are in form. Are you well?

I hope you have not been alarmed by the changes in my life. They are not the result of my impatience, but are the natural outcome of my quest for Truth. A tour on foot is an old aspiration of mine. I would even like to give up completely travelling by rail or car. That time has not come yet, but my mind is working in that direction. I, therefore, have often declared that I regard railway trains, cars, etc., only as a necessary evil. I have never taken pleasure in travelling by them. Dharma does not use even a bullock-cart. He may only limp, but ever goes forward in his journey. The experience of even these seven days has been wonderful. It is only now that I see villages and can see untouchability as it really is. This will also mollify the wrath of the sanatanists, but even if does not I can retain peace of mind. When travelling by car, I am always afraid that it might get crushed.

564. SPEECH AT OPENING OF TEMPLE

BALIANTA,
May 15, 1934

Temples, Gandhiji said, were a reflection of the state of the society for whose use they were built. Temples of yore were reported to have had such a moral atmosphere round them that the worshippers felt elevated and, for the time being, shed all their evil thoughts. Then, one found on the temple ground primary schools for boys and girls. They had pandits attached to them who imparted Sanskrit learning to seekers. They were an abode of refuge for the poor who would always be sure of finding shelter for the night, and they had commodious rooms or open spaces for the assembly of elders. That was the ideal surrounding ancient temples. In his wanderings, he had seen temples where one or more of the institutions he had described were to be found. There was no difficulty about carrying out the programme he had suggested if the trustees put forth their best effort for the realization of the simple ideal. Nor was there a question of large funds. The school might be a palm grove, the assembly hall might consist of mother earth below and open sky above. The question, therefore, was one of will and sufficient men of purity and strength of character. He hoped that such men would be forthcoming.

_CUTTACK_,

_May 16, 1934_

CHI. MANU,

I sent you messages but could not write to you. I read your letter. I have sent it to Father. I don’t have the time to explain my letter in detail. My chief argument is clear, that considering all sides of the question your children should be brought up as Hindus—provided you regard yourself as a sincere Hindu who has faith in Hinduism. I can understand Vimala’s desire being different, but that fact would be an argument against your marriage. That the children should be brought up in Vimala’s religion is not a correct position. Children are bound to be influenced by their mothers, and that is why parents should not belong, and generally do not belong, to different religions. When they do, it is only outwardly so. You will find that one of the two is indifferent to his or her religion. I shouldn’t like that in your case. Vimala’s insistence that the children should be brought up as Catholics seems wrong to me. If she marries you, she should merge herself in you. But at present you shouldn’t think about this problem. Your immediate duty is to obey Father’s instructions to the letter and dispel his fears. I have faith that ultimately what is for your good will be done. I hope you will not expect a longer letter from me during this tour on foot.

567. SPEECH AT KAJIPATNA

May 16, 1934

In replying to the address, Gandhiji said that, if this were true of him, it would be a matter, not of praise but of reproach. He was a follower of Advaita or the theory of oneness of all. East and West, South and North were all one to him. How could he, sworn opponent of untouchability in every shape and form, dare to make an untouchable of the West? What he had really said was that it would be suicidal for them to imitate Western, or properly speaking, modern civilization, which they called Western because it came from the West. Modern civilization stood for indulgence, while ancient or Eastern civilization attached great importance to self-denial and self-restraint. It was, therefore, a conflict, not of East and West, but of two widely divergent philosophies of life. Untouchability was the worst form of exclusiveness. The Harijan movement was really only the first step in his programme of breaking down all barriers whatever which divided man from man.

Harijan, 25-5-1934

568. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS

CUTTACK, May 16, 1934

Mr. Gandhi said that he did not know whether there was any particular problem concerning the Harijans in Orissa not common to other provinces. He was, however, not concerned with shades of untouchabilities. He did not think that any more tinkering would answer the purpose. He, therefore, looked at the problem as one indivisible whole. It permeated the whole of the society, the extreme form of untouchability being the most hideous expression of it. The arrogation of superiority of one caste over another in the name of religion would have to go. This could be done only by appeal to heart.

Replying to a question as to whether he intended to ask the Working Committee or the A.I.C.C. to take up Harijan work, Mr. Gandhi said that it had already become one of the chief items in the Congress programme of 1920 and it had since suffered no alteration.

569. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, CUTTACK

Gandhiji congratulated the audience upon their having accorded a patient hearing to the Pandit and observed that such courtesy was the very essence of culture and religion. They should deal gently by their opponents and try to convince and, perhaps, convert them to their own view. The cause of religion could never be advanced by violence or force.

570. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

May 17, 1934

CHI. PREMA.

Kisan stayed with me for so many months, and now Sushila is with me. It should be enough for you to know how often and what precisely we must have talked about you. That being so, where was the need to send any message to you? There are two reasons why I am writing this letter today. One is that Sushila has been urging me to do so. And the second reason is the news given by her. I am told that you cried for three days because of my decision. I had thought that you would feel unhappy on hearing of it, but I had also expected that you would at the same time dance and sing with joy because you would not fail to see its significance and importance and its absolute conformity with truth. Experience is daily proving the correctness of the decision. There is no question here of the unworthiness of co-workers. Nobody has proved himself unworthy. But the facts which had come to light were significant and prompted me to take the decision which I did. When the time comes — and it will certainly come—those very co-workers will fight again. The chief thing is to cultivate more strength and self-control.

My weapons cannot be said to be wrong because they are ineffective at present. Maybe they require sharpening or the time is not ripe for their use. I cannot write more on this subject. When you are released, come straight to me and, if you are not convinced even then, contend with me as much as you please and understand my reasons. This decision will test everybody, myself included. With God’s grace, I am sure all of us will emerge successful. I think this should be enough.

572. APPEAL TO WORKERS

The day on which I am writing this is the sixth day of the walking pilgrimage.1 By train and motor I would have covered probably seven hundred and fifty miles and would have nominally seen 1,50,000 people at least. On foot I have covered not more than 40 miles, the sixth day being my silence day, and come in touch with not less than 20,000 men and women.

My innermost feeling is that the work done is in inverse ratio to that between the artificial locomotion and the natural. The contact during the past five days has been more real between the villagers and myself. But, of these experiences, perhaps, some other time. The purpose of this note is to invite the co-operation of the whole of India. It was no small thing for the Utkal leaders all of a sudden to disturb the programme, which they had prepared with elaborate care and from the fulfilment of which they had expected to realize nothing less than Rs. 30,000 even from this the poorest province in all India. I had certainly set my heart on Rs. 50,000. But they had no hesitation, when the truth burst upon them, in sacrificing the pecuniary gain and risking the wrath of their lieutenants. Nor, when I approached Dr. B. C. Roy, had he any difficulty in sacrificing the Bengal programme practically altogether. I expect no difficulty from the other provinces. I must refuse to believe that they will fail to see the superior beauty of the walking tour over that of the train and motor travel.

But I ask for and expect much more than mere passive co-operation. I invite the active co-operation of all India. I expect the all-India workers to arrange simultaneous walking tours in their own provinces for the purpose of delivering the message and even collecting coppers and silver pieces from the people by way of purses to be sent to me, as they would have given if I had gone to them. There should be more intimate touch established between the workers and the Harijans and friendlier approach to the sanatanists. There should be a more real appreciation of the difficulties and disa-ilities of the Harijans in the villages visited. There should be more temples opened, more Harijan children brought to public schools. Let the workers and the villagers believe that, in as much as I am walking to the Utkal villages, I am walking to theirs also. If mine is a spiritual act, it should have that value, the people should feel impelled to intensify their effort on behalf of the cause. This pilgrimage should result in the discovery of more workers and the increasing dedication of the existing ones.

1 Gandhiji renounced the use of conveyances at Puri on May 8, 1934, and on the following day walked to Hastinapur. Vide also “Statement to the Press”, 8-5-1934.

573. LETTER TO BHAGWANJI A. MEHTA

BHAI BHAGWANJI¹,

The date on your letter is December 30, 1933, but that must be a mistake, as it came to my hand only yesterday. Never mind. I was glad to read about your happy experiences with Bhai Prabhashankar². But they are irrelevant so far as I am concerned. I believe that one who is responsible for looking after the affairs of Ratilal³ ought not to create difficulties about giving her share to a helpless sister in Jeki⁴'s position. One needn’t cite the example of Chhaganlal⁵ in this matter. Can a wise man take cover behind the conduct of an ignorant man? All of us know that Chhaganlal is ignorant. I, therefore, don’t understand what made you write such a long letter. If you have understood my point, please use your intelligence and your influence to see that the sisters get their share from Ratilal at any rate.

574. SPEECH AT A.I.C.C. MEETING, PATNA—I

Whilst congratulating the movers of the several amendments, I may say that their speeches have only strengthened me in the opinion expressed in my statement. I have found nothing in them to induce me to alter my decision. Indeed I am surprised to see that none of the speakers has taken me to task for advising the suspension of civil resistance for everyone except myself.

On the contrary, all the amendments are unanimous in demanding the suspension of civil resistance. This fact surprises me, but does not pain me. It only shows that my decision has come not a moment too soon. In asking me, however, to go a step further and give up the idea of offering civil resistance myself, you want to deprive me of my individual liberty of action. It is undoubtedly open to you to repudiate my claim to represent the Congress in my civil resistance. I can understand and even appreciate such a repudiation on behalf of the Congress.

³ Dr. Pranjivan Mehta’s second son
⁴ Dr. Pranjivan Mehta’s younger daughter Jayakunvar, wife of Manilal Doctor

Individual civil resistance as laid down by the Poona Conference was to be offered in the name of the Congress and the proposition before you is but a modification of the Poona decision. Civil resistance was then restricted to an indefinite number; now it is restricted to one single individual. The very fact of my approaching you for approval is evidence of my desire to act in the name of, and with the authority of, the Congress, but in case you do not see your way to giving me that authority, you may not still deprive me of the liberty of individual action, for that would mean wiping me out of existence itself. I would not hesitate even to wipe myself out, if I were convinced that the step would lead to an advance in the progress of India onwards her goal.

My conviction on the contrary is that India will not win swaraj by depriving a single individual of his freedom of action. A speaker has said, I claim to bring swaraj by my single action when he says “swaraj won by one man is no good to the nation”. He only quotes from my own words. I have said from a thousand platforms to the school of violence that even if they succeeded in achieving swaraj by taking the lives of some English and Indian officials, it would be swaraj for themselves, but not for the masses of India and one should not know whose lives they would take next.

Civil resistance is a complete substitute for violence. Through it everyone has to achieve his own swaraj. This weapon has given spirit and new strength to the masses. Legislative work cannot rouse the masses. I would like you to come with me for a few days and see the truth of what I say. I have never tried to force my decisions on you. I have no power but that of gentle persuasion. I only urge you not to coerce me to act against my cherished conviction.

Lala Dunichand has asked me not to ‘infringe the limits’ of the constitution which I had a hand in framing. To him I may say that I am a civil register because I am a constitutionlist by instinct. That is 1 Vide “Speech at Leaders’ Conference, Poona—I”, 12-7-1933 and Speech at Leaders’ Conference, Poona—II”, 14-7-1933.

2 A Congress worker of Ambala the very reason why I have come to you as your representative. I have no desire to go beyond the four corners of the Congress constitution.

If I have failed to carry conviction to you, you will refuse to me that authority, but I only plead for the liberty of individual action. The decision is not an outcome of despair. I am an optimist and never give way to despair. My desire is born of an unshakable faith in non-violent resistance.

It is surely for the General to decide the time for and the manner of action. The General has to be convinced of the soldiers’ capacity to act at a given moment. The conditions of service are to be laid down by the General who has no physical force at his command. He can only appeal to his soldiers’ reason and heart. My sole civil resistance is no reflection on any one of you.

All these years I was not unaware of the limitations under which I was working, but the time came when it became necessary to cry a halt if the weapon was not to suffer discredit. It is open to you to accept or reject the advice of your General. In a non-violent struggle it is not the General who can dismiss his soldiers. The latter can dismiss him if his terms do not appeal to them.

This is no threat; in any case, I will continue to be a member of the Congress, but will not claim to be its representative. What would be the matter if a year or two more elapse before your faith in him will be restored. The General in non-violent struggle has no powers of punishment. He has no authority to compel obedience to his commands; his authority rests on his power of persuasion. To ask such a General to alter his course of action is to force him to act against his judgment. You are at perfect liberty to dismiss the General if his commands are obnoxious to you.

I do not say it out of anger. If I were to be angry with you for rejecting my advice, I should be unfit to offer civil disobedience. I claim to be amenable to reason. Even children have shed all fear of me and have been able to make me bend to their will. I have not harmed flies even when pestered by them. Why should you be afraid to order such a man to vacate places if that is your desire? I tell you it will not pain me. On the contrary, I will thank you for your frankness, but if you decide to retain your General, you should cease to demur and should follow his discipline.

It is open to you not to accept his discipline, but once you accept it, you should feel yourself bound to obey his command. One of the speakers has told me that spirituality is a thing I have newly introduced in politics on this occasion. A friend here reminds me of resolution passed by the Working Committee on the eve of the Dandi March in 1930, and the preamble to that resolution contains the same thing as I have said in this statement. It was there with the approval of the late Pandit Motilal Nehru. The preamble lays down in clear terms that the struggle should be started and carried on by those who believed in truth and non-violence not as a policy, but as a creed. Therefore, I was authorized to start and carry on the struggle and Congressmen were ordered to assist in it.

What I say today is not different from what was said in that preamble. Of course, those who look upon civil resistance as a political weapon came to the struggle, but they were expected to be loyal to the creed and to the discipline required of them, while they remained in the struggle. I expected them to be loyal to it in the same way as a jailor protects in thought, word and deed the prisoner, who may by guilty of murder and is in his charge for the time being. If you choose to follow my lead, you have to accept my conditions. If not, you will leave me free to follow the course I consider best, no matter even if I am alone.

The Bardoli decision of 1922, which the late Hakim Saheb and Dr. Ansari could accept with the utmost difficulty, was a step that saved the country from an ignominious defeat and destruction. It brought it sufficiently home to the masses that there was no room for violence in a peaceful struggle. Those who had taken part in the recent struggle have been free from violence in deed. God alone knows how far we were non-violent in thought. It may be admitted that we were not non-violent to the same degree in word.

Our non-violence was for a great part confined to deed. If the country learns the art of going to prison and the art of practising non-violence as the Pathans have done, we should be within easy reach of swaraj. I am unrepentant about the Bardoli decision and consider it to have been an act of wise statesmanship. Even so do I consider the present advice. My heart is supposed to be extremely soft, and I know that it is as hard as steel.

I am helpless if you read into the statement a meaning that is unwarranted. The person whom I have mentioned in the beginning of the statement is to me as dear as a son. I have no charge against him; I found fault not with him, but with myself. He is at present travelling with me. If I have not passed judgement against him, how could I have done so against others? But when I see that our laxity has gone so far as to injure the cause, I shall be guilty of breach of trust if I did not cry a halt and warn members that far severer discipline and keener appreciation of the necessity of non-violence in thought, word and deed had to be expected before the people could be called upon to reengage in the struggle.

I said a few words about the Frontier. I feel with the same acuteness about Bengal. I know what is happening in Bengal today.
There are some Bengalis who blame me for what they consider my neglect of the woes of Bengal. Some of them repudiate my claim to represent Bengal. I represent no other province, if I don’t represent Bengal. I am an admirer of the poetry and emotion of Bengal. I am tied to my province by silken cords of love, but today I am helpless.
My lips have been sealed under my vow.

Do not I feel sore about the incarceration of Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan, whose faith in non-violence is stronger than ours? Both the brothers have assimilated non-violence to an extra-ordinary degree. I understand that they read the message of non-violence in every verse of the Koran. Should I as a General leave them to their fate and look on their incarceration with philosophical indifference?
Jawaharlal Nehru has been clapped in jail and Sardar Vallabhbhai who was jocularly called “a blind follower of Gandhiji” as he said ditto to all that I said. Do you think that he had no intelligence? He was a bigger barrister than myself. He had made his name as a criminal lawyer. He said ditto to what I said because he was convinced of the wisdom of my proposal. Shall I leave these men in prison and revert or let you revert to a life of ease and luxury? I ask you to remain out for the same purpose for which they have gone to jail.

I want you to remain outside not to live a life of comfort and luxury. I want you to remain outside to embrace voluntary poverty. In any future struggle none of you will get allowances for dependents who remain behind. There is no want of work outside the prisons. You can offer your lives to the cause of Hindu-Muslim unity. Will you neglect khadi and hope to win freedom for the villagers? Then there is untouchability. For you, who will be outside, there will be neither peace nor rest. I have put before you not a single item that has not been included in the Congress programme ever since 1920. You may work out that programme to the full and you will be entitled then and then only, to ask me to refrain from going to jail.

575. LETTER TO AMTUSSALAAM

DEAR DAUGHTER AMTUSSALAAM,

I got your letter and the wire. I am sending a letter to Dr. Jivaraj [Mehta] but I shall not write to Dr. Sharma. It is not right of you to send for him in this way. If need be you can find someone in Bombay.

With reference to your remarks on Dr. Sharma’s diet, I shall write to him. I must receive letters from you regularly.

576. RESOLUTION ON COUNCIL-ENTRY

PATNA

May 19, 1934

Inasmuch as there exists in the Congress a large body of members who believe in the necessity of entry into the legislatures as a step in the country’s progress towards its goal, the All-India Congress Committee hereby appoints Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and Dr. M. A. Ansari to form a Board with Dr. M. A. Ansari as president, called the Congress Parliamentary Board, consisting of not more than 25 Congressmen.

The Board shall run to control the elections of members to the legislatures on behalf of the Congress, and shall have the power to raise, possess and administer funds for carrying out its duties. The Board shall be subject to the control of the All-India Congress Committee, and shall have the power to frame its constitution, make rules and regulations from time to time for the management of its affairs.

The constitution and the rules and regulations shall be placed before the Working Committee for approval but shall be in force, pending the approval or otherwise of the Working Committee. The Board shall select only such candidates as will be pledged to carry out in the legislatures the Congress policy as it will be determined from time to time.

577. SPEECH AT A.I.C.C. MEETING, PATNA—II

It is in the fitness of things that I have been asked to move this resolution, for the idea of boycott of legislatures, so far as I know, had originated with me. I fought for years with some of my most valued comrades in the Congress for a rigid observance of that boycott, but an influential minority always thought it to be a mistake.

When, therefore, we met in an informal conference at Poona in July last year and Messrs Satyamurti and Asaf Ali came to me to lift the council-entry boycott, I suggested their forming a council-entry party of Congressmen.

Let us trace the history of the boycott. The country accepted it in 1920, and it gave the country a new life. No one could miss seeing that wonderful manifestation. But when in 1922, civil resistance was suspended, council-entry programme came and crystallized itself in the formation of the Swaraj Party which first received Congress recognition, and in 1926, took charge of the Congress organization.

In 1929, at the instance of Pandit Motilal Nehru, leader of the Congress Party in the Assembly, the boycott of legislatures was resumed. But even then, there remained a body of Congressmen who did not like the resumption of boycott. And now that there is a virtual suspension of civil resistance, the demand for return to legislatures has resulted in the revival of the Swaraj Party under the leadership of no less a veteran ‘No-changer’ than Dr. Ansari.

I regard myself as a practical idealist. I shall retain my disbelief in legislatures as an instrument for obtaining swaraj in terms of masses. But I see that I have failed to wean some of the Congressmen from their faith in council-entry. The question therefore is whether they should or should not enforce their desire to enter legislature as Congress representatives. I have no doubt that they must have the recognition they want. Not to give it, will be to refuse to make use of the talents we possess. These patriots, every whit as staunch as any of us, were idle and discontented for want of political work, strictly so-called. Their discontent affected others, and there was a general paralysis. For Congressmen, as a whole, have never taken kindly to purely constructive work, such as the spinning-wheel. I could not look at this state of things with indifference. When therefore Dr. Ansari wrote to me I had no hesitation in encouraging him to form a Parliamentary Party of Congressmen. Now that by Government sufferance we have met as lawful body, it is but meet that we give recognition to Dr. Ansari’s effort. Hence the resolution is before you.

2. Vide the preceding item.

The virtual suspension of civil resistance makes the resolution doubly necessary. I call it virtual, because it is now strictly restricted to one individual. By this resolution, we create a Board which will be entrusted with the carrying on of the work inside legislatures. It will be an autonomous body like the All-India Spinners’ Association with one difference. The All-India Spinners’ Association is subject to no interference from the All-India Congress Committee or the Congress, whilst the Parliamentary Party will be subject to the discipline of the All-India Congress Committee because the latter would, from time to time, have to express its opinion on political questions cropping up in the country. The All-India Congress Committee naturally wants its political opinion reflected through the Parliamentary Board in legislatures, and would, therefore, expect Congressmen in legislatures to voice its opinion. In all other respects, it will be an autonomous body. Some of the Provincial Congress Committees have expressed the view that the All-India Congress Committee, instead of creating a separate Board, should itself undertake council work. The Working Committee considered the suggestion, and rejected it as unworkable.

I have cherished the hope that all Congressmen do not want to enter legislatures and that all of us do not have the faith in the councils that the parliamentary-minded section has. I have tried so far to put before you the view of the council-goers. They hope to reap limited benefit for the nation through the councils. There is no doubt in my mind that the benefit would be insignificant, when compared to the energy that must be spent on it. The All-India Congress Committee must not be an exclusively parliamentary body. It must represent and regulate all the national activities of the Congressmen. It must interest itself in the great constructive programme of 1920.
including khadi, Hindu-Muslim unity, untouchability, prohibition, national education, organization of villages, village industries, and industrial labour and the like. The parliamentary work must be left to those who are so inclined. I hope that the majority will always remain untouched by the glamour of council work.

In its own place, it will be useful. But the Congress will commit suicide if its attention is solely devoted to legislative work. Swaraj will never come that way. Swaraj can only come through an all-round consciousness of the masses.

Two of my comrades came to me this afternoon agitated and remonstrated with me. They feared that the present course of action would result ultimately in converting the whole Congress into a council-going party. I said I had no such fear. The ‘No-changer’ must be weak of faith, if he could not survive the competition of the glittering council programme. I therefore feel that the resolution I have moved exactly meets the case. The Swarajist resolution at Ranchi had to be self-contained, and therefore full. It was taken to meet the remote eventuality of the All-India Congress Committee never being able to meet. Since it has met, the Working Committee resolution is the fittest way of confirming the Ranchi decision. The All-India Congress Committee does not need to reiterate what the Ranchi resolution was bound to do.

The question has been asked why two members have been authorized to appoint other members. I have always seen that in a well-regulated democracy, those who are invested with power are trusted to use that power judiciously. If you believe in the integrity of the two gentlemen named in the resolution, you must also have trust in them that they will appoint fully competent men on the Board. It would be wrong to thrust upon them members who may not co-operate with them to the extent they desire. When we give the reins of a particular administration into the hands of someone, he should be left free to choose his own colleagues. The Congress, following my advice, has made of it a convention. Regarding the Working Committee, I had not the courage to incorporate the rule into the Constitution, but we have learnt by experience that the convention has worked well. The President chooses his own colleagues. Your sanction to the choice has become a formal affair.

When the Bihar Earthquake Committee met, I went a step further, and the resolution gave power to the President Rajendrababu to choose his own colleagues. I advise the same course for the formation of the Board.

Now a word as to the competence of the All-India Congress Committee to pass this resolution. The Chairman has given his ruling. I wish to defend the step on its merits. If the Congress were in session today, naturally it alone could undo what it has done. But in an emergency, the All-India Congress Committee is bound to do all that the Congress can do when in session. It may not shirk the duty cast upon it. The Congress can review the doings of the All-India Congress Committee if it wishes. You may not put the nation to the expense of calling a session, when you have the authority and duty of acting.

I do not propose to detain you over an examination of the amendments. It is right for the members to suggest amendments. But when the member in charge of the resolution cannot see his way to accept your amendments, it is better to withdraw them or reject the resolution, if his reasons for not accepting the amendments do not appeal, to you. The ablest painter has not yet produced a painting that has not evoked some criticism. If he were to incorporate all the criticisms into his picture it would become a daub. The resolution drawn up after much trouble is like a picture to be dropped or taken. It may not be tampered with except when the author is convinced of his error.

APPENDIX I

RABINDRANATH TAGORE’S STATEMENT

It has caused me painful surprise to find Mahatma Gandhi accusing those who blindly follow their own social custom of untouchability of having brought down God’s vengeance upon certain parts of Bihar, evidently specially selected for His desolating displeasure. It is all the more unfortunate because this kind of unscientific view of things is too readily accepted by a large section of our countrymen. I keenly feel the indignity of it when I am compelled to utter a truism in asserting that physical catastrophes have their inevitable and exclusive origin in certain combination of physical facts. Unless we believe in the inexorableness of the universal law in the working of which God Himself never interferes, we find it impossible to justify His ways on occasions like the one which has sorely stricken us in an overwhelming manner and scale.

If we associate ethical principles with cosmic phenomena, we shall have to admit that human nature is morally superior to Providence that preaches its lessons in good behaviour in orgies of the worst behaviour possible. For we can never imagine any civilized ruler of men making indiscriminate examples of casual victims, including children and members of the untouchable community, in order to impress others dwelling at a safe distance who possibly deserve severer condemnation. Though we cannot point out any period of human history that is free from iniquities of the darkest kind, we still find citadels of malevolence yet remain unshaken, that the factories, that cruelly thrive upon abject poverty and the ignorance of the famished cultivators, or prison-houses in all parts of the world where a penal system is pursued which, most often, is a special form of licensed criminality, still stand firm. It only shows that the law of gravitation does not in the least respond to the stupendous load of callousness that accumulates till the moral foundation of our society begins to show dangerous cracks and civilizations are undermined. What is truly tragic about it is the fact that the kind of argument that Mahatmaji used by exploiting an event of cosmic disturbance far better suits the psychology of his opponents than his own, and it would not have surprised me at all if they had taken this opportunity of holding him and his followers responsible for the visitation of Divine anger. As for us, we feel perfectly secure in the faith that our own sins and errors, however enormous, have not enough force to drag down the structure of creation to ruins. We can depend upon it, sinners and saints, bigots and breakers of conventions. We, who are immensely grateful to Mahatmaji for inducing, by his wonder-working inspiration, freedom from fear and feebleness in the minds of his countrymen, feel profoundly hurt when any words from his mouth may emphasize the elements of unreason in those very minds—unreason, which is a fundamental source of all the blind powers that drive us against freedom and self-respect.

When Mr. Gandhi was returning to India at the end of the Second Round Table Conference in December 1931, he visited Rome. It may be recalled that, just as he was leaving Italy for India, he was reported by The Times correspondent in Rome to have given a sensational interview to the Giornale d’Italia. Denials and counter-denials followed, Mr. Gandhi was soon afterwards imprisoned, and the public were left to draw their own conclusions.

In view of all that has happened since, this affair may seem trivial today . . . . But it wrought great mischief at the time, and such mischief may subconsciously continue to affect judgments. Accordingly it seems necessary that now at last . . . an exact statement of the truth should be made available.

In republishing the statements from The Times together with Mr. Gandhi’s recent letter on the subject to Sir Samuel Hoare, it has seemed desirable to prefix a statement on the circumstances under which Mr. Gandhi left England. For the Rome interview gained credence in England largely because it seemed to fit in with some of the things Mr. Gandhi had said just at the close of the Conference in London. After listening to the Prime Minister’s declaration of policy, Mr. Gandhi had questioned whether a new “parting of the ways” had been reached; he had also spoken of the “hidden meanings” in the Prime Minister’s statement. What did these phrases indicate? Did the Rome interview provide the answer? (Those who were in Mr. Gandhi’s confidence during the last days of his stay in London know that there was no such connection, for certain decisive private conversations had intervened.)

There were in fact two matters that were specially occupying Mr. Gandhi’s mind during the last days of the Conference: the question of India’s public debt, and the fresh measures just taken by the Govt. of India for destroying terrorism in Bengal.

However, before he left England he had conversations with the Prime Minister and with Sir Samuel Hoare. These conversations reassured him. He understood that if he accepted membership of the small representative working committee to be appointed in India, he could raise the question of India’s public debt there. As to Bengal, the Govt. of India was free to decide with whom they would discuss their administrative measures. The India Office was not closing either door.

Finally, on the eve of his departure from England, Mr. Gandhi solemnly assured his friends that he would do all he could to keep the door of negotiation open. Though he admitted that for him the Conference in London had been, indeed, a “long and slow agony” he still hoped to find a peaceful solution of the outstanding problems.

THE INTERVIEW ‘A NEW TRADE BOYCOTT’

The Rome correspondent of The Times writes on December 15, 1931:

Mr. Gandhi, who had refused to make any statements to the many journalists, both Italian and foreign, who had been invited to meet him, has now made a long statement to Signor Gayda of the Giornale d’Italia.

Mr. Gandhi said that the Round Table Conference, which “marked the definite rupture of relations between the Indian nation and the British Government” had been for Indians a long and slow agony. It had, however, served to make quite clear to the British authorities the spirit of the Indian nation and its leaders and to test the true intentions of England. He was returning to India in order to restart at once his struggle against England, which was to take the form of passive resistance and the boycott of British goods. He considered that the boycott would now prove a powerful means of rendering more acute the British crisis, already difficult through the devaluation of the currency and unemployment. The closing of the Indian market to all British products would signify substantially a reduction of English industrial activity, an increase of unemployment, and a new depreciation of the pound.

Mr. Gandhi concluded his remarks by lamenting that few European countries had hitherto shown interest in the Indian problem. That was a pity, since an independent and prosperous India would mean a richer market for the products of other nations and Indian freedom would be manifested through commercial and intellectual exchanges with all countries.

GANDHIJI REFUTES

The Times of December 18, 1931, publishes the following:

Mr. Gandhi has authorized a complete denial of the authenticity of an interview which he was alleged to have given to the Giornale d’Italia during his brief stay in Rome, and which was summarized in The Times of December 15. The statement attributed to him went so much farther in respect of the prospect of restarting civil disobedience in India than any previous utterance that it was felt necessary to ascertain precisely what he said. Accordingly a telegram was sent from an authoritative quarter to Mr. Gandhi on board the Italian liner Pilsna in the Mediterranean in the following terms:

Press reports state that on embarkment, you issued to Giornale d’Italia a statement which contained expressions such as following:

(1) Round Table Conference marked a definite rupture of relations between Indian nation and British Government.

(2) You are returning to India in order to restart at once struggle against England.

(3) Boycott would now prove powerful means of rendering more acute British crisis.

(4) We will not pay taxes, we will not work for England in any way, we will completely isolate British authorities, their politics and their institutions, and we will totally boycott all British goods.

Some of your friends here think you must have been misreported, and, if so, denial desirable.

GANDHIJI'S REPLY

The following telegraphic reply was received from Mr. Gandhi yesterday:

“Giornale d'Italia statement is wholly false. I never gave any interview to Pressmen at Rome. Last interview I gave was to Reuter at Villeneuve in Switzerland, where I asked the people of India not to come to hasty decision but to await my statement. I shall take no precipitate action but shall make ample previous entreaty to the authorities should direct action become unfortunately necessary. Please give this statement the widest publicity possible.”

SIGNOR GAYDA’S REAFFIRMATION

The following appears in The Times of December 21, 1931:

Signor Gayda has resolutely refused to accept Mr. Gandhi’s denial of the statements attributed to him in the Giornale d’Italia. In a laconic note Signor Gayda has declared that the words attributed by him to the Mahatma were written in his presence as he spoke them and in the presence of other witnesses. So far as I understood the facts of the case, the “demanti” of Mr. Gandhi may be correct in so far as Signor Gayda did not request a formal “interview”, and no such “interview” was granted.

According to information given to me, Signor Gayda was introduced to the Mahatma in a private house, and it was made perfectly clear to Mr. Gandhi who Signor Gayda was. When Mr. Gandhi began to make the remarkable statements attributed to him Signor Gayda, realizing their interest and anxious to make no mistake, asked for a pencil and paper, which were given to him. Signor Gayda then wrote down the statements of Mr. Gandhi there and then in his presence and in that of a follower, without any word being spoken by either of them that the remarks were not for publication.

It would appear, therefore, from the version I have received that so far as the substance of the remarks is concerned Signor Gayda, who, as I personally can testify, understands English quite well, took down the utterance of the Mahatma with particular care.

MIRABEHN’S RECOLLECTION

My recollection of the occasion, which occurred now two years and three months ago, is as follows:

Gandhiji with his companions was invited to an informal gathering at the house of an Italian Countess in Rome, friend of the Italian Consul, Bombay (then in Rome). It was a long visit consisting of a drawing-room talk followed by light refreshments and further general conversation. During the beginning of the visit I was the only member of our party with Gandhiji, the others dropping in later one after another. I was with Gandhiji during the whole visit except for 15 or 20 minutes near the end of the time when I went into the dining-room to prepare some fruits, etc., for Gandhiji and to take some refreshment myself.
During the talk as far as I can now remember, the conversation was, to begin with, somewhat social and varied. The Countess was busy introducing people to Gandhiji and leading off conversations on various topics. As the talk warmed up two or three gentlemen from amongst the group became conspicuous by their persistent questioning on the political and economic situation, and I remember one of them asking for a pencil and paper and beginning to make notes. After a little while the rest of our company began to turn up and we soon moved into a bigger room next to the dining-room. Here the conversation again became general except for a little serious talk of Gandhiji with someone, the particulars of which I cannot now remember.

I heard every word that Gandhiji uttered except for the few minutes I had gone out. He was giving his usual replies to political and economic questions with rather extra force and plainness of language because of the difficulty the Italian gentlemen felt in understanding English and because of the persistence of the questioners. If Gandhiji had said some of the things attributed to him by The Times correspondent I should have been dumfounded. It would have meant that he had thrown his ideals and beliefs to the winds, and I could no longer have looked to him as my guide and father.

APPENDIX-III

PYARELAL’S NOTE ON GANDHIJI’S VIEWS

[On or after April 4, 1934]

The present step is a logical corollary of the Poona decision. When mass civil disobedience was suspended in August last under the Poona resolution it was expected that all those who could should offer individual resistance. The idea was that they should keep the spark of satyagraha alive till under favourable circumstances the movement could again develop white heat. It was assumed that those who took to it were capable of developing independent inspiration and could go on indefinitely without any outside direction or guidance and in such an ideal manner what was lost in numbers would be more than made up by gain in quality.

Experience, however, has shown that the assumption made was unwarranted. Those who went in had not assimilated the spirit of satyagraha fully. Almost to a man the individual civil resisters who were in the field were fighting because they felt that they ought to, not because they must. Those who came out showed no impatience to rush back. Instead they hesitated and faltered. Even the best ones instead of feeling spiritually exhilarated had experienced mental anguish in prison. No good can come out of sacrifice that is forced instead of being spontaneous and natural.

Under the circumstances Bapu felt that the continuation of individual civil resistance would only result in internal decay. For coercive effect it was too insignificant; for spiritual effect too cumbersome and heterogeneous. Because it

1 Vide “Notes”, 6-4-1934 Gandhiji expressed the views in talks with Dr. M. A. Ansari, Dr. B. C. Roy and Bhulabhai Desai. The source bears Gandhiji’s corrections. A similar report was also made by Raojibhai Patel.

2 The talks were held on April 4.
proved inadequate for producing immediate political results it failed to satisfy the patriotic instinct of the terrorist, and because its quality was indifferent it failed to touch the spirit of his idealism which craved for intenser and intenser forms of self-expression and self-sacrifice.

The present step is an essay on Bapu’s part, to purify and intensify the ideal of satyagraha to the last degree. There was danger of indifferent numbers smothering the flame of his individual satyagraha when it should burn the brightest and of diluting its potency. Unadulterated by numbers it should prove more efficacious.

Even as it is, Bapu feels that it would be possible to put thousands of civil resisters in the field, if not today, in the very near future. Of that his experience of the present Harijan tour has left him in no doubt. But now he has discovered that for a successful fight the plan of civil disobedience as it has been practised so far would have to be radically modified and extended. In what way he cannot say at present. We have not succeeded in harnessing the classes to our cause. They have uniformly failed to rise to the occasion and unsupported by the classes the masses have been overwhelmed. In other words Bapu has suddenly discovered that we were advancing into a blind alley. It was absolutely essential to retrace the steps. Even if all had gone well with the mass movement this reorientation of the strategy should have been inevitable sooner or later. That being so, Bapu is anxious to save to the utmost the remnants of his disorganized force and give the country time to reorganize, rest and recuperate.

He remained the ideal satyagrahi. Because the next fight, as Bapu conceives, must be planned on a different pattern. Bapu would not like even a perfect satyagrahi today to go on. To do so would be wasteful. It would be, to use his own simile, like cashing a good cheque at the wrong bank, at the wrong time.

As far back as August 1933 the feeling had come upon him that there was something internally wrong in the movement somewhere. But at that time, first owing to the quick succession of his fasts and then owing to the Harijan tour, he could not analyse that feeling further. “The step I have taken today ought to have been taken after the Poona Pact. That was the right time for it,” he remarked the other day. “The arrest of every worker since then has jarred upon me. But I have ignorantly allowed things to drift like an improvident speculator who fails to pull himself up when every fresh deal would make the chance of his ultimate solvency more and more remote.” On another occasion he said, “by allowing my best men to go now I would only be bargaining for the survival of the unfittest. The fittest would be reduced to utter wrecks for want of a proper grounding, leaving the field a barren waste after I am gone”. Instead, therefore, of making a holocaust of his old guard he has chosen to release the civil disobedience forces that were lying locked up owing to the present stalemate to combat in whatever ways it might be possible the fresh rivets that are being sought to be fastened upon the country. In the mean time he himself would be active in his laboratory making fresh researches in satyagraha. And given time and God’s grace he expects to discover a weapon that would give us what we have lacked so far.

Let it be noted here that what Gandhiji has said about the imperfection of satyagrahis in connection with individual civil resistance does not apply to all that has taken place before the Poona resolution. Perfect satyagraha was essential for individual resistance, not for mass resistance. The mistake lay in sanctioning individual civil resistance when perfect satyagrahis were not forthcoming. If the mass civil disobedience had to be started tomorrow we would not have to wait for perfect satyagrahis. There is therefore no cause to feel despondent about the future of mass satyagraha; because perfection is not a sine qua non of mass civil disobedience.

The freedom to offer civil resistance for specific purposes is there. But an early or extensive exercise of it is not envisaged. The country has to pass through a period of darkness, depression and reaction. But Bapu has faith that there is sufficient vitality in the nation to enable it to pull itself through the morass. The length of the period of recuperation can be curtailed by the civil resisters of today deporting themselves as ideal constructive workers and using all the energy set free from the civil resistance to free the country from the paralysis that has overtaken it, instead of allowing it to be dissipated by despondency or self-indulgence. Here I may add that just now Bapu’s mind is teeming with fresh constructive projects. He contemplates covering [the country] with new institutions and organizations that would be based not on ideals adulterated with heavy doses of compromise as was the case with our old institutions but would be erected on pure unwatered principles. The old institutions were good enough for their time but institutions that we now need to carry us over the remaining stage of our journey need to be differently patterned. It is good therefore in a way that old institutions have disappeared leaving the ground clear for the rise of new ones.

Lastly it should be remembered that the fight for independence has not been given up. Civil disobedience has not been suspended. It remains the official programme of the Congress. If the Government will not tolerate the sanction of civil disobedience by the Congress even when it was confined to Bapu alone and foreclosed to everyone else, it would be best for the Congress to remain under suspension. Dr.
Ansari, Bhulabhai and Dr. Roy have agreed that the Congress must not repudiate Bapu’s civil resistance, come what may. For to do so would spell death to the Congress. If, however, the Government recognizes civil disobedience as a legitimate political weapon by restoring the Congress unconditionally after Bapu’s latest statement, it would be open to the Congress to adopt the Council programme while recognizing civil disobedience as an alternative weapon.

The conditions about the resumption of civil disobedience during Gandhiji’s lifetime for the attainment of swaraj should not worry an intelligent satyagrahi. It should be realized that owing to the self-imposed restrictions by Gandhiji during the year of grace several things had to be left unsaid in his statement. There is nothing whatever in that statement to prevent the nation from launching upon individual civil resistance of the direct and the most extensive type to secure Gandhiji’s release, for instance, if the authorities should choose to indefinitely incarcerate him. Even in 1930 mass fight had that for culminating point.

1. LETTER TO KASTURBHAI LALBHAI

May 20, 1934

BHAI KASTURBHAI,

I have written to Chamanbhai. I hope that you will prevent implementation of the Mill-Owners’ Association’s resolution. I will not let the tradition which has been followed for so many years be broken without sufficient reason.

The insistence on paying Mr. Patankar his fee also seems to me to be derogatory to our good name.

2. INTERVIEW TO “THE HINDU”

May 20, 1934

Gandhiji left Patna early morning by the Sealdah Express and was seen off by a large number of people. Tired as he was, he hardly failed, except for a brief while when he was asleep, to stretch his hand across the window at every passing station and ask for “coppers” for his Harijan work and got silvers in plenty. This was for darshan alone, but if one wanted a brief interview ten rupees cash down was the price.

He said:

In trains, I do nothing else except collect funds for Harijans.

At Mokameh station, a Bengali rushed in and told Gandhiji that he had Rs. 1,001 to be given away to the Harijan Fund. The Mahatma was all smiles and stretched out his hand. But the Bengali gentleman said: “But you must come to Calcutta and take it. We shall give you plenty more.”

[CORRESPONDENT:] Now that the All-India Congress Committee has passed a resolution accepting your statement of 7th April and making you sole civil resister on behalf of the Congress, can you kindly tell me how and when you propose to give effect to it if at all?

GANDHIJI: I cannot tell you how, because I myself do not know. So far as the date is concerned, it was fixed when I was put out of the Yeravda Prison. Beyond that all is a perfect blank to me as to anybody else. But I must repeat what I stated at the time I was discharged, that I would strain every nerve to prevent civil resistance from becoming a necessity.

[c.] Your resolution sanctioning council-entry is different from the Ranchi resolution in so far as yours makes no reference to the White Paper and does not define the Congress attitude towards it. Can you tell me the significance of the resolution as apart from the Ranchi resolution and the attitude which in your opinion should be taken by Congressmen in regard to the Ranchi resolution?

[g.] The Ranchi resolution was an independent resolution enabling the Swarajists to know their own mind and to enable them to function if it became impossible, from circumstances beyond the control of their organization, to obtain recognition from the All-India Congress Committee. But the All-India Congress Committee having been allowed to meet, there was no occasion for that body to adopt the resolutions of the Ranchi Conference. It was enough for the All-India Congress Committee to appropriate the Council Party and turn it into its own agency for the purpose of working the political programme of the Congress. And it was unnecessary to define the attitude of the Congress towards the White Paper, as that attitude is well known. The Congress can accept nothing that is inconsistent with its objective, namely, the attainment of purna swarajya.

Asked whether he intended the Swarajya Party to be dissolved, Mahatma replied:

This question I have already answered in reply to your previous one. The Swarajists have become part of the Congress organization.

By the time the interview concluded, the train had reached Jahajah where, it may be remembered, not long ago an anti-Harijan demonstration pelted stones at Mahatmaji’s car smashing the glass window. The demonstration today at this place was of the friendliest nature, more than a thousand people having gathered on the platform and continuously shouted “Mahatma Gandhi-ki-Jai” and pelted the author of the Harijan movement with flowers. Gandhiji, however, told the crowds that what he wanted was not flowers, but money.

3. INTERVIEW TO “THE HINDUSTAN TIMES”:

May 21, 1934

Q. What are your impressions about the All-India Congress Committee meeting?

A. Considering the revolutionary character of the two resolutions, the criticism was restrained, and the voting showed an extraordinary sense of responsibility and appreciation of facts. The attendance, too, was quite good.

Q. Do you think it will be necessary for you to offer civil disobedience in pursuance of the permission given to you by the All-India Congress Committee?

A. There is the 3rd August next in front of me, but what will happen that day is more than I can say. I have no pre-conceived plans. Sufficient unto the day is the work thereof.

Q. How do you look upon the emergence of the Socialist group within the Congress? Have you any message in this connection?

A. I welcome the emergence. And if it acts, as I am sure it will act, with due restraint and in keeping with the special conditions of the country, it can only do good. I understand that it is pledged to non-violent methods to the exclusion of violent methods.

Q. How do you expect Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Sardar Vallabhbhai and Abdul Ghaffar Khan to view your advice to the country?

A. I have no doubt that, if they had been out they would have acted precisely as I have. How, being in jail, that is, being ignorant of the outside world at first hand, they would view its proceedings is surely an illegitimate question.

4. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

May 21, 1934

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I have read Elwin’s letter. I return it separately to save postage. After I have seen his institution it seems that we shall have to help him.

1 Gandhiji got down at Byree and walked to Gandhi Seva Ashram at Champapurhat. It being his day of silence, he wrote down his answers.

2 Vide footnote 2, “Speech at A.I.C.C. Meeting, Panta- I”.

3 Verrier Elwin

VOL. 64 : 20 MAY, 1934 - 15 SEPTEMBER, 1934 3
From where does he get the money at present? How does he teach music? Who else is there with him besides Shamrao?

Non-vegetarian food seems indispensable for him. He has not enough faith [in non-violence] to be able to live on fruit and milk. But he need not be denied help because of his food habits. If, however, he stops spinning or slackens in it, I don’t think we should ignore that. He may give up spinning entirely if he has not faith in it. I do not wish to say that he should be helped only if he continues to spin. What I want is that he must be truthful. All that is necessary is that whatever work is done, should be done sincerely. Elwin, being a good and simple-hearted man, may deceive himself. It is therefore necessary that friends should watch him.

Dr. Ansari’s plan for a party¹ must have been finalized. You should take enough interest in the matter at least to see that everything goes well. Rajaji also should take interest in it. Having brought in Malaviyaji, we should help him and also see that he does no harm, which he can either by delaying or acting hastily.

Did you see the programme up to July? It will help workers at most places to see me if they wish to do so.

5. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

CHAMPAPURHAT (UTKAL),
_May 22, 1934_

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

I got your letter the day before. It is about three o’clock just now. Everybody in the . . . ² Ashram has fallen. We arrived here yesterday (Monday). Our good friend Masani of the Socialist Party is with us. He is returning to Bombay today. Agatha³ also is with us. She will leave in about four days. Ceresole⁴ will join today. He will remain with me for three or four days. Muriel¹, too, is coming. She will stay for two days. I don’t give the names of the other local workers who are accompanying me. This tour on foot will end in Balasore on the 12th. It has been decided that after that we should stop walking and I should spend a few days in each province, doing the work from a fixed place. The programme is as follows: I should reach Bombay on the 14th and from there go to Poona on the 17th. Thereafter I go to Ahmedabad on the 26th and from there proceed to Sind. I will spend three days in Sind and three in Lahore and then go to the U. P. I am enclosing a copy of the programme. It is, however, subject to changes. I had called workers from all provinces to meet me in Patna. They were of the view that I must visit every province. It was finally decided that I should visit every province and stay in one place for a few days. It will be the time of the monsoon then and walking will probably be difficult. You have already read about the decision taken at Patna. Please rest assured that what has happened is the best. That is what the people desired, and they were only waiting for me to agree. But acute differences arose as soon as the first step was taken. There is no limit to the goodness and patience of Ansari and Malaviyaji and to Dr. Roy’s overbearing temper. Let us see what happens now. I will send with this a fine word picture drawn by Sushila². Probably Om³ also will write. I will ask Agatha to write, too.

Ba has been released. She will first go to Wardha and Delhi and then join us somewhere.

I wished to spend Rs. 5,000 from the Flood Relief Fund for Harijan victims of similar calamities but I was told that you had given instructions not to spend any amount from that Fund. I, therefore, got only Rs. 1,000. I thought it necessary to ask you before drawing more. Please write and tell me what instruction you remember to have given or what your wishes are.

Surendra⁴ is fasting in Wardha. He is doing so only for the sake of his health. The jail food has broken the health of even stalwarts. Narandas suffered from bleeding nostrils and came out of jail an old man. Swami’s iron constitution also has broken down. The same thing happened to Surendra. A diet of pure starch and fat was not adequate.

I see that milk and curds are essential. Manilal’s Sushila has given birth to a son. Manilal hasn’t informed me at all about this. I have lost all interest in this growth of the family-tree. My only feeling is one of profound sadness. However, who can thwart Nature? Or we can adopt the European way (birth-control) and sing: “Come, let us enjoy ourselves, Beautiful-eyed One, but prevent the natural consequence of our indulgence.” I can’t help feeling that we shall not gain spiritual knowledge if we follow that path. So long as Death remains unconquerable, nothing that Man does will avail him. Hence the first verse of the Ishopanishad. Do you remember it? I used to recite that Upanishad every day in jail, trying to memorize the verses. If you don’t remember them and if you wish, I will send you a copy of the Upanishad. It contains only 18 verses. The author has compressed all knowledge within that short compass. There is no difference between its teaching and the Gita’s. What is present in it in the form of a seed has become a beautiful tree in the Gita. I will stop here now.

May 22, 1934

MY DEAR HARDIKAR,

I have your strange letter twice sent, first without the quotation. It is a favourite saying of mine that you have quoted. There was no anger in the use of that expression. But it should be enough for you to have the admission from me that I am not without anger. It is therefore right for critics to fling it in my face. But friends tolerate my shortcoming, and knowing that, I make a Herculian effort to throw it off. Let me point out to them their shortcomings feeling that among equals perhaps I am the most experienced in these matters. Remember too that two wrongs don’t make one right.

If I appeared to be angry, I must have been unconsciously angry. I was certainly not pretending. The question is, can a man be unconsciously angry? He can be unintentionally so.

No anger is permissible, it may be unavoidable through human weakness.

Does this sufficiently answer your questions?

I hope you are well.

Yours sincerely,

Bhai Sharma,

Amtussalaam has much praise for you and only one complaint, i. e., you have lost much weight and that you have cut down on your food. I would like to say only this much that exposing the body to unnecessary hardship is as much a crime as the pampering of it. Hence all that is required to conserve the body should be done.

All this was written four days ago. I have your letter now. You can come to me whenever you wish but without deserting the patients there. My intinerary must be with you. My work will keep me here till June 12, after that possibly in Bombay.

It will take some time for your wish to fructify. I want you to gain in steadfastness. But all this can only be talked over. For the time being it is to the good that you are winning the hearts of the people there.

I have your letter. I won’t be able to come to Bhavnagar. The plan of touring on foot has changed the whole programme. In every province that I visit, I will camp in one town and do what I can from there. Touring on foot cannot be continued in the rainy season, and all the provinces want a share in the programme. I, therefore, have decided on a compromise as above. I hope you are well. I take it that you will send your contribution to the purse to Ahmedabad. It will do even if you send it here.

DEAR PROF. KARVE,

I have just received your letter of 15th May last. It will give me great joy if the dispute between you and the executors of the will of the late Sir Vitthaladas is amicably settled. And whether it is amicably settled or not, I would like the appeal that has been made for donations to your University to receive a generous response. It is a tragedy that a man of your amazing industry and great devotion to the ideal that he has set before himself should feel the want of funds for the cause to which he has dedicated his life. If this letter enables you or the organizers of the appeal to get help from quarters which were hitherto closed against you I should feel delighted.

DEAR FRIEND.

I have your letter. I confess that I have not been able to go through the Goshti from page to page, but I have glanced through it. But I am sorry that your argument does not make any appeal to me. I have no repentance over the choice of co-workers. Moreover my decision was not prompted by any sense of repentance or blunder. The decision in Poona was not an error. It could not be otherwise than it was. The experiment of individual civil disobedience had to be made. Confining it to me alone at that time would have been highly improper as not to do so now would have been cowardly on my part. Those who have understood the decision do not feel at all that they allow me to immolate myself whilst they look on unconcerned. Their immolation would perhaps be far more difficult than mine. Nevertheless you must continue your criticism fearlessly. Who knows some day your criticisms may open my eyes to my many errors of judgment as you conceive them? And then what does it matter if I remain unrepentant so long as your criticism does not appeal to me?

Yes, I glanced through the letter of Gopalakrishnayya.

21. NOTE

AVOID EXAGGERATION

Pandit Lalanth draws my attention to the fact that some newspapers which favour removal of untouchability have exaggerated the Deoghar incident and ascribed to those who delivered lathi blows on the hood of my car, designs upon my life. There is no warrant for ascribing any murderous motive to the authors of the demonstration. From the same source comes an unsigned printed leaflet which threatens death to those who might arrange demonstrations against the reformers. I refuse to believe that this anonymous leaflet is the work of any responsible body or person at all. So far as I know, no injury was done and no counter-demonstration was made against sanatanists in Calcutta on the day which they had fixed for anti-Temple-entry Bill demonstration. Nevertheless, I cannot be too insistent on reformers being and remaining non-violent in thought, word and deed. Let them ignore these sanatanist demonstrations. So far as I have seen, and I could not help seeing, these sanatanist demonstrations have little, if any, backing from the public. In any case, we have to win them over 1 The names have been omitted.

2 ibid
by showing regard for their sentiments. We must not repel or acerbate them by making irritating or offensive remarks about their activity.

_Harijan, 25-5-1934_

22. WILL THEY DO IT?

Since I have taken up the walking pilgrimage, hundreds of villagers have been following the pilgrims. Some even talk about their woes. Thus, whilst I was reaching Sakhigopal, a representative weaver himself told me that the weavers were in great distress as there was no demand for their cloth.¹ I told him I had prophesied fifteen years ago that it would not be possible for them to co-exist with mills, so long as they used mill yarn, and that the natural supplier and sustainer of the handloom was the spinning-wheel. In his reply I heard, to the best of my recollection, for the first time, ‘Give us hand-spun and we shall weave it.’

‘I will, if you will do as I tell you’, said I.

‘We will’, the old man replied. The weaver was an old man with a bent back.

I was overjoyed at his replies and said, ‘That is very good. Then I would teach you, your wife and your children how to gin, card and spin. You will then have enough yarn for your loom. You will spin good, strong, even yarn, you will avoid waste. I shall expect you from your first out-turn to take your khaddar for your own use and then I shall buy all the surplus khaddar you weave. I shall try to become a member of your family and give you the benefit of my experience. Thus, I shall ask you to give up drink and intoxicating drugs if you are addicted to them. I shall go through your family budget and wean you from incurring debts.’

The old man’s face lightened up and he said, ‘We shall surely follow your advice. At present, starvation stares us in the face.’ I asked him to bring some of his friends to see me at 3 o’clock at the Gopabandhu Ashram in Saikhigopal.

He came with his friends, I repeated much of the morning conversation and said, ‘I know you can’t spin at once enough yarn to start your looms. I shall, therefore, supply you with enough yarn to start with for the most promising families. By the time you have woven it, you will have spun enough to feed your looms. The first khaddar you weave from this supplied yarn will be taken over from you. For the second lot, if you have not yet enough yarn of your own, I will again supply you with some. After that you should become self-supporting and you should make all your own family requirements of cloth and then only sell the surplus.

I regard this as an experiment of the highest importance and potency. There are probably ten million weavers in India. No one has the correct number, to the thousand even. But ten million is a safe guess. If these added all the previous processes to the art of weaving, they would not only ensure their own existence, but cheapen khaddar to the lowest possible limit and turn out much more durable and beautiful khaddar than has yet been produced.

The readers of Harijan know that there are in the Central Provinces several Harijan weaver families which do their own carding and spinning. I would add to this ginning. The future of khaddar can be assured if the weavers realize the necessity, for their own sakes, of themselves doing all the processes antecedent to weaving.

May 25, 1934

DEAR DR. GOPICHAND,

I got your letter in Patna. I do not want to say anything about what has already happened. But the question still remains as to what co-workers like you should do. Unless you feel inclined to, there is no obligation on your part to take any interest whatsoever in the election except in the way of giving your vote to the Congress candidate, if he is otherwise a fit person. But if you have the slightest inclination in the direction, there is nothing whatsoever to prevent you from taking full share in the elections. However, I should personally feel deeply grieved if those who were engaged in constructive work such as khadi, untouchability and the like were to withdraw themselves from it and plunge into the turmoil of elections.

24. DISCUSSION WITH M. R. MASANI AND N. R. MALKANI

May 25, 1934

M. Is your main difference as to method or do you suspect that socialism is based on violence?

G. It is not a matter of suspicion but of fact. Violence need not be physical. Your socialistic system is based on coercion.

M. But coercion is used not as an end. It is for the good of the many.

G. Violence is impatience and non-violence is patience. Great reforms cannot be introduced without great patience. In violence lies the germ of future failure. For instance, take 100 persons—5 armed and powerful, who could chop off the heads of the helpless 95 if they would oppose them. That would be complete failure for the five. But suppose that someone of the 95 kills these five and acquires power, without the desire of the remaining 94, you cannot say that the new rule will be good for all. It may only mean one bad rule followed by another bad rule.

M. But one could not snatch power without the desire and active co-operation of the 94.

G. We have assumed absence of desire.

M. But with us the desire exists. The socialistic programme can be understood and accepted by all.

1 In his introductory note to this, N. R. Malkani, who was Gandhiji’s acting secretary, stated that these notes had the “advantage of having been passed by Gandhiji”. Malkani wrote: “It was Friday, the 25th of May, 1934, and we had to walk five miles in the morning from Sisua to Patpur... Gandhiji walked barefooted with a cloth on his head, the right hand on Masani’s shoulder, the left on mine; his words instructing us, his hands now soothing and now restraining us; and ‘M’ in this talk stands to the credit of both Masani and Malkani indifferently...”
G. Talk to the peasant in Orissa about monopoly of trade and socialization of industry and he will not know what you are talking about.

M. But the Gujarati or Deccani peasant can understand the rationalization of land.

G. Well, I have known Gujarati peasants defending and approving the institution of the Bania in villages. They say the Bania is their benefactor in distress and so forth. These people have to be awakened. It is no use having an over-ambitious programme. I am a practical man. I would cut down your programme to what I actually do.

M. The present tendency is towards decentralization in agriculture. Intensive agriculture can only be on a small scale. But the tendency in industry is towards large-scale production and later large-scale control. In such cases there is bound to be a conflict between labour and capital. There are some industries which always will tend to be on a large scale.

G. Industries like transport, insurance, exchange must be State-owned. But I would not insist that all large industries should be taken over by the State. Suppose there is an intelligent and expert individual who volunteers to run and direct an industry, without much remuneration and only for the good of society, I would keep the system elastic enough to allow such an individual to organize that industry.

M. I too have no objection to such elasticity provided all private profit is eliminated. If any individual promises to work for society, he should be permitted to do so. But I would like to make sure that the industries are run on national lines. I would, therefore, like the industries to be represented on a functional basis in the State, each trade to have its own representation.

G. That would be superfluous in a State which was based on adult franchise. India is mostly agricultural and adult franchise would, therefore, give preponderance to agriculture.

M. In Russia they have a slightly different system. The urban worker’s vote is weighted—four agriculture votes are equal to one urban vote. For the rest the system of election is indirect, like our Congress election.

G. Well, I would not give that preference to the urban vote. In the Round Table Conference I urged the adoption of adult franchise and voting by the village community. The proposal was rejected because the Round Table Conference was not representative.

M. But any conference which has representatives of landlords and capitalists will reject adult franchise. They will say one thing but will do the other.

G. Then they have to be persuaded and converted to your views; I do not believe in the so-called class-conflict.

M. But we can convert individuals, never a system. For instance take the Champaran planters. To the last they were not converted. But for the pressure brought on them by the Governor nothing would have been done.

G. I am not sure. Some planters were converted. What part the Government and planters played in the matter I do not know. But I do know that the Government could have done nothing, if the planters had not stood by them.

M. But if the Governor had been hostile the planters would have resisted to the last.

G. That is shifting the ground. I simply say that some planters were converted. In India Europeans are of four classes—businessmen, soldiers, civilians and ecclesiastics. Surely you do not suggest that individuals from these cannot be converted. You must eliminate violence. And when you do, you will find that there is not much difference between you and me. Both of us desire the welfare of the starving millions.

25. SPEECH AT PATPUR

May 25, 1934

Mr. Gandhi reached Patpur this morning at 7. The party halted at Sisua last night.

In a speech at Patpur Mr. Gandhi characterized the locality as a khadi-growing place and exhorted his audience to use khadi instead of mill-made cloth. The Charkha Sangh presented him with some khadi. A purse of Rs. 101 was presented to him on behalf of the people.

26. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

KAKTIA,\(^1\)

May 26, 1934

DEAR SATISBABU,

I have your letter. I am glad of the Bengal decision. How I should love to pass three months roaming about Bengal after the rains are over. But though I am not coming to Bengal, not even to Calcutta, I would like those who have understood the meaning of this walking pilgrimage to send their subscriptions to me whilst the pilgrimage is going on in Orissa. You should, therefore, get what copper and silver pieces you can and send them to me. Bhagirathji, who was here, agreed with me that even though I may not come to Calcutta, such subscriptions as could be collected should be sent to me. You have got the tour programme. The purses may be sent to me at any stage, but if nowhere else, let them be sent at least at Balasore which I reach on the 12th proximo and which is the last station. You may therefore choose Balasore for sending purses if you can’t anticipate it.

Love.

If I feel confident that I could do useful work in the direction indicated by you, I should set aside all other activities and tour in Bengal for several months. But I have no present hope.

28. LETTER TO MATHURADAS SHETH

May 27, 1934

Most probably I will arrive there on the 14th and leave for Poona on the 19th. I will decide finally in a few days. You may arrange whatever is possible within that time. Please do not take me to too many places. We should be content with what is possible in one meeting. Personally I should like to keep at one place and explain my views to workers and listen to what they have to say. Untouchability cannot be eradicated merely with the help of money. It will disappear only if the hearts of large numbers can be melted. I would ask you to think about this problem.

29. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

May 27, 1934

BHAI THAKKAR BAPA,

I have written to Gopalan of Cannanore. Chandrashankar or Valji would not have destroyed the letter. Is it certain that you must go over to Kashi? If you have to go there, let the meeting of the Board be held there. Now we have many places for that purpose. I hope your boils have disappeared now. Things here are well enough, though not as good as one would wish. That tireless worker, Ramabehn, too has fallen ill. Neither Harakhchand nor Ishvarlal is here. The brooms are new. But who can harm him whom Rama guards? I have written to Raja about Hildapud.

30. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

May 27, 1934

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I assume that you will be able to manage Dr. Suresh Banerji.

I have already replied to your letter and your wire. You have my tour programme. I should very much like to break the journey at Wardha, but I don’t think I can do so. The whole programme is fixed and it seems desirable to stick to it.

I hope you are keeping well. You must have received my letter regarding Elwin.

Malaviyaji has written to me and suggested a meeting of the Congress Working Committee at Poona. Both places will suit me equally well if the meeting takes place on a date or dates when I shall be there. If the strike is going on in Bombay at the time, I won’t like to stay there at all. But that is beside the point. I shall have to be in Bombay from the 14th to 18th.

Om is going on well enough. She learns a great deal from experience, but she is a bit lazy with her studies.

[May 27, 1934]¹

After the rich experiences I am having in Orissa this programme does not please me at all, but no province save Bengal was willing to forgo my visit altogether. Almost all the provincial workers agreed that the walking tour was better. I urged that a walking tour for three or four days would be a mockery and the spiritual effect would be missed if it was closely intermixed with railway and motor travelling. A compromise was therefore effected and the revised programme was the result. Its peculiarity lies in my being in one and the same place in each province during the whole of my stay there. I see that Thakkar Bapa has made an exception in favour of the United Provinces which is not one but many provinces. This obviates the mad rush.

The revised programme becomes a predominantly collecting tour and not one for the delivery of my message. I would, however, like the workers to meet me at these places and gather the results of the past six month’s tour and discuss the future plan of work. If I am to do this solid work I must not be taken from place to place to receive purses or address meetings. During my stay in each province there should be no appointments for me to go anywhere. Beyond one public meeting and one women’s meeting where desired there should be no other functions. I should like to come in touch with as many Harijans and sanatanists as possible.

May 28, 1934

CHI. VASUMATI,

I hope you are satisfied now with the frequency of my letters. In this tour on foot I could have included all the women workers, but it is extremely doubtful whether any of them would have been able to endure the hardships. Mira will probably arrive there at about the same time that you get this letter. The details of the tour, therefore, will be given by her. If you can stop thinking about your troubles, I shall believe that you have got the reward of pilgrimages to all the shrines.

May 28, 1934

BHAI GHANSHYAMDAS,

I have gone through your plan. The donkey is missing on page six. The omission is only through oversight, is it not?
The scheme appears somewhat expensive. But what discourages me is the absence of annual results. Isn’t it a feature of the Russian plan that it shows yearwise results and ultimately proves its self-sufficiency at least on paper? I do not notice any such attempt in this scheme.

You must have got my letter about . . . ‘s letter received yesterday says that . . . is coming to see me. It will be good indeed if he does come. There is no doubt that . . . is highly perturbed. You are well, I trust. The touring I like very well. The only regret is that physical exhaustion prevents me from moving around the countryside.

May 28, 1934

DEAR DAUGHTER AMTUSSALAAM,

You are right in saying that only the rich and educated people can live with me. I have to turn the rich into poor and place a broom in the hands of the educated. Why should I have you with me? To make you poorer still or to place a broom in your hands? What was there to do in Patna? Did you have to deliver lectures there? If you wish to serve you must calm yourself. I got your telegram. Why was the operation postponed? I shall learn that from your letter. Yes, the best course for you would be to listen to your mother and get married. Where is the single-mindedness in you that is required for remaining a virgin? You are prone to all kinds of thoughts. You cannot concentrate on any one thing. Therefore attain tranquillity if you wish to remain unmarried. When will you learn Hindi? By now you ought to know Gujarati too. Tell me now your plan. I shall arrive in Bombay on the 14th and remain there till the 18th; afterwards,

35. OBSERVATIONS ON M. R. MASANI’S SOCIALISTIC PROGRAMME

I welcome the rise of the Socialist Party in the Congress. But I can’t say that I like the programme as it appears in the printed pamphlet. It seems to me to ignore Indian conditions, and I do not like the assumption underlying many of its propositions which go to show that there is necessarily antagonism between the classes and the masses or between the labourers and the capitalists such that they can never work for mutual good. My own experience covering a fairly long period is to the contrary. What is necessary is that labourers or workers should know their rights and should also know how to assert them.²

‘Abolition of the rule of Indian princes’ is an arrogation of power which does not belong to the party or which belongs as much as the power to abolish Portuguese and French authority in what is called Portuguese and French India would. It may be unfortunate, but the dismemberment of India is a fact which may not be ignored. It is surely enough to concentrate upon what is called British India. It is large enough territory for any party to operate in, and its successful operations in British India cannot but have their effect upon the other parts of India. On principle too I am not for the abolition of the rule of the princes; but I believe in its reformation and modification in consonance with the true spirit of democracy.

‘The repudiation of the so-called Public Debt of India incurred by the foreign Government’ is too vague and too sweeping a statement in the programme of a progressive and enlightened party. The Congress has suggested the only real and statesmanlike

² This paragraph was repeated in Gandhiji’s letter dated June 14, 1934, to the addressee. proposition, namely, reference to an impartial tribunal of the whole of the so-called Public Debt before any part can be taken over by the future free Government of India.

‘The progressive nationalization of all the instruments of production, distribution and exchange’ is too sweeping to be admissible. Rabindranath Tagore is an instrument of marvellous production. I do not know that he will submit to be nationalized.

Regarding ‘State monopoly of foreign trade’, should not the State be satisfied with all the power it will possess? Must it also exercise all the powers in one swoop, whether such an exercise is necessary or not?

‘Cancellation of debts owing by peasants and workers’ is a proposition which the debtors themselves would never subscribe to, for that will be suicidal. What is necessary is an examination of the debts some of which, I know, will not bear scrutiny.

I should educate the masses to cultivate habits of thrift. I should not be guilty of maiming them by letting them think that they have no obligation in the way of taking preventive measures in the matter of old age, sickness, accident and the like.

I do not understand the meaning of the phrase ‘the right to strike’. It belongs to everybody who wants to take the risks attendant upon strikes.

Does ‘the right of the child to care and maintenance by the State’ absolve the parent from the duty of caring for the maintenance of his children?

‘The elimination of landlordism’ clearly means usurpation of the Zamindari and Talukdari tracts in clause 13. I am not for elimination but for just regulation of the relation between landlords and tenants.

How do you seek to oppose the ‘introduction of religious issues into politics’ if you regulate and control all religious endowments?
What we really want to do is to observe strictest religious neutrality.
But when professors of one of the religions in the State desire some kind of internal reform without which progress will be impossible for them, State aid will become inevitable.

These are some of the observations as they occur to me on a cursory glance of your printed programme.

37. SPEECH AT KENDRAPARA

May 29, 1934

I am out to demolish all manner of inferiority complex from the mind of my Harijan brothers. It is this which is taken advantage of by the opponents to the Harijan uplift movement and also induces the Harijans themselves to take the humiliating and absolutely irrational status assigned to them in society lying down.

Proceeding, Gandhiji enjoined on his audience the need for conducting themselves in their everyday life in such a manner as to deserve treatment as equals with their so-called high-caste fellows. And for this it was essential, said Gandhiji, that the Harijans should scrupulously avoid carrion-eating, uncleanly habits and drunkenness. A touching scene was witnessed in Mahatmaji’s camp today, when an inmate was found weeping over the news of the death of a near relation of hers. Gandhiji consoled her saying that the best way to conquer death was to take no notice of it. In this connection he cited the example of Sjt. Satis Chandra Das Gupta of the

38. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS OF INDIA

In an exclusive interview with the ‘Associated Press’, in the course of which he was asked whether he had definitely abandoned the Bengal tour, Mr. Gandhi said:

It is not I who have abandoned the Bengal tour. I put myself at the disposal of the Bengal Board, placing before them my difficulties. They first dispensed me from the tour in the districts. I offered to go to Calcutta for a few days if it was thought at all necessary for me to do so, though I had no mind to go to Calcutta only. The Bengal Board also thought likewise and came to the conclusion that if I went to Bengal I should go there for three months. And since that was impossible Calcutta was abandoned. I should certainly love to go to Bengal for three months or more. But I do not know whether this opportunity will come to me during my lifetime.

To another question whether he contemplated any discussion of the Poona Pact with Bengal Hindu leaders and whether the Pact was still open to discussion and, incidentally, to revision, Mr. Gandhi replied:

I have always been ready and willing to discuss the Poona Pact with the Hindu leaders of Bengal. Anything is possible by agreement of all parties. So far as I am concerned nothing is possible that would not be consistent with justice to Harijans.

Asked whether he would support untouchables if they started satyagraha for the vindication of their right to entry into public temples and whether untouchables had an inalienable right to worship in public temples, Mr. Gandhi said:

I do believe that Harijans have as much right of worship in public temples as any other Hindus. But I could never be a party to the use of force in order to vindicate that right. Satyagraha has come to signify many things. I should therefore want to know the nature of the satyagraha to be offered. And in any case satyagraha by Harijans would not be advisable while reformers were trying their utmost to persuade the orthodox to waive their objections.
Asked whether he would give any lead regarding the entry of untouchables into the Puri Jagannath Temple, Mr. Gandhi replied:

I have known of the importance of the temple at Puri being open to Harijans as it certainly was years ago and, as I know from first-hand evidence, always has been so long as Harijans have gone without asserting their rights. But I have no lead to give about opening the temple beyond this—that public opinion should be cultivated in that behalf.

40. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

BERIMUL (UTKAL),
May 30, 1934

BHAIVALLABHBHAI,

It is already Wednesday but there is no letter from you yet.

The newly built ship has already sprung a leak. It may keep afloat, but one can’t say whether it will reach the port. The Four will meet again in Bombay on the 15th.

Mahendrababu, Rajendrababu’s elder bother, is seriously ill. It is doubtful if he will survive. If he passes away, Rajendrababu will suddenly find himself burdened with a heavy responsibility. Write to him.

Ceresole, Agatha and Muriel are leaving on the 15th. All three had sufficient experience. Ceresole will come back in October. He will bring with him some other friends too. The Bihar work is progressing quite well, thanks to Jamnalalji’s strict supervision. He has taken Muriel to see . . . They will go to Wardha via Anantpur.

Bapa’s place is taken at present by Malkani. Devdas had come to Patna. He has put on some flesh now. Marriage and Delhi have done him good. Ramdas is the same that he was, though he seems to have improved a little now.

It seems Mani is being tested fairly severely (in Jail). Kaka also is being tested. He was ill. There has been a wire from him saying that he is a little better now.

Since Sushila, Prabhavati and Om write to you, you must be getting plenty of tit-bits from them. It can be said that the heat here is worse than what it is even in Ahmedabad.

41. INTERVIEW TO UTKAL WORKERS

May 30, 1934

Asked if he was satisfied with the formation of the Swaraj Parliamentary Board in which Utkal was not represented, Mahatma Gandhi said:

I am not particular about it, nor am I at all concerned with the selection of the personnel of the Board. I am mis-represented by the Press as such. Only Malaviyaji and Dr. Ansari have taken all responsibility for it.

As regards the discontent of the Utkal people for being neglected in the matter of representation on the Board, he said:

I am of opinion that those who can do constructive work should not worry about representation on the Board. But if you feel keenly on the matter, you should write asserting your right of representation of at least one seat.

He further advised the Utkal workers that instead of utilizing his services in such matters, they should take his more useful services in solving the flood problem which he was thinking about day and night. Repair of the embankments, which was prohibited by the Government, was the greatest problem which every representative of the people of Utkal must think about. To solve this he was writing to an expert engineer for making a survey. He was confident that if a solution was suggested, the Government would not ignore it.

CHI. JAMNALAL,

The burden on Dwarkanath has increased. Please know everything from him and lighten it. Listen to what he may have to say regarding Manohar and Keshu and look into the matter carefully, and do what is necessary. Why did Manohar go away suddenly to live in the orchard? 43. LETTER TO HARIBHAU UPADHYAYA

May 31, 1934

Bhai Haribhau,

I came to know only just now about your son’s death. All of us will have to go that royal road sooner or later. If, however, you two do wish to observe mourning for him, do so by observing complete self-control. Please remember that now we have to observe with all the greater vigilance the strict rules for civil disobedience volunteers.

I had received your letter. What you mean is this that I also should demonstrate my love by giving up civil disobedience. If I think that necessary, I would certainly take that step. But I see no such necessity. What displeased the Government was not civil disobedience itself, but the incivility which was displayed in its name. The party of violence were not, and are not, concerned with demonstration of love. They didn’t see our non-violence, but saw the subtle violence behind it and concluded that it was the result of cowardice and that their violence of the brave was far better. Thus, because our disobedience was uncivil, neither of the two parties could understand it. Is this clear?

44. LETTER TO SARITA

May 31, 1934

Chh. Sarita,

I have your letter. It was good that you wrote to me. I am glad you are undergoing Dr. [Hiralal] Sharma’s treatment. Stick to it. Don’t think there is anything wrong in staying with Nimu. There is no need to believe in that superstition. The custom of not having even water at the daughter’s place was good for those parents who threw their daughters in the ditch because of greed. They did not, however, reform their evil practice. Moreover my relations with you are not of today. They go back to Amritlal’s time. So you should have no hesitation whatever in staying with Ramdas.

Still, if you can get better treatment by staying with Dr. Sharma, certainly do so.

Now that you have started writing, keep it up.

47. ‘THE COOLIE PROBLEM OF ASSAM’

Whilst I was touring in Assam, a correspondent sent me his outpourings under the above heading. From his letter I take the following:

I can agree from personal experience with much of what the writer has to say. The very word ‘coolie’ is a misnomer and reminds one of what happens in South Africa. Instead of meaning a labourer or a porter, the word came to be applied in South Africa to designate the bearer’s nationality, and became a word of reproach. An Indian merchant, barrister or doctor was known as a coolie merchant, etc. So, in Assam, the Indian who went from another province to work on the tea estates remained a coolie even after the termination of his contract as a labourer and even though he ceased to be a labourer and became a land-owner. But being industrious, he has multiplied in Assam and yet remains in perfect isolation and ostracism. It is a suicidal policy that keeps him so. He cannot be driven out of Assam. Being grossly neglected, he has become an economic waste. If these men were properly taken care of, they would become an asset of first class importance. It is up to the educated people of Assam to study this problem and solve it to the benefit of all concerned. It does not require an outlay of money so much as it requires an outlay of intelligence and industry.

_Harijan_, 1-6-1934

48. UNTOUCHABILITY AS IT EXISTS TODAY

The Editor sends me the following from his box. A correspondent who gives his name and address but prefers to remain unknown to the readers of _Harijan_ says:

In the _Harijan_ of the 9th March, Gandhiji is reported to have said that ‘there was no warrant in the Shastras for untouchability’. One of the most prominent pundits who support Mahatmai’s movement is Mahamahopadhyaya Pramatha Nath Tarkabhushan of Benares Hindu University. He has published the letter which he wrote to Gandhiji last year quoting scriptures in support of Gandhiji. The pundit wrote that, although there are texts in support of untouchability, there are other texts which stated that untouchables could be made pure by diksha (initiation) and devotion to God. Thus, according to the pundit, those chandalas who were not initiated nor devoted to God were untouchables according to the Shastras. Gandhiji’s opinion that there is no sanction for untouchability is, therefore, not supported by this pundit.

1 The extract is not reproduced here. The correspondent had pointed out the need to remove the indignities suffered by the so-called ‘coolies’ and those belonging to other Depressed Classes. He had requested Gandhiji to “evolve a scheme of work” to raise their standard of life and to earn them recognition in society.

Will you kindly state pundits have told Gandhiji that there is no sanction for untouchability in the Shastras?

Gandhiji himself wrote before that sanatanists had supplied him with many texts from the Shastras in support of untouchability, but that he did not accept the authority of such passages as they were against the fundamental principles of morality.

Gandhiji’s present statement that there is no sanction for untouchability in the Shastras does not seem to accord with his previous statement which was that there is such sanction but he did not accept the authority of such passages because they were immoral.

Will you kindly explain the apparent inconsistency through the columns of the Harijan?

I have not verified the quotation from the Harijan of 9th March. But everybody knows by this time that, whenever I speak on untouchability, it has reference to untouchability as it is practised today or known to us today. And I do repeat here, as I have said on a thousand platforms, that there is no warrant in the Shastras for untouchability as we practise it today. I well remember Mahamahopadhyaya Pramatha Nath Tarkabhushan’s letter to me. His argument is an enforcing argument combating the doctrine of ineradicable untouchability. That letter not only does not controvert my proposition but supports it in the sense that no single untouchable need always remain untouchable. When once it is admitted that an untouchable can become touchable by simply reciting the Bhagavata’s twelve-lettered mantra, the citadel of untouchability is destroyed. For the support of my position, I cite even the sanatanists themselves, for, they have not as yet produced a single verse in support of untouchability as it is practised today. Innumerable castes are at one time enumerated as untouchables in the census report and

1 The source has “contraverse”.

34 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
at another removed from that list and some new ones are enumerated. Surely, there is no warrant in the Shastras for accepting census figures for branding persons as untouchables, and untouchability as we practise it today has reference only to these several crores of men and women who are classified as untouchables in census reports. Nor is there any warrant in the Shastras for the treatment that is meted out to these people in their respective provinces or districts. I have, indeed, said that the verses produced by sanatanists in support of untouchability as they describe it are wholly inconsistent with the fundamental principles of Hinduism. Therefore, under the canons of interpretation laid down in the Shastras themselves, such verses must be repudiated as devoid of authority. There is, therefore, no inconsistency in my writings or sayings, when I say that there is no warrant for untouchability as it is practised today. Of course, there is ample authority in the Shastras for temporary untouchability on sanitary grounds. That is not an untouchability that is contrary to reason or to ethics. The untouchability against which I am carrying on war is an internal taint which is supposed to apply to a man by birth and of which no amount of expiation can purge a man.

49. LETTER TO TARA JASWANI

June 1, 1934

CHI. TARA,

May I compliment you for writing to me after three years? Though you wrote to me after such a long time, you have not given me an account of the work you did during this period. Have you collected any money for Harijan work, for which I have undertaken this tour? If you have not, please do so now. Add your own contribution to it before sending over the amount. My not going to Calcutta shouldn’t be an excuse for forgetting either of these things.

50. FRAGMENT OF A LETTER

[Before June 2, 1934]

Why should you feel broken-hearted? Why can’t you follow the example of Janakraja? He was indifferent when his capital city was being reduced to ashes, because he had done all he could to save it. Have you yourself failed anywhere? If not, why worry? Give some chance to God who has His finger in every pie. And even if you have failed anywhere, why worry? Like Lacy [sic] of old “Try again”.

51. LETTER TO KAMALA NEHRU

June 2, 1934

CHI. KAMALA,

I always look forward to hearing from you. Your letters can never be a burden to me. My regret is that I am not able to write to you as often. I invited you to come over because in Patna you were having to attend meetings night and day. But I do not wish to put you to the inconvenience of coming here, especially now, when the inconvenience has been even further increased with the onset of the rains.

Prabhavati has conveyed to me your question. Who is the person and from which place? Be that as it may, it is my view that this time we must swallow the bitter pill. But anyone who sincerely cannot put up with such a thing should certainly not obey an order of this kind. But anyone who defies the order must do so on his own responsibility. He must make it clear that the Congress or swaraj has nothing to do with such an action on his part, which for him is purely a matter of self-respect. The same should apply to meetings, etc. I am sure that at the present juncture, obeying even such obnoxious orders will add to our strength provided we do it not for fear of imprisonment or something else, but out of a sense of duty.

This message was conveyed in a letter dated June 2, 1934 from Chandrashankar Shukla to K. M. Munshi. The addressee’s name, however, is not known.
Give me news of mummy. How is Indu? Has she gone to Kashmir? When will she be going to Santiniketan and what will she study?

52. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, JAJPUR

June 2, 1934

In the address presented to me you have reminded me that this is a place of pilgrimage. How nice it would have been if you had also added that in this place of pilgrimage all the temples have been thrown open to Harijans. I have repeated several times that in the temples where Harijans have no right of entry, there are idols no doubt, but they have not been consecrated.

We call God the saviour of the fallen; we call him Daridranar-ayana; we call him the Merciful and the Benign. God has thousands of such epithets that go to prove that He does not belong to any particular caste. God belongs neither to the Brahmins nor the Kshatriyas but He belongs to all. But steeped in pride we say, ‘God is for us only and not for others.’ To those who think so I have been crying myself hoarse that if there is any truth in the Shastras, if there is any truth in the tenets of the Shastras, a temple where Harijans are barred entry, has no God but only a stone.

If we fail to see what is obvious and if with the idea of high and low in our hearts, we segregate the Harijans, the Hindu dharma and Hindu society are doomed to perish.

From your address, it would appear that a tremendous propaganda is going on for the removal of untouchability and yet it cannot be uprooted in our time. With my naked eyes I can see clearly that, whether we like it or not, untouchability is destined to disappear. No man, up till now, has succeeded in stopping the wheels of time. If we willingly own our Harijan brothers and give them all the rights we enjoy, this shall be deemed as a blessed act in the kingdom of God.
and in the Book of God. I shall explain to you what will be the result if untouchability is abolished against our wishes and also the result if it is removed with our consent. If untouchability is removed against our wishes, it means the destruction of the Hindu dharma. If Hinduism perishes there will certainly be no untouchable left. But that will not be for the good of humanity. If however untouchability is removed with the willing co-operation of the Hindus, with the purification of and atonement by caste Hindus, it will be something to be proud of and will be a blessed act. And the Hindu dharma which is on the decline today will have a renaissance, and it will progress. With the rise of the Hindu community the concept of brotherhood and fraternity will prevail not only in India but in the whole world. I have shown you two ways—one of progress and the other of decline. Now, it is for you to decide which path you should choose.

A Muslim brother has sent me a letter. He wishes me to give a reply here itself. The purport of his letter is that, in all that I have attempted so far, I have only met with failure. He writes, “Then why have you unnecessarily taken another task on your hands?” He cites this example: “You took immense trouble to bring about Hindu-Muslim unity. But it was no use; only there is a little more tension now.” In answer to this I wish to say only this: I do not accept that I have failed in my attempts especially for Hindu-Muslim unity. It is my strong belief that as a result of the efforts that have been made, though tension appears to have increased due to the prevailing political conditions unity has on the whole been strengthened. It is also my unshaken faith that the endeavour to unite the Hindus and the Muslims will go down in history as a great and worthy cause. But, even if I concede that all my attempts have failed, still I have no regrets, because I have conducted these experiments all my life as a worshipper of truth. Therefore I have no regrets whatever for what I have done.

53. A LETTER

If you will regard my walking tour in villages from day to day as walking to all villages of India, then there should be visible participation by all the provinces. There may be walking parties to villages delivering the message of equality and brotherhood, for abolition of untouchability means nothing less. These parties can do the double work, that of speaking in the friendliest manner to the caste Hindus on the evil of untouchability and distinction of high and low, collecting from them repentance money and sending this to me in the form of purses even as they would have done if I had travelled to them, and the work of delivering the message of peace and deliverance to the untouchables. What a glorious awakening it would be if a simultaneous response such as I have adumbrated here is made!

I am glad that you are taking up the walking tour in Bengal, if only for five days. It would be successful if there is a good response. Of course you will explain to the people the cause of the collection of the tour. Let them understand that Orissa was in greater need, and that my tour in Orissa should be taken for touring all over India. At the same time if I had the opportunity I would certainly tour in Bengal for three months or more.

on a fast to press your demand. You have not taken a vow, and cannot take it now. We should accept and be content with any food that is given to us in a manner that does not hurt our self-respect, provided it is such as we can eat. When we go to jail, we entrust our body to the jailor.

About the extracts which you made while in jail, you can go right up to the India Office, and, if you wish, take even legal steps.

It might be wise not to get an operation performed on the nose, unless it seems absolutely necessary, for improvement in eyesight.

The resolution which you intend to move concerning the Indian States seems altogether bad to me. I see nothing but attachment or complete lack of thought behind it. Personally, I wouldn’t advise you to move it.

The second resolution is not as bad as the first, but it is bad enough. You do not know the history of how that province was formed. The population also cannot be put as high as you do. The number of delegates which you have assigned to Ajmer-Merwara also seems excessive to me.

56. LETTER TO MARGARETE SPIEGEL

June 4, 1934

CHI. AMALA,

You did well in writing the letters. I want to know you as you are and not as you would be. I shall love you in spite of your faults. You have no cause to fear me. You must dismiss from your mind the thought that I hate you. I hate nobody in the world. You never gave me any cause for hating you. On the contrary you have given me many reasons for loving you. You must not therefore let your imagination run away with you.

I have read your letter to Mira. I think you should go to a cool place. I could easily send you somewhere. Why should you swear by German medicine? There are competent doctors enough in Ahmedabad. Tell Parikshitlal and he will take you to one. You should be sane in these matters. You will be a cause of great anxiety to me, if you become ill and your body is undermined.

Why do you want to be like Mira? She is not perfect. No one is perfect. You should strive to be good according to the gifts God has given you. No two persons are alike in the world. But all can be good if they choose to.

We shall soon meet. I would like you to be fit when we meet. And this you will be, if you won’t brood over you illness and take the necessary measures for getting well.

I enclose herewith some letters to be handed to those concerned.

Love.

57. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

June 4, 1934

‘Civil resistance’ is a wider term, and also indicative of respect. Civil disobedience is not necessarily an accurate expression of the attitude indicated in ‘civil resistance’. ‘Civil disobedience’ may also indicate an attitude of the mind. The term ‘civil disobedience’ was first used by Thoreau. I didn’t like it because it didn’t suggest all that I had in mind. Looking for a new phrase, I fixed upon ‘civil resistance’. The current phrase was ‘passive resistance’. But my way of resistance or the force which I had in mind was not passive. It was active, but ‘active’ might also mean violent. The word ‘civil’ suggests nothing but non-violence. I, therefore, joined it with ‘resistance’.

The pledge taken at the start of the Dandi March certainly did not mean that I would remain in jail till swaraj was won. Nor is it always in our hands to be in jail.

If the Yeravda Pact required a change in the Award by the Government, it also required the people to discharge their debt to Harijans. Because the Government was aware of this condition, it was by implication bound to give me facilities for fulfilling it. The Government had accepted a similar argument during my first term of imprisonment and given me the necessary concession. This correspondence has been published. How can they go back on it now?

I have had no hand in Jamnalalji’s appointment. But I approve of it. The post of secretary was not filled because one secretary is out. If nobody was available, even that post would have had to be filled. There is no principle involved in such matters, the only criterion being propriety. What is wrong in the same person being President and Treasurer?

What you say concerning the Parliamentary Board is correct. The priest ministers at the wedding, but cannot help the partners to run their home. If we let ourselves be seen as we are some day we shall become what we ought to be.

Now nothing till the 14th. However, if there is anything special I will write or ask somebody to write.

61. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

June 4, 1934

CHI. BRIJKRISHNA,

I have your letter. I feel that you should join the family business. You should earn what you can and enter the field of service only when you are free from attachment to the family and when the desire for money ceases and effortless brahmacharya is attained. It is useless to make any sacrifice because I or someone else so advises. Only you can have a measure of your own strength, only you can judge the degree of your attachment. Until you have measured yourself truly it is your dharma to keep up the domestic links and retain the family profession. There is no sin in maintaining family relationship or even in making money. One can also after all render service by keeping the domestic ties within limits. He also serves who observes truth, etc., while remaining in his own sphere of work. One who enters the field of service yet indulges in subtle pleasures, selfishness and the like renders no service, but only harms the cause and turns a hypocrite. It is a grave delusion to say that one cannot preserve truth while earning wealth. There are quite a few people today who adhere to truth while making money. I think your duty lies in this for the present, but the first thing you should do is to make yourself absolutely healthy.

Nothing will be gained by coming to me in my travels. But if you wish you may join me on my reaching Poona or Ahmedabad.
My advice would be against it. It would be better to busy yourself in work.

June 5, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS,

It was a good idea of yours to pay all those visits. I understand what you say regarding Rukhi. City life cannot have any other result than this. Rukhi could have made her way easier, but she did not have enough courage. But that was not her fault. Everybody obeys his or her own nature. One may make whatever changes are possible within its limits. Anybody who attempts more is bound to fall lower than he or she was before.

Prabhudas has got what he wanted. He will make his way in life if his health remains good.

Let Velanbehn follow her own inclination and rise or fall in consequence. She will come to no harm whatever. If Prema is released after I have left, I hope she will follow me. When is Lilavati expected to be released? I feel sometimes that we should now relieve Anasuyabehn of the burden of Anandi and others. Kanu has proved his mettle well indeed. I have written to Amala. You do not seem to have met Amina. Amtuussalam has been operated upon for piles in Bombay. She is in the King Edward [Memorial] Hospital. Write to her. 69. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

GARADPUR (UTKAL),

June 7, 1934

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

I have received no letter from you this time as yet. I myself have written to you regularly, however. The rains have started here, and so all touring has stopped. It will soon be time for the morning prayer. As I am writing this, Satisbabu has arrived with his band of ten, carrying their luggage and walking a distance of two miles from Bhadrak Station to this place. They took an hour and three quarters to walk that distance through the mud.
I am now taking up the letter again after the prayer.

Satisbabu has been touring Bengal on foot. It is too early yet to assess the results of the walking tour. Personally I am fully satisfied. All other things seem pale beside this.

Miss Harrison has gone to Bombay. I shall meet her again there. She is a very good woman indeed. She thinks about nothing else but this problem. Muriel has toured fairly widely in company with Jamnalalji. She also will meet me in Bombay.

I have already sent the tour programme to you. Have faith that what is happening is perfectly all right.

71. SPEECH AT GARADPUR ASHRAM, BHADRAK
[June 7, 1934]

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

It was arranged that there would be a meeting on the public road today at 9 a.m. But I was informed that no meeting could be held on the public road without a license issued from the Superintendent of Police. It was our mistake that we did not obtain a license for the meeting. The S. P. is not here now. He stays at Balasore. His subordinates here are not empowered to issue a license. So I could not go to the place of the meeting. Therefore I called you all to this place. I know law cannot be broken here; because I do not want to break the law and convene a meeting on the public road. I say all of you should give up untouchability. We are all sons of one God, then why should we live aloof from Harijans? We should give all facilities to them which the caste Hindus enjoy. We should not hold out any distinction between high and low. The next thing that I have to say is that we have become idle and idleness should be given up. If we do not give up idleness we will starve. It is for this reason that some sort of work must be done. If no other work is available then charkhas should be plied so that something may be earned. If anyone gets more money by doing any other work, he should engage himself in such work. Thirdly, intoxicants should be given up because intoxicants do harm to us. If you have followed me, then give whatever you can for the service of Harijans.

72. SPEECH TO HARIJAN WORKERS, BHADRAK
[Extracted from “Weekly Letter”]

Those who took a direct part in the pilgrimage cannot but have been struck by the fact that real work lies in the villages. The vast mass of Harijans live there. Untouchability has its strongest roots there. Poverty, too, is most rampant in the villages. Therefore the Sangh, while not neglecting the cities, should send its best workers to the villages and there do twofold work—serve the Harijans and the savarnas—the former, by procuring for the young and the old educational facilities, clean water-supply, admission to temples, betterment of economic condition, removal of bad habits, e.g., carrion-eating, eating and drinking intoxicating drugs and drinks, and inducing hygienic habits; and the latter, by establishing friendly contact with them and securing their co-operation to the extent they would be prepared to give it. In all things there should be no compulsion or the show of it. Above all, remember that personal purity of the worker is to count in the end. Those, therefore, whose character is not above suspicion and weatherproof should not touch Harijan service, particularly in the villages. The Sangh will have to be most careful in the selection of workers.\footnote{What follows is reproduced from The Bombay Chronicle.}

Gandhiji expressed his satisfaction at the enthusiasm displayed by all sections of people throughout Utkal including the womenfolk in furtherance of Harijan uplift movement. Mahatmaji said:

I am returning more convinced than ever before that Harijan work is far better done by \textit{padayatra} (tour on foot).

Referring to a query by one among the audience as to whether suspension of civil disobedience should be interpreted as a verdict of its failure, Gandhiji said:

There is no such work as ‘failure’ in the dictionary of a satyagrahi. He simply prepares himself according to experience gained at every step. The progress of a satyagrahi is similar to that of a mountaineer who has in the course of his march got to retrace his steps several times before he ascends a few steps.

Replying to another question as to how he expected to get swaraj by restricting the practice of civil disobedience only to himself, Gandhiji said:

Wait and you will see.

\section*{73. NOTES}

\textbf{LIMITATIONS OF PENITENTIAL FASTS}

It will be remembered that Shri Sitaram Sastri sometime ago underwent as unconditional fast by way of penance for the weakness of a friend who, having promised to open a temple under his charge, had, under pressure of his friends, gone back upon his promise. Shri Sastri discussed the fast with me. I promised to set forth the argument briefly in these columns.
Fasting with a spiritual purpose behind it is praiseworthy only under well-defined conditions. It must not be for a selfish end. It must not be in the nature of violence, as, for instance, it would be, if one fasted against a sanatanist for not opening a temple when it was well known that it was against his religious conviction to do so. The question that Sitaram Sastri had to deal with was of a different nature. He had to deal with a broken promise of an intimate friend. Ordinarily such a breach or its imminence is cured by a fast, and the fast would be advisable, if not obligatory, for those who believe in fasts as a lawful institution in a non-violent crusade against social or religious abuse or evil, both of which untouchability is. But in dealing with the timid, almost emasculated, society such as we have to deal with, a breach of promise have to be gently dealt with, especially when they are made in connection with social matters as distinguished from individual affairs. Superstition is ingrained in us. Untouchability—itself a poisonous boycott of the extreme type—has filled us with imaginary horrors of an imaginary boycott. Living in such fears, mere threat of a social boycott to one for whom life outside his particular caste is inconceivable is enough to make him withdraw or break a solemn promise. In such cases, a fast is too drastic a remedy. Prudence demands abstention from taking promises from such men and treating lightly promises already made. Such persons require most sympathetic treatment and gentle handling. A drastic treatment like that of fasting may, instead of strengthening, actually weaken a person and, therefore, endanger or injure the very reform for which a fast is undertaken.

_Harijan, 8-6-1934_

74. A CAREFUL SPINNER

A Harijan sevak, who is working in a Harijan school and trying to introduce hand-spinning amongst his pupils and their parents, in addition to many other things writes:

During the national week I spun more industriously than hitherto and much more carefully. My speed was 300 yards per hour on an average. Out of 40 tolas of cotton I obtained 37 tolas of yarn of 16 counts. The output was 9,700 rounds—a round is equal to four feet. In cleaning cotton and carding it, I lost two and a half tolas, and another half tola was lost in spinning. I have preserved all the waste. This I propose to utilize for filling pillows and the like. I have seen many spinners whose waste sometimes amounts to as much as the wages obtained from spinning for the amount of cotton on which the waste has been made. You would remember that I spin only during leisure hours. I shall have spun for myself much more khadi than I need for personal use. I propose to sell the Purplus and apply the proceeds towards the expenses of conducting the Harijan school under my charge. My yarn is considered to be so strong and good that the weavers prefer my yarn to any other.

I know this spinner. He has become what he is by his sincerity and application. He was no better than the average spinner. But, today, very few volunteer-spinners would be able to show the record that this Harijan sevak has been able to show. Wandering through the villages of Utkal, speaking to the people and coming in closest touch with them I have a daily demonstration of enormous possibilities of hand-spinning. The idleness that has crept over the poor villagers is a first-class tragedy. I see hundreds, and often thousands, hovering round me all day long doing absolutely nothing. Those who hover round me are not in any shape or form well-to-do. Their food is of the most meagre kind. They hardly get milk or ghee. The food consists chiefly of boiled rice, dhal and oil. The people appear to me to be without ambition and without hope, and yet they show in their own lives a remarkable culture which you cannot help noticing. But all that culture will presently be of no avail to them, if they cannot be induced to learn the art of profitably utilizing every idle hour. And I come irresistibly to the conclusion that there is nothing but the spinning-wheel to present to the millions for their acceptance and use during idle hours. Surely, any industry is remunerative which is designed to give occupation to millions of people.

76. LETTER TO J. C. KUMARAPPA

June 8, 1934

I have your note of the 4th instant.

You enquire about things here. I shall content myself with giving you just a subjective report of the policy of the management as I expect detailed report of work done to reach you through Pyarelal and others from time to time.

My asking you for the expenses of your party has had a salutary effect and people are more careful in debiting items against the Bihar Central Relief Committee. But still there is a tendency to mix up reconstruction work with relief work. They want bridges built—even pucca ones—out of our funds without first tapping District Boards, the Government and other sources. Even the wells sunk seem excessive and they have not yet got over the idea of free doles. It appears to me, a great deal of the relief work is undertaken with political motives especially after the A.I.C.C. decisions. The Bihar Central Relief Committee does not get the impartial and unadulterated attention of those in charge and the work is not what it should be because of mixed motives. Middle class relief is an answer to pressure.

As an organization our weak point lies in the absolute control and discretion vested in the officers in charge at the districts. True, the Managing Committee sits down in all seriousness to budget. But when the President, out of the goodness of his heart, is persuaded to give blank cheques to officers in charge without consulting the Managing Committee such budgeting becomes a farce and is to no effect. The work merely reflects the imagination or the lack of imagination of one man in each district. Dictatorial powers are good in an emergency but it seems to me in constructive work some control of the executive is important to co-ordinate effort. The Audit Department, in the nature of things, is a day after the fair and is subject to executive discretion generally; while the inspection department becomes an organization for recording pious opinions.

1 Addressee’s name as given in the G.N. register
In the course of an exclusive interview with the Associated Press Mr. Gandhi said that if he had it in his power he would undoubtedly use it in order to bring about a settlement of the labour strike during his visit to Bombay, but he knew that he had none. As regards his impressions on the conclusion of his walking tour in Orissa, he said:

I have always considered Orissa to be the poorest of our provinces. That impression was strengthened by intimate contact with the villages visited during the tour. The enforced idleness among people is appalling. The Harijans in the villages I found to be exceptionally clean in their habits. Indeed, in some of the villages their homes appeared to be cleaner than the homes of their fellow-villagers. Intellectually, too, they appeared to me to be in no way inferior to others in spite of the social handicaps they are living under.

I have nothing but happy memories of the pilgrimage and, due opportunity coming to me, I should repeat it on a much larger scale. Utkal co-workers showed great powers of endurance. Their organizing ability was of no mean order. Twice during nights storms swept over us. Volunteers proved equal to the emergency and we were able to pass the nights in more or less comfort.

Our party included girls from Rama Devi’s Ashram. I marvelled at their capacity for walking bare-footed. Every morning, as soon as we reached our destination, these girls went out to Harijan quarters and brought me reports of what they had seen or done. They never knew what fatigue was. And though many of them had been brought up in the lap of luxury they put up with all the trials of a march which was by no means a soft job. If the work is continued with the same enthusiasm and earnestness that were exhibited during the march and the workers concentrate upon Harijan service in the villages more than the cities, the result will be startling. I have no doubt that savarna Hindus’ minds are ready. But, in order to induce action they require the living touch which could only be supplied by pure-minded workers working in the villages, not by fits and starts, but regularly.

1 Wife of Gopabandhu Babu and Secretary of the Harijan Sevak Sangh
In conclusion, Mr. Gandhi said that these walking tours had not yet taken place in any other province except Bengal. In his opinion such tours would become more and more popular as experience grew.\(^1\)

On Government communique lifting the ban on Congress organizations, Gandhiji declined to make any comment at present.

On being told that the whole country was waiting for his lead in this matter, he smilingly replied that the country should know what his lead was.

78. SPEECH AT BALASORE

Mr. Gandhi spoke for about 15 minutes. He began by explaining the reason for abandoning his tour on foot and said that as he had been drenched by rain for two nights and as it rained the whole day at a place called Turunga he had to abandon his walking tour. He then touched on untouchability and said that we are sons of the same God and as He does not make any distinction between His sons it would be sin for us if we do so. No distinction should be made between the different castes among the Hindus, between the caste Hindus and the Harijans, and also between the Hindus and the non-Hindus, as they are all brothers. It is a sin not to remove this distinction and a religion which does not obliterate this distinction is doomed to extinction as a result of this sin. He asked the audience to remove untouchability.

He then touched on the evil of intoxicants and said that the use of intoxicants deadens one’s intellect and might bring on even insanity. He exhorted the audience to give up intoxicants.

Concluding, he said that everyone should do some work, as idleness is always bad. He asked the audience to take to spinning by charkha, if they had nothing else to do, as that will remove Orissa’s poverty.

He then asked for contributions for the Harijan Fund.

80. LETTER TO JAYAPRAKASH NARAYAN

WARDHA,

June 9, 1934

CHI. JAYAPRAKASH,

I received your letter just now at 10 p. m. There has been a misunderstanding. While you are in Patna the expenses will be negligible. My impression was that you ate at the camp. Your going to Bombay has already been arranged. As to your programme after you are relieved of the Delhi work, I had asked you but you refused to say anything. Prabhavati also was not in a position to tell me clearly. I want to make a villager of you. But today you do not have the necessary strength. Since you want me to have the onus to deciding the matter I shall fix Rs. 20 or Rs. 25 per month to be paid to you. Many co-workers are paid less. I shall allow the same sum for Prabhavati. I would want Prabhavati to live at Wardha. The three of us had agreed on this. If now you feel differently Prabhavati will have no objection if you can let me know what she will be doing in Bihar or anywhere else. It is also not clear to me whether you wish to have her with you or just anywhere in Bihar. All this is very delicate. I do not wish to interfere in any way. When both of you need my advice I like it because I feel that I can share your life. But I would like it more if you could each conduct your life according to the wishes of the other. Only yesterday I was ready to send Prabhavati to you. But she does not wish to go in this way. Madanmohan says you will be going to Madras on the 17th. Prabha says: “What would be the use of my going? Jayaprakash cannot even spare a minute to talk to me.” I do not like all this. I want something definite from both sides. I shall be reaching Bombay on the 24th. I suggest that you come there. Talk to Prabha and let me know your joint decision.

I have talked at length with Masani on communism. I have read your syllabus. I do not like the manifesto that has been issued.¹ I have pointed out its blemishes to Masani. I shall also speak to him when I can spare the time.

81. SPEECH TO TEXTILE WORKERS, NAGPUR

June 9, 1934

Mahatma Gandhi arrived here by mail en route to Wardha and was greeted by a large number of textile workers (on strike) at the railway station.

Gandhiji, addressing the gathering, said that he had invited the labour leaders to Wardha to meet him the next day when he would ascertain the situation from them. He would then give his advice which he hoped would do good to them.

Gandhiji assured them that though they were labourers of today, he was a labourer for the last 20 years. Though he practised as a lawyer he always lived with labourers and lived like them.

Gandhiji was presented with donations amounting to Rs. 50 at the station.

82. TO MAHAGUJARAT

No one has expressed any disapproval of the pilgrimage on foot. But there is some discontent in all the provinces. Everyone wants to take me from one town to another. But I am really tired of travelling by train and car. We are sprawling in a field at the moment. We have the sky above and the earth below. We are about fifty persons here, perhaps more, but not less. We are so far removed from trains and cars that we hear no sound of them at all. It is no small matter to come in contact with the villagers and know the Harijans in the countryside. The Harijans of the village have their meals in our kitchen every day. At night there are ‘magic lantern’ lectures by Gopabandhu Babu. Our girls go to the Harijan colony every day. Five girls from Rama Devi’s Ashram walk in front. They ask for no amenities. On their own they get up at three in the morning and set out. They work hard throughout the day. If I live like this I feel that untouchability would be soon wiped out. Even if this calculation turns out to be wrong, it can be said about this activity that “no effort undertaken is lost, there is no fear of failure. Even a little of this righteous course delivers one from great fear”. 1

This is a first-hand experience. But how would [our] colleagues in other provinces believe it? How would they be convinced of the maxim that the universe is the reflection of our own selves? Bengal swallowed a bitter pill. It gave all its time to Utkal. And now I hear that our colleagues in Bengal are planning pilgrimages on foot in several places. No such thing is known to be happening anywhere else. Why not? If such pilgrimages are undertaken in good faith and in a spirit of sacrifice, how long can untouchability last? But how can such faith be created among our colleagues?

Hence, we will have to go round in the other provinces as best as we can. Camping in one place also seems to be a difficult proposition but our colleagues must bear with this much at least. Let people from the whole province come wherever I camp. Let them meet, exchange ideas and bring purses by way of expiation from their places—I want copper coins from many, not silver from a few. Untouchability will not be wiped out with the help of rupees. I have never heard of anyone’s heart being melted because of money. If an individual’s donation is the token of his change of heart, it would not help the Harijans but will help those who consider themselves caste Hindus. Hence, I expect the people of Gujarat, Kathiawar and Cutch

1. to know that this activity is purely religious;
2. to mix with the people and, facing all opposition, give them the message of removal of untouchability;
3. to collect individual donations if they are offered by way of expiation—and not for my sake;
4. to come and see me after cleansing their heart of all the impurities and freeing yourselves from selfishness and feelings of hatred and jealousy.

1 Bhagavad Gita, II. 40
5. Even in Ahmedabad do not insist on taking me round. Let me sit in one place, wherever it may be. There is a telegram from Kathiawar full of woes. They demand two days for Kathiawar. Their demand is justified. Right now I am not able to find any solution. But something would have been decided by the time this is printed. My mind prompts me to keep touring in this very place. But I am aware that it is not necessarily one’s duty to follow one’s inclination. One has to go against the promptings of the mind too. As Mirabai has said:

By a delicate string the Lord holds me;
He can pull me as He wills.

I thank you for your letter. Believers in peace and non-violence dare not look for immediate tangible results. Patience—infinite—is the characteristic of non-violence, impatience, of violence. My congratulations to you on your being assaulted. Go on writing to the officers [about the incident]. Can a protest meeting not be held in Baroda and Navsari? It was not you but the Harijans who were assaulted. You should not, therefore, have the slightest hesitation in taking whatever measures may be necessary.

I understand about Bhavnagar. It must be given two full days, otherwise the work there cannot be completed. In Ahmedabad a car will have to be used for all movement. I have not been able to go as far as renouncing completely the use of a car. But the fact that you had such fear made me happy.

87. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

WARDHA,
June 12, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS.

I got all your letters. But I could get no time at all to reply to them. Today I woke up at one and started writing.

You have taken up a good job indeed there. We are faced with such difficult moral problems here that I miss you very much. Since, however, you have undertaken the present work with my consent, I can do nothing for some time. You must be permitted to continue your experiment. I am not quite happy that the place is Rajkot. But since you yourself see no difficulty in that, I don’t worry. My faith rests on yours.

I assume that you will see me either in Ahmedabad or Bhavnagar. Would you like to have Prema or Gangabehn with you there?

... has fallen once again, and this time very low indeed. He must leave this place now. The final decision will be made today. Some other moral lapses also have been discovered. I don’t write about them here for want of time. Vinoba has undertaken a seven-day fast. It has been decided that Vinoba should live here now, but that will not be enough. He must have somebody like you to help him. Can you make any useful suggestion in this connection?

And now about Jamnadas. His complaint is completely unjustified. But there is no remedy for a suspicious nature. I have always given him help or advice whenever he sought either. I have given him advice even without his seeking it. Jamnadas can say that I have neglected him only if you also can make that complaint. When I have no doubt as to the correctness of the course he is following and no advice to give, why need I write unnecessarily? Whenever he asked me to take him with me on my travels I did so. If he didn’t learn anything, how could I help that? What work could I give to anybody who accompanied me only occasionally as he did?

This time there are so many persons wanting to accompany me that it is a problem how to take them all. I certainly don’t require all of them. If, now, Jamnadas also comes, he cannot but be superfluous. And I, too, would be busy with problems connected with my own work. This is the position. If you can understand him, [try to advise him and] guide him properly. If he would let me guide him, I am ready to do so. I would assign him a village and put it under his sole charge. Would he go to Phoenix? Can’t he do some work under you? Why can’t he run the school after you have put it on a sound foundation? Or why doesn’t he go somewhere to improve his health? Would he like to go to Almora? Does he know his own mind? Does he want to marry? You can show this letter to him.

I have been thinking about Sharma. He has decided to adopt a simple life and live with Ramdas. He wants to take the latter to Phoenix. Some decision will be taken today. Jamna owes me one letter.

88. LETTER TO M. R. MASANI

June 14, 1934

MY DEAR MASANI,

I have read the questions you left with me as also the Congress Socialist Party’s programme.

I welcome the rise of the Socialist Party in the Congress. But I can’t say that I like the programme as it appears in the printed pamphlet. It seems to me to ignore Indian conditions and I do not like the assumption underlying many of its propositions which go to show that there is necessarily antagonism between the classes and the masses or between the labourers and the capitalists, such that they can never work for mutual good. My own experience covering a fairly long period is to the contrary. What is necessary is that labourers or workers should know their rights and should also know how to assert them. And since there never has been any right without a corresponding duty, in my opinion a manifesto is incomplete without emphasizing the necessity of performance of duty and showing what that duty is.

You would not want me at this stage to examine your programme clause by clause, but if you so desire and if you do not mind consulting my convenience, I would appoint for you a time when I could discuss with you, and those whom you may wish, the whole of your programme in detail.

Yours sincerely,

90. INTERVIEW TO MEMBERS OF HARIJAN SEVAK SANGH

BOMBAY,
June 14, 1934

The first work done by Gandhiji on arrival was to meet the members of the Provincial Sangh. Sheth Mathuradas after introducing the members gave a resume of their work. The Sangh spends well in scholarships and runs three chawls providing accommodation for nearly 200 families. In answer to the question what more was to be done by the Sangh, Gandhiji told the members that, whilst he held temple-entry to be an integral part of the programme, he would like them to concentrate their attention on the education of the savaarna Hindus as to the scope of the work and the necessity of removal of the evil. This work should be done by purely voluntary workers of recognized status. The other thing was extension of constructive work. He would like to see a decent eating-house run by the Sangh where Harijans could feel they could go without the slightest restraint. A well-managed eating-house could become a centre of culture for the Harijans and an object lesson to all showing that Harijans had eating habits as clean as those of the average savaarna Hindus. It was true that some of them were not cleanly dressed. But they were no more likely to visit these places than the numerous equally dirtily dressed savaarna Hindus. The two things he mentioned were only by way of illustration. If they would have an exhaustive census of all the Harijans in Bombay and have a catalogue of their disabilities due to untouchability, they could prepare a definite programme of work. Gandhiji expected the Sangh to approach the Bombay Corporation in the many matters in which it alone could render effective help.

Mahatma Gandhi, after some discussion, expressed appreciation of the action of the Bombay Board in renting three Improvement Trust chawls and giving them for the use of Harijans. He also desired that the Local Board should exert its influence with Hindu landlords to see that they let out their houses for Harijans, and also persuade Hindu owners of restaurants to remove the bar on Harijans. Mahatmaji asked the Board to persuade individual Hindus to engage Harijans as domestic servants and employees in offices. He impressed upon the Board the fact that while everywhere he found little hostility to the cause of removal of untouchability there was everywhere indifference and inertia. He wanted the Harijan Sangh to fight this inertia. He also promised to give sympathetic consideration in regard to the allocation of the collections and make his recommendation to the Board.¹

1 This and the following item have been extracted from “Weekly Letter”.

In answer to a question, Gandhiji said Harijan work had nothing to do with politics. The Sangh approached it purely from the religious and the social standpoint. The Sangh was, therefore, open to all. Indeed, he would like all the offices to be filled by non-Congressmen, if they would come. Congressmen should take pride in working under them. This work of mighty reform in Hinduism could not be a monopoly of any party or group. He was glad to be able to say that during his tour he had found in many places that Government were working unstintingly under non-Congressmen.

91. INTERVIEW TO MEMBERS OF GANDHI SEVA SENA

BOMBAY, June 14, 1934

The next appointment was with the sisters led by Shrimati Gosibehn Captain. They had a great deal of silent service to their credit. But Gosibehn would not detain Gandhiji with a recital of those services. She wanted him to speak to the lukewarm, of whom she said they had their fair share. That gave Gandhiji the opportunity of speaking to them on the necessity of dealing with the root evil. What were the weak of body to do? Gandhiji said it was easy enough for such to do one thing. They could keep a Harijan boy or girl to serve them. Given the change of heart and willingness to serve, there was limitless scope for all to serve. What were the women to do where the elders were opposed to the reform? For them no doubt the difficulty was great. But so was the opportunity for work. They had to commence with the conversion of their elders, and this they could do by gentleness and firmness. They must be prepared to suffer for their convictions. Character played a great part in every movement of reform. Only the pure of heart could touch the hearts of their neighbours.²

¹ The Bombay Provincial Board had requested Gandhiji to get the Central Board to permit them to retain 75 per cent of the collections made in Bombay instead of 50.
² What follows is reproduced from The Bombay Chronicle.
Mahatma Gandhi in the course of his address advised women to take an increasing interest in the work for the uplift of Harijans and spread knowledge about health, hygiene and cleanliness among the Harijan womenfolk.

92. NOTES

THE ‘J. K. WELL FUND’

I can easily emphasize the appeal made by Thakkar Bapa, published in the last issue of the _Harijan_, asking for donations to a fund for constructing wells for Harijans. In walking through the Puri and Cuttack Districts, I have observed scarcity of water almost everywhere, and the reader can imagine the plight of Harijans when there is scarcity all over. This is a charity to which all sanatanist reformers and others can subscribe; and let it be remembered that, whilst unreasoned prejudice may prevent Harijans from making use of one of the primary necessities of life, every well constructed for the use of these will relieve not only their distress but will add to the general supply of water. All wells constructed for the sake of Harijans will be available to all who care to make use of them. I hope, therefore, that there will be a generous response to the appeal made by Thakkar Bapa.

A RIGHT STEP

The C. P. Government deserves congratulations for announcing that henceforth the so-called Depressed Classes are to be known as Harijans, and criminal tribes as wandering tribes. Both the names ‘Depressed Classes’ and ‘criminal tribes’ were certainly offensive. And let us hope that the other Governments will copy the good example set by the C.P. Government.

_Harijan, 15-6-1934_

93. HARIJAN V. NON-HARIJAN

“Rather than do constructive work among Harijans, will it not be better to create intense dissatisfaction amongst them with their condition and thus promote such self-help as they can generate among

1 A gentleman who wanted to remain anonymous had donated in June 1933 a sum of Rs. 25,000 to be paid in instalments of Rs. 2,000 per month for constructing wells for Harijans all over the country. The amount was called under this name after it was fully paid up.
themselves? It is no use your trying to convert the savarnas.” This was one of the questions that was asked at a meeting of workers. As it is an important question, it is as well to give the gist of the answer given by me at the meeting. The question betrays ignorance of the whole scope of the movement. To create dissatisfaction among the Harijans can bring no immediate relief to them and can only tend to perpetuate a vicious division amongst Hindus. The object of the movement is to do away with this utterly unnatural division and to secure for Harijans the simple justice to which they are entitled at the hands of savarna Hindus. Thus the movement is one of repentance and reparation. Hence it is confined, on the one hand, to constructive work among Harijans and, on the other, to conversion of savarnas by persuasion, arguments and, above all, by correct conduct on the part of the reformers. If the latter have gentleness, forbearance and patience, what is scoffed at as irreligion by sanatanists will presently be regarded as the essence of religion. Has not Manu said, “Know that to be dharma which is generally observed by the learned, the good and those who are free from passion and hate and which is felt in one’s heart”? If, therefore, the reformers possess the qualities insisted upon by Manu, there will be no doubt whatsoever that the hearts of the sanatanists will respond. Whether they do or not, the service rendered to suppressed humanity by reformers will be a substantial contribution to human progress and will be its own reward. It will certainly find honourable mention in God’s eternal book of life.

Another question discussed was, “Do you not think that the improvement of the condition of starving peasants in more important than the service of Harijans? Will you not, therefore, form peasant organizations which will naturally include Harijans in so far as their economic condition is concerned?”

I wish that what the questioner says were true. Unfortunately, the betterment of the economic condition of peasants will not necessarily include the betterment of that of the Harijans. The peasant who is not a Harijan can rise as high as he likes or opportunity permits him, but not so the poor suppressed Harijan. The latter cannot own and use land as freely as the savarna peasant. He cannot command the labour that he needs. In many places he cannot even buy the seed he requires. And assume for one moment that the Harijan peasant is able to better his economic condition equally with the non-Harijan. Even so, he will still labour under the numerous social disabilities he was labouring under before. Only, because of the very betterment, he will feel them much more keenly than when he was a pauper. Therefore, a special organization for the service of Harijans is a peremptory want in order to deal with the special and peculiar disabilities of harijans. Substantial improvement of these, the lowest strata of society, must include that of the whole of society. Moreover, the ordinary peasant is by no means neglected. For instance, the All-India Spinners’ Association is solely engaged in bettering the peasant’s economic condition by educating him to add a handicraft to husbandry and thus have an automatic insurance against famine and always a substantial addition to his scanty income.

94. SPEECH AT WOMEN’S MEETING, BOMBAY

Gandhiji, at the outset, asked his audience if he was sufficiently audible and the ladies occupying the balconies replied cheerfully they were able to hear him . . .

In the course of his address to them, Gandhiji said that he was glad he was speaking to women before he would speak to the men, for women were superior to men in faith and love, and his battle would be more than half won if he could enlist their whole-hearted support. He hoped that the women of Bombay would rise to the occasion. Women held the key position in society and it would be a tragedy if they blocked the path of reform.

Untouchability had its origin not in religion, but in mere pride of race and the tendency of the strong to keep down the weak. It had persisted so long because Harijans were cut off from all contact and consigned to the worst places. If, however, they were allowed freely to mix with all classes of society and to practise all professions on a footing of equality, we would in a few years be surprised that they should ever have been looked down upon.

The reformer’s was an uphill task, as we had imported religion into untouchability. Sacrifice was essential; but service was impossible without sacrifice, and no sacrifice could be too great to be offered in order to wipe out the deep and long-standing stain of untouchability.

Appealing for funds, Gandhiji hastened to clear any impression in their minds that he was collecting money always. He was there to ask for the support of the women of Bombay for the cause of Harijans, which was dearer to him than anything

95. INTERVIEW TO B. R. AMBEDKAR

BOMBAY
_June 16, 1934_

In the afternoon Dr. Ambedkar interviewed Gandhiji along with Dr. Solanki and other friends of his. Gandhiji asked Dr. Ambedkar for a criticism of the work of the Harijan Sevak Sangh. The worthy Doctor suggested that the Sangh might economize on education and medical relief, as these were attended to by Government and there was a risk of duplication of effort in these matters. Again, education, in the first place, only benefited the individual; whether it would benefit society or not would depend upon what attitude the educated individual took up towards society. He would like the Sangh to concentrate on the primary object of securing full civic rights for Harijans, such as the right to draw water from public wells and to send children to public schools, without any discrimination being exercised against them. As regards cases of maltreatment of Harijans by villagers, such as those adduced by Dr. Ambedkar, Gandhiji said the Sangh was bound to deal with them. In fact, steps had actually been taken in numerous cases with more or less success. But in future Gandhiji would be glad if the Doctor was good enough to send him full facts about every incident of that description. In course of his tour of villages he had noticed that a change for the better was coming over them, but progress in that direction would be accelerated if he had the Doctor’s valued co-operation. As regards education, Gandhiji did not think there was overlapping. In fact, the Sangh was unable to cope with the whole demand, as the right type of teachers were not readily available.

96. SPEECH AT MEETING OF CONGRESS PARLIAMENTARY BOARD, BOMBAY

After his consultation1 Gandhiji addressed the Board in a speech which is described as one of the most moving and earnest speeches that he has ever delivered. The main trend of the speech was that the Congress claimed to stand for the Muslims as well as the Hindus and the Sikhs and other communities and that, therefore, nothing should be done that would have the effect of making the Muslims feel that the Congress had departed from that position.

The majority of the Muslims had accepted the Communal Award. It was their duty to bring about such a voluntary settlement of the Communal Award as would satisfy all communities. They should not go to a third party to secure a modification of the Award. So long, however, as a voluntary settlement was not brought about, it would be betrayal of the Muslims to shake their confidence in the Congress by taking up a position of uncompromising opposition to their view of the Communal Award.

I am thankful to you who have taken the trouble to attend this meeting, the continuous downpour of rain notwithstanding. But fortunately, it has ceased to rain just at this moment, and let me deliver briefly my message to you before it recommences.

I must confess it was with great hesitation that I decided to come to Bombay. For one thing, the labourers in the local mills are at present on strike. I call myself a labourer and, ever since I was in

1 With M. M. Malaviya who, along with M. S. Aney and some other members, had been pleading for the rejection of the Communal Award by the Parliamentary Board which met in Mani Bhuvan on June 15 and 16. The nationalist muslims had been supporting the view of the Ranchi Conference, that the Award should be neither accepted nor rejected, until an agreement was brought about between Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs. The Board, therefore, sought Gandhiji’s advice. The Congress Working Committee, which met in Mani Bhuvan on June 17 at the parliamentary Board’s request, accepted Gandhiji’s view. For the Working Committee Resolution, vide “Letter from N. C. Kelkar”, 22-6-1934

2 This appeared under the title “At the Maidan” with the following introductory note by Valji G. Desai: “On 16th instant, punctually at the advertised time, Gandhiji came in spite of rain to address the public meeting. Sheth Mathuradas [Vissanji, Chairman Harijan Sevak Sangh] presided. The following is the substance of his speech.”
South Africa, I have tried to live a labourer’s life, with considerable success. You can, therefore, easily realize how deeply I sympathize with workers in their distress. My sympathy is, if possible, all the greater, because there are large numbers of Harijans among them. I believe I have some ability as a peacemaker in industrial disputes, but I am sorry I cannot use it in the present case for reasons I need not explain here. Of course, I have no direct contact with labour here and less, perhaps, with their leaders. Then, again, trade in Bombay has not yet emerged out of the valley of depression, and only recently you have made a handsome contribution to the Bihar Relief Fund.

I cannot set much store by your purse of Rs. 39,000 which, as the Chairman has said, might go up to Rs. 50,000. You have always showered upon me your love as well as your gold. But there is an essential difference between this purse and the funds you have raised on other occasions. Your Harijan purse is part of your penance for our maltreatment of Harijans. If the payment is not a token of such penance, it is absolutely worthless in my estimation. And if it is penance, you give to the utmost of your ability. Indeed, I know of a friend who has given up certain necessary articles of food ever since my fast1 and has thus been able regularly to remit two rupees and four annas every month. This two rupees is more valuable than Rs. 2,000 of a wealthy person. Even a cowrie honestly acquired and sincerely given is a pearl beyond price.

I am certain that we shall be blotted out of the Book of Life, if we do not completely destroy untouchability while still there is time. I do not know of a sin more heinous than that in the whole catalogue of sins, for it is practised in the name of religion. It is one thing to fall because we are weak; it is another thing altogether to fall and to imagine at the same time that we are rising. How can we dare to treat our brothers, every whit as good as ourselves, as untouchables by birth? You must have heard about Shri Parikshitlal, the indefatigable Harijan servant, who drank water at a parab2 and then went to Harijan quarters. For this he was severely beaten by a Hindu constable in Baroda State. This shows you cannot distinguish between a Harijan and a non-Harijan. It also shows that, if you are a Harijan, you are done for. You may not expect justice. You have no right even to quench your thirst. What a hue and cry would have been raised, if a political worker had been lathi-charged by the police? But neither we here nor the people in Baroda State seem to have raised their voice against the treatment accorded to Shri Parikshitlal.

It will not do to say that Harijans eat carrion, drink liquor and have dirty habits. What else can we expect if we segregate them and kick them at every step? We keep them in places unfit even for cattle, and then affect surprise if they develop any bad habits. But are we prepared to consider them as part and parcel of our society if they shed all evil habits? The fact is we must bear with them and try to improve them. My heart wept within me when I observed the housing conditions of the Harijan employees of Bombay Municipality. Bombay is beautiful, indeed, but wherein does its beauty consist—in Malabar Hill or in the Kachrapatti at Mahalakshmi? I tell you we can live in equanimity on the Ridge only after decent housing conditions have been secured for these Harijans. And the expenditure involved in this modest programme is a mere flea-bite for a Municipality, which counts its income in crores, and for the citizens of no mean city who once gave away 43 lakhs of rupees in a single month. I beseech you to have a look at the plague-spots in Bombay and to move the Municipality to deal with them at once. How would you like to live near a sewer even for a single day?

If you go to Walpakhadi, you will have an opportunity of seeing what a change for the better can be brought about by a handful of workers like Shri Purushottamdas, Shri Morarji Sheth and Shri Sopariwala. Even their work is not perfect, but it looms large in our horizon, as there is little like it besides. It is easy to criticize workers and to say, for instance, that the members of the Provincial Board sit in armchairs all day long and should, therefore, be driven out of office. We love to criticize, but we do not know how to galvanize our organizations to activity. We never offer them our services, and without thus offering our services we have no right to pass mere destructive criticism. I freely admit that there is much room for improvement in the Sangh’s work. But they are working honestly and to the best of their capacity. We must appreciate their work, and then suggest fresh lines of activity, such as, for example, establishment of an eating-house where Harijans would be served with respect in common with the rest of the citizens. I may say in passing that for people thus to sit in a line at dinner is not inter-dining. I therefore hope that everyone of you will co-operate with the Sangh and thus increase its capacity for usefulness. And you must not say that you are unfit to render service. If only you have love for the cause, everything else will be easy. ¹

101. INTERVIEW TO ALL-INDIA SWADESHI LEAGUE DEPUTATION

BOMBAY,

[June 17, 1934]

During the last few months, Mr. Gandhi has been approached by several workers in swadeshi for a comprehensive definition of 'swadeshi' for their guidance. In trying to prepare an exhaustive definition and in the course of discussion with co-workers in the extreme South, he discovered that such a definition was almost impossible—it was a spirit that was growing and undergoing variations daily. He suggested the following workable formula for the guidance of the All-India Swadeshi League and kindred organizations:

“For purposes of the All-India Swadeshi League, swadeshi covers useful articles manufactured in India through small industries which are in need of popular education for their support and which will accept the guidance of the All-India Swadeshi League in regulating prices and in the matter of wages and welfare of labour under their control. Swadeshi will, therefore, exclude articles manufactured through large and organized industries which are in no need of services of the All-India Swadeshi League and which can or do command State aid.”

My formula as stated clearly is for the guidance of the Swadeshi League. It does not purport to cover the whole field of swadeshi. It is only by way of suggestion to the League to restrict the scope of its work to the encouragement and propagation of minor, particularly home industries to the exclusion of major organized ones. The object of making this suggestion is not to decry major industries or to ignore the benefit those industries have bestowed and in future may bestow on the country. But a body like the Swadeshi League need not become self-appointed advertising agents of those industries as it has hitherto been. They have ample resources at their command and they are well able to take care of themselves. The spirit of swadeshi has been sufficiently generated and it helps them without any effort of swadeshi organizations. These, if they are to be useful, have to concentrate their attention on the struggling industries. Any attempt to advertise the wares of large organized industries can only result in sending up the prices. This will be unjust to the consumer. It is a waste of effort to bring into being a philanthropic organization to help a successful business organization. We may not delude ourselves by the wish and belief that our efforts have helped the growth and advancement of those industries. It will be cheap self-satisfaction not substantiated by facts. I recall a conversation I had with Fazalbhai in 1920, when I was on the eve of launching movement for swadeshi. He characteristically said to me: ‘If you Congressmen become advertising agents of ours, you will do no good to the country except to put a premium on our wares and raise the prices of our manufacturers.’ His argument was sound. But he was nonplussed when I informed him that our object was to encourage hand-spun and hand-woven khadi which had been woefully neglected and which needed to be revived if starving unemployed millions were to be served. But khaddar is not the only such struggling industry. I therefore suggest you direct your attention and efforts to all small-scale minor unorganized industries that are today in need of public support. They may be wiped out if no effort is made in their behalf. Some of these are being pushed back by large-scale industries which flood the markets with their manufactures. It is these that cry for your help.

Take the sugar industry. The largest major industry next to textile is that of the manufacture of sugar. It stands in no need of our assistance. Sugar factories are fast multiplying. Popular agencies have done little to help the growth of this industry. It is indebted for its growth to favourable legislation. And today the industry is so prosperous and expanding that production of jaggery is becoming a thing of the past. It is admittedly superior to refined sugar in its nutritive value. It is this very valuable cottage industry that cries out for your help. This, by itself, furnishes a large scope for research and substantial help. We have to investigate ways and means of keeping it alive. This is but an illustration of what I mean. I have no doubt in my mind that we add to national wealth, if we help small-scale industries. I have no doubt also that true swadeshi consists in encouraging and reviving these home industries. That alone can help the dumb millions. It also provides an outlet for creative faculties and resourcefulness of the people. It can usefully employ hundreds of youths in the country who are in need of employment. It may harness all the energy that at present runs to waste. I do not want anyone of those who are engaged in more remunerative occupations to leave them and take to minor industries just as I did with regard to the spinning-wheel. I would ask only those who suffer from unemployment and penury to take to some of these industries and add a little to their slender resources.

It will thus be seen that the change in activity that I have suggested to you does in no way conflict with the interests of major industries. I want to say only this much: Treat your national servants well, restrict your activities to minor industries and let major ones help themselves as they are doing today. Minor industries, I conceive, will not replace major ones but will supplement them. Of large industries, I even aspire to induce owners to take interest in this work, which is purely humanitarian. I am a well-wisher of the mill-owners, too, and they will bear me out when I say that I have not failed to help them when I could.

104. SILENCE DAY NOTES 3

It is painful, but if it must happen it must be endured. The Congress will survive the shock.

I am quite clear in my mind that the elections must be faced. Such a big organization as the Congress cannot allow its fate to be decided by purely personal considerations. I anticipate no untoward results, if we regulate our work resolutely, calmly and honestly.

I am certain that nothing else can be done now. I cannot measure the amount of damage that it will do to the country if we retrace our steps now. Whatever it is, we cannot put a stop to this at this stage.4

You, the members of the Parliamentary Board, who are here (in Bombay) may meet once again, and if you arrive at the conclusion that if these two resignations stand, it would be impossible to proceed with the election work, you may advise the Working Committee accordingly. I am firm in my opinion expressed to you; but it has no value, because I have not to run the elections.

111. SPEECH AT MAHILA ASHRAM, POONA\(^3\)

June 21, 1934

At the Ashram Gandhiji was garlanded by Harijan girls and, in the course of his address to the girls, he said that he owed his first acquaintance with Professor Karve and the great work he was doing for the women of India to the late Mr. Gokhale, who desired him to see for himself what one man could do in the cause of women’s progress. Since then his ship had long sailed on troubled waters, with the result that he could pay them a second visit only after about 20 years, and that, too, by accident. He did not have enough time even for his immediate work, but still he was glad to be in their midst. He hoped that the girls, when they grew up, would so regulate their lives as to be worthy of the great sacrifices of the Karves in their interest. With such an example before them, they dare not lead lives of luxury and self-indulgence. There

He would, therefore, expect the girls to spend themselves in the service of their less fortunate sisters.

He was sorry to note that Hindi was only optional and not compulsory in a national institution such as the Women’s University. He would suggest that they should have English optional and Hindi compulsory, for all girls would take up English as a matter of course owing to the prevalent fashion, but they would not so readily take up Hindi. 115. INTERVIEW TO NATIONAL EDUCATION WORKERS\(^3\)

Poona,

June 22, 1934

In the course of his conversation Mr. Gandhi said that institutions that are under ban by the Government should not try to get the ban lifted by applying to the Government or by other means. He further emphasized that as municipal and local bodies were semi-Governmental, help from such bodies should not be taken for national education.

Asked if Harijans, while getting the benefits of national education from Congress organization, should also receive education from Government schools, Mr. Gandhi said that as long as we are not considering Harijans as part of our society we cannot apply the same rules of national education to them. They can adopt all means to get education either at national schools or Government schools.

Questioned if the objects of national education should be to produce village workers in contra-distinction to producing self-supporting national-minded workers,

Mr. Gandhi said that the attention of workers should be directed to the creation of village workers as opposed to city workers. That should be the primary object of national education. Mr. Gandhi opined that primary education was most needed in the system of national education. He approved of the ideal of an All-India

117. SPEECH AT MEETING TO COMMEMORATE THE PROPHET’S DEATH

POONA,

June 23, 1934

My friendship with the Mussalmans does not date from yesterday but from the time when I was a young man fifty years ago. My first visit to South Africa was in connection with the affairs of a Mussalman firm in that country. And there I had the privilege of coming into intimate touch with Muslim friends, for years together. In India too, you know, what close association there was between the Ali Brothers and myself. And although Maulana Shaukat Ali and I have appeared to have been estranged from each other, he knows that he has me always in his pocket.

Such being my relations with Mussalmans, I felt it to be my duty to study the life of the Prophet. I had tried to do this in South Africa but then I did not know sufficiently. In India imprisonment brought me good luck and thus I had the opportunity to read Maulana Shibli’s biography of the Prophet which the late Hakim Saheb Ajmal Khan was good enough to send me at my request. At the same time I also read the volume on companions of the Prophet. I had read English works on Islam and the Prophet.

These studies led me to the conclusion that the Koran and the Bible were sacred books for me and not alone the Vedas and the Gita. Hazrat Mahomed was a great Prophet and so was Jesus Christ. From my reading I received the impression that the Prophet was a seeker of Truth. He was godfearing. In this I know I am not telling you anything new. I am only describing to you how I was impressed by his life. He suffered endless persecution. He was brave and feared no man but God alone. He did what he considered to be right in scorn of consequences. He was never found to say one thing and do another. He acted as he felt. If there was a change in his opinion, the next day he responded to the change without counting the cost and regardless of popular censure or opposition.

The Prophet was a Fakir. He had renounced everything. He could have commanded wealth if he had so desired. Even as you would, I shed tears of joy when I read of the privations he, his family and companions suffered voluntarily. How can a Truth-seeker like me help respecting one whose mind was constantly fixed on God, who ever walked in God’s fear and who had boundless compassion for mankind?

You all read the Koran. But how few put into practice what you read? You will perhaps retort that, if you do not live up to the precepts of the Koran, nor do the Hindus act according to the precepts of the Gita, and you will be right. It only comes to this that if both the communities followed the teachings of their respective faiths, communal quarrels would be a thing of the past. But at present some men in both communities appear to have taken leave of their senses, and are absorbed in slinging mud at one another. I will not have addressed this meeting in vain, if a single Mussalman will thereby come to a true understanding of the situation, and instead of picking holes learns to love other communities as well as his own.

I should certainly be very happy if Father and Mother come and see me at Wadhwan. But that will be night time. Why should we give them that trouble? 121. LETTER TO KRISHNADAS JAJU

June 24, 1934

BHAJ JAJUJI,

I have your sweet letter.

In courtship there is necessarily some mental unchastity. In order to avoid this and the risk of an unsuitable choice being made in an impure state of mind, I have been placing on the parents the responsibility of making preliminary enquiries and selection. So far there has been no disadvantage in this method. Two sons of mine got married when they were around thirty. The brides of both were chosen by me in the first instance. And in the case of Devdas the initial choice was certainly his but as soon as the idea came to him he voluntarily confided in [me] and Rajagopalachari and made a proper and successful effort to satisfy us. When marriages are contracted by adults the fear of courtship is always there. This is a part of dharma itself and dharma literally means the choice between good and evil that a man has to make every moment. Your question implies another, that of co-education. I have doubts about girls and boys studying together, I have not yet formed any decisive opinion. As our experiment is only in its primary stage mistakes are bound to occur and imperfections there are. But the experiment is worth a trial. On the whole it appears to be worth while though we have had quite a few bitter experiences too. If you have anything more to ask in this connection, do so.

122. SPEECH AT DISTRICT LOCAL BOARD MEETING, POONA

Gandhiji congratulated the Board on their work, but wanted them to insist on quality. He was confident that the economic distress among Harijans and insanitation in Harijan quarters would speedily vanish, if only Local Boards and Municipalities satisfactorily discharged their duties towards Harijans. They must see that the Harijan children were properly taught in the preparatory schools, and teaching in their case meant at first not the three R’s so much as keeping their persons and clothes clean. They would do well to institute prizes to be won by teachers who best attended to their Harijan pupils. Then, again, Harijans were often not allowed to draw water from public wells, though they were legally entitled to do so. Wherever such was the case, they must help them to exercise their undoubted rights and, in the mean while, not leave them without water but construct special wells for them.

Harijan, 6-7-1934

123. INTERVIEW TO HARIJAN WORKERS

June 24, 1934

Gandhiji was with over 100 workers for one and a half hours and answered all sorts of questions with his usual patience. The central point of his answers was that the workers should settle in the villages and work both among savarna Hindus and Harijans.

A Harijan asked if it was right to encourage Harijan boys to become B. A. s or M. A. s, when unemployment was rife among graduates, and whether it would not be better if they took to technical education. Gandhiji replied that they could hardly expect Harijans to go in for industrial education before it had successfully appealed to the savarnas. And it was possible that, even if mere academic training was now no good for savarnas, it had its own value for Harijans. For instance, he had long thought Dr. Ambedkar to be a Brahmin. He was equal in intelligence and ability to the tallest among us. Such distinction had its undoubted use for Harijans. Gandhiji himself fully believed in industrial education and wished the numerous Harijan students would turn their attention to it. Harijan Sevak Sanghs could not force Harijans to such education. They had to encourage the academical side by side with the industrial. It was for the Harijans to preach the gospel of industrial training. He hoped Harijans would study the life and work of Booker T. Washington\(^1\), whom he looked upon as one of the great men of the world, and draw their inspiration from it.

As regards housing Harijans, Gandhiji said that perhaps there was not much to do in the case of village Harijans, and, as for city-dwelling Harijans, it was the duty of Municipalities to provide housing facilities for them; it was too big a proposition for the Harijan Sevak Sangh. The Municipalities if they were efficient and mindful of their duty, could solve the problem with very little expenditure.

On being asked how Harijans could assert their right to draw water from public wells, Gandhiji said they should, if necessary, seek police aid and the protection of courts of law for the purpose.

124. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, POONA

_June 24, 1934_

The public meeting in the evening was a remarkable function. Deputations from the various districts of Maharashtra presented Gandhiji with their respective purses, and then Gandhiji asked Shri Shankarrao Lavate, the well-known veteran public worker of Poona, who had come as a representative of the sanatanist opposition, to address the meeting. Shri Lavate said that he and his sanatanist colleagues desired removal of untouchability no less than Gandhiji himself, but they objected to legislation affecting the Hindu community as a whole being passed with the help of the votes of the Government as well as other communities.

Gandhiji congratulated Shri Lavate on his courtesy and extreme moderation and was sorry that the audience should have betrayed any impatience while he was addressing them, whereas etiquette required that they should hear speakers patiently and not interrupt them while they were speaking, Shri Lavate was a seasoned public worker. When he came to Poona in 1915, he was told that, if there was any true servant of the public in Poona, it was certainly Shri Lavate. When he saw him, he was put in mind of the _rishis_ of old. Everyone was aware of his services in the cause of prohibition. His regard for him was as profound as ever, though for the moment he happened to be arrayed in opposition to himself, and he was not so simple as not to give due consideration to the views of men like Shri Lavate. But he was afraid that Shri Lavate was labouring under a misunderstanding. In the course of the present tour, he had not only not canvassed votes for the Temple-entry Bill, but he had hardly ever referred to it at all, for he believed it was a technical problem which should be left for the lawyers to grapple with. He was certain that it was their duty to secure the passage of the Bill, as untouchability could not be abolished without flinging the temples open to Harijans. But he did not want the Bill to be placed on the statute book, unless a majority of the Hindu members of the Assembly were in favour of it. It would be sheer violence to get the Bill passed with the help of the Muslim or Christian votes. He assured Shri Lavate and the other sanatanist friends that their fears were groundless. He would be very glad, indeed, if the sanatanists in Poona could join the movement. Savarna Hindus in villages have been reported to compel Harijans to eat carrion and carry dead cattle against their will, and assault them if they dared to exercise their common right of drawing water from public wells. Why could not all join hands in dealing with such violent conduct? Not one shastri had quoted a single verse in support of such untouchability. He claimed to follow the Shastras as he knew them. He ever asked God to give him courage to die for Truth as he knew it. It was, therefore, that he called himself a sanatanist.

BHAJ VALLABHBHAI,

I tried my best but couldn’t write to you during the whole of the last week. Hoping that I would be able to write, I kept back even the girls’ letters.

Even today I am writing under great pressure. If I had sufficient time, I would fill pages. But now please be satisfied with what I can give.

I will go on doing all I can for Chandubhai. I will leave nothing undone. I am going to Gujarat only because it was necessary to tour it. Since I am going, I must collect for the Harijan Fund. You must have read about the decision I have announced. Merely watch for the present what is happening. Who knows what is for good and what for ill? All that we can hope for is that we shall always do what we think is for the best. I think what is happening is really for the best.

I hear that you have not been keeping well for some time, Do everything possible and improve your health. If necessary, ask for outside doctors to be called in. As you know, even a mother doesn’t serve unless the child asks for what it wants. Ask for anything which you are entitled to and get the nostrils cured.

I am afraid you may not have liked the resolution which was saw me. Let us see what happens now. There is such an infinite number of dust particles in the air that nobody can cleanse the air of them all. We may do the best we can and not worry about the result.

Cling to the principle that it is futile, even harmful, to think from there about what is happening outside and let not your peace of mind be disturbed.

Khurshedbehn and two other ladies are here. The former suffered much (in jail). Her health is better now. She is pining to go to the Frontier Province.

The assault on Parikshit is not a trivial matter for me. That there has been hardly any protest against it seems more terrible to me than the fact of the assault itself.

Ba has joined me. Her health is fairly good. She is quite happy.

Kanti is with Devdas. He is studying. His aspirations are noble indeed.

Velanbehn and Anandi are with me. My party has become quite a large one these days. I am thinking now whom I can send away.
Bablo is with Jivanji.

. . . has turned out to be a worthless man. He has again been guilty of the same kind of lapse, but he doesn’t seem to have realized its seriousness. I have now advised him to go to Rajkot. Narandas will stay there for the present. . . should stay there and do what he can. He has forfeited Jamnalalji’s trust. He doesn’t seem even to have kept the accounts properly.

Radha (Gandhi) has joined Prof. Karve’s school. I didn’t know about this at all. She arranged the business herself. She came and saw me yesterday. I couldn’t give her much time, though. Here also I get very little free time.

yesterday . . . was fairly seriously ill in Abu and is here now. He has come to discuss the arrangements with me. Swami will have to return to Bihar.

You must have read the news about Mirabehn. There is nothing more behind it. She suddenly felt that she herself should go and do something. I consented and she left. Her personality had become suppressed under me. I hope she will regain her former independence

132. STATEMENT ON BOMB INCIDENT

POONA,
June 25, 1934

I have had so many narrow escapes in my life that this newest one does not surprise me. God be thanked that no one was fatally injured by the bomb, and I hope that those who were more or less seriously injured, will be soon discharged from hospital.1

I cannot believe that any sane sanatanist could ever encourage the insane act that was perpetrated this evening. But I would like sanatanist friends to control the language that is being used by speakers and writers claiming to speak on their behalf. The sorrowful incident has undoubtedly advanced the Harijan cause. It is easy to see that causes prosper by the martyrdom of those who stand for them. I am not aching for martyrdom, but if it comes in my way in the prosecution of what I consider to be the supreme duty in defence of the faith I hold in common with millions of Hindus, I shall have well earned it, and it will be possible for the historian of the future to say that the vow I had taken before Harijans that I would, if need be, die in the attempt to remove untouchability was literally fulfilled.

Let those who grudge me what yet remains to me of this earthly existence know that it is the easiest thing to do away with my body. Why then put in jeopardy many innocent lives in order to take mine which they hold to be sinful? What would the world have said of us if the bomb had dropped on me and the party, which included my wife and three girls, who are as dear to me as daughters and are entrusted to me by their parents? I am sure that no harm to them could have been intended by the bomb-thrower.

I have nothing but deep pity for the unknown thrower of the bomb. If I had my way and if the bomb-thrower was known, I should certainly ask for his discharge, even as I did in South Africa in the case of those who successfully assaulted me.2 Let the reformers not be incensed against the bomb-thrower or those who may be behind him.

1 A bomb was thrown on what the assailant believed was the car carrying Gandhiji on his way to the Municipal Building. Gandhiji arrived at 7.30 p.m. little knowing what had occurred. When informed of the incident, he received the news calmly and agreed to the suggestion that the programme should be carried out. Accordingly the address was presented and Gandhiji left the hall at 8.30 p.m. This appeared under the title “Providence Again”.

June 26, 1934

I have had the kindest service from Shri Dinshaw Mehta and his staff during my 21 days’ fast and after. It was all voluntary labour. I believe him to be a sincere lover of his profession. He has passion for naturopathy. Being myself a believer in natural and simple remedies I am deeply interested in his experiments. He is at present in financial difficulty. The friend who has hitherto supported him liberally is unable to do so much longer. His minimum expenses are in round figure Rs. 3,000 per month. His loss is half that amount. He therefore wishes to make public appeal for funds. If the help forthcoming is large enough he would use the fund as an endowment. He keeps accounts which are open to inspection.

I gladly support the appeal and hope that it will meet with success.

134. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS OF INDIA

BOMBAY, June 26, 1934

No amount of violence intended to be done to me can possibly stop me from pursuing action which I consider to be wholly good.

Gandhiji was quite unperturbed by last night’s bomb incident in Poona, and dictated the interview to the Associated Press in his usual manner, cracking jokes frequently. He continued:

After all, what is happening in the case of untouchability is but a repetition of history. No reform worth the name has ever been accomplished without the reformer holding his life as a stake for his or her cause. If the Moloch of untouchability takes one life, it may be regarded as easy satisfaction. An agelong evil masquerading in the name of virtue cannot be removed without an adequate measure of sacrifice. I am a believer in the all-powerfulness of God. So long as He wants me in the present body for the cause, He will protect me from all harm, and when it has no use for Him not all the protection that earthly power can give me will be of the slightest avail.

Q. Do you think the opposition of sanatanists put up against the idea of presenting an address to you and the throwing of the bomb are indications that sanatanists are taking to violence?

GANDHIJI: I am not going to say that sanatanists indulge in violence because one person parading in the name of sanatanists wanted to do violence. I am not yet persuaded that sanatanists have organized themselves to oppose my activities by resorting to actual physical violence.

Q. Do you think activities carried on in Poona, Bihar and Orissa are an indication that sanatanist opposition to your anti-untouchability campaign is taking the shape of violence?

GANDHIJI: I am quite willing to admit that the activities that are carried on in Poona and elsewhere have influenced some excitable youths against me. When I returned to India in 1915, I had prophesied that if the bomb found a habitation in this land, no matter what the cause was, it would not be restricted to that cause alone. That prophecy has more than once proved to be true. I would like further, at this juncture, to drive the truth home that if we are following violence in thought and word, it must some day or other assume concrete form, and it is not capable of being restricted to what one may call a good cause alone.

It is absolutely wrong to say that if the motive is pure, the means are justified whatever they be. For realizing pure end means must be pure too.¹

Replying to a question as to what he thought was the reaction to the Working Committee resolution on the Communal Award and the subsequent events, he said:

I do not fear any split in Congress ranks.

Beyond this cryptic remark, the Mahatma refused to be drawn into any further discussion about the political situation.

135. SPEECH AT BARODA

Gandhiji, addressing the huge gathering, thanked the public of Baroda for presenting the purse of Rs. 1,000 for Harijan uplift.

I would rather wish that the Baroda people should contribute first to the fund of the distressed peasants of Gujarat started by Dr. Chandulal Desai and others and then as a bounden duty to remove the slur of untouchability, they should contribute to the Harijan Fund. I regret that I cannot stay here, tired and exhausted. The Maharaja Saheb Gaekwar has done a good deal for the uplift of Harijans and it is a slur on the Baroda public that the Secretary of the Gujarat Harijan Sevak Sangh Mr. Parikshitlal Majmudar is roughly handled by the police of a small village of the State. 137. DISCUSSION WITH HARIJAN WORKERS

AHMEDABAD,

Every worker placed before Gandhiji the work done so far in one’s own district. They also acquainted Gandhiji with manifold difficulties that beset their path in doing Harijan work, especially in villages. They also told him that digging wells for Harijans was a great problem and suggested that some special fund should be collected for the purpose.

Gandhiji did not like that a special fund should be collected for digging wells. They must scrutinize each application for a well, for it was their duty to give them water and all facilities possible. They must also accept whatever help was given them by sanatanists in any form. Their sole duty ought to make Harijans self-contained. Gandhiji said that they must work in villages and incessant propaganda would remove whatever obstacles lay in their way.

In reply to a question Gandhiji said that if the Harijan work of a particular village was not done by the Harijan Sevak Sangh or by its members actively, they must do it themselves, even as Government do the work of a Municipality if the latter does not do its function properly.

The number of reformers is daily increasing and the heart of people is also undergoing change towards their treatment to Harijans.

Sjt. Parikshitlal Majmudar . . . narrated the difficulties they were experiencing in their work of organizing wells for Harijans and the problems of collecting funds.

Gandhiji said that if they were earnest in their work, they could easily get funds.

In replying to a question of Sjt. Thakkar Bapa that organizing separate wells for Harijans was considered by some people as tantamount to perpetuating untouchability, Gandhiji said that it was not necessarily so, but in any case they cannot allow Harijans to die for want of water.

138. SPEECH AT WOMEN’S MEETING, AHMEDABAD

June 27, 1934

It is an auspicious thing for me that my public work in Ahmedabad in the Harijan cause begins with a women’s meeting. At many women’s meetings and some men’s meetings I have said, whenever I thought necessary, that not only in India but all over the world, religion has been and will be safeguarded by women. It was not, and is not, my intention to say that women have safeguarded religion by writing big treatises or delivering lectures. They have rather safeguarded religion by their actions. No religion has been propagated through lectures or books. We regard certain books as religious books; but they are a propagation of the thoughts and deeds of virtuous men and women. A work that is not backed by virtuous conduct, however beautiful the thoughts may be, cannot make a religious treatise. Nor can it bring us the peace that the scriptures do. When a confirmed liar says, ‘Speak the truth’, he fails to make any impression, although no one may have known that he ever uttered a lie. But the act of a person who is persistent in his virtuous ways is bound to bear fruit even if he is completely silent about it. If a live seed is sown in fertile soil, it is bound to sprout. The same is true about the words in religious books. I have said after due thought that women have done most to safeguard religion. Women’s capacity for sacrifice, suffering and patience cannot be found in man. This can be attributed to many causes. It is unnecessary to go into them here. But the world believes what I have said. That is why I am happy that my work here has begun with this function.

If you are convinced that untouchability is a social sin, you must strive hard to free yourself from that sin. It is not enough that someone like me should go round and collect funds. Behind my effort is the hope that I should be able to appeal to the hearts of women. It is only when this happens that I would be able to complete my work. The work would be partly done if I can appeal to the hearts of men. I went to give my condolences to Lady Lakshmibai in Bombay. What condolences could I give to her? I stressed only one point. I told her: ‘Give up your mourning and come out of the house. Mourning will bring no credit, but Harijan work will bring credit to your widowhood.’

Lakshmibai has worked for the eradication of untouchability. So, she told me: ‘You men may say anything. But can you do anything if we are obstinate?’ I had to plead guilty. ‘I know it by experience’—she added: ‘What would you do if a woman does not obey you—a husband or father? We women know only to say no. And, are you men going to be in the house for all the twenty-four hours? You may instruct us to do something and go out; but how would you know later if we did not carry it out?’ What she said was absolutely true. That is why I say that my work can be carried out only if I appeal to the hearts of women. Men tell me: ‘We do wish to give up untouchability. But to you wish to create domestic quarrels? We are willing to have Harijans in our houses. But what can we do if those who are in the house for all the twenty-four hours would not allow them?’ So, if women realize that untouchability is a sin and has to be wiped out, men would not be able to hold fast to it. It is beyond the powers of men. This is the experience of most men.

That is why I want to firmly impress upon you women, that let any number of Brahmins and astrologers talk to you, you should firmly bear in mind that if you are good mothers, you would not discriminate between one child and another. On the contrary, you would shower more affection on a dull, stupid and crippled child. I have never known a mother who would cast off a stupid child and lavish her affection on an intelligent child. Such a mother, if there is one, should be scorned. At least I would do that. A mother is bound to show more affection for her handicapped child. If we men and women who are images of clay have such sense of justice regarding our children and pay more attention to the crippled, how would God who has created us, who is our Father, who is Father of all fathers, who is the Father of the universe, the Creator of the entire living world, have a different sense of justice? My reason does not accept that it is God’s will that the Harijans should be boycotted, that they should not be allowed to take water from wells and tanks, that they should not be allowed to enter temples, and that temples would be defiled if they entered them, and any fruit or bread, it touched by them, should be thrown away. This is sheer superstition. We do not find such a thing in Islam or Christianity. Only Hinduism has specialized in regarding these people as worse than animals. We give good water and food to cows and buffaloes, but to these people we give only our left-over food, and that too, we throw at them from a distance for fear of touching them. We do not feel ashamed of doing so. We believe that those people are born to be so treated.

This is such an obvious thing that we can easily see it if we wish to. Those who consider themselves sanatanists do not let us step in at all. They tell us that the untouchables are untouchables by birth and we would incur sin by touching them. I do not wish to say that such a thing is not to be found anywhere else in the world. Such a thing exists even in America; but there is no pretence of religion about it. My complaint against the Hindu men and women is that they indulge in such a thing in the name of religion. If you tell me that it is adharm to touch a Harijan, I would ask, ‘From where did you get the idea?’ I have not come across a single shastri who has established on the testimony of the Shastras that untouchability as practised today ever existed before. I have studied our scriptures fairly well and have found in them no mention of untouchability as it is practised today. I do not wish to discuss what sort of untouchability has a place in the Shastras. I say that this untouchability of today should be wiped out. Once we realize that it is sheer injustice, it is adharm, we shall be able to bring about her quickly all the reforms we desire.

I have dealt with these things to indicate what I expect from you. You must study this subject. Do whatever is not beyond your capacity. Serving the Harijan when the time arises is within the capacity of everyone. It is not enough to give money for them. We must believe that they are not untouchables but are just like us. Had they been untouchables by birth, instead of two eyes they would be having three eyes or one ear instead of two, or God would have put some such mark on them. But God has not given them any such mark. If there is a Harijan girl in our midst, we would not be able to make her out at first sight from others.

Anyone who does not consider untouchability a sin need not put even a cowrie into this bag. He who considers it a sin should give whatever he can and make expiation. We would know that a particular lady has put a coin in the bag and the following day we would take some service from her. You have shown your sympathy by parting with a coin. It may as well be said that you have given your co-operation. Later when you meet women in your neighbourhood they would perhaps abuse you and be rude to you, but face it and tell them that what they are doing is not dharma but adharma.

140. DISCUSSION WITH GUJARAT SWADESHI SANGH WORKERS

Ahmedabad, June 28, 1934

For the purpose of this Institution (All-India Swadeshi Sangh), swadeshi shall cover useful articles wholly manufactured in this country, through small industries which require for their existence continuous education of public opinion in their favour, and which will accept directions issued by the Board of this institution, as to the price of articles manufactured by them, and wages and welfare of the labour under their control. Such swadeshi will, therefore, exclude articles manufactured through large and organized industries which are able to take care of themselves and which can command State protection without popular aid.

Explaining his definition Gandhiji said that his definition was such as required no change. He said that the lines on which swadeshi movement is conducted at present has made us voluntary agents of big manufactures, and this has resulted in their neglecting home industries.

Gandhiji was therefore of the opinion that big manufactures do not require any stimulus from them and his definition was framed with a view to removing unemployment.

In reply to a question whether raw material which could not be procured from India should be imported or not, Gandhiji replied in the affirmative and said he would certainly ask to import such raw materials as are not available in India.

142. SPEECH AT MILL-HANDS’ MEETING,

AHMEDABAD

June 29, 1934

After a long time I have been able to meet you in such large numbers and for this I am grateful to God and consider myself fortunate. I thank you for the address which has just been read out and for the purse of Rs. 5001 for the Harijan work. You have stated the truth [in your address] that you are quite well off compared to

1 The source had reported: “This definition was found by some of the workers as not entirely practicable, and the Gujarat Swadeshi Sangh suggest a change in the definition which should be: ‘Goods which are manufactured in India in all its stages, and under the direction of the Management with labour and capital 75 per cent Indian, with Indian material as far as possible, shall be considered as swadeshi. But in manufacture of goods, yarn—cotton, silk and woollen—should necessarily be Indian.’” Vide also pp. 87-9.
other Harijans. You have some money and gradually you are getting more and more educational facilities. There are other Harijans who are considered lower than those who have contributed to this fund which means that there exists untouchability within untouchability. I congratulate you on admitting that you have given this money as an atonement for that sin. But please do not you believe that having atoned and having given this purse, you have acquired a right to consider yourselves superior and regard other Harijans as lower than you. There are some people who are found atoning for their sins in this manner. There are many who believe that once they visit the temple and offer rice, betel-nut and money, they are entitled to commit sins. There are also people who believe that sins can be committed and atoned for daily just as clothes get dirty every day and are washed daily. It is therefore wrong if you have given these five thousand rupees as a passport for committing sin. One who makes atonement should not consider others lower than himself. I will show you an easy way of putting this in practice. One must consider oneself lowest [in the world], that is to say that there can be no one lower than oneself. We are ultimately bound to suffer degradation if we consider ourselves higher than others and this would mean that we have not done away with untouchability. Those who have given money should make their atonement complete by removing the feeling of high and low among the sub-castes like sweepers, scavengers, tanners, etc. The caste Hindus who consider themselves higher than others, are also responsible. It is because they preached untouchability that it has spread to every home. It is only when we ourselves get rid of the feelings of high and low, that we shall be able to do away with whatever ill-feeling there is between the various communities and religions. The reasons for the bitterness among the Hindus, Muslims, Parsis, Christians, etc., are not to be found outside, but can be traced to the feeling of high and low and the sense of exclusiveness prevailing among them. The leaves of a tree, even though separate, are all the same. They are not different; similarly, even if we differed in our thoughts and beliefs, different views do not matter if there is no exclusiveness, no feeling of high and low. The campaign for the ending of untouchability is intended to bring this home to all.

Here, the trade union workers have been working very hard for your sake. They think about your comforts night and day. I do not find anywhere else the activities which I find in Ahmedabad. It is true that I have not stayed long in other places. No sooner I reach a place than I leave it for another. I have not been able to identify myself with activities elsewhere as I have been able to do with yours. It is possible that your activities appear great to me because I know all about them. I believe that the labour-welfare activity in Ahmedabad is the best of all. But do you take any advantage of it? If not, it is as good as wasted. I have just returned from Kalyanagram. The houses there are beautiful and clean. Their alleys and courtyards are also clean. I have never stayed in a house cleaner than theirs; nor do I stay in one. I had not expected more than what I found. [But if you are not careful] you will undo all that has been done. If, in spite of living in good houses, we neglected our body, our soul which dwells in it for all the twenty-four hours is sure to be ruined. And then, what use can we make of solid brick-houses? For a long time I have had a quarrel with you over giving up liquor. Yet, all of you have not given it up. If we look at the history of the liquor-shops, it would be known that the most frequent visitors are the industrial workers. They spend too much and then face financial difficulties. They spend money to lose their senses. A drunkard behaves like a mad man, he becomes a lunatic. You must therefore get over this thing.

Many Harijans eat carrion. Here you cannot justify it. Here you get ghee, milk and vegetables. In spite of that you eat carrion. How shameful it is! Nowhere in the world can one eat carrion and yet be considered civilized. You are considered civilized. The ancient Hindu dharma is yours. How can you be so barbaric? It is not proper for you to squander money. You must educate your children. You have a long way to go. You and your children must eat nourishing food. Children cannot do without milk. You should not be satisfied by giving them gruel. Children can never be brought up that way. Use your money where the need is real. You would be rewarded. The children would be healthy and strong, they would be good and would earn more. They would be happy themselves and so would you be. You would have added to the wealth of India and the world. Learn to make different kinds of [useful] things. Who would then dare to insult you by looking upon you as Harijans, or untouchables? I have said that all troubles would be ended if the Harijans really become men of God, acquire qualities befitting their name. A person like me would have to qualify himself to become a Harijan. Let the caste Hindus also become Harijans. In this yajna of purification the caste Hindus have to be reformed. They have to do penance. You too have a contribution to make. You have to get rid of your bad habits. Keep your houses clean. Sunshine and light are necessary both for body and mind. Do not pollute the air. Keep your houses, courtyards and alleys clean. I was glad to see that you have planted trees in front of your houses. These houses will be yours ultimately. You acquire more and more ownership over the houses with every payment of periodical rent. If you save money and pay rent, the houses will be yours after a specified time—there is a scheme to that effect.

I congratulate you on presenting a hand-written address to me. A printed sheet has been distributed here which you must read. The communist friends have criticized me in it. I can only say that it is written out of misunderstanding. If those on whose behalf this leaflet has been issued examine it, they would find that what is stated there is not correct. It says that I am a friend of capitalists. But my activities do not include the exploitation of labourers by capitalists. I have become a labourer ever since my stay in South Africa...¹

The first question of this friend is: What did I do when the labourers at Bombay, Sholapur, Kanpur and other places were in trouble? What did I do when there was firing on the workers in Bombay? I must reply to this question. I am not God. I am a labourer like you. Regarding your question as to what I did for the labourers I can only say that I employed a part of my capacity for the benefit of labourers. If I possess greater powers as a human being, I am willing to put them to use. Previously in Bombay I had a talk with the workers. I did that even this time. On the occasion to which this friend has referred, I had prevailed upon the labourers who had come and told me of their requirements that I must at least know why they needed money. I can only advise them. I have no power to carry out all my wishes. I must know the cause of the strike. If the workers are suffering due to some fault of theirs, the remedy is that they should set their own house in order. All my life I have done nothing without knowing why. I do not have any money of my own. I have to ask others for it. Hence, I must know the purpose for which money is needed. I have tried to reach the workers everywhere. I have talked to workers who have come to me. Even at Nagpur where the strike was going on, labour leaders met me.

This friend has asked me what I had done about the Government action in the matter. I do not say anything on the activities of the Government. You would certainly not expect me to break my vow. For this year I have chalked out for myself the programme of Harijan work. That is why I talk about the Harijan work, and that too, without criticising Government policies. I must abide by the pledge I have taken. The pledge has not been taken keeping you or the Government as witness but with God as witness. I am like a person inside a prison. And so, I can pursue one activity alone. Except on this I must observe silence. I am now doing the work which I could have done from the prison. That is the reason why I do not wish to say anything about the Government policies. If I did that I would be violating my pledge.

I cannot spare enough time from Harijan work to read newspapers or study other activities. I have no quarrel with the communists. At the most I can have a difference of opinion. Nevertheless, I wish I can explain to them my view and win them over. Wherever there is a difference of opinion, they are welcome to have their own view. Similarly, they have to permit me to have mine. May be, they will win me over some day. I have been serving the working class for the past fifty years. Throughout I have had only one aim. Though I have associations and friendship with the capitalists, I work in the interest of the working class. I believe the workers would gain nothing by liquidating the capitalists. It is not my intention to persuade the workers to follow the path of the capitalists. In a sense, even the workers are capitalists. Why should they believe that money alone and not labour is an asset. Capital is formed only through the working class. Money has no value in the desert of Sahara. One cannot get water there without one’s own labour. There a labourer is a capitalist. The workers are as good as capitalists if they are organized and are intelligent. Capital consists in money for one and labour for the other. People do not know how to use and accumulate capital. Crores of rupees lying scattered in several places will not make capital. It becomes capital only when it is pooled together and invested intelligently. The same applies to labour. A union of a lakh of workers who have intelligently come together can do much than accumulated wealth. Those who realize this, will not be envious of capital in the form of money. They would ensure that the capital is properly utilized. At the moment there is rivalry between the two kinds of capital. Both the workers and the moneyed people are capitalists. Those people have organized themselves, whereas you have not been able to do so. Those people are clever and intelligent. When the workers are better organized and more self-sacrificing, their power would grow. You are not conscious of your strength and therefore you are oppressed. This causes harm to you and to the world at large.

I wish well to the workers. I believe that the workers can gain nothing for themselves by liquidating the capitalists.
If the capitalists are liquidated, we would be liquidated too. Both should unite in amity. We would need gold and silver bricks too. The important thing is that we should know how to put all these to good use. This is the conflict between the proper and the improper use of capital. Both the classes will benefit if we learn how to make good use of capital. I cannot change this view of mine, for it is based on my experience of fifty years. You may do whatever you think is right, and in your interest.

143. SPEECH TO JYOTI SANGH MEMBERS, AHMEDABAD

Asked for advice as to what the little girls in front of him should do, Gandhiji said that they must see the labourers’ chawl in the Gujarat Cotton Mills and understand the life of labourers. They must enter into the Harijans’ lives and reject sweets and finery for themselves, at least until the latter had sufficient food and decent clothing. Let the girls go into that dark world as light-bearers.

He would suggest that they must put on khadi, which was the only real swadeshi cloth. They must use things manufactured by millions and not by half a dozen people. And they must take to spinning, for, if millions of girls did it only for half an hour every day, they would add considerably to the wealth of the nation. They need not wait for others to do this service, but must make a beginning themselves, in the faith that their numbers would swell later into thousands and millions.

Harijans constituted the lowest strata or the foundation of society, and if they were neglected, society would topple down like a house of cards. On the other hand, if the foundation was well attended to, they need not worry much about the superstructure.

He was glad to note that the association was mainly run by women, typifying their desire not to accept any inferior or slavish position for women. He hoped they had no intention of importing into India the movement for making women absolutely independent of men, which was out of keeping with Indian culture and was bound to do us untold harm. Socially men and women were inseparable members, one of another, supplying one another’s deficiencies. Women were dubbed the ‘weaker vessel’, being physically weaker than men, but spiritually they were superior to men. Men were proud of their brute force, but women need not mind their inferiority in that respect.

An association of women started by Mridula Sarabhai and run mainly by women with a view to creating interest in public life among women and giving them training in home industries and crafts so as to increase their earning capacity. The speech is extracted from “Weekly Letter”.

muscular body and a great soul went ill together. They must not confound real health with crude physical development. Women’s inferiority complex only prevented them from going out alone fearlessly even at midnight, which they could do if they had the same fire of purity burning in their hearts as Sita had. If they realized this, they would concentrate on exercising their souls more than bodies and cultivate soul-force and courage rather than learn to use the dagger or the revolver, which would only furnish their enemy with a weapon. No one on earth could suppress anyone else. Oneself was one’s best friend or worst enemy. He would certainly like them to take physical exercise, but his point was that it was useless in the absence of moral courage.

_Harijan_, 13-7-1934

144. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, AHMEDABAD

_June 29, 1934_

You have been able to collect from Ahmedabad nearly Rs. 32,000 for Harijan work. Out of this amount you have given me a _hundi_ for Rs. 25,000. The accounts of the money received from other parts of Gujarat were read out to me. I have also heard that 1,289 pice have been received from Balubhai’s school. The significance of that collection is that one girl student took an independent stand and said, ‘‘I shall not give even a pie.’’ No one has spoken ill of that girl, nor criticized her. I would like to send my congratulations to that girl. I would not like to have even a single pice from those people who are not willing to regard untouchability as a sin and end it. Eradication of untouchability means change of heart on the part of the caste Hindus. If we can bring about that change of heart from this place by just praying to God, no money would be needed at all. And if it is needed it should come to us right at our doorstep. That is the law of nature or God. To bring it about we have to strive so hard and a person like me in old age has to go about from place to place—all this means that my capacity to pray is limited. I would have been able sitting at home to convert the hearts of the caste Hindus, had my capacity to pray or in other words my personal purity been so great. But that is a state of perfection. We human beings are all imperfect. Hence, we have got to make efforts according to our capacity. In such an effort lies the key for attaining the state of perfection. We may be eager but not able to reach that state. That is why I have to influence you as best as I can by going round, giving talks and awakening your religious sense. Only that money which you have given under such influence, or by way of expiation, would bear fruit. It would serve no purpose if the caste Hindus have given the money for my imagined political services or out of a sense of obligation to the fund-raiser. Even a lakh of rupees given that way would bring no result. That is exactly why I congratulated that girl who did not contribute her pice. For the same reason I congratulate those who have not given money. Those who give me money even while cherishing the idea of untouchability in their hearts would be deceiving me. I would expect work from the people who give money and what a sad plight it would be if I don’t get it!

This brings me to the contribution for the farmers. When the question came before me I sent word that I must go to Gujarat, and, if I did, I must raise the fund for Harijans. Contributions would be accepted only from those who give in a spirit of atonement. The persons seeking expiation will no doubt fulfil the other moral obligations which may come to them. Funds are urgently needed for the farmers. This obligation will not be always there. It is *apaddharma*¹ and an urgent one. First contribute for them as much as you can and then give to the Harijan fund. Let it be just a pice, I would be satisfied with it. If we covert the pice thus collected into rupees it would be a big amount. Such a contribution would be more valuable than this sum of Rs. 32,000. There is no limit to the Harijan Fund. If given in the spirit of atonement a crore of rupees would be welcome and equally so crores of pice. Otherwise, even a billion of rupees would be of no use.

Why should I not complain against Ahmedabad? I had settled in Ahmedabad. I have drunk deep of the affection of the citizens of Ahmedabad. And so, however much you do, I would always feel it is not enough. How wonderful it would be if all the mill-owners of Ahmedabad consider themselves the insurers for anything that may happen in Gujarat and they would donate generously for any worthy cause or institution? From where would they give that money? If they decide to do so out of their earnings, we will never be in difficulty. The well-to-do people should never say that because there are many funds, they could not contribute to all of them. One can only wait for the auspicious day when the call comes. I do not know what is the mill-owners’ contribution to this purse. I do not want to run them down. They do give but I want to squeeze more out of them. Though a fallen city now, Bombay has kept its reputation alive. Those who cannot get money from any place, get it from Bombay. The credit goes mainly to the Parsi community. Why should Ahmedabad not earn such a reputation? Why can’t its pursestrings be loosened for the deserving? God will replenish the amount. That is what I wish to tell the mill-owners and the rich.

I cannot help mentioning a couple of things I noticed in the Harijan colony yesterday. What did I see there? On the one side, due to the efforts of the people of Ahmedabad, I saw a good chawl like Pritampara and on the other I saw the slums—which would beat the slums of Bombay and Poona. How strange that these things can persist in Ahmedabad after so much work has been done here? Ahmedabad is the city of Sardar. How can such a thing be allowed in Sardar’s Ahmedabad? It is in the hands of the mill-owners. No human being can live in the chawl I visited, even then how do these labourers live? They do not live there like human beings but like animals, and even that at the cost of their health. He who lives at the cost of this health does not lead a human life. One who lives like a human being grows in his mind and soul. Harijans are not doing that. I appeal to the mill-owners, the Municipality and the citizens that they should not tolerate such conditions even for a moment. You will say that it is easier said than done. From the testimony of modern history we can say that there is nothing which cannot be attained by human effort. I cannot cite all the instances, but one I must. In the city of Johannesburg in South Africa, the plague broke out in the Location where our people were staying. Promptly the Location was locked up, police watchmen were posted and people were removed to a place thirteen miles away. There in a couple of days they set up a tented village on beautiful land, and all people were accommodated in it. The condition of that Location was better than this chawl. And yet, while describing it, I had called it hell. If that was hell, what I saw yesterday was a greater hell. After removing the people thirteen miles away from that Location, setting up shops there and providing other conveniences, the Location was destroyed and all the things were burnt. Compensation was given to those whose belongings were burnt. I had even complained that the compensation was very little. Please do not tell me, ‘Johannesburg is a mine of gold and where does Ahmedabad stand in comparison with it?’ There are so many mills in Ahmedabad and the chawls I am speaking of belong to these mills. Money spent in it would be rewarded. We must resolve that the Harijans by whose labour we are able to maintain cleanliness in the houses and palaces leading a life of luxury should have at least for them not slums but well-ventilated and well-lit houses which are conducive to health. If enough citizens resolve, this work can be done in a week. I have told you how it can be done. There are so many men and women volunteers here. Doctors like Dr. Hariprasad have worked hard for the Ahmedabad Municipality. Even though he is in Ootacamund, he is thinking of this same problem. Balubhai has already told you this. He wrote to me too: ‘I feel sorry that I am not there right now. I am going to do at least this much work.’ He has now become the Chairman of the Sanitation Committee. Hence, I have now a right to demand work from him. Ahmedabad would be committing a great crime if we cannot keep the Harijans in good condition in spite of the favourable circumstances. In 1915 I went round with Mr. Ewbank to see these chawls. There is some improvement since then but it is just a drop in the ocean. There should not be a single person in Ahmedabad who would lose his health by living in unhealthy surroundings. If we can reach the most downtrodden classes of the society, we shall be able to reach the others.

There are some here who are considered expert sanatanists. There would be none among them who would say that he hesitates to do this work. I would not ask a single pice for this purse from those sanatanists who do not regard untouchability as a sin. But it does not mean that I would not take their money for the houses of the Harijans. If I take money from the Parsis, Muslims and Christians, why not from the sanatanists? I would not take any money for this purse from those Hindus who do not give it in the spirit of atonement but let them at least build chawls for the Harijans. Our scriptures do not tell us to keep the Harijans in the condition of animals. The scriptures give no evidence of the untouchability we observe today. A certain type of untouchability is observed all over the world. We should not touch a dirty man. But we have turned six crores of men into slaves. We have considered them untouchables by birth. Where is the evidence for it in the sacred books? It is the dharma of all of us, the Hindus, Muslims, Christians and Parsis to see that no one in Ahmedabad is forced to live in unhealthy conditions. Go and visit for yourselves the places which I have seen. You will have to hold your handkerchiefs to your noses. You will have first-hand knowledge of the pitiable conditions in which the Harijans are living. I fail to understand how we have borne it so long. Do take up this matter in right earnest and deal with it immediately.

MY DEAR CHILD,

Though I often get up at 2 a.m. I do not overtake my correspondence. There is just time to send you a card of love on your birthday. I know I owe the box spinning-wheel to the children. My love and kisses to them. Mira felt the impulse all of a sudden and went.

Gandhiji was questioned why he welcomed the formation of the Socialist Party within the Congress while objecting to its programme. Gandhiji replied that on examining the programme he found that certain items of the programme could be modified.

Regarding the question of class struggle, Gandhiji agreed that in the present stage of society class struggle did exist. If class struggle implied violence it was certainly against the Congress creed.

Socialists retorted that they did accept non-violence out of political expediency.

Gandhiji had no objection to such an idea of non-violent class struggle, and he would support Congressmen participating in such a struggle.

Regarding the well-known Gandhiji-Jawahar correspondence they had fundamental difference between them. His agreement to a certain extent with the idea of divesting of vested interests did not mean confiscation of property.

Regarding the recent Bombay resolution of the Working Committee, Gandhiji said that it did not refer to bona-fide non-violent socialists, but to those who talk about violently overthrowing the present capitalist order and confiscation of property.

Gandhiji admitted that the State must regulate the use of property in a wise and just manner. He visualized a State where such private profiteering inequities could not exist. Their programme should be educative and organizing of masses. Regarding their duties and rights and privileges, if this meant development of class consciousness Gandhiji would not fight shy of the term, if masses organize and take charge of State for the attainment of the socialism he had in view. He would welcome such a consummation.

Gandhiji believed in true democracy based on functional adult franchise.

I would certainly be glad if Congress socialists gather strength and take over charge of the Congress.

149. DISCUSSION WITH KATHIWAR YOUTHS

Asked why he had not put up in Harijan Ashram, Gandhiji said he was at present out to convert savarna Hindus, and it was his duty not only to accept but even seek their invitations.

One of the young men questioned the propriety of Gandhiji taking such a large party with him on tour. Gandhiji is careful of the pennies and he is still more careful of the pounds. When he throws letters into the waste-paper basket, he is careful to save the pins and the blank half-sheets. And he is naturally still more punctilious when expenditure of large sums of money is in question. He said some members of the party were travelling at their own expense, and the rest had their expenses paid by a friend. No charge whatever was made on the Harijan funds. Being a born teacher, he carried some friends with him to be trained as apprentices. He required the assistance of others in his own work, while still others were like the blind teats of the goat, which also he tried to milk as best he might. A Kathiawari Bania as he was, he might fairly be expected to account to himself for every pie he spent.

Referring to a description of himself in another question as a defeated General, Gandhiji said he did not know what it was to be defeated.

Questioned if he was opposed to veth (forced labour) and, if yes, what should be done to get it abolished, Gandhiji said his whole life had been dedicated to the purpose of doing away with veth—first in the family, then in South Africa and later on in the mother country. If veth was imposed on the poor, servants of the public must take it upon themselves.

Another question related to the menace of artificial methods of birth-control which has now invaded India. Gandhiji said that the national physique was half ruined as it was, and its ruin would be complete if they were foolish enough to copy such questionable practices.

Did they stand to lose anything if religion was destroyed, was one more poser. Gandhiji answered that religion was the foundation upon which the world edifice was supported, and it would be dashed to the ground if the foundation was undermined.

The last question was whether they should not abolish the institution of the States. Gandhiji said that as a satyagrahi he sought not to destroy but to transmute them into instruments of service. There was nothing intrinsically bad about the institution itself.¹

Replying to other questions Gandhiji said that he had already established institutions wherein youths could work, but it was not his fault if they allowed themselves to die and that Kathiawari youths merely wanted to talk and did not want to do serious work. If they were not satisfied with his programme of khadi and untouchability, he said they could better start new programmes and new institutions.

I want to fight a non-violent battle. If you are interested you work with me or else find out a new programme for yourselves.

In answer to other questions, Gandhiji said he never believed that he was defeated in his fight. Had they ever heard a defeated man being welcomed in such a way and travelling at this old age for Harijan work with such zeal?

150. SPEECH TO HARIJANS, BHAVNAGAR

June 1, 1934

In the afternoon Gandhiji visited the Vankarvas near Ruvapari. This quarter is far from the city, so that the *vankars*² do not receive adequate police protection and are put to considerable inconvenience in the pursuit of their occupations, as well as in their dealings with the city. It has long been under contemplation to remove this quarter to a more commodious site, and it may be hoped that the matter would be expedited, and the removal carried out at an early date. The vankars should also be invested with occupancy rights in the land they built upon, so that they might no longer be liable to be shifted from place to place. If a good locality is selected for Harijan quarters, Harijans will learn to observe the laws of cleanliness, as they will come in close with the savarnas. But the Harijans, too, owe a duty to themselves. If they give up liquor and carrion and keep their person, clothes and surroundings clean, they will help the reformer to break down the barrier which now divides them from the rest of the community.

151. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, BHAVNAGAR

_July 1, 1934_

I thank you for the purse that you have given for Harijan work on behalf of Kathiawar. We have so very little faith in Harijan work, and especially in such work among Kathiawaris, that even the resolve to collect Rs. 25,000 seemed very big to you. You thought you would hardly be able to collect that much and, if you fell short, a few of you would add three or four thousand each and thus you hoped to collect Rs. 30,000 in all. That seems a very big amount to you and that is why you have applauded it. I am not much impressed. You must have thought poorly of the contributions from other cities of Kathiawar when the figures were read out to you. Only Rs. 203 from Wankaner? And that too was not from all the people. Only two or three persons had contributed that sum. The same is the case with Morvi. There are so many first-class States in Kathiawar, and innumerable other States too. Nor are kathiawaris beggers. They are an enterprising people and are spread out in many parts. But those who approach them for contributions do so with diffidence, and, therefore, the others also feel disinclined to give. We rarely come across people who offer contributions on their own. What is Rs. 30,000 compared to the importance of Harijan work? It is true that even if we had collected three lakhs, money alone would not have been enough for eradicating untouchability. For that the hearts of caste Hindus have to be touched. Only then would that demon perish. Those who look upon untouchability as God cannot but worship it. It will perish in no time if the hearts of such people change. Its end is bound to come even in spite of them, but Hindu dharma or caste Hindus will not get credit for

116  THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
it. When Harijans themselves are so awakened that they would not tolerate their present condition even for a moment, untouchability is bound to disappear. But we shall not get credit for that. We have, therefore, to accomplish the Herculean task of humbly reasoning with those who worship untouchability and convincing them that it is no God but a demon. If we can do this much, we shall progress in our aim. Wherever I go, I meet sanatanists and try to reason with them. I know that there are sanatanists in Bhavnagar too. There is nothing surprising in this. Can there be any place without sanatanists? I knew something about the sanatanists of Bhavnagar because a leaflet was published by them and some literature was sent to me too. I always tell the sanatanists to think over what I say. I will come to that point later.
At the moment I wish to put forward the sanatanists’ case before the reformers. If the latter believe that they are superior to the sanatanists because they had awakened while the sanatanists were still sunk in darkness, they would not be able to melt their hearts. I have good reason for saying this, if or sanatanists have complained to me. They ask me: ‘‘Why should we come to you? If we came, reformist newspapers would hold us up for ridicule. They would distort what we might have said and put into our mouths statements we had never made. And if we do not come, we stand condemned. They will then say: ‘See, they did not go. How could they go when they had no case?’’ It is not that all news-papers are doing this, but there is some truth in what these people say. Some newspapers do misrepresent them.
Reformers may feel, having cited a few verses from the Manusmriti, that they had scored a victory over the sanatanists, but victory cannot be won in this way. As we increasingly realize the greatness of the task, we should become ever more humble and should even feel greater respect for the sanatanists. Why feel respect for them, you will ask. A great many of them are hypocrites, and do evil in the name of religion. I have already referred to this at some places. But hypocrisy will always go on in the world. But neither I nor the reformers believe that every sanatanist is a hypocrite. Many of the sanatanists sincerely believe that untouchability as it is practised today should continue, otherwise there would be confusion of varnas. It is difficult for people to give up things which they have been practising for a long time.
This is true of untouchability. Moreover, we have practised it as dharma. Hence I request the reformers not to malign sanatanists.
Argue your case with them, but do not forsake gentleness, moderation and humility while doing so.
I want to put one important and simple point before the sanatanists. The sanatanist \textit{shastris} have not been able to reply to my argument that untouchability in its modern form has no sanction in any Hindu Shastra. No one has justified it. Many sanatanists forget this term ‘modern’. I had once occasion to discuss the problem with very learned \textit{shastris}. They intentionally asked me about this word ‘modern’. I said that some sort of untouchability was practised all the world over and that we, too, had been observing it. We may not touch a dirty person or a man who was smelling of liquor. How can we touch him? If we tried, the foul smell from his mouth would throw us reeling back several feet away. This sort of untouchability can be practised even as between mother and son. But this modern form of untouchability is a demon with not twenty but a thousand arms. It keeps far away from us five to six crores of people. If you ask what this modern untouchability is, I would reply, if the President of your Municipality and Pattanisaheb would forgive me, that it is what we see in the Bhangi quarters of Bhavnagar. New quarters for them were to be built within three years. But Pattanisaheb told the Municipality today to demolish the old quarters and build new ones immediately, and offered Rs. 30,000 for the purpose. The President has agreed. I should not, therefore, criticize them. If, however, you wish to see modern untouchability, visit those quarters tomorrow morning. Go a little further also. You need not go anywhere outside Bhavnagar. Visit the weavers’ quarters and see how they live. They were born untouchables and will remain so till their death! If in this State a weaver’s son wants to study, he can do so and join a school or college. The State may even give him free education or the Harijan Sevak Sangh may help him, and after completing his studies he may be appointed a judge. But he would still remain an untouchable! We would go to him for justice, but we would take a bath if he happened to touch us. We deal out such perverted justice to six crores in the name of untouchability. Shall I show you still further what modern untouchability means? The \textit{Manusmriti} does not define an ‘untouchable’. Or let us say the Government’s Census Report is our \textit{Manusmriti} in this respect. You have decided those born untouchables will remain so all their life. But the Census Report says that there can be a change in their status. Every ten years when the census is made, a great many people cease to be untouchables and many others become untouchables. This is modern untouchability!

There may be some sanatanists here in this meeting. If they do not know the Shastras, let them go to others learned in them and tell them that I want them to show me if there is any sanction for modern untouchability in the Shastras. I do not say this out of pride. I have studied the Shastras and have found in them no sanction for untouchability. I am not a pandit. My knowledge of Sanskrit is very limited. I have to take the help of translations and commentaries. I, therefore, do not claim to be learned in the Shastras. I cannot argue about their meanings. When I was asked to do so, I replied that I was a simple man and could not argue about the meanings of the Shastras, and that it was for them to explain them to me. I claim to be a votary of truth, and I wish to die trying to discover it, and pray to God to give me such strength. Such a man is telling you that you have no sanction for this modern form of untouchability in the Shastras. If anyone can show the contrary and if I feel that it is true, then I would readily admit it. I have written and explained a number of times how I interpret the meaning of the Shastras. If a teacher is not able to know the limitations of a student, or a man of knowledge those of an inquirer, then no heartbond can be established between them. Sanatanists, therefore, should understand my limitations.

I have explained to the reformers how they should be gentle and humble towards the sanatanists, and I have asked the latter to understand what I am doing. There is also the bug-bear of temple-entry. I have not thrown open any temple without the consent of the public, and that too of the temple-going public. I did not include the votes of Arya Samajists, Harijans and those who did not believe in temples. I counted the votes of those who visited temples with sincere faith and threw open the temples only after ascertaining their support. I have thrown open many temples in that manner and have received no complaints for having done so. I see nothing wrong in throwing open temples thus. So far as it lies in my power, I would not let a temple be thrown open if people going to that particular temple did not wish it and at present reformers do listen to me. I do not want even the Temple-entry Bill which has been introduced in the Central Legislative Assembly if the Hindu members of the Assembly do not accept it. I do not want the Bill to be passed forcibly. I consider myself a sanatanist. I want to get the Bill passed in a manner consistent with this claim. I do not take votes about the Bill in public meetings because it involves subtleties of Shastras and law. The common man cannot understand them. It is such a complicated matter that only lawyers and shastris can understand it. I believe I possess the ability to simplify a complicated problem and explain it to the common man, but I do not find it possible to do so in the case of this Bill. That is why I have not taken votes in any meeting regarding the pros and cons of the Bill. Of course the common man can decide whether or not such a Bill should be passed. Representatives of the Hindu community had, on behalf of the community, taken a pledge in Bombay in September 1932 that henceforth they would not recognize the practice of untouchability in Hindu society. It was also stated in that resolution that Harijans had equal rights with the caste Hindus in regard to the use of wells and dhamashalas and access to public institutions, including public temples. It was further stated in it that when we got power in our hands we would pass legislation to this effect and would do so even now if it was possible. The reference to legislation was made because it is not possible to progress in this matter without changing the law. We have got to remove the obstacle that is lying like a mountain in our way. Still I want to clear the misunderstanding that prevails regarding this Bill. A charge has been levelled against me concerning it and by no less a person than Lavate, a public worker and yogi has been serving the people for many years. He said in a public meeting in Poona that I wanted to get the Bill passed with the help of the votes of Muslims and Christians. I laughed at this and wondered how a man like Lavate could believe such a thing. He had just believed what he was told. I opened his eyes and told him that what he believed was not true, and that the conditions regarding the Bill had been published in Harijan.1

And now one last point. You have recounted in your statement what work you had done. It is all right so long as we do not go too closely into it. There is nothing to feel proud of, if we take all the work done in Kathiawar into account. If you want compliments for the work done, I will pay them, but with reservation. You have achieved nothing great. How is it that an enterprising people like the Kathiawaris are so lethargic in this work? the enterprising among you do not observe untouchability. Then why are they so negligent about this work? I saw today a woman who was walking with the help of crutches in place of one leg. In reply to my question, she said that the leg had got a gangrene and had to be amputated, and that if that had not been done the gangrene would have spread to the whole body. Untouchability is a gangrenous limb of Hindu society and if measures are not taken to remove it the society would become crippled. And a crippled society cannot go on like that, so that it will ultimately perish.

1 Vide “Notes” sub-title Communal Representation”
Can dharma be preserved if we cut off one of its limbs? All the limbs of dharma are inseparable from one another. Just as, if one brick is removed from an arch, the whole of it will collapse, so also if one limb of dharma perishes, if one brick from the structure gets loose and falls, the whole will collapse. We are so much engrossed in other things that we do not see how backward our Hindu society is. I for one see that. But let no one deduce from this that I want Hindus to become superior to Muslims. I have said several times that if the Hindus do this much self-purification, then they will get whatever they want and we will be able to end the enmity which exists between Hindus, Muslims, Christians and Parsis. So wonderful a thing is this. It is life-giving and not life-destroying. But this will be possible only if all Harijan workers are pure. If their hearts have not become pure and they have not become selfless, they will not be able to serve dharma. If such workers arise in Kathiawar, the tiger or, say, the demon of untouchability that flourishes here, is bound to perish.

152. LETTER TO N. C. KELKAR

July 2, 1934

DEAR MR. KELKAR,

The unusual demand upon my time is my excuse for delay in replying to your letter of 22nd June last.

Instead of dealing directly with the points raised by you I propose to define my own policy regarding the Indian States.

The policy of non-interference in the affairs of the States that the Congress has followed is wise and sound.

The States are independent entities under the British law. That part of India which is described as British has no more power to shape the policy of the States than it has, say, that of Afghanistan or Ceylon.

I wish it were otherwise but I recognize my importance in the matter. India of the States is undoubtedly an integral part of geographical India. But that carries us no further than where we stand today. Portuguese and French India are also an integral part of geographical India but we are powerless to shape the course of events there. We enrol members from the States in the Congress. We receive

1 The letter was in reply to the addressee's dated June 22, 1934; vide “Resolution on White Paper and Communal Award”
2 President, All-India States’ People’s Conference considerable assistance from them. It is not want of appreciation or will that compels our non-interference. It is our helplessness.

It is my conviction that any attempt on the part of the Congress at interference can only damage the cause of the people in the States.

But there is nothing to prevent us from urging the States to adopt a certain policy.

I am of opinion that whatever we are able to accomplish in British India is bound to affect the States.

I would like the States to grant autonomy to their subjects and would like the Princes to regard themselves as, and be in fact, trustees for the people over whom they rule, drawing for themselves only a small and definite percentage of the income. I have certainly not lost hope that the Princes will deem it a pride to become real trustees of their people. I do not seek to destroy their status. I believe in the conversion of individuals and societies.

What I said at the Round Table was in the nature of an appeal made to the Princes. It certainly did not imply that whether they listened to the appeal or not, the Congress would enter the federation. I had no authority to bind the Congress to any such thing. The Congress entering the federation had to depend upon many other circumstances beyond the attitude of the Princes. If ever federation comes, it will surely depend on mutual adjustment.

I hope I have covered all the points you have raised. If I have not, please write to me again. I have written this under great pressure of work.

155. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

BHAVNAGAR,

July 2, 1934

Bhai Vallabhbhai,

For the first time, I saw signs of some erasures in your letter. These are found in your list of visitors.

There was a wire today saying that the women prisoners in Sabarmati jail have been released. Mani, therefore, must have been released. Some men prisoners also have been released from that jail. Some still remain behind.

As for the attempt on my life, I don’t think it is worth writing about. Something of the sort was bound to happen for one cause or another. I am glad that it happened on account of my Harijan work. When some means have been used for one end, it is bound to be used for another end also, unconnected with the first. But, then, does anything happen unless God wills it?

I am writing this letter from Bhavnagar. You know the state of affairs here. One great difficulty is that the workers cannot work as a team. But the collection will be quite good, about Rs. 30,000.

Durga and others are coming to see me tomorrow.

I don’t think there will be any difficulty regarding the cultivators. Please don’t worry in the least.

Being hard pressed for time, I can’t write long letters to you. But I have asked others in the party to write to you.

Did I write to you about Amtussalaam having been operated upon for piles? She has now been discharged from the hospital. Meherally\(^1\) is in a hospital. How is your health?

Ramdas has been suffering. He needs a lot of money for medicines, etc. How can I let him accept such a large amount as gift? I hardened my heart, therefore, and wrote to him today saying that he must not accept more than Rs. 100 every month, no matter whether he lived or died in consequence. Keshu is in Rajkot for the present.

157. LETTER TO HIRALAL SHARMA

July 2, 1934

CHI. SHARMA,

I have your clear letter. I have no objection to your going to Khurja. I understand now your remark to Ramdas that you would look after the expenses. I suppose it meant that I had undertaken the responsibility of that expense. Quite correct if it did. There should be one more proviso that the expenditure should be within limits. The letter from Ramdas gives me to understand that the minimum amount required would be Rs. 300 a month. The expenditure is too high in my view. After all we have to take the requisite sum from Jamnalalji. How can I burden him or anyone else to this extent? It would be better that Ramdas goes away to South Africa. He will, somehow or other, get well there. You too may go if you can obtain the passport. It should also be understood about nature cure that it is practicable even for the poor. It is very painful for me to write all this but I see no alternative. The affection between you and Ramdas is a test for you too, while I am of course not exempt from it.

My opinion is crystallizing into this, that you should remain at Wardha and manage everything within a limited amount. The expenses on Ramdas and Nirmala should not exceed Rs. 100 and the same goes for you too. Whatever is possible within this limit should be done. Do not do anything through ignorant attachment. Ramdas will become all right when his future is settled. Others in similar circumstances have been cured thus; Ramdas too will be cured. In all this your decision and judgement are essential as Ramdas is placing more and more confidence in you.

158. LETTER TO U. RAJAGOPALA KRISHNAIYYA

July 2, 1934

BHAI KRISHNAIYYA,

Here are the replies to your queries:

1. There is no doubt that a union of dharma and artha is possible for an individual, the society and the nation. But it is almost impossible to say when it might be achieved.

2. My writings about non-attachment to the result are an outcome of personal experience not on one occasion but many. Even a hard-working yet hungry farmer can attain self-realization. The wise men go to the length of saying that self-realization though not impossible is certainly very hard to achieve for the man endowed with the three assets, that of wealth, health and intellect.

3. An all-pervading, conscious Power fills our universe which we call God. We have to offer to it worship. Even the fact that that power does not fulfil all our desires should cause us no concern.

4. The Gita cannot be interpreted as one pleases, it has to be interpreted in accordance with rules of grammar, etc.

5. The meaning of being transformed into God is clear enough.
It means a son is not content till he becomes like his father.

160. SPEECH ON STATE GOSHALA, BHAVNAGAR

July 3, 1934

Before taking leave of Bhavnagar I cannot but make a passing reference to the State goshala, which I had the privilege to visit in company with my old friend, Swami Anand. The goshala has a fine herd of Gir cattle, and it has a four-year-old bull which, according to the Maharajasaheb, no mean judge of cattle, is the finest animal of the kind he had seen in Kathiawar. The State is doing very good service by maintaining this farm, but I hope it will not rest content with it, but also chalk out and work out a policy of cattle improvement in villages by placing a studbull in each village, castrating all other bulls whatever and, in the case of people letting loose a bull on religious grounds, insisting that it shall be first-class animal and, if it is not, stopping the dedication altogether.

162. LETTER TO MRIDULA SARABHAI

July 5, 1934

CHI. MRIDULA,

I had received your letter. I am surprised that even you have been led into an error. You must have read the letter addressed to Bhogilal. To say that swadeshi today is a fraud is not to condemn the people engaged in that work. It is a warning to them. I had even given the history of swadeshi in that conversation. I have often said that cow-protection today is a fraud and that is my belief. And yet many pure-hearted persons are engaged in that activity. Even my colleagues in the field are in it. I do not consider them knaves. I have shown the way to genuine cow-protection as against spurious cow-protection. You must be aware of it. I have referred to the cow-protection societies as cow-devouring societies in Hind Swaraj. Today also I think the same about them. But I know that many men and women engaged in that fraudulent activity are extremely purehearted. It is the same about the swadeshi fraud of today. You and other colleagues are not knaves but have been innocently entangled in it. It is my attempt to redeem them from it. The result is my new concept of swadeshi.

Have you understood the point now? If you have understood, remove the pain of those who have been hurt by my words.

163. SPEECH AT WOMEN’S MEETING, AJMER

July 5, 1934

Gandhiji reached Ajmer at night on the 4th, and on the 5th he addressed a women’s meeting the first thing in the morning. He said he would not make any elaborate argument before them. Everyone would agree that we are subject to the law of love. As Tulsidas put it, mercy is the root of religion. Untouchability must be abolished if only because it was opposed to the law of love and to the spirit of mercy. How could they swear by love and at the same time consign a large class of their fellowmen to insanitary surroundings, prevent them from drawing water at wells, compel them to drink water spilt by cattle and assault them if they tried to assert their common right over public wells? So also, if quite a number of dirty savarna children could attend the public schools with impunity, was it right to exclude

164. INTERVIEW TO HARIJAN SEVAKS

_AJMER_,
_July 5, 1934_

In the course of his conversation with Harijan servants, Gandhiji carefully defined the conditions of Harijan service. He wanted the workers to serve the Harijans in all sincerity. This service was its own reward, and it had no selfish or political motive behind it whatever. Their sole aim was the purification of religion. There was no room in the movement for those who approached the question from a political standpoint, and they must leave it at the earliest opportunity, as their continuance in it was fraught with great injury to the cause. They could never hope to convert _savarna_ Hindus, if they cherished any political aims. They alone should participate in the movement who accepted the principles of truth and non-violence and who believed in temples as an integral feature of Hinduism.

_Harijan_, 20-7-1934

165. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, AJMER

_July 5, 1934_

Gandhiji said that the Pandit was perfectly entitled to attend the meeting with the black-flaggers and record his protest against the movement.\(^1\) Whoever had assaulted him had exhibited gross incivility. Black flags could do them no harm, but the assault on the Pandit had certainly damaged the cause they had all at heart. The Pandit’s assailant had committed a great sin in the eyes of God as well as man. Sanatanists and reformers had occasionally come to blows before, but the Ajmer assault was unpardonable, as he had made himself responsible for the Pandit’s safety. Untouchability could never be abolished by violent methods, which would only recoil on their own heads. He would consider what penance he should undergo as reparation for the untoward incident,\(^2\) for people ought to know the conditions on which he could invite their co-operation. Reformers might no assault others, but should suffer assaults without retaliation, as thus only could hearts be moved and untouchability abolished. He was confident that religion could not be served or saved by violence, untruth or anger, but only by self-denial, self-restraint and self-suffering. He could not bear with violence even in politics; much less could be brook it in religion.

Gandhiji then called upon the Pandit to speak and asked the audience to accord him a patient hearing. When he had spoken for a couple of minutes, members of the public interrupted him. Upon this Gandhiji said that it was an exhibition of gross discourtesy. Some of them and already committed one incivility in molesting him, and they were committing another in refusing to hear him. If they were not here prepared to hear the Pandit, it meant that they were not prepared to hear him either. He never claimed infallibility for himself. On the other hand, he had confessed to Himalayan blunders. If he could say with impunity that untouchability was a sin, the Pandit had an equal right to assert that the movement directed against untouchability was irreligious in his opinion. If they cried ‘shame’ when the Pandit expressed his honest opinion, the shame was not his but theirs. They must not thus betray intolerance, which was but a form of violence. A man who did not listen to opponents could never be capable of truly religious conduct. Harijan service was a religious movement in which there was no room for intolerance or physical violence. Supposing some violence was offered to him and it was even of a fatal character, would they lose their senses and indulge in orgies of violence? If so, he would have lived his life before them in vain. They would kill the great movement, whereas if they restrained themselves untouchability would die with him.

171. SPEECH IN REPLY TO MUNICIPAL ADDRESS, KARACHI

In his speeches here, Mahatmaji congratulated the Karachi city on maintaining cordial relations between Hindus and Muslims and also for having done a lot for the uplift of Harijans, but he hoped that the Karachi Municipality will still do its best for Harijans and set an example in this respect to other municipalities of India. He was, however, not satisfied with the unhealthy quarters in which at some places Harijans were living and he urged the city fathers and the people to see that not a single Harijan was housed in Karachi in any quarters in which they themselves would not consent to live.

He also urged them to purge their hearts of distinctions of high and low, untouchable and touchable, or of their being Hindus, Mahomedans, Christians or Parsis, etc., and until that was done India would not attain her salvation. By doing this, not only India but the whole world would be benefited.

Mahatmaji also emphasized that a noble cause like that of the removal of untouchability would not be carried out by the use of force. It could only be achieved by self-purification and penance and he urged the Harijan workers to realize their responsibilities in this direction. He also urged people to show respect towards sanatanists who might differ from them.

174. SPEECH AT CONGRESS WORKERS’ MEETING, KARACHI

July 8, 1934

On Sunday morning Mahatma Gandhi had a heart-to-heart talk with the Sind Congressites in Khaliqdina Hall. Gandhiji referred to the socialists’ allegations that the programme chalked out by the Working Committee was mild and ineffective. He rebutted it saying that khadi, Hindu-Muslim unity, untouchability, and peasants’ re-organization were sufficiently dynamic work. If the workers took them in right earnest there could be no need for civil resistance and going to jail. He advised the people not to change the programme which was sufficiently dynamic and truly socialistic.

Speaking on Communal Award, he said the Congress could neither accept it, as the Muslims desired, nor reject as Hindus and Sikhs wanted. He felt, therefore, the Working Committee’s resolution was the wisest.

_The Tribune, 11-7-1934_

175. SPEECH TO SIND HARIJAN WORKERS, KARACHI

_July 8, 1934_

At Karachi, on the 8th instant, Gandhiji met the Harijan workers of Sind, who complained that Kabulis who had lent money to Harijans harassed them a good deal and refused to accept payment even when their exorbitant claim as regards the principal and the interest was admitted in full. Gandhiji advised that, in dealing with these money-lenders, they should seek the good offices of godfearing Mussalmans in the first instance. But their main work lay in so educating the Harijans that they would cease to borrow money altogether for unproductive purposes and give up vices like drink and gambling. And when they did borrow, six per cent was the maximum interest they should pay. In Tharparkar, there are about 5,000 Bhils and Meghwads, the original inhabitants and peasant proprietors of the district, who are fast losing their lands and being reduced to the status of landless labourers and stand badly in need of legislative protection. Gandhiji said they might try to get such legislation passed, but meanwhile a band of earnest workers must bury themselves in the heart of this backward tract and dedicate their lives to its service.

_Harijan, 27-7-1934_

176. SPEECH TO BUSINESSMEN, KARACHI

_July 8, 1934_

The Chairman has rightly observed that of late I have very little time for activities not directly connected with Harijan work; or, I may be said to have no time at all. It is also ture that after such an extensive tour and the experience of walking in Utkal, I find myself rather exhausted mentally. Now I am only hoping that the month of July will pass off without trouble so that I can rest my mind a little. In this frame of mind I was not inclined in the beginning to accept the Chairman’s invitation to visit this place. But I could not decline the invitation when I came to know that the Chairman of this Association is also the Chairman of the Harijan Sevak Sangh here, and carries on the Sangh’s activities admirably well.

1 The speech is extracted from “Weekly Letter”.

2 This appeared under the title “To the Businessmen of Karachi.”
As it is, I have always had good relations with everyone in India, including businessmen and other rich people. I have been constantly receiving financial help from them for the poor in the country, for Daridranarayana, for Harijans and others. But I feel it is necessary to make it clear that although I am friendly with the princes, officers, business men and the rich, I never forget that I am a representative of the workers. It is my constant prayer to God that I may not, in any way disgrace myself as representative of workers, and, I may not ask anything for myself from the rich class. I believe that I have led fifty years of my public life in this spirit.

I do believe that businessmen, the wealthy men and princes are inseparable limbs of India. My duty does not demand that I should destroy one of these limbs in order to serve Daridranarayana. My experience of many years has strengthened my belief that even if it is possible to liquidate these classes, Daridranarayana is not going to benefit by it. What I desire and what is uppermost in my thoughts and dreams is that I should help as much as is possible in bringing about unity among all these classes, and devote my utmost energy to this cause. It is also my experience that so far I have not by such activities harmed Daridranarayana. I have seen that when I approach the poor, they accept me as one of them and shower affection on me. And even now, I shall do for them whatever is possible.

Having laid the foundation-stone of this building, I take it that you would not turn me away empty-handed whenever I approach you for the much needed help for the Daridranarayana. I presume that, as representatives of the Indian business community, you would not resort to dubious trade practices, would not exploit Daridranarayana and would see that their rights are not violated at your hands. I expect that you would not indulge in any trade which may harm Daridranarayana. I know that all businessmen in India do not carry on their business in this spirit. I also know that all the rich people do not use their wealth as if it really belonged to the poor. In spite of that I am sure the number of rich persons who desire to be the trustees of their wealth is increasing. They are striving hard and also succeeding in their efforts. If we treat these rich people with decency, they would fulfil the expectations we have of them. What benevolence would not teach them today, selfishness would teach them tomorrow. Experience shows that altruism and self-interest can be blended in trade. Genuine

1 For the Karachi Indian Merchants’ Association
In conclusion, I pray to God that this Merchants’ Association may continue to do such noble deeds which would serve the best interest of every Indian. It would do good not only to Hindus and Muslims but the whole of India which includes the Daridranar-ayana as well as others. You have pledged that this Association is open to everyone who calls himself an Indian and accepts India as his country. I hope that this beautiful city which is small but well on the way to becoming another Bombay and may compete with Bombay in the near future—will have no place for jealousy and enmity. Competition is not a bad thing by itself. That is the basis of trade. It is all right to progress through competition, but there should not be mutual jealousy and quarrels. If you succeed in avoiding these things, I am sure that your Association would become an ideal organization for the country.

You have yourself mentioned that because of the efforts of your Mayor you have received land and other help. He is the son of a wealthy man, but an outsider who comes to Karachi and meets him would regard him not as a rich man but a fakir. In the entire history of municipalities I have never come across an instance where one person is elected Mayor year after year. It is not too much to entertain great hopes from a city who has a fakir for its Mayor.

177. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, KARACHI

July 8, 1934

At the public meeting in the evening, 30,000 people, including 5,000 ladies, had turned up to hear Gandhiji, but they were rather disappointed, as the loudspeakers failed and Swami Krishnanand\(^1\) had to take their place as a human substitute. Referring to the Harijan quarters he had inspected, Gandhiji said he was deeply pained to see the chawls in Ranchhod lines, and he expected the Municipality to see that they no longer disfigured the fair face of the city of Karachi. Besides this, there were three more places which peremptorily demanded improvement. It did not redound to Karachi’s credit that a single Harijan within its limits should be compelled to live in a house which the tallest of its citizens would not gladly occupy. The citizens, therefore, should continuously press this matter upon the Municipality’s attention until the remedy suited to each case was applied.\(^2\)

A band of sincere workers armed with prayer and purity as weapons was what was needed for the work. No caste distinctions should ever exist. He desired unity between communities wherein lay India’s salvation. He requested the public to nurse no grievance against sanatanists. Love, persuasion and no force should be applied in converting them to his viewpoint. He expressed his inability to make a long speech amidst the din of the unruly mob.

187. STATEMENT ON FAST

Inquiry made by me into the unfortunate incident at Ajmer resulting in the cut received by Pandit Lalnath on the head shows that the black-flag demonstration enraged those who saw the processionists, and, according to Pandit Lalnath, the public, which included volunteers, seized the flags and trampled them under foot. A scuffle ensued in which Pandit Lalnath received the injury mentioned. Happily, none of the other demonstrators received injuries worth the name. But the guilt is enhanced by the fact that those in charge of the volunteers had specific instructions to see that the black-flag demonstrators were fully protected from molestation by the public. It is no answer in defence that Pandit Lalnath and his party came in advance of the time appointed. In my opinion, responsible men should have been posted at all points to afford protection to the demonstrators, and notices should have been put up at the meeting ground, warning the public against interfering with them in any shape or form.

That precaution was not taken and the pledge given to Pandit Lalnath, that he and his party would be free from molestation when they made the demonstration, was broken. The pledge was given by me in the full faith that the captain of the volunteers was willing and able to carry it out. I have no doubt he was a willing partner to the pledge. That he was unable to redeem the pledge was quite clear. But there can be no doubt that the final responsibility rests with me. Indeed, no pledge was necessary. In a movement claimed to be purely religious, non-violence on the part of the public sympathizing with the movement must be presumed. If I mentioned the pledge, I have done so to enhance the magnitude of the guilt and demonstrate the greater necessity of public penance on my part. Pandit Lalnath always warned me that my persistence in the movement must result in widespread violence on the part of the sympathizing public. I did not share his fear, nor do I share it now, in spite of his ability to show stray cases of violence done to black-flag demonstrators.

But it is necessary for me to emphasize the fact that the movement, which is purely religious, admits of no violence on the part of reformers even in spite of provocations. The movement can only succeed by appealing to reason and touching the hearts of the opponents. This is possible only through the purity and penance of reformers. After much searching of the heart, I have decided to impose upon myself a fast of seven days, to commence on Tuesday noon August 7th, i.e., two days after my reaching Wardha, which I expect to do on the 5th of August next. This is the least penance I owe to Pandit Lalnath and those sanatanists whom he represents. God willing, the Harijan tour will finish at Benares on the 2nd of August next. It is, perhaps, fitting that the end will be signalized by a penitential fast. May it cover all errors, conscious or unconscious, of omission or commission, of me and my co-workers. The movement will not end with the fast. Let it open a new and cleaner chapter in this struggle for the emancipation of nearly fifty million human beings from thraldom imposed in the sacred name of religion. Let it also be a warning to those who are in, or will join, the movement that they must approach it with clean hands and hearts free from untruth and violence in thought, word and deed. I hope no one will feel tempted to imitate the fast. The cause will be best served by greater dedication.

Chi. Mira,

You will understand the coming fast. The incident calls for the penance because there was a clear breach of pledge.\(^3\) Nothing on earth is so serious perhaps as breach of safety. If I had greater capacity I would have taken a longer fast. You must not be disturbed. You should go on with your appointed task\(^4\), unmoved. Share this with the other friends.

192. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

I see nothing wrong in Rajaji’s standing on the same platform with Bhulabhai. But it is best that, even though doing all this, he should not join the Board or enter the Assembly. I would dissuade even those who are not confirmed non-co-operators from entering the Assembly. There will be too many who will be wanting to go. All of them will not make a good show there, nor can all get elected.

We may assume that Rajaji and Rajendrababu, when they consider it desirable to join the Board or enter the Assembly, will surely do so. They are always free to do it. On the other hand, those like you who wish to keep themselves completely out are free to do that too. [You may be sure that] nobody will be criticized on that ground. And even if there is some criticism, you should not mind it. In this age now, we ought to shed all fear and not to pay too much attention to what others do or think. People may follow me in my intellectual experiments as long as they appeal to them. My spiritual experiments require faith. People may follow them, as far as their faith can lead them. Let nobody force his reason or his heart to follow me.

As you will be reading in the papers about my impending fast, I don’t write more about it here. Its necessity should be self-evident.

I got your wire. My health will survive the ordeal. I will come through if I don’t have to carry too heavy a burden from day to day. Having reached dinner time, why should I have a breakfast? Have faith.

193. INTERVIEW TO HARIJAN LEADERS

KARACHI,

July 10, 1934

Early in the morning on the 10th, a number of prominent Harijans met Gandhiji, represented their grievances to him and sought his advice on many points. As regards Municipal and other elections, Gandhiji said that there never should be a contest between one Harijan and another. Harijans should consult among themselves and select as many worthy candidates as there were seats, and these should have a walk-over. It would do them no good if these seats, instead of furnishing opportunities for service, were looked upon as conferring privilege.

With reference to the demand put forward by some Harijans for the reservation of a certain percentage of posts in services, Gandhiji said they would perhaps be surprised to hear that there were hardly a few lakhs of Government posts in the whole of India. Out of these few how many could after all be held by Harijans, and what would that mean to five crores of Harijans? Gandhiji, therefore, advised the Harijans to leave these percentages severely alone and trust merit to command attention.

194. SPEECH AT DAYARAM JETHAMAL SIND COLLEGE, KARACHI

_July 10, 1934_

This is not my first contact with you. My contact with students has always been intimate whether they are students of Sind or any other province. This kind of relationship exists since I returned from South Africa. Therefore I have confidence, based on my experience, that I have a place in the hearts of the students. Whenever I am asked, ‘How many children do you have?’ I reply, ‘Innumerable, and they keep on increasing daily’; there is no fall in the number. Some of them die; but many more are born. Some betray me and some even run away from me. If I count the number of those who are born, it will outnumber the total of those who have run away from me, who have betrayed me and who are dead. Such boys and girls are first born out of their mothers’ wombs and as they have faith come to me and, having transformed their lives, are reborn.

It was for this reason that I could not decline your invitation. You should know that at the moment my mental and physical condition is such that I would not accept any invitation. A girl in this city is on her death-bed. She wished that I should call on her. To her grandmother, who came with the request, I had to say “If I come to see your child, [I must go and see other] sons and daughters of mine who are ill; how can I manage to see all of them? If I call on one, how can I turn down the request of another?" I have still not been able to find a way out of this dilemma. I hardened my heart and argued to myself, 'After all I would not be able to save her by going there. And so I will not go.' Nursing the sick has been my habit but I hardened my feelings and restrained myself. If it was difficult for me to call on that girl, then it was equally difficult to come here. It is beyond my physical and mental strength these days to go about from place to place. Normally money tempts me; but lately I have become free to great extent even from that temptation. I am indifferent whether I get money or not. I shall certainly carry on this work even if I do not get money. For, this activity is after all carried on not by me but by God. It is beyond the power of a single individual to bring about a change of heart in millions of caste Hindus. Man cannot acquire such power even by self-purification or penance. By these means he merely becomes an instrument in the hands of God. He can do nothing more. I am experiencing this every day and every moment, and that makes me more and more humble. The world alone can say whether or not there is humility in my words and actions. But I am humble and my humility goes on increasing, because I know and realize my mental, physical and spiritual limitations.

1 This appeared under the title: “To the Students of Karachi”.

With this introduction I would like to tell the students, boys and girls, that humility is the primary thing to be acquired. One who is not humble cannot put one’s learning to proper use. What does it matter if he has obtained double first class or has stood first? One does not achieve everything by just passing an examination. It is possible that it may help in securing a good job or a good marriage alliance. But, if learning is to be put to proper use, if it is to be used only for the sake of service, one should acquire more and more humility every day. No service is possible without it. I know quite a few students who are proud of their B. A. Hons. or engineering degrees. The villagers would not even bother to look at them. They would say: “How are we concerned with degrees? How are you going to share our troubles?” Nowhere in the 7,00,000 Indian villages would one find an instance of someone winning the affection of the villagers because he possessed high academic degrees. Man should not use his intelligence and spiritual power to earn his livelihood and sustain himself. For that purpose God has provided him with hands and legs, and with these he should do some common labour and earn his bread. Can learning be used for earning thousands of rupees? In the past even lawyers rendered their services free of charge. This practice is prevalent even today. A barrister cannot file a suit for his fees, for, his is supposed to be a profession of service. The same is true of vaids. To which student, boy or girl, can I say that the wealth of learning is meant for service? And that too in Sind? Here they try to imitate the Sahibs and the Parsis. When I saw the girls during my first visit to Sind I wondered how there were so many Parsi girls around. Later on I came to know that they belonged to the Amil class. I had come in contact with the Sindhis in South Africa. But I had no occasion to know Sindhi women since they never brought their women with them. I saw Sindhi women only when I came to Sind. I was familiar with the name ‘bhai-bandh’. But I was rather scared by the name ‘Amil’. I wondered what kind of people they would be. When I saw the Amils I found them exactly like the Sahibs. Let no one be under the impression that I am running down the Sahibs. It is only proper Sahibs should appear like Sahibs. If others try to imitate the Sahibs they would meet the fate of the jackdaw who posed as a peacock in Aesop’s Fables. A crow is all right as it is but appears ridiculous when it forgets itself and imitates someone else. Thus, how nice would it be if we confine ourselves to the Indian way of living. It was not Dadabhai but Lord Curzon who said that the annual per capita income in India was Rs. 40. This average includes the income of the millionaires also. This means that 30 million have no income at all. They sustain themselves by begging and eat only the crumbs of bread they get. How should we live in a country which is so poor? We will find that we are not wealthy enough to live like Sahibs if we look at our average per capita income. We must realize that we can look well-clad only if we wear khadi. If the girls are keen on silk saris and laces they would be at the mercy of the boys. Here, the boys accept the brides only if they bring thousands of rupees and with this money they want to go to Oxford to get degrees.

The very fact that you have invited me and are presenting me a purse implies your pledge that you would work for the Harijans. If that is not true and you want to exonerate yourselves by giving money, then that money is worthless. This work cannot be accomplished by money alone. You must give your heart along with money. Money alone will achieve nothing if your heart is not willing. Have you taken a vow of such service? If you have done so, I will tell you what to do. You would become humble and simple. And you would go to the Harijan children and treat them as your own. These children, their bodies, their noses and their mouths are so full of dirt and they stink so much that you can go to them only in simple dress.
If you wish to work in India and among the Harijans, you have to do it with humility and without being proud of your learning—only then can you succeed. I have visited seven or eight Harijan colonies in Karachi. Two or three of these places were quite good. I would like to congratulate the people of Karachi on that. But there are two or three other places where you would never stay. The huts there are on the point of collapsing. There is no light and no sun. The sun can be rarely seen from there. People are living under great hardships. Those people approached me and requested me to arrange for houses for them. You can do a lot of work if you go among such people. I do not suggest that you should give up your studies and go there. You should do this work in your spare time. Dr. Dutt, the Principal of the Forman Christian College of Lahore, has written to me that some boys from his college go and do Harijan work every day. I was delighted to read the report of the work done by the students of the Agra College. The Principal of that college also does the same work and sends me a report. The students of the Dehra Dun College devote their vacation to this work. Those boys asked me as to what they should do about the problem of the left-over food. I wrote¹ to them it was a sin to give our left-over food to the sweepers and it should be stopped and they stopped it. The sweepers then said that they must have the left-overs. Just money would not be enough. We have got to serve the sweepers even if they persist in bad habits.

How is such service possible? Only a person with a pure heart and good faith can take up this work. It cannot be done by merely making the Harijans conscious of their economic conditions. Dr. Ambedkar is such an intelligent and clever lawyer that he puts to shame many others. He is able to touch the hearts of many people by his sharp intelligence. The magnitude of his sacrifice is great. He is absorbed in his own work. He leads a simple life. He is capable of earning one to two thousand rupees every month. He is also in a position to settle down in Europe if he so desires. But he doesn’t want to stay there. He is only concerned about the welfare of the Harijans. But what is the condition of even a man like him in our society today? He says: “If I go to Poona to attend the Assembly session, I have to stay in a hotel and spend the entire amount of the daily allowance of Rs. 10, whereas the others can stay with their friends and save that money. There is no Hindu family in Poona which would accept me as a colleague or a friend.” Whose shame is this? How can one who has been put to such treatment be won over? At the same time we have to touch the heart of Shankaracharya. Those two are poles apart. How can they be brought together? We stand between these two. Would we be able to impress them by our learning? What would I do if Ambedkar says, ‘You are traitors; I shall follow the path of violence’? I would have to bend my head and say: ‘Here is my neck for your sword. I must expiate for the sins of my ancestors.’ Again, should I go before Shankaracharya and recite the Vedas? He would say: ‘You have no right to recite the Vedas.’ But, surely, he cannot say that I am not entitled to make any sacrifice, or be humble? Hence, we have to win over both of them with our sacrifice and tolerance.

You had the portrait of the late Vithalbhai unveiled by me. But what good has it done to you? Your Principal said that Vithalbhai was one of the greatest servants of India. There is no doubt about it. No one can deny the work he did in the Bombay Municipal Corporation, the Bombay Legislative Assembly and the Central Legislative Assembly. His courage, his ability, his sacrifice were second to none. Moreover, he presided over the [Central] Legislative Assembly like a rishi. No one could surpass him in simplicity. He was a scholar and a great barrister. Had he been corrupt, he would have made lakhs of rupees. But he did not have much money. He used to send me a large portion of the salary he received as the President of the Central Legislative Assembly. It was a fairly large sum and the interest from it is added to it. I have not yet been able to decide how best I can use it. You have made me unveil today the portrait of such a person. But having done that you cannot claim that you have, thereby, discharged your debt to Vithalbhai. He had accepted the Harijans as his own people and used to mix with them. He was present in the Harijan colony at Godhra when the first Harijan meeting was held there. I did not recognize him at first, because he was dressed like an ascetic. He did not feel that being a barrister it was beneath his dignity to visit the Harijan colony.

I have laid down for you the conditions for doing Harijan work. I suggested to you how to put your education to the best use. I also told you that you must keep away from the evil custom of taking and giving [dowry]. No matter how many progressive boys and girls there may be in Sind, I would say that that is meaningless and the dust

KARACHI,
July 11, 1934

Bhai Vallabhbhai,

These days I cannot write to you when I propose to do so. I commenced this letter at 5.30 a.m. after breakfast. Just then a Parsi lady came in with her 15-year-old daughter. The latter has won the first place in tennis in the whole of India, but she has now lost interest in worldly things. Her interest now is all in religion. She, therefore, urged her mother to bring her to see me. She gave ten rupees for the Harijan Fund and has now left after obtaining my autograph.

Please do not be unhappy at the news of my fast. It is absolutely necessary. Large crowds come to the meetings and sanatanists are on the war-path. People do not tolerate their conduct and, therefore, trouble is bound to follow. People will not listen to mere exhortations. One can convey one’s message to vast masses of people only by fasting. Crowds at the meetings are larger than ever before and it is very difficult to control them. Seven days will pass without any difficulty. Please don’t worry in the least. My health is perfectly all right. In spite of heavy pressure of work, the blood-pressure remains round about 150. That should be considered very good. The weight is 104. I shall be happy if the rest of the tour is completed without further trouble. August will be taken up by the fast and the gradual return to normal diet. After that as God wills.

I must get a detailed report about your health. I am writing to Dahyabhai to send me one.3

I learnt yesterday about Mani having been released. Mahadev and Pyarelal will join me at Lahore. That will increase the size of the party. Kakasaheb has joined it at Hyderabad. It is quite desirable that all three of them should be with me at present. Narahari will not be coming. If I can stay at a fixed place, I can meet everybody. Let God’s will prevail.

Ba keeps good health. She manages to secure the food that she needs. At any rate, in such matters nothing is likely to escape Thakkar Bapa’s attention.

Ramadas’s trouble is mental, and mental illness cannot but have an effect on the body. At present he is following...’s advice. He has been considerably reduced. The fact that he has three children also worries him. What is ordained will happen. Devdas’s Lakshmi keeps fairly good health.

I had long discussion with... and others. Just now they are not likely to listen to any advice. The new wind is intoxicating beyond measure. They will come to their senses only when that intoxication has subsided. Swami parted from us at Viramgam. He will now take up constructive work in the suburbs.

They will have no more to do with Round Tables where nominees of Government speak the language of patriots and follow in the footsteps of flunkeys. They will aim at educating public opinion on the question of the Constituent Assembly. And in the Assembly they will solely work to create a situation whereby an Indian Constituent Assembly would become an accomplished fact. 199. INTERVIEW TO SIND JOURNALISTS²

KARACHI,

_July 11, 1934_

Mr. Punniah³ at the outset said that the reasons adduced for embarking on his new fast were not convincing and that he should not undertake another fiery ordeal close on the heels of a strenous Harijan tour. Gandhiji replied:

The movement is of tremendous importance. Nothing but a drastic measure like fasting can meet the situation. You can influence the mass mind not through speeches or writings but only by something which is most well understood by the masses, that is suffering, and the most acceptable method is that of fasting. My repeated experience here and in South Africa has been that, when well applied, it has been the most infallible remedy. My lot has been cast with the masses, and I have always to take work from and through them. The only language they understand is the language of the heart, and fasting when it is utterly unselfish is the language of the heart.

Gandhiji was acquainted with the news that the Bombay Congress circles viewed with alarm his contemplated fast and Congress friends were of opinion that the strain would be too much. Gandhiji smilingly answered:

I have no such fears, and physically speaking a fast after an exhaustive tour can only benefit the person who has undertaken the tour.

But then there is the risk.

Of course, I am risking. I am not taking this fast for its physical effect. Physically speaking, there is some kind of risk, because my body does not require a fasting cure. Any fast must require some risk, otherwise it has no meaning. It must involve torture of the flesh.

The decision is irrevocable. I announced at the Ajmer meeting that I would undertake some sort of penance. The announcement was long overdue. I reasoned with myself and with my friends and then came to the deliberate conclusion that fasting was the only penance that I should make. Then the question was that of duration. I would have undertaken a longer fast. I do not want to produce any unnecessary shocks, and therefore I did not undertake the maximum period. Friends who at the present moment are physically near me have realized the necessity of the fast.

Does it include also Kasturba?

Yes. It has been my rare fortune that in all such matters she has never worried me, never argued with me, and has allowed me to have my own way, although she has felt the distress. Therefore although she is my wife, I have not hesitated to say that she is one of the bravest women I have ever met in this respect.

Mr. Punniah then asked him about his views on the Sind separation issue, over which the people of this province were greatly agitated. Gandhiji with a significant laughter and a nod of his head remarked:

Now, you are taking me out of my depths. It is not to be answered before the 3rd of August.

But then you have been participating in political discussions.

1 Vide “Speech at Public Meeting, Ajmer”, 5-7-1934
Yes. But it was not for public consumption. I am glad that a reference has been now made to it, and that I got an opportunity for expressing my sorrow at the breach of confidence indulged in by some young journalists who were permitted to be present at the Congress at the Khalikdina Hall meeting. I told them that the proceedings ought not to be reported. I consider that it is a breach of confidence to have reported unauthorized statements, and I felt that those who broke that promise had not observed the fundamental etiquette of journalism and it was gross impropriety. I have a fairly high notion of the journalistic profession.

Has not the Harijan movement estranged the community for national politics?

No. Not in the slightest degree. Because, some people have used this movement as a cloak to divert the mind of the people from real politics. As it is well known, I don’t believe in watertight compartments. Politics, religion, social reform, economic uplift all these form parts of a whole.

Answering critics who are of the view that Council-entry was a concession to weakness and that in his heart of hearts Gandhiji had no faith in such a programme, Gandhiji said:

I have no such superiority complex. It is not a concession to weakness. It is a concession to hard facts. That I have myself no faith in the Council programme in terms of swaraj is a different matter. I should be sorry that those who have faith in council-entry were by any act of mine prevented from acting according to their faith. It was, therefore, a matter of pleasure for me to help those congressmen who had faith in Council-entry programme to follow out their policy.

The talk then turned to the Communal Award. Asked what course he would adopt at the Benares meeting of the Congress Working Committee, Gandhiji said:

Pandit Malaviya, Bapu Aney and others have felt aggrieved over the Working Committee resolution. For my part I have seen nothing to alter my view. But I would, consistently with my belief in the correctness of the Working Committee resolution, go any length to retain the valuable co-operation of Panditji and other friends. The more I think of the Working Committee resolution, the more I think that for the Congress it is the only correct attitude possible.

Mr. Punniah said that the bomb of fast was hurled in a country which was already apprehensive that unless Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel were released he may court jail again after 3rd August. The public wanted an assurance that he would not go to jail again as there was a lot of important national work to be attended to.

I honestly say that it is a matter not in my hands at all. I don’t thereby mean to say that it is in the hands of the Government, though it would be true to a certain extent if I said so. However, at the present moment, what I wish to say is that it is surely in the hands of God. I have no fixed notions of what I should do after the fast and the convalescence after it is over. You should believe me implicitly when I say that I should be guided by he inner voice.

To a question from a journalist he replied:

My impressions of the Sind tour have been very happy. I should have been happier if I could beg more money.¹

I do not want to rob you of what little you get. At least give me your pencils.

200. SPEECH AT PARSIS’ MEETING, KARACHI

July 11, 1934

Whenever I come to you I do not at all feel that I am a guest, but amidst Parsis I am amidst members of my own family. My close relations with the Parsis are of long standing. It is not as if these relations began with me. I have inherited them from my elders. My father’s personal friends included many Parsis. I have accepted money from you. But you have been giving away money to all the world. You are known as donors of the first order. You have received this certificate not from a Parsi but from an English writer. You have fully earned that certificate. But you have given me something more than money. I have been able to steal your hearts. I have always felt that I have a place in the hearts of the Parsis. Even if I am invited to a Parsi meeting or family out of courtesy, I would make it a point to attend it. I am and I have always been confident that any time I want some public service from you, I shall be able to get it. Hence, I could not have declined your invitation this time. Bhai Sidhva² has already explained to you that my physical and mental condition does not permit me to attend any meetings. I do not like to go out anywhere. I prefer to do my work sitting at home. If there is an occasion to go anywhere on foot I would like to walk from village to village spreading my message through conversation and that would give me enough satisfaction. But I could not decline your invitation.

After saying this much, let me come to the work I want you to do. The Chairman has given you some idea about it. The fact that from the activities going on here he selected only two suggests that I am going to ask for those very things from you—khadi and prohibition. You must understand what these two things mean. You have got into the habit of giving away money as donation, and so, you are sure to give it. But when something becomes a matter of habit it loses its virtue. If a man always speaks the truth it is not a trait cultivated in childhood but his inborn nature. It is in your nature to give away money. It would be a novel thing if you do something more. That is why when I came to you last time I told you that if you wished to make some tangible sacrifice, you must give up your fondness for city life. Your population throughout the world is of about one lakh. Out of this the majority is in India and that too mainly in Bombay and Gujarat. You do business worth millions of rupees and naturally you have become one with the cities. One can see your impact very much in Bombay and Karachi. But what about the villages? Your impact does not reach the villages. And it is quite evident that it is not felt there. If the Parsis scatter themselves in seven lakh villages they would be completely lost, for, there would be one Parsi for every seven villages. Moreover, this population of one lakh includes men, women and children. Hence, you cannot reach all the villages. But you can certainly influence them [through supporting khadi].

The khadi which the villagers produce is meant not only for the Hindus and Muslims but also for the Parsis. Hence you can reach and influence the villages by using the khadi produced there. You know that men and women in Utkal walk four to five miles in the hope of obtaining rice worth one pice or some work. Just think of their plight. I have received a letter from Utkal today in which it is said that it is possible to do a lot of khadi work there; but from where to get the workers? And, who would use that khadi? I am at least having a loin-cloth. Those men in Utkal do not have even that. What they are wearing cannot be called a loin-cloth. They are merely rags. How can these people bathe? They must at least have a change of clothes after their bath. They have to carry on with just one loin-cloth.
Millions of people live in such conditions. If I can provide them work for a pice, they would be able to get something at any rate. In Utkal I met ten thousand weavers. They told me that nobody bought the cloth they had woven. Those weavers had been weaving mill yarn. I had to tell them that I would become their customer if they would weave khadi out of hand-spun yarn. Moreover they would have to spin themselves. What charity can you give when conditions of such poverty and starvation prevail and where people are ready to work for a pice and ask for so little? They cannot fill their stomachs with cash and they would become invalids. How can one give charity to anyone who is able to work? He can be given charity only in terms of work. Hence I told them that they must work and take their wages and buy cheap rice. We can even give them that rice at subsidized price. So much can and has been done. Many of them, therefore, have not accepted alms and have taken up work. I want such pure charity from you. You have given money and will give more. But I would not be satisfied with that much. I would be satisfied only if you would serve Daridranarayana. They would not come to ask for alms. You should provide them with work.

What work can be provided for millions of men? There should be some home industry for them. That industry can only be the spinning-wheel. And it can thrive on if you would buy the khadi made by the millions. If you visit the local Khadi Bhandar you would get any type of khadi, in any colour and of a fine texture. No Parsi woman would be able to say that she cannot get the type of khadi that she would like to have or would suit her. If you have forgotten or do not know it, let me tell you that there are 75 Parsi women in Bombay who maintain themselves by doing khadi embroidery. Dadabhoy’s granddaughters have engaged them for that work. Mithubehn Petit also does similar work. She has gone to the villages. In Bombay the women earn [daily] wages of one, two and even three rupees out of this kind of work.

These women print designs and embroider khadi and thereby make it acceptable to the women who are fond of these things. You can help these women. Bhai Sidhva has, while talking about khadi, stated that you women buy not foreign cloth but swadeshi mill cloth. You only fill the coffers of the millionaires. I have not come here to beg on behalf of the millionaires, but I ask for donations on behalf of Daridranarayana. And that too not donations in the form of money. You must appreciate the craftsmanship of the poor. Adorn yourselves by wearing the khadi made by them.

Liquor was another thing that Bhai Sidhva mentioned. I was very much delighted when I learnt from your report that 80 per cent of you had given up liquor. But I heard there that this 80 per cent applies to the occasions of marriage and navjot when liquor is not served. I had thought that it had stopped even in private homes. I would not be satisfied if it has not gone from homes. Still, whatever has happened is a good thing. But the work would be complete only when the evil of drink has disappeared from homes. Some Parsis tell me that toddy does one good rather than harm. Some may even say that the proportion of alcohol is more in whisky and less in toddy and lesser still if the toddy is fresh. That way even those who take beer fool themselves. I have seen drunkenness among people who take both these. It is not as if those who do not drink toddy are unhealthy and those who take it do not have to go to the doctors. I have seen a whole array of medicine bottles in the houses of some Parsi friends who are habitual toddy drinkers. So I request the Parsis and would go on requesting them till I die that they must give up this evil thing. If the Parsis in general give up liquor, those Parsis who earn their livelihood out of it would also be convinced. You are people with great enterprise. If you realize that this is not a worthy occupation, you would take up something else. I can never persuade myself to believe that the Parsi community lacks the spirit do discovery and adventure and enterprise. You are capable of finding your way where others may not.

You have given me Rs. 352 for Harijan work. In a way, I have no right to ask money from you for that work. I always ask money from you for everything. But when I take money from you for the work which is meant for the Hindus it implies something else. The direct objective of this activity is to wipe out untouchability which involves 50 million people. This is such a great corroding factor in Hinduism that it has penetrated into other fields as well and untouchability has become a widespread thing. A large number of wise Parsis come to me and say that the distinctions of high and low have always existed, and so I need not pursue this activity. I ask them: “Since when have you become such Vedantists? And when did you study the Hindu Shastras?” They might have read a few sacred books; and since the Parsis have a custom of consulting astrologers, they might have heard something from them; and from that they might have come to the conclusion that the differences of high and low have existed since time immemorial. Is untouchability something that the prophet Zoroaster preached? The feeling of high and low is something Satanic. It can never be divine. The evil that is going on in the name of Hindu religion has penetrated all religions. The same religions prevailing outside India may not have even the slightest tinge of it; but it has definitely entered those religions as soon as they landed in India. It is such a dark well. The other wide implication of removing untouchability is the feeling of brotherhood amongst all religions. It does not mean doing away with the differences among religions. Just as men have different names and faces, these religions also are different. But just as men are all human in spite of their different names and forms, just as leaves of a tree though different as leaves are the same as leaves of the same tree, all religions though different are the same. We must treat all religions as equal. It is this lofty consequence of this activity that I have in mind. But for it I would not have decided to devote my life to this work. I am not such a fool that I would offer to sacrifice my life for a trifling job, go from village to village at the age of 65 and beg for two pice or even a pice. This work that I have begun not only means the liberation of 50 millions, but I have to melt the hardened hearts of the caste Hindus for their liberation. If those hearts can be melted, untouchability which has gone so deep and whose impact is so widespread can be eradicated. I do not hesitate of feel ashamed to take money from you for such a widespread activity.

1 A Parsi religious ceremony where a boy or a girl is invested with the sacred thread.

I have shown you what the removal of untouchability should mean to you. I am of course taking this money you have offered; but along with it I wish to carry away the hearts of the Parsi men and women, and seek your blessings that God should grant me rapid success in this work.

201. LETTER TO MRIDULA SARABHAI

July 12, 1934

CHI. MRIDULA,

I am replying to your letter in the moving train.

All similes are misleading. They can be carried only up to a point. You should have taken this view of the simile I used. I would not hesitate to admit that the Congress misled the public into a fraudulent activity. To some extent I had a hand in framing those rules. If I can have a say, I shall definitely wind up the fraud of swadeshi through the Congress. Whatever purpose that fraud had to serve has been served. Now I see that it is only doing harm. But it may well be useful to those who still do not see it as a fraudulent activity. It is merely a question of discernment. I have patience.

My blessings to Bharati, Suhrid, Nimubehn and Indu. They must be all doing well. Nothing has gone wrong with me. The body and the mind are terribly fatigued. I need sleep very badly. I am trying to have it.

You need not be alarmed by my coming fast'.

202. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

July 12, 1934

CHI. MIRA,

This is being written in a moving train.

I hope you duly received a note of authority on his banker. I do not know for how much it was. You will let me know your requirement in due time.

For the whole of August at least I am free. The way before me after is not at all clear and I do not worry. He will show the next step. Andrews is due on 25th August.

You will keep your health. Please know that I shall not mind if you show no visible result from your visit to England. The experience

1 Which Gandhiji was to undertake from August 7 to August 13. For his statement on the fast, vide “Statement on Fast”, 10-7-1934 you will gain is adequate result for me. Therefore you will not be impatient with yourself or your surroundings.

I am keeping quite well. The fatigue is there. But that is inevitable.

Love.

203. INTERVIEW TO “THE TRIBUNE”

July 12, 1934

Gandhiji, who was very tired, first hesitated to give any interview saying that his brain was not working owing to the fatigue from the strain of the journey; but being pressed to give a message to the people of the Punjab he said:

I wish I would get the quiet I am pining for in Lahore. The terrific noises that greeted me at every station have already shattered my nerves, which are now ill-fitted to stand such strain, nor are these noises conducive to the reception of the message of essential brotherhood I am struggling to deliver. I long for a suitable atmosphere for its delivery.

July 13, 1934

CHI. UTTAMCHAND,

I got your letter. Just now I don’t feel like criticizing you or other co-workers for what you or they do. Maybe through the present separation itself the sincere ones will come together. Anybody who earns an honest pie will certainly be doing service thus. Please remain where you are without feeling any regret and see that both of you improve your health. When the time comes, you may return. Why do you worry about my fast?

206. INTERVIEW TO PROVINCIAL CONGRESS LEADERS

LAHORE,
July 13, 1934

Provincial Congress leaders including Lala Dunichand of Ambala, Raizada Hansraj and Lala Sham Lal met Gandhiji. One of the questions discussed was that of the elimination of undesirable elements from the Congress in the new scheme of re-organization. Gandhiji admitted the existence of such elements, but he could not see his way under the present constitution of the Congress to prevent such undesirable elements from becoming members of the Congress. The only way to keep such elements in check was to strengthen the better element in the Congress.

At the same time he pointed out that at the instance of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru a rule had been framed that if an office-bearer of the Congress acted in a manner prejudicial to the discipline of the Congress, he could be dealt with.

The next topic discussed was that of lack of co-operation among Congress workers and leaders. Gandhiji said that the only way in which this could be dealt with was to evolve higher character and a noble spirit of service among Congress workers.

Gandhiji was then asked how power, influence and prestige could be secured for the Congress as that alone could enable the Congress to meet the reactionary and hostile forces in the country. It was pointed out that if the country sent higher type of men to the legislatures, that would give some additional prestige and influence to the Congress. Gandhiji agreed with this, but laid emphasis on the fact that Congressmen should acquire influence and position in the Councils by dint of their service and work.
The question of employing a large contingent of paid workers for every province next came up. Gandhiji agreed with the proposal that a large number of paid workers to carry on the work of the Congress should be employed in every province; and to some extent already there were paid men in the All-India and Provincial Congress organizations, though on a small scale. Gandhiji was requested to remove the idea prevailing among the public regarding paid workers, and he said that he would write on the subject, though he had previously written on the subject.

The question of the Communal Award was also raised. It was pointed out that if the Communal Award became an accomplished fact and a Constitution based on it became legal statute, it would become extremely difficult for any future national Government to undo the mischief that it would have done by that time. Gandhiji replied that he recognized such evils in case of effect being given to the Communal Award but he saw no solution of the problem unless all parties concerned agreed to an equitable scheme.

207. INTERVIEW TO HARIJAN DEPUTATION

LAHORE,

July 13, 1934

That he was maturing the scheme to start an Industrial Home at Delhi for the Harijans was the information conveyed by Gandhiji to the Harijan deputation that met him this afternoon.

With reference to the suggestion that the Harijan Sangh should agitate for annulment of the Punjab Land Alienation Act, Gandhiji said that Harijan Sangh being a non-political social reform body, is unable to do anything in this respect and cannot come in conflict with the Government on such political matters.

208. SPEECH AT STUDENTS’ MEETING, LAHORE

July 13, 1934

I am very grateful to all of you who have presented me with the address and the purses. That which I feared has happened. This meeting was arranged exclusively for students but the general public has come in. This is not proper. Even yesterday when I saw the huge crowd I was afraid that my car would break down on the way. On work for which a quarter of an hour was enough you wasted an hour and quarter of my time. Therefore, in future, only those for whom a meeting is fixed should attend it. Service to Harijans is a religious undertaking and so it can be accomplished by penance alone. Such tasks can only be performed in a peaceful and quiet atmosphere. Perhaps this is my last tour of the Punjab, because I may not be able to come here again. Therefore, I should like to impress upon you [the importance of my message] as strongly as I can during this tour. I thank all the students who have shown interest in the task of service to Harijans.

In your two addresses you have in all humility acknowledged your shortcomings. And for this I cannot thank you enough, however, much I try. Even in order to acquire knowledge, one must recognize one’s ignorance and acknowledge it in all humility. That you have acknowledged it is a good sign. Please understand the limitations and conditions of this activity. I congratulate the students of this college who are taking part in it, and hope for their greater participation. As I told the students at Karachi, this work can be carried out only by self-sacrifice, penance and suffering. Moreover, the work is to be carried on not in the cities but mainly in the villages. You say that you wish to treat Harijans as your own and that you do not discriminate against them. If this is true, do your duty towards them. It is not enough that you treat the Harijan boys on equal terms in schools and colleges. Your duty consists in going to the Harijans in the villages, treating them as your own and loving them. You will realize when you go there that they have very little knowledge about rules of sanitation. Some of them are given to drinking and carrion-eating. You have to go and convince them. How can that be done? It is not possible by going there like sahebs. Rather, you would have to go there in simplicity and humility. In that work college education is of little use. If you carry with you the fragrance of courtesy, religious sentiment, truthfulness and abstinence, you will be able to influence them. Giving orders or feeling superior will serve no purpose. It would be done only by remaining their servants and fulfilling the conditions which I have indicated. It is enough if you can spare some time after studies.

Hinduism and the Hindu community would perish unless untouchability is eradicated. That adharma, that blemish, that poison is so widespread and it has been with us for so long that we are not able to feel its poisonous effect. But it is corroding us. A person like me sees with his naked eye that religion is well on the path of destruction. This poison has not remained confined to the Harijans. It has of course affected the 60 millions, but it has spread to the caste Hindus as well. It has also reached the Muslim and Christian communities that come in contact with us. It is most important and essential that we wipe out the difference of high and low among us.

If we want to do that work, we have to fulfil two conditions. You tell me that you indulge in pleasures and think anxiously about examinations day and night. But you are not satisfied with what you get out of it and you are eager to improve this state of affairs. I do not wish to suggest that because you say these things you must leave your schools and colleges. But, while remaining in your schools and colleges, secure that education which is not provided there; and supplement the education imparted there. At present, the minds of the students become dull there. They can only imitate. Instead of this, they must acquire the power of independent thinking. We are born into this world not for indulging in sensuous activities but for sacrifice, for restraint. The purpose of education is that we know God and progress towards the ideal, and get closer to Him. It is the strict law of God that anyone who desires to be close to Him should renounce the world and yet be in it. This is what the first mantra of the Ishopanishad exhorts us to do. This thing is difficult and yet easy at the same time. It is easy if we believe that we have to live for service. We acquire learning not for sensuous pleasures and for earning but for mukti. Education is considered necessary to save ourselves from darkness, sensuous pleasures and capricious behaviour. If we understand this, we can put our learning to good use. If you understand this much, you would not be worried about examinations. You would be calm if you succeed and not be despondent if you fail.

You have said in your address that you are given to sensuous pleasures. This implies that you have given up khadi. The fact that you have given up khadi in the Punjab where it is readily available means that you have given up Daridranarayana, the village and the village people. Khadi is produced by the villagers. Millions of unemployed people and those who can find no other occupation are able to earn a little by it. In my view, you have committed a grave crime by giving up khadi. You are getting education for which the villagers pay. Not every student among you pays for the education he receives. Apart from your tuition fee, there is much other expenditure incurred for you, and that money comes from the villages. You study with the help of the money from the villages, and what do you give them in return? Nothing! Wearing khadi is the least you should do. Serve Daridranarayana to this extent. To label anything else than khadi as swadeshi is a false claim. By calling it swadeshi you are deceiving yourselves and the world. Save yourselves from this deception.

216. SPEECH AT WOMEN STUDENTS’ MEETING,
LAHORE

JULY 14, 1934

I am grateful to you for the purses you have presented me for the service of the Harijans. One sister has presented me a garland² of yarn. I felt very sad when I saw this garland. It seems as if the sister who made this garland had no idea of the science of spinning. This yarn can be put to no use. As soon as yarn is spun it should be made into spools. The state of this yarn is exactly as pitiable as our condition. We are ourselves responsible for it. The self is its own friend and also its own enemy. This applies to girls, women and men equally. I have had the acquaintance of countless girls during my tours. Form the point of view of them all I am not a man but only a woman. When I was in South Africa, I had realized that if I did not serve the cause of women, all my work would remain unfinished. And perhaps this is the reason why when I go to a women’s assembly, the women there think that a friend has come in their midst. I consider myself the father of thousands of girls. It has always been my endeavour to be both father and mother to girls. In this capacity I shall mention one thing to you here. Outward show and fashion is increasing among the Punjabi girls. I can see much luxury here. Although this may not be true of all, it is true of most of you. Our civilization too has been encouraging this luxury. If all of us fell a prey to pleasure, we shall be ruined. History teaches us that nations steeped in luxury and pleasure are destroyed. It is difficult to rise from the depths of luxury. So my entreaty to you is to give up this fashion and not to indulge in luxuries and pleasures. Unfortunately, the literature taught in our schools and colleges is also tending towards these things. But it is gratifying that this literature cannot reach the crores and only a few thousand have access to it. Just as water flows downwards, people given to sensual pleasures surely head for a downfall. We do not realize this but it is eating into our vitals. If you wish to save yourselves from such suicidal pleasures, this is the time. I appeal to you to be on your guard immediately.

¹ Vide “Telegram to G. D. Birla”, 14-7-1934

Now for the subject of service to Harijans. I have told the boys and I say the same thing to you to devote the time you can spare from studies in the service of the Harijans. In this way so much work can be accomplished. You can help a great deal in the work for the abolition of untouchability. Khaddar you must adopt. Along with it be proficient in the art of spinning. When I visited Punjab ten years ago, I saw very fine charkhas here. But I find they are not in good condition today. It is true Orissa Province is much poorer as compared to the Punjab but culture there is better than it is here. If you wish to help a poor province like Orissa please ply the charkha. Thus you will not only spend your leisure usefully but you will be free from sensual pleasures. Do devote your spare time in the service of Harijans and in spinning. You should always wear only khadi.

Concluding, Mahatma Gandhi said that those who had ornaments on their persons should part with them for the Harijan cause. He knew that the Punjabi girls were not very fond of ornaments. He could take ornaments from other parts of India also. But those who wanted to offer their ornaments should send them on to him and those who could make monetary contribution should also give money for the Harijan purse.

217. SPEECH AT WOMEN’S MEETING, LAHORE

Gandhiji in his speech thanked the women for the addresses and purses presented¹ to him. He asked the women to remove the curse of untouchability, otherwise, he said, Hinduism would die. The women of India, he said, had always protected the religion of this country and they were embodiments of renunciation.

Gandhiji then explained the meaning of untouchability to the women. They had, he said, been cherishing the feeling of high and low amongst them so long. This feeling must be removed. Unless this was removed untouchability could not go. Tulsidas had told them the essence of religion in two words. And that was this: daya (charity and pity) was the foundation of all religions and that abhiman (pride) made them feel high and low. And when abhiman was removed form them and they took resort to daya, then abhiman was lost and they became truly religious.

In the end Gandhiji appealed to the women to part with their ornaments and make monetary contributions for the Harijan cause. He also asked the women to cultivate the habit of simplicity and serve the Daridranarayana, because in that, he said, lay their welfare.

Gandhiji once more thanked the women and concluded his speech amidst constant noise and uproar.

218. LETTER TO DR. B. C. ROY

July 15, 1934

DEAR DR. BIDHAN,

I have your letter.

I shall hold myself in readiness to see the Governor. I shall want also to see the editor of The Statesman. I shall therefore ask you to reserve some time for him too.

I suppose a public meeting for men and one for women will be necessary. And then there is the foundation of another wing or is it the opening?

There is nothing wrong with me, but I have a feeling of intense mental and physical tiredness. I love to sleep whenever I get the

CHI. VIDYA

I got your letter. You are unnecessarily worrying. What does it matter if someone reads your letters? Surely you don’t write anything of which you need feel ashamed? We should welcome our elders, guardians and teachers to read our letters. Of course we should see that nobody reads them without our knowledge. Since you have forbidden me, henceforward I will not send your letters to Bhai. But you should withdraw your ban.

We shall now be meeting in a few days. Don’t get tired of that place.

220. INTERVIEW TO AKALI AND KHALSA DURBAR DEPUTATION

LAHORE,
July 15, 1934

Gandhiji enquired of the deputation the cause of the retirement of Master Tara Singh from Sikh politics. Sardar Mangal Singh briefly explained the facts.

The deputationists then placed their point of view before Gandhiji regarding the Communal Award. They expressed disapproval of the non-committal policy of the Congress in the matter of Communal Award and said that the Sikhs had taken a vow not to submit to it. They, therefore, while supporting the Congress in all other matters, were determined to carry on their fight in the legislatures against the Communal Award and to otherwise safeguard Sikh rights. They informed Gandhiji that the Khalsa Durbar had decided to run their own candidates in the coming Assembly elections.

Gandhiji, who listened to the viewpoint of the Sikhs with attention, replying, explained the Congress position and said that the rejection of the White Paper meant the rejection and the lapse of the Communal Award. He added that no constitution would be acceptable to the Congress which did not satisfy the Sikhs. Similarly the Congress would not reject what the Mussalmans wanted nor could it accept what the Hindus or Sikhs rejected. Therefore if there was no Congress candidate among Sikhs, a Congress voter with conscientious scruples would abstain from voting. But if there was an otherwise safe candidate against a reactionary, he would be free to use his vote to defeat the out-and-out reactionary.

The deputationists at this stage drew the attention of Gandhiji to the necessity of issuing proper instructions to the anti-untouchability workers to restrict themselves to Harijan uplift work and to refrain from making it a religious conversion propaganda. This was needed, they said, because in the Punjab there were so-called untouchables who professed Sikh faith.

Gandhiji said that he had numerous complaints against Sikhs to the effect that they were tempting Hindu Harijans to reject Hinduism and to become Sikhs. If this was the case it was certainly reprehensible. For his part he did not believe in conversion propaganda and it was no part of the Harijan Sevak Sangh’s plan.

221. INTERVIEW TO DEPUTATION OF PUNJAB HINDUS AND SIKHS

July 15, 1934

It is reported that Mahatma Gandhi admitted that an injustice had been done to the Hindus and the Sikhs, but he wanted to know a practical scheme by which the Communal Award could be scrapped or modified. The present policy of the Congress was something inevitable in the circumstances. The policy of the Congress was to accept any settlement that was agreed by all communities, even if it fell short of the Mahatma Gandhi assured the deputation that he was thinking of the matter night and day and had come to the conclusion that the only way to modify the Award was to get the White Paper scrapped.

222. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, LAHORE

July 15, 1934

Ever since I first came to the Punjab, the Punjabis have showered their love on me. They have always met me in their thousands but this time their numbers have been much greater than before, so much so the D. A. V. College Hostel ground in unable to accommodate this vast assembly. To me this phenomenon is very satisfactory; for I have not come today with a political mission but for a mission which is purely religious and which I have been carrying on in a purely religious spirit. The vast numbers that attend the meetings are to me a sign that it will be well with both the country and Hinduism. There is no end to our difficulties but the vast meetings that I have been addressing leave no doubt in my mind that we shall be able to remove untouchability root and branch. I have seen during my tour that thousands have attended the morning prayer; the sight that I witnessed at this morning’s prayer would have moved anyone and would have inspired faith even in an atheist. They were about 10,000 in number but pin-drop silence prevailed and they sat with rapt attention for about 25 minutes and I presume they thought of God alone in those moments. All these experiences have deepened my faith in God and I feel that I am but an instrument in His hand. He seems to have ordained that untouchability, which held its sway over Hindu society for hundreds of years, should now be abolished. He seems to be bringing about a transformation in the hearts of savarna Hindus. This vast meeting is a testimony to that transformation.

The object of this movement is neither to score a victory over any other community nor to increase the number of Hindus. It is essentially a movement of self-purification and of ridding Hinduism of the blot of untouchability. I see that you are unable to sit quiet and probably you are not satisfied with seeing me for these few minutes. I tell you, however, that I am made of common clay as much as you are and you will be able to gain nothing by merely seeing me. You will gain much only if you act up to what I say.

1 The source had reported that this was a summary of Gandhiji’s speech obtained from his secretary by one of its representatives. Gandhiji was inaudible at the meeting.

I repeat what I have said from a thousand platforms that, if we did not remove untouchability, both Hinduism and Hindus would perish.

223. LETTER TO ABUL KALAM AZAD

July 16, 1934

DEAR MAULANA SAHEB,

I have your letter. Of course I shall gladly see the Governor during my stay in Calcutta and do whatever is possible. Dr. Bidhan wrote to me two days ago.

The fast had to come. Such was God’s will. So long as He desires service from me, I shall be unhurt.

I reach there 19th morning.

225. LETTER TO DILIP KUMAR ROY

July 16, 1934

MY DEAR DILIP,

I have your letter and enclosures. The letter came into my hands only yesterday. It went first to Bombay and then by oversight remained with one of my helpers for some days.

My difficulty is fundamental. I do not believe that my present activity is less conducive to self-realization or merger in the Divine than abstention would be. Sannyasa is not cessation of all physical activity. It means to me cessation of all activity, mental or physical that is selfish. If I could be convinced that cessation is the better way for me, I should adopt it at once.

I am no judge of poetry. Of what use, therefore, can be any opinion of mine on your poems! I have really no opinion to offer. But now Mahadev is free. He is himself a poet. And he will, I doubt not, give you his opinion after I have explained the thing to him.

Yours sincerely,

226. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

LAHORE,
July 16, 1934

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

I never expected that you would be released. The Government and we both have been following our own ways independently of each other. That is good in a way. People will know what both of us mean. After you have studied the whole situation I will ask for your view as an impartial judge. You may seem to agree out of loyalty as a co-worker, but the truth is that the habit of agreeing with all that I do is not likely to have been cured by a few years of imprisonment.

I like your decision to come only after you have got your nose trouble completely cured. Your presence at Benares is certainly necessary, but we will do without you if the condition of your nose does not permit you to come.

It wouldn’t have been advisable to refuse to visit . . .1. Our workers also desired that I should go. He will gain nothing by my visit. It is true, however, that the atmosphere at Ajmer and elsewhere is full of violence. You will hear echoes of it even there.

I found Lalnath to be the best man in that part. He is brave, too. He always kept his word. But of course he did criticize and abuse me. Everybody has a right to do that. This is not the first time that he was assaulted. His men also have been assaulted. But he has never lodged a complaint with the police. Generally he and his men do not even ask for police protection. Moreover, he has good control over his men. If I had not kept strict control over our workers, Lalnath and his men would have sustained serious injuries and our cause would have suffered. Only today I received a letter from somebody who says he had played a part in inciting people against Lalnath. He wants to know what he should do to atone for his lapse. He is one of our best workers. He is a writer and a poet. Tell me now, was I not right in announcing a fast? Whom should I consult in such matters? And where? If a person is bitten by a snake, would a physician who knows the remedy argue about its merits with other people or would he apply it straightaway? Surely it can give me no pleasure to take such steps without consulting co-workers. But I find myself helpless in such cases. Ghanshyamdas had wired to me requesting that he should be consulted before I took any decision. I, therefore, wrote to him. He left the decision to me. Devdas suggested a fourday fast. Jairamdas felt that a fast was necessary, and advised that, if I did fast, it should not be for a period of less than seven days. Bapa did not oppose the idea. As for Chandrashankar, poor man, how could he oppose me? Kaka couldn’t find any argument to oppose me. The great task on which we have embarked cannot be accomplished without undertaking such fasts. There is no limit to the awakening among the people.

In Lahore and other places I see crowds such as I have never seen before.

I do feel convinced about one thing. You should force me to stop travelling by rail and car, let me stay at one place and tour on foot—if, that is, I am out of jail—which I shall be during August. After that Rama alone knows.

Andrews will arrive here on the 25th. Swami will give you enough news and Chandrashankar also will write.

I am going to Calcutta, purely for cleaning our house there. But I had a letter from Dr. Bidhan Roy telling me that most probably I would have to see the Governor. That possibility was certainly there. Agatha and others had strongly pressed for a meeting. Now it seems to have become a certainty. The discussion will be exclusively about the terrorism in Bengal. More after the meeting. And since Mahadev is with me now, you will get all the news you want.

Mani should get very strong again. This time, however, her health does seem to have suffered fairly. She is only putting on a brave face. I am not writing to her separately today.

Blessings from

231. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

July 17, 1934

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I have your letter. I get frightened when I think of your responsibilities on the one hand and your ear-trouble on the other. Now that Vallabhbhai has been released, I expect that the burden on you will become lighter in a month or so. It will be enough if you do the best you can without worrying about anything. Do what you can about Bihar. There are things which we cannot improve, do what we will. I will explain this when we meet. Only you can bring about some improvement, if at all, in Mahendrababu’s management. I cannot understand the problems. I shall be able to understand the account relating to Bihar.

I read the article criticizing the Ashram. No reply is necessary. If we can safeguard the Ashram, everything will be well. We will solve the problem. You may write to Gangabehn and Prema if you wish. The chances of their coming are remote. The latter has developed new interests now. It can do no good to press anybody to come against her wishes. But now continues to write to me. He is trying to see you.

I am well. You should have no fear regarding my fast. It is clear that it is absolutely necessary.

232. LETTER TO MANILAL AND SUSHILA GANDHI

July 17, 1934

CHI. MANILAL AND SUSHILA,

Please do not worry about the fast I have to take up in August. God will see me through it. Don’t worry about attempts on my life either. They are nothing new. I have survived such attempts so far and will survive them as long as God wills. When He wills otherwise, a mere yawn will end my life.

Ramdas doesn’t keep good health. He will improve if he goes there. Can he and a vaid accompanying him get permission to go there? If it is possible, please secure it and send it here. The companion’s name in Raghunandan Sharma.

I am writing this letter from Lahore. We are leaving this place today. Devdas is here. Mahadev, who has been released, Pyarelal and Kakasaheb are with me. It is, therefore, a family gathering, so to say.

I am all right.

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 4822
I want you to keep up the practice you have now started of beginning your day’s work with early morning prayers as you have been doing with me these few days. You may have them either privately in your own respective homes or congregationally in some central place in your localities. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of this prayer. When one begins the day with a devout prayer all his day’s work will be informed with a spirit of purity and prayerfulness. The time for it is the early hour of the dawn when the sun, the most luminous of God’s manifestations, reveals to us His witnessing presence in all that we do.

I shall tell you now one or two marks of genuine worshipper of God. One is a spirit of friendliness and brotherhood for the oppressed and the depressed. This cannot express itself better than by befriending the Harijan and you cannot befriend him in a better way than by getting off his back, so that he may no longer remain the beast of burden and the downtrodden creature that we have kept him for ages, and that he may breathe and move free.

The other mark is the service of Daridranarayana—India’s starving millions among whom are included, of course, the Harijans, but whereas the poorest of the poor, if he is not an untouchable, may move about free wherever he pleases, even the richest Harijan may not enter a Hindu temple and use a public well. Whilst, therefore, the service of the Harijans lies in the eradication of untouchability, the service of the poor lies in enabling him to find work and to add to his scanty income. The best way to do this thing is the habitual use of khaddar and daily sacrificial spinning. If all the women of the Punjab were to make a resolve to give all their spare time to spinning, I am sure they would be able not only to clothe the whole of the Punjab but also to send out cloth to other provinces.

If you do these two things, I should unhesitatingly say that you are going nearer to God every day, provided that all that you do is done not for show or self-advertisement but in a spirit of service and humanity. There is a third thing which also I would declare to be the distinguishing mark of a man of prayer—the spirit of silence. The noise and the din of meetings jar on me wherever I go. You should all make a point of avoiding all bustle and noise and cultivating a spirit of orderliness and discipline. These are three out of the many implications of prayer which I want you all to bear in mind.

234. DISCUSSION WITH VOLUNTEERS

July 17, 1934

Gandhiji, in the course of a short speech said that the volunteers spent a lot of their time in looking after his personal comforts wherever he went. They should instead look to their general duty and service of which they had taken a vow to fulfil.

Questioned, Gandhiji said he had no objection to the volunteers taking military training, but they must abstain from violence. He asked them not to use violence even if women were attacked by the mob, because he thought that women were not helpless and they were strong enough to take care of themselves.1

235. DISCUSSION WITH FRONTIER LEADERS

July 17, 1934

Gandhiji has advised the fullest voluntary obedience of the law in pursuance of the Congress decision.

This, it is understood, has been definitely promised by the Frontier leaders, who are anxious to do nothing to weaken Gandhiji’s hands and give Congress prestige a shock.2

The delegation conveyed the love and respect of the Frontier people for Mahatma, who also reciprocated his feeling of love for Frontier Pathans.

1 Gandhiji met the volunteers in the morning at Lajpat Rai Bhavan.
2 The report concluded: “The women volunteers who were present supported Gandhiji’s view and the meeting came to a close.”
3 The source had reported that the Frontier Province Congressmen, representing the districts of Peshawar, Bannu, Kohat and Hazara, met Gandhiji in the morning. They were led by Pir Shahen Shah, President, Frontier Congress Committee.
4 What follows is reproduced from _The Bombay Chronicle_.

VOL. 64 : 20 MAY, 1934 - 15 SEPTEMBER, 1934 187
Mahatma Gandhi expressed his desire to visit the Frontier Province and told the delegation:

I regard Frontier Gandhi, Abdul Ghaffar Khan, as dear to my heart as Devdas.

Finally, Gandhiji conveyed his message of love to the Frontier people through them and said, he could never forget them in his life and their particular difficulties and troubles were ever in his mind.

236. SPEECH TO PUNJAB NATIONALIST WORKERS, LAHORE

July 17, 1934

Gandhiji said it was harder to carry out their programme of work than to go to jail. He himself found it much easier to go to jail and spend a quiet time there reading his books and drinking goat’s milk than to carry out a strenuous and taxing programme in the country. Gandhiji added humourously that Mrs. Gandhi had suggested to him to go to jail and have an easier time there than tire himself our with strenuous work outside.

Mahatma Gandhi added that their programme had to be worked out now and it would be wrong to think that they could wait till swaraj was achieved for completing it. He advised the workers to distribute the work among themselves and carry it out sincerely. Let truth be their motto and work would prosper. This was a time of peace and their message should be one of peace. Referring to the reception given to him at Lahore on his arrival, Gandhiji said he was slightly hurt physically by those who wanted to touch his feet. He could well meet crowds of thousands of people if there was no noise. Swaraj could not be attained by noise.

The Hindustan Times, 18-7-1934

237. SPEECH TO KHADI WORKERS, LAHORE

July 17, 1934

Addressing the khadi workers, Gandhiji described khadi as annapurna (the butter part of food), for, if our peasants took to spinning, they could have butter to add to their bread or rice. The other cottage industries could support thousands at the most, while khadi was an indispensable cottage industry for crores. Khadi could bring about an automatic adjustment between the supply and the demand, for the peasants would mainly produce it for themselves and their neighbours and but little transportakhadi, if weaver families spun the yarn to be woven by themselves. Again, if a producer of cotton wanted cloth free of cost, he had only to carry out himself all the processes from picking to cotton to weaving. This would not take the bread out of the weaver’s mouth, because, if the whole of India took to khadi, they would need twice as many weavers as there were now. Khadi was the only swadeshi cloth; it was pure humbug to describe Indian mill-cloth as swadeshi in the same breath as khadi.¹

Till now I have been very lenient but henceforward I cannot but be strict. I recruited to the Charkha Sangh even those who did not know spinning in the hope that good workers would be found only from among such people. I have now come to the conclusion that the latitude shown has been quite enough. Every worker of the Charkha Sangh must learn and become fully proficient in ginning, carding and spinning. He should be well versed in weaving also. This will greatly facilitate our work in the villages and expedite the advent of freedom.

238. INTERVIEW TO JOURNALISTS

LAHORE, July 17, 1934

The journalists, who numbered between twenty and thirty, desired a message from him but Gandhiji said he was not selling goods gratis and wanted them to pay the price for a message in the shape of a contribution to the _Harijan_ Fund. A ring came forth and then a few rupees and coppers totalling Rs. 16. . . .

Gandhiji said that . . . if they were really serious about the message they should make up Rs. 50 . . . .

A member of the staff of one of the papers present undertook to make up the balance required and remit it in the evening.

Gandhiji responded by saying that of course he did credit business and would give a message on that basis . . . . He said:

The extraordinary enthusiasm with which I was greeted at the Lahore railway station and which has been sustained throughout my five days stay in the Punjab has been a matter of great joy as it has been also a matter equally of great enthusiasm.

How I wish all this enthusiasm turned into the direction of a solid, continuous and constructive work. It behoves the Punjab leaders to harness this enthusiasm, which is running waste. It is a matter of joy also that the people, rich and poor alike, spontaneously came to offer their quota to the Harijan Purse Fund. To me it is sure that the donors believe in the removal of the curse of untouchability from Hinduism. Referring to morning mass prayers, Mahatma Gandhi said that there was complete silence and revered attention. That was evidently observed by vast audiences when verses were chanted. It was to him a sure sign of their heart-felt co-operation in this movement of self-purification.

VOL. 64 : 20 MAY, 1934 - 15 SEPTEMBER, 1934 189

Concluding, Mahatma Gandhi said that the one thing that saddened him most was the condition of the Harijans in Lahore which he thought testified to the criminal neglect by the Municipality of its most deserving employees and citizens. Mahatma Gandhi referred particularly to lighting and sanitary arrangements and want of tap-water in the Harijan quarters.

I know that Municipal finances all over India are in a bad plight. But surely its effect ought not be visited upon these most deserving and useful employees and citizens. I hope, therefore, that complaints about insufficiency of water, want of light and sanitary conveniences, will receive immediate attention. Whatever be the difficulties in the Municipality, surely this essential humanitarian work should not be allowed to suffer.

I have a great deal to say about the manner of living, conditions of work, and economic condition of these people, but I do not want unnecessarily to burden this message and I want the attention of the public and Municipality to be concentrated upon the grievance that is crying and capable of immediate redress.

The Hindustan Times, 18-7-1934

239. SPEECH AT GULABDEVI TUBERCULOSIS HOSPITAL, LAHORE

July 17, 1934

Mahatma Gandhi said that he thanked them for having asked him to perform the ceremonies. He was not surprised, he said, that the late Lalaji had wished him to perform the opening ceremony of this Hospital because of the intimate relations that he had with him. He was delighted that he could come to Lahore and take part in the opening ceremony of this Hospital.

Gandhiji said the present function put him in mind of Deshbandhu Das, who also had expressed a desire in his will that a hospital for women should be established.

1. The first and the last paragraph have been reproduced from The Tribune. This and the following item are extracted from “Weekly Letter” in Harijan.
2. Of unveiling the portrait of Gulabdevi and opening of the Hospital in Calcutta. The Chittaranjan Sevasadan was now a flourishing institution under the fostering care of Dr. Bidhan Roy. It was a remarkable coincidence that both these great Indian leaders cherished in their heart the idea of social service, especially service of women. The nation could not achieve greatness, unless our women were fitted to stand shoulder to shoulder with the men. Most of their leading men were social servants by choice and politicians only from necessity. They were powerful advocates of social reform. Everyone knew Lalaji as a great social worker, and he would have chosen social service as his life-work if had the choice. But no true servant of the people could now a days ignore politics. It was remarkable that the last wishes of Chittaranjan Das and Lalaji were centred on social service.

Those who knew Lalaji could not be surprised to learn that Lalaji had desired that preference should be given to Harijan women. There was no greater Harijan servant than Lalaji had been.

Tuberculosis hospitals were unfortunately a necessity, but Gandhiji trusted that the medical men in charge would attend to prevention no less than to the cure of the terrible scourge. The prevalence of tuberculosis in India, which was the land of perpetual sunshine, was rather inexplicable and required investigation. The medical staff of the hospital had the unique opportunity of studying the causes of tuberculosis among their patients and discovering means of prevention.

In the end, Gandhiji congratulated all who had helped to build this Hospital and hoped that they would help it with money.¹

240. SPEECH AT MODEL TOWN,² LAHORE

_July 17, 1934_

Referring to the rosy picture of the town drawn in the address, Gandhiji said he was sorry to learn that the picture did not seem to square with facts. A model town hardly deserved the name if it slavishly followed the bad old tradition of segregating Harijans, who did for society what every mother did for her own children. Then, again, he had heard that they lived in bad houses and were put to great hardship with regard to water. He trusted the good people of Model Town would investigate the complaint and fulfil their promise to treat Harijans on a footing of equality with themselves.

_Harijan,_ 3-8-1934

¹ Gandhiji then declared the Hospital open amidst cheers and afterwards inspected some of the buildings.

VOL. 64 : 20 MAY, 1934 - 15 SEPTEMBER, 1934
LAHORE,
July 17, 1934

When he was asked whether there was any hope of his abandoning the seven day’s fast he has announced to begin on the 7th August, now that Pandit Lal Nath had made an appeal to him to reconsider his decision, and in the light of the statement recently made by the Secretary, Rajputana Harijan Board, Mahatma Gandhi said :

There is no possibility of abandoning the fast.

Repeating to a further enquiry whether he was prescribing any penance for the Secretary of the Rajputana Harijan Board, as he had been asked by the Secretary, Mahatma Gandhi said that no penance save greater watchfulness was necessary on the part of the Secretary.

The next question was whether Mahatma Gandhi thought that his health would not be put to undue strain by this fast, following as it would his strenuous Harijan tour. The Mahatma replied that he did not anticipate any permanent injury.

Repeating to an enquiry whether there was any possibility of avoiding an election fight between the Hindu Maha Sabha and the Congress and of retaining Pandit Malaviya and Mr. Aney on the Congress Parliamentary Board, Mahatma Gandhi stated :

I can only say I shall try to avoid a split.

Mahatma Gandhi had no idea of this programme after the Harijan tour and the fast.

The final question was regarding the manner in which the Harijan Fund would be spent. The Mahatma said that three-fourths would return to the source from where it came, provided it could usefully be spent there. The balance would be used for constructive work.

242. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS OF INDIA

July 18, 1934

With reference to Sir Samuel Hoare’s reply in the Commons regarding the non-release of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Gandhiji said :

There is no reason for deferring the question till after the completion of the Harijan tour.

He was already considering it.

1 At New Delhi station en route to Calcutta
Asked what penance he proposed for the volunteer who beat Pandit Lal Nath at Ajmer and who confessed the act in a letter to a newspaper, Gandhiji said that he should put his brain in order.

Replying to another question regarding Doctor Alam’s resignation from the Working Committee, he said that it was due to domestic reasons.

243. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

July 19, 1934

CHI. MIRA,

Again I am writing this on the train. You must not expect long or informing letters from [me]. It is enough for me to send you my love from week to week. Chandrashankar does the rest effectively. And now Mahadev is free and so is Vallabhbhai. Pyarelal and Mahadev are with me, also Kaka. Jairamdas too is free but not with me. Now of the principal ones Jawaharlal and Abdul Ghaffar Khan remain.

This train is taking me to Calcutta. I am likely to see the Governor and of course Moore.

The coming fast must not disturb you. You will be surprised to learn that the news of the fast has brought to light the names of men who actually took part in the assault on the black-flag demonstrators.

I have already asked whether you had the credit note I promised.²

Love.

244. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

July 19, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got both your letters. I understand your view regarding the dairy, namely, that it should be run independently. If so, who should be its trustees? Shankerlal¹, Ambalalbhai², Ranchhodbhai³ and Titus? I have left out the names of persons who are likely to be imprisoned any time. We may include Chimanlal⁴ also, if you wish.

I don’t know what to do regarding Amalabehn. Can you accommodate her in Rajkot? She is not likely to remain even at Wardha for long. I don’t know on whom I should place this burden. After all, how long am I likely to remain in Wardha? If I am not arrested, I will live not at Wardha but somewhere in Orissa or Bengal or the Frontier Province. I should be written off now so far as routine work is concerned.

I hope everything is going well. Has Jamnadas’s health improved? What is Keshu doing? We have to provide the monthly expenses of Santok, Keshu and Radha. It is for you to decide what they should be paid. Fix any sum that you think proper. Relieve Radha of her worries. Santok should do some work there, either teaching the children or any other work that she can do. Where does she live? Where does Keshu live? I am placing this burden on you, but I am helpless. I can’t decide anything from here. You should decide objectively and do what is right with firmness of mind. If you think it necessary, you may consult me.

How is Kusum doing? It is rather strange that Prema has not written a single letter. Sushila was to write to me about herself, but she has not written so far.

I am writing this in the train on my way to Calcutta.

246. LETTER TO LILAVATI ASAR

July 19, 1934

CHI. LILAVATI,

I got your letter. Please overcome your desire, born of your attachment, to stay with me. Count me as a useless man. The Ashram has been broken up and understand that it cannot be revived now. I shall be wandering from place to place or be in a prison. I shall be staying in Wardha only because of the fast. What will you do there at that time? There you have settled down to some useful work. Stay there and learn and teach what you can.

247. STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

CALCUTTA,

July 19, 1934

It was a matter of great grief to me that I was not able to alight at Howrah Station. I had not understood that the public knew that I would alight at Howrah Station. As a matter of fact, I was to be taken away at Burdwan but finally I was taken away from Belur Station, thanks to the courtesy of the Railway authorities. Had I known that I was expected by the public at Howrah Station I would have insisted on reaching there.

1 The source had reported that Gandhiji made this statement “immediately after his arrival in Calcutta”.

I was also distressed to learn that some people were arrested for fear of their molesting me or causing disturbance. I would request the police authorities to discharge them. My life is held in trust by the public and it is at their disposal and has been since I have entered upon public life. I fully realize that the police have their own duty to perform. Nevertheless I would ask them to release those people who have been arrested, if it is at all possible to do so.

248. IN PRAISE OF WALKING

In the middle of the railway and the motor-car to which fellow-workers have dragged me again from the slow but steady and fruitful quiet walks in Orissa, it is pleasant to receive reflections like the following:

Your pilgrimage makes my heart sing. It is a yajna (sacrifice) worthy of those for whom you perform it. Forgive my presumption! But I feel all aglow when I think of it. Somehow your rushing about in a motor-car in the cause of Harijans seemed to be queer, incongruous. I see this as a wholly spiritual problem, and that you should approach it on foot, as a true pilgrim, satisfies me through and through like perfect music, or a magnificent sunset. So, I feel, should Daridranarayana (the starving millions) be approached. Forgive me.

My words are an involuntary exclamation of a musician, in ecstasy over a tambura flawlessly in tune. People say, ‘But how many villages can he cover on foot?’ My heart says, ‘Yes, but how many souls he will touch!’ Surely, souls matter more than villages and one pilgrim is worth a thousand propagandists.

How I wish other fellow-workers will realize the beauty and the necessity of pilgrimages on foot for Harijan work. People’s hearts cannot be touched by a mad rush through space. They can be by quiet, personal, intimate contact with them. Rushing in motor-cars and railway trains dazes one and makes one powerless for clear thinking for the time being. But hardly has he recovered from the shock when he has to prepare to receive another. And so there is no chance of recovery, either for the occupant or for his victims. I know that the present programme cannot be substantially varied. But the remarks quoted above should be treasured for any future programme, and the one for the few remaining weeks should be so shaped as to fit in with the idea of no-rush. Let there be as few visits as possible during my stay in the principal places. My presence ought not to be exploited on behalf of other causes, however meritorious they may be. Let my mind be concentrated, as far as may be, on the Harijan cause.

_Harijan, 20-7-1934_

249. LETTER TO MARGARETE SPIEGEL

_July 20, 1934_

CHI. AMALA,

I have your letters. You are unnecessarily alarmed over my fast. Nobody else is. Seven days’ fast can’t kill me. But if my end is to come, it will come, fast or no fast. Therefore I would ask you to give up all anxiety about me.

It betrays gross neglect of duty to want to come to Wardha. You are living with me when you are doing my work, even though you may be physically miles away from me. And you are not living with me though you may be physically in the same place, if you are not doing my work. When God will it you will be physically near me. But as I have said, if you simply cannot live in the Ashram you must do as you like. In that case there is no question of permission. I cannot surmount my nature and do the impossible. Will you go and live with Narandas in Rajkot?

Dwarkanath has not yet left Wardha. I am quite well. Blood pressure normal.

Love.

250. LETTER TO S. AMBUJAMMAL

July 20, 1934

CHI. AMBUJAM,

I have your two letters.

Have no anxiety about my fast. God will see it safely through. This body can come to no harm as long as God wants it to render even the least service.

You should tell your parents if it is utterly impossible for you to live with your husband. You must listen calmly to whatever they say and bear it. If you can, you may certainly go to Kumbakonam and live with your husband. If the heart does not accept something, there is no gain but only harm in forcing it, the heart being the means to the deliverance of the soul from bondage. Gita declares thus and this is also the experience of all. Do write to me about your activities.

May God give you peace.

251. LETTER TO JAYAPRAKASH NARAYAN

July 20, 1934

CHI. JAYAPRAKASH,

I have your letter. It is clear. I now understand your situation clearly. It is natural for you to wish to have Prabhavati with you. Such being the case I do not wish to keep her at Wardha. I am certain that Prabhavati can do some work in Bihar. But Prabhavati does not have that feeling. She has not enough self-confidence. If she could be persuaded of the virtue of going to Bihar, it would be well. The way is now clear. You can have Prabha anywhere you want. You should both decide something together. I shall have nothing to say about it. I can only give advice when you seek it. Yes, I do want that neither of you should coerce the other. The ideals the two of you pursue are different. No doubt I have had a hand in shaping Prabhavati’s ideal and I do not regret it. But if your love draws her to your ideal, it will be all right by me. It will lessen my responsibility and give you satisfaction. It is a matter of sorrow to me that your life is becoming dreary. Send for Prabha or come and meet her. Take some decision.

To what extent it is right for you, considering your communist beliefs, to accept help from me I cannot say. I cannot also say where we disagree and why. We shall argue about it.

252. DISCUSSION WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF THE DEPRESSED CLASSED

[On or before July 21, 1934]

Gandhiji had no difficulty in showing them that the term ‘Depressed Classes’ had itself a bad odour which the name ‘Harijan’ had certainly not, but he assured them that he would be the last man to impose even a term of endearment on those who did not like it. Among the other grievances was the one that they were not given a majority of seats on the Harijan Board. Gandhiji explained to them at length the penitential character of the work that the organization of the caste Hindus had set before itself and that, whilst they were in no way called upon to share in the act of penitence, they would do better to form an independent advisory board, in order to inspect and review the work of the Harijan Sevak Sangh Board, and to offer helpful advice and guidance. This was not only their privilege but their duty. Their other duty which they could perform much more effectively than savarna reformers was internal reform, viz., weaning from carrion-eating, drink, etc., those Harijans who were addicted to them. Finally he implored them not to be impatient—though they had every right to—as during the last two years a marvellous change had come over the mentality of caste Hindus. For, when action precedes mental change, it may well be mechanical and fruitless, but, when it is the result of a change of mind and heart, it has a vitality of which everyone feels the warmth and glow.

Harijan, 10-8-1934

We Indians as a nation are lacking in self-confidence. It is often said against us by our critics that we are deficient in constructive abilities and that we are incapable of running and managing successfully big public institutions. The steady progress that the Seva Sadan has shown under the capable guidance of Dr. Bidhan Chandra Roy and Sir Nilratan Sircar constitutes the most effective reply to this charge.

The other day I was called upon to perform the opening ceremony of Gulabdevi Charitable Hospital at Lahore. I want to share with you the reflection which that occasion gave rise to in my mind. Is it not surprising that both the late Lala Lajpat Rai and the late Deshbandhu Das who were the foremost political leaders of their time and who had passed their entire life in political struggles, should at the time of their death assign all their property not for any political object but for purely philanthropic and charitable object? It is a phenomenon for our critics to reflect upon and digest. It shows that our essential talent runs always in the direction of service and philanthropy. But we are forced into politics against our will owing to extraneous circumstances with the result that our innermost urge for constructive work is smothered and remains unfulfilled. This was just what the late Lokamanya lamented also. As the whole world knows, twice he was imprisoned and on both these occasions he utilized his time and talents not for writing any political work but for producing religious and scientific works. On one occasion it was the celebrated Gita Rahasya and on the other the monumental work on the antiquity of the Vedas that has since become famous throughout the world. If I repeat what I have already remarked, this again proves the fact that although today politics may seem to engross our entire being, the ideal that our soul craves for is service, our innermost bent is religious not in the narrow or parochial sense but in the broadest sense of the term, and if we are often compelled to engage in politics it is in order to clear the way for the exercise of our constructive talent.

You know how close Deshbandhu and I had come together particularly towards the close of Deshbandhu’s life during our stay

1 Vide “Speech at Gulabdevi Tuberculosis Hospital, Lahore”, 17-7-1934 together at Darjeeling. I was looking forward to his fullest cooperation in the prosecution of the constructive programme which we had planned together. But God had willed otherwise and within a week of that meeting Deshbandhu passed away. It always gives me supreme pleasure to be able to do anything for the ideal that we held in common. I therefore gladly availed of the invitation of Dr. Bidhan Roy to perform the present ceremony\(^1\). I would appeal to you to render all help that you are capable of to this institution. This is the least that you owe to the memory of the late Deshbandhu.

254. DISCUSSION WITH STUDENTS

[July 21, 1934]\(^2\)

QUESTION: Believing that mass revolution is the only means to achieve freedom, do you believe it a practical proposition that the mass will and can remain absolutely non-violent in thought and action in spite of all possible provocations in the course of such revolution? It may be possible for an individual to attain that standard but do you think that it is possible for the masses to attain that standard of non-violence in action?

GANDHII: This is a strange question coming from you at this time of the day, for the entire course of our non-violent fight bears testimony to the fact that wherever violence has broken out, it has broken out not on the part of the masses but, if I may put it like that, on the part of the classes, that is, it was manipulated by the intellectuals. Even in violent fighting, though the individual sometimes lets himself go and forgets everything the mass of the fighting force dares not and does not. It resorts to arms only under orders and has to suspend fire in response to orders, no matter how great the individual impulse to revenge or retaliation might be. There is no prima facie reason why under non-violence the mass, if disciplined, should be incapable of showing the discipline which in organized warfare a fighting force normally does. Besides, a non-violent General has this special advantage: he does not require thousands of leaders to successfully carry on his fight. The non-violent message does not require so many for transmission. The example of a new true men or women if they have fully imbibed the spirit of non-violence is bound to infect the whole mass in the end. This was just what I experienced in the beginning of the movement. I found that people actually believed that in my heart of hearts I favoured violence even when I preached non-violence. That was the way they had been trained to read and interpret the utterances of the leaders. But when they realized that I meant what I said, they did observe non-violence indeed under the most trying circumstances. There has been no repetition of Chauri Chaura. As for non-violence in thought God alone is judge. But this much is certain that non-violence in action cannot be sustained unless it goes hand in hand with non-violence in thought.

\(^1\) Gandhiji laid the foundation-stone of the children’s wing of the Seva Sadan.

Do you think co-operation between the exploited and the exploiters is at all possible to attain the ideals you stand for? Do you not think that time has come when Congress should take a definite stand for the rights of the masses irrespective of the interests of the capitalists and the landlord? Do you not think that it is not possible to organize the masses effectively on nationalistic programme and workers have no need or no other alternative but to array themselves against the capitalists and landlords for the exploited tenants and labour? Do you not think that a class war is inevitable and interested classes must perish for the sake of a greater humanity?

I never said that there should be co-operation between the exploiter and the exploited so long as exploitation and the will to exploit persist. Only I do not believe that the capitalists and landlords are all exploiters by an inherent necessity or that there is a basic or irreconcilable antagonism between their interests and those of the masses. All exploitation is based on the co-operation willing or forced, of the exploited. However much we may detest admitting it, the fact remains that there would be no exploitation if people refuse to obey the exploiter. But self comes in and we hug the chains that bind us. This must cease. What is needed is not the extinction of the landlords and the capitalists but transformation of the existing relationship between them and the masses into something healthier and purer. You ask whether the time has not come when the Congress should stand for the rights of the masses as opposed to the interests of the capitalists and the landlords’. My reply is that ever since the Congress had come on the scene it has done nothing else whether it was dominated by the Moderates or the Extremists. From its very inception under A. O. Hume it has sought to represent the masses. That indeed was its origin, and a study of its history of nearly half a centurty would prove to the hilt that the Congress has been all through progressively representative of the masses.
Do I not think that time has come when Congress should take a definite stand for the rights of the masses irrespective of the interests of the capitalists and the landlords? No, we, the so-called friends of the masses, will only dig our and their graves if we took that stand. I would like to use the landlords and capitalists for the service of the masses as the late Sir Surendranath used to do. We must not sacrifice the interests of the masses to the capitalists. We must not play their game. We must trust them to the measure of their ability to surrender their gains for the service of the masses. Do you think that the so-called privileged classes are altogether devoid of nationalistic sentiments? If you think so, you will be doing grave injustice to them and disservice to the cause of the masses. Are not they too exploited by the rulers? They are not insusceptible to the higher appeal. It has invariably been my experience that a kind word uttered does go home to them. If we win their confidence and put them at their ease we will find that they are not averse to progressively sharing their riches with the masses. Moreover, let us ask ourselves with the masses, have we bridged the gulf between the surging millions and us? Let us who live in glass houses not throw stones. To what extent do you share the life of the masses? I confess that with me it is still an aspiration. We ourselves have not completely shed the habits of living that we say the capitalists are notorious for. The idea of class war does not appeal to me. In India class war is not only inevitable but it is avoidable if we have understood the message of non-violence. Those who talk about class war as being inevitable have not understood the implications of non-violence or have understood them only skin-deep.

How can the rich help the poor without the rich being poor themselves? Richness or capitalism is a system which tries to perpetuate the colossal difference between capital and labour in order to maintain its position and status. Is it therefore possible to effect any compromise between them without greatly injuring the interests of either?

The rich can help the poor by using their riches not for selfish pleasure, but so as to subserve the interests of the poor. If they do so there will not be that unbridgeable gulf that today exists between the ‘haves’ and the ‘have-nots’. Class divisions there will be, but they will then be horizontal, not vertical. Let us not be obsessed with catchwords and seductive slogans imported from the West. Have we not our own distinct Eastern traditions? Are we not capable of finding our own solution to the question of capital and labour? What is the system of varnashrama but a means of harmonizing the difference between high and low, as well as between capital and labour? All that comes from the West on this subject is tarred with the brush of violence. I object to it because I have seen the wreckage that lies at the end of this road. The more thinking set even in the West today stand aghast at the abyss for which their system is heading. And I owe whatever influence I have in the West to my ceaseless endeavour to find a solution which promises an escape from the vicious circle of violence of exploitation. I have been a sympathetic student of the Western social order and I have discovered that underlying the fever that fills the souls of the West there is a restless search for truth. I value that spirit. Let us study our Eastern institutions in that spirit of scientific inquiry and we shall evolve a truer socialism and a truer communism than the world has yet dreamed of. It is surely wrong to presume that Western socialism or communism is the last word on the question of mass poverty.

We want to be precise as to what you mean by non-violence. If by non-violence you mean absence of personal hatred, we have no objection to it. What we object to is your identifying non-violence with non-killing. Wars are waged not on personal lines but to vindicate national honour or interests. Issues have always been fought with the maximum amount of force both moral and physical. When all can successfully use physical force for the triumph of our national ideals and when it is the shortest cut, why do you object to it? Besides, the world is not even now advanced enough to appreciate moral persuasion.

My ahimsa does rule out the use of all force otherwise than moral. But it is one thing to say that physical force has been or is today being used in the world for the settlement of national issues; quite another thing to say that it should continue so to be used. We cannot afford to blindly imitate the West. In the West, if they do certain things they have antidotes for them too; we have not. Take the instance of birth-control. It may seem to work well there, but if we took to the practice of birth-control as it is being advocated in the West, in ten years there will be a race of eunuchs in India. Similarly, if we take to violence after the West we shall soon be bankrupt as the West is fast becoming. Only the other day, I was having a talk with a European friend. He was appalled at the prospect of wholesale exploitation of the coloured races of the world by the highly industrialized nations of the West with which civilization is today confronted. The principle of non-violence is today passing through a period of probation. The forces of the spirit are engaged in life and death grapples with brute force. Let us in this crisis not shrink from the test.
What has the Congress done or what should it do in connection with the young men and women of Bengal detained without trial?

I have given you my solution. If we work the Congress organization non-violently and honestly we shall be able to purge it of its corruptions today. It is reeking with corruption, and Bengal, I must confess to my sorrow, has been the worst sinner in this respect. I will promise you that every one of these detenus is discharged. But then our non-violence will have to be real in thought, word and deed.

We regard all those elements in our society as Harijans who in one way or other are being exploited or kept suppressed. Your satyagraha movement is always for those who are downtrodden. Why then a separate Harijan movement?

It is not a separate Harijan movement that I am conducting. Its significance is world-wide.

Is it yet time for the youths of India to force a social re-ordering? Should it follow or precede any further political effort towards swaraj?

The two things—the social re-ordering and the fight for political swaraj—must go hand in hand. There can be no question of precedence or division into water-tight compartments here. But a new social order cannot be ‘forced’; that would be a remedy worse than the disease. I am an impatient reformer. I am all for thorough-going, radical, social re-ordering; but it must be an organic growth, not a violent super-imposition.

What is the utility of trying to keep a number of pseudo-nationalist Muslims within the Congress fold by allowing them illegitimate and illogical concessions which are only increasing their insatiable hunger?

If the Muslim nationalists are ‘pseudo-nationalists’, we too are ‘pseudo-nationalists’. Let us therefore eradicate that word from our dictionary. I do not know that an ‘illogical concession’ means, but you will never find me supporting an illegitimate concession. That is common ground between us.

Is not the Congress Party responsible for the embitterment of the communal relations when it brought the Khilafat question on the Congress platform?

It is historically not true that the participation of the Congress in the Khilafat movement is responsible for the embitterment of the communal relations. The fact is just the other way about, and I shall always maintain that the Congress did well in standing by our Mussalman compatriots in their fight for the Khilafat.

To the Students, pp. 204-9
Replying in Hindi, Gandhiji expressed regret for want of knowledge of the Bengali language although it had always been one of the cherished dreams of his life that he should learn his beautiful and sweet language—a language the wealth of which had been immensely increased by the contributions of his Gurudev, Rabindranath Tagore.

He recalled the occasion when he received another civic address from the hands of Deshbandhu Chittaranjan Das and made a touching reference to his close and intimate association with Deshpriya Jatindra Mohan Sen Gupta whom he no more found by his side today.

As regards the good words had been said about him in the address, Gandhiji received them as their blessings. What could he say to them in reply? He would only fervently pray to God that this great Corporation become an ideal body, that it could set up such an example as might with profit be emulated by other municipal institutions.

Calcutta with its beautiful parks, big thoroughfares and magnificent buildings was rightly called the City of Palaces but they could not overlook the fact that the picture had its other side too. On the one hand, there were these gorgeous things which the city could be well proud of and on the other, there was the miserable condition of the bastis in which the Harijans lived. The contrast distressed him very much. He had an opportunity of visiting some Harijan quarters in the morning and it pained him very much to see the wretched state in which these people lived, without air, without light and without sufficient water for drinking. He was a Harijan himself by adoption and it would be no exaggeration to say that he felt uneasy in that place. They must not forget that it was these scavengers and sweepers of the city who were responsible for the cleanliness and the health of this big city. It was his prayer to the Councillors of the Corporation that they should make provision of some amount of money every year for removing the various grievances of these people. He appealed to them in the name of humanity and justice to devote a little of their time and attention to this noble cause.

Concluding, Gandhiji said that his attention had been drawn to the big headlines in newspapers regarding the dispute over the Mayoral election. He hoped that there would be no repetition of the same, and appealed to the Councillors to see that all sections of the Corporation could work with one common purpose of serving the interests of the city, without any distinction of caste, colour and creed. He hoped that this great body would work in a way as could make it the object of pride and admiration to the whole of Hindustan.

256. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, CALCUTTA

July 21, 1934

He began by expressing regret that he could not make his stay in Calcutta longer, for he was leaving Bengal that very night in connection with the Harijan work. The presence of such a huge gathering, continued Gandhiji, demonstrated that the people of Bengal would not and could not forget their work for Harijans. So far he had collected Rs. 65,000 in Calcutta for that noble work and, before he left that city that night, he hoped to receive further contributions. Even the Bengal Bus Syndicate, he was glad to find, had come forward to identify itself with that cause by contributing Rs. 501. Harijan work was such that it could not but be dear to all classes of people, even to those who called themselves sanatanists. They could not but ignore that cause without ceasing to be human.

Continuing, he said that some mazdurs (labourers), who had gathered there in large numbers, asked him as to what he had done for their welfare. To the service of Harijans he had already dedicated his life and thereby he had been doing his service to the labour also.

He was also working for the cause of popularizing charkha and this was a work in which was involved the welfare of millions of poor Harijans. Because he was serving the cause of these poor labourers, he was himself leading the life of a labourer and had embraced poverty, for their joy was his joy and their sorrow was his sorrow.

257. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS OF INDIA

July 21, 1934

When I agreed to go to Calcutta for three days in order to try to compose the domestic differences, Dr. B. C. Roy wrote to me inquiring how all the workers could be brought together and whether I considered Maulana Abul Kalam Azad to be a neutral party for issuing invitation to workers. I wrote immediately, saying that the

1 Held at Deshbandhu Park; Gandhiji spoke in Hindi.
2 Gandhiji was going to Kanpur. A representative travelled with him up to Asansol.
Maulanasaheb would be the proper man to issue invitations which he did.

On my arrival I found that there was some dissatisfaction that enough invitations had not been issued, and the Maulana Saheb was willing to issue more invitations as soon as names were supplied to him. The names were ultimately supplied. They were too many for issuing cards within the time for the meeting. I, therefore, suggested that workers should be admitted without cards on identification by checkers. It is necessary for me to make this statement in order to make clear what happened in connection with bringing the workers together.

I have had a full and frank discussion with the different groups, and as a result of this discussion I came to the conclusion that, if party feeling was to be avoided, the Congress organization must be freed of manipulation of votes, even what amounts to a purchase of a vote.

It is most essential to avoid such manipulation, especially in Bengal where party feeling runs very high. I am happy to be able to say that nearly 22 out of 48 districts assured me through their representatives that they endorsed my suggestion and also assured me that they would have unopposed elections. If the representatives of the districts named are able to make good their claim, it would be a happy augury for the future, and the example of such a large number of districts was bound to prove infectious.

In any event I have no remedy to suggest for purging the Congress organization in Bengal of all the undesirable elements. It would be impossible to run the Bengal Congress organization, or for that matter any Congress organization, until and unless the vast majority of Congressmen make up their minds to work the Congress with absolute honesty. Let it not be forgotten that my suggestion does not mean in any shape or form the suppression of the Election Board with Mr. M. S. Aney as the final arbitrator. He would still have to scrutinize papers received from districts having unopposed election. A declaration of such elections will have to be made by that Board and in the unfortunate event of any contested elections it would be that Board which would regulate them.

It is to be hoped, therefore, that my suggestion will commend itself to all Congressmen, no matter to which party they belong. I am sure that without purity and honesty in the Congress organization it would not be possible to rid Bengal of the many special ills from which she is suffering.
In conclusion, whatever happens to my advice I would like to state that the workers were throughout courteous and attentive to whatever I had to say to them.\footnote{What follows is reproduced from Amrita Bazar Patrika.}

Asked by the Associated Press representative as to the progress made by the Harijan movement in Bengal, Mahatma Gandhi said that he was unable to answer the question until he had studied the situation more thoroughly. He, however, expressed great satisfaction at the generous contribution made by the province to the Harijan Fund.

He declined to say anything with regard to the release of Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and the question of Bengal detenus.

258. LETTER TO SANATANISTS

July 22, 1934

In reply to a letter of an orthodox sanatanist of Benares, Mahatma Gandhi says that he is always prepared to hear the discussion of pundits with a view to obtaining correct interpretation of the Shastras on the subject of untouchability, but if the conclusion arrived at by the President was not convincing to him he will not be bound to accept it.\footnote{The report was published under the date-line, “Benares, July 22”, 1934.}

259. REPLY TO CIVIC ADDRESSES, KANPUR\footnote{For a discussion with the sanatanists, vide “Discussion with Sanatanists”, 24-7-1934.}

July 22, 1934

Replying to the addresses presented by the Municipal and District Boards, Gandhiji congratulated the Municipal Board on the very good work it had done for the uplift of Harijans. He appealed to the members of the Board to complete the scheme as early as possible. He said that for a big municipality like that of Cawnpore it was not difficult to construct sanitary houses within a short time. He hoped to see these quarters himself. He referred to his visit to the Bhagalpore Municipality and said that there too he had advised the Board to complete the work at once, which they readily accepted to do. He hoped the Cawnpore Municipal Board too would act upon his advice. He said that there were many things which they could do without much trouble. Their grievances were not such as would require lakhs of rupees in the budgets. Those who were called the higher class of people could get their work done in so many ways. But how could poor Harijans get their grievances redressed? Gandhiji was pleased to note that in the Cawnpore Municipality, members belonging to all the communities—Hindus,—Muslims and others loved the Harijans alike. As he said, they were not there in the boards as Hindus or Muslims or anybody else but as public servants. He again expressed his gratification at the substantial and solid work done for the welfare of the Harijans by the Cawnpore Municipality.

Turning to the District Board’s address, he returned to two points particularly. The address stated that the District Board had resolved that students should be admitted to all their schools without any restriction, but he said that it was a rule like so many others. What he advised the Board was to see whether the rule was observed, as it was well-known that often the rules said something while what was actually done was something quite different. He said that he had seen some sign-boards over wells saying that the wells were for the use of Harijans as well, but still the so-called caste Hindus beat any untouchables that used them and did not let them use them.

We should realize that the Harijans also are men and not beasts. Our Dharmashastras all say that if a man gives water to a thirsty man, he is rewarded manifold for it.

Referring to spinning taught in District Board Girls’ Schools, Gandhiji said that his faith in khadi was as bright as ever. It was closely related to the Harijan cause, as they were serving hundreds of Harijan women and weavers through khadi. These, being terribly restricted in the choice of professions, would starve if they did not give them spinning or weaving. Indeed, for that matter, they were similarly serving hundreds of Muslim women and men. The women, as they observed purdah, would not earn the few pice they did per day if they were not given the opportunity of spinning. To these they must add the thousands of general spinners among the semi-starved millions of India. Khadi was thus no respecter of persons, and no lover of Daridranarayana could afford to go without khadi. He who bought a yard might rest assured that he was giving tangible help to the poor, whether Harijan Hindu, Muslim or savarna Hindu.¹

In the end, he thanked both the Boards for the addresses presented to him.

260. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, KANPUR

July 22, 1934

I thank you for your purse of Rs. 11,000, but you will allow me to say that it is not worthy of the open-handedness which you have taught me to associate with Cawnpore. I am certain that you would have given me many times as much, if you had realized the magnitude of the task before us.

There are some people in Cawnpore who look upon the Harijan movement as irreligious and have issued a large number of leaflets for public consumption. I was sorry to find that these were full of palpable falsehoods and insidious half-truths, exaggerations and distortions. How I wish that these statements were made unintentionally! For instance, it is said that reformers in some place slaughtered sanatanists without mercy, but I know nothing about it. If I did, I need scarcely say that I would take strong action to check it. What a deep tragedy it is that these falsehoods are spread in the name of sanatana dharma? I appeal to the sanatanists to stop this campaign of falsehoods.

You would give lakhs where you now give thousands, if you understood the far-reaching character of the Harijan movement. Nevertheless, our goal cannot be achieved by collections, no matter how large they are: it will be achieved only with the melting of savarna Hindu hearts. When a gift is token of a change of heart, its value is multiplied a hundredfold. This is a movement of purification. It has nothing to do with the counting of heads. It is not a movement designed to fight Muslims or others. We do not seek to make goondas of Harijans. We seek to make them worthy citizens. If we succeed, the world will benefit as well as we. At present the world would be fully justified in despising us and our faith for our maltreatment of five crores of our own kith and kin in the name of religion.

I have regard for the black-flaggers no less than for the reformers and, if it was at all possible, I would gladly go away as they wish me to do. But I consider it my religious duty to bear witness to the truth as I see it, and any number of black flags, or even a bomb or a revolver cannot prevent me from discharging it by such means as are open to me. I am but an imperfect being and not a tapasvi who \footnote{According to the source, this is ‘‘a substance of Gandhiji’s speech’’. This appeared under the title ‘‘The Cawnpore Speech’’.

\footnote{One who has acquired spiritual power through austerities} could blow away untouchability with a breath from the Himalayas. I can only speak to such as are inclined to hear me, and for this I am going about from place to place, although I long for rest from the toil of continuous travel.

Let me tell the sanatanists who claim to be monopolists of religious truth that I believe in the same Shastras as they do. I have profound disagreement with them as regards interpretation. These Shastras lay down that, when there is a conflict of interpretation, one must follow the promptings of one’s own conscience. And that is exactly what I am doing. I would be the sanatanists’ slave if they could convince me that I was wrong. Meanwhile, I will say even with my last breath that, if we do not wash out the stain of untouchability, Hindus and Hinduism will be wiped out from the face of the earth.

Let me repeat the implications of this movement. It is limited to the removal of the feeling of superiority and inferiority and has nothing to do with inter-dining and intermarriage. I personally inter-dine with Bhangis and Mussalmans. I am not ashamed of this. On the other hand, I think my conduct in this respect is fully in consonance with the Shastras. But it has nothing to do with this movement. Inter-dining and inter-marriage are matters of individual choice. There is no need, nor can I spare time, for such propaganda. I only place the essentials or religion before the people for their acceptance. The movement claims for the Harijans the same social, civic and religious rights as belong to any other Hindu.

As regards temple-entry, you should know that no temple is opened to Harijans except with the full consent of those who attend that temple for worship. Temples must be opened as a part of our penance. Not a single pie from the Harijan Fund is spent on temple-building. Our constant effort is to ensure that as large a part of it as possible finds its way into Harijan pockets in one way or another.

As this is a Harijan tour, I do not often speak about khadi, although my faith in it is as strong as ever. But you must not forget that khadi supports a large number of Harijan spinners and weavers. It will never do for you to give a second place to khadi in your thoughts.

I thank you for the peacefulness of the proceedings, but I cannot lose sight of the fact that we are under the shade of the elaborate police precautions we see around us. I would very much wish they were away, but they, too, must discharge their duty. Reformers as well as sanatanists should be ashamed that the presence of the police should be required for my protection or for ensuring peace during my stay in your midst. Reformers and sanatanists should realize the importance of maintaining self-imposed discipline so as to render police precautions wholly unnecessary. As it is, however distasteful their presence may be to me, I must testify to the exemplary manner in which the police have behaved throughout the trying tour. I must also testify to the facilities that the railway authorities have given from time to time.

262. LETTER TO SULOCHANA A. SHAH

July 23, 1934

CHI. SULOCHANA,

I got your letter. It was a good one. I have taken some time to reply to it. It is something that I am able to write even today. It was very good that you could preserve your health and maintain your weight even in jail. You did good study, too. Tell me in your next letter what you read and thought about.

Why don’t you yourself think what you should do? If you cannot decide, however, follow Narandas’s advice. He knows you better.

Premabehn has not so far gone to Wardha. She doesn’t seem to have come to any decision. Lilavati and Siddhimati are at Rajkot.

Kusum must marry if she wishes to do so. If she has no such desire, she must engage herself in some kind of public service. She should know that, if physical desire troubles the mind, it is a sin to hide it. It would be good if she could keep such thoughts out. If, however, she cannot do that despite her best efforts, she should get married at any cost.

I will tell Gulab to write when I meet her in a few days. It is rather surprising that she doesn’t write.

There is room for improvement in your handwriting. It wouldn’t be bad if you even make the letters a little bigger. What are you reading at present?

Ba is with me, and so are Mahadevbhai, Pyarelal, Valjibhai and Chandrashankar. There are others too, but perhaps you would not know them. Isn’t this a sufficiently long letter?

Bhai Parikshital,

I got your letter. I had received your wire too. Amalabehn seems to have given you a lot of trouble. I will not send her to you again. She arrived here yesterday. She seems to be half crazy. She herself does not know what she wants. She appears to stick to her word that she would stay nowhere but with me.

How is your pain which was caused by the beating?

Was the report about that man having been dismissed or demoted found to be true or false? Did the Baroda State take any steps?

264. LETTER TO MANILAL AND SUSHILA GANDHI

July 23, 1934

CHI. MANILAL AND SUSHILA,

I got the letter from you both. I understand [what you say] about West. If finally he does not reply, let it be. It is necessary that you should stay on there till somebody else agrees to take charge of your work. I see no harm in your remaining there so long as you can meet your expenses.

Have quarrels started even on the football ground? So be it. Certainly do what you think best. I have no desire at all to guide you from here, nor wish to criticize your actions. I want nothing but that you should be completely independent. It is not desirable that every day you should have to think what I would say. I want you always to do what seems proper and right to you. Progress for you two lies in your doing so. Who will guide you after my death? God is the only true guide. You should, therefore, pray to Him every day. You should daily pray, “Let Your will be mine”, and then act with faith that the Lord dwelling in your heart will guide you rightly without fail.

This answers Sushila’s question. It will be enough to maintain courteous relations with Sorabji. If you try to go further, you may have to compromise yourselves.

I hope you have seen about passports for Ramdas and Dr. Sharma.

Would you give Rs. 5 or 10 to Mama1 every month? I have got Rs. 500 paid to him by Jamnalal. I should like it if you, Devdas and Lakshmi contribute small sums towards that. If you agree, you should pay regularly, remitting the amount to Jamnalal.

266. LETTER TO KANTI GANDHI

July 23, 1934

CHI. KANTI,

I got your letter today.

Your analysis is correct. I don’t feel disappointed when I find that somebody has not fulfilled my expectation, for I don’t see anybody’s fault in such failure. I don’t blame even myself. I gave according to the best of my lights, and you all received as you could. When all are imperfect, nothing else can happen. At the age of about thirty, I happened to read, “Through hundreds of thousands of disappointments, endures imperishable hope”. I had pondered long over this line, memorized it and used to sing it to myself. The ghazal was a source of great consolation to me. Now I don’t even need its support. How can I spare time even to keep count of the number of disappointments?

The illusory appearance of silver in a mother-of-pearl or of water in the sun’s rays, although unreal at all times, cannot be avoided.

If you or I feel that Bal is doing wrong, what is that to poor Bal?

I hope you understand the meaning of these lines. If you don’t, ask Devdas. The doha is by Tulsidas. It has had a profound effect on my mind. Man cannot but cling to an illusion so long as it seems truth to him. That is why the world has been described as an illusion and a snare, as maya. I will be content if you always do your best. I haven’t written to Mr. Cousins, as I couldn’t get time to do that. But since Rajaji has now written to me positively, I am waiting till we meet in Benares.

If you feel a strong wish to come to Wardha, you may do so. Otherwise, after paying the intended visit to relations, go to the South.

I have not abandoned Harilal, nor given up hope about him. I am serving him by not yielding to him. The saying means “to follow his wishes”. I am extremely doubtful about the rightness of the course which has now been adopted. He has always lived thus up to now. He used to be brave, but friends have deprived him of his capacity for self-reliance. And now he has thought of [business in] patent medicines. But as all of you have approved of this solution, I need not criticize it. What seems right to one, that is one’s dharma. Keep writing to me.

267. LETTER TO NARAHARI D. PARIKH

July 23, 1934

CHI. NARAHARI,

I have been wanting to write to you for a long time, but couldn’t do so till today. I felt, too, that since Mahadev had been released, it wouldn’t matter if I didn’t write. If I expressed disappointment on hearing that you would not be able to go to Wardha, I don’t remember why; I didn’t feel disappointed. I was afraid that you wouldn’t like to go there, and I had expressed my fear to Jamnalalji. The reasons which you have given are sound. The reason about the Vidyapith is not valid. If it is, it is such as can be overcome. But the reasons regarding temperament are so strong that they require no support from others. It is not a small responsibility to take charge of Wardha. An experienced and mature woman is required for that. Perhaps Prema may be such a woman. Gangabehn has no interest in the work. I don’t know where Prema is now. She did come and see me, but that’s all. Besides these two, I can’t think of any other woman in our circle. Can you think of any?

July 23, 1934

CHI. BRIJKRISHNA,

I have both your letters.

Why should it be taken that all those companions of mine are sinners who do not live with me or render personal service to me? What sins could Vinoba, who has ever lived away from me, have committed? Disabuse yourself of this misconception.

It is true that you are suffering from the three delusions you have dwelt on in the second letter. But you have to get rid of all three of them if you wish to render any service to the Ashram and me. As you have renounced everything, you should regard it as wrong to take anything from the brothers to render help to individuals. All that perform his labour with humility. If he is not up to it he may well choose his own way of life and provide for himself. My reading is that

272. SPEECH AT OPENING OF TILAK HALL, KANPUR

July 24, 1934

I am thankful to you for inviting me to perform this sacred ceremony this morning. When I learnt early this morning that I had to come here, my memory went back to the day 20 years ago when I first visited Cawnpore as a stranger. It was the late Babu Ganesh Shankar Vidyarthi then a youth unknown to me, who then housed me in his press which was also his residence, for nobody else would dare harbour me. I was then an utter stranger to the bulk of our countrymen. Whatever little was known of me was through my services in South Africa. Neither the people nor the Government knew what I would do here. Nor did I myself know what was in store for me or what part I was to play in the national affairs. It was a happy coincidence that Tilak Maharaj came to this city that very day and was accorded a very hearty reception. To me the association with this city is bound up with the memory of Ganesh Shankar. I came to know him more intimately later on and found in him a simple, straightforward, upright, selfless servant of the nation. You know more than I do of the services he rendered through various channels to this city in particular and the country in general. He was a lover of the Hindi language. The Pratap founded by him is a living monument of that

1 This appeared as “an authorized translation of Gandhiji’s speech”.

love. As we all know he crowned a life of service with a heroic death. I cannot describe to you how I miss him today on my first visit to this city after his death.

Tilak’s vast learning, his immense sacrifice and his life-long service has won for him a unique place in the hearts of the people. He it was who infused life into the nation with the mantra of swaraj to the achievement of which his whole life was dedicated. But the thing to which I want to draw your attention today was his outlook and catholicity in matters of religion. He was a live sanatanist. No one in his lifetime nor even now could claim deeper or vaster knowledge of the Shastras than he possessed. His masterwork—the ‘commentary on the Gita’—is unsurpassed and will remain so for a long time to come. Nobody has yet carried on more elaborate research in questions arising from the Gita and the Vedas. It was not without deep study and careful research that he had declared that there was no sanction in the Shastras for untouchability as it is practised today. I can bear witness to the fact that he had eliminated the distinctions of high and low from his own life. He did not believe in untouchability based on birth and never hesitated to mix freely with so-called untouchables. I carried on anti-untouchability work in those days as I do now. I remember my many conversations with him on this subject and I can bear testimony to the fact that he was wholeheartedly with me and keenly desired the abolition of untouchability from Hinduism. It is relevant to refer to his opinion today, for it is said in some quarters nowadays that this anti-untouchability movement is subversive of religion.

I can give you many more reminiscences of his liberal outlook in other fields of life also. His contribution of the growth of the political life of the people has been unparalleled. But I believe his commentary on the Gita will be a more lasting monument to his memory. It will survive even the successful termination of the struggle for swaraj. Even then his memory will remain as fresh as ever on account of his spotless purity of life and his great commentary on the Gita. We owe to the memory of the great leader whom we revere that we should strive ceaselessly for completing the structure of swaraj of which he laid the foundation. Let this hall be but an outward token of our intense desire to make that effort to the best of our ability.

273. DISCUSSION WITH SANATANISTS\(^1\)

KANPUR,

[July 24, 1934]\(^2\)

QUESTION: How is this temple-entry agitation of yours going to benefit the Harijans materially? Are you sure that they want it?

GANDHIJI: It is for the material benefit of the Harijans. It is for the spiritual benefit of the savarna Hindus, who have to purify themselves and who owe a debt to the Harijans. If untouchability is a sin and if the Harijans are as good Hindus as the rest of us, they have as much right to enter the temples as the others. Whether they can get any material benefit from it, or even spiritual benefit or salvation, or whether they themselves want it or not, is beside the point. The point is whoever cares to go to a temple, provided he observes the rules observed by all other Hindus, ought to have the right to do so. He may be a sinner, but it is precisely because we are all sinners that we would like to go to temples to wash out our sins there. A saint need not go there. The sanat-anists may expect him to observe all the rules of outward cleanliness that they themselves observe, but nothing more.

But the Shastras are against temple-entry. Why not frankly say that you want to found a new Shastra?

No. I believe in the same Shastras as you do; only my interpretation is different. I am not a shastri myself, but if there is a section which contends that the Shastras enjoin untouchability, there is another equally strong section of pandits and shastris who no doubt say that there is no sanction in the Shastras for untouchability as it is practised today.

But if you destroy untouchability, the untouchables will invade our professions and occupations. They will have sweetmeat shops, for instance. All self-restraint in matters of food will be swept away.

You forget that the Harijan campaign has nothing to do with questions of food and drink, it seeks to destroy untouchability as it is

\(^1\) This is extracted from “Some Misconceptions” by Mahadev Desai who explains: “The organizers of the reception in Cawnpore had set apart a certain time exclusively for the sanatanists . . . . There were, however, no opposing pundit there. But there was a young man (who afterwards I found was an oil-dealer) who had a list of several questions…which, naturally, someone more learned had written up for him and which represent the misconceptions that still have possession of the sanatanist mind.”

\(^2\) From The Leader
practised today. There are numerous shops being run by non-Hindus and non-Brahmins. No one compels the Hindus or the Brahmins among them to go to these shops. There are orthodox Brahmins who would not touch food cooked by anyone else. They are quite welcome to their self-imposed restrictions, which will remain untouched for all time.

But why do you say untouchability is a sin, when our own mothers and sisters and daughters are treated as untouchables four days in the month?

You must know that some kind of untouchability is practised not only by us, Hindus, but by people of all faiths— Parsees, Mussalmans, Christians. But do we treat our mothers and sisters as untouchables for the rest of the month? Do we spurn them, do we fling our food remains at them even during the period of untouchability? Do we keep them out of our houses? For God’s sake, don’t forget that you are subjecting the so-called untouchables to insults and outrages that you would not dare to impose on anyone else.

Those insults and outrages are unknown here. You had better go to places where they are practised.

Will you accompany me?

Why should we? It is enough that we are not guilty. We invite them to our caste-dinners.

And fling remains at them, don’t you?

But, you reformers, do not so much as fling the remains at them. In your zeal for reform, you starve them. We don’t starve them. Whilst we observe untouchability, we have that much sympathy for them. You always say the Harijan campaign has nothing to do with questions of eating and drinking or with the question of marriage. Why, then, did you marry your boy Devdas to a Brahmin girl?

This is an irrelevant question. But I must answer it. The marriage was no part of the Harijan movement. I did not allow the marriage as a leader of the anti-untouchability campaign, but I allowed it as a Hindu reformer. As a reformer of Hinduism, I want to restore the ancient varnashramadharma to its pristine purity. Varnashramadharma lays down the functions and duties of various classes according to their special aptitudes and gifts and has nothing to do with questions of marriage and food and drink. Now that you have raised the question of my son’s marriage, I shall summarize the considerations that weighed with me and would weigh with me on all such occasions:

(1) The four varnas do not exist today, and, therefore, it is the duty of those who believe in the varnas to restore them by observing the sovereign principles of purity and self-restraint. Let me tell you that, when I was told that there was mutual attachment between the two young people in question, I asked them to impose self-restraint on themselves for a period of five years—not meet each other, not even to correspond with each other—and thus to prove the purity of their attachment. They fulfilled the conditions and even then would not have the marriage until it was blessed by their parents. (2) Even assuming that varnas exist, instances are not wanting in Mahabharata and other work of inter-varna marriages. (3) After all is said and done, the laws and codes governing personal conduct apply to the times in which they were framed. The ruling principle is self-restraint.

There are, besides, numerous texts in our smritis which contradict one another, and hence we cannot blindly accept every text as gospel truth. We have to prove them on the touchstone of truth and non-violence. There are things, for instance, in Manusmriti which no author believing in ahimsa could ever have written and which run counter to the precepts in the same great work, precepts which would do credit to the spiritual genius of any race or clime. I must expunge those texts as apocryphal, as we do in the case of many verses of doubtful authenticity which have crept into a much more recent work like, for instance, Tulsidas’s Ramayana. For me, the text of Manu defining sanatana dharma—eternal religion—is all-sufficing:

That dharma is eternal which is always observed by saintly men of learning, free from ill will and passion, and which appeals to one's hridaya or sense of right and justice.

As regards my own practice in matters of food and drink, everyone knows that I eat food from the hands of any human being, provided it is clean and pure. It is a purely personal question and not a social question at all. I am not out for reform in the matter, as I know that it can take care of itself, and I, therefore, do not seek to air my views in public. My own sister would not eat food cooked by many, certainly not food touched by a Harijan, but I would not strive with her. It should be enough for me that she discards untouchability and refuses to regard a human being an untouchable because of his birth.

274. SPEECH TO U. P. HARIJAN WORKERS, KANPUR

[July 24, 1934]

As regards the general complaint of municipal neglect, Gandhiji said they must rouse the members from their lethargy by directly approaching them as well as by educating the voters, who could then be expected to keep the members straight. He was glad to learn that the non-Hindu members of Cawnpore Municipality co-operated whole-heartedly with the Hindus as regards the welfare work among its Harijan employees, and he was sure that the Mussalman members of other municipalities, too, would be equally sympathetic when, as guardians of not one section but of the whole body of the public, they realized that ours was a purely humanitarian movement which had nothing to do with politics, that Harijans ministered to non-Hindus no less than to Hindus and that insanitary conditions in Harijan quarters were a potential source of danger to the whole of the city. It was a notorious fact that Harijans did not enjoy the same amenities as regards water-supply, light, etc. as the rest of the citizens did.

But irrespective of what the municipalities might do or fail to do, the Sangh must try to secure decent living conditions for Harijans. And this could be done with ease and without any heavy expenditure. First, they must see to the proper drainage and cleaning of the Harijan quarters and the making of roads. Slight repairs should be carried out in the houses so as to allow a free passage to light and air. If they placed before municipalities a modest programme of improving the sanitation of Harijan quarters, they would make a small grant of money to the Sangh and make them their agents in carrying it out, for municipalities might not have at hand the worker required, or if the workers were there, they might not have a keen interest in work of this nature.

Secondly, they must obtain for Harijans a good supply of water. Harijans in villages were worse off in this respect than their fellows in cities. They had yet to develop strength enough to assert and maintain their right to draw water from public wells by seeking the protection of courts or otherwise. Meanwhile the Sangh must construct for them good wells from which even the savarnas would be tempted to take water for themselves, and during the period that these wells were under construction, reformers must draw water for the Harijans and pour it into their pots.

Thirdly, the Sangh should establish good preparatory schools for Harijan children, where the teachers would not make a fetish of the 3 R’s, but try to teach their pupils to keep their person and clothes clean, so as to enable them at the end of six months to take their place in a line with savarna children of the same age. For 1 This appeared under the title: “Harijan Workers’ Guide”.

2 From Valji G. Desai’s “Weekly Letter”
this, kindliness was more essential in a teacher than scholarship. The Sangh would do well even to bring out a Harijan preparatory schoolmaster’s guide, showing him how he should impart to his charges the cultural training which savarna children received in their homes.

Fourthly, as regards Ashrams, he thought they had better fight shy of that big word and rather call their institutions ‘Chhatralayas’ (hostels) or ‘Udyogalayas’. Personally he did not like that the institution at Sabarmati was called Harijan Ashram. In these hostels they might supplement the ordinary education of the inmates at schools by teaching them some industry and religion, not through textbooks but in actual practice. The superintendent must see that the members used their hands and feet and told the truth in their actual lives, instead of merely reading copybook maxims about it. In fact, he should be as father to them. A couple of such institutions in each province should go a long way in the spread of culture and serve the purpose of comprehensive propaganda.

As regards total abstinence, Gandhiji said they could make an impression only if they entered into the drunkards’ lives and established an intimate personal relation with them. It was no use merely getting them to sign a pledge. They must find out the reasons why people took to drink. They must devise substitutes for it, such as milk and tea, and organize games, lectures and such other diversions.

Finally, Gandhiji expressed his emphatic opinion that they had hardly touched the fringe of their problem so long as they had not penetrated into the villages, which were the stronghold of untouchability and where alone they could strike it a death-blow.

275. SPEECH TO STUDENTS AND HARIJANS, KANPUR

_July 24, 1934_

Mahatma Gandhi, replying, thanked the students for the purse but said that it was too little for Cawnpore students who gave Rs. 1,500 in his last visit but as it was given out of love it was welcome. He was pleased to learn that they regarded him as a votary to true sanatana dharma and that their wish to do Harijan service was a good sign.

At the Harijan workers’ meeting\(^1\) it was said that there were not sufficient Harijan workers but here they were. As he did not expect them to give up their studies and devote all their time to this work, but he did expect them to devote their time to this work along with their studies just as they attended their parents when they fell ill. He wanted the spirit of sacrifice instilled in them. Knowledge did not mean mere book-reading. It included this kind of service also. He wished he could bring home to their hearts how much poor Harijans suffered and students could remove many of their grievances, if not all, and all this could be done while continuing regular studies.

In the end Mahatma Gandhi appealed to students, both male and female, to wear khadi at least if they could not devote much time to Harijan work. This wearing of khadi gives to Harijans much of what we pay for it.¹

Relying to the Harijans’ address, Gandhiji said that sanitary service was a sacred occupation, and scavengers no more deserved to be despised than a nurse, a surgeon or a mother, who had all to handle excreta. But they must observe the rules of cleanliness and give up carrion as well as liquor and gambling. They should refuse to accept leavings of food and ask for monetary equivalent or at least uncooked cereals or pulses in payment of their services. As regards strikes, Gandhiji said, he himself had led several successful strikes in South Africa as well as in the mother country, and as an expert in the science, he would advise them to exhaust all other avenues of settlement of disputes before they downed tools.²

279. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, LUCKNOW

July 25, 1934

Replying to the addresses Mahatma Gandhi thanked the sanatanists, the Harijans and the other citizens of Lucknow for the reception accorded to him but frankly expressed his dissatisfaction at the small sum contributed by Lucknow to the Harijan Fund. He refused to recognize that there were extenuating circumstances for the paltry contribution. Lucknow had fair notice of his visit and the sum raised for the cause of the Harijans should have been much larger. A few years ago when he had come to Lucknow, the premier city of the United provinces had presented him with a much bigger purse but this time it had disappointed him.

When the women of Lucknow presented him with a purse of Rs. 1,500 and ornaments valued at Rs. 500, he hoped that the other citizens would contribute a sum to the Harijan Fund which would be fitting to the city’s status but all his expectations had been frustrated. He was, however, prepared to give Lucknow another chance to redeem its honour and hoped that its citizens would send him a substantial sum before his tour in the provinces was concluded.

1 In the morning, Gandhiji visited the Charkha Sangh Khadi Bhandar, near Aminuddaula Park, Lucknow.
2 At Aminuddaula Park
3 At Zenana Park, earlier in the morning, soon after he had reached Lucknow
So far as work for the Harijans was concerned, Mahatma Gandhi invited the people to go and see for themselves the plight of the Harijans all over India. Regarded as outcastes they were denied even the elementary rights of human beings in the name of religion. Those who countenanced untouchability were guilty of a grave social sin. To keep more than 6,00,00,000 people outside the pale of the society in the name of religion was an unpardonable act for which there was no justification.

In South Africa and America the whites showed the same aversion and intolerance to the members of the darker races as were being shown in India by the caste people to the members of the Depressed Classes, but in those countries the whites had taken up that attitude as a political weapon for their own aggrandizement. They did not take recourse to religion as was being done by the caste Hindus in India to justify their action.

Due to this impossible attitude, for which there was no justification, people like Dr. Ambedkar, for whose intelligence, sincerity and other sterling qualities he had the highest respect though he differed from him on the Harijan question, were regarded as untouchables by the Hindu society. The Depressed Classes were not born depressed but had been kept oppressed for centuries by the cast Hindus.

There was no justification for the theory advanced by the caste Hindus that the Depressed Classes had been born as untouchables for their sins in their previous lives. It was rank injustice and sin to deny the rights of human beings to the members of the Depressed Classes.

The surest way of serving God, according to all religions, is to serve the poor. By using khadi people could easily do that. If the use of khadi became more popular millions of people in India, who were now starving, would be assured of at least one full meal. A person buying even one rupee worth of khadi could be sure that fifteen annas of it would go to the poor and keep them from starvation.

KANPUR,
July 25, 1934

Gandhiji felt grateful to the Sabha for having invited him to receive the address. 1 Gandhiji agreed with the members of the Sabha that Swami Dayanand had tried to serve the Depressed Classes and that he had taken a great part in the removal of untouchability. Mahatma Gandhi said that his connection with the Arya Samaj was not recent but dated back to the time when he was in South Africa and he was glad to mention that the connection was getting closer and stronger. In the end, Mahatma Gandhi wished that his connection with the Arya Samaj might get closer still in future and that he and the Arya Samaj might serve their God and country together.

281. ANSWERS TO ZAMINDARS

July 25, 1934

QUESTION. The Karachi Congress passed a resolution laying down the fundamental rights of the people and, since it recognized private property, nationalist zamindars have supported the Congress. But the new Socialist Party in the Congress threatens the extinction of private property. How would it affect the Congress policy? Do you not think that this will precipitate class war? Will you prevent it?

ANSWER. The Karachi resolution can be altered only by an open session of the next Congress, but let me assure you that I shall be no party to dispossessing the propertied classes of their private property without just cause. My object is to reach your hearts and convert you so that you may hold all your private property in trust for your tenants and use it primarily for their welfare.

I am aware of the fact that within the ranks of the Congress a new party called the Socialist Party is coming into being and I cannot say what would happen if that party succeeds in carrying the Congress with it. But I am quite clear that if a strictly honest and unchallengeable referendum of our millions were to be taken, they would not vote for wholesale expropriation of the propertied classes. I am working for the co-operation and co-ordination of capital and labour and of landlords and tenants. It is open to you to join the Congress as much as it is open to the poorest by paying the fee of four annas and subscribing to the Congress creed.

But I must utter a note of warning. I have always told the mill-owners that they are not exclusive owners of the mills. Workmen are equal sharers in the ownership. In the same way, I would tell you that the ownership of your land belongs as much to the ryots as to you and you may not squander your gains in luxurious or extravagant living, but must use them for the wellbeing of the ryots. Once you make your ryots experience a sense of kinship with you and a sense of security that their interests as members of the family will never suffer at your hands, you may be sure that there cannot be a class war between you and them.

Class war is foreign to the essential genius of India which is capable of evolving a form of communism broad based on the fundamental rights of all and equal justice to all. The Ramarajya of my dream ensures the rights alike of prince and pauper.

You may be sure that I shall throw the whole weight of my influence in preventing class war. I do not know what I am going to do after the termination of my self-imposed restriction on August 3, but I shall try my best to avoid going back to prison. But it is difficult to predict anything with certainty in a situation of which I am unaware today. But supposing that there is an attempt unjustly to deprive you of your property, you will find me fighting on your side.

We propose to support Congress candidates in the next Assembly elections. But we have our misgiving about the policy they will adopt in the Assembly. Could you persuade the Parliamentary Board to dispel our fears?

I invite you to discuss this thing with the members of the Parliamentary Board. I know however that no member will talk of expropriation or extinction of private property. They will certainly insist on a radical reform in your relations with the ryots but that should be no new thing to you. Even Sir Malcolm Hailey¹ and Lord Irwin appealed to you to realize and live up to the spirit of the times. If you will only do this, you may be sure that we shall be able to evolve an indigenous socialism of the purest type.

Socialism and communism of the West are based on certain conceptions which are fundamentally different from ours. One such conception is their belief in the essential selfishness of human nature. I do not subscribe to it, for I know that the essential difference between man and brute is that the former can respond to the call of spirit in him and can rise superior to the passions that he owns in common with the brute and therefore superior to selfishness and violence which belong to brute nature and not to the immortal spirit of man.

That is the fundamental conception of Hinduism, which has years of penance and austerity at the back of the discovery of their truth. That is why whilst we had had saints who have burnt out their bodies and laid down their lives in order to explore the secrets of the soul, we have none as in the West who have laid down their lives in exploring the remotest or highest regions of earth. Our socialism or communism should therefore be based on non-violence and on the harmonious co-operation of labour and capital and the landlord and the tenant.

There is nothing in the Congress creed or policy that need frighten you. All your fears and misgivings, permit me to tell you, are those of a guilty conscience. Wipe out the injustice that you may have been consciously or unconsciously guilty of and shed all fear of the Congress and Congressmen.

Once you turn a new leaf in the relations between zamindars and ryots, you will find us on your side jealously guarding your private rights and property. When I say “us”, I have Pandit Jawaharlal also in mind, for I am sure that on this essential principle of non-violence there is no difference between us. He does indeed talk of nationalization of property, but it need not frighten you. The nation cannot own property except by vesting it in individuals. It simply ensures its just and equitable use and prevents all possible misuse, and I do not think you can have any possible objection to holding your property for the benefit of the ryots. The ryots have themselves no greater ambition than to live in peace and freedom and they will never grudge you your possession of property provided you use it for them.

You have been almost avoiding us and the villages. Why not have candidates belonging to the rural classes?

You may be sure that we are going to penetrate the villages and establish healthy relations with you.

284. DISCUSSION WITH CONGRESS, HARIJAN AND KHADI WORKERS

KANPUR,

July 26, 1934

Mahatma Gandhi had another busy day in the course of which he held illuminating discussions with Congress, Harijan, and khadi workers. He gave them sound advice on many matters and pointed out that they must develop a very high sense of discipline without which no real advancement was possible. He pointed out that the volunteers like others had their shortcomings but it was neither difficult nor impossible to overcome them. They must keep before themselves the high ideals which impelled them to render service to their fellow-brothers and keep in view that they were servants of the people and as such always prepared to render them help in every possible way. He pointed out that they should be ever ready to suffer for the cause of the country and discharge the duties entrusted to them honestly and faithfully and diligently. Volunteers, he said, had great obligations and it was more difficult to discharge those obligations than it was to speak about their duties.

He exhorted khadi workers to carry on their work unceasingly and nothing should deter them from carrying on khadi sales, for the use of khadi alone was the surest way of serving God and the service of God was the service of the poor. The use of khadi would provide food to the starving millions . . . Mahatma Gandhi is reported to have pointed out to Congressmen to seek the co-operation of non-Congress workers, give them offices and serve under them. Let them have no distinction between Congress and non-Congressmen, he said, for Harijan work interested everybody alike. He felt that healthy co-operation between Congress and non-Congressmen in Harijan work would prove very beneficial to the Harijans. He appealed to them to seek the help of non-Congress workers as much as they possibly could.

The Congress workers asked for his views on class war and desired to know if it could be non-violent. He replied that it could not be non-violent in the form in which it was spoken of today. Whenever there came up question of crushing anybody it became violence.

Asked if the present policy of the Congress Socialist Party would injure the Congress cause, he said that he had no complaint if the policy was so outlined in the manifesto issued from Bombay. Asked if socialism was against Congress policy, Gandhiji said that socialism was a good thing. He himself was a socialist. But his definition was always non-violent, and what he really meant was expressed in the Karachi resolution and he still stuck to that and would go no further.

Pointed our to Congressmen to seek the co-operation of non-Congress workers, give them offices and serve under them. Let them have no distinction between Congress and non-Congressmen, he said, for Harijan work interested everybody alike. He felt that healthy co-operation between Congress and non-Congressmen in Harijan work would prove very beneficial to the Harijans. He appealed to them to seek the help of non-Congress workers as much as they possibly could.

The Congress workers asked for his views on class war and desired to know if it could be non-violent. He replied that it could not be non-violent in the form in which it was spoken of today. Whenever there came up question of crushing anybody it became violence.

Asked if socialism was against Congress policy, Gandhiji said that socialism was a good thing. He himself was a socialist. But his definition was always non-violent, and what he really meant was expressed in the Karachi resolution and he still stuck to that and would go no further.

Asked what attitude Congressmen must adopt towards zamindars, he said that there should be a brotherly affection and that our aim must be to end injustice and bring about samanvaya. They had to change hearts. He said that a feeling had been created amongst the zamindars that when they got swaraj, zamindars would be robbed of all they had. Supposing Government were pleased to award some land to a man in 1857, how could it be fair to rob his grand-children today of this property? If his land was taken, the State must pay appropriate compensation. Similarly a man who purchased land today and duly paid its price, could not be deprived of it.

1 What follows is reproduced from The Hindustan Times, 27-7-1934.
2 ibid
3 Harmony
Balkrishna Sharma questioned whether we should ameliorate the tenants’ condition while zamindars were there. Out of Rs. 19 crores realized from the peasantry in U.P., only Rs. 7 crores went to Government Treasury, the rest Rs. 12 crores being taken by the zamindars.

Gandhiji, replying, said that it was true that Rs. 12 crores should not go to them unless they rendered services to the peasantry of the same value. There had been times when they took Rs. 12 crores and rendered services worth Rs. 24 crores, but today the return was not worth even Rs. 12.

To destroy them would be no solution and violence would creep in. They should not make zamindars another sect of untouchables. They must get the Tenancy Acts enacted on lines different from those of the present Acts. There were no zamindars in Gujarat, still tenancy conditions remained the same.

Asked what work should be done amongst the tenants, Gandhiji said that much of their sufferings resulted from their ignorance, which should be removed. As they remained without work for six months in the year, they could be supplied with some cottage industries. Another thing he emphasized was training in hygiene and health besides education.

Asked what the workers should do in cases where lands had been confiscated during the civil disobedience and where zamindars refused to restore the same, Gandhiji said that the only way open to them was to approach the zamindars and appeal to their sense of justice. He hoped zamindars would be brought round, but if they could not they should approach lawcourts and sue them for justice.

Referring to civil resistance, he said that none should practise it, for he had found after attempting to penetrate into the masses’s mind all these years since 1920 that they could not develop a sense of discipline.

In the end, he was asked why the clause of habitual wearer of khadi for purposes of franchise was not deleted when it was found that it was impracticable to get habitual wearers even in small numbers. He referred to the same question when it was raised by Mr. Pranjapay in the same city. His reply then was that if they really desired to be with the masses, they must keep that clause in the franchise rules, but that if they wanted to delete it, he was prepared not to exercise his right of veto when the question came up for voting. He would be quite satisfied if there were only one hundred Congressmen who used khadi rather than a crore who did not.

285. SPEECH AT WOMEN’S MEETING, KANPUR

Gandhiji, replying, said that Rs. 501 was too small an amount from Cawnpore women. They were rich and could give more if they wanted to. He was all the same obliged to them and felt sure, he said, that they would give more. He then emphasized that women had a very important part to play in the Harijan uplift movement. He called upon them to take up uplift work and do their best to improve the social and economic condition of the Harijans who, he said, were as important a unit of human society as the caste Hindus. Women, he said, could do a good deal more than men and therefore women must come out and take up the work in all earnestness, sincerity and devotion which was characteristic of the womenfolk. He appealed to them in strong terms to use khadi for therein, he said, lay the salvation of the struggling and starving millions. By using khadi they could provide them with work and food. Charkha, he said, was the panacea for all ills. Charkha, he said, was remarkable and by the use of charkha women could bring about the economic emancipation of the country. He laid great stress on women’s education. No social uplift, he said, was possible unless women were educated. An educated woman was an asset not only to the family but to the country as a whole.

He then exhorted them to give up purdah, come out and take up the responsible duties which they had to discharge. Purdah killed their independence. It took away their spirit, their very life and the sooner the women-folk gave it up the better for all concerned.

[Before July 27, 1934]

The moving train is responsible for making my bad writing worse.

Neither Malaviyaji nor you have sent me any suggestions for removing your difficulty. I have been taxing myself for a solution. The more I think about it, the clearer I become that the Working Committee resolution is faultless. Non-committal is the only position the Congress can take up. We must not tease the communal boil. The more we tease it, the worse it becomes. In my opinion it is a fatal blunder to turn our attention from the White Paper. If the reforms are not killed, the Award will stand in spite or agitation. The reforms can

287. DISCUSSION WITH SOCIALISTS’ DEPUTATION

BENARES,
July 27, 1934

The deputationists, who were invited by Gandhiji for a free and open discussion, are reported to have told him that the Congress programme as it stood fell far short of the socialist demand and that he should use his influence with the Congress executive to adopt the socialist programme as envisaged in the Patna resolution of the Socialists’ Conference.

Gandhiji is understood to have deprecated frequent and unwarranted socialist attacks on the Congress executive and its programme and plainly told socialists that they should either be prepared to abide by the Congress decision without attempting to create unnecessary splits in Congress ranks or take over charge of the Congress machinery including its executive. He and other members of the executive were prepared to hand over control and make room for them if they so desired.

The socialists, who were evidently taken aback, came out disappointed in the main, but somewhat mollified by the assurance that Gandhiji gave them that he would put their suggestions before the Working Committee and after full consultation with them get the Committee to pass a resolution clearly defining the Congress attitude towards socialism, confiscation of property, etc.

DEAR DR. GOPICHAND,

Can you not collect from the public what you have spent for the Congress? But if you must pay, it is better to do so as early as possible and avoid interest. Therefore you must give more attention to practice than you are doing.

I am quite clear that you should keep away from the Congress and the elections.

1 Led by Narendra Dev
I do not at all appreciate Dr. Kitchlew’s fast. I hope it will have ended when this reaches you.

I shall await your letter on khadi.

I am ashamed to have put you to all that taxing trouble during my stay.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

289. MANIFESTO OF CONGRESS PARLIAMENTARY BOARD

BENARES,
July 29, 1934

The Parliamentary Board appointed by the All-India Congress Committee at its meeting at Patna on May 19 appeals to the voters of the Legislative Assembly at the forthcoming elections to record their votes in favour of Congress candidates.

The Congress policy has been declared and the Board has received mandate from the Working Committee in the following resolution passed by that body at Bombay on June 18.

Though much has been written for and against the part of the resolution regarding the so-called Communal Award, the line is absolutely clear so far as Congress candidates are concerned. By common consent it is intrinsically bad. It is anti-national. But the Congress cannot refuse to take into account the attitude of Mussalmans in general, who seem to want the Award; nor can the Congress accept it as the Hindus and Sikhs reject it. No other policy than that explained above is consistent with the aim and history of the Congress, which has throughout stood for peace and unity and founded all its activities on the firm belief that the various communities of India will act justly and honourably towards one another. The only thing, therefore, that Congress candidates and the Congress can do is to promote and assist in securing an agreed solution. Suffice it to say that we shall never reach such a solution by

1 The source had reported that the manifesto was drafted by Gandhiji. It was released to the Press after its approval by the Board which met in the morning; vide the following item.
2 Vide “Resolution on White Paper and Communal Award” appealing to a third party or power. Then, again, those who have confidence about successful opposition to the White Paper proposals need not feel concerned about the Award. They should know that if the White Paper lapses, the Award, which was framed for the White Paper, must automatically lapse. If the Award is bad, the White Paper is worse. The Parliamentary Board has, therefore, to concentrate the attention of the voters on the rejection of the White Paper and, as the only alternative to it, upon securing and convening a constituent assembly.

The White Paper is in no way designed to secure complete or even partial independence. It can easily retard the nation’s progress towards it. It proposes a costly pretence of representative institutions in India, with all the real control retained abroad. The safeguards wherewith it bristles are not conceived for the protection of the interests of India. On the contrary, they can easily be shown to prevent its economic progress, to deepen the poverty of the masses and to perpetuate the British exploitation of and domination over India. If the proposals contained in the White Paper are carried out, there will be no national control over the army or external affairs, and the burden of military expenditure will remain what it has been, and in effect foreign control will continue over the finance and fiscal and economic policy of India. If it be said that the proposals at least seek to give complete autonomy to the provinces, it is hedged in by restrictions that make it a sham and a shadow. No wonder, almost all parties have more or less condemned the White Paper scheme.

What is the alternative? Though the Congress claims to represent the whole nation, in the opinion of the Government it is only one of the political parties, albeit very powerful. Time will show what the position of the Congress is in the country. The voters at the forthcoming elections also may show it somewhat. But it is clear that the Congress must not frame any constitution only to be rejected by the Government. The Working Committee has, therefore, as stated above, suggested an infallible alternative—a constituent assembly to be elected on the basis of adult suffrage or as near as it may be. We know that such an assembly can be convened only by an agreement between the Governing Powers and the people, unless it is after a successful revolution. We have in contemplation the former. We do not despair of its acceptance if the electors choose their representatives in the forthcoming elections with a clear mandate that a constituent assembly is the only alternative to the White Paper. True, the existing franchise is narrow and therefore not truly representative of the masses. The constitution of the Assembly is, further, such that the members elected by the people cannot play an effective part in it. Nevertheless, if the verdict of the electorate is unequivocal, it cannot be flouted.

If the voters reject the White Paper and insist on a constituent assembly, it will no longer be said by the British bureaucracy that the people are quite satisfied with the methods and measures of the British Government and whatever they plan for them. It will be no small gain to have the illusion dispelled. Every vote for a Congress candidate, that is, for a constituent assembly in place of the White Paper, will help to clear the atmosphere. We hope all communities will unite on this simple issue.

This rejection of the White Paper and the acceptance of a constituent assembly is not all that the Congress representatives will attempt. They cannot be unmindful of the reactionary legislation passed during the past few years, unhappily often with elected members’ votes. Nor can they be unmindful of the way in which the non-violent struggle for liberty was met by Ordinances of extraordinary severity, and of the great sacrifices of thousands of Congressmen, including many women, who went to prison, suffered privations and lathi charges and submitted to heavy fines and confiscation of property. It will be the duty of those Congress candidates who are elected to press for their restoration wherever possible and the repeal of the repressive laws and of the Ordinances, now called Acts of the legislature. The extraordinarily drastic methods adopted towards Congress organizations in the Frontier Province will demand their special attention. It will also be their duty to demand an impartial scrutiny of the methods adopted by the Government in the Assembly for the purpose of meeting terrorism and to take measures to give effect to public opinion in regard to them.

The Congress Parliamentary Party will miss no opportunity of rendering such national service, be it small or great, as is possible through the legislatures. We are fully aware that the powers of the legislatures, provincial and central, are too small for the effort which the nation must make for the realization of its goal of complete independence. The constructive programme of the Congress, the successful prosecution of which alone can make our demand irresistible, can be most effectively carried on only outside the legislature. But there are matters which can be dealt with only through the legislatures and which will engage the attention of the Congress Party. In order to end the exploitation of the masses, political freedom must include real economic freedom of the starving millions. The economic policy of the Party will, therefore, be in accordance with the fundamental rights and the economic programme contained in the Karachi resolution of the All-India Congress Committee.

The Board, therefore, appeals to voters to unmistakably show that they stand for the Congress methods and objective and that they condemn the present bureaucratic rule and its methods.

290. SPEECH ON MANIFESTO OF CONGRESS
PARLIAMENTARY BOARD, BENARES

_July 29, 1934_

It is understood that in the course of discussion on the manifesto of the Parliamentary Board at the joint meeting of the Working Committee and the Parliamentary Board, Mahatma Gandhi made a most powerful and moving speech in support of the manifesto. He wanted to remove one misapprehension about the Congress Parliamentary Board. He had come to the conclusion that parliamentary mentality had come to stay in the Congress. It was no longer a question of the obstructionist policy alone of the old Swaraj Party. The Parliamentary Board’s idea was of contesting the elections to go to legislatures and remain there for the rejection of the White Paper, the convening of a constituent assembly, the repeal of repressive laws and the carrying on of a constructive programme and other national activities of the Congress to the extent opportunities were available.

Referring to the work of the old Swaraj Party, Mahatma Gandhi is reported to have said that he felt satisfied that they had rendered a good account of themselves in the legislatures. There was not a single speech of the late Pandit Motilal Nehru of which the nation need be ashamed. They had produced a good moral effect.

Answering a question whether Congressmen may not be in a minority, Mahatma Gandhi said that while hoping for a majority, he was willing to concede that they might be in minority; but all depended on the personnel of the minority.

Referring to Mr. Satyamurti, he said that even if he were in the minority of one, he (Mahatma Gandhi) was confident that he would give a good account of himself. The Congress was also learning by experience as the Government was. Several things in connection with civil disobedience and other matters might not have happened as they had happened, had Congressmen been in the legislatures. He was confident, of course, that Congressmen would come out of the legislatures if they were called upon to do so by the Working Committee of the Congress, but he did not believe in calling them out unless there was a supreme need for the same and the Congressmen in the legislatures had voluntarily agreed on the course. Even if civil disobedience were to be re-started, the Congress might not call on Congress members in the legislatures to come out, for after all, even if a crore of Indians offered civil disobedience they could easily spare about a thousand Congressmen for work in the legislatures. Today the Government were enacting repressive measure after repressive measure, like the Bengal Act recently passed by the Assembly, and claiming before the world that they had the support of the elected members of the Assembly for the purpose. The Congress would be able to deprive the Government of that excuse.

In conclusion, Gandhiji said that a manifesto was to be issued by the Congress Parliamentary Board for all work in legislatures subject to the control of the Congress in matters of policy which would be laid down from time to time.

291. SPEECH AT CENTRAL BOARD MEETING OF HARIJAN SEVAK SANGH, BENARES

July 29, 1934

There are two questions on which I have to speak to you—one in connection with the nature of the whole organization and the other in connection with the idea of having a training institution for workers for a period or for life. To take up the first question, I know there is a general desire to introduce an element of democracy—voting, election, etc.—into our organization. I was torn between two opposites; but, after having gone through this nine months’ tour, I have come to the conclusion that in an organization like ours there is no room for election, democracy or anything of that sort. Ours is a different kind of institution. It is not a people’s organization in the ordinary sense. We handle money merely as self-appointed trustees, using it solely for the benefit of the Harijans, and in such a manner that it finds its way directly into their pockets. Ours is an organization formed with a view to doing our duty by those whom we have 1 Published under the title “A Talk to the Workers”, this appeared as “a condensed summary” of Gandhiji’s speech “at the conclusion of the proceedings” at Kashi Vidyapith on July 28 and 29.

We are an organization to give effect to the pledge given to Harijans at Bombay by the great meeting held under the chairmanship of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviyaji. The people who pay to the Harijan Fund do so, we assume, in a penitent spirit, and all we have to do is to utilize it for the Harijans. To run an elective institution means expense and delay. Our aim is to distribute the funds among the Harijans with as little expenditure and delay as possible. We do not want any intervening medium between Harijans and ourselves. We are mere trustees, and the trust descends to those whom we appoint. There are people who say the donors ought to have a voice in the administration. I should say, they do not know. To me, he who pays a pie is as much a donor as, say, Ghanshyamdas Birla, who pays ten to fifty thousand. Maybe, the value of that pie is greater than the ten thousand rupees that Ghanshyamdas may give. I have seen in Orissa poor people untying their knots and parting with their coppers. That has given me more hope and greater pleasure than the thousands, however willingly given. The thousands without the coppers would be of little use in this cause of self-purification. But the thousands of the poor donors will never receive the vote. We do not even know their names. And still we are as much responsible to them as to the big donors, or even more. We are a charitable institution, depending for its existence upon honest and efficient management. And if we are to have the highest amount of efficiency, we have to select the best and the most honest workers.

Having said this, I leave it entirely to you to decide. I look at the movement as purely religious, moral or humanitarian. It is to me purely one of reparation and penitence. I do not know to what extent all the lakhs of donors share with me the belief in the penitential character of the work. But so far as I am concerned, I would declare that there is nothing in my mind save the desire to expiate for sins we have been guilty of all these years. Therefore I cannot think of the movement in terms of any political end. Not that it will not have political results, but we need not give a moment’s thought to them. The results will be surer, our relation with Mussalmans and other communities will be infinitely purer, if we keep only the larger end in view, and no other, as a result of this movement. I want everyone to dismiss the thought from his mind that our aim has been to raise an army of six crores of goondas. That certainly is not how I would think of defending Hinduism. I am sure that it can stand against the whole world, if it is purged of the curse of untouchability. This is no narrow movement; it is, I hope, the broadest of movements of our times.

The second question is easier. As a matter of fact, it follows from what I have said. I believe in the ideal of life-service. I want servants whose sole ambition is to devote themselves body, mind and soul to the Harijan cause. If we had ten thousand such workers—I make bold to say even if we had a thousand, we should have startling results. I would welcome a training institution for such workers. In Pinetown, near Durban in South Africa, there is a Trappist monastery\(^1\). The rigour observed at the time, now more than thirty years ago, when I visited the place, was very great. They had nothing like privacy for themselves; they had one long hall in which they stretched themselves; they had to get up at 2.30 a.m.; they had purely vegetarian food; they strictly observed the vow of silence. Only two or three who had to go to the market or to speak to visitors could speak. All others had to work silently. They were giving instruction to the Zulus. Their proselytization consisted in working among the Zulus and giving them the best of their life. They were workers for life. They were all learned sannyasins. They added to their learning a calling. They were carpenters, smiths, porters, shoemakers. They made all sorts of experiments. Their monastery was a model of beauty, a veritable garden, with not a particle of dust anywhere, and there was a sweet silence pervading the whole atmosphere. Zulu students were taken as raw youths and discharged as accomplished artisans. My idea is to have a training institution of this type. If anything, I would do better. But we are today fallen from grace. We used to have this rigorous discipline in our country but we have not progressed, while they have progressed. They have made researches and increased their heritage. If we can make anything like an approach to them, I should be satisfied. If we can get even five persons who are prepared to forget father, mother and children, and to devote themselves to Harijan service, I would have them. They would form the nucleus. But if we cannot aim so high, we may conduct an industrial home or a Harijan hostel or some other thing. Sheth Shivratan Mohatta has an industrial school in Karachi out of an endowment made by his brother. He had got two teachers from

\(^1\) Vide “A Band of Vegetarian Missionaries”,

244 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
Dayalbagh (Agra), which has its own aroma and its own Western finish. The students are kept well, there is a good boarding-house and a good dormitory. There are two departments—boot-making and tailoring. It is not a training institution but an industrial home. The Harijans there are conscious that they will not be discharged without being taught some handicraft, so that, when they come out, they will not be thrown on the streets. We may multiply such institutions.

We, Harijan workers, have not done justice to ourselves. Many of us are not workers even to a passable type. They have not given their whole time to their work; they do it in a leisurely fashion. I have often asked them, ‘Do you read Harijan?’ They have said, ‘No’. Out of the three editions of this weekly—English, Gujarati and Hindi—English and Gujarati are self-supporting; Hindi is not. Sufficient reception has not been given to these journals, though much labour is put forth in the preparation of these. Even in this preparation, sufficient help is not coming forth. Workers do not send information, facts. They do not go in for a discussion of problems as they occur from day to day. For, problems occur to workers and not to thinkers. If our workers were alive to their work, they would flood the editors with matter from which poor editors might find it difficult to make selections. Today they are starved. Harijan is a workers’ journal, for their guidance and for the interchange of their thoughts. I do not want for it essays. I have been pained to be asked questions by workers who should find the answers in the journal, if they were reading it carefully. But many do not read it at all. If you do not read the budget of news collected in these pages, how are you going to hold the movement together? You must know what is being done by sister organizations. We have not got itinerant messengers who will take the story of the vicissitudes of institutions from place to place. That would be a costly medium. But we have Harijan. It is full of information, but it can still be filled with more accurate information and greater variety.

Please do not run away with the idea that I am not capable of recognizing what little has been done. Nice things are there, but they do not need to be recounted. Virtue is its own reward. But I am an inspector. I must show you the blemishes and not tickle your ears with praise for the good things that you have done.

A word about the Harijan Ashram at Sabarmati. It is a big thing. It is not being made full use of. It is nobody’s fault. Poor Parikshitlal is there, but it is beyond his capacity to conduct it. He has also to look to the work of the whole of Gujarat. To utilize this institution fully would be an immense task for anybody. The burden of conducting and maintaining it will be on trustees specially appointed. Many baffling problems arise there from day to day. You can now understand why we want men of the Trappist type before we can make the fullest use of the big Ashram at Sabarmati.

292. _SPEECH ON NATIONAL EDUCATION_

_July 29, 1934_

Gandhiji dwelt at length on the National education as imparted nowadays and remarked that the Vidyapith up till now confined itself to towns only. He said that the time has come when the National education should be spread in villages and pointed out the necessity for the same.

I am fully aware of the part that Vidyapith played in the national movement. I am ever ready to give any advice on the subject.

_July 30, 1934_

MY DEAR ANAND,

I have your letter. Jeramdas has supplemented it with news about both you and Vidya.

I understand that you need Rs. 50 per month from July to October and thereafter would need Rs. 100 per month. I shall arrange for this sum to be paid to you. I want you to reduce your wants at least to the Ashram standard but not at the sacrifice of your or Vidya’s or Mahadev’s health.

You should get yourself examined by a competent doctor and put your body in order.

Concentrate on your work to the exclusion of everything else. If you do this you will derive the keenest joy from it and that will be

294. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

July 30, 1934

Your letter was all right. I got it only today. It was given to me immediately after the meeting of the Working Committee had ended.

There is an error in your suggestion, namely, that at present we are not offering civil disobedience. Appointing Abdul Ghaffar Khan would violate norms. Nobody has understood the difference between the present programme and the previous one. Our actions and words have become too arrogant. That is a sign of violence. Not only do we lack the regard and courtesy which we should show even towards an enemy, but I feel that falsehood and arrogance, instead of diminishing, are increasing among the workers. This requires further explanation, but I don’t have time for that just now. If you wish to know the reasons, when we meet and if I have time, you may ask me.

You also have been appointed one of the Treasurers.¹ See that you don’t overtax your health. You can’t afford to do that.

295. STATEMENT ON FAST

BENARES,
July 30, 1934

It is to be hoped that no one would take the trouble to come to Wardha, i.e., from August 7 to 14 next and during convalescence. I would need perfect rest and quiet during these days. The best way of showing their sympathy and sustaining me would be for every friend to do the utmost he or she can to be friend the Harijans in every way they can and win over opponents by correct and gentle behaviour. Those who have courageously admitted their error will do their share not by joining in the fast but by making a firm resolve not to repeat the error which has occasioned this fast.

296. DISCUSSION WITH VALLABHBHAI PATEL

[On or after July 30, 1934]1

GANDHIJI: It is my view that we should now let the library remain with the Municipality and, if possible have a separate trust made for it.2 I think that we are thus making a good use of the library but, of course, if the other trustees do not like this idea, we should not hesitate to ask for its return. This is not a question of prestige, and therefore whatever is proper should be done. I have no doubt Kakasaheb will be big enough not to mind it. When I think over the matter further, I must admit that even if Kakasaheb overlooked these points, I should have considered whether he had the necessary authority. Rushed as I was, I dealt with many matters hurriedly and this was one of those into

1 In the source, Narahari Parikh explains that the discussion was carried on through writing on a Silence Day after Vallabhbhai Patel’s release on July 14. Vallabhbhai Patel met Gandhi in Banaras on August 1, 1934; vide “Speech at Benares Hindu University”, 1-8-1934

2 Narahari Parikh explains that in July 1933, when Sabarmati Ashram was disbanded, the Ashram Library was entrusted to the Ahmedabad Municipality. Later on the Gujarat Vidyapith Library also was disposed of in like manner, after Gandhi had a discussion with D. B. Kalelkar. Vallabhbhai Patel and some other trustees of the Vidyapith who were in jail at that time could not be consulted. Vallabhbhai Patel, who did not like the move when he heard of it in jail, sought Gandhi’s guidance after his release. Vide also “Letter of Vallabhbhai Patel”, 21-8-1934 and “Letter to G.V. Mavalankar”, 15-9-1934.

which I did not go fully.

VALLABHBHAI PATEL: According to Kakasaheb, it was you who first suggested that the Vidyapith library might be given to the Municipality.

GANDHI: I do not remember making this suggestion, but if he says so, I am prepared to accept that I may have done so. . . .

It is true that they too had no authority. I would only say this much that any bequest made by one who had no authority to make it could always be taken back. If, therefore, it is considered proper to take these books back, they should be taken back. I think, however, that if at that time kakasaheb had asked everybody, possibly everyone concerned would have agreed. . . .

You say that the trustees had no right. Very well, if that is so then you must take back the books.

Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, Vol. II, p. 163

297. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, BENARES

July 31, 1934

I am very happy that by God’s grace I have had a second opportunity to visit Kashiji. The joy becomes greater when I realize that my Harijan tour will end in this holy place. If there are any who hold a different opinion, please come up to this platform and say something. I do not know why the Pandit of the Varnashrama Swarajya sangh could not be present here. Harijan uplift is a religious upheaval. There is no room for prejudice in this task. However hard I may try, I am also prone to make mistakes and I have committed them. I have never claimed that I have never erred nor that I ever will. What I am admitting today is nothing new. Ever since my childhood I have realized this fact. Even as a child, I followed my own way and

1 Narahari Parikh infers: “The Sardar must then have spoken about the rights of the trustees. . . .”
2 Narahari Parikh infers: “Vallabhbhai must then have said that the trustees had no right to make such a bequest to a Government-controlled institution.”
3 Subsequently, Vallabhbhai Patel, after obtaining legal opinion from K. M. Munshi and Bhalabhai Desai, moved the Municipality which on its part consulted Bahadurji, another distinguished lawyer, and returned the books to the Vidyapith.
4 Reference is to Devanayakacharya, who, however, came late. In his “Weekly Letter” (Harijan, 17-8-1934), Valji G. Desai had explained that “a representative of Varnashrama Swarajya Sangh and Bharata Dharma Mahamandal” had been invited to “present their standpoint before Gandhi ji’s speech”.

VOL. 64 : 20 MAY, 1934 - 15 SEPTEMBER, 1934 249
never recognized untouchability. I was taught the Ramanama mantra which would always protect me. If I had forgotten to admit this self-evident fact, I shall not in the least be ashamed to admit it in this holy place. Untouchability as it exists today has no place in the Shastras. Untouchability is a blot on Hinduism. So many pundits have come here at my invitation and many of their own accord. They have tried to justify the present form of untouchability by quoting the Shastras; but I respectfully beg to say that while attempting to understand the arguments put forth by the pundits I am in no way convinced of them.

I feel sad to say that according to the census published by the Government, untouchables number about seven crores. The census officers do not take the trouble to find out whether every one of these is an untouchable according to the laws of Manu. They write whatever the census inspectors report. Census is taken every ten years and the population increases or decreases in these ten years. A dog can drink from a reservoir, but a thirsty Harijan boy may not. If he goes, he cannot escape being beaten. Untouchability as practised today considers man worse than a dog.

A Harijan was down with pneumonia. A sanatanist doctor was called on payment. He accepted the fees but how could he touch the patient? He sent for a Muslim, gave him a watch and told him: “Please tell me how many times his pulse beats in a minute.” The doctor was given the pulse-count, he wrote the prescription and left. A second doctor was then called. He examined the patient’s lungs and heart carefully and then prescribed medicine; the sick man then recovered. Such kind of untouchability practised now has no sanction in the Shastras. In my opinion no shastri will be prepared to admit it. Neither my mind nor my heart will admit that such untouchability has sanction of the Shastras.

I shall say nothing more now.¹ It is my first duty to give Panditji an opportunity to speak. At this time I shall say only one word more. I am very grateful for the address of welcome given to me by the Kashi pundits. I consider it your blessings to me. I am thankful for the money presented to me. Although it is a small sum, I have been promised that efforts will be made to collect more money. Kindly remain quiet and listen to Panditji with attention and follow the dictates of your reason as regards the removal of untouchability. I hope you will all listen to Panditji’s speech with due respect.¹

After what Pandit Malaviyaji has said from the bottom of his heart, I have nothing more to add. I thank Pandit Devanayakacharya for the valuable advice he gave you in his calm and short speech. I thank you all for having listened to the speeches quietly. But if I do not reply to Devanayakacharya it would be considered bad manners. Panditji’s chief objection was in connection with the Temple-entry Bill. I shall have no objection if, as Malaviyaji has suggested, there is a talk between us both and some way is found in the future by which with the consent of temple-goers there would be no legal obstruction to temple-entry by Harijans. I have already said that without the consent of the Hindus no law will be made on this subject. Rest assured with this reply. Regarding the Bill, I made no reference to it in my Harijan tour; I did not even mention the name of the Bill. This has to be said about discussion: Today or in the future, discussions can take place anywhere; but religion is not a subject to be understood by the intellect but one that is accepted by the heart. Except the temple-entry question I do not see anyone against any other question. I neither wish to force anyone nor do I wish to quarrel with anyone. None should be afraid of me. I can do no harm nor evil to sanatana dharma. I am also a follower of the same sanatana dharma that you profess.

[From Hindi]

_Harijan Sevak_, 10-8-1934

¹ In his speech, Devanayakacharya opposed the Temple-entry Bill and said that Gandhiji was introducing an innovation undermining the importance of sanatana dharma. Madan Mohan Malaviya who spoke next made a forceful appeal in support of the reform.
298. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

August 1, 1934

CHI. PREMA,

I got your fairly long and frank letter.

Parents don’t think or talk about their children’s good health. They think and talk about their diseases, which are not of the body only. I am not surprised to learn that you are observing the Ashram rules. I would have been surprised indeed had you not observed them.

May you succeed in your noble aims.

Every day is one’s birthday. We are born every day and we die every day and are born again. But, following convention, we regard a particular day of the year as our birthday. You certainly have my blessings for that day and for all other days of the year.

I am sending this reply through Narandas and thereby saving five pice. Narandas also will write to you. I have to write to him today and so, instead of sending the letter through Dhurandhar, I am sending it through him.

Please keep writing to me. Your description of that place was good. This letter is being written before the morning prayer.

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your letter. It is strange that Santok can do no work. How is it that Baba' has been brought up in such a way that he doesn’t let her attend to anything else? How do the children of the poor grow?

Ask Kusum, Lilavati and others to write to me when they feel inclined to do so. They should not, however, expect any letter from me, for I shall not be able to write any.

I got Prema’s long letter. A reply to her is enclosed.

Amala is extremely frank, but she has no common sense at all. If I sent her to you, she would waste your money. It is better that, so long as I live at one place, I should shoulder her responsibility. When I give up a fixed residence, I will see what to do about her. I will try to fix her permanently at the place where she may be at that time.

What work is Keshu doing? Where does he live? I often meet Rukhi here. Her health cannot be described as very good.

You should keep up the practice of writing to me on a fixed day once every week, whether or not there is any special business. If there is anything particular to write about, you may write as often as necessary. A postcard will do.

I am thinking about the dairy.

300. SPEECH AT BANARES HINDU UNIVERSITY
August 1, 1934

The Hindu University is not new to me. Since its inception Malaviyaji had me associated with it and it remains exactly so to this day. If there has been any change, the association has been strengthened and my regard for this University is increasing. With the progress of this University there should be progress in dharma as well; this is Pandit Malaviyaji’s idea. I hope students will acquire learning and will make good use of it and not accept a narrow view of religion. A broad-minded religion accepts all other religions in its fold. This is the auspicious occasion of Lokamanya Tilak’s anniversary and I have come to tell you what we should do about one aspect of religion. I shall not speak of Lokamanya’s political strength; I have also no freedom to touch upon that subject. I wish to tell you at this time what Tilak Maharaj said about religion. You should know that Lokamanya had great sympathy in his heart for the Harijan brothers. In our exchange of thoughts and ideas with each other, he said that in the dharmashastra there is no sanction for untouchability and there cannot be because truth ranks highest in the Hindu religion. If truth was put in one scale of the balance and all the rest in the other, even then the scale with truth in it will go down. No pundit can find anywhere in the Vedas, Puranas or history things said contrary to the principles of religion. There is no mention of untouchability in other religions. Hinduism alone seems to have taken a monopoly. There are several things mentioned in our religion which are not found elsewhere. If the varna system is abolished in our country, then Hinduism will also disappear. There is no connection between the varnashrama and the present-day concept of untouchability. My faith in this is growing stronger and after nine months of this tour I can avow it with greater conviction.¹

I have been asked by Acharya Anandshankar Dhruva to say a few words on the Gita to the students of the Kashi Vishvavidyalaya. It is not without hesitation that I have accepted the invitation. What right can a layman like myself have to discourse on a theme like this in the presence of a savant like him? I have neither his profound scholarship, nor the deep study of our ancient religious lore which Pandit Malaviyaji, for instance, has. Sardar Vallabhbhai, in his characteristic manner, asked me this morning whether scavengers, cultivators, and weavers like him and me were not altogether out of court in a city of pundits like Kashi and in the presence of such learned pundits as Malaviyaji and Acharya Dhruva, and in a way he was right. But I have come here, not with any pretence to learning, but only to tell you what reaction the Gita had on lay natures like mine and the Sardar’s. I wonder whether you have even a distant idea of how profoundly it affected the Sardar during his imprisonment. I am here to bear witness to the fact that in the Yeravda Prison it gave him more strength and sustenance than meat and drink. To read the Gita in the original he set about learning Sanskrit with the help of Pandit Satavalekar’s Sanskrit self-instructor, and once he had started on it, the book seldom left his hands. It occupied him from morning till night. It was not an obsession of an unoccupied mind, as you might be tempted to think, but the result of deep thought. ‘Which is the one book that can be to the Hindus what the Bible is to the Christians or the Koran to the Maussalmans?’ We asked ourselves. Is it the Vedas? No. The Bhagavata? No. Devipurana? No. Early in my childhood I had felt the need of a scripture that would serve me as an unfailing guide through the trials and temptations of life. The Vedas could not supply that need, if only because to learn them would require fifteen to sixteen years of hard study at a place like Kashi, for which I was not ready then. But the Gita, I had read somewhere, gave within the compass of its 700 verses the quintessence of all the Shastras and the Upanishads. That decided me. I learnt Sanskrit to enable me to read the Gita. Today the Gita is not only my Bible or my Koran; it is more than that—it is my mother. I lost my earthly mother who gave me birth long ago; but this eternal Mother has completely filled her place by my side ever since. She has never changed. She has never failed me. When I am in difficulty or distress, I seek refuge in Her bosom. Often in the course of my struggle against untouchability, I am confronted with conflicting opinions delivered by doctors of learning. Some of them tell me that untouchability as it is practised today has no sanction in Hinduism and they bless my efforts to eradicate it; but there are some others who maintain that untouchability has been an essential part of Hinduism from the very beginning. Which authority should I follow under the circumstances? I feel absolutely at sea. The Vedas and the smritis are of no avail to me. I then approach the Mother and say, “Mother, these learned pundits have put me in a predicament. Help me out of my perplexity.” And the Mother, with a smile, says in reply: “The assurance held out by me in the ninth chapter is not meant for the Brahmans only, but for the sinner and the outcaste, the downtrodden and the disinherited, too.” But in order to be worthy of that promise, we must be obedient and devoted children of the Mother and not disobedient and disloyal children, who only make a pretence of devotion.

It is sometimes alleged against the Gita that it is too difficult a work for the man in the street. The criticism, I venture to submit, is ill-founded. The Gita enabled the late Lokamanya, out of his encyclopaedic learning and study, to produce a monumental commentary. For him it was a store-house of profound truths to exercise his intellect upon. But that need not scare away a lay reader. If you find all the eighteen chapters too difficult to negotiate, make a careful study of the first three chapters only. They will give you in a nutshell what is propounded in greater detail and from different angles in the remaining fifteen chapters. Even these three chapters can be further epitomized in a few verses that can be selected from these chapters. Add to this the fact that at three distinct places the Gita goes even further and exhorts to us to leave alone all ‘isms’ and take refuge in the Lord alone, and it will be seen how baseless in the charge that the message of the Gita is too subtle or complicated for lay minds to understand. The Gita is the universal Mother. She turns away nobody. Her door is wide open to anyone who knocks. A true votary of the Gita does not know what disappointment is. He ever dwells in perennial joy and peace that passeth understanding. But that peace and joy come not to the sceptic or to him who is proud of his intellect or learning. It is reserved only for the humble in spirit who brings to Her worship a fullness of faith and an undivided singleness of mind. There never was a man who worshipped Her in that spirit and went back disappointed.

Our students are prone to be upset by trifles. A trivial thing like failure in an examination plunges them into the darkest despair. The Gita inculcates upon them the duty of perseverance in the face of seeming failure. It teaches us that we have a right to action only but not to the fruit thereof and that success and failure are one and the same thing at bottom. It calls upon us to dedicate ourselves, body, mind and soul, to pure duty, and not to become mental voluptuaries at the mercy of all chance desires and undisciplined impulses. As a satyagrahi, I can declare that the Gita is ever presenting me with fresh lessons. If somebody tells me that this is my delusion, my reply to him would be that I shall hug this delusion as my richest treasure.

I would advise the students to begin their day with an early morning recitation of the Gita. I am a lover and devotee of Tulsidas. I adore the great spirit that gave to an aching world the allhealing mantra of Ramanama. But I am here today, not to present Tulsidas to you, but to ask you to take up the study of the Gita, not in a carping or critical spirit, but in a devout and reverent spirit. Thus approached, She will grant your every wish. It is no joke, I admit, remembering by heart all the eighteen chapters but it is worth while to make the attempt. Once you have tasted of its sweet nectar, you attachment to it will grow from day to day. The recitation of the Gita verses will support you in your trials and console you in your distress, even in the darkness of solitary confinement. And, if with these verses on your lips you receive the final summons and deliver up your spirit, you will attain Brahmanirvana—the Final Liberation. What that blessed state is, I leave it for your learned Acharyas to explain to you.

301. SPEECH AT HARIJANS’ MEETING, BENARES

August 1, 1934

In the course of his address to them, Gandhiji said that the Harijan movement was fraught with immense possibilities and held within it the seeds of reconciliation, not only between the various communities in India, but also the white and the coloured races of the world.

The Municipality and the citizens of Benares should be ashamed of the fact, he said, that Harijan quarters were situated just near public latrines and that Harijans had to live in a place unfit even for cattle. It was up to the Municipality to construct decent houses for them in good and pleasant surroundings.

Harijans must fulfil their part of the programme by giving up beef, carrion, liquor, gambling and the idea of superiority and inferiority even among themselves.²

Mahatma Gandhi reiterated his view that anti-untouchability was not against the Shastras. If anyone could convince him that this movement was against the Shastras he would be the first person to give it up.

302. LETTER TO NARENDRA DEVA

BENARES,

August 2, 1934

DEAR NARENDRA DEVA,

I was thankful for the two hearty meetings¹ with the socialist friend during the all too few days I have been with you and enjoyed your hospitality.

I promised to study your draft programme and let you have my criticism on it. I cannot say I have studied it as carefully as I would ¹ The Leader had reported that the meeting was held at Central Hindu School.

² What follows is reproduced from The Leader.

VOL. 64 : 20 MAY, 1934 - 15 SEPTEMBER, 1934 257
have liked to. The following therefore is meant as a cursory criticism by no means exhaustive.

I think that it is wrong to call the party ‘Congress Socialist Party’ unless you apply for permission to make it part of the Congress organization. But it would be quite proper to call it ‘All-India Socialist Party of Congressmen’. I am sure you realize the significance of the distinction.

I miss in your draft constitution acceptance of the Congress objective of attainment of purna swaraj by legitimate and peaceful means.

If it is an intentional omission I can understand it. For your object seems to be far different from that of the Congress. You perhaps claim that it is far ahead of the object of the Congress. Even so you cannot then call yourself a Congress party.

The object of the Congress is to form an independent State. What that State will be we can but dimly guess. Some of its features we have already determined. Experience teaches us daily new things to add. But your enunciation of the socialist object frightens me. The implications of all the three principles are too vast for my comprehension. They make an intoxicating programme. I fear all intoxicants.

I now take by way of illustration what appear to me to be objectionable items in your programme. Items 7 and 8 are contrary to the present policy of the Congress. Though I have all my life identified myself with the masses and renounced possession of private property, I do not contemplate the elimination of the princes and the landlords nor do I contemplate redistribution of land to peasants. I aim at reformation of the princes and the landlords. It is possible, without a violent redistribution of land, to secure for tenants rights which virtually amount to ownership. I like item 11, which 7 and 8 and some others seem to me to contradict. To everyone “according to his needs” should be, in my opinion, a perfect formula if you can find place for “just” before “needs”. That alone sums up all you can wish for for the most helpless and forlorn among the millions of our...¹. Your fifth method, as I conceive it, is a negation of non-violence. I fail to find any justification for refusal to enter at any stage into negotiations on the constitutional issue with the British Government. The Congress did not adopt that policy even in the heyday of non-co-operation. I am sure this is a hasty interpolation.

Your “general strikes of workers and peasants” without any qualification is too dangerous for a sober, non-violent programme.

Your immediate demands are attractive with the exception of a few items. But I find nothing in your methods to show that you have any hope of immediate attainment.

I draw your attention to glaring omissions:

Removal of untouchability.
Communal unity.

Khaddar as symbol of identity with the masses and immediate occupation till a better is found for the millions who are unemployed for six or four months in the year.

Total prohibition of intoxicating drugs and drinks.

I plead for a drastic revision of the whole constitution. We are both labouring under a heavy handicap in that Jawaharlal, who has given us the mantra of socialism, is not in our midst, and I consider him to be the natural wearer of the Congress crown of thorns when I and other elderly men and women have been permitted to take well-deserved rest. I feel sure that if he was in our midst, he would have hastened slowly. I suggest your presenting the country with practical socialism in keeping with Indian conditions instead of scientific socialism as your programme has been called. I am glad that the programme you have given me is but draft though prepared by an influential committee appointed for the purpose. It would be wise, if when you settle your programme finally, you will associate with you men who have socialist leanings and have experience of actual conditions.

Yours sincerely,

303. LETTER TO GOVINDDAS

BENARES,

[August] 2, 1934

Bhai Govinddasji,

I have gone through your letter. My article or statement did not at all imply that Congress Committees should not or cannot be formed in the Indian States. The Committees already existing such as the Baghelkhand District Congress Committee about which you wrote to me should certainly continue to exist. It will, of course, be a matter of extreme regret if such committees are disallowed in any State.

Yours,

Mohandas Gandhi

304. LETTER TO MADAN MOHAN MALAVIYA

BENARES,

August 2, 1934

There are grave objections to organizing things in accordance with your demand. The Congress would, in that case, be charged with complete nullification of its resolution and this it cannot afford. First, only the Parliamentary Board can properly deliberate over this because that alone is in possession of correct information regarding the number and the names of candidates to be put up and their respective constituencies. But the Parliamentary Board itself will find it well-nigh impossible to accept the suggested arrangement. It has already put up candidates at many places and the work too has been started. To withdraw the Congress candidates and put up your candidates instead would have, in view of the Bombay Resolution1, an extremely adverse effect. It is also very difficult to judge whether candidates whom you want to be put up on your behalf can be found among tried Congressmen in sufficiently large number. What we suggested was that you yourself, Shri Aney and only a few other important persons whose participation you consider most essential should come. They should be confirmed Congressmen and willing to co-operate fully with the members of the Parliamentary Board in all other respects except the Communal Award. I feel this would be the proper course and I do not expect good results from any other. My appeal to you even now is to accept this scheme and not to involve yourself in the botheration of forming a new group. It would add to the prestige of both sides if you avoid any contest with the Congress candidates. You have left the Parliamentary Board regarding it as your dharma. If we all work placing this dharma before us we shall all benefit and achieve our objectives. Competition is bound to be very harmful. I am confident that your opposition by itself would suffice as an expression of disapproval of Communal Award. I hope you will respond to my humble appeal.

305. SPEECH AT WOMEN’S MEETING, BENARES

[August 2, 1934]

It is a tragedy that religion for us means today nothing more than restriction on food and drink, nothing more than adherence to a sense of superiority and inferiority. Let me tell you that there cannot be grosser ignorance than this. Birth and observance of forms cannot determine one’s superiority or inferiority. Character is the only determining factor. God did not create men with the badge of superiority or inferiority, and no scripture which labels a human being as inferior or untouchable because of his or her birth can command our allegiance; it is a denial of God and Truth which is God. God, who is the embodiment of Truth and Right and Justice, can never have sanctioned a religion or practice which regards a fifth of our vast population as untouchables. I want you, therefore, to rid yourselves of this monstrous notion. Untouchability attaching to unclean work is there, must be there. It applies to every one of us, but the moment we have washed ourselves clean of dirt or filth, we cease to be untouchable. But no work or conduct can render a man or woman untouchables for all time. Sinners we are all to a greater or less extent, and every one of our spiritual books—Gita, Bhagavata, and Tulsi

1 This appeared under the title “Plain Talk to Women”. The meeting was held in Harish Chandra School.
2 From Valji G. Desai’s “Weekly Letter” in Harijan, 17-8-1934
Ramayana—declares in no uncertain terms that whoever seeks refuge in Him, whoever takes His name, shall be free from sin. That covenant is for all mankind.

There is another simple test that I want you to apply to this question. Every species, human and sub-human, has some distinguishing mark, so that you can tell a man from a beast, or a dog from a cow and so on. Have the so-called untouchables any distinguishing mark declaring them to be untouchables? They are as much human as every one of us, and we do not regard even sub-human beings as bearing the mark of untouchability. Why and whence, then, this monstrous injustice? It is not religion, but the grossest species of irreligion. I want you to cast off that sin, if you still happen to have it in you.

The only way in which we can expiate this sin of centuries is to befriend the Harijans by going to their quarters, by hugging their children as you do your own, by interesting yourselves in their welfare, by finding out whether they get enough to eat, whether they get pure water to drink, whether they have the fresh light and air that you enjoy as of right. The other way is for each of you to start the spinning sacrifice and to pledge yourselves to wear khadi, which supports millions of these submerged human beings. The spinning sacrifice will help you in some slight measure to identify yourselves with them, and every yard of khadi you wear will mean some coppers going into the pockets of the Harijans and the poor. The last thing is to contribute your mite to the Harijan Fund, which has no other end but the amelioration of the lot of the Harijans.

Harijan, 31-8-1934
306. THE ANTI-UNTOUCHABILITY BILL

August 3, 1934

This interpretation of the Bill is not sustained by lawyers. Harijans will be shut out of temples effectively where savarna Hindus are against their entry, though not on the ground of untouchability. If there is any doubt about it, the Bill can be amended; but I hold that in principle it is absolutely necessary, more so than the Temple-entry Bill.

307. LETTER TO J. C. GUPTA

PATNA,
August 3, 1934

DEAR MR. GUPTA,

Thanks for your letter. I cannot help feeling that your resignation is a mistake. You were at liberty, although a member of Parliamentary Board, to agitate against separate electorates and for any agreed solution that you thought fit. And as a member perhaps you would have been more effective. In any case you will earn universal thanks if you can procure even an agreed solution for Bengal.

Yours sincerely,

1 This appeared as reply to a letter to the editor from Basant Kumar Chatterjee, which read : “Gandhiji has often declared that he is not in favour of temple-entry by the Harijans, unless the majority of Hindus of the higher castes are in favour of the innovation. If, however, the Anti-untouchability Bill is passed, it will secure temple-entry to Harijans, even though the majority of Hindus of the higher castes are against such temple-entry. Will Gandhiji kindly state whether he is against the Anti-untouchability Bill?”
308. LETTER TO SURENDRANATH CHATTERJI

PATNA,
August 3, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter of the 18th ultimo. The question you raised baffles a decisive answer. The vote of a majority cannot bind a minority, in religious matters, but that must surely mean that the minority secedes from the majority. As to legislation, it is necessary when law prevents the growth of religion. Legislation was the rule of the day during the pure Hindu period.

DEAR LALA MULKRAJ,

I have your wire to which I sent a reply yesterday. Your budget of expenses was signed by Panditji, some days back, but pressure of work prevented my sending it to you.

Panditji has promised to send you the cheque at once on hearing from you. If there is any delay you will please write to me. Meanwhile, I would like a copy of the Congress Resolution, trustdeed, and deed appointing the Committee of managers.

Panditji desires that the work should be started forthwith and that a report of the progress with expenses should be sent from month to month.

I leave for Wardha tomorrow morning.

310. LETTER TO DR. B. C. ROY

PATNA,
August 3, 1934

DEAR DR. BIDHAN,

I have your letter. I have given to Mantreswar public answers to your questions. I have come to no agreement with Malaviyaji and I have no authority either, but I have suggested that Malaviyaji should be satisfied if two or three of his nominees, being all Congressmen, are left uncontested. He won’t be satisfied with less than 22 seats. I have said that would be impossible. I myself could not agree to any such proposal. I fancy that we could not object to expression of dissent on the part of the members of general committees, but we could and should resist such action on the part of members of Working Committee, or such committees. These latter are the executives pledged to carry out the programme of provincial majorities.

Though I am somewhat broken up since you left us, I share your confidence that I shall pull through the fast. I have no objection to the Parliamentary Board meeting, but Sardar would insist on protecting me from it.

Yours sincerely,

I got your letter. What you say is correct. Follow Narandasbhai’s advice. Sushilabehn also is there now. You may consult her too. Now think over my argument. Do you want a degree or knowledge? Do you want education which brings you knowledge or to work for some sort of degree? Do you know that a degree does not serve the purpose of knowledge?...

CHI. SHARMA,

I have your letter. There is no longer any necessity, I suppose, of answering all your letters. But you may send me those you want to be dealt with.¹

I do not see any impropriety in accepting from one’s brothers the financial help they can offer without hesitation. So they may give what help they can.

It is not right that you should feel yourself exiled there. This attitude, if not corrected, is bound to have a bad effect on Ramdas.²

Why do you think we have all hampered your work? For myself, I have endeavoured to give you as much encouragement as I could. You must tell me if I have unwittingly done something to the contrary.

How is it that Devi³ is suffering from typhoid, and, if he is, don’t you have any treatment for it? You may treat the children as you think best, I have no wish to interfere unduly.

314. SPEECH AT BIHAR CENTRAL RELIEF COMMITTEE

MEETING, PATNA

August 3, 1934

It is in the fitness of things that we are having a resolution recording confidence and not expressing any elaborate appreciation. There were two reasons, one being that the report is not yet in the hands of the public and, secondly, the general committee in eulogizing the work of its Managing Committee would be eulogizing itself. But the resolution is necessary in order to tell the public that the Managing Committee retains their confidence and that the general committee wants it to go ahead with its work. It is worth nothing that the Committee has expended just little less than half of the funds as its disposal; not that it could not spend it all, but it knew its limitations. Thus it might have attempted to clear the sand-covered areas and sunk

1 The source had reported that the first general meeting of the Earthquake Relief Committee, after its reconstitution, was held in Wheeler Senate Hall. Rajendra Prasad presided. Gandhiji spoke after moving the following resolution : “The general meeting of the Bihar Central Relief Committee, having received the report of the Managing Committee regarding work done up to the 30th June, records its confidence in the Managing Committee.”
the whole of the funds in sand. I am in a position to move this resolution because though I have not been able to go through the report, I have been in constant touch with the actual work of the Committee.

There is a complaint that the Committee has not been mindful of the interests of the middle classes inasmuch as it has spent something like twenty-two thousand rupees for helping the middle classes. The complaint is hardly just because the total amount allotted is Rs. 5 lakhs and I am here to give the assurance that the balance will be spent for the middle classes. The critics must remember that those responsible for distribution of relief themselves belong to the middle classes and could not be accused of neglecting them. Besides, Government has distributed Rs. 22 lakhs for their relief, the Government being in a better position to ascertain the condition of these classes. The Bihar Central Relief Committee had naturally to concentrate its attention to the relief of the poorer classes inasmuch as it knows their condition and their grievances better than any other agency. It was well that there was a natural division of functions between the official agency and our agency. There was also another reason why relief to the middle classes could be deferred for a while, for they had much more staying power than the poor. I can assure you that not only the balance of Rs. 4,80,000 would be expended for the help of the middle classes, but that even more will be voted if it is needed and is available. I would ask everyone, who could afford, to go in for a copy of the report and study it. Every little contribution has been acknowledged. I would invite everyone to study the report critically and pass on his criticism to the Committee.

I am thankful to the railway companies and the Tata Company for the concessions and the help they have extended to the Committee but I associate myself with Babu Rajendra Prasad that they should continue these concessions unless they have strong reasons not to do so.

I am thankful that we had a band of volunteers and workers to help us in the work. Volunteer work is done so much efficiently and honestly than paid work. I hope and pray that the present calamity will have taught us the lessons of resourcefulness and self-help so that in case of future emergencies we may not be found wanting.

I am sorry that we are not ready with the full audited accounts today. This is a thing that public organizations can ill afford to neglect.
and we should always be ready to account for our receipts from minute to minute and from day to day. No care in this matter would be too great.

In conclusion, I would ask you to note that the committee is not making a further appeal for funds mainly at my instance. It is not that we don’t want more money. The sum of Rs. 83 lakhs received for the Viceroy’s Fund and by the Bihar Central Relief Committee is hardly enough for our needs but we cannot appeal for more so long as we have not disbursed all the funds at our disposal. Let the public, however, remember that we may have to make an appeal in future and let them be prepared to pay as generously as they have done especially when they know that all the monies are well spent and every pie is accounted for.

315. INTERVIEW TO THE PRESS

PATNA,
August 3, 1934

INTERVIEWER: Are you now in a position to say what your programme will be in the very near future?

GANDHIJI: So far as I am aware this month will be devoted to fasting and convalescence. Thereafter what is in store for me in September I have no notion. But I can say this much. I am in no hurry to find myself in a prison. On the contrary, I shall try to avoid it to the best of my ability. If it becomes possible for me to avoid imprisonment for any length of time, I hope to be able to devote it undoubtedly to the continuation of the Harijan work and the rest of the constructive programme of the Working Committee, for I swear by that programme, and I am positive that if we are to mount to freedom through really non-violent means, the workers will have to qualify themselves for such constructive work and devote themselves whole-heartedly to it.

Though I am mainly responsible for the coming into being of the Congress Parliamentary Board, I have always insisted that it is the least part of the national programme. It will be useless, in terms of swaraj, without the backing of the constructive programme, not one on mere paper but in solid substantial Indiawide work. If God enables me to do so I hope to be able to show in its fulness the marvellous potency of the Working Committee’s resolution\(^1\) on swadeshi, passed at Benares.

1 Accorded jointly to The Hindu and The Hindustan Times

But what about the split between Pandit Malaviya and Mr. Aney on the one hand and the Working Committee and the Parliamentary Board on the other?

You may call it a split if you like. In spite of Herculean efforts on either side to prevent the parting we saw that there were fundamental differences which were not to be overcome and we have parted as friends and hope to remain as such although we might be fighting.

Indeed I am not without hope that the fight could be avoided. How it will be, I do not know. How it can be, I do know. I have submitted my proposal\(^2\) to Pandit Malaviya. If it comes to anything it will have to go to the Working Committee and the Parliamentary Board. I have no power whatsoever to come to any agreement.

But rumour has it that you and Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel have agreed to divide half the available seats with Panditji and those who represent his point of view.

I can give you a summary contradiction of that rumour. Indeed, any such division will be a betrayal of trust. After all, the Working Committee’s resolution enunciates a very big principle. If the members of the Working Committee had no confidence in the correctness of their position they would have been wrong to lose the co-operation of such men as Pandit Malaviya and Mr. Aney. The Working Committee and the Parliamentary Board have, therefore, to work out the comprehensive resolution on the White Paper and the Communal Award to its full extent and know, as also demonstrate, the efficacy of all its parts. That surely cannot be done by a surrender of half the available seats to the representatives of the view for which Pandit Malaviyaji stands. I would, therefore, urge the public to discount all rumours.

Pandit Malaviya is a seasoned servant of the nation. He is one amongst the very few of the oldest of Congressmen with an unbroken record of brilliant service and sacrifice. I have no manner of doubt that he will do nothing to undermine the Congress influence whether they put up a fight or it becomes possible, as I hope it will be, to come to an honourable understanding. But let me not anticipate.

\(^1\) Vide “Resolution on Swadeshi”
\(^2\) Vide “Letter to Madan Mohan Malaviya”, 2-8-1934
We have read the Working Committee’s resolution\(^1\) on discipline. There are Congressmen whose views coincide with those of Pandit Malaviya. In such cases, where they are members of Congress Committees, should they retire, as Mr. Aney has done?

I personally do not think so. Disciplinary action in such matters can only extend to bodies corresponding to the Central Working Committee. Thus, the Provincial Congress Committees have members who may represent Malaviyaji’s point of view and advocate it in the Press or on the platform without being considered guilty of indiscipline, even as members of the All-India Congress Committee expressing views opposed to those held by the Working Committee will not be. But every Provincial Congress Committee has or should have its own Executive Committee corresponding to the Central Working Committee. That is the real Executive which has to carry out loyally and without murmur the whole of the Congress programme. And if any of the members has no faith in the programme he should retire from the Executive. But so long as he is in it, he may not criticize the programme either in the Press or on the platform. This is the view I have always held. Any other attitude will break to pieces any organization.

Is it likely that you will devote any time now or in the near future to a special effort at tackling the terrorist problem? What special methods do you contemplate employing to bring revolutionary young men under control?

Indeed I am a determined opponent of the cult of violence. Not a day passes when I do not do or think something about this question which is one of life and death to me. But I would like to do ever so much more than I am able to at present. For that, however, I need help from outside, both Indian and English, official and non-official. The cult of violence is not going to die easily. I entertain no extravagant dreams about the establishment of the kingdom of non-violence on the earth. If I get the atmosphere for the work that I need, I would love to bury myself for some time in Bengal and see what possibility there is for me to battle with violence. But I have patience. God will open the way for me, if he wants me to work more actively than I am doing in that direction.\(^2\)

It is a matter of great thankfulness for me that the tour was

\(^1\) Vide “Resolution on Discipline”

\(^2\) According to the source, Gandhiji was then “asked to give his impressions about the Harijan tour”.
finished without interruption and according to the programme that was settled from time to time. The impression left on my mind is that untouchability is on its last legs. Millions who attended the meetings were not all utterly ignorant of all I had to say to them. They were certainly not indifferent. The intensive propaganda carried on by sanatanists had left no room for ignorance or indifference. Nothing was left undone to prejudice the mass mind against the movement. The grossest falsehoods were broadcast. It would be wrong, therefore, to say that the attendance of multitudes at the meetings was purely a personal compliment to me and had no reference to my message. I am quite sure that the message has appealed to the reason of the masses. I am also fully aware that all of them are not yet ready to translate their beliefs into practice. But I consider it a tremendous gain that the masses have begun to believe in the truth of the message. It makes the task of the workers easier than before. To show how heartily the masses have taken part in the movement. I should mention that the eight lakhs of rupees collected during the past nine months represent contributions from the poorest. It has occupied hours, from day to day, of our accountants to count coppers and small coins, whether collected at public meetings or at railway stations. People are not known to contribute to the cause which they have utterly disliked. The third thing I should say about the tour is that a demonstrable awakening, on a large scale, has taken place among the Harijans. Many of them have made unsolicited statements before me that the position had considerably advanced and that they had confidence that untouchability would be a thing of the past in the near future. I share their confidence. If the movement goes on as it is doing at present—and I have no doubt that it will go on—it must cause daily increasing awakening among Harijans and when they fully realize how they can substantially help themselves, and how in many cases the law is with them, whether savarna Hindus like it or not, Harijans would make good their position. I would, of course, hope that savarna Hindus will realize the wickedness of untouchability as it is practised today and get rid of it themselves rather than that they should be compelled to do so by circumstances beyond their control. Whatever happens, untouchability cannot survive for many years.

Much mischievous agitation has been led on this question in spite of my having cleared the position at the beginning stage of the Harijan tour. No temple was opened where there was not a virtual consensus of opinion, in favour of opening, on the part of those who were in the habit of visiting those temples. Nobody has ever suggested that when practically the whole congregation is in favour of such opening, the temple should not be opened. As to the Temple-entry Bill, I hold that it is a legal necessity. But I have declared times without number that I would be no party to forcing the Bill through the Assembly by the vote of a mixed majority. It is, therefore, that Mr. C. Rajagopalachariar is ascertaining independently Hindu sentiment in the legislature and if Hindu sentiment is against the Bill, so far as I am concerned, it will be withdrawn. With all these reservations, therefore, all agitation against the measures ought to die, unless I commit a breach of faith. How I wish that the undivided attention of all Hindus was concentrated on the ameliorative measures that have been adopted by the Harijan Sevak Sangh!

Let me finally add that no money has been spent during these nine months in connection with the temple-entry agitation or the Bill. No temple has been built out of Harijan purses.

317. LETTER TO MANILAL AND SUSHILA GANDHI

August 4, 1934

CHI. MANILAL AND SUSHILA,

I thought I would write a few lines before the fast which commences in two days’ time. We are in a train just now. We shall reach Wardha tomorrow morning. Devdas had come to Kashi. He parted from us at Allahabad.

This time it may be said that I have already begun the fast; but how can I claim merit for it? Not being well during the last two days I have not taken milk for four days. For two days I have been eating only fruit, and that too in small quantity. Even so, my strength and weight have remained satisfactory. That means that the body has lost nothing yet except the toxins. There is, therefore, no cause at all for worry. By the time you get this letter, everything will have been over. Hence it even seems unnecessary to write all this. But I thought you should know my condition as it is today.

Sushila seems to be giving you excellent help. If she had a stronger body, she could have done much more. But what she is able to do is quite satisfactory. You must have received the name selected for Arun and sent to you.

Ramdas’s health causes anxiety. He has become very much emaciated. If you can get passes for him and Dr. Sharma, I would send them over there. But don’t ask for them as a special favour. If they can be obtained in the natural course, it is all right.

With me are Ba, Mahadev, Prabhavati, Valjibhai, Kakasaheb, Thakkar Bapa and Prithuraj. The others have gone to Wardha in advance.

I hope Manilal has been able to make a good collection.

318. TALK ON RAMANAMA

August 4, 1934

Ramanama to me is all-sufficing. There are as many names of God as His manifestations, but sages have, as a result of their lifelong penance, devised names to be uttered by the devotees, in order to be able to commune with the Nameless. There are other mantras than Ramanama, but for me that is supreme. It has become part of my life. When [I was] a child, my nurse taught me to repeat Ramanama whenever I felt afraid or miserable and it has been second nature with me with growing knowledge and advancing years. I may even say that the work is in my heart, if not actually on my lips, all the twenty-four hours. It has been my saviour and I am ever stayed on it. In the spiritual literature of the world, the Ramayana of Tulsidas takes a foremost place. It has charms that I miss in the Mahabharata and even in Valmiki’s Ramayana.

319. INTERVIEW AT JABALPUR

August 4, 1934

Mahatma Gandhi, in spite of weakness, appeared cheerful. Interviewed, he said that at present he was quite well and his temperature was normal. He also stated that he would commence his seven days’ fast from August 7. He also inquired about the local political atmosphere and party quarrels.

Replying, Seth Govind Das said that though the atmosphere is tense with party feelings, efforts are being made to bring about a satisfactory compromise between the rival groups of the workers, adding that in the event of a satisfactory compromise not being arrived at, he along with his friends had decided to retire from political arena and patiently wait for the time when his service will be required by the motherland.

Mahatma Gandhi expressed approval of Seth Govind Das’s views and said that in order to avoid conflict and friction, he had always advised loyal Congressmen to retire from the field of party-feeling and to devote their energies in other constructive and solid programme.

1 This is extracted from “The Purification Week” by Mahadev Desai, who had explained that “two days before the fast” Gandhiji was talking to a friend who was travelling with him.

Mahatma Gandhi also appealed to the public to contribute towards the Harijan Fund and collections were made on the spot.

321. OF “HARIJAN”

[August 6, 1934]

With the completion of the tour and the year of probation during which I was to devote myself wholly to the Harijan cause and take no active part in politics, many have begun to speculate about my immediate future activity. Happily, the fast is to predetermine my course during it and for some time after. But, even apart from the fast, I should like to say that, whilst it is open to me to speak and write on politics, I propose to keep myself aloof from them as much as possible. The joy of the past self-restraint is too fresh to fade from the memory and to induce volubility of political speech. My partiality for Harijan and kindred causes persists and will persist, I hope, to the end of my life.

And what is true of my general attitude is truer still of Harijan. No doubt I shall have to do more political work. I may be compelled to resort to civil resistance. But the Harijan will remain what it has been ever since its inception. It will rigorously eschew all politics. But now that I expect to have some time for them, it will, I hope, deal with constructive causes, more especially those that have direct connection

1 The Bombay Chronicle, 15-8-1934, had reported this under the title, “Mahatma’s Birthday”. Presumably, the message was given in connection with Gandhi Jayanti Celebration from September 15 to October 7, 1934.

2 In Harijan, 17-8-1934, giving an account of Gandhiji’s day-to-day activities in “The Purification Week”, Mahadev Desai had explained under this date that “though thoroughly exhausted [Gandhiji] wrote a few letters and the two articles for the last [week’s] Harijan”. The “two articles” referred to are this and the following.
with Harijans. It will, therefore, consistently with the Harijan interest and as time permits and occasion arises, deal with communal unity, khadi and all the processes leading to khadi, other branches of swadeshi, temperance and the constructive side of prohibition and the condition of the so-called criminal or aboriginal tribes, who live on the border-line of untouchability.

_Harijan, 10-8-1934_

322. _SWADESHI_

[August 6, 1934]¹

Early in the year, if not immediately after my convalescence last year, I was called upon by those who were interested in swadeshi to frame a definition so as to answer the many difficulties that faced them. I had to bear in mind the various shades of swadeshi in textiles. I put together the definitions that were suggested. I had correspondence with Shri Shivarao and Shri Jalbhai Naoroji and well as others. I failed to frame a definition that would suit all cases and found that it was impossible to frame an exhaustive definition. As I was travelling far and wide, I had the opportunity of observing things and of seeing how swadeshi organizations were functioning. I came to the conclusion that the existing practice was an unconscious fraud upon the public and that many workers of ability were wasting their energy in a vain effort. They were practising self-deception. This strong language, whilst it correctly describes my mental attitude, is not intended to cast any reflection whatsoever upon the workers in swadeshi organizations. They were doing their best without realizing that they were moving in a vicious circle and labouring under self-deception.

Let me explain what I mean. We were holding exhibitions of things that were in no need of special help or of advertisement for their sale. In their case, our interposition can either stimulate the prices of their wares or set up unhealthy rivalries between flourishing but competing firms.

We may profess to gratuitously help textile, sugar and rice mills and, respectively, kill the village spinning-wheel, the handloom and their product, khadi, the village cane-crusher and its product, the vitamin-laden and nourishing _gur_ or molasses, and the hand-pounder and its product, unpolished rice, whose pericarp, which holds the vitamins, is left intact by these pounders. Our clear duty is, therefore, to investigate the possibility of keeping in existence the village wheel, the village crusher and the village pounder, and, advertising their products, discovering their qualities, ascertaining the condition of the workers and the number displaced by the power-driven machinery and discovering the methods of improving them, whilst retaining their village character, to enable them to stand the competition of the mills. How terribly and criminally we have neglected them! Here, there is no antagonism to the textile or the sugar or the rice mills. Their products must be preferred to the corresponding foreign products. If they were in danger of extinction from foreign competition, they should receive the needed support. But they stand in no such need. They are flourishing in spite of foreign competition. What is needed is protection of the village crafts and the workers behind them from the crushing competition of the power-driven machinery, whether it is worked in India or in foreign lands. It may be that khadi, gur and unpolished rice have no intrinsic quality and that they should die. But, except for khadi, not the slightest effort has been made, so far as I am aware, to know anything about the fate of the tens of thousands of villagers who were earning their livelihood through crushing cane and pounding rice. Surely, there is in this work enough for an army of patriots. The reader will say, ‘but this is very difficult work’. I admit. But it is most important and equally interesting. I claim that this is true, fruitful and cent per cent swadeshi.

But I have as yet merely touched the fringe of the question. I have merely sampled three big organized industries and shown how voluntary swadeshi agencies need to concentrate their attention solely on the corresponding unorganized village industries that are dying for want of voluntary and intelligent, organized help.

There are numberless other village, and even town, crafts that need public support, if they are to live and thus maintain the thousands of poor artisans depending upon them for their daily bread. Every ounce of work in this direction tells. Every hour given to this work means the sustenance of some deserving workers.

It is my certain conviction that, if work is done on a systematic basis in this direction, the department doing it will become self-supporting, new talent will be stimulated, the educated as well as the uneducated unemployed will find honourable employment without displacing anyone and crores will be added yearly to the wealth of this country, which is getting progressively impoverished.

Here is enough profitable and entertaining work and to spare for all the swadeshi leagues put together. The recent resolution of the Working Committee on ‘swadeshi’ means all this and much more. It provides limitless work for the creative genius in the country.

324. A LETTER

August 6, 1934

MY DEAR . . . 4,

Jamnalal and Swami Anand report that you have made different statements to different persons, that you have not fulfilled many of your promises to Swami Anand and that their strong suspicion almost amounting to belief is that you have made up the story about the girl. This seems to me to be unbelievable. And yet if you cannot give me the name of the girl, I must also reluctantly come to the conclusion that Jamnalal or Swami are fast coming to.

Your concern about the girl is surely needless. You will be surprised to learn that . . . 5 and his wife are sitting by me while I am writing this. It would be a great shock to me if I discover in you a young man in the prime of life capable of connections involving the honour of girls of tender age.

August 6, 1934

CHI. RANCHHODLAL,

I was shocked when I heard about your financial condition from Jamnalalji yesterday. I had never imagined that money deposited with you would be unsafe in any circumstances. In my view, you credit was higher than that of the Bank of India. Is that true no more? If not, why not? Why did you not even breathe a word to me about the matter? If you wish to be as a son to me, you must always tell me about things like this. In such a situation Jamnalalji would most certainly have told me.

Let me know the details in brief. Do this thing now. Don’t keep back a single pie. Hand over even the house and the furniture and the jewellery to the creditors. If anything is held in Motibehn’s or Rama’s name, they and you should regard that as belonging to the creditors. The gifts given to relations in times of prosperity should be looked upon as deposits on behalf of creditors to be used in the hour of misfortune. Difficult times come to all. He alone will have lived well who preserves his honour even at the cost of his wife and children, as Harishchandra did. I hope that you will not—I bless you that you may not—shrink from heroism such as Harishchandra’s.

Do not worry about my fast. Reassure me by giving me proof of your uprightness.

327. STATEMENT ON FAST

August 6, 1934

As I enter upon the seven days’ fast from tomorrow (Tuesday), I would like to re-emphasize the necessity on the part of Harijan workers helping the cause by greater personal purification and greater concentration on the work before them. The monster of untouchability will not be killed without constant and ceaseless effort on the part of workers who have faith in the mission and who have by patient toil built up personal purity and integrity. Let everyone also realize that fasting is not for everyone and for every occasion. Fasting without faith may even lead to disastrous consequences. All such spiritual weapons are dangerous when handled by unqualified persons.

I would like to utter a word of warning to Congressmen and Congress workers. During the coming seven days I shall be filled with thoughts about them as I have been during the past month. The acrimony with which Congress elections have been fought in some places and the unclean methods adopted by Congress workers by manipulating votes and grossly abusing the rule about habitual wearing of khadi have filled me with horror and dismay. The constitution provides for truthful and non-violent methods. In some provinces, at some elections, truth and non-violence have been conspicuous by their absence. Though my fast has nothing to do with these unclean methods, how I wish Congress workers will detect my anguish in the words I have written and lighten it during the purification week by resorting to self-introspection and resolving to make the Congress an organization in keeping with its creed, so that anyone who cares may without difficulty find it to be a living embodiment of its creed. I shall certainly be praying for its purification. Purity of this, the greatest national organization cannot but help the Harijan movement, since the Congress is also pledged to the removal of the curse.

Finally, I ask all friends, whether in India or outside, no matter to what faith or race they may belong, to pray that God may bless the forthcoming little penance.

328. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

August 7, 1934

CHI. MIRA,

At 6 a.m. I entered upon the fast. It is now 7 a.m. I do hope that you would not be disturbed during the week. There is no cause for uneasiness. But what is the use of my saying all this? Ere this reaches, the fast would have been twice over.

You are quite right in repeating your warning. (At this stage I felt too sleepy to write, so I slept. It is now 7.30 a.m.) So long as you feel like giving the warning, you should go on doing it, in ever so emphatic terms. Some day it may have its full effect. Partial effect there is even now. It keeps me on my guard. If . . . 1 copied me, he had surely a corrupt mind. For there is no warrant for thinking that any other person was similarly affected unless of course I have been kept in the dark or unless you suggest that every fall in the Ashram was due to my practice. So far as . . . 2 is concerned, Jamnalalji and Swami Anand with whom . . . 3 had long talks have almost come to the conclusion that . . . 4 has concocted the whole story for the purpose of blackmail. They are both finishing the chain. But this is all by the way. You should not disturb yourself over this. I don’t. I take the necessary steps and forget all about it. You have given a whole

1 The name has been omitted.
2 ibid

paragraph to the matter. Hence this reply.

Many changes are taking place in my mind just now. The corruption in the Congress is preying on me as it has never before done. I am conferring with friends as to the advisability of leaving the Congress and pursuing its ideals outside it. It is good that the corruption agitates me. I shall take no hasty step but there it is. And I feel that the girls’ institution here should be closed unless I am prepared to sit down in Wardha or Vinoba takes the sole responsibility of its management. He will think over it during the fast. These are the two things that are uppermost in my mind.

The rest you will have from Mahadev or Pyarelal both of whom and Bal, Bapa, Devraj and Prithuraj are here. I insisted upon Jamnalalji going to Bombay for his ear trouble. Ba, Prabhavati and Om are of course here. And Vasumati and Amtul Salaam have insisted on coming here. The latter is somewhat better but by no means overwell.

Your work there is certainly voluminous. You are putting forth extraordinary energy. What more can you do? Take your time. Do not get ill.

Kamlani’s mental derangement is sad news. I hope you had time to be able to go to him. Your very presence may do him good.

Love.

329. LETTER TO AGATHA HARRISON

Unrevised August 7, 1934

DEAR AGATHA,

Your love-letters continue to pour in on me. And as you have been hearing regularly from someone or other of the (now) many companions, I do not write to you. This is to tell you I entered upon the little fast at 6 a.m. today and to ask you not to worry. But where is the meaning in asking you not to worry when I know that this letter

---

1 Which he ultimately did on September 17, 1934
2 A. S. Kamlani, Secretary, Friends of India League, London would reach you only after the fast will have become a faint memory?

That the fast is a fitting finish to the Harijan tour I have no doubt. It is a great spiritual instrument. That Protestantism has virtually discarded it is a distinct loss to it and the world seeing what a power it is today in the world. However, I must not argue about it. If it is a desideratum of the soul, there are too many seekers after truth among Protestants not to feel the want of it sooner or later.

During this month I shall be resting in Wardha and collecting my thoughts. What is in store for me in September I do not know. But this I do know. To go to the Frontier Province or to Bengal or to both alternately is a craving of the soul. Where to go first I do not know. If the so-called Red Shirts are violent, I must know them and disown them. If they are not, I must defend them against the slur cast on them. Those who are not given to lying and are well able to judge have testified to their non-violence. These are Khurshed Naoroji, a much-travelled woman of exquisite purity and honesty, Elwin whom you know and Devdas whom too you know are the three eye-witnesses. And yet the British official testimony is equally emphatic the other way. It cannot be all manufacture. The mystery can only be solved if I am permitted to go and live in their midst. This is a fundamental necessity—greater perhaps than that of going to Bengal from one point of view. I go to the Frontier to find the truth and act accordingly. I go to Bengal not to find any truth but to try to wean terrorists from terrorism. Detention of Abdul Ghaffar Khan and Jawaharlal is a great disturbing factor and a wholly unnecessary irritant. But this detention, while it worries me, does not just now appeal to me as a cause of war. Now you have an analysis of my mind as it is likely to be at the end of the month. What occupies my mind at present is how to achieve the purity of the Congress and to rid the Ashram here of subtle untruth and breaches of brahmacharya. Perhaps you are not sufficiently interested in such things. Here I was interrupted by an army of doctors. They have overhauled the system and say I must not do any writing even this first day of the fast. So goodbye and much love.

BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 1478
August 7, 1934

I can say from experience that fasting is an essential part of Ashram life. The assault on Lalnath was certainly the occasion of the fast, but as I have said in my public statement, this fast is intended for the purification of many. If I were to have regard to all the incidents and happenings that have prompted me to take such a step, I should have to go on a much longer fast. But I am painfully aware of my own physical and spiritual limitations and hence could not think of a longer fast.

Our Ashram was certainly in my mind when I made the decision to fast. There are two enemies against which we must guard—untruth and impurity. Purity of the mind is essential for the observance of all the vows. If the mind is not pure, no amount of physical restraint would avail. The Gita teaches us that the man who restrains the organs of action, whilst he allows the mind to run after the objects of the senses, is a hypocrite. We may fail to restrain the mind, but let us not be hypocrites. If we fail, let us own up, rather than be guilty of the double sin of untruth and want of restraint. For not only telling lies is untruth, but guilty silence or hiding one’s state of mind from one’s guardians is also untruth. Let my fast spur you on to further self-purification and self introspection.

We have also to remember that one of the objects of the Ashram is the abolition of untouchability, it is one of our eleven vows. Now an effective observance of that vow is impossible without an observance of the other vows, especially of truth and non-violence. In fact, no worker in the cause of removal of untouchability—and we are all workers in the cause—is fitted for it, unless and until he is pledged to observe truth and non-violence in thought, word and deed. In a word, no service is possible without self-purification. If, therefore, we think more and more of self-purification as a result of this fast, we should be able to bring about the proper atmosphere. I shall be constantly thinking of you this whole week and I want you to cooperate with me. I am hoping that God will pull me through this ordeal, and I know that all of you will help me with your prayers.

Harijan, 17-8-1934

331. SILENCE-DAY NOTE

[August 13, 1934]

Tell Janakibehn not to be so unreasonable. Most probably I will go there at the time of the operation. I shall regain strength in three or four days. Even if I can’t go, we must not take the risk of delaying the operation. I wish to send a wire immediately today. God willing, we shall both be present there, but the operation need not be postponed on that account.

334. LETTER TO JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

August 14, 1934

MY DEAR JAWAHARLAL,

Though you are now under distressing circumstances, your release takes a great load off my mind, as it is three-fourths medicine for Kamala. I have missed you greatly during all the momentous steps I have taken. But of these when we meet.

I am well, though the last day proved the most trying of all the days and washed me out thoroughly. But I have no doubt that I shall pick up quickly.

This is however to suggest to you that you should not make any public political pronouncement. I have felt that in cases of domestic illness or sorrow the Government has acted in a becoming manner. I do feel therefore that we ought to recognize this fact by not using the liberty thus obtained for any other purpose not inconsistent with that of the Government. I feel that this is due to them and to ourselves, especially when civil resistance is suspended. If my argument appeals to your reason, you will announce your self-restraint in a fitting manner. When Kamala is better I expect you to come here. I shall be in Wardha up to the end of the month, except that I might have to go to Bombay to attend the delicate operation that Jamnalalji might have

335. LETTER TO HIRALAL SHARMA

Unrevised August 14, 1934

CHI. SHARMA,

I am sorry for the mistake I made in addressing the letter.¹ It should not have occurred. Send me your views about Ramdas’s condition.

Your sending the money to Amtussalaam was not right. No longer do you have any funds to make donations. Moreover Amtussalaam is in no such predicament as to warrant any help. I pointed out to her that she should not have taken money thus and she has understood. Friendship never implies that we pamper our mutual weaknesses. Its aim is to ennoble one another. I regard it as a subject of study for the nature-cure practitioner. The naturopath recognizes physical, mental and spiritual ills and treats them mainly by developing inner powers. He takes the help of earth, water, ether, fire and air. It should be an impossibility for him to be instrumental in spiritual degeneration. Consider the case of Amtussalaam from this viewpoint. She has a weak heart. It is a disease. She has a weakness for squandering money yet feels reluctant in accepting funds from the family. Sending her money is contributing to her downfall, while not sending it will help her progress. So a naturopath would not send money.

¹ Gandhiji had wrongly addressed the letter ‘Khurda’.
The real work of the Vidyapith lies in the villages. I have been stressing this point ever since the inception of the Vidyapith, but until a couple of years ago, when it was declared an illegal organization and most of our professors and boys were imprisoned, we laboured under the impression that the work could be carried on only through a central institute situated in the capital town of Gujarat. But under the altered conditions, and now that we have some breathing time to put our heads together and to collect our thoughts we shall do well to hark back to the original conception and think of our future work in its terms. Each member of a live institution must be a living embodiment of the ideals of the institution, wherever he may be, and when such a state of things is brought about, it is the same thing whether the institution has a habitation and a corporate existence or not.

I would, therefore, expect every one of you who has cherished the ideals of the Vidyapith and who is pledged to serve it to go straight to the villages and start living those ideals there. Each one of you will thus be a peripatetic Vidyapith, teaching the ideals by means of his own personal example. It is quite conceivable that a host of workers, after having lived the life in the villages according to the ideals of the Vidyapith, re-establish the central institute in a village. But we are not in that position today. We have yet to gain all that experience on which alone you can build the new Vidyapith.

The centre of this village worker’s life will be the spinning-wheel. I am sorry I have not been able yet to bring home to anyone the message of the spinning-wheel in all its implications. The reason is that my life itself is not a true echo of the message. But it came home to me again and again during my nine months’ peregrinations in India. We have not yet sufficiently realized that hand-spinning is a supplementary industry of universal application and scope in India. The village weaver cannot live but for the spinning-wheel. He gets his yarn no doubt from the mills, but he is doomed to destruction, if he is to remain for ever dependent on the mills. Today, the spinning-wheel has established itself in our economic life only to the extent that it is needed to minister to the clothing needs of the new class of khadi weavers that has sprung up during the past decade. But a large body like the Spinners’ Association cannot justify its existence to fulfil that limited object. The idea at the back of khadi is that it is an industry supplementary to agriculture and co-extensive with it, that it is the life-breath of millions of Harijan weavers who derive their sustenance from it. The spinning-wheel cannot be said to have been established in its own proper place in our life, until we can banish idleness from our villages and make every village home a busy hive. Unemployment and idleness of millions must lead to bloody strife. Khadi is the only alternative to this and not the so-called socialism, which presupposes industrialism. The socialism that India can assimilate is the socialism of the spinning-wheel. Let the village worker, therefore, make the wheel the central point of his activities.

1 The discussion appeared under the title “What Is Village Work” as a summary of Gandhiji’s talk, with the following introductory note by Mahadev Desai: “During his convalescence after the fast, Gandhiji has been giving part of his time each day to workers coming with their doubts and difficulties. Among these were some of the professors of the Gujarati Vidyapith.” Gandhiji broke his fast on August 14, 1934.

2 ibid

The worker will not be spinning regularly but will be working for his bread with the adze or the spade or the last, as the case may be. All his hours minus the eight hours of sleep and rest will be fully occupied with some work. He will have no time to waste. He will allow himself no laziness and allow others none. His life will be a constant lesson to his neighbours in ceaseless and joy-giving industry. Bodily sustenance should come from body labour, and intellectual labour is necessary for the culture of the mind. Division of labour there will necessarily be, but it will be a division into various species of body labour and not a division into intellectual labour to be confined to one class and body labour to be confined to another class. Our compulsory or voluntary idleness has to go. If it does not go, no panacea will be of any avail, and semi-starvation will remain the eternal problem that it is. He who eats two grains must produce four. Unless the law is accepted as universal, no amount of reduction in population would serve to solve the problem. If the law is accepted and observed, we have room enough to accommodate millions more to come.

The village worker will thus be a living embodiment of industry. He will master all the processes of khadi, from cotton-sowing and picking to weaving, and will devote all his thought to perfecting them. If he treats it as a science, it won’t jar on him, but he will derive fresh joy from it everyday, as he realizes more and more its great possibilities. If he will go to the village as a teacher, he will go there no less as a learner. He will soon find that he has much to learn from the simple villagers. He will enter into every detail of village life, he will discover the village handicrafts and investigate the possibilities of their growth and their improvement. He may find the villagers completely apathetic to the message of khadi, but he will, by his life of service compel interest and attention. Of course, he will not forget his limitations and will not engage in, for him, the futile task of solving the problem of agricultural indebtedness.

Sanitation and hygiene will engage a good part of his attention. His home and his surroundings will not only be a model of cleanliness, but he will help to promote sanitation in the whole village by taking the broom and the basket round.

He will not attempt to set up a village dispensary or to become the village doctor. These are traps which must be avoided. I happened during my Harijan tour to come across a village where one of our workers who should have known better had build a pretentious building in which he had housed a dispensary and was distributing free medicine to the villages around. In fact, the medicines were being taken from home to home by volunteers and the dispensary was described as boasting a register of 1,200 patients a month! I had naturally to criticize this severely. That was not the way to do village work, I told him. His duty was to inculcate lessons of hygiene and sanitation in the village folk and thus to show them the way of preventing illness, rather than attempt to cure them. I asked him to leave the palace-like building and to hire it out to the Local Board and to settle in thatched huts. All that one need stock in the way of drugs is quinine, castor oil and iodine and the like. The worker should concentrate more on helping people realize the value of personal and village cleanliness and maintaining it at all cost.

Then he will interest himself in the welfare of the village Harijans. His home will be open to them In fact, they will turn to him naturally for help in their troubles and difficulties. If the village folk will not suffer him to have the Harijan friends in his house situated in their midst, he must take up his residence in the Harijan quarters.

A word about the knowledge of the alphabet. It has its place, but I should warn you against a misplaced emphasis on it. Do not proceed on the assumption that you cannot proceed with rural instruction without first teaching the children or adults how to read and write.
Lots of useful information on current affairs, history, geography and elementary arithmetic, can be given by word of mouth before the alphabet is touched. The eyes, the ears and the tongue come before the hand. Reading comes before writing and drawing before tracing the letters of the alphabet. If this natural method is followed, the understanding of the children will have a much better opportunity of development than when it is under check by beginning the children’s training with the alphabet.

The worker’s life will be in tune with the village life. He will not pose as a litterateur buried in his books, loath to listen to details of humdrum life. On the contrary, the people, whenever they see him, will find him busy with his tools—spinning-wheel, loom, adze, spade, etc.—and always responsive to their meanest inquiries. He will always insist on working for his bread. God has given to everyone the capacity of producing more than his daily needs and, if he will only use his resourcefulness, he will not be in want of an occupation suited to his capacities, however poor they may be. It is more likely than not that the people will gladly maintain him, but it is not improbable that in some places he may be given a cold shoulder. He will still plod on. It is likely that in some villages he may be boycotted for his pro-Harijan pro-clivities. Let him in that case approach the Harijans and look to them to provide him with food. The labourer is always worthy of his hire and, if he conscientiously serves them, let him not hesitate to accept his food from the Harijans always, provided that he gives more than he takes. In the very early stages, of course, he will draw his meagre allowance from a central fund where such is possible.

I have deliberately left out the question of the cow. The village worker will find it difficult to tackle the question and will not attempt it, except to the extent of educating the people in the theory of it. We have not yet hit upon the best way of curing dead cattle’s hide and dyeing it, as also the best means of protecting the cow. In Gujarat the buffalo problem complicates the situation. We have got to make people realize that to encourage the buffalo is to allow the cow to die. But more of this some other time.

Remember that our weapons are spiritual. It is a force that works irresistibly, if imperceptibly. Its progress is geometrical rather than arithmetical. It never ceases so long as there is a propeller behind. The background of all your activities has, therefore, to be spiritual. Hence the necessity for the strictest purity of conduct and character.
You will not tell me that this is an impossible programme, that you have not the qualifications for it. That you have not fulfilled it so far should be no impediment in your way. If it appeals to your reason and your heart, you must not hesitate. Do not fight shy of the experiment. The experiment will itself provide the momentum for more and more effort.

337. “GOD BE PRAISED”

_[August 15, 1934]^

Happily nobody questioned the propriety of the fast just finished. On the contrary, those who have written about it have recognized the necessity of it. Its spiritual value for me has been inestimable. Why, I do not know, but it is a fact that man clings most to God when he is in distress, even as a child clings to its mother when it is in suffering. Though I was cheerful, I had my due share of physical suffering attendant upon all fasts except when required by ill-health.

I was able during the seven days to understand more fully than hitherto the implications of what I had meant when from a hundred platforms I had declared that untouchability was not to be removed without the workers showing in their lives great purity of character. Therefore, so far as the fast was directed towards myself, it has, I hope, served its purpose. That I may fail to come up to the standard I visualized during the fast is possible, nay, probable. But no fast has ever proved an insurance against human frailties. We can only mount to success through failures.

The fast was primarily and nominally intended as a penance for the hurt caused to Swami Lalnath and his friends at Ajmer at the hands of sympathizers with the movement. But in reality, it is a call to all the workers and sympathizers to be most exact and correct in approaching opponents. Utmost consideration and courtesy shown to them is the best propaganda for the movement. The fast was taken to impress upon the workers the truth that we can only win over the opponent by love, never by hate. Hate is the subtlest form of violence. We cannot be really non-violent and yet have hate in us. The dullest brain cannot fail to perceive that it is impossible by violence to wean millions of caste Hindus from the evil of untouchability, which they have hitherto been taught to regard as an article of faith.

Evidence so far received shows that the fast has operated to quicken the conscience of many workers. Time alone can show the extent of its influence. It is not for me to measure the influence of the fast. It was for me humbly to perform what was a clear duty. God be praised that He permitted me safely to go through the fast. Let the reader join me in the prayer that He may give me greater purity and strength of purpose of fulfil the mission He has entrusted me with.

This is my first letter after the fast. I am in very good health. I drank some milk today. Blood-pressure is excellent. Please, therefore, do not worry about me. Let Janakibehn stay there as long as she pleases. But it may not be necessary to keep Om there for a long time. It is good that Mahadev and Madanmohan are going there. I hope you will welcome them. I thought it necessary that they should go. They may, if they can, return immediately tomorrow. There will be no difficulty here. Keep your mind fixed on Rama as they give you chloroform. All are well here. It is God’s will that you should be spared for more service and many more sacrifices still.

340. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

Not revised August 16, 1934

CHI. MIRA,

I wrote to you on Tuesday, 7th, after commencing the fast. Today is Thursday, the third day of the breaking of the fast. The last day was one of physical torture. It was well perhaps it was so. What was the penance worth, if it did not cause me any physical suffering? The phrase joy of suffering has no meaning if there is no suffering felt. I knew on Monday more fully than before the meaning of the phrase joy of suffering. I am the richer for the treasure which I would not have missed for a kingdom.

There it was. As I am writing this I feel the strength slowly coming. I have settled down to this after having walked a few paces on the terrace with Vasumati’s help. She and Amtul Salaam and Amala have been with me all the time. Prabhavati is of course there. She has slaved during these day. I cannot understand where she gets all the strength from. She seems never tired. Amala is as mad as ever. But she is better with me than elsewhere.

Don’t be sorry or angry that I have not yet written to Mr. Maxwell about the prisoners. The thing has never been out of my mind but want of time has prevented me from doing it.

You remember the green canvas bag which contained my dictionary, Gita, Bhajanavali and such other things. That and the green khadi bag I can’t trace anywhere. I thought that you had put them together with the other things in Wardha. The bundle of khadi too which you put at Lady Thakersey’s is missing.

August 16, 1934

CHI. BRIJKRISHNA,

Your letter. I am doing well. The rest you must have seen from the newspapers. Jamnalalji has undergone in Bombay today a successful operation of the ear.

Without your consent I will not write anything to Keshu and others about Damodardas. His argument is without substance. I find in it neither the dharma of friendship nor any other. My distrust of Damodardas as also of Keshu and others is increasing. That is why unless I am fully confident of the truth I cannot remain perfectly neutral and that undermines my capacity for serving Keshu’s people. It is a matter of regret that Damodardas fails to understand this clear-cut dharma. But whether he does or not, you at any rate ought to understand it clearly. You have one more duty. It is not possible for you to hide anything in this world from me. Therefore those who discuss things with you should know that ultimately it will all reach me. How to use that knowledge depends on me. If this is clear you should let me have your opinion. You may acquaint Damodardas with this letter. What more shall I say? I can give you this assurance that I will not write anything to Keshu and others without your consent.

347. INTERVIEW TO THE PRESS

August 16, 1934

I am all right.

Thus returned Mahatma Gandhi, with a winning smile, my greeting and my query about his progress. . . . He had been reading What Marx Really Meant by G. D. H. Cole, which Gandhiji said he had been reading during his fast and he had not yet finished. When asked about his future programme, Gandhiji continued in a low voice:

I have no plans ready. My immediate concern is to pick up strength.

He added he was making satisfactory progress and for the first time after eight days he had been at his charkha yesterday for about half an hour. He also wrote an article yesterday for this week’s Harijan and did some walking too. He hoped to regain his energy and strength soon. He said he would continue to stay in Wardha during convalescence unless some pressing engagement took him out of it.

1 Vide “God Be Praised”, 15-8-1934

If you ask me whether I thought anything about the Congress during the seven days, I can say as I have stated in the columns of Harijan That I constantly thought of Congressmen. I was not thinking in terms of politics and therefore not of what the Congress had to gain in the wake of independence, but I was concentrating on the great necessity of achieving internal purity.

Letters have been coming to me from Congressmen confirming my fears about corrupt methods that have crept into the Congress ranks over Congress elections and the like. How I wished, during all the seven days that I was lying on my bed, that every man and woman belonging to the Congress would realize that he or she was in it, not in order to mount to office and fame, but to render mute service to the country! I cannot understand the mutual mudslinging and violence of speech toward one another.

Civil disobedience is certainly not for those who have not learnt the art of voluntary obedience to law, even when it is irksome. This elementary principle seems to have been altogether forgotten, or else one could not witness spirit of indiscipline and disobedience to laws and rules which we have ourselves enacted and to which we have voluntarily pledged ourselves to render obedience.

For me, therefore, every other thing has paled into insignificance before this prime necessity of achieving internal purity, for I do feel that just as without the purity of Harijan workers untouchability would not be removed so also do I feel that the Congress, as a powerful national organization, will perish unless it is sustained by internal purity of those who compose that organization. At present, I have no other message to give, for my mind is still preoccupied with this predominant feeling.

Consequently they resigned from the Congress parliamentary Board and summoned a conference of Congressmen and others at Calcutta on August 18 and 19 under the presidentship of Malaviya, which announced the formation of Nationalist Party with the object of carrying on agitation in the Legislatures and outside against the Communal Award and the White Paper, and to put up candidates for the Legislative Assembly to promote that object.
MY DEAR JAWAHARLAL,

Your passionate and touching letter\(^1\) deserves a much longer reply than my strength will permit.

I had expected fuller grace from the Government. However your presence has done for Kamala and incidentally for Mama what no drugs or doctors could have done. I hope that you will be allowed to remain longer than the very few days you expect.

I understand your deep sorrow. You are quite right in giving full and free expression to your feelings. But I am quite sure that from our common standpoint a closer study of the written word will show you that there is not enough reason for all the grief and disappointment you have felt. Let me assure you that you have not lost a comrade in me. I am the same as you knew me in 1917 and after. I have the same passion that you knew me to possess for the common goal. I want complete independence for the country in the full English sense of the term. And every resolution that has pained you had been framed with that end in view. I must take full responsibility for the resolutions and the whole conception surrounding them.

But I fancy that I have the knack for knowing the need of the time. And the resolutions are a response thereto. Of course here comes in the difference of our emphasis on the method or the means which to me are just as important as the goal and in a sense more important in that we have some control over them whereas we have none over the goal if we lose control over the means.

Do read the resolution about ‘loose talk’ dispassionately. There is not a word in it about socialism. Greatest consideration has been paid to the socialists some of whom I know so intimately. Do I not know their sacrifice? But I have found them as a body to be in a hurry. Why should they not be? Only, if I cannot march quite as quick, I must ask them to halt and take me along with them. That is literally my attitude. I have looked up the dictionary meaning of socialism. It takes me no further than where I was before I read the definition. What will you have me to read to know its full content? I have read one of the books Masani gave me and now I am devoting all my spare time to reading the book recommended by Narendra Deva.

\(^1\) Dated August 13; vide “Letter from Jawaharlal Nehru”, 13-8-1934

You are hard on the members of the Working Committee. They are our colleagues such as they are. After all we are a free institution. They must be displaced, if they do not deserve confidence. But it is wrong to blame them for their inability to undergo the sufferings that some others have gone through.

After the explosion I want construction. Therefore now, lest we do not meet, tell me exactly what you will have me to do and who you think will best represent your views.

As to the trust, I was not present. Vallabhbhai was. Your attitude betrays anger. You should trust the trustees to do their duty. I did not think there was anything wrong. I was too preoccupied to concentrate on it. I shall now study the papers and everything. Of course your feelings will be fully respected by other trustees. Having given you this assurance, I would ask you not to take this matter so personally as you have done. It more becomes you generous nature to give the same credit to your co-trustees for regard for Father’s memory that you would take for yourself. Let the nation be the custodian of Father’s memory and you only as one of the nation.

I hope Indu is well and likes her new life. And what about Krishna?

Love.

353. LETTER TO SHERWOOD EDDY
August 18, 1934

DEAR DR. EDDY,

I hope this will be in your hands in due time. If you have to go away without our meeting, I shall be very sorry indeed. During convalescence after the recent fast medical friends would not hear of my leaving Wardha quite so soon, and I do not feel like overriding their advice. If, therefore, we do not meet, you will please put down on paper as much as you can of what you intended to say to me. I know what a poor substitute it would be for a heart-to-heart conversation. But a letter from you will have its own value for me.

1 Hiralal Sharma explains that Ramdas had made considerable progress in health. He was eager to go back to Wardha. But the addressee did not favour this idea lest he (Ramdas) might impair his health there. Rather, he wished him to be sent abroad and engaged in some different type of work. He had, therefore, written to Gandhiji to advise Ramdas accordingly.
I hope you had a good voyage, and that the same good fortune will accompany you during the balance of your journey.

Yours sincerely,

354. LETTER TO H. A. POLEY

August 18, 1934

DEAR REV. POLEY,

I thank you for your letter. I wish it was possible for me to go to Bombay if only to see Dr. Eddy. But medical friends forbid any such movement, and I do not feel the call to override their advice. By as much conservation as possible of the energy being daily gathered I am trying to regain lost strength as quickly as possible.

My fast was a rich experience for me. You have perhaps come across my reflections\(^1\) on it in the current issue of Harijan.

MY DEAR BHASKAR,

I have read your letter to Mahadev of the 15th instant. I cannot help thinking that you have closed down the scavengers’ schools much too hastily. The Section 91 that you quote, I certainly do not read in the manner you do. It does not prohibit the Corporation from using even a part of the lakh of rupees for education among scavenger boys and girls. On the contrary, I should read the Section to compel the Corporation to use a part of the funds amongst the scavengers. The Section to be of any use can only mean that the Corporation will begin by spending the money among the poorest, and surely not among the fashionable suburbs of Calcutta for instance. Has the Corporation taken legal opinion on the interpretation of the Section in question? If, therefore, there is any chance of the Corporation retracing its steps in the matter, I ask for its reconsideration.

With reference to the penultimate paragraph of your letter I would like you to tell me in detail what work the Corporation has done, and is doing, for Harijans and what sum is spent during the past twelve months in their behalf.

That I am dictating this letter shows that I am gaining strength.

Jawaharlal’s release has brought relief to poor Kamala and relieved Jawaharlal’s many friends of a great burden of anxiety over Kamala’s ill-health.

My love to baby and children. I hope you are doing well in every respect.

CHI. SHARMA,

Jamnalalji has been operated upon and he is in a Bombay hospital. About Ramdas, I have wired¹ that the proper thing may be done. I do not feel it would be your dharma to come away leaving Devi in this condition but I cannot insist on my view in this matter. Every man forms his own code of conduct as a father. What more can I write? We can continue the discussion in person or through letters.

CHI. JAMNALAL,

You seem to be progressing satisfactorily. Do not be impatient about the healing of the wound. It will heal in its own time. Do not worry about work at all. You must not talk either. If you wish to say something, you may write it down. If you follow this rule, it will help you very much.

You should not worry about things here at all. Nobody gives me any trouble. I do not exert myself too much. My weight has reached 96 lb. You need not worry about the Ashram. Let Madanmohan stay there.

CHI. OM,

I get your letters. Do not be remiss in writing to me. Fix a certain hour daily for writing, so that you will do no other work at that time. Write slowly and in a careful hand. Give me all the details about what Jamnalalji can eat and drink, how he sleeps, what is the condition of the pain, what is the progress of the healing, who are the visitors, etc., etc. You should not make him talk. If any people come to talk to him, you should not let them. If these rules are observed, the healing will be quicker.

Give me an account of how you spend the time. Where do all of you sleep? Give a description of the hospital. Who are the other patients there?

Gopi is still here. Her health is as poor as ever. Write to her. Madalasa comes regularly to do your share of the daily work. I give your letters to her to read.

It is about 4 a.m. just now. I sat down to write this letter after cleaning my teeth.

359. LETTER TO CALCUTTA CONGRESSMEN

August 19, 1934

I am afraid that your optimism is ill-grounded, for I have seen nothing as yet to shake my confidence in the correctness of the Working Committee’s resolution. The utmost limit within which accommodation was possible was prescribed in Benares. There it stands. Nobody approves of the Award—much less has anybody acquiesced in it. Everybody condemns it. But a Congressman, because he is a Congressman, can neither accept it nor reject it because if he did one or the other he would be taking sides and therefore not represent the whole nation. I can easily respond to your optimism but if it is based on the belief that I shall any way influence the Working Committee to reconsider the resolution, I am afraid that your optimism is ill-grounded.

365. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI
August 19, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your letter. I understand what you say regarding Siddhimati. She shouldn’t have left like that. I am of the opinion that she should not be re-admitted all too easily.

Has Jamnadas gone out in search of a job? I tried to persuade him to stay with me, but he did not. His anger does not seem to have subsided yet. Didn’t he and others read the circular letters which I wrote to you?

I am glad that Lilavati is doing well. If Kusum is getting fever, wouldn’t it be advisable for her to go to Ranavav? She always gets better there. Chimanlal’s case also is pitiable. His health doesn’t improve at all. Do not put too much trust in Amala’s letter. She is very cheerful here. She is even improving a little. So long as I live here, it will not be advisable to shift her from here. Even when I leave this place permanently, I will burden you with the responsibility for her only if I think that she can safely go there. I am sure that, if she is likely to improve under anybody, she would do so under you.

If Keshu succeeds in his experiment regarding the spinning-wheel, it will be a great achievement. He should continue the experiments. The time-limit cannot be extended now, but, if he succeeds in inventing a spinning-wheel which would have deserved the prize, everybody will welcome it. He should not, therefore, worry. We have not so far received any model which would deserve a prize.

I have still not been able to decide anything about the dairy. I wish to discuss the matter also with Jamnalalji who is in hospital. I gathered your viewpoint to be that it should be run as an independent activity and should not be handed over to the Harijan Ashram. Is this impression of mine correct?

Has there been any change in Harilal’s mod of life? Does he exercise self-control there or does he continue to live in the same manner?

It is excessively humid here. The rainfall has been quite heavy. If possible, I don’t wish to shift you from there for the Kanya Ashram. You have been doing excellent work there. It is desirable that you should put everything in perfect order. In case of absolute necessity here, you will of course be available. Vinoba has agreed to take up complete responsibility. I see that I shall have to call you here once before I decide anything. I hope I shall be able to give you fairly long notice.

I am regaining strength fairly well. Even if the progress is rather slow, I am satisfied.

Narahari, Kishorelal, Maganbhai, Soman and Kakasaheb are here at present. I have been discussing1 with them plans for proper organization of villages.

I hope you read the Harijan carefully. I suppose you know that Krishnamachari and Sulochana are here. Amtussalaam and Vasumati are with me, and of course Prabha. Ramdas may come back in three or four days. There is an epidemic of cholera in Khurja.

367. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL
August 19, 1934

BHAISHRI VALLABHBHAI,

I got your messages. Please see if you can come here after you have got all right. Andrews is coming on the 25th. I think it will be good if you are here then. I do get here as much rest as I need. Nobody bothers me. The chowkidars also follow Jamnalalji’s instructions to the letter. I am sure that you, too, will get more peace here than you do there. But you can think of that only after you have completely recovered from fever and regained peace of mind. If you come, Mani will definitely benefit at any rate.

I understand that nothing can be done about your nose trouble just now. If anything can be done by staying on there for some time, I think it will be worth while to do so. Let us see if it helps. There will be no risk at all in getting it done just now. The only thing is that you will have to keep to the bed for some time. That need not matter.

I had a long letter from Jayaprakash yesterday. He is very unhappy. He has read much but does not seem to have digested all that he has read. And he certainly has no experience. But he can pour out in speeches what he has read. That impresses educated people, which fact increases his enthusiasm and he leaves home and family, neglects his health and does about rousing people. He has, however,

1 Harilal Gandhi, addressee’s father said in his letter that he will come and see me. Let us see what happens.

There is no possibility of my leaving the Congress immediately. But I share my agony with you.

How can I leave the Congress till you and others permit me to do so. Personally, however, I do feel that there is no other way for me. I seem to be obstructing the growth of the Congress. To cling to the means without faith in it or to fail to act according to one’s faith—what a pitiable and frightful condition to be in! Is it not your duty to save the Congress from it? There may be no harm [in my remaining in the Congress] so long as I can think of some means of fighting the rot, but what can I do if I cannot think of any way except leaving the Congress? My doing so will rid it of hypocrisy. If the attitude of the ordinary Congressman is that no distinction need be made between truth and falsehood, violence and non-violence, khadi, calico, jagannathi and muslin, then it is best that he should act accordingly. But that won’t be possible till I leave. These restrictions cannot be removed with my consent, for I would never consent to their removal. If the Congress removes them despite my opposition, would not that amount to expelling me? Would it be desirable to let things go that far? I want to make you, Raja and others think about all these points. If you can come over, we shall discuss them at leisure.

We shall also have to think what I should do in September or after I have regained strength. It is an issue to which we must give thought. The time is drawing near for taking a decision. Jawaharlal’s explosion is not as frightening as it seems from the flames. he had a right to let off steam, which he has exercised. I think he has calmed down now.

About the unfortunate cultivators of Gujarat, I will do what you want, but I have definite views of my own in the matter.

What you desired regarding the Parliamentary Board has happened, though the reason for postponement was quite different.

I have written enough, I think, for today.

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

I forgot to reply to one question of yours. I can reply to . . . 's letter immediately, but then we ought to think about . . . and others also. Moreover, do you fully agree with the views which I hold on this subject? Personally I think they alone are correct. What does it avail a thief’s mother to hide her face?\(^1\) If, therefore, . . . and others want us to keep silent, we may do so, or alternatively we may issue statements in keeping with what we regard to be the present policy of the Congress. Or I may publish my personal view on my own responsibility. I will prepare a draft\(^2\) and send it to you after you have called . . . to you and come to some decision and informed me. Meanwhile I am writing to . . . and informing him that I am in correspondence with you, and that I will reply to him in detail later. He is in needless hurry. I don’t think there is any urgency.

CHI. JAMNALAL,

After Vinoba had left yesterday, I received a reassuring wire from Dr. Jivraj, from which I learnt that there was no recurrence of bleeding and that the pain also had subsided. Even then I think it is good that Vinoba has gone there for a short visit. You must have learnt that Kamalnayan himself was the cause of Vinoba’s going there. He was very much disturbed by what you had to endure on Saturday and, therefore, immediately on arrival here, he sent me a message through Mahadev. I welcomed the suggestion and sent a message to Vinoba who immediately got ready to go. Madalasa also wanted to go but, being obedient, she stayed back on learning that Vinoba wished to go. She will be duly rewarded for her self-control. It is good that she has stayed back. If your pain has subsided now and your mind is at peace, give leave to Vinoba to return soon. But he can stay as long as he is needed. The management of this place is being organized carefully. Vinoba is busy with the task day and night.

Your promise regarding facilities for education will certainly be kept. I write this to reassure you. Do not try to discuss this matter with Vinoba and exert yourself. Just now your chief aim should be to get all right. You need not worry about anything here or elsewhere. And certainly not about me, for my affairs are going on well enough. Radhakisan and Shivaji keep a strict watch over me. I hope you do not talk much. It will be advisable to use with caution any freedom that the doctors may permit. One should follow their advice as long as it is not against dharma. But it is a different matter when they permit any freedom to satisfy us.

371. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

CHI. MIRA,              August 21, 1934

You do not now need to be told how I am getting on. This letter will be enough evidence of the progress made. The food is almost normal.

Your letter is revealing. But I do not want to change my course of action. The cause will be compromised by no one except ourselves. Let them all do their little bit or their utmost there. It is enough for us that they are all well meaning. As you know, I have not set much store by the work that is being done there. Though I do not want to take any action on the strength of what you say, I would like you to have a frank and full discussion with both Agatha and Muriel and hear what they might have to say. So far as the big folk are concerned, I entirely agree with you that you should seek interviews yourself directly. I am quite sure that they will all see you. If they do not, you need not mind.

The question of Dara is different and difficult. One does not know how to help. He has always appeared to me to be mysterious. Brockway\(^1\) is supposed to be the leader. But he did not seem to me to lead. He was apologetic about Dara and in no way enthusiastic. I am afraid we can do very little for him. Of course there is no difficulty about carrying on correspondence with him. We do no more for the friends or the fellowship group. We pay nothing. Agatha is paid and that is all. It is well to follow Shakespeare’s advice: “Give thy ear to everyone, thy voice to none.” You will gather all the information and we shall confer when we meet, if we do at all. ‘If’ clause is merely precautionary. Nothing hangs by it. I have no present plans except the convalescence. Andrews reaches Bombay on 25th. He should be with

374. LETTER TO S. GANESAN

August 21, 1934

MY DEAR GANESAN,

I am glad that your venture is making steady progress. Don’t be in a hurry, but build on a solid foundation.

If the boy in question was merely a nominal convert and knew nothing of Christianity or of any religion in fact, in my opinion he never ceased to belong to the religion of his birth. And then there is no question of reconversion. If, however, he was a bona-fide convert it is none of your business to reconvert him. His faith must be personal to him and he has to be answerable to God for what he actually is. I hope this is quite clear.

There can be no objection to your admitting Christian boys, but they cannot be a charge on the ordinary Harijan Funds. You have to procure scholarships for them from personal friends, if the students are otherwise deserving. It would be a pity if they had to be turned out for want of funds. And yet it would be wrong to disburse their expenses out of the Harijan Funds which are intended solely for Hindus.

CHI. PREMA,

I got your letter. Your generosity of heart knows no bounds. You would not mind if I don’t write. But I don’t wish just now to take advantage of your generosity. All the same, you deserve compliments for it. I am glad that you went and saw Jamnalalji and also that you prayed with him. It was very good of him indeed to offer on his own to meet your expenses. May your future be as good as your beginning is. There can be no end, of course.

In saying that we are born every day I didn’t wish to show up your childishness. I had no such thought even in my dreams. On the contrary, I tried to express my appreciation of your having asked for my blessings. You may, therefore, continue to ask for my blessings for your birthday.

I feel no pain at all if somebody slanders the Ashram. But I do feel pain if anybody doubts the reason which I have given for offering it as sacrifice. How could I offer as sacrifice something which I did not regard as pure? I hope you have explained this properly. But it is our duty to bear everything serenely.

I am very glad that you met Father and that his anger has left him. I have no doubt that this understanding between you two will endure.

Things are going on all right with me. I am regaining strength. Write to me from time to time.

CHI. LILAVATI,

I did get your letter. I have been trying to give effect to one of your suggestions—about bringing Kumarappa into this. I am afraid it will be difficult for me to write for Swadeshi. I cannot ride two horses at the same time. You must have read about my decision to widen the scope of Harijan. Whatever ideas occur to me will, therefore, go into it. Since my store is limited, I cannot write the same thing in several journals. For the present, therefore, please be satisfied with what I write in Harijan. However, continue to send me copies of Swadeshi. Has the new policy been fully accepted there? Lallukaka said that there was no change. Have you fully grasped the new form? THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
378. LETTER TO K. M. MUNSHI

August 21, 1934

BHAI MUNSHI,

My health is improving so well that my capacity for work is increasing every day. I had glanced through the note you gave to Shankerlal. It need not be used publicly just now. I liked your suggestion regarding the Congress elections. But it is incomplete. Draft whatever improved rules seem necessary to you. Draft the by-rules also. For giving effect to some of the suggestions, it will be necessary to amend the Constitution. Don’t hesitate to suggest such changes too. You will have to find time for this. Do so if you can.

If you send me cuttings of what you have been writing in newspapers, I will try to find time and read them. No hour has been fixed when even Mahadev or Pyarelal can give me their substance after reading them. Everybody is so busy with his own work that he can get no free time. And even if one of them can do so, he will not find me free.

The work of the Bombay Congress is certainly difficult. The picture you have drawn is quite correct. It is not an easy job in such circumstances to work so as to enhance the prestige of the Congress. Do the best that you can.

CHI. NARANDAS,

I have received a letter from... in which she has poured out her grief. I thought I should send it to you and am, therefore, doing so. A summary by me would not have served the purpose. Try to heal her wound. There seems to have been some misunderstanding. She has become very sensitive. She has suffered a good many blows recently and is likely to have to suffer more still. 380. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

August 21, 1934

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

I got your letter. I understand the need for you to remain there. You alone can judge which need is more important. Whether here or there, we have to do the same sort of work. We should stay where the need is greater. You may, therefore, do what you think proper. About the Congress work in Bombay, my view is that those who have undertaken the responsibility should do the job in their own way or give up control of the organization. How long will they be able to hide the truth?

The problem of purifying the Congress is a big one. We can discuss it in detail only when we meet. I agree with what you write about. . . 2. The Congress must decide its policy. Let us send for . . . 3 and discuss the matter with him and have done with the problem. I had a letter from . . . 4, to which I have replied saying that he may come in the first week of September and may fix the date through you. If it is impossible for you to come then, I will argue out the matter with them. I will not give anything in writing without showing it to you.

I fully understand your impatience regarding Gujarat. Do what you think best. We must have our eyes on the future.

When Andrews comes there, have a frank and full discussion with him about everything. I will write to you or ask somebody to write to you about what happens here.

I forgot to write about Kaka. He had taken the decision\(^1\) with my consent. I liked it. It was not taken in resentment but was inspired by his sense of duty. I myself suggested to him that he should write to you. August 22, 1934

Sujna Bhaishri,

I got your wire. As long as God wishes to take some service from this body, He will preserve it. When it is no more needed, would not even a yawn suffice to end life? I am regaining strength. I am gradually returning to work.

Read the accompanying. If the facts stated in it are correct, take whatever measures you would for a friend or relation in a similar plight.

Yours,

Mohandas

[PS.]

After I had written the above, I received a wire from Bhavnagar giving more details. I, therefore, sent a wire² and post this letter to follow it.

August 22, 1934

MY DEAR AGATHA,

This is merely to tell you that I am slowly rebuilding the body. The seven days’ rest was good at the price of seven or eight pounds of flesh. I knew your anxiety which you showed in your letter and cable. I could not avoid the fast. Friends have to put up with that part of me. For this last may not be the last of my fasts. I can survive discredit by the world and not by myself.

Of the current events you will know from Mahadev and Pyarelal and the cuttings that Chandrashankar may be sending you. These letter(s) are not, I think, duplicated to Mira. Whatever you may consider necessary, you will pass on to Mira. She seems to be going about in a business-like manner. Anyway you must give your own impressions.

Poor Kamlani! I expect to have full accounts from you and Polak.

C.F. Andrews reaches Bombay on 25th. He may be here on 26th. Till then do not be anxious about the future. I have no cut and dried plan. Of course Bengal and the Frontier with Abdul Ghaffar Khan as the centre-piece are there. But I see no clear line of action. I want to precipitate nothing. But things may become impossible for me any moment. I must have room to move. The Black Hole will suffocate anybody—much more me, an open-air creature. A most unnatural condition is becoming naturalized in this unhappy land. This is written to give you my mental condition, not to expect more from you than you are doing. What can you the handful do, if we here can do nothing? And I admit that we are doing nothing or not enough. It is in this atmosphere that I have to act when this convalescence in finished. You must not be alarmed. What I have described is nothing new. You know these things. I have put them here in order to show that the things are about the same as when you left India. Not even all the ordinary civil disobedience prisoners have been discharged. And extraordinary treatment is being meted out to Jawaharlal. He may be pounced upon any day. They have put him out. Without seeming indecent he can’t find himself in prison and they tell him he may be taken away any moment. This gives no chance to poor Kamala for whose sake Jawaharlal is discharged. This is cruelty double distilled. And in spite of their declarations, many prisoners are still being detained without the slightest cause. Attachments of land still going on for fines! My ahimsa is on its mettle. But I do not want to act. I am passive till God wants me to act; not my will but His shall be done.

\[1 \text{ Vide “Letter to Agatha Harrison”, 7-8-1934}\]

You should share this with Mira and Muriel without fail. Of course Polak and any other you like.

Love to you and your sister to whom I was unable to write when her little note was received.

August 22, 1934

MY DEAR MURIEL,

I take this up after a long letter¹ to Agatha. Hence I must be brief now. I am getting on as well as might be after a fast of seven days.

I would like you to give me your experiences of Russia if you can spare the time.

I have never forgotten the commission you gave me about writing out my thoughts on non-violence for Rajkumari Amrit Kaur. But there has been no time left for me to do the work and I do not know whether I shall ever get the time for it. I can only promise to bear the commission in mind.

You remember you were to go specially to Rome in order to unravel the mystery of that interview.² You were to meet the Editor of that journal and find out from him what he actually had said and what he had to say to you. This thing may have no value now for the outside world. But it was for you and one who wants merely to serve Truth and nothing but It.

August 22, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. You are quite right in saying that I have not been able to discover any royal road to physical brahmacharya. All that I can say is that you have to persevere along the lines suggested by me. Pure food, fresh air and moderate amount of exercise are to yield the desired result. Pranayama and some asanas have been reported also to produce good results. Hipbaths are also valuable. Mustard oil is a condiment which should be eschewed. In fact, I would advise you to eschew all oils. Vegetables should be boiled. Starchy vegetables should be avoided, and so should be pulses. You need not worry about milk. Honey is no substitute for milk. You should take a fair quantity everyday. And above all you should persevere in praying and have faith that your prayer will be answered.

387. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

August 22, 1934

BHAISHRI VALLABHBHAI,

Here is a problem for you to solve. Kaka wishes to go and work in the South. This has no connection with his resignation as trustee. I have been telling the teachers who have assembled here that they should go and live in villages and, through constructive work, do what they can to organize village life and educate the people. The teachers like this idea and those who can be relieved are ready to take up such work. Kaka is one of them. We of course wish to utilize the Vidyapith buildings for meeting the needs of the city.

Mahadev left yesterday evening. He will reach Prayag tonight.

Mathuradas will certainly go to receive Andrews on Saturday. Send some others, too, who can go. If possible, put him up with you and, if he wishes, let him leave for Wardha on the same day.

I got your letter after I had written the above.

It was good that you could meet. Let him, the Chronicle, The Free Press, etc., agitate for the release of prisoners. We may remain silent on minor issues, but why should we do so on an important one? Dahyabhai should ask Natarajan also to attend. According to a wire received from Ghanshyamdas, he intends to leave on Monday for Wardha.

I believe Andrews will stay for three or four days at least. But it is also likely that he might want to leave immediately for Santiniketan. You may yourself ascertain his intention.

I cannot write more today.

CHI. BRIJKRISHNA,

I have your letter. You may certainly summon Damodardas if you so wish. It is unnecessary to consult me on such matters; how can I even object to it? I have no desire to curtail your independence in any way. But I do want your consent, if I can have it, to my making use of the remarks made by Damodardas regarding . . . and others in order that I may be able to do them justice. This matter is hurting me like poison because now I am terribly embarrassed while writing to . . . and . . . This is probably the first occasion in my life that I heard something against them which affects me yet I may not let them know. It will be enough if I am released from this restriction. I will never involve myself in the Delhi Congress controversy. Such matters are now beyond my strength.

Since I have your permission I am sending your letter to Sardar. The reference to Damodardas is of course there.

By now you must have realized the point about your writing to Prabhavati about the marriage. It was not as if this subject could not have been discussed at all but that it should never have been discussed with Prabhavati. This has never been nor can it ever become her sphere till she has gained some independence in such matters. A discussion about any girl of the Ashram can take place only with Jamnalalji, Vinoba or myself; and in such affairs Vinoba and I give precedence to Jamnalalji. What need was there to write to Prabhavati when the right thing was to contact Jamnalalji?

You may, by all means go to Mussoorie for your health’s sake. We shall see afterwards.

389. STATEMENT TO ASSOCIATED PRESS OF INDIA

[ On or before August 23, 1934 ]

What was offered was freedom of speech and vote to elect candidates who had real conscientious scruples over the acceptance of the Working Committee’s resolution on the Communal award. This would not satisfy Panditji. He desired full freedom of action for all. This amounted to a nullification of the Working Committee’s resolution which the Committee could not do. It was a mistake to suppose that the Working Committee’s resolution was a virtual acceptance of the Award. The Committee neither accepted nor rejected the Award and thus proved its impartiality and national character. It was the only way to arrive at an agreed solution which was sure to come if Congressmen, Hindus, Mussalmans and others, loyally and seriously worked out the resolution.

Mahatma Gandhi was then asked if Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya’s new organization could run the elections in the name of the Congress. He replied that the Parliamentary Board was the only authorized body which could function in the name of the Congress.

I have your letter. If it is merely a matter of resumption of practice, I hardly think you need any interview because I am clearly of opinion that those Congress pleaders who want to resume practice are entirely at liberty to do so. MY DEAR ANAND,

You have given me a tragic tale of your woes. That a little ringworm should develop into a frightful thing passes comprehension. Generally speaking it yields to simple treatment inside of two or three days. Have you not placed yourself under a competent doctor? And you ought not to trifle with your piles. It is a very simple operation, and if a competent surgeon advises that you should go through the operation at once you should do so without demur.

I see that your letter is dated the 16th instant. It was received only yesterday. Evidently the letter takes a long time to reach Karachi and therefore I am sending the following telegram:

Hope ringworm cured. Under surgical advice undergo piles operation immediately.

You can publish the message on God. If you like you can copy the full text from Young India. As you know, selections from Young India have been published in book form. This message is among the selections.

I am not writing separately to Vidya, but she ought to. I hope she and Mahadev are all right.

Love to you both.

400. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

August 23, 1934

BHAISHRI VALLABHBHAI,

Enclosed is a letter from Brijkrishna regarding the dissensions in Delhi. Read it and tear it up. I have categorically stated\(^1\) in my reply that, even if they ask me, I will not intervene in this dispute. Every day I receive nothing but such complaints. Everybody thinks only of himself and nobody thinks of the country. I don’t know how, in such circumstances, we can reach our goal.

I have received wires from Bengal, too, against Aney. I have replied in plain words saying that nobody should doubt his impartiality and that he should be fully trusted.

Malaviyaji has ordered The Hindustan Times to change its policy on the question of the Award. Ghanshyamdas has resigned because of this, giving reasons in his letter of resignation which reveal his disagreement with Malaviyaji’s views. Let us see what happens now. I don’t know what has happened to these two.

On receiving a wire from Rajendrababu, I have sent a statement\(^2\) to the Associated Press. You will read it in the papers. If a copy has been preserved, they will send it to you. It would help if you also issued such statements from time to time from Bombay. I had a wire from the Maulana asking me what the formation of the Congress Nationalist Party meant. I have wired back saying that it is the President who should reply to his question, and that, though I would write about it to you, he should send a wire to you. If you receive one, give him a suitable reply.

I received a letter from Rajaji today, which you should read. Tear it up after reading it. If you wish, write to him. If you regain sufficient strength to travel to Madras and if you can get time, you may go there. I have not seen the cutting from The Statesman. If I find it, I will send it too. Whatever it writes, how can we hide the truth? Prafulla Ghosh has arrived here. He has a painful tale to tell of the rot in Bengal.

401. INTERVIEW TO KHADI WORKERS

[On or before August 24, 1934]

Khaddar in a sense is purely an economic proposition. A khaddar organization must be a business concern before everything else. The democratic principle, therefore, cannot apply to it. Democracy necessarily means a conflict of will and ideas, involving sometimes a war to the knife between these different ideas. There can be no room for such conflict within a business organization. Imagine parties, groups and the like in a business concern. It must break to pieces under their weight. But a khadi organization is more than a business concern. It is a philanthropic institution designed to serve demos. Such an institution cannot be governed by popular fancy. There is no room in it for personal ambition.

“In reorganizing your khadi production, you should not forget that the science of khadi, in some respects, works on diametrically opposite lines to that of ordinary business. You know how Adam Smith in his Wealth of Nations, after laying down certain principles according to which economic phenomena are governed, went on to describe certain other things which constituted the ‘disturbing factor’ and prevented economic laws from having free play. Chief among these was the ‘human element’. Now, it is this ‘human element’ on which the entire economics of khadi rests; and human selfishness, Adam Smith’s ‘pure economic motive’, constitutes the ‘disturbing factor’ that has got to be overcome. What applies to the production of mill-cltoh, therefore, does not apply to khaddar. Debasing of quality, adulteration, pandering to the baser tastes of humanity, are current staple in commercialized production; they have no place in khadi, nor has the principle of highest profit and lowest wages any place in khadi. On the contrary, there is no such thing as pure profit in khadi. And there should be no loss. Loss there is, because we, the workers, are still incompetent novices. In khadi, the prices realized return to the prime producers, the spinners, the others getting no more than their hire.

1 This appeared under the title “Khadi—A New Orientation” as a “gist of Gandhiji’s remarks” to prominent khadi workers of Andhra, including Pattabhi Sitaramayya, Sitarama Sastri and Narayana Raju, The discussion continued for two days.
2 From The Bombay Chronicle, 26-8-1934, which had reported that Pattabhi Sitaramayya left Wardha for Madras on August 24, 1934.
Then, take the question of standardization. You cannot enforce it in khaddar. As Rajagopalachari once remarked, a poor, ordinary spinner cannot always spin thread of a uniform quality. She is not a machine. Today she may be unwell, tomorrow her child may be ill and her mind will be distracted. If you have love for the poor spinner or her child, you will not insist on having smooth, even thread always, but be satisfied with what she can give, so long as she gives her best in the condition in which she finds herself at the moment. The sacred touch of her hand gives life and history to khadi which the machine-made yarn can never give. The art that is in the machine-made article appeals only to the eye, the art in khadi appeals first to the heart and then to the eye. I would, therefore, deprecate the bleaching of khadi. It adds to the cost of production, affects the durability of cloth and makes the detection of fraud ever so much more difficult. We must not pamper the popular fancy, but seek to cultivate a new taste. A few washes in the ordinary course will suffice to make khadi perfectly white and give it a softness which bleaching destroys. We must make everybody contribute his or her mite to reduce all unnecessary cost.

If, then, we treat khadi, not as an article of commerce, but as one necessary for the sustenance of semi-starved millions, we must penetrate the spinner’s home and induce her to wear khadi made from her own yarn. This at once reduces the cost of production and ensures automatic distribution. So far, we have simply tried to manufacture khadi for the city people. From insignificant beginnings, the production of khaddar has grown to several lakhs per year. We have multiplied varieties. But that does not satisfy me now. Khadi was conceived with a much more ambitious object, i.e., to make our villages starvation-proof. This is impossible, unless the villagers will wear khadi themselves, sending only the surplus to the cities. The singular secret of khadi lies in its salability in the place of its production and use by the manufacturers themselves.

Our overhead charges are today much too high for me. If we concentrate attention on the central mission of khadi, they will be considerably reduced. The rules governing the reduction of the price of khadi are somewhat, if not wholly, different from those that apply to purely commercial articles produced chiefly for profit. In khadi, there is a limitation to the improvement of tools. But there is no limitation to the improvement of human intelligence and honesty. If we despair of these two, we must despair of khadi. In khadi, therefore, we reduce cost by eliminating middlemen as far as is consistent with the smooth running of the organization, which itself will be unnecessary when khadi is self-supporting and self-acting.

The science of khadi is still in its infancy. It is a developing science. With every new discovery that I make in it, the realization comes to me all the more vividly how little I know of that science. There is no other country in the world, with the possible exception of China, that is potentially so rich as India, with its inexhaustible, untapped reserves of man-power. Tap these reserves, and you at once banish poverty from this country; and hand-spinning is the means by which this could be done. All that we have done so far in khadi was necessary. Without it we could not have reached the present stage. But we have yet only touched the fringe of the problem. We have now need to take another step. If, therefore, you will have autonomy for Andhra khadi, you can have it for the asking and without much trouble about the discharge of your obligations. There is nothing to prevent you from working along the lines suggested by me.

402. NOTES

Its Physical Effect

A few words about the physical effect of the recent fast will not be out of place. No matter how much spiritually inclined a person may be, a physical act cannot but produce its corresponding physical effect. The latter may be regulated or reduced by the spiritual effort, but it can never be completely overcome. And as I have often fasted for health reasons, i.e., for physical effect, I have not failed to study from that standpoint all the fasts that were taken from spiritual motives. During all the four fasts undertaken for the Harijan cause, I have noticed a particular dislike for water, whether with or without soda or salt, and whether hot or cold. I have been able to bear, but only just bear, aerated water. This inability to drink water has been the greatest drawback in my fasts. I must mention that, being largely a fruitarian and having abstained from condiments of every description, except salt, practically for the past forty years, I rarely drink water even in the ordinary course. All the liquid I need comes from the fresh juicy fruit and the non-starch vegetables and honey and hot-water drinks. I have known many friends who have gone through long fasts, but I do not know anyone who had had the dislike for water that I had. Medical friends who have kindly helped me during my fasts have not been able to suggest anything within the permissible limits whereby they could make me drink water freely. They have suggested and adopted remedies to reduce the evil effect of inability to drink enough water. My purpose is to compare notes with those who have any knowledge of fasting and to discover a means whereby the dislike of water could be cured. Though I do not know them, surely, there must be people who develop during their fasting periods the same repugnance to water that I do. If any light can be thrown on the question, it will help many persons like me. Much as I should like to avoid having to fast, I cannot make myself believe that the recent fast was the last in my life. It is a matter beyond my control.

THE AJMER INCIDENT

Although Shri Ramnarayan Chaudhri and Shri Durgaprasad Chaudhri, captain of the volunteers in Ajmer, do not in any way wish to be absolved from any blame that may attach to them for forgetfulness or negligence in connection with the Ajmer incident, they are most anxious to have the blame removed from the volunteers who have been condemned in the Press and who they hold to be utterly blameless. They have made careful investigations and find that not a single volunteer was involved in doing injury to Swami Lalnath or his party. The investigation papers have been sent to me. The only deadly piece of evidence in favour of the theory of the guilt of the volunteers has been utterly discredited. The confessor appears to have been altogether a fictitious person, no trace can be found of him. The newspaper that published the confession has failed to produce the name of the writer, and the Editor has made such acknowledgement in his paper and expressed regret for having published an unauthentic letter. All the evidence, therefore, that I have hitherto received goes to show that no volunteer was involved in the affray. My own statement has nothing in it to warrant the inference that the volunteers had actually assaulted Swami Lalnath or any of his party. I had simply said that Swami Lalnath had said that volunteers were involved. But in this belief he was evidently mistaken. No trace was found of the volunteer described by him. Since the Ajmer volunteers have come in for a great deal of public criticism, it was necessary to give my own opinion in the matter. The fact, however, that in my opinion no volunteer seems to have committed the assault does not imply that the fast was in any way unnecessary. That the assault was committed is not to be denied, nor can it be denied that those who took part in the affray were of the reformer group. The fact also remains that Shri Ramnarayan Chaudhri forgot to give the necessary instructions and take adequate precautions against the mishap. The fast was, therefore, clearly necessary, and I am thankful to God that He gave me the strength to take and go through it. Those who handle purity movements cannot be too vigilant. The legal maxim has it that ‘Law’, i.e., God, ‘helps the wakeful, never the sleepy.’

AN ENGLISH FRIEND’S WARNING

An English friend sends the following message:

We, English people, do not understand this fasting of yours. We were hardly able to tolerate your previous fasts. But you will be discredited, if you repeat any more of these.

I know that this warning has been sent out of concern for my reputation. I know the Protestant dislike for fasts. But, inspite of all the wish to stand well with my English friends, I am really helpless in this matter. I am not responsible for these fasts. I do not undertake them for my amusement. I would not torture the flesh for the love of fame. Though I bear joyfully the pangs of hunger and many other physical discomforts of fasting, let no one imagine that I do not suffer. These fasts are bearable only because they are imposed upon me by a higher Power and the capacity to bear the pain also comes from that Power. I can only plead with that Power that He may not put me through any more ordeals of that nature. But if my pleading goes in vain and another fast comes my way, I must take it, even though I may have to risk a wreckage of all the reputation I may possess for sanity and what not. ‘For, what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?’

Harijan, 24-8-1934
August 24, 1934

CHI. MARY,

I was glad to hear from you so soon in reply to my postcard. Jamnalalji is doing exceedingly well. The operation itself was a prolonged affair because it had to do with the bony parts of the ear and there were some tough bones to be chiselled and hammered. But the convalescence has been exceptionally easy. He was allowed to walk yesterday and is almost on normal diet. Even the stitches were taken off. That of course does not mean that the bones where cuts were made were healed. That must take some time, but not so much as the doctors had expected. They say that the operation was successful and very cleverly done.

Mira had a sudden call from within. One fine morning she came to me and said that she felt an irresistible call to go to England. I asked her, “when”; and she said, “as soon as I can pack and go”. I did not resist her. On the contrary I encouraged her because I felt that it must do her good and be a rich experience, though she might be able to do nothing. I have confidence that she will not make any serious blunder by talking nonsense. She is too well-balanced to do that. She does not expect to be away for more than four months, but I have written to her not to hurry back and that she should stay longer if it was necessary. Her programme is very elaborate. She is leaving practically no friend unvisited and she is booked to go to Scotland also. She has been sending long letters and she herself is more than satisfied with the way she is being received. I fancy that she will return in October. Is it not strange that the English climate is not suiting her as well as the Indian climate! She told me that she was freezing in Wales! If you want to see a sample of her very long but interesting letters I will gladly send you a specimen.

I hope you are now thoroughly restored. Do you hear from Duncan?

Love.

DEAR TAYEBBHAI,

I have your letter. It is difficult for me to give you a firm opinion. I can conceive circumstances under which a Congressman will be justified in accepting appointment as honorary magistrate. Each case has, therefore, to be judged on its own merits. But I would like to state generally that every Congressman should, in such matters, act according to his conscience. More generally still, if he can avoid accepting honours from Government it is well. It will go hard what any person to justify a departure from a very safe road.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR KSHITISHBABU¹.

I understand that you have difficulty in reconciling yourself to the Working Committee’s resolution² on the Communal Award as also to the position³ I have taken up regarding the Parliamentary Board. You have a right to strive with me when you cannot see eye to eye with me. You must not think of sparing me for the sake of my health. I may not be able to straightaway reply to your letters; but it would hurt me to think that you had formed, without arguing with me, an adverse opinion on any step that I might have taken. You know how I have valued your silent service of the country and your equally silent co-opreation. I do not want to forfeit the confidence of valued co-workers like you.⁴

407. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

August 24, 1934

BHAISHRI VALLABHBHAI,

Since Kaka has resigned his place on the Board of Trustees of the Vidyapith, all of us have come to the decision that you should be the Chairman of the Board. We have already appointed you to the post. I did not remember what my legal position was in the Vidyapith, so I enquired about it and was told that I had none, but that, morally speaking, they regarded me as its Chancellor and all the teachers had agreed among themselves that I should be permitted to intervene in its affairs whenever I wished to do so. But this is no way of running an organization. You are the only person who can be the legal chairman. I am satisfied with whatever moral position I have and have neither the desire nor the strength to shoulder greater responsibility than that.

Another decision which they have arrived at on my advice and subject to your approval is that Narahari should take over management of the Harijan Ashram and that as many teachers from the Vidyapith as he may need should be made available to him. The expenditure over Narahari and other teachers from the Vidyapith who may be assigned to the Ashram should be met from the Vidyapith funds as long as they last. I am of the view that this burden should not be put on the Harijan Sevak Sangh for the present, in view of the policy of the Sangh that it should pay caste Hindus from its funds in as few cases as possible. The ideal is that 95 per cent of the receipts should go directly into the pockets of Harijans. If we wish to realize it, we should set an example with our own workers. The third decision we have taken—and this also subject to your approval—is that the remaining teachers should, if they agree, spread out in villages for rural reconstruction work and for service in villages, and start work according to the scheme or plan which I have put forward. Narahari will explain it to you. If you do not approve of any item in it, exclude it unhesitatingly. Kakasaheb, Kishorelalbhai, Maganbhai, Soman and Narahari were present when these decisions were taken and they have agreed with them. About Narahari, I have discussed the idea with Thakkar Bapa also. The Harijan Ashram cannot be run on the best lines unless it gets the services of a person like him. I am sure that, if we run it well, we shall advance the cause of Harijans considerably. Only then will the gift of the Satyagraha Ashram have been justified. Though I know, therefore, that we can take many other services from Narahari, I think this is the best use we can make of him at present, and he himself is interested in this work and is fully confident of being able to make a success of it. Please, therefore, let Narahari be sacrificed for the Harijan Ashram.

BHAISHRI VALLABHBHAI,

I got your letter and wire. I am not sending a wire in reply to your wire, since I have already written to you yesterday on that very subject. If you have not issued any statement as suggested in that letter, you may state as follows:

I have read the proceedings of the new party formed by Pandit Malaviyaji and Shri M. S. Aney. I have read telegrams and letters asking me to clarify certain points. In my opinion it is not proper to use the Congress name without the Congress authority. The party may be called the National Party of Congressmen if its composition strictly confirmed to Congressmen. But without the authority of the Congress duly received it cannot with propriety be called the Congress National Party especially when it is formed deliberately to propagate a policy in direct contradiction to that which is the official policy of the Congress. The adoption of the Congress name cannot but confuse the popular mind and I would respectfully urge Panditji to reconsider the position and adopt another name for the party which he had a perfect right to form for the education of Congressmen and others. There other point I should like to emphasize is that no one but the Congress Parliamentary Board can run elections in the name of the Congress. Lastly in the midst of the unfortunate differences between Pandit Malaviyaji and Sjt. Aney and the Working Committee I hope that all Congressmen will loyally support the policy enunciated in the resolution of the Working Committee regarding the Communal Award.

If you wish to make any changes in this, you may do so.

Rejendarabau’s letter was rather strange. There can be only one reply to it. The Congress certainly cannot assume responsibility for providing the money and we cannot raise funds at present through private efforts. That is the responsibility of Bhulabhai and others. Discuss this matter with him.

I will write to Bhulabhai regarding the A.I.C.C.

He wants a meeting of the Working Committee to be called. I, therefore, think that it will be best to call it. You may hold it either in Bombay or Wardha, as you wish. He wants it to be called early in September.

Rajaji will arrive here the day after tomorrow or on Sunday.

Pattabhi and others are here . . .¹ and others have arrived. They will leave today.

DEAR DR. BIDHAN,

Yes, I have recovered from the effects of the fast in the sense that there is no untoward consequence. I am steadily but slowly regaining strength.

I have no desire to have a meeting of the Working Committee. But, if it is needed by the Parliamentary Board, I have no doubt that Sardar Vallabhbhai will call it. But have you need for it? I have a telegram from Maulana Saheb and Sardar Sardul Singh who evidently desire a meeting of the Working Committee at the same time as the Parliamentary Board meeting. If such is also your feeling, then of course the Working Committee must meet. I am loath to be dragged to Bombay just now. Jamnalalji from his sick-bed has been warning me not to leave Wardha before I have reached 110 lb. I am now 98 lb. and I am gaining at the rate of less than $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. a day. Supposing that I keep up that pace, it would not be before the 20th September that I can leave Wardha. But of course Jamnalalji is exacting and he can be over-ruled if both the meetings must take place in Bombay, and that in the early part of September and if my presence is a necessity. All these things I leave to you to decide and then move Sardar Vallabhbhai accordingly.

Of course the appropriation of the name ‘Congress’ by Panditji’s party is a bad job. No one can act in the name of the Congress without due authority. I believe Sardar Vallabhbhai would be issuing a statement in the matter. You must have seen the brief statement that I have issued.

I hope you do not want the Working Committee to lay down the procedure at the present stage to be followed by Congressmen in the Assembly. If an amendment of the character you describe is brought before the meeting just now I think it would be better not to say anything. But the Parliamentary Board is the best judge to decide as to what is necessary. But should an amendment be moved, you have correctly interpreted my own opinion as to the clear duty of Congress members. They must vote against a resolution or amendment accepting the Award. And since they cannot vote for rejection, naturally they must abstain from voting in regard to a resolution or amendment rejecting the Award.

I am glad that so many districts had undisputed elections. I wish the rest of the districts would follow the good example set by the overwhelming majority of the districts. But if a fight is inevitable, I think that the decisions of Mr. Aney should be loyally followed.

Yours sincerely,

DR. BIDHAN CHANDRA ROY

Though I have not been able to write to you I have been closely following the course that Kamlani’s 1 derangement is taking. 416. LETTER TO NARAHARI D. PARIKH

August 25, 1934

CHI. NARAHARI,

Since Kakasaheb has resigned from the Board of Trustees of the Vidyapith, the question arises as to what should be done regarding the village improvement scheme of Shri Nagindas Amulakhrai. As desired by Shri Nagindas, I had appointed a committee to implement the scheme. On thinking about it, I now feel that the committee should be made completely independent of the Vidyapith, and that Sardar Vallabh bhai should be appointed its President and Raojibhai its Secretary. The latter should be appointed for one year.

Kakasaheb has rightly deposited the money of the Nagindas Trust with Jamnalalji. After the latter is all right, we may, if necessary, make some other arrangement. I have another fund also under my control. Kakasaheb has deposited that amount, too, with Jamnalalji. For the convenience of keeping accounts and from other points of view I think it would be desirable to amalgamate this amount with the Nagindas Trust money.

The late Punjabhai had donated an ear-marked sum and, on my advice, entrusted the Vidyapith with the responsibility of editing and publishing Jain literature through a committee. I have a moral responsibility in this matter too. In view of the present circumstances, I would suggest that that work also should be carried on independently of the control of the Vidyapith. I suggest the following names as Trustees of such an independent body:

1. Narahari Parikh
2. Valji Desai
3. Ramniklal Modi
4. Maganbhai Desai
5. Nilkanth Mashruwala
6. Gopaldas Patel

If, besides these, we can get a learned and pious Jain, I think it would be desirable to invite him also to become one of the Trustees. We shall have to look out for such a person. If you can think of any name, please let me know.

In this programme, so far we have paid attention to publication of material from the original sources of the Agamas together with a translation. If, instead, we make selections from this vast field of literature which might be useful to the people, or get such selections made, and publish them, I think the late Punjabhai’s object would be better fulfilled.
It was always Punjabhai’s wish that Shri Rajchandra’s birth anniversary should be fittingly celebrated. We should assume the responsibility for this. But whereas in Punjabhai’s time people were content with holding meetings on the anniversary day, I think it would do greater credit to the committee and give greater peace to the soul of Shrimad if some constructive work could be done on that day. The committee should consider whether this should be done by publishing some literature or arranging a lecture on the anniversary day or in some other manner. The anniversary falls on the next Kartik Purnima. We should, therefore, think and decide in time how it should be celebrated on this occasion.

417 LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

August 25, 1934

Bhai Vallabhbhai,

You must have received my letter\(^1\) of yesterday. Mathurababu\(^2\) brought your letter today. It was good that he came. I have sent an emphatic message with him to the effect that they should fight the elections only if the Parliamentary Board provides the money, otherwise they should abandon the idea. They should expect no help from you or me. Of course, if they have the courage to fight without spending money they should certainly do so. If, however, that is not possible, they should think twice before deciding to fight. If it is possible anywhere in the country to fight elections without money and solely on the prestige of the Congress, it is in Bihar. However, this problem is outside my sphere. I haven’t the slightest idea how elections are fought. If indeed they can be fought without money or with very little money solely in the name of the Congress, there can be nothing more creditable than that.

I have a wire from Bhulabhai saying that he is coming today between 3 and 4. Mahadev is arriving in the evening.

Did I write to you that I had received three wires regarding the

\(^2\) Mathuraprasad, Rajendrababu’s co-worker in Bihar
Working Committee? I have merely wired back in reply that they should ask you about it.

It will not matter if you find it impossible to come. We shall meet through letters and be satisfied with that. I will keep you informed about anything new which I come to know about.

Mirabehn seems to be doing good work. Probably it will bear no result just now, but her trip [to England] will not have been in vain. If you have not been getting letters regarding such matters, I will arrange, after Mahadev’s return, that they are forwarded to you. Muriel met Lloyd George. She talked with him for hours. Thus these few friends have been doing the best they can. Mirabai and Agatha have clashed with each other a bit. Partly Mirabai’s impatience and partly her suspicious nature were responsible for this. Mahadev or Pyarelal will give you the details of the incident.

You do not seem to have fully regained your strength. Bhulabhai has arrived. Call the meeting in Bombay. That will drag me there. Bhulabhai will be able to manage the A.I.C.C.

August 26, 1934

MY DEAR SAHGAL,

I was glad to receive your very prompt letter giving me all the information I wanted except one. I wonder if with all your attainments it would be proper for you, with wife and children, to give your services to a Harijan institution for Rs. 150. And it is not so much the small maintenance that you require as the fact that I cannot provide, perhaps for some years, the scope that your abilities would need. I have not in mind the bringing into being of a mighty Harijan institution. It would be a small affair with big promise in a somewhat distant future. Will you be content to allow your abilities to lie fallow? You will just tell me what is the urge. And is your wife in hearty co-operation with you in coming down from Rs. 750 per month to Rs. 150, when I suppose even now you could command, if not Rs. 750 per month, something very near it?

422. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

August 26/27, 1934

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

Mahadev must have replied to your letter. Raja arrived suddenly today and was in a great hurry to return. Since I spent a good deal of time with him I am late with the post. Aney also came and saw me. All that I can say about him is that he brought a message of love from Malaviyaji and asked me if I had any reply to give. I told him that if they cared for propriety they should put up their candidates after consulting us and should not put up anybody simply to fight the Congress. He left soon, as he had to catch the train for Nagpur, and said that he would come again. The new Party has confused the situation, but apart from that I don’t think it will be able to do much harm.

Bhulabhai came. I had a wire from the Maulana. He will have no objection to the meeting being held in Wardha. He can easily be accommodated here. He says he will not mind if he cannot stay in a hotel. I don’t think he will stop for more than two days. To me, Wardha would certainly be more convenient. There will of course be some burden on Radhakisan, but he has kept everything ready. Recently Jamnalalji has added to the buildings. Hence there is sufficient accommodation. I have been assured that all the arrangements are perfect. Jamnalalji’s invisible presence has been working behind all this, of course.

Bhulabhai will take care of all the necessary arrangements in consultation with you. You may now do what is most convenient to you. If you fix the meeting here, one advantage at any rate will be that we shall be able to meet.

I have been discussing with Rajaji my intention of leaving the Congress. He has come specially to discuss that. If possible, he wants to run away on Tuesday.

Ramdas is returning from Khurja on Monday. It is because of the cholera there. I shall know more when he comes.

I hope you are recovering your strength.

Mahadev has written to you everything about Jawaharlal. It was very good indeed that he went. Jawaharlal felt much comforted. Moreover, the old lady and Kamala were very happy.
I have dashed this off in great haste immediately on entering my silence after the evening prayer. If anything is left out, I will supply it tomorrow.

_Morning, August 27, 1934_

I have recollected one thing. It is not necessary for me now to write to Ballubhai1 or anybody else about the matter concerning the Municipality. I should write to you only. Even if you decide to take back the books belonging to the Vidyapith, there must be books worth thirty to fifty thousand belonging to the Ashram, maybe a little less or a little more. These books are lying unused. If they employ a librarian, the books can be catalogued on scientific lines, rules for lending them can be framed and they may then be loaned according to those rules. I very much desire that something should be done.2

Andrews and Jones3 have arrived. I got your letter. Bhulabhai will be seeing you tomorrow. You may certainly have the meeting at Wardha. As regards Mahadev, see him when you come over. Andrews and Raja are here.

423. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

August 27, 1934

Bhai Bapa,

I got your letter regarding Amalabehn. The Sangh needn’t have incurred that expenditure. But I don’t write this by way of criticism. Compassion is a wonderful thing. On the one hand, a trust, and, on the other, compassion. Who can solve this conflict? But the expenditure ought not to be borne by the Sangh. I, therefore, assume responsibility for that bill and for the ten rupees spent from Parikshitlal’s pocket. I will lay my hand on some other appropriate fund. Please forget about that bill. I will send from here a hundi or money order to Parikshitlal in a day or two.

I have asked Prithuraj to write to you and give you plenty of other news. Somebody has given me a hundi to be spent as I like. Prithuraj is sending it to you to be spent by you in the manner I have suggested.

424. LETTER TO CHANDULAL MODI

August 27, 1934

BHAI CHANDULAL,

I got your letter. Tell Ramniklal that I have become impatient to see him. Ask him to see me soon. But what would it matter even if we can’t meet? After all, everything that we wish doesn’t happen. I do get news about you through Tara. I am glad that you keep cheerful. That is what one ought to do. I am regaining strength and weight. I was 94 immediately after the fast. Today it was 100. This gain in 14 days is not bad.

During the fast, I also used to drink boiled water after it had been cooled. The difference between boiled and unboiled does not trouble me. I cannot tolerate water itself. Do you eat oranges during the fast? Write to me about any other symptom that may appear.¹

Let me know as soon as you have met Ramniklal. Most probably he will be released before his time. I am trying. But we can try only in a manner befitting us.

425. LETTER TO MANILAL AND SUSHILA GANDHI

August 27, 1934

CHI. SUSHILA AND MANILAL,

Since Manilal has not written to me but Sushila has, should her name not be put first?

I am awaiting your reply regarding a permit for Ramdas.² Medh has sent nothing as yet to Uncle.³. If he does mean to send it, why doesn’t he send it directly to Uncle, or to me?

I think I have already written to you about saving at least Rs. 5 and sending it to me for Uncle. I have requested this contribution for repaying the sum that I have got paid to him. I would be glad if he is not given even that much as a gift. I don’t think he himself will be able to repay the sum. If you two and Devdas pay every month, you will feel no burden and the sum which I have borrowed from Jamnalalji can be repaid. You should try and do this much.

Andrews has returned. We talked a great deal specially about you. He has been very much disappointed. He complains that Manilal has been writing articles about the Agent which are full of anger and cont-empt. He doesn’t say that there should be no criticism of the Agent, but that it should be kept within proper limits. I myself cannot read Indian Opinion these days. I rarely see any newspapers. I therefore don’t know. If however you have been writing anything in anger or with contempt, you should change that. You should realize that your responsibility is great. Since I have not read anything, I am not writing this by way of criticism. I am only letting you know the impression that Andrews has formed.

Who is the Swami from Bengal who takes so much of Manilal’s time?

Ramdas is coming here tomorrow as cholera is raging in Khurja. Kishorelal and Gomati are here at present. The former’s health cannot be described as too good.

Devdas is all right, more or less. Lakshmi has always been delicate. Her daughter is doing fine. Andrews was full of praises of Govind alias Arun.

I have regained sufficient strength. But I have still to take some rest.

That Mahatma Gandhi will not go to jail at least till the Bombay Congress session is over, is indicated by a letter which he has written in reply to the Congress Reception Committee’s query as to where he would like to stay during the forthcoming Congress session. Mahatma Gandhi has stated in his reply that he would like to stay in Congress Nagar together with the incoming and outgoing Presidents.

Madalasa is standing by as I write this and tells me that your Marwari is not very good. But one judges another according to the measure of his or her own ability. 430. LETTER TO DR. B. C. ROY

August 30, 1934

DEAR DR. BIDHAN,

I understand that dispensation from adherence to the Working Committee resolution on the Communal Award is being given to Bengal Congress candidates on the ground of conscientious scruples. Can that be so? If it is, I think we have not got the power to give the dispensation. You would have seen my statement¹ to the Press regarding that. I said that such was the offer made and it was rejected; but that if Malaviyaji was disposed to accept it, the Working Committee would probably make the offer again. But until the dispensation becomes part of the Working Committee resolution no one can grant it. And it cannot be granted even by the Working Committee if the Nationalist Party continues to function. Those, therefore, who want dispensation have simply to belong to the Nationalist Party.

431. LETTER TO HARIBHAU PHATAK

August 30, 1934

MY DEAR HARIBHAU,

I have your letter. My position on the cow is not that the cow might be superior to the buffalo in giving milk. If cow protection is part of Hinduism, then we must abjure buffalo milk even if it is superior to cow’s milk. Such is the conception of religion. You cannot apply to it the bare rule of utility. If we would prefer buffalo milk, then by and by the buffalo would become the object of worship and the cow would disappear, as she is fast disappearing. Having said this, I can say that all the information that I possess goes to show that, all things considered, cow’s milk is superior to buffalo milk. But it is a question which does not much interest me, because I am sure that it would be possible to obtain medical testimony in favour of the superiority of the cow’s milk over buffalo milk and vice versa.

¹ Vide “Statement to Associated Press of India”, 23-8-1934
Therefore, in matters of this character, the safest thing is to steer clear of expert opinion. If we worship the cow, we must give her preference over all, irrespective of the quality of the different milk that different animals may give.

Yours sincerely,

432. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

August 30, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your letter. How can you afford to lose heart? One who becomes a vaid has to talk and listen daily about diseases. It was good that I sent you . . .’s original letter. Your letter throws new light on the matter altogether. In such circumstances, you should, in the first place, acquaint me with all the facts and, secondly, do only what seems right to you. You should follow my advice only if it appeals to your reason, or when I ask you to follow my instructions even if they do not appeal to your reason. In this case, I hastily expressed my opinion on the basis of . . .’s one-sided letter. You should act upon it only if you also are convinced. But, on the contrary, you repudiate all her allegations. That being so, there is no question of your acting upon my suggestions. First you should discuss . . .’s charges in detail and show that they are unjustified, and afterwards you should tell her firmly what you think regarding money. Personally, I am willing, on the basis of your letter, to write to her and reprimand her. But I am not writing for fear that my doing so might be misunderstood.

I understand what you say concerning the dairy. We shall separate it. Whom do you suggest for its trustees? I think we had thought of some names, but I have forgotten them. Please, therefore, send your suggestions. Ramdas and Dr. Sharma have returned here. They will not have to go back to Khurja, for the house in which they lived had to be vacated and, moreover, there is nothing special in that place.

437. THAT ILL-FATED MEASURE

The ill-fated Temple-entry Bill deserved a more decent burial, if it deserved it at all, than it received at the hands of the mover of the Bill. It was not a Bill promoted by an individual for his personal satisfaction. It was a Bill promoted by, and on behalf of, the reformers. The mover should, therefore, have consulted reformers and acted under instructions from them. So far as I am aware, there was hardly any occasion for the anger into which he allowed himself to be betrayed or the displeasure which he expressed towards Congressmen. On the face of it, it was, and was designed to be, a measure pertaining to religion, framed in pursuance of the solemn declaration publicly made in Bombay at a meeting of representative Hindus who met under the chairmanship of Pandit Malaviyaji on 25th September, 1932. The curious may read the declaration printed almost every week on the front page of Harijan. Therefore, every Hindu, caste or Harijan, was interested in the measure. It was not a measure in which Congress Hindus were more interested than the other Hindus. To have, therefore, dragged the Congress name into the discussion was unfortunate. The Bill deserved a gentler handling.

Having not a moment to spare myself during the exacting and swift Harijan tour, I had asked Shri Rajagopalachari, in pursuance of the pledge given by me at public meetings and to sanatanist friends in private and in these columns, to ascertain informally (as it could only be done informally) the views of the Hindu members of the Assembly, as, I thought, if it was discovered that the majority was opposed to it, steps should be taken to have the Bill withdrawn. This was the very simple issue on which the Bill could either have been dropped or proceeded with. Both the sanatanists and the reformers would have understood the position. Its fate ought not to have been decided on a side issue. If C. Rajagopalachari or I had committed a mistake, we should have been made to pay for it. But the Bill was above persons. Right or wrong, it enunciated a great principle and, therefore, deserved a more decent treatment than it received.

As for the part played by the Government, this journal’s policy is to avoid as much as possible criticism of the Government. But I should like to say that, with the material before it, the Government could only have taken the course it did. But the public should know that on behalf of the reformers there was not only no attempt made to canvass public opinion but a decision was deliberately arrived at that no attempt should be made to obtain signatures of the public in general in favour of the Bill, it being left open to expert bodies to send representations if they chose. This was duly announced in these pages. My co-workers and I came to the conclusion that the questions underlying the circulation were too technical for the public to decide. Thus, the question was not whether Harijans should or should not enter public Hindu temples precisely on the same terms as the others. The question was whether there should be any legislation in the matter and, if there should be, whether the Bill was good on its merits. In my opinion, both these questions were too technical to be put before the public. Surely, it is not impossible to conceive occasions when legislative help or interference is indispensable even in matters of religion. As a matter of fact, there are many cases of such legislation. But it was difficult to get an intelligent vote from the public. Then, on the merits, it was equally difficult to show to the public that the Bill was purely of a permissive nature and that no temple could be opened without the consent of the majority of the temple-going public. Such public education is not impossible under congenial circumstances. But it is well-nigh impossible when party feeling runs high and truth is at a discount.

The temple-entry battle has to continue. The promise made to Harijans must be redeemed and the temples have to be flung open. If they can be, without legislative sanction, no one would be more glad than the reformers. Not that they want a single temple to be opened where the majority of savarna Hindus who are in the habit of using them are opposed. Law’s assistance is invoked because lawyers opine that the law prevents such opening even where an overwhelming majority of temple-goers are agreeable. If such is the case, the permissive legislation is peremptory. Law alone can undo what law has done, whether it is judge-made or statutory or customary. But reformers will wait till such time as the passing of legislation becomes irresistible. But waiting is only for the wakeful. The hasty withdrawal of the Bill teaches its own lesson. There is no cause for disappointment. Redoubled effort is required. It is not necessary to know or prove that Harijans want temple-entry. Removal of the sin is necessary for the satisfaction of the savarna Hindus who have realized that untouchability is a canker eating into the vitals of Hinduism, which, if not removed in time, must kill Hinduism.

_Harijan_, 31-8-1934

438. LETTER TO P. N. RAJBOJ

_August 31, 1934_

MY DEAR RAJBOJ,

Your letter of 25th August astonished me, for you have now taken up a position in connection with the work of the Harijan Sevak Sangh which is contrary to what you had taken up some time ago and in your correspondence and conversations with me. It may be that experience has altered your view. If such is the case, I have nothing to say except that you have based your criticism on insufficient data.

You know that I have repeatedly expressed my opinion that Harijan Sevak Sangh is an organization of penitents. Therefore it cannot be predominantly manned by Harijans. It has got to do the repentance in the manner that the penitent savarnas may consider to be the most suitable. It it does not appeal to the Harijans, it would be no doubt unfortunate. Then the penitents must try again. But they have got to learn the art of repentance from bitter experience.

As I have said to you personally so often, and you seemed also to agree, the better and more effective method of influencing the policy of Harijan Sevak Sanghs would be for local Harijans to form representative Advisory Boards to study sympathetically the activities of the local Sanghs, and then advise them, criticize them and make concrete suggestions. If such Advisory Boards are formed everywhere, the work done by the Harijan Boards will be naturally much more effective than it is today. But even as it is, the Boards have nothing to be ashamed of. If you will follow the columns of _Harijan_ from week to week, you will surely be astonished at the way the money all over India is being distributed among Harijans. It can be shown from records that many institutions managed by Harijans are being substantially supported from funds collected by Harijan Boards. You will find also, if you study the figures, that the extent of distribution of funds directly among Harijans and Harijan institutions is progressively increasing. Extraordinary precautions are being taken to ensure the impartial distribution of funds.

You are altogether wrong in thinking that accounts of distributions are not published. Reports by provincial branches are published from time to time. They are available for inspection by the public and you can test the accuracy to my statement by turning over the columns of Harijan and even by application of local offices for copies of their reports. I am asking Thakkar Bapa to let me have a consolidated account for publication in Harijan, and you will be yourself astonished at the amounts spent for Harijan institutions and students all over India.

As to temple-entry, you will find that practically nothing has been spent either on opening of temples or on the building of new temples, and throughout the nine months’ tour, the reports of my speeches in the columns of Harijan will show you conclusively that the temple-entry question occupies the least part of them. The Harijan Sevak Sanghs have concentrated on some of the very things that you mention. If they have not tackled all the items, it is not for want of will but for want of capacity to overtake all the items at once.

Your attack upon the Maharashtra Harijan Board comes with ill grace. An out-and-out supporter of the Harijan cause, namely, Mr. Devdhar, is the President of the Provincial Board. He began this long before the Harijan Board came into existence, and probably before the birth of many of us. So far as I am aware, he has never been accused of lukewarmness over this reform. If you have any specific complaints against the local Board, don’t you think that your first duty is to send those complaints to the local Board, and if you do not get relief or satisfaction, to take your appeal to the Central Board? And then if you find that your complaint has gone unheeded, you will be justified in exposing the respective Boards in the public. As it is, you have nothing but a vague allegation against the Maharashtra Board which, in my opinion, has deserved a better treatment.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

DEAR SITARAMA SASTRY,

I have your letter. Although the matter you mention escaped you, there is nothing new in it. We had the large sum spent on Andhra because Andhra had given its due share during the khadi tour. But that does not entitle Andhra to appropriate the sum for use at will. The sum was given to the All-India Spinners’ Association just as Harijan Funds have been given to the Harijan Sevak Sangh. These funds have to be largely used in the province where they were collected. But they are used under instructions of the central organization. Therefore so far as the security is concerned, it has got to be obviously on the same footing for both the funds. And under the proposed autonomy you will be keeping the equivalent of both the funds in the shape of khadi and furniture. If you issue debentures and offer them as security, that is totally a different proposition. If that kind of security appeals to the Association naturally it will be accepted. I have not visualized the debentures sufficiently to pronounce any opinion upon merits. I hope this is perfectly clear.

441. TERRIBLE OPPRESSION

I have been receiving reports from several quarters about the oppression of the Harijans in the area surrounding Talaja. Even after assuming an element of exaggeration in them and making allowance for it, what remains is shocking enough. It is difficult to understand how man can be so cruel.

The tragedy of it is that the Harijans were quite innocent. Because there was an epidemic of the plague among cattle and they died, it was supposed that this was the doing of the Harijans. And so the latter were harassed and beaten almost to death, and in some cases actually to death, with the result that, to escape this oppression they left their homes and belongings and took shelter in Talaja.

It is all the more distressing that such things should happen in a model State like Bhavnagar. I do not say this in order to blame the State. I see from the letters and telegrams I have received that the officials are alert, and I hope that these cruel happenings will be fully investigated, the innocent Harijans will get justice and be resettled in their homes, and the guilty will be forced to compensate the Harijans who have been injured and make good the losses of those whose belongings have been destroyed, and steps will be taken to ensure that such things do not happen again.

What is specially lamentable is the fact that even in a progressive State the people are stony-hearted towards the Harijans, treat them as less than animals and do not hesitate to beat them up.
half-dead or dead and do not even fear being punished with hanging or rigorous imprisonment. Many people seem to argue that they need fear authority or God in beating or killing a Harijan no more then they need to do so in beating or killing cats and dogs, and their reasoning is not completely unjustified either.

The help that the Government or State can give in such matters is not much. It can punish the guilty after the event and force the guilty village to pay compensation. But where a strong public opinion has not been cultivated against such things, the State cannot produce big results. At the root of the Talaja atrocities are utter ignorance and superstition. It is the duty of Harijan workers to dispel this darkness. They should explain to the people that epidemics of the plague are known to occur occasionally in all countries of the world, and that outside India nobody is suspected when such an epidemic occurs. The people in those countries merely regard it as a natural calamity, employ blameless remedies for eradicating the plague and give medicines to the cattle. This should be done vigorously and ceaselessly in villages sunk in ignorance.

In this connection I have received a heart-rending letter from a Harijan. Since it is worth reading by every caste Hindu, I reproduce below its important part:

[From Gujarati]

Harijanbandhu, 2-9-1934

---

1 The letter is not translated here. The correspondent, who was serving Harijans in as many ways as he could as atonement for the cruel treatment of them by caste Hindus, had described the cruel lot of Harijans in Saurashtra and appealed to Gandhiji to save them.
442. MODEST ATONEMENT

The author of this letter has given his name and address. I do not give them lest doing so might detract from the worth of his silent service. The fact that such service is being done in isolated places all over the country serves partially as an antidote against the painful reports regarding Talaja. It is only through such service that untouchability can be eradicated.

443. LETTER TO SAHEBJI MAHARAJ

September 2, 1934

DEAR SAHEBJI MAHARAJ,

It was indeed an agreeable surprise to me to hear from you. But I am afraid that I must not accept your congratulations. I have no talent for reproducing Dayalbagh in the different provinces of India. My reference was to the loan of the excellent men you have sent to Karachi, who are conducting in a methodical manner the Industrial Institute founded by the Mohatta Brothres. Yours is a huge enterprise. I know my limitations. My experience may be extensive in some directions; but I do claim very little experience in the direction in which you have built up Dayalbagh. Nor have I unlimited resources. However, I do expect, when I am ready, to fall back upon you for trained men, to assist the Harijan Sevak Sangh in establishing industrial homes for Harijans. Necessarily therefore they have got to be unambitious.

I am glad you have put up a tannery. Will your expert give me a brief article describing the method of tanning so that an intelligent reader may be able to make his own experiments in tanning? Does your tanning include the treatment of carcasses, flaying them and separating the skin from the bone and the flesh? And if it is, what is being done with the bones, blood, the flesh, the entrails, etc.? For me,

1 Vide the preceding item.
2 A settlement of the Radhaswami sect founded over a century ago near Agra. Covering over 500 acres of land, it was under the personal supervision of Sahebji Maharaj, who was the fifth, head of the sect. Vide also “Letter to Chhaganlal Joshi”, 18-9-1929 tanning has a most important bearing upon the tremendous question of cattle preservation, consistently with the Hindu belief in the sanctity of the cow. And do you take any leather, or do you confine yourself only to leather of dead cattle as distinguished from slaughtered?

Do I infer from your kind offer to include Dayalbagh in the list of Harijan colonies, that the Harijan Sevak Sangh may send Harijan boys to be trained there in the several departments? And if the Sangh may, on what terms?

Mirabehn will be delighted, as I am, to learn that you have succeeded in producing iridium-tipped gold nibs which are eleven-twelfths swadeshi. I shall inform Mirabehn of the good news you have given.

I thank you for your kind inquiry about my health. I am making as good progress as can be expected after the fast.

444. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

September 2, 1934

DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

I had just a reminder\(^1\) from Hariji that at Chheoki where he met us, I had approved of his suggestion that the 25% of the U.P. collections should also be sent to the U.P. Board. That is to say, the whole of the collections should be spent by the U.P. Board, naturally subject to the approval of the scheme or schemes that might be submitted by the Board.

You have given excellent advice in your last letter. But do you yourself do what you advise? sleeper. Isn’t it better that you are there and taking walks or idling away your time in the Hanging Garden, and, in return for this freedom, doing some nursing for Father? Do you know the story of the Hanging Garden? I believe that it is not a place where poor people like us can enjoy a walk. Only fashionable people go there. When you go there next time, observe and let me know how many poor people you saw. I went there once or twice and had enough of it.

I don’t mind your displaying your knowledge before me. An adopted father cannot expect better treatment. But I hope you have not alarmed Father there.

You have made a mistake. You have stated that Father’s weight is 104. I shall probably overtake that in four days. Are you sure you don’t mean 204? Do you read the Ramayana regularly?

448. LETTER TO DRAUPADI SHARMA

_Saturday 2, 1934_

CHI. DRAUPADI,

You must give up this fear of me. I said nothing to scare you, I simply pointed out the parental duty. Nevertheless forget all that now. Write to me without any fear.

Now, news from this end: Sharma, Ramdas, Kanu and Ba left for Sabarmati today. It is all for the best. The account as given to me is still maintained. How have you managed to charm Ramdas? You had already charmed Amtussalaam? Tell me how you do it!

If you are to be called to Sabarmati it will only be after ten or twenty-four days¹ but it will be automatically dropped if Ramdas leaves for South Africa. But in case he does not go you will have to go over to Sabarmati. I say ten or twenty-four days because of the fortnightly shipping service from South Africa. One boat is to reach

CHI. PREMA,

Your letter was full of descriptions. It seems your work is going on very well. Continue to send accounts of it in the same manner. There is an article in Harijan about the work to be done in villages. Read it. One and the same method will not work everywhere. This is a virgin field of work. Hence there will probably be a great deal of variety in the work to be done. The plan which I have and which I have explained in Harijan is based on one line of approach only. But to whom can I explain this, if not to you? Let me see now to how many persons you can explain it.

I am not surprised to learn about your being harassed. I would advise you not to mention the name of the Congress at all, let alone civil disobedience. For the present, only explain to the village people the pros and cons of your programme. Speaking of the Congress serves no purpose if its programme is not carried out. If the programme is carried out, there is no need to speak of it. The real worshippers of Shri Krishna are not those who shout “Krishna, Krishna”, but those who do His work. Our hunger is not appeased if we keep shouting “bread, bread”. It is appeased by eating bread.

Your assumption is correct. If you receive an order to leave the village, you should readily obey it. Only those who willingly obey laws which they do not like earn the right sometimes to disobey a law. This is rarely remembered by people.

Please do not assume that I shall attend the Congress. Many plans are maturing in my mind. I don’t get time to write to you about all of them. Wait and see what happens. You should be satisfied that you have chalked out your work.

Kisan writes to me sometimes. Your letter to Amtussalaam was a good one.

September 3, 1934

DEAR BRELVI,

Mahadev showed me your letter about Shah. I would like him to be elected. He will be a valuable representative. But I doubt the propriety of a socialist standing for an avowedly capitalistic group. To divide on this issue the Chamber which is struggling to make good its position does not appeal to me. Nor does it appeal to me to oppose Mathuradas if he is standing. If Shah cannot stand on behalf of a popular constituency this time, he should wait. But if you and he feel otherwise, of course you will put forth the case before the Parliamentary Board. After all, the decision will rest with it. And I neither attend your meetings nor do I try to influence its decisions in such matters.

457. LETTER TO SHANTIKUMAR MORARJEE

September 3, 1934

CHI. SHANTIKUMAR,

Mr. Mung of Burma came and saw me two days ago. He said that to Haji’s request he plunged into the Burmese question and carried on such a powerful agitation that it even told on his health. He has incurred, he says, an expense of Rs. 2,000. Since there has been no result, neither the company nor Haji would now accept his demand. They deny any understanding with him. He also expressed a desire to see you. I have replied to him that everybody takes up such work of his own free will and for the good of his people. If somebody refuses to keep his promise, one should blame one’s own stupidity. All the same, I have advised him to write to you. If Haji gave a moral undertaking of any kind, I am of the view that Mr. Mung should be reimbursed the expense which he has incurred. Please let me know what the facts of the case are.

Today I have crossed the limits in writing. My back forbids me to go on any more. But I can’t obey the prohibitory order immediately. I could read Narahari’s letter only today. I think some injustice has been done to him. I see no reason at all why you should have felt displeased with him in this matter. Since he could not put his case before you in Bombay, he has stated it with the utmost humility in his letter. The hope which he has expressed in it, that you would dissuade Kaka and prevail over those who cannot co-operate with him to try and do so, is no doubt too much. However, it is only a request that he has made. It betrays his ignorance of your nature. He should have taken your letter to me as expressing your final view. It is quite clear and fully meets the requirements of the situation. I have told Narahari that, if anybody can keep Kaka in Gujarat, it will have your approval and your blessing. Kishorelal told me that you had written a stiff letter to Narahari. If my argument appeals to you, please write a soothing letter to him. In case you may want to read his letter again, I am returning it.

461. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

September 4, 1934

I got your letter. I chanced to see your writing on karmayoga only yesterday and glanced through it. I will read it now if I get time.

What is this about music and cinema? Do they wish to turn the Congress session into a Felix Circus or Barnum show? But, then, what can I say in this matter? I do love music, but everything is good in its place. If the three or four days of the Congress session are crowded with such activities, the atmosphere of seriousness will disappear. Even if they wish to arrange such programmes, somebody may be given a contract for them. I am of the view, however, that no such programmes can be arranged at the place where the parliament meets. But we have turned the Congress into a tamasha. Inclusion of genuine Indian music in a cent per cent swadeshi exhibition is legitimate. But only traditional instruments should be used in such a programme. I can see no room at all for a band. You may show this to Sardar. But if you wish to maintain discreet silence, you may do so. You must have heard from Sardar about the step I am contemplating. I will not, therefore, waste a few minutes of my time by writing about it here.

Why inquire about my health? It was tested yesterday. I was busy with the pen the whole day. There was no ill effect.

I don’t know, however, if somebody here writes to you and gives you a different report.

462. DISCUSSION WITH DODD¹

September 4, 1934

DR. DODD: I have come to India², 10,000 miles, to see Taj which is a monument of the past and Mahatma Gandhi which is a symbol of the future.

GANDHJI: But why not become a living Taj than a dead Taj? And why not a monument of the present than of the future?

Is there any chance of your coming to America? Could we kidnap you to America? We hear, you know, so much of kidnappers nowadays.

No, for the simple reason that I should be of no use there. If I came there, it would be to demonstrate the secret and the beauty and the power of non-violence. I should not be able to do it today. I have not yet carried complete conviction to my own countrymen.

What is your main objective, Mr. Gandhi?

The main objective is obvious and it is to gain independence, not for the literate and the rich in India, but for the dumb millions.

I know. I have often come across that expression in your writings. What are your methods?

Not many methods, but the one method of unadulterated truth and non-violence. But you might ask me, ‘How are non-violence and truth expressed and applied?’ I would say at once that the central fact in my programme is the spinning-wheel. I know that Americans are startled when I say this. What can be the meaning of this pet obsession, they ask.

Not all Americans. Our daily paper one day criticized the spinning-wheel programme and in the very next column had an article describing people working with the shovel on a public thoroughfare, forty doing the work of a single machine. In a letter to the editor, I drew his attention to the incongruity and told him that, just as we were fighting unemployment, India, too, was fighting unemployment. But with you, Mr. Gandhi, it is moral and spiritual symbol, too?

Yes, of truth and non-violence. When as a nation we adopt the spinning-wheel, we not only solve the question of unemployment but we declare that we have no intention of exploiting any nation, and we also end the exploitation of the poor by the rich. It is a spiritual force which in the initial stages works slowly, but as soon as it gets started, it begins working in geometrical progression, i.e., when it gets into the life of the people. When I say I want independence for the millions, I mean to say not only that the millions may have something to eat and to cover themselves with, but that they will be free from the exploitation of people here and outside. We can never industrialize India, unless, of course, we reduce our population from 350 millions to 35 millions or hit upon markets wider than our own and dependent on us. It is time we realized that, where there is unlimited human power, complicated machinery on a large scale has no place. An Indian economist told me once that every American had 36 slaves, for, the machine did the work of 36 slaves. Well, Americans may need that, but not we. We cannot industrialize ourselves, unless we make up our minds to enslave humanity.

¹ This appeared as “A Talk with an American Friend” in Harijan. The date-line and the first two paragraphs are reproduced from the manuscript of Mahadev Desai’s Diary.

² Dodd was in charge of a girls’ college in America.

Then, we have to fight untouchability. Untouchability of a kind is everywhere. A coal porter coming from a coalmine would not stretch out his hand to shake yours. He would say he would wash himself clean first. But the moment a man has rendered himself clean, he should cease to be untouchable. Here however we have regarded a part of one population as perpetually untouchable. We are trying to abolish that untouchability. Added to their untouchability is unemployment, which they share in common with a vast number of others. You, too, have got the unemployment problem, but it is of your own creation. Our unemployment is not entirely of our creation, but, however it came about, I am sure that, if my method was universalized in India, we should not only find work for those that exist but for those to come. That is, we should easily be able to tackle our population problem. The problem is to double the penny a day which is the average income of a poor Indian. If we can achieve that, it would be quite enough at least till we find a better method. The spinning-wheel, by utilizing the idle hours of the nation, produces additional wealth; it does not, it was never meant to, displace existing employment. Give me a thing which would increase the daily income of the millions of our impoverished people more than the spinning-wheel, and I should gladly give up the spinning-wheel.

I quite see. We talk of shortening of the hours of work, but as to what they are to do in their spare hours, we do not seem for a moment to trouble ourselves about.

1 This sentence is reproduced from the manuscript of Mahadev Desai’s Diary.
I would ask one more question, Mr. Gandhi. I have the opportunity of speaking to many young men and women and I should like you to tell me what you consider your most satisfactory achievement—I will not say your greatest achievement, lest I should embarrass you. In other words, what should I put before the young people as a thing that they should aspire after in life?

It is a difficult question. I do not know what to say. I can simply say this: I do not know whether you will call it an achievement or not, but I may say that, in the midst of humiliation and so-called defeat and a tempestuous life, I am able to retain my peace, because of an undying faith in God, translated as Truth. We can describe God as millions of things, but I have for myself adopted the simple formula—“Truth is God”.

I see it, I see it. You have achieved peace in a world of confusion and turmoil.

But several American friends say to me, ‘You cannot have peace unless you believe in Jesus.’ Well, I tell you I have peace, though I do not believe in Jesus as the only son of God.

I am glad you said this. May I ask you to let me know your conception of Christ?

I consider him as a historical person—one of the greatest amongst the teachers of mankind. I have studied his teachings as prayerfully as I could, with the reverence of a Christian, in order to discover the Truth that is buried in them. I have done so, just as I have done about the teachings of other teachers.

In this connection, may I ask your opinion on the missionaries’ work in India? Have they wronged India?

I should not say intentionally. They, of course, come here as critics, they exaggerate our social evils, they criticize our religion. But that does not matter. All their criticism has but served to make us more conscious of our weaknesses and more alive to our duties.

But that, I suppose, you say of missionaries as individuals, not of missionary societies as such?

I should not draw that distinction, for, missionary societies have certain pre-conceived notions of our society and religion which the members propagate. Thirty-five years ago, for instance, as I was passing through Zanzibar, I went to the Bible Society to purchase a copy of the Bible and with that I was given a report of work done by a mission there. I was astounded to find therein that a missionary could count his work in the terms of £. s. d. A convert meant so many shillings, as to a recruiting agent a recruit means so many rupees. One cannot think of a religion in the terms of the number of its adherents.

What, Mr. Gandhi, has been your greatest disappointment?

Frankly, I have no sense of disappointment, excepting, perhaps, that sometimes I am disappointed with myself, inasmuch as I cannot control the fleeting thoughts as much as I should like to. That’s all.

What is the source of your ideals?

The source is truth or the uttermost identity with all life. Truth is the realization of God.

One last thing, Mr. Gandhi. I am coming from the Congress of the Baptist Christians in Germany. They took a firm stand on peace and racialism. I spoke there on the ‘Gospel of the Day’ and spoke ‘on strict honesty and integrity in the business of our life’ and ‘war as the most insane and unchristian thing on earth’. I made, in conclusion, an appeal to all, coupled with my own declaration, that true Christians everywhere should refuse to shoot down their Christian brethren whenever Governments decided to go to war against any other nation. How much does that proposition come near you?

It would come very near me, if you were to drop out the word ‘Christian’ and said only ‘brethren’. I should refuse to shoot down any human being, black or white, Christian or non-Christian. Your declaration must apply to the whole humanity.

I mean it. I said ‘Christian brethren’, as I was addressing a group of Christians.

That is all right. I have to give this warning, because sometimes it is thought that there is nothing wrong in shooting down so-called savages.

No, no.

1 This and the following answer by Gandhiji, are reproduced from the manuscript of Mahadev Desai’s Diary.
DEAR VALLABHBHAI,

After much deliberation and discussions with friends who have been to Wardha recently, I have come to the conclusion that the best interests of the Congress and the nation will be served by my completely severing all official or physical connection with the Congress, including the original membership. This does not mean that I cease to take any interest in an organization with which I have been intimately connected since 1920 and which I have worshipped since my youth. In spite of all I have recently said about the corruption that has crept into the organization, it still remains, in my opinion, the most powerful and the most representative national organization in the country. It has a history of uninterrupted noble service and sacrifice from its inception. Its progress has been unbroken and steady. It has weathered storms as no other institution in the country has. It has commanded the largest measure of sacrifice of which any country would be proud. It has today the largest number of self-sacrificing men and women of unimpeachable character.

It is not with a light heart that I leave this great organization. But I feel that my remaining in it any longer is likely to do more harm than good. I miss at this juncture the association and advice of Jawaharlal who is bound to be the rightful helmsman of the organization in the near future. I have, therefore, kept before me his great spirit. And I feel that whilst his great affection for me would want to keep me in the Congress, his reason would endorse the step I have taken. And since a great organization cannot be governed by affections but by cold reason, it is better for me to retire from a field where my presence results in arresting full play of reason. Hence in leaving the organization I feel that I am in no sense deserting one who is much more than a comrade and whom no amount of political differences will ever separate from me.

Nor by retiring at this critical juncture am I less true to Babu Rajendra Prasad who will in all probability be the President to the

1 Gandhi had been having discussions on his withdrawal from active leadership of the Congress; vide the following item. In his letter dated August 20 to the addressee, Gandhi had said that he would “prepare a draft” and send it to him. This letter appears to be a draft of his “Statement to the Press” which was finally released on September 17, 1934 forthcoming Congress, and who unlike Jawaharlal shares most of my ideals and whose sacrifice for the nation, judged whether in quality or quantity, is not to be excelled.

Then there is the Congress Parliamentary Board which would perhaps not have come into being, unless I had encouraged its formation with my whole heart. It supplies a want that was felt be many staunch and true Congressmen. It was necessary, therefore, to bring it into being. Such services as I am capable of rendering will still be at its disposal as at any Congressman’s. It must command the full support of all Congressmen who have no insuperable objection to the entry of Congressmen into the existing legislatures. I should be sorry if the Board lost a single vote because of my withdrawal.

I fear none of the consequences dreaded by some friends, for I know my ground. A tree is no more hurt by a ripe fruit falling from it than would the Congress be by my going out of it. Indeed the fruit will be dead weight, if it did not fall when it was fully ripe. Mine is that condition. I feel that I am a dead weight on the Congress now.

There is a growing and vital difference of outlook between many Congressmen and myself. My presence more and more estranges the intelligentsia from the Congress. I feel that my policies fail to convince their reason, though strange as it may appear, I do nothing that does not satisfy my own reason. But my reason takes me in a direction just the opposite of what many of the most intellectual Congressmen would gladly and enthusiastically take, if they were not hampered by their unexampled loyalty to me. No leader can expect greater loyalty and devotion than I have received from intellectually-minded Congressmen even when they have protested and signified their disapproval of the policies I have laid before the Congress. I feel that for me any more to draw upon this loyalty and devotion is to put an undue strain upon them. I wish that those who strongly disapprove of my method would outvote me and compel my retirement. I have tried to reach that position but I have failed. They would cling to me till the end. The only way I can requite such loyalty is by voluntary retirement. I cannot work in opposition when there are some fundamental differences between the Congress intelligentsia and me. Ever since my entry into public life I have never acted in that manner. . . .

1 Then there is the growing group of socialists. Jawaharlal is their

1 Omissions as in the source undisputed leader. I know pretty well what he wants and stands for. He claims to examine everything in a scientific spirit. He is courage personified. He has many years of service in front of him. He has an indomitable faith in his mission. The socialist group represents his views more or less, though probably their mode of execution is not exactly his. That group is bound to grow in influence and importance. I have welcomed the group. Many of them are respected and self-sacrificing co-workers. With all this, I have fundamental differences with them on the programme published in their authorized pamphlets. But I would not, by reason of the moral pressure I may be able to exert, suppress the spread of the ideas propounded in their literature. My remaining in the Congress would amount to the exercise of such pressure. I may not interfere with free expression of those ideas, however distasteful some of them may be. . .

For me to dominate the Congress in spite of these fundamental differences is almost a species of violence which I must refrain from. Their reason must be set free at any cost. Having discovered this undisputable fact, I would be disloyal to the Congress if, even at the risk of losing all my reputation, I did not leave the Congress.

But there is no danger to my reputation or that of the Congress, if I leave only to serve it better in thought, word and deed. I do not leave in anger or in a huff, nor yet in disappointment. I have no disappointment in me. I see before me a bright future for the country. Everything will go well, if we are true to ourselves. I have no other programme before me save the Congress programme now before the country. . .

In this and various other ways I would love to serve the Congress in my own humble manner. Thus living in complete detachment, I hope, I shall come closer to the Congress. Congressmen will then accept my services without being embarrassed or oppressed.

One word to those who have given me their whole-hearted devotion in thought, word and deed in the pursuit of the common goal. My physical withdrawal from the Congress is not to be understood to mean an invitation to them to withdraw. They will remain in the Congress fold so long as the Congress needs them and work out such common ideals as they have assimilated.

Yours,

BAPU

464. STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

September 5, 1934

I am surprised that a responsible paper like The Hindu should have published, without reference to me, unauthorized news about a serious decision said to have been made by me. Surely the Wardha correspondent could have the news confirmed or denied. It was wrong to disclose incomplete and unauthorized reports of confidential conversations.

I may say that there have been discussions with co-workers in the matter but no final decision have been taken. According to my wont, I am sharing with friends, who happen to come to Wardha, the thoughts that dominate me. Public life will become impossible if exchange of views in the process of formation is at all published, especially if they are reported as if they are decisions.

Whatever the decision that may be arrived at, it has and will have no connection whatsoever with Malaviyaji and Mr. Aney.

Whilst every effort will be made to reconcile differences and conduct the election campaign without friction with the new party that has been created by Malaviyaji, there is no doubt whatsoever in my mind or that of the members of the Working Committee that the Congress Parliamentary Board should, with the full backing of the Working Committee, prosecute the election campaign and in doing so give full effect to the resolution of the Working Committee on the Communal Award, in which it has an abiding faith and which, it believes, is the only effective method of bringing about an agreed solution between the communities concerned.

1 According to The Hindustan Times, 5-4-1934, the correspondent had reported: “Mahatma Gandhi has decided to withdraw from the active leadership of the Congress... The decision, it is understood, is due to differences with Pandit Malaviya and others.” Vidai also “Letter to Vallabhbhai Patel”, 19-8-1934.
465. LETTER TO S. GANESAN

September 5, 1934

MY DEAR GANESAN,

I have your letter. I think it will be wise not to tackle any of the candidates on this question for the simple reason that all Congress members are bound to carry out the instructions issued from time to time by the Congress. And Temple-entry Bill is such a highly technical thing that it would be necessarily exploited by opponents. And the only question that would embarrass would be not of opening of temples but of the so-called legislative interference.

DEAR DR. DHARMAVIR,

I thank you for your letter. If I could only allow myself lemon-juice, I know there would be no difficulty in drinking sufficient quantity of water with lemon-juice added. But my fasts do not admit of the introduction of lemon-juice, for however low it may be it has a food value apart from such value as water and salts have. The problem before me therefore, is somewhat difficult—how to overcome the disagree-ability of water without taking anything with it except soda or salt?

MY DEAR SANTDAS,

I have your letter. You have good news from Atma. The doctor’s report does not disturb me at all. Naturally he has to be careful, and he has used an expression which need not frighten us. I am already in correspondence with Polak. Any letter going from me to Atma is likely to excite him. Therefore, for the time being I shall confine myself to writing to Polak. I have already written to Mirabehn or Agatha Harrison, I forget which, that Atma should be induced to return to India. When the proper time comes I shall not fail to write to Atma directly and press him to come back, because I am quite clear in

469. LETTER TO G. R. SAHGAL

September 5, 1934

MY DEAR SAHGAL,

I have not been able to reply to you earlier. I am not able yet to tell you definitely what I can do with you.\(^1\) I do want to harness your abilities for the Harijan cause. Would you care to go to Harijan Asrham, Sabarmati, and be there for a few days or longer, and come in contact with the workers there? The manager will then report to me and you will also tell me how you feel there and what use you would make of it if you were placed in charge. I am afraid that if you take me on trust you may have a reaction and may be thoroughly disappointed, or you may not be the man I picture you to be, and then I or the co-workers might be disillusioned. I do not want either tragedy to take place. And then it won’t be for me to take you. It would be the Harijan Sevak Sangh which will have finally to decide.
But naturally they would be largely guided by me seeing that you will be passed on to them through me. If you feel like going to Sabarmati on a visit of exploration, you will tell me and I shall secure the necessary permission for you. But you may, if you want to save time, correspond directly with Sjt. Parikshitlal, the manager there, mentioning this letter to him and I have no doubt that he will let you go. And then perhaps it will be necessary for you to see me in Wardha before I can finally make up my mind. If you do go to Sabarmati or come to Wardha, you will naturally pay your own fare.

Yours sincerely,

400 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
DEAR DAUGHTER RAIHANA,

What a letter! But the reply will have to be in English.¹

You are a perfect fraud—a strange mystic who cannot rise above the loving prejudices of parents. Your issue seems to me to be quite correct. But why are you not satisfied with your being in the right! Must your neighbours, be they parents, also admit your claim to be in the right? Why must not your knowledge that you are in the right be its own satisfaction? Why should disappointments defeat you? Or you must withdraw your claim to be spiritually-minded and mystic. Mystics are made of sterner stuff—they are not ruffled by misery or pain or insult nor elated by happiness, pleasure or praise.

If you say, they interfere with your action, it won’t hold water. They do not prevent you bodily from being absorbed in prayer or contemplation for two hours or longer. I think you will find that all your difficulties will dissolve, if without irritation, anger or assertiveness you tell them with the greatest firmness and equal gentleness and with a smile on your lips, that whatever you are doing is a fundamental necessity of your being.

Whilst I say this you should know that my whole heart is with you. You must have freedom of thought, speech and action. You must be treated as a friend, not as a child. I am afraid that in your resentment you have underrated the atmosphere of largeheartedness and tolerance that is the speciality of Tyabjis. If you gave full credit to them for this rare quality you would gladly overlook what appears to be patronizing in their behaviour towards you. Remember that you will not be you but for the training they gave you and the affection with which they have surrounded you all. Do not be little the much they have done for you. Do you know this great doha of Tulsida, the mystic?

CHI. MARY,
I have your two letters. The selections from the Upanishads are prior to the Gita and therefore they were written between the tenth and the fifth century (B.C.), if not much earlier. There are others which are comparatively recent; but the Sanskrit selections are very few.
I am sorry for Miss Linforth’s loss. If she wants me to replace it, I would gladly do so. But I should have the full text.
I hope you are completely restored. I am keeping quite well. I have gained 8 lb. I walk freely, though on the terrace, and go through a fair amount of work.
It is difficult to induce Harijans to spin. In some places we have succeeded.
I send you through separate post one of Mirabehn’s letters for you to read, which please return after use. There is no hurry about returning it.
I am also sending you the latest number of Harijan.
Love.

September 5, 1934

BHAI THAKKAR BAPA,

I wish you had told me about Surajbehn in Poona itself. I didn’t know at all that Deodhar and you had encouraged her to study [the working of ] a maternity home. Many women can, and would like to, run such a home. I would never think of engaging Surajbehn in work which many other women can, and would like to, do. Moreover, as Kishorelal says, such work does not seem to be included among our objects. If I can, that is, am free to do so under the trust rules, I will acquiesce in what Deodhar and you have approved, but if I have to decide after seeing for myself, Surajbehn must vacate the building.

Read Kishorelal’s letter. I was surprised about Swami too. It certainly does not become one who claims to be a satyagrahi to show disrespect to a man or woman simply because he or she did not go to jail. That is why I have given so much time to this matter. Please guide me now.

Ghanshyamdas and I have had discussion, not exhaustive but enough for our purpose. We have had a full discussion about the Ashram. The draft will be dispatched tomorrow.

473. LETTER TO ESTHER MENON

September 6, 1934

MY DEAR CHILD,

I held up your letter all these days in the hope of being able to send the answer myself. But I must deny myself that pleasure and dictate this letter if I am to overtake the arrears.

If proof were needed God is proving for me His greatness and goodness every day. You remember the hymn “Count your many blessings”. I think it is in Moody and Sankey’s Hymn Book. I can’t even count the blessings, they are so many. For even the so-called sorrows and pains He sends descend like blessings. If we knew His love, we should know that He has nothing but blessings—and never curses—for His creation.
I hope Tangai is quite free and both the children are flourishing. You must have now received the spinning-wheel. I hope that Menon is well-settled.

I am flourishing. My weight has gone up from 94 to 101 lb. I am going through a fair amount of work and taking regular exercise.

Mira is doing good work in London. She expects to be back in October. Andrews was here for over a week and he has now gone to Simla. He will come once more to Wardha before sailing, most probably on the 6th October, for London. He was looking quite well. He has brought a Welsh blacksmith with him from South Africa. Mr. Jones, that is his name, has recently joined the Oxford movement and considers himself a changed man. We all liked him very much. When Andrews goes to England, he will go back to South Africa.

Pyarelal and Mahadev are here. Ba has gone with Ramdas to Sabarmati where Ramdas is to have rest and cure for his ailment. Devdas was here for a few days. He left yesterday for Bombay. He is likely to come back for the Working Committee meeting on the 8th. This, you will admit, is a fair family budget of news. You must write more regularly than you have hitherto done. I don’t expect to move from Wardha yet for some time.

With love to you all,

BAPU

MY DEAR SURESH,

I have your letter. I was not able to reply to it earlier. I had a chat with Birlaji. He is agreeable to your spending from Rs. 2,000 to 3,000 on land and buildings, provided of course that they remain his property. But you will be at liberty to inhabit the house free of rent or any other charge so long as your health needs such residence. He does not intend to make private use of such property. He will give it for a charitable purpose, most probably for a Harijan hostel. But that is a thing with which neither you nor I are concerned. I think that then you won’t need Rs. 200, but only Rs. 60 per month. Observe too that from October to December you will need not Rs. 200 but ranging from Rs. 125 to 150. You will let me know in time what you would require. And I hope that you will make steady improvement. You must not encourage the thought that the disease is incurable and that you have got to leave within a year or two.

478. VILLAGE TANNING AND ITS POSSIBILITIES

Village tanning is as ancient as India itself. No one can say when tanning became a degraded calling. It could not have been so in ancient times. But we know today that one of the most useful and indispensable industries has consigned probably a million people to hereditary untouchability. An evil day dawned upon this unhappy country when labour began to be despised and, therefore, neglected. Millions of those who were the salt of the earth, on whose industry this country depended for its very existence, came to be regarded as low class and the microscopic leisured few became the privileged classes, with the tragic result that India suffered morally and materially. Which was the greater of the two losses it is difficult, if not impossible, to estimate. But the criminal neglect of the peasants and the artisans has reduced us to pauperism, dulness and habitual idleness. With her magnificent climate, lofty mountains, mighty rivers and an extensive seaboard, India has limitless resources, whose full exploitation in her village should have prevented poverty and disease. But the divorce of the intellect from body-labour has made of us perhaps the shortest-lived, most resourceless and most exploited nation on earth. The state of village tanning is, perhaps, the best proof of my indictment. It was the late Madhusudan Das who opened my eyes to the great crime against a part of humanity. He sought to make reparation by opening what might be called an educational tannery. His enterprise did not come up to his expectations, but he was responsible for the livelihood of hundreds of shoemakers in Cuttack.

It is estimated that rupees nine crores worth of raw hide is annually exported from India and that much of it is returned to her in the shape of manufactured articles. This means not only a material but also an intellectual drain. We miss the training we should receive in tanning and preparing the innumerable articles of leather we need for daily use.

Tanning requires great technical skill. An army of chemists can find scope for their inventive talent in this great industry. There are two ways of developing it. One for the uplift of Harijans living in the villages and eking out a bare sustenance, living in filth and degradation and consigned to the village ghetto, isolated and away from the village proper. This way means in part re-organization of villages and taking art, education, cleanliness, prosperity and dignity to them. This means also the application of chemical talent to village uplift. Tanning chemists have to discover improved methods of tanning. The village chemist has to stoop to conquer. He has to learn and understand the crude village tanning, which is still in existence but which is fast dying owing to neglect, not to say want of support. But the crude method may not be summarily scrapped, at least not before a sympathetic examination. It has served well for centuries. It could not have done so, if it had no merit. The only research I know in this direction is being carried on in Santiniketan, and then it was started at the now defunct Ashram at Sabarmati. I have not been able to keep myself in touch with the progress of the experiment at Santiniketan. There is every prospect of its revival at the Harijan Ashram, which the Sabarmati Ashram has now become. These experiments are mere drops in the ocean of possible research.

Cow-preservation is an article of faith in Hinduism. No Harijan worth his salt will kill cattle for good. But, having become untouchable, he has learnt the evil habit of eating carrion. He will not kill a cow but will eat with the greatest relish the flesh of a dead cow. It may be physiologically harmless. But psychologically there is nothing, perhaps, so repulsive as carrion-eating. And yet, when a dead cow is brought to a Harijan tanner’s house, it is a day of rejoicing for the whole household. Children dance round the carcass, and as the animal is flayed, they take hold of bones or pieces of flesh and throw them at one another. As a tanner, who is living at the Harijan Ashram, describing the scenes at his own now forsaken home, tells me, the whole family is drunk with joy at the sight of the dead animal. I know how hard I have found it working among Harijans to wean them from the soul-destroying habit of eating carrion. Reformed tanning means the automatic disappearance of carrion-eating.

Well, here is the use for high intelligence and the art of dissection. Here is also a mighty step in the direction of cow-preservation. The cow must die at the hands of the butcher, unless we learn the art of increasing her capacity of milk-giving, unless we improve her stock and make her male progeny more useful for the field and carrying burdens, unless we make scientific use of all her excreta as manure and unless, when she and hers die, we are prepared to make the wisest use of her hide, bone, flesh, entrails, etc.

I am just now concerned only with the carcass. It is well to remember here that the village tanner, thank God, has to deal only with the carcass, not the slaughtered animal. He has no means of bringing the dead animal in a decent way. He lifts it, drags it, and this injures the skin and reduces the value of the hide. If the villagers and the public knew the priceless and noble service the tanner renders, they will provide easy and simple methods of carrying it, so as not to injure the skin at all.

The next process is flaying the animal. This requires great skill. I am told that none, not even surgeons, do this work better or more expeditiously than the village tanner does with his village knife. I have inquired of those who should know. They have not been able to show me an improvement upon the village tanner. This is not to say that there is none better. I merely give the reader the benefit of my own very limited experience. The village tanner has no use for the bone. He throws it away. Dogs hover round the carcass, whilst it is flayed, and take away some, if not all, of the bones. This is a dead loss to the country. The bones, if powdered fine, apart from their other uses, make valuable manure. What remains after the dogs have taken away their share is transported to foreign countries and returns to us in the shape of handles, buttons, etc.

The second way is urbanizing this great industry. There are several tanneries in India doing this work. Their examination is outside the scope of this article. This urbanization can do little good to the Harijans, much less to the villages. It is a process of double drain from the villages. Urbanization in India is slow but sure death for her villages and villagers. Urbanization can never support ninety per cent of India’s population, which is living in her 7,00,000 villages. To remove from these villages tanning and such other industries is to remove what little opportunity there still is for making skilled use of the hand and the head. And when the village handicrafts disappear, the villagers working only with their cattle on the field, with idleness for six or four months in the year, must, in the words of Madhusudan Das, be reduced to the level of the beast and be without proper nourishment, either of the mind or the body, and, therefore, without joy and without hope.

Here is work for the cent-per-cent swadeshi-lover and scope for the harnessing of technical skill to the solution of a great problem. The work falls three apples with one throw. It serves the Harijans, it serves the villagers and it means honourable employment for the middle-class intelligentsia who are in search of employment. Add to this the fact that the intelligentsia have a proper opportunity of coming in direct touch with the villagers.

CHI. MIRA,

I must not attempt to write to you this week. I have too much to attend to immediately to undertake a long letter to you. Mahadev must have written at least. This is just to tell you that I am getting on quite well and working almost full speed. There is nothing to worry about myself.

I hope the storm about Agatha and Muriel is entirely over and that the associations between them and you are sweeter than ever.

I have the Parliamentary Board and Working Committee meetings before me. Before this reaches you, you will see some startling announcement. You should not worry about it at all there.

Ba has gone to Sabarmati Harijan Ashram in charge of Ramdas who is going to have treatment there under Dr. Sharma. Ramdas’s health has broken down completely, though there is nothing organically wrong about him. But Ba was anxious about him and offered to go with Ramdas. I was also pleased. Devdas was here and passed a few days with us. Khan Brothers are here and I am having a very nice time with them. To be with them more, is to love them more. They are so nice, so simple and yet so penetrative. They do not beat about the bush.

Love.

480. LETTER TO NURGISBEHN CAPTAIN

September 7, 1934

I have been withholding replies to your letters and Khurshed’s as you had expected none from me and as I had wanted to save as much time and energy as I possibly could. But your last letter demands an answer. I must not postpone it for writing the reply myself.

I see no objection to your using swadeshi yarn for embroidery so long as we cannot procure a hand-spun yarn suitable for embroidery work. My justification for this latitude is this: embroidery is no part of original khadi; but embroidery is simply superadded even as we use sewing thread for preparing clothes, or use even foreign dyes in order to enhance the salability of khadi.

I am glad Khurshed is looking better. When are you proposing to do likewise? Khan Brothers are here and I am having a glorious time with them. I am having quiet discussions with them twice daily for about two hours. They are both free and penetrative.

You will be presently seeing another startling announcement from me. Don’t you be anxious or inquisitive. It is better not to hawk about the proposed decision so that I can safely make the announcement. There is nothing that I can possibly have to withhold from you, but I do not want to write anything about it.

Love to you all. I suppose I must not expect any letter from Jamnabehn.

DEAR SATISBABU,

I have your several letters as also the ink-bottle. I must report to you on the ink later on. Did you prepare it specially for me, or did you prepare it for the general market?

What about Kshitishbabu’s experiment in dried milk? I wonder if he has received my letter1 sent through you. So far as I am aware he has been silent.

Have you yet got charge of the Harijan office? You have asked me for suggestions about welfare scheme for Bengal Harijans. I can’t think of anything special. You must, therefore, refer to Harijan for whatever I had said, and adopt with necessary modifications whatever you may find to be suitable there. Of course your problem is somewhat different from the problem elsewhere. You will carefully study the article2 I have sent to Harijan on tanning.

Are you making progress with your “Guide for Village Workers” on treatment of simple diseases and accidents?

In Onward I see an advertisement on strawboards manufactured by Kuver Board Limited, Mill Department, 84 Clive Street, Calcutta. The advertisement says it is manufactured through Indian capital, Indian labour and Indian material. What are these strawboards? Are they of any use for Yeravda Charkha?

CHI. PURATAN,

I got your letter. If you were not cheated when you parted with the hundred rupees, what else could it be? If you were not cheated, what mistake did you acknowledge? As for myself, I believe that you have been cheated. Would a poor man give away a hundred rupees for the sake of a joke? I am afraid, I have no hope that you will either get the Rs. 100 or the money for the bill. If this does not happen again, let us take it as an easy atonement.

Have we to debit the money which Parikshitlal gave for his board to the Charkha Sangh? We cannot debit it to the Harijan Fund. Have you taken the right amount of rent for their lodging? What is the rate of rent?

Tell Parikshitlal that I have written a letter to a palace official at Lakhtar. Let us see what happens.

Are you keeping fit?

September 7, 1934

CHI. NARAHARI,

I have your letter. You must have got mine.

I have purposely and after due thought sent Ramdas [to the Ashram]. The result lies in God’s hands. Surendra is engrossed in doing his duty there. How could I call him away? Ramdas’s illness is more mental than physical. According to me, the good company that he will get there will itself help like medicine.

Give only such help as you easily can without going out of your way. I have not created new work for you in this.

You may go to the Ashram when you are completely free. I am trying to send you the letter which you require. Why should you feel afraid of Thakkar Bapa? All of us have some idiosyncrasies and we should tolerate one another’s. I am sure you will be able to manage. And in the last resort I am always there.

485. LETTER TO HIRALAL SHARMA

[September 7, 1934]¹

CHI. SHARMA,

I did not mind your not visiting me, rather I appreciated it. I took it that you wished to save my time.²

I do not see much reason for calling the doctor. You ought to know the processes of examining the urine and the stools. But I am sending a letter, you may certainly use it if you want to.

I shall write to Ba and advise her to express her opinions freely. I had already told her to do so. I shall at once inform you of whatever Ba writes to me.

Enquire into the arrangement³ at Jamnagar and write to me. I shall find out the details later and write about it. I quite like your intention of cooking for yourself but you must not be adamant about it. What do you cook?

I shall let you know immediately the news I receive from Phoenix. You can send for Draupadi when it is all fixed up. I had written to her.⁴ If you have gained some experience and things are progressing well so that Ramdas need not at all go to South Africa, Draupadi can be immediately sent for. We shall know something definite on Monday.

Blessings from

[PS.]

It was good that you met Mogheji. The sum of Rs. 152 was deposited in the Ashram that very day. I have enquired about the goods and am awaiting a reply.

486. LETTER TO MOTILAL DEEVD

September 7, 1934

Bhai Motilal Deevda,

I had your telegram. Also your letter. I could not reply promptly for lack of time. Please excuse me. It was not possible to send a wire in reply to the wire.

The matter of . . .’s second marriage is being discussed. The future alone can show what the ultimate outcome will be and, whether or not he will get my blessings as well as his elders’. His present wife, although more than 20, has, because of her illness, the appearance of a twelve year old. She is incapable of bearing children. She heartily consents to . . .’s second marriage. For years she will not be able to lead conjugal life, so she wishes to take up a life of service. If he marries again there is a talk of satisfactory maintenance for her by . . . and his father. . . . feels the need for a wife. I believe it is in conformity with dharma to enable him to lead a restrained married life with a suitable wife. And he should be able to get the blessings of all pious men and women. All this, however, depends upon the purity and restraint of. . . . Nothing will be done in haste. All his kith and kin are keen about preservation of dharma. The best thing for. . . would be to exercise total restraint and overcome his passions. But only one among a million young men can do this. We should all pray to God to grant . . . such strength.

In the interest of. . . , I request you not to publish this letter nor to discuss this matter publicly. If you wish to convey something to me, certainly do so. ¹

Yours,

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I have been regularly getting your letters and also reports about your health. You seem to enjoy God’s kindness in full measure, for the wound is healing more quickly than the doctors had expected. Do not be in the slightest hurry to leave. Leave only after the wound has healed completely. I like your idea of going to Sinhgad. There you will also get Mehta’s help whenever needed. The climate is certainly very good. The water is very light. The place, therefore, will do you much good. Nor is it very far.

Do not talk much. Even when necessary, talk in a low voice and not with a full voice. The effort to speak has always some effect on the ear.

Avoid rice and dal. I am sure that will do you much good. Rely more on milk. Curds should not be even slightly sour. Go on gradually increasing exercise as much as the doctors permit from time to time. Do not worry about anything. If you follow this regimen, it will not only be good for the ear but will also refresh the brain.

Malaviyaji came today. He is accompanied by Radhakant. Ali and Khaliq [uz-Zaman] also have come. The others will come tomorrow.

Khanbhai is very happy. He is with me every morning when I go for a walk and also from 4-5 in the evening. We discuss the problems at leisure one by one.

You must have heard Pagali’s story regarding myself. I do not want to bother you with it now. You may offer your criticism later when you are completely all right. I think you will approve of everything.

Om stays with me all the time and helps as and when required. Four or rather five girls are doing the work which could be done by one or two girls. Each, therefore, gets very little to do. As you know, Prabhavati will not let the other girls do much. Moreover Madalasa also comes to claim her share.

Radhakisan keeps worrying so much because of your instructions that, though he keeps careful watch over me, he is always afraid lest he may be blamed. I do get up very early. I do not need more sleep and I feel light during the day if I have finished my work in the morning. Now the weight will increase slowly. The quantity of food cannot be increased, so what I eat now will increase the weight slowly. I think that is better. Strength is growing steadily. I take a short nap during daytime and am in bed at 8.45 p.m., or at the latest by 9 p.m. Thus nobody can blame me for not taking enough care of my health. I shall be here till you come and even after that. I shall not go anywhere unless there is some reason.

Andrews is returning on Sunday. Kumarappa has taken 20 days’ leave. I will send him back as soon as the period is over. He will arrive here on Tuesday.

The girls seem to be progressing quite well. Vinoba himself supervises everything. I therefore, don’t have to interfere with anything.

488. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

September 8, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS,

I have your letter of the 6th.

I have asked Narahari to inquire into the facts regarding the dairy and let me have his opinion. I will not forget about this matter.

I am still not able to take sufficient rest. I have again started getting up at 2.30. The bed itself pushes me out and I welcome that. It is 3.30 just now. I have started writing this after finishing one to Jamnalal.

I can’t think what to do regarding Chimanlal and Sharda. One thing is clear to me. Sharda’s living with Chimanlal may not be for her good. If her devotion to her father has become her sole passion, she may, though ill herself, sacrifice her health in nursing Chimanlal. We come across many such instances in Europe. I don’t remember to have seen any among us. But the education which we give is certainly likely to produce girls of this type. Such idealism endures only if it grows spontaneously. If Sharda does not possess this spirit, she should have regard for her health and leave Chimanlal. She may come and live here. There are other girls of her age here, and among them there are ten Gujarati girls even, including Vali. The climate also is excellent. I, too, shall be here for some time. In any case my headquarters will continue to be here. There are good arrangements for study, too. It is desirable that one who is ill should not nurse another sick person. Shakaribehn should undertake to look after Chimanlal. The latter should stop eating solid food and live only on milk and fruit. A pure milk-diet has been found to have beneficial effect, but I think such an experiment is too drastic. A mixed diet of milk and fruit is found best. Even if such a diet brings on weakness, I would advise Chimanlal not to mind it but persevere in the experiment patiently. Sharma is at Sabarmati now. He has renounced everything in order to live with Ramdas. That is why he has taken Ramdas with him and gone to Sabarmati. Ba has gone there to look after Ramdas. You may, if you wish, consult Sharma [regarding Chimanlal]; I have had experience of his goodness. I cannot say, though, anything regarding his competence as a doctor. All the same, there can be no harm in consulting him. Milk and fruit, however, are both food and medicine. Anybody who is not benefited by them is hardly likely to be benefited by anything else. Water and sun treatments also should go on at the same time. The chief thing in my advice is the suggestion regarding Sharda. Both of you should please think over it.

My personal needs are being looked after by Prabhavati, Amtussalaam, Vasumati and Om. Amala also does some work. But I am really afraid that she will go off her head one day. She is hardly in her senses. She is growing thinner everyday. And now she has become impatient to marry. I observe that she is not free from passion. In consequence of her trying to suppress it, it has become uncontrollable. She hopes to be mother of twelve children. She is 37 at present. Let us see what she does. I don’t have the courage now to send her to you or somewhere else. She is trying to get a job in some college. I don’t mind if she succeeds by her own efforts. But I don’t intend to recommend her to anybody. I don’t worry, but the fact remains that the responsibility of looking after her has become more difficult.

489. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

September 8, 1934

DEAR SATISBABU,

You have given a dismal picture. But it does not disturb me. The atmosphere will undoubtedly clear up presently. You will have seen my counter-statement about retiring from the Congress. Discussions are going on. So far as I am concerned, I am most anxious to leave the Congress and serve it from being out of it. I have drawn up a statement which I propose to discuss with the Working Committee. You will know the result in due time. The thing that is deeper than the corruption is the fundamental differences between many Congressmen and myself. But let me not anticipate. Let the constructive workers go on with their work.

Constructive workers must not touch any newspaper enterprise, and certainly not at this time. Nor do I agree with you that a paper with balanced views is required at this time. An outspoken paper in the face of the Press laws is an impossibility unless it eschews politics altogether. But that is not what you mean. You want something to counterbalance the poisons. That means having to deal with politics also.

How much ink have you prepared? What is the use of distributing things gratis unless it is for advertisement?

I hope Hemprabha is going on well.

I hope you have a good wife and that you are happy. If she is educated, if she can write, let her do so.

I understand that you have financial difficulties. The only advice I can give you is: “Do not borrow.” What honestly and industriously you find, you will take and keep up father’s reputation. The real capital young men need is a good body, a good character and tireless industry.

I shall wait for Parthasarathy’s and Sesamae’s letters. You should continue to write to me.

September 8, 1934

MY DEAR RAMACHANDRAN.

I have not been able to answer your enquiry earlier. Gandhi Seva Sangh is just now undergoing a thorough overhauling and is about to adopt some drastic changes. The allowances made hitherto had been on a liberal scale. But it is being radically revised. And then if these changes are to come into force, Jamnalalji is not taking any part in it. He is still undergoing treatment in Bombay and would not be able to attend to regular work before a few months perhaps. He has got to take rest in a quiet place before he resumes normal activity. CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your letter.

I knew that the important letter which I wrote to you would certainly put you in difficulty. I think what I expected you to do was unreasonable. I was plainly guilty of violence. But I thought it would be a great trouble to re-write such a long letter, and this desire to spare myself increased the magnitude of my violence. God knows how many times I must be committing such violence everyday. The path of renunciation of work was discovered to save us from such dangers. But only one person out of ten million can follow it. Can a person who does nothing outwardly but whose mind is always busy be regarded as observing non-violence? For us, therefore, the only course is to go on working and committing errors and to strive all the time to remain inactive inwardly and reduce the number of our errors from day to day.

I have wired to Kanu and told him that he may come, so that his days may not be wasted. It seems my letters take four days to reach you.

I am sending to you a letter which I have received from the Superintendent at Dhulia. It will be sent by book post. I have just given it to Vinoba to read.

I have still not received Mathuradas’s reply. Lilavati may certainly come here in the vacation. I know her very well. Her unsteadiness is incurable.

The women are doing well as teachers. Even if only 50 per cent of them became permanent here, the Bal Mandir will run well.

499. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

September 11, 1934

CHI. MATHURADAS,

You have completed 40 years. Does it not mean that out of the 100 years 40 years are gone? If we reckon the years in this way, we can also say that as time passes our span of life becomes shorter. Live your remaining 60 years as you did your 40 and add to the sum of your achievements so far.

You must not imagine that I have time to indulge in unnecessary talk with Nariman or anyone else. My time is as occupied as you have so far known it to be. God is sustaining me.

Who can send you letters now? Mahadev is wholly tied up. So is Pyarelal. Nor does Prithuraj find time in the midst of his work. That leaves the young women. Your hunger should be satisfied. Let me see.

You have not sent me your book on karmayoga. But I chanced upon it. I read it every day in the library. I shall finish it in a few days. I like the work. You have tried to say a lot in a few pages. This will make it difficult for the uninformed. The binding is bad. What is the demand it has elicited? Does Vicharsrishti sell?

500. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

September 11, 1934

CHI. BRIJKRISHNA,

I have your letter. The last two letters received from Damodardas have been sent on to you. I find something quite different in them. He says there is some misunderstanding on your part. Or is it mine? You yourself must write to Damodardas, and me, too, what precisely you told me. This, now, cuts the ground away from under any charge against Keshu, Santok and Radha. The words you quoted from the letter of Damodardas also are rendered insignificant. You remember, do you not? I am nervous. I am behaving contrary to my nature. How can I remain at peace while I harbour the least doubt about Santok and others? And how can I disbelieve what you have told me? I have no knowledge at all as to when I shall go to Bombay. Possibly I may go in October during the Congress session. And there will be no time then for talking to Damodardas.

I hope you are keeping well there and there has been no recurrence of fever.

If you have money enough to send to Radha, why can you not send to me? On the one hand your brothers are under debt, it is not known if the house ever will be saved or not, yet you are capable of shouldering the burden of Radha’s expenses! Don’t you know that Radha is provided for? There has never been any trouble in meeting her expenses. You may certainly help me if you wish to. Are you asking for my permission to send money to Radha over and above her present allowance? If so, why?

[On or before September 12, 1934]

Lord of humility, dwelling in the little pariah hut, help us to search for Thee throughout that fair land watered by Ganges, Brahmaputra and Jumna. Give us receptiveness, give us openheartedness, give us Thy humility, give us the ability and willingness to identify ourselves with the masses of India.

O God, who does help only when man feels utterly humble, grant that we may not be isolated from the people we would serve as servants and friends. Let us be embodiments of self-sacrifice, embodiments of godliness, humility personified, that we may know the land better and love it more.

MY DEAR BROTHER,

It is just 3 a.m. This is the first letter I take up after mouth wash. My whole heart goes out to you all. Who am I to judge your delicate and domestic affairs? You have granted me the unique privilege of knowing your secrets. I may not abuse it. I do not know the implications of the actualities as they happen. But this mute warfare must cease, if you and Raihana are to have peace. If I were you, I would either let her have her way ungrudgingly and joyously or give her a separate house and maintenance and let her have her way. She is too much of an invalid to be left to her own resources. I should not bother about Hamida, she is no freak like Raihana. Raihana has no marriage in store for her. So far as I am aware she is a stranger to the sensuous passion. I wish I could give you a cheery letter, but I cannot. Having read this you would do as [the] Great Spirit guides you.

With deep love to you all.

September 12, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

In continuation of my letter to you regarding your complaint about the Sholapur Dispensary, I have now a letter from the Secretary of the Harijan Sevak Sangh, Maharashtra Board, from which I find that the grant was being voted and was given only after Thakkar Bapa had inspected everything and satisfied himself about it. In the circumstances the only thing that I can say to you is that if you are not satisfied with this recommendation, you have to write to the President of the Central Board at Delhi. As you may know, I have no official status in the Sangh. My connection therefore is purely moral. It is only on rare occasions that I tender my advice to the Board. In this connection I don’t feel called upon to do anything beyond what I have done.

507. LETTER TO SAUDAMINI MEHTA

September 12, 1934

CHI. SAUDAMINI,

I got your letter.

I agree with you that if I knew as much about . . .’s case as I do about . . .’s, my opinion would perhaps soften. I made the remarks in question when I read . . .’s defence and . . .’s outpouring of her grief. However, if I became more intimate with all the persons involved, I would perhaps have a better understanding of their points of view. The conclusion to be drawn from this is that before criticizing anybody’s action one must go deep into the matter. Since this is not easy to do, the golden rule is not to criticize anybody. I know how to follow this rule and rarely criticize people, though it is true of course that I occasionally pass hasty criticism on persons with whom I am connected in some way. I am still not free from that measure of attachment. Such subtle attachments cannot be overcome by an act of will. They weaken gradually through prolonged effort.

Let me give you some more information about . . .’s case. Even today all his elders except . . . are against his marrying again. If I had not supported his intention, the idea of second marriage would have been abandoned. I came to know . . . first. The moment I saw her, I felt that a girl like her was unfit for conjugal life and that she would never be able to satisfy . . . sexually. Before I came to know her and take interest in her life, she used to tremble in . . .’s presence, talked with none and always wore an unhappy look. Now she talks frankly with everybody and can even joke. She expresses her views quite freely. She and . . . gave me their letters to read. The sole cause of her worry is the fact that . . . has not taken another wife. As long as he has not done so, she does not feel herself safe in her relations with him and with their elders. Other members of the family keep taunting her for her inability to satisfy. . . . She, on her part, being a loving girl, keeps thinking about her inability and feels miserable. I doubt if you have come across any other instance like hers. Being a woman yourself, you can certainly claim to know a woman’s heart better than I do. But as against that I can claim many years’ longer experience than yours. Though a man, I have been striving for many years to reach women’s heart, cultivating and preserving complete passionlessness. As a result, I have had intimate knowledge of the lives of hundreds of women of every class and religion and of different countries of the world. I know of several instances in which women urged their husbands to marry again. This is not a peculiarity of Hindu women. You will perhaps be surprised to know that such instances are to be found in England also.

1 Vide “Letter to B. J. Marathey”, 6-9-1934
2 Vide the preceding item.
3 This and other names have been omitted.

I have a motive in writing such a long letter to you even under all this pressure of work. I am pleased that you have taken interest in this matter. . . . had been after me. She also had expressed her pain. I have promised her that I would welcome a deputation of women headed by her and put this case before them. For me this is an issue of dharma. It is one of my experiments in truth. I feel no shame about what I am doing. I am not taking interest in this case because of the bond of friendship. This is part of my service of women. I think of . . . as a helpless cow. I should like to protect her as much as I can. I want the help of you women in that task. That is, if in the name of dharma I am in fact yielding to self-delusion of any kind and following a course contrary to dharma, please wake me up and save me. If, therefore, you can keep up your interest in this case, meet . . . and discuss the matter with her and then three or four of you may come and see me. I will put my case before you and listen to what you have to say. I am not concerned with what happens to . . . or . . . as individuals. Such cases will always arise. Ill-matched unions are no rarity in this country. I have told . . . that when her body has developed and grown to the size natural for her age and if she feels sexual desire then and wishes to remarry, I will be ready to help her at any cost to myself. If, however, despite . . . having married a second time she prefers to live with him and if . . . is inclined to agree to that, I shall be helpless . . . ’s father would of course desire that she should share his bed even though he might have another wife. My effort is to save both of them from such a position. This is a very complicated case. In solving it I shall be solving many problems. I, therefore, do not mind giving my time to it.

I don’t know if I am imposing an unwelcome burden on you through this letter. If you do not wish to go so deep into the matter, you need not reply to it. Please consider the letter to have been written by me more for my satisfaction than for yours. I seem to feel that I know my dharma, but I am always liable to err in my reasoning. I, therefore, cling to any person who points out my error. This has saved me from many errors.

508. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI

WARDHA,
3.30 a.m., September 12, 1934

CHI. RAMDAS,

Your wire has scared me. I at once wired Dr. Kanuga that he might remove you to whichever hospital he thought best. Vallabhbhai was with me when I sent the wire. I mentioned a hospital at his suggestion.

God will restore you. Keep repeating the name of Him Whose you are considered to be, that is, to Whom your name signifies you are dedicated. Know that Ramanama is the only remedy that never fails. There is no remedy like peace of mind. Who has ever escaped birth, death, old age and disease? They are inseparable from the body. If, however, they are all equal in our eyes, all the four will be the same to us in spite of their being different.

Now that you have started treatment under a doctor continue it. Sharma may give you company and nurse you. But as he has now learnt humility, he will not mind your being looked after by a doctor. He may even welcome it. You cannot go to S. A. till you are fully recovered. The passport also will take some time. It will be in my hands at the earliest on the 23rd. You will get a boat ten days after that. That is quite a long time by our reckoning. By that time you will have perhaps completely recovered. This fever may eventually remove all the poison from your body. I do not worry as Ba is also there. Had she not been with you, both of us would have been very nervous at a time like this.

509. LETTER TO RAGHUVIR NARAYAN SINGH

September 12, 1934

BHAICHOWDHRIJI,

I had your letter. I withheld the reply till the Working Committee had met. In my opinion, we cannot, under any circumstance, apply for the release. But I hear that the application is only a formality and release will be granted for certain. If this is correct and you are so inclined, you may apply. But under no condition should the application be sent up if there is the slightest doubt about its acceptance. It is also implied that in case of rejection of any one application all are to be withdrawn. The announcement of the Provincial Board should be awaited.

510. LETTER TO HIRALAL SHARMA

September 12, 1934

CHI. SHARMA,

Your letter. I also saw your letter to Prabhavati regarding the keys.

I was already apprehensive about catching fever. Anyway, it is now a fact and I hope it will be only to the good. I was quite right to get him treated by the doctors. You have to be patient. The doctor’s instructions must be adhered to, you have only to turn yourself into a nurse and follow them. This augurs well in every way. God alone controls the results. I must get a letter from you daily.

For the time being, how can I even mention south Africa? But I shall keep up the effort of clearing the way and we shall wait and watch.

511. LETTER TO HIRALAL SHARMA

September 13, 1934

CHI. SHARMA,

I read your letter after cleaning my teeth. I could not go through the whole of it yesterday. Such is my plight these days! I have replied to your wire of yesterday.¹ The same answer holds for today too. Be patient. If you move from there, Ramdas’s health will deteriorate. This is my opinion from a distance. Surendra is there on the spot, his advice must be followed. What I mean is that you should be a silent nurse. As long as Ramdas is happy with you, you must remain at his side even facing the insults of the doctors. Go on informing of all the developments. Tolerate Ba. I had forewarned you about the developments there. It will be good even now to send Kanu here. But in all this you must be guided by Surendra. Being far away, I am in a quandary.

I am aware that people are scared of me. That is why I want to dissociate myself from the Congress and for the same reason I like to live away from people; but all this cannot be forced. Everything will be as God wills. Your last remark is wholly right. Who am I to become responsible for the destiny of India or of any man?

But despite this, my ignorant attachment may be pushing me unwittingly into such illusions.

If, after considering all circumstances, you think you must leave Ramdas, you should visit me on your way. We shall then discuss about Draupadi and the children. I too am concerned with their welfare. But we shall not be hasty in anything, we shall discuss the future too.

512. MORE ON SWADESHI

I would like to resume the thread of my remarks on swadeshi in the Harijan of 10th August.¹ Take the special occupations of Harijans. There is a meaning behind the over two thousand Harijan castes. Most of them denote their respective occupations—basket-making, broom-making, rope-weaving, durri-weaving, etc. If a complete list was made of them, they would make an imposing list. They are occupations which either need encouragement, or should be deliberately destroyed if they are useless or unprofitable. But who is to decide whether they are profitable or unprofitable, useless or otherwise? If there was a true swadeshi organization, if would be its duty to find out the truth about all these innumerable handicrafts and interest themselves in these craftsmen. The ink with which I am writing comes from Tenali. It supports about 12 workers. It is making headway against odds. I had three more specimens sent to me by different makers, all no doubt struggling like the Tenali group. They interested me. I entered into correspondence with them. But I could do no more for them. A swadeshi organization will examine the samples of these inks in a scientific manner and guide them and encourage the most promising ones. It is a good and growing industry, requiring expert chemical knowledge.

¹ Vide “Swadeshi”, 6-8-1934
In Cawnpore, a man sent me samples of the paper his friend was manufacturing in a village nearby. I enquired into the concern. It supports about nine men. The paper was stout and glossy. However, it was not good enough for writing. Men engaged in the manufacture are eking out the barest livelihood. The skill is supplied by an old man nearing the crematorium. The whole concern may perish with him, if it is not properly guided. I was told that, if there were enough orders, the paper could be supplied at the same cost as the mill–made article. I know that hand-made paper can never supply the daily growing demand for paper. But lovers of the seven hundred thousand villages and their handicrafts will always want to use hand-made paper, if it is easily procurable. Those who use hand-made paper know that it has a charm of its own. Who does not know the famous Ahmedabad paper? What mill-made paper can beat it in durability or polish!

The account books of the old style are still made of that paper. But it is probably a perishing industry like many such others. With a little encouragement, it ought never to perish. If there was supervision, the processes might be improved and the defects that are to be noticed with some of this hand-made paper may be easily removed. The economic condition of the numberless people engaged in these little known trades is well worth investigating. They will surely allow themselves to be guided and advised and feel thankful to those who would take interest in them.

I hope I have given enough illustrations to show how vast and uncultivated this field of true swadeshi is. It is capable of limitless expansion and of producing, without any capital outlay, new wealth in the country and providing honourable employment to those who are today starving for want of it.

513. WHY NOT ‘HARIJAN’?

TO

THE EDITOR, “HARIJAN”

SIR,

I was rather pained to find that the keen intellect of Mr. Mahadev Desai missed the real point involved in the representation made by “some friends who met Gandhiji claiming to be representatives of the Harijans or rather ‘Depressed Classes’ as they preferred to call them” (See Harijan of August 10, ’34, p. 206, col. 2). The “bad odour” attaching to the term ‘Depressed Classes’ is a surety of its ultimate extinction and complete disappearance along with the development of consciousness amongst these classes leading to the unification and consequent solidification of the general Hindu community at large, which, we all know, is the aim of Gandhiji in his great and unique endeavour. But the sweetness of the term “Harijan” is likely to perpetuate the gulf between them and the savarna Hindus, which is surely not desired by Gandhiji. This point should have been noticed by Mr. Mahadev Desai, whose use of the adjective ‘curious’ appears to be remarkable and at the same time regrettable, coming as it does from one of the closest associates of Gandhiji.

I myself feel interested in the matter as one belonging to this great class, but feel indifferent to the appellation that others may choose to give, excepting, of course, the result it is likely to have on the future positon of the great community in the large Hindu fold.

Will you kindly show this to Mr. Mahadev Desai?

I am, etc.,

H. K. MULLICK

Mahadev Desai has passed the foregoing to me. I know Sjt. Mullick, as I had the pleasure of meeting him in Calcutta during the recent visit. I can share his nervousness and his preference for an odious appellation so long as the stigma of untouchability persists. But I invite Sjt. Mullick to enter into the feeling of reformers who have no untouchability in them and who, therefore, have a horror of using an odious name for those whom they love and are eager to serve to the best of their ability. Add to this the fact that tens of thousands of untouchables do not like the words achhut, asprishya and the like and that they do like the word ‘Harijan’. The aim of us all is the

1 Vide “Discussion with Represent same—total extinction of untouchability. When that happy day arrives, either the word ‘Harijan’ will disappear or we shall all be proud to be called Harijans—devotees of God—deserving to be so described, having been free of the virus of high and low.

_Harijan_, 14-9-1934

514. NOT ARGUMENT, BUT EXPERIENCE

For me non-violence, like Truth, is my eternal creed for every activity. That I often fail to act up to it in many activities in my dealings with the sub-human family proves my weakness; it cannot and does not affect the truth of the creed or my faith in it. I am but a weak aspirant ever failing, ever trying. My failures make me more vigilant than before and intensify my faith. I can see with the eye of faith that the observance of the twin doctrine of Truth and Non-violence has possibilities of which we have but a very inadequate conception. If these two should pervade the whole of our being, how much more in the purely religious war against untouchability? I, therefore, gladly share with Harijan workers the following extracts from an intimate letter received from an American friend who discloses the working of his mind and declares his faith in non-violence achieved, though, perhaps, not yet fully, after laborious search:

You may have gathered from my last conversation with you that I was turning from my faith in the principle of non-violence. I had been troubled by doubts concerning this principle, and that was why I wanted so much to talk with you. I think that was very foolish of me, for, it should be evident that great moral and spiritual truths can never have their validity established through arguments. They have to be tested in the fire of experience, which I have not done in my own life to any large extent. I am persuaded that it would require a much stricter discipline than I have yet known for me to prove by my own experience that non-violence is eternally true.

But I am able to accept it as one of the great fundamentals of my faith by my observation of the fruits it has produced in the lives of others. To associate intimately with such men as Rajendrababu is a privilege for which one may thank God. I have seen that he and several others whom I might mention, who have accepted the principle of non-violence in their own lives, have been able to purify themselves from all the greed, the lust, the self-seeking, the hatred, the fear which obsesses so many who have caught a vision of a glorious future but are obstructed by these enemies within the gates from fighting successfully with the enemy without. It is not what non-violence has done to those who oppose you that is to me significant, but what it has done for you and that very small minority who have in their hearts become non-violent. Since I believe this is a moral universe, it must follow, as night follows day, that such development of character can never arise out of experiments with falsehood, and, by the same token, I believe that Jesus is right, at least in the long run, when he says that “they who take the sword will perish by the sword”.

... I am certain that the only virtue which you need to exercise for the ultimate success of your struggle is that of patience.

... So far as your own leadership in India is concerned, you did not develop your qualities of leadership in a day, nor were you born with these qualities. I consider that you are the product of a long discipline of supreme loyalty to truth as you saw it and that you have arrived at your present position through a long and arduous experience. While Europeans may be untrained in the exercise of non-violence, I do not think human nature is essentially different in Europe from that of India, and the only way they can learn non-violence is through practice. There are bound to be many failures, many heart-breaks, many defeats, as has been true and is still true in your case. But if it is truth, it can never be forsaken.

Harijan, 14-9-1934

515. ALMOST LIKE HARIJANS

An Andhra graduate who has married a devadasi writes:

I wanted to write to you long ago. But I was awfully shy. Thank God! I am at last confiding my burden to you.

I come from the devadasi community. My life was socially a torture. Gandhiji, do you think there is any other profession worse than that of the dancing girls in the universe? Is it not a blot on India that prostitution should personify in a community?

Andhradesa, I think, is the heart of this evil. Hindu society here engages dancing girls—especially during marriages and festivals of the deity—to sing obscene songs accompanied by obscene gestures before the pious deity and sets a bad example before the newly-wed couple.

The misery of a whole community consigned to a life of prostitution is great. Young men here are trying their best to root out this evil. But they badly need help and guidance. Won’t you kindly take up this matter as equally

1 Omissions as in the source
2 ibid
important and emergent as the Harijan movement? Please have this affair always in a corner of your heart and give it publicity. You have not only the Congress, but the whole public opinion at your back. What the Brothels Bill and the I.P.C. could not do I am confident that a word from your mouth would do.

I am legally and religiously married to a girl of my own community and I am a father of two daughters. My wife is as pious in my eyes as any other Hindu wife. Still society looks down upon us. The sins of our ancestors and wreaking vengeance on us. The stigma of prostitution is attached to us, though both of us are free from the vice.

Harijans and devadasis are the only two communities which are almost in the same degree of depravity. Of course, they will have to help themselves to moral elevation. Still a teacher like you would educate them and the society more quickly than they can do it for themselves. These are two sister movements. Please don’t forget the sister community in your enthusiasm for the Harijans.

I wish I had the ability he ascribes to me. I am painfully conscious of my limitations. The correspondent is perhaps unaware that, when I was editing Young India, I used constantly to refer to the devadasi institution and prostitution in general. But my effort did not root out the evil. It would only bring relief in individual cases. If I now refer to the question in the pages of Harijan, it is not because I have any hope of faring better than I did during the Young India days. I shall be pleased if this fresh effort brings relief in individual cases.

The correspondent is quite right in likening devadasis to Harijans. Nevertheless, he will recognize the difference there is between the two. But it is waste of time to measure the degree of difference in wretchedness. Like untouchability, this institution for the perpetuation of vice must go, if Hinduism is to be purified. Those who are engaged in the noble task of ridding society of the evil will have to work in a systematic manner and not become dispirited if they do not find their effort crowned with success at once. Let them concentrate on the evil immediately surrounding them. There are two ways of working at the problem. These should be work amongst those who employ devadasis for their base end and the devadasi community itself. If the latter will refuse to serve society’s vice, the system ends at once. But the process is not quite so simple. Hunger knows no sin. Even like Drona and Bhishma, devadasis point to their bellies in justification of sin. Habit has dulled their sense of sin regarding their calling. Therefore, they have to be found an innocent source of livelihood in the place of prostitution. Then, there is work in the society. Festival and marriage parties in which devadasis are employed have to be sought out and those in charge reasoned with. Reformers may not dictate reform to society. They will have to appeal to its reason and heart. In a way, all reform is a kind of education, just as essential as the education which is commonly known as such. Hence it is a science by itself and yields results only when systematically pursued.

The correspondent who has dared to marry a devadasi deserves to be congratulated. He should be satisfied with the approbation of his own conscience and live down the prejudice against him and his wife.

As you know there is a life-and-death struggle between the Congress and the Government. It is the duty of the Congress at the present juncture to keep Depressed Classes outside the fray which they cannot be, if they are invited to become full-fledged Congressmen determined to carry out the national programme as it may be determined from time to time. The best policy for the Congress, therefore, is to keep Depressed Classes out of the political arena. Is that all right?

But I hope to obtain part of this amount from Dhulia. If I succeed, we shall credit it to the Cow-protection Society, but it seems right to me that the Society should meet Parnerkar’s requirements. Let me know whether you agree with this view.

I am writing to Sheth Mathuradas.

Read my letter to Lilavati and pass it on to her. I have already made my suggestion regarding Chimanlal. I still adhere to it.

Ramdas had an attack of malaria in Sabarmati. He is better now.

I understood from Kanu’s last letter that he was perfectly happy there. If he wishes to come here, send him over as soon as you get this letter. What will he get from me, though? His study will be neglected. There will be nothing but hard work for him here. There is so much work that nobody gets any free time. If he can look upon work itself as study and be content, he may certainly come. Even if he merely wants to have some experience and see for himself how things are, I will not mind. Bal got tired; Kanti was wise and on his own did not come and Prithuraj is getting ready to leave. From all these instances I have come to the conclusion that only a few persons, who have had sufficient education to satisfy their ambition, can stay with me for any length of time. I would be happy if it is different with Kanu. I see my own imperfection in the fact that young people soon get tired of living with me and leave. But I don’t know exactly the reason why they do so.

CHI. JAMNA,

I got your letter. Equanimity of mind cannot be learnt from anybody. One can cultivate it by constantly keeping it before one’s mind when acting. Rather than overstrain yourself, you should spend some money in engaging a servant whom you can treat as a member of the family. You ought not to put any burden on Devbhabhi. I see some discontent regarding Santok. You should tell her about it and then suffer it. This, too, you can do by engaging a servant. It is part of the teaching of the Gita that one should endure what is inescapable.

CHI. JAYAPRAKASH,

I have your telegram. Prabhavati is going but not happily. She has decided that she will cheer you up and come away again soon. When your first telegram came I told her that she should go at once. But she did not agree and wrote to you. She waited a long time for your answer, but there was no answer to the very last moment. Then when your telegram to me arrived, I decided that it was my duty to persuade Prabha to go.

Prabha’s difficulty is that she made a promise to Mirabehn that she would do the work that Mirabehn did till the latter returned. Later Ba also went away after extracting another promise from Prabha—for she knew about your telegram. Prabha told Ba that she could go and promised her that she would not leave till Ba returned. Still, since the work consisted of serving me I told Prabha not to worry about me but go. She is a little troubled as she goes.

1 The name has been omitted.

Another thing is that you have both decided that Prabha should serve in the Kanya Ashram for five years. She should not get out of this. It is as well that she has not yet taken up this work. But how can she give it up?

However, concerning all these matters I am neutral. I have no right to come between you two. I only regret that the education that Prabha has got from me does not have your entire approval. But that education cannot go waste. What she has assimilated is now part of her. You can now strike at her heart as many blows as you like. I have told Prabha not to pay any heed to my advice but to do as her heart and her reasoning dictate.

I have your sweet and pure-hearted letter. Since I was hoping that you would be coming here I did not answer it. I am conscious of the regard and esteem in which you hold me. We shall talk when we meet.

My commitment for paying you stands. I have made an arrangement about it with Ghanshyamdasji too. It was you who had raised the question of moral dilemma. It is you who must take a decision. We shall do as you say.

I hope you are in good health.

524. LETTER TO G. V. MAVALANKAR

September 15, 1934

BHAISHRI MAVALANKAR,

I have your letter.

There is no connection between the Vidyapith library and Kaka’s idea of leaving Gujarat. If the original Trustees had no right to hand over the library, its gift would remain illegal even if made at a meeting attended by all. If you think that the Trustees had a right to make the gift, I believe Sardar wishes to take no action regarding Kaka’s other error. Being one of the Trustees, he only wants to know what his duty is. I don’t think anything can be said about that. But personally I wouldn’t blame Kaka for this ignorance of law if it is such.

The serious error committed by Kaka, may be unintentionally, was that, though he had not secured the consent of the Trustees, he allowed a sentence implying that it had been secured to stand in the letter\(^1\) to the Collector. Kaka decided to atone for this carelessness by resigning from all the trusts. Sardar has had nothing to do with this.

However, Kaka’s resignation only solved the moral problem and has no connection whatever with the question of whether or not he should remain in Gujarat. He has been waiting for a long time to run away from Gujarat. We need not go into the reasons for that. But the final decision whether he should leave or not rests with me. Sardar will have had no part in it. I will not let Kaka run away. He will leave only if I feel helpless. You and other co-workers, however, should have no worry or fear.

You should merely give your professional opinion as a lawyer as to the legal loophole.

APPENDICES
APPENDIX I
RESOLUTION ON WHITE PAPER AND COMMUNAL AWARD

The following is the authorized report of the Working Committee resolution on the policy of Congress regarding the White Paper proposals and the Communal Award:

The Congress Parliamentary Board having asked the Working Committee to enunciate the Congress policy on the White Paper proposals and the Communal Award, the Working Committee declares the Congress policy on these matters as follows:

The White Paper in no way expresses the will of the people of India, has been more or less condemned by almost all the Indian political parties, and falls far short of the Congress goal, if it does not retard the progress towards it. The only satisfactory alternative to the White Paper is a constitution drawn up by a Constituent Assembly, elected on the basis of adult suffrage or as near it as possible, with the power, if necessary, to the important minorities to have their representatives elected exclusively by the electors belonging to such minorities.

The White Paper lapsing, the Communal Award must lapse automatically. Among other things it will be the duty of the Constituent Assembly to determine the method of representation of important minorities and make provisions for otherwise safeguarding their interests.

Since, however, the different communities in the country are sharply divided on the question of the Communal Award, it is necessary to define the Congress attitude on it. The Congress claims to represent equally all the communities composing the Indian Nation and, therefore, in view of division of opinion it can neither accept nor reject the Communal Award as long as the division of opinion lasts. At the same time it is necessary to redeclare the policy of the Congress on the Communal question.

No solution that is not purely national can be propounded by the Congress. But the Congress is pledged to accept any solution falling short of the national, which is agreed to by all the parties concerned, and, conversely to reject and solution which is not agreed to by any of the said parties.

Judged by the national standard the Communal Award is wholly unsatisfactory besides being open to serious objection on other grounds.

It is, however, obvious that the only way to prevent untoward consequences of the Communal Award is to explore the ways and means of arriving at an agreed solution and not by any appeal on this essentially domestic question to the British Government or any other outside authority.

June 22, 1934

DEAR MAHATMAJI,

The people in the Indian States desire to ascertain your individual opinion on certain matters affecting themselves, so that we may move the Congress to consider, in the light of your opinion, the desirability of defining its policy on certain questions more precisely than at present and modifying it somewhat on certain others.

The first question that we would bring to your notice in this connection is the necessity of the Congress taking up for solution problems pertaining to the States. The Congress has now given up its traditional policy of “keeping itself unsullied” from the States. It recruits members in the States and brings them under the control of its district and provincial committees. The accession of strength that it has thus received from the States is by no means negligible; nor are these members sleeping partners in the Congress activities, although these activities concern mostly British India alone. On the other hand, even in such movements as civil disobedience, they have proved good comrades-in-arms and have cheerfully borne their share of the burden, realizing that British India and Indian India are essentially one and indivisible and that the concerns of one are necessarily the concerns of the other also.

We think that time has now arrived for the Congress to respond to this spirit of good comradeship exhibited by the States’ people by putting all its weight and prestige behind their efforts at self-emancipation. At the Madras (1927) and Calcutta (1928) sessions the Congress no doubt pleaded for the establishment of democratic swaraj in the Indian States and extended its sympathy to the inhabitants thereof. The Calcutta resolution is well worth quoting here in extenso.

Vide “Letter to N. C. Kelkar”, 2-7-1934
The Congress urges no the ruling Princes of the Indian States to introduce responsible government based on representative institutions in the States, and to issue immediately proclamations or enact laws guaranteeing elementary and fundamental rights of citizenship, such as rights of association, free speech, free Press and security of person and property.

This Congress further assures the people of the Indian states of its sympathy with and support in their legitimate and peaceful struggle for the attainment of full responsible government in the States.

We make no doubt that a similar resolution will be reiterated at the sessions that will be held hereafter. But may we not hope that the Congressmen in British Indian will lend active help to the people in the Indian States in achieving political freedom even as the Congressmen in Indian India gave a measure of help to British Indians in their attempts to realize their destiny? Of the two, British Indians are much the more advanced, but in fact help has flown far more from the States’ people to British Indians than from British Indians to the States’ people. Do you not think it desirable to advise British Indians, in the name of the Congress to support actively, even by undergoing suffering if necessary, all legitimate movements for the establishment of popular government in the Indian States under the aegis of their rulers? Such comradeship shown on both sides, it appears to us, will cement the two Indians far more firmly than any formal federation can.

Another question, of even greater urgency, on which the Congress must determine its policy is its attitude towards those parts of the White Paper scheme which relate to the Indian States. The authorities of the Congress have declared the scheme to be unacceptable because it does not satisfy the aspirations of the Indian people. May we say that the provisions concerning the States are far from acceptable to the States’ people and may we hope that the actual acceptance or otherwise of these provisions will be made to depend upon their wishes? The future constitution of India which, according to the Congress intentions, is to take the place of the White Paper constitution, will be based upon the principle of self-determination given effect to by a Constituent Assembly. Is it implied that the federal scheme that will be evolved by this Assembly will be the result of an agreement between the people in British India on the one hand and those in the Indian States on the other?

While on this subject it would be well to refer to the apprehensions that have arisen in the mind of the Indian States’ people by some passages in your speeches at the Round Table Conference. You pleaded earnestly in this Conference with the rulers of the Indian States for allowing the States representatives in the Federal Legislature to be chosen by election and for allowing the fundamental rights of the States’ people to be written into the federal constitution and placed under the protection of the Federal Court. But your pledings on this occasion have given rise to an impression that if the Princes did not agree, as they did not and they do not agree, you would accept a constitution in which provisions of the kind that you suggested did not find a place. If this impression is well-founded, we cannot help saying, and saying it straightout, that you have done a grave wrong to the States’ people. If you think that nomination by the Princes, for instance, must be acquiesced in, if necessary, in the existing circumstances, we will only beg you to refer the matter to the States’ people themselves in order to ascertain what their wishes are in this respect. The right of self-determination of the Indian States’ people is no less sacred than that of British Indians.

But it has been explained to us that in expressing your views in favour of the election of the States’ representatives and the protection of the fundamental rights of the States’ people in the way you did, you wished it to be understood by the rulers of the States that if they did not agree to do what you urged upon them, you would not admit them into the federation. You meant these to be essential conditions of federation, but you did not express yourself in this categorical manner only because, at the time you spoke, federation was still shrouded in uncertainty. If this be your meaning, we would entreat you to make it clear beyond the possibility of doubt, for we know that the rulers of the States are putting a different interpretation upon what you said. They are representing that you are ready to put up with nomination by the Princes, for instance, for an indefinite length of time. It is necessary that your meaning should be made plain, for the Swarajist Conference at Ranchi made it known that their party (which is now only a wing of the Congress) would follow the lines of your speeches in framing the future constitution. Since, in the final determination of the Congress policy on these points your personal views plays such a decisive part, we are anxious to know whether election of the States’ people and Declaration of Rights in their interest are, in your opinion, merely desirable features of a federation or essential conditions thereof. There are various other matters connected with the federal constitution which require careful consideration on the part of the Congress, but we do not wish to trouble you with them at the present moment. We would only beg you to give us an unequivocal statement of your views on the point raised in this letter.

Yours sincerely,
(SD.) N. C. Kelkar and Others

APPENDIX III

RESOLUTION ON SWADESHI

Doubts having arisen on the Congress policy in regard to swadeshi, it has become necessary to reaffirm the Congress position on it in unequivocal terms.

Notwithstanding what was done during the civil resistance struggle, no competition is permissible on Congress platform and in Congress exhibitions between mill-made cloth and hand-spun and hand-woven khadi. Congressmen are expected to use and encourage the use of only hand-spun and hand-woven khadi, to the exclusion of any other cloth.

In regard to articles other than cloth, the Working Committee adopts the following formula for the guidance of all Congress organizations:

The Working Committee is of opinion that the activities of Congress organizations relating to swadeshi shall be restricted to useful articles manufactured in India through cottage and other small industries which are in need of popular education for their support, and which will accept the guidance of the Congress organizations in regulating prices and in the matter of the wages and welfare of labour under their control.

This formula must not be interpreted to mean any modification of the unbroken policy of the Congress to promote the swadeshi spirit in the country and to encourage the personal use of only swadeshi articles. The formula is a recognition of the fact that the large and organized industries which can or do command State aid are in no need of the services of Congress organizations or any Congress effort in their behalf.

APPENDIX IV

RESOLUTION ON DISCIPLINE

All Congressmen, whether they believe in the Congress programme and policies or not, are expected, and office-bearers and members of the Executive are in honour bound, to carry them out, and that office-bearers and members of the Executive who carry on propaganda or act against the Congress programme and policies are, in accordance with the rules made by the A.I.C.C. dated May 24, 1929, under Article of the Constitution, clearly guilty of breach of discipline and liable to disciplinary action.

LETTER FROM JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

ANAND BHAWAN, ALLAHABAD,

August 13, 1934

MY DEAR BAPU,

After just six months of absolute seclusion and little exercise I have felt rather lost in the anxiety, excitement and activity of the past 27 hours. I feel very tired. I am writing this letter to you at midnight. All day there have been crowds of people coming. If I have the chance I shall write to you again, but I doubt if I shall be able to do so for some months. I am, therefore, going to indicate to you briefly how I have reacted to the various major Congress decisions of the last five months or so. My sources of information have naturally been strictly limited but I think that they were sufficient to enable me to form a fairly correct idea of the general trend of events.

When I heard that you had called off the C. D. movement I felt unhappy. Only the brief announcement reached me at first. Much later I read your statement and this gave me one of the biggest shocks I have ever had. I was prepared to reconcile myself to the withdrawal of C.D. But the reasons you gave for doing so and the suggestions you made for future work astounded me. I had a sudden and intense feeling, that something broke inside me, a bond that I had valued very greatly had snapped. I felt terribly lonely in this wide world. I have always felt a little lonely almost from childhood up. But a few bonds strengthened me, a few strong supports held me up. That loneliness never went, but it was lessened. But now I felt absolutely alone, left high and dry on a desert island.

Human beings have an enormous capacity for adapting themselves and so I too adapted myself to some extent to the new conditions. The keeness of my feelings on the subject, which amounted almost to physical pain, passed off; the edge was dulled. But shock after shock, a succession of events sharpened that edge to a fine point, and allowed my mind or feelings no peace or rest. Again I felt that sensation of spiritual isolation, of being a perfect stranger out of harmony, not only with the crowds that passed me, but also with those whom I had valued as dear and close comrades. My stay in prison this time became a greater ordeal for my nerves than any previous visit had been. I almost wished that all newspapers might be kept away from me so that I might be spared these repeated shocks.

Physically I kept fairly well. I always do in prison. My body has served me well and can stand a great deal of ill-treatment and strain. And being vain enough to imagine that perhaps I might yet do some effective work in this land to which fate had tied me, I looked after it well.

But I wondered often enough if I was not a square peg in a round hole, or a bubble of conceit thrown about hither and thither on an ocean which spurned me. But vanity and conceit triumphed and the intellectual apparatus that functions within me refused to admit defeat. If the ideals that had spurred me to action and had kept me buoyed up through stormy weather were right—and the conviction of their rightness ever grew within me—they were bound to triumph though my generation might not live to witness that triumph.

But what had happened to those ideals during these long and weary months of this year when I was a silent and distant witness, fretting at my helplessness? Setbacks and temporary defeats are common enough in all great struggles. They grieve but one recovers soon enough. One recovers soon if the light of those ideals is not allowed to grow dim and the anchor of principles holds fast. But what I saw was not setback and defeat but that spiritual defeat which is the most terrible of all. Do not imagine that I am referring to the council-entry question. I do not attach vital importance to it. Under certain circumstances I can even imagine entering a legislature myself. But whether I function inside or outside the legislature I function as a revolutionary, meaning thereby a person working for the fundamental and revolutionary changes, political and social, for I am convinced that no other changes can bring peace or satisfaction to India and the world.

So I thought. Not so evidently the leaders who were functioning outside. They began to talk the language of an age gone by before the heady wine of N. C. O. and C. D. had fired our heads. Sometimes they used the same words and phrases but they were dead words without life or real meaning. The leading figures of the Congress suddenly became those people who had obstructed us, held us back, kept aloof from the struggle and even co-operated with the opposite party in the time of our direct need. They became the high priests in our temple of freedom and many a brave soldier who had shouldered the burden in the heat and dust of the fray was not even allowed inside the temple precincts. He had many like him had become untouchables and unapproachables. And if he ventured to raise his voice and criticize the new high priests, he was shouted down and tol that he was a traitor to the cause because he spoilt the harmony of the sacred precincts.

And so the flag of Indian freedom was entrusted with all pomp and circumstance to those who had actually hauled it down at the height of our national struggle at the bidding of the enemy; to those who had proclaimed from the house-tops that they had given up politics—for politics were unsafe then—but who emerged with a jump to the front ranks when politics became safe.
And what of the ideals they set forth before them, speaking as they did on behalf of the Congress and the nation? A pitiful hotch-potch, avoiding real issues, toning down, as far as they dared, even the political objective of the Congress, expressing a tender solicitude for every vested interest, bowing down to many a declared enemy of freedom, but showing great truculence and courage in facing the advanced and fighting elements in the Congress ranks. Is not the Congress being rapidly reduced to a magnified edition of that shameful spectacle, the Calcutta Corporation during the last few years? Might not the dominant part of the Bengal Congress be called today “the society for the advancement of Mr. Nalini Ranjan Sirkar”, a gentleman who rejoiced to entertain Government officials, Home Members and the like, when most of us were in prison and C. D. was supposed to be flourishing? And the other part probably a similar society for a similar laudable object? But the fault does not lie with Bengal alone. Almost everywhere there is a similar outlook. The Congress from top to bottom is a caucus and opportunism triumphs.

The Working Committee is not directly responsible for this state of affairs. But none the less the Working Committee must shoulder the responsibility. It is the leaders and their policy that shape the activities of the followers. It is neither fair nor just to throw blame on the followers. Every language has some saying about the workman blaming his tools. The committee had deliberately encouraged vagueness in the definition of our ideals and objectives and this is bound to lead not only to confusion but to demoralization during periods of reaction, and to the emergence of the demagogue and the reactionary.

I am referring especially to the political objectives which are the special province of the Congress. I feel that the time is overdue for the Congress to think clearly on social and economic issues but I recognize that education on these issues takes time and the Congress as a whole may not be able to go as far at present as I would like it to. But it appears that whether the Working Committee knows anything about the subject or not it is perfectly willing to denounce and to excommunicate people who happen to have made a special study of the subject and hold certain views. No attempt is made to understand those views, which, it is notorious, are held by a very large number of the ablest and most self-sacrificing people in the world. Those views may be right or wrong but they deserve at least some understanding before the Working Committee sets out to denounce them. It is hardly becoming for a reasoned argument to be answered by sentimental appeals or by the cheap remark that the condition in India are different and the economic laws that apply elsewhere do not function here. The resolution of the Working Committee on the subject showed such an astounding ignorance of the elements of socialism that it was painful to read it and to realize that it might be read outside India. It seemed that the overmastering desire of the Committee was somehow to assure various vested interests even at the risk of talking nonsense.

A strange way of dealing with the subject of socialism is to use the word, which has a clearly defined meaning in the English language, in a totally different sense. For individuals to use words in a sense peculiar to themselves is not helpful in the commerce of ideas. A person who declares himself to be an engine-driver and then adds that his engine is of wood and is drawn by bullocks is misusing the word engine-driver.

This letter has become a much longer one than I expected and the night is already far spent. Probably I have written in a confused and scrappy way for my brain is tired. But still it will convey some picture of my mind. The last few months have been very painful ones for me and, I take it, for many others. I have felt sometimes that in the modern world, and perhaps in the ancient world also, it is oft preferred to break some people’s hearts rather than touch other’s pockets. Pockets are indeed valuable and more cherished than hearts and brains and bodies and human justice and dignity.

There is one other subject I should like to mention. That is the Swaraj Bhawan Trust. I understand that the Working Committee recently considered the question of the unkeep of the Swaraj Bhawan and came to the conclusion that it was not responsible for it. As however it had already made a grant about three years ago and this had not been paid yet, although expenses were incurred on the strength of it, a fresh grant was sanctioned. This will probably be enough for some months. In regard to the future, the Working Committee was evidently anxious not to be saddled with the burden of maintaining the house and grounds. This burden amounts to Rs. 100 a month, which includes taxes, etc. The trustees, I understand, were also a little frightened of the burden and suggested that parts of the house might be let in the ordinary way to raise money for the maintenance. Another suggestion was made that part of the grounds might be sold off for this purpose. I was surprised to learn of these suggestions, as some of them seemed to me to be contrary to the letter of the trust and all of them against its spirit. As an individual trustee I have only one voice in the matter but I should like to say that I have the strongest possible objection to any such misuse of the trust property. The very idea of the wishes of my father being flouted in this way is intolerable to me. The trust represented not only his wishes but also in small way a memorial to him and his wishes and his memory is dearer to me than a hundred rupees a month. I should, therefore, like to assure the Working Committee and the trustees that they need have no anxiety on the score of the money required for maintenance of the property. As soon as the funds, now granted by the Working Committee for some months, are exhausted, I shall make myself personally responsible for the maintenance and no further grant need be made by the Working Committee. I would also beg the trustees to respect my feelings in this matter and not to break up the property or to hire it for the sake of hiring it out. I shall endeavour to maintain the Swaraj Bhawan property till such time as it is put to some worthy use.

I have not the figures by me but I believe that even thus far the Swaraj Bhawan has not been, in any sense, a financial burden on the Working Committee. The grants that have been paid to it will probably not be much in excess of reasonable rent for the quarters occupied by the office of the A.I.C.C. This rent could have been reduced by occupying smaller and cheaper quarters. At the same time in the past the A.I.C.C. has paid as much as Rs. 150 a month for rent of an upper floor only in Madras.

Perhaps some part of this letter might pain you. But you would not have me hide my heart from you.

Yours affectionately,

JAWAHAR

1. LETTER TO DUNICHAND

WARDHA,

September 16, 1934

DEAR LALA DUNICHAND,

You have come to the wrong man. Do you know that I rarely attend the meetings of the Parliamentary Board? In Their selection of individual candidates I have absolutely no part. I have been involved in solving the problem of Malaviyaji’s party. You have rightly written exhaustively to Maulana Abul Kalam Azad. Let him consider the question. This matter of selection is absolutely beyond me.

Yours sincerely,

CHI. SHANTA.

I am returning your letter with this. I can’t understand why you want it back. I have explained all my reasons to Maganbhai. I will not, therefore, spend time in repeating them here. You will get my blessings. Isn’t that enough? Have you informed

1 The Parliamentary Board was formed in May 1934, with Dr. M. A. Ansari as President “to run and control” elections to the Legislative Assembly.
2 Madan Mohan Malaviya and M. S. Aney had formed a separate party to carry on agitation against the Communal Award.
3 Daughter of Shankarbhai Patel
4 The addressee had asked for permission to marry a boy of her own Choice not belonging to her caste.
Lakshmidasbhai? What are you studying at present? I hope you know that Ba is there just now, and also that Ramdas is ill.

3. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

[September 16, 1934]

BHAII VALLABHBHAI,

I got your letter. The Kaka affair has become a painful one. But you should laugh away the thing. It will all subside by and by. I think there is no malice behind the outcry. I am trying to calm it and hope to succeed. There is nothing but simple misunderstanding behind the whole affair. I will not let Kaka go in this manner. I have sent you a copy of the letter I have written to Malvalankar.

Kaka has been laid up with fever from the very next day after he arrived here. The temperature has not come down even once. It was above 100° this morning. It rises to 102°. There are no other symptoms, except cold and a little cough. There is some fear that it may be typhoid. Write a brief note to him.

Jones is better but not quite well. Write a few lines to him also. Dr. Khan Saheb examines him.

Both the brothers went to Akola yesterday. They were dragged to Khamgaon from there. They were to return today, but now they will return tomorrow.

CHI. K.²,

...'s³ is a pathetic tale. . . .⁴ has badly deceived us. . . . was simply enticed. Of course, she too was at fault. Ultimately, we may say . . . fled from here. He did not even see me before leaving; he had told many lies too. Even in Sabarmati he had been given to self-indulgence. The whole affair is deplorable. . . . seems to be a simple innocent girl like any other Malabar girl. It seems somewhat risky to keep her here. Anyway her husband must be informed, but I do not wish to take any step without consulting you. You may come over here if that is necessary. There is no cause for panic. . . . is well looked after. 5. STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

WARDHAGANJ,
September 17, 1934

The rumour that I had contemplated severing all physical connection with the Congress was true. However, for considerations urged by many friends who had come to Wardha during the meetings of the Working Committee and the Parliamentary Board last week, I agreed with them that it might be safer for me to leave the Congress, if at all, after the forthcoming session. There was an intermediate course suggested by Pandit Govind Vallabh Pant and Mr. Rafi Ahmed Kidwai of remaining in the Congress without participating in the active administration of the organization but both Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and Maulana Abul Kalam Azad strongly disapproved of that course. Sardar Vallabhbhai had agreed with me that the time had arrived for me to retire from the Congress but many others would not endorse that view.

After due consideration of all the pros and cons I have adopted the safe and prudent course of postponing the final step, at least till after the meeting of the Congress session in October.

One tempting idea behind the insistence on postponement was that it would enable me to test the accuracy of my impression that a very large body of Congress intelligentsia were tired of my method and views, and the programme based upon them, that I was a hindrance rather than a help to the natural growth of the Congress, that instead of remaining the most democratic and representative institution in the country, the Congress had degenerated into an organization dominated by my one personality and that in it there was no free play of reason.

If I am to test the truth or otherwise of my impression, naturally I must put before the public the reason on which my impression was based and my own proposals based thereon. Congressmen might vote on them and thus clearly register their opinion. I must try to do this as briefly as I can.

It has appeared to me that there is a growing and vital difference of outlook between many Congressmen and myself.

I seem to be going in a direction just opposite of what many of the most intellectual Congressmen would gladly and enthusiastically take, if they were not hampered by their unexampled loyalty to me.
No leader can expect greater loyalty and devotion than I have received from intellectually-minded Congressmen even when they have protested and signified their disapproval of the policies I have laid before the Congress. For me any more to draw upon this loyalty and devotion is to put undue strain upon them.

Their loyalty cannot blind my eyes to what appears to me to be fundamental differences between the Congress intelligentsia and me.

Let me state them. I put the spinning-wheel and khadi in the forefront. Hand-spinning by the Congress intelligentsia has all but disappeared. The general body of them have no faith in it and yet if I could carry their reason with me, I would substitute the four-anna franchise by personal daily hand-spinning. The khadi clause of the Congress constitution has been almost a dead letter from the beginning and Congressmen have not been wanting who have reminded me that I am responsible for the hypocrisy and evasion about the working of the khadi clause. I ought to have realized that it was not passed out of deep conviction, but largely out of personal loyalty to me. I must own that there is considerable force in the argument.

Nevertheless my conviction is growing that if India is to win complete independence in terms of the toiling millions and through unadulterated non-violence, the spinning-wheel and khadi have to be as natural to the educated few as to the partially unemployed and semi-starved millions, who, for not using their hands for the purpose for which nature has endowed man with them, have become almost like beasts of burden. The spinning-wheel is thus an emblem of human dignity and equality in the truest sense of the term. It is the handmaid of agriculture. It is the nation’s second lung. We are perishing because we are using only one lung. Yet only a few Congressmen have a living faith in the Indiawide potency of the wheel.

The removal of the khadi clause in the constitution would mean a removal of the living link between the Congress and the millions whom it has from its inception sought to represent and yet if it remains it has to be rightly enforced; but it cannot be, if a substantial majority of Congressmen have no living faith in it.

Take again the Parliamentary Board. Though the author of non-co-operation I am convinced that in the present circumstances of the country and in the absence of any general scheme of civil resistance, a Parliamentary Party within the Congress is the necessary part of any programme that may be framed by the Congress but there are sharp differences of opinion among us on that point. The force with which I urged the programme at the A. I. C. C. meeting in Patna, I know, oppressed many of our best colleagues but they hesitated to act according to their own conviction.

Up to a point suppression of one’s views in favour of those of another considered superior in wisdom or experience is virtuous and desirable for healthy growth of an organization. It becomes a terrible oppression when one is called upon to repeat the performance from day to day.

Though I have never wished any such untoward result, I cannot conceal from me or the public the tragic fact that such has been my own experience. Many have despaired of resisting me. This is a humiliating revelation to me, a born democrat. I make that claim if a complete identification with the poorest of mankind, an intense longing to live no better than they and a corresponding conscious effort to approach that level to the best of one’s ability can entitle one to make it.

I have welcomed the formation of the Socialist Group. Many of them are respected and self-sacrificing co-workers. With all this, I have fundamental differences with them on the programme published in their authorized pamphlets. But I would not by reason of the moral pressure I may be able to exert suppress the spread of ideas propounded in their literature. I may not interfere with the free expression of those ideas however distasteful some of them may be to me.

If they gain ascendancy in the Congress, as they well may, I cannot remain in the Congress. For me to be in active opposition should be unthinkable. Though I have identified myself with many organizations during a long period of public service I have never accepted that position.

Then there is the policy advocated by some in regard to the States which is wholly different from what I have advised. I have given many anxious hour to the question but I have not been able to alter my view.

2 The Congress Socialist Party was formed at Patna in May 1934.
Even on untouchability my method of approach is perhaps different from that of many if not most Congressmen. For me, it is a deeply religious and moral issue. Many think that it was a profound error for me to have disturbed the course of the civil resistance struggle by taking up the question in the manner and at the time I did. I feel that I would have been untrue to myself, if I had taken any other course. Last of all take non-violence. After 14 years of trial it still remains a policy with the majority of Congressmen whereas it is a fundamental creed with me. That Congressmen do not still regard non-violence as a creed is no fault of theirs. It is undoubtedly my faulty presentation and still more faulty execution that are responsible for this failure. I have no consciousness of faulty presentation or execution. But it is the only possible inference from the fact that it has not yet become an integral part of the lives of Congressmen.

And if there is uncertainty about non-violence there must be still more about civil resistance. In spite of my 27 years of study and practice of the doctrine, I cannot claim to know all about it. The field of research is necessarily limited as occasions for civil resistance in a man’s life must not be frequent. It can only come after voluntary obedience to authority, whether of parents, teachers or other elders, religious or secular. There need be no wonder that as the only expert, however imperfect among us, I should have come to the conclusion that it should for some time to come be limited only to me. This was necessary in order to minimize errors and mischief proceeding from them as also to explore its hidden possibilities. But again for no fault of Congressmen it has been increasingly difficult for me to carry the reason of fellow Congressmen with me in all resolutions recently passed on the subject, while they have generously voted for them.

Even the memory of the sense of opposition which they experienced at the time of voting without an intelligent belief in these resolutions oppresses me just as much as they were oppressed. They and I must be free from this oppression if we are all to grow in pursuit of what we believe to be the common goal. Hence it is necessary for all concerned to act freely and boldly according to their convictions.

I have in my Patna statement, recommending the suspension of civil resistance, drawn attention to the failure of civil resistance to achieve two obvious results. If we had the full non-violent spirit in us

1 Vide “Resolution on council-entry”, 19-5-1934.
2 Vide “Statement to the press”, 2-4-1934.
it should have been self-evident and should not have escaped the notice of the Government that their ordinances were certainly not warranted by any of the ‘misdeeds’ done by or imputed to us. They were undoubtedly intended to break our spirits anyhow, but it would be wrong if we contended that civil resisters were above reproach. If we were non-violent through and through our non-violence would have been self-evident.

Nor were we able to show to the terrorists that we had greater faith in our non-violence than they in their violence. On the contrary many of us made them feel that we had the same spirit of violence in our breasts that they had. Only we did not believe in deeds of violence.

Terrorists rightly argued that if the spirit of violence was common to both, the policy of doing or not doing violence was a matter of opinion. I need not repeat what I have said before that the country has made great strides towards non-violence indeed and that many have exhibited great courage and self-sacrifice. All I want to say is that ours has not been unadulterated non-violence in thought, word and deed.

It is now my paramount duty to devise ways and means of showing demonstrably to the Government and the terrorists the efficacy of non-violence as a means of achieving the right thing including freedom in every sense of the term.

For this experiment, to which my life is dedicated, I need complete detachment and absolute freedom of action. Satyagraha, of which civil resistance is but a part, is to me the universal law of life. ‘Satya’, in truth, is my God. I can only search Him through non-violence and in no other way and the freedom of my country as of the world is surely included in the search for truth. I cannot suspend this search for anything in this world or another.

I have entered political-life in pursuit of this search and if it cannot carry reason as well as heart of the educated Congressmen when I say that this search necessarily includes complete independence, and many other things which may be part of truth, it is plain I should work single-handed in implicit faith that what I fail to make clear to my countrymen today shall be clear to them some day of itself or, if God wills it, through some apt word He may put in my mouth or some apt work which He may prompt me to do.

In matters of such tremendous importance a mechanical vote or a grudging assent will be wholly inadequate if not injurious to the cause itself.

I have referred to the common goal, but I have begun to doubt if all Congressmen understand the same thing by the expression complete independence. I want for India complete independence in the full English sense of that English expression. For me poorna swaraj has an infinitely larger meaning than complete independence, but even poorna swaraj is not self-explained. No one word or compound expression will give us a meaning which all can understand. Hence on several occasions I have given several definitions of swaraj. I hold that they are all true, not at all self-contradictory. They are all hopelessly incomplete even when put together, but I do not wish to labour this point further.

My mention of the difficulty, if not impossibility, of giving a complete definition leads me to another serious point of difference between many Congressmen and myself.

I have always said since 1908 that means and end are convertible terms and that, therefore, where the means are various and even contradictory the end must be different and even contradictory. We have always control over the means, never on the end, but may not bother about its content if we all employ identical means with identical connotation for them. It will be admitted that many Congressmen do not admit this, to me the obvious truth. They believe that end justifies means whatever they may be.

It is the sum total of these differences which has sterilized the existing Congress programme because members who gave their lip-assent to it, without believing in it, have naturally failed to reduce it to practice and yet I have no other programme save the Congress programme now before the country. Untouchability, Hindu-Muslim unity, total prohibition, hand-spinning with khadi and cent per cent swadeshi in the sense of the revival of village industries and general reorganization of seven lakhs of villages ought to give all satisfaction that one’s love of one’s country may demand.

Personally I would like to bury myself in an Indian village, preferably in a Frontier village. If the Khudai Khidmatgars are truly non-violent they will contribute the largest share to the promotion of non-violent spirit and of Hindu-Muslim unity, for if they are non-violent in thought, word and deed and are lovers of Hindu-Muslim unity, surely through them we should see the accomplishment of the two things we need most in this land. The Afghan menace which we dread so much should then be a thing of the past.

I am, therefore, yearning to test the truth for myself of the claim that they have imbibed the spirit of non-violence and are believers in the heart-unity of Hindus, Mussalmans and others. I should like also personally to deliver the message of the spinning-wheel to them. In this and various such other ways I would love to serve the Congress in my own humble manner, whether I am in it or outside.

I have reserved to the last any reference to the growing corruption in our ranks. I have already said enough about it in public. In spite of all I have said the Congress still remains in my estimation the most powerful and most representative organization in the country. It has a history of uninterrupted noble service and self-sacrifice. From its inception it has weathered storms, as no other institution has done. It has commanded a measure of self-sacrifice of which any country would be proud. It holds today the largest number of devoted men and women of unimpeachable character. If I must leave this organization I shall not do so without a wrench and I should do it only when I am convinced that by being outside I would serve it, that is, the country better than by being in it.

I propose to test the feeling of the Congress on all the points I have touched by placing before the Subjects Committee certain resolutions giving effect to the views enunciated above.

The first amendment I would propose is to replace the words “legitimate and peaceful” by the words ‘truthful and non-violent’. I should not have done so but for the purpose of the opposition which was raised against the utterly innocent use by me of the two adjectives in place of “legitimate and peaceful”. If Congressmen really believe in the necessity of truthfulness and non-violence for the attainment of our goal they should have no hesitation about accepting the unequivocal adjectives.

The second amendment would be to replace the four-anna franchise by the delivery, by every member to a Congress depot, of 2,000 rounds (one round equal to four feet) per month of well-twisted even yarn of not less than 15 counts spun by himself or herself. On proof of Poverty, with enough cotton for spinning the requisite quantity, the arguments for and against need not be repeated here. If we are to be a truly democratic body representing even the lowest paid labourer, we cannot do it better than by devising a simple labour franchise.

Hand-spinning is by common consent the lowest paid labour and yet the most dignified. It is the nearest approach to adult franchise, within the means of almost everyone who is willing to labour for the sake of the country for half an hour daily. Is it too much to expect the intelligentsia and propertied classes to recognize the dignity of labour irrespective of the material benefit it brings? Is not labour, like learning, its own reward? If we are true servants of the masses, we would take pride in spinning for their sakes.

I recall what the late Maulana Mahomed Ali used to repeat from many a platform. As the sword was the symbol, he would say, of brute force and might, the wheel or the takli was the symbol of non-violence, service and humility. When the wheel was accepted as part of the National Flag it was surely implied that the spinning-wheel would hum in every household. If Congress men do not believe in the message of the wheel, we must remove it from the National Flag and khaddar from the constitution. It is intolerable that there should be unashamed fraud in the observance of the khaddar clause.

The third amendment I should propose would be that no one shall be entitled to vote to any Congress election whose name has not been on the Congress register continuously for six months without default and who has not been a habitual wearer wholly of khaddar for that period. Great difficulty has been experienced in the working of the khaddar clause. It can be easily avoided by giving powers, subject to appeal to the President of the Congress, to the chairmen of the respective committees to decide the question as to whether a particular voter is or is not a habitual wearer wholly of khaddar within the meaning of the constitution. No one is to be considered such a wearer who at the time of voting is not manifestly wholly clad in khaddar. But no rule however carefully and strictly worded can produce satisfactory results if a large number do not voluntarily carry it out.

Experience has shown that the Congress is an unwieldy organization even with 6,000 delegates. In practice the full number has never attended the Congress and when this Congress register nowhere contains a truly representative list the delegation can hardly be claimed to be as reality.
I would, therefore, have an amendment for the purpose of reducing the number to not more than 1,000 delegates, not more than one delegate per every thousand voters. To have full number of delegates would mean one million voters, not an overambitious hope in a country having a population of 315 millions. The Congress would by this amendment gain in substance what it may lose in the show of numbers.

The spectacular part of the session would be kept intact by making ample provision for visitors, but the Reception Committees will be spared the wholly unnecessary anxiety of having to provide accommodation for an unwieldy number of delegates. Let us recognize the fact that the Congress enjoys prestige, democratic character and influence not by the number of the delegates and visitors it has drawn to its annual functions but by the ever increasing amount of service it has rendered.

Western democracy is on its trial, if it has not already proved a failure. May it not be reserved to India to evolve the true science of democracy by giving a visible demonstration of this fitness? Corruption and hypocrisy ought not to be inevitable products of democracy as they undoubtedly are today; nor bulk a true test of democracy. True democracy is not inconsistent with a few persons representing the spirit, the hope and the aspirations of those whom they claim to represent. I hold that democracy cannot be evolved by forcible methods. The spirit of democracy cannot be imposed from without. It has to come from within.

I have mentioned here only the principal amendments I should propose in the constitution. there would be other resolutions bringing out clearly the points I have touched upon in the foregoing paras. I don’t need to burden this statement with them.

My fear is that even the amendments I have named will hardly commend themselves to the large number of Congressmen who will attend the Congress. Nevertheless if I am to guide the policy of the Congress I hold them and the resolutions in keeping with the spirit of this statement to be essential for the earliest attainment of our goal.

No voluntary organization can succeed in its purpose without its resolutions and policies being carried out whole-heartedly by its members and no leader can give a good account of himself if his lead is not faithfully, ungrudgingly and intelligently followed and this is true of a leader who has no resource at his disposal but what truth and non-violence can supply.

It follows, therefore, that there is no room for compromise on the essentials of the programme I have endeavoured to adumbrate in these paras. Let Congressmen, therefore, examine it dispassionately and on its merits. They must eliminate me from their consideration and give effect to the dictates of their reason.

6. LETTER TO TAN YUN-SHAN

September 17, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your two letters. I was unable to overtake yours of 4th September before now. I wish you every success in your mission of love in China. I have no doubt that all individual effort in the direction of mutual understanding will bear fruit in the long run. You shall certainly correspond with me as often as you like, and I shall endeavour to reply to your letters as soon as I can. I hope that it will be possible for you to return to India to continue your work. And when you return, you shall certainly stay with me if I am still free and settled at one place. I had your book which of course is hieroglyphics to me, I am sorry to say.

7. LETTER TO MAHESH CHARAN MOWAR

September 17, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. The way to prove the truth of the statement I have made is not by coining conundrums which cannot be satisfactorily solved, but to see the working of God’s will in His helpless creation. Man ever proposes, but God always disposes.
All our best plans are reduced to naught in less than the twinkling of an eye.

MY DEAR KHARE,

If you succeed in producing a reliable directory of village industries at the ridiculously low price of one anna, you will help the cause of cent per cent swadeshi and confer a boon on those who want to serve it. You will supply a felt want.

September 17, 1934

DEAR SATISBABU,

I am sending you a letter received from Dar-ul-Aman by used correspondence post. Herewith enclosed is a copy of my reply. Do you know anything about this association?

I have commenced using your ink. It promises to give satisfaction, but I must gain more experience of it. Mahadev is, however, conducting a more critical examination.

I hope you have now got books and papers from Satcowrie-babu.

10. A LETTER

September 17, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I have a pathetic letter from your son and he tells me that you refuse to return to India till swaraj is established. Now no one knows what swaraj is. If it is merely usurping power from the present rulers, I for one would not be satisfied that we had swaraj. But in one sense swaraj was established when the Congress adopted the constitution of 1920 and the policy laid down in virtue of it. I do hope, therefore, that for the sake of your wife and your son, you will return as soon as you can and perform your duty by them as a part of the scheme of swaraj.

Yours sincerely,

September 17, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter of the 25th ultimo. I well remember your previous letter. But I have been under the impression that I had already sent you my reply enclosing a letter for your father. It is just likely that the letter like many of my letters written during the hurricane tour has gone astray. Here is a letter addressed to your father. You will please send it to him. I take: it that you will treat the letter as confidential.

12. LETTER TO LALCHAND NAVALRAI

September 17, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. The way in which Harijan purses collected in different provinces are used is by provinces sending to the Central Board' their schemes for approval, and these schemes come to me whenever it is thought necessary by the Central Board. You will have, therefore, to convince the Provincial Board of the soundness of your suggestion, and in doing so you will have to show to the Board that your scheme can be worked with the funds at the Local Board’s disposal and consistently with the continuation of the work they have started.

13. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR

September 17, 1934

CHI. MARY,²

I have your letter. In his letter Rajbhoj has used the expression ‘Brahmin’ to mean non-Harijan Hindus. The Board does not consist exclusively of Brahmins; it has non-Brahmins also. Nevertheless you should remember that the Board contains only workers and not those who want prominence or cheap credit. Strange as it may appear, the largest amount of sacrifice is still to be found among Brahmins, if it is also true that Brahmins are the stumbling-block in the way of progress of the campaign against untouchability. But no provincial organization is wholly confined to Brahmins.

As to the second objection, you will be glad to know that there is no Harijan Board which does not contain at least one Harijan, and in several organizations there are many. There are hundreds of Harijan Boards affiliated to the Central Board. I can claim no merit or credit for this event. If I could have helped it, I should certainly have confined all these boards exclusively to non-Harijans. In the place of the word ‘penitents’ read ‘debtors’. Harijans are in the place of creditors. Have you ever heard of a board of debtors containing a sprinkling of creditors? Debtors alone know how to discharge their obligations. Creditors will be the judges as to whether they will give them discharge certificates for the payments they will make. But they would not even be bothered about the meetings of the debtors. They will have their own meetings, their own advisers and the like. And I have invited the Harijans to form their own advisory boards which will become irresistible. They will, if they are compact bodies, dictate their own terms. If you are closely following the Harijan from week to week you will understand surely the meaning of what I have said. Marvellous work has been done in the shape of distribution of funds. Harijan Boards are intended to be swiftly moving organizations carrying out their operations without fuss. They are not debating societies. To alter their character would be to turn them into debating societies frittering away time, energy and substance, whereas I want to save every ounce of these solely for the benefit of Harijans. Then and then only will there be no ‘you’ and ‘we’, but only ‘we’.

You have again returned to your proposal about prayer. The proposal does not appear to me to be feasible. The utmost we have been able to attain in this direction is that we have Mussalman hymns or bhajans as also Christian. You may perhaps know that every Friday we have a rendering of “Lead, Kindly Light” in the Ashram and every Thursday we have a very popular Islamic bhajan. The Ashram Bhajanavali contains several bhajans from Mussalman sources and you will find also a selection of Christian hymns. On certain occasions we have Christian and Mussalman prayers. But to make these prayers a daily feature would be entirely mechanical, if not also hypocritical. It would be different if we had a large number of Mussalmans and Christians in the different ashrams. And if we had an ashram predominantly Mussalman or Christian, there will naturally be generally only Christian or Islamic prayers. The point I am trying to make is to show that the ashrams are not theosophical organizations, but they are organizations which have equal regard for all the religions. I should expect, therefore, non-Hindus in an ashram predominantly Hindu to pay equal respect to the Hindu form of worship. And a predominantly Hindu ashram should never be deliberately exclusive and would be expected to pay particular regard to its few Mussalman or Christian inmates. Ashrams honestly attempt, though they may ever fail, to reach the ideal of equality and growth from within.

Love.

14. LETTER TO MANILAL AND SUSHILA GANDHI

September 17, 1934

CHI. MANILAL AND SUSHILA.

I had received your letters. I had long discussions with Andrews. The trouble about Sorabji\(^1\) will go on. But it is desirable that no attacks should be made on the Agent. It would be better to write to him confidentially. So far as I can judge from here, attacking him will serve no purpose except giving vent to one’s anger. Andrews liked all that you have been doing except the attack on the Agent. Schlesin\(^2\) also didn’t like it.

You have suggested that Kanti\(^3\) should be sent over there. But he does not agree to go. He has set his heart on studying.

I believe Ramdas will require a permit. I suspect that they have taken away the rights of even the Colonial-born [Indians]. Ramdas’s plans are still uncertain. Just now he has gone to Sabarmati with Ba. He had a fairly serious attack of fever there. It has come down now. He has taken Kanu\(^4\) with him. Since he gets good company at Sabarmati, he feels quite cheerful. Kanti has gone far away to Travancore, where he will do Harijan work and study at the same time.

My future plans are uncertain. I shall not be able to leave the Congress immediately. Let us see what happens in October. I cannot say in what direction my dharma will lead me after that. Thus everything regarding me is uncertain. But I don’t worry. He who has dedicated his all to Shri Krishna feels at rest in his mind even in the midst of uncertainty. Since I am ceaselessly striving to reach that state, I never suffer from worries. Where there is complete uncertainty about life itself from moment to moment, why worry about other things?

Jalbhai\(^1\) came and saw me. Omar Sheth seems to have lost his all. How did that happen?

Kishorelal\(^2\) and Gomati\(^3\) are here at present. And of course Vasumatibehn too.

16. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

September 17, 1934

CHI. BRAJKISHAN,

Your letter. What happens after meeting Damodardas is yet to be seen. Till then I shall remain doubt-ridden. I cannot be just either to Damodardas or to Santoku and others. And now you too are involved. Damodardas alleges that you have misunderstood him but I have no doubts about you. My fear in respect of you is of a different kind. You have not realized even now the value of money. In spite of your renunciation, your mind is still that of a moneyed man and not averse to possession. An action performed without the prompting of the heart loses all its value.

I trust you maintain good health there. Prabhavati has gone to Patna; she might return on Friday.

CHI. SHARMA,

I have your Hindi letter today. The English letter should arrive tomorrow. I can certainly read all your letters with ease.

I have nothing to say if Ramdas himself desires to be released from your care. In that case you have to come here. I have no idea what is happening there. What is Ba doing? What is her opinion? It is very good that Surendra is there. Whatever happens, you must not lose your peace of mind. I am always aware of all the trouble you have taken for Ramdas. And, as a matter of fact, Ramdas had not been instrumental in your coming to me. That was on account of your nature-cure. Therefore all that we want to do in that respect still remains to be done. We shall discuss it when we meet.

I am returning your letter but not Jamnalalji’s which I am destroying.

Blessings from
BAPU

I am returning Jamnalalji’s letter too. Perhaps this is your file copy.

18. LETTER TO S. AMBUJAMMAL

September 17, 1934

CHI. AMBUJAMMAL

I have your letter. I am sure I have written a letter or two. It cannot be that you have no letter from me.

Gomati has not mentioned anything about Sharma’s illness but the information came through Satyanarayana’s letter to Kaka. He must be all right by now.

What you write about the Ramayana is true.

1 Daughter of Srinivasa Iyengar.
It would certainly be good if you can come to Wardha even for a few days. I have no objection if you come during the Congress session but then I hardly have time even to look at a person. Ramdas is well. For the time being he will stay at Sabarmati with Ba.

19. LETTER TO BENARSIDAS CHATURVEDI

September 18, 1934

BHAI BENARSIDAS,

While looking for something else which I found I came upon your letter of July 21. This could have reached me only during my travels. I had read it and put it away in a special place in order to answer it, thereby defeating that very purpose.

I hope it is not too late even now to answer. You can come whenever you wish and stay as long as you like. I like your opposition. This has never been a ground for keeping you away and it cannot be such now.

Inform me of the date of your arrival. I take it you only want to be with me, but you must not take much of my time as I can spare very little of that commodity.

21. LETTER TO RAJENDRA PRASAD

September 18, 1934

Bhai Rajendra Prasad,

I sent through Mahadev the reply to your wire, which Prabhavati must have given you. Later your letter also arrived. I have no recollection whether I replied to your first letter through someone or whether it remained unanswered. These days the work is quite pressing, some rest is also needed. It does not seem proper to make Abdul Ghaffar Khan the President this time. He is a good man and is full of love for the country. He is sincere and self-sacrificing. But he has little experience of the Congress and the session this time involves great responsibility. Among the men devoted to truth and non-violence and commanding popularity I see none but you or Rajagopalachari or Jairamdas. But these two men cannot now be chosen and that leaves only you. Moreover, there is no other choice because of your contribution to the earthquake [relief] work. You have illness in the family as also your financial problem; but are you a family man any more? In other words, you can serve the family only so far as it is a part of the people at large. The financial problem is almost solved. Jamnalalji is still at Bombay but that should cause no worry.

¹ Gandhiji’s birthday according to the Vikram Era, celebrated as Spinning Day
² Weapon of Lord Krishna
You should come over here as soon as you can. Come with more time on hand if it is possible to stay over for a few days. Anyway I shall be happy with whatever time you can give me. If the date is fixed for certain I shall try to call Sardar too. You can in no case go to Bombay before October 20. The Khan Brothers will be here during this period and we shall send for any others if their presence is required.

You must have seen my statement¹ in the papers. The relations between Prabhavati and Jayaprakash have to be clarified. Arrangements have been made for her to serve in Wardha but I sent her away on receiving a telegram from Jayaprakash. I have of course told Prabha to discuss everything with you and Brijkishorebabu².

22. LETTER TO SHAMLAL

September 19, 1934

DEAR LALA SHAM LAL,

I have your letter. I am glad that you have such a brilliant prospect in front of you. There can be no question of my asking you to retire at this stage. Retirement can only be in those places where there is demonstrably no chance of success. And in any case these things are not regulated by me. They are regulated by the Parliamentary Board. You need, therefore, have no fear of being abruptly asked by me to retire. You need not be disturbed by my forthcoming talk with Bapuji Aney.³

23. LETTER TO EMMA HARKER

September 19, 1934

DEAR SISTER,

I have your touching letter. If Pierre Ceresole1 comes from Europe with his contingent, I would certainly like you to join him. I do not like the idea otherwise of your going anywhere, for it will be cruel to expect you to lead the life of the poor, and it will be unfair to the people to put you in a place where they will think that they have to give you more attention than what they are to expect from you. You do not know the difficulties of relief work in the villages of Bihar or Orissa or in any part of the flooded areas. And in the cities hardly any help is required. Therefore I am inclined to think that if Ceresole does not come you should do some service in Karachi itself. Surely Jamshed Mehta can easily inspire you.

24. LETTER TO MATILDA B. KALLON

September 19, 1934

MY DEAR MATTY,

I was talking today with Shyamjibhai about you. He tells me that something would be presently fixed up. But he raises one question. He asked me whether you, though a Christian, would be taking charge of Harijan boys and girls and inculcating in them respect for Hinduism and teaching them the principles regarding Hindu religion to be as true as Christianity. I have told him without any hesitation that you are a liberal-minded Christian and that your Christianity is not exclusive but inclusive of all the other great religions. Am I not right?

25. LETTER TO PADMA

September 19, 1934

CHI. PADMA¹.

I got your letter. For you I have preserved such coloured sheets. Another such girl is Durga². For her also I preserve coloured sheets. I do not remember to have omitted to reply to any letter of yours.

You will be surprised to know that these days I hardly get time to speak even to the girls here. Girls like you who are away get an occasional letter at least. These girls don’t get even that. Do you still envy them?

If your Magan spinning-wheel³ is out of order, why don’t you get it repaired? What has gone wrong? Why can’t slivers be made there? You must also pray regularly.

If stray cattle get into our fields, we should inform their owners and ask them to make good the damage. If they don’t listen and the cattle come again, we may certainly have them impounded. If this involves the taint of violence, we should not mind being guilty of it. He who is wise will deduce from this that he should own nothing. He will have no need, then, to impound other people’s cattle for his own benefit.

If a letter which the writer wishes to be treated as private is Nor have I expressed pain to anybody with regard to giving away the books. The only question can be, and is, not to do anything which might be improper. I had no other meaning in what I wrote except that if we were making any mistake we should rectify it. Please, therefore, banish that idea from your mind.

If there is delay in preparing a catalogue of the books or in receiving a list from Jivanji, let me know. Can we not make some arrangement, pending the construction of a building, to see that the books are being used?

30. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

September 19, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS,

I am enclosing copy of a letter from Harilal. Read it and think over it. The letter seems very good to me. If Harilal has changed as much as he seems to have done, it would be a great thing. You may think about it now. Can he be given some work connected with khadi or Harijan uplift? Call him to you or pay a visit to Porbandar. Let me know what you think after making the necessary inquiries. I have written to Harilal and asked him to write to you. He can be given khadi work only after consulting Ramjibhai. Harijan work can be given after consulting Jivanlal or Nanalal. No pressure should be put on anyone. I would prefer an independent experiment for the present. However, think over the whole matter yourself.

What would you advise regarding his eyes and teeth? Is there anybody there who can attend to them? If there is nobody, he can be looked after and treated in Ahmedabad. There are facilities in regard to both in Ahmedabad.

September 20, 1934

CHI. PREMA,

I have your letter. Today also I am writing this letter before the morning prayer. I am not doing this as a favour to you. I have stated the fact merely to tell you that I get up now at 3 a.m. as usual and start work immediately. I don’t get much time during the day for writing letters. Nobody wakes me up, nor do I have an alarm clock. Mostly I wake up myself. There is a terrace here1 for sleeping. On both sides of me sleep Amtussalaam, Vasumati, Amala2, Ba when she is here, Om and Prabhavati.

You seem to be widening your field of activities. I would advise you to do little but do it thoroughly well. Impatience will not help you in village uplift work. Read Harijan and/or Harijanbandhu regularly. Some other subjects are being discussed in them. I think I have already written to you about Ba having gone to Sabarmati to look after Ramdas.

If you want, I will send a copy of Gitai3. Let me have your reactions to my statement.

34. LETTER TO VAMAN G. JOSHI

September 20, 1934

DEAR VAMANRAO,

I have your letter.

Without entering into the argument, I give you my replies to your questions.

1. When a man wears clothes made of khadi as a matter of habit, he is a habitual wearer. If, therefore, for any just cause he cannot use khadi on some occasions, he does not cease to be a habitual wearer.

2. But if a person appears at Congress functions in clothes not made of khadi, he will be presumed not to be a habitual wearer of khadi.

3. Habitual wear of clothes made of khadi means all clothes from top to toe made of hand-spun and hand-woven khadi.

4. When it is pointed out to the Chair or when the Chairman of a Congress meeting himself knows that a voter or a candidate is not wearing khadi clothes at that meeting, he is bound to rule that the person is not a habitual wearer in spite of his protestation to the contrary.

September 20, 1934

DEAR SRINIVASAN,

Your letter to Mahadev of 8th instant has been on my file ever since its receipt. Your argument, I am sorry to say, does not appeal to me. Surely absolute reliability of the source of information does not absolve an editor from criticism if the information itself was confidential, especially if he is favourable to the cause to which the information is related. Rangaswamy used to know many most important things contemplated by members of the Working Committee.

Yours sincerely,

1 Vaman Gopal Joshi alias Veer Vamanrao, Marathi playwright and President of Berar Pradesh Congress Committee
2 Editor, The Hindu
3 A. Rangaswami Iyengar, former editor of The Hindu
Committee. I am not aware that he ever abused the confidence by publishing anything and saying that the information was absolutely reliable, as it undoubtedly was. Even Salivati who, in Rangaswamy’s time, had committed a serious blunder, has very often got from me information and therefore absolutely reliable. But he observed the law of the game by not disclosing it when he knew that I did not want the information to be published.

I should not have asked Mahadev to write to you the letter he did if it was a mere matter of embarrassment to me. There was none. But undoubtedly public cause was damaged by your publication of information that was strictly confidential, more so as it was not even accurate. Had it not been for the dangerous statement that the cause of the contemplated retirement was the formation of the Malaviyaji party, I would not have taken any public notice of your announcement.

I wish I could convince you that you had laid down a most dangerous principle of conduct. You say “in this instance, therefore, our sole anxiety was about the authenticity of the news”. Suppose that the Sardar had contemplated some big move on behalf of the Congress whose premature publication would defeat the very end he had in view. Suppose that a very clever correspondent of The Hindu was a thought reader, and he had read the Sardar’s thought. The news would be authentic. Would you be justified, unless you avowed yourself as an enemy of the Congress, in publishing the authentic information? Don’t retort by saying that no such calamity was possible in connection with your publication of the news in question. I am trying to show you the untenability of the position you have taken up. That the publication in the case in point did not result in much damage, you could not plead in self-protection. You will, therefore, please dismiss from your mind the idea that you have done any wrong to me. I have endeavoured to appreciate your point of view. It is unfortunate that I have not been able to appreciate your position. I think that it is wholly indefensible, unless of course you take up the position that, as a newspaper man, you have nothing to do with the nation, your sole concern is to purvey news—no matter how obtained.

40. LETTER TO PARIKSHITLAL L. MAJMUDAR

September 20, 1934

Bhai Parikshitlal,

I have your letter.

It is difficult to give a reply which can be universally applied, to the question what should be done when a Harijan living in the Ashram misbehaves. You yourself will have to decide that. Or Narahari will do so when he comes. How to find a way between the duty of forbearance on the one hand and that of protecting the Ashram on the other can be decided only with reference to each particular incident. Adopt whatever course experience suggests without any fear or hesitation.

Such a rule cannot be applied to a caste Hindu nor to a responsible Harijan living in the Ashram. And I am firmly of the view that nothing can be forgiven those who are responsible for the management of the Ashram. If moral laxity enters their lives, institutions of Harijan service will perish.

I am afraid I have not been able to give a reply which will satisfy you. Find what guidance you can from this.

I read your remarks about Narahari. Your annoyance is justified. But there has been no deliberate malice behind what has happened. There is nothing but misunderstanding at the bottom of the whole thing. It will disappear in time. I am convinced that there is no malice in anybody’s heart. I have decided that, if Kaka can be persuaded, he must not leave Gujarat at present so as to end all this bitterness, if for no other reason. Let him manage or mismanage the education department of the whole country from Gujarat.

There is no necessity at all for you to leave. And if my view has appealed to you, at present managing the Vidyapith means no more than disbursing funds to the individuals concerned in terms of the resolutions passed. The Vidyapith will be a movable institution. Everybody will go on doing the work entrusted to him. All decisions about teaching Programmes will be made by Kaka or by the teachers collectively. My view is that everybody will have to shoulder independent responsibility in the place which he has selected. If anybody consults someone whom he admires, it will be only as a friend. This is the plan I have in mind. I have discussed this scheme at length with Kaka, Kishorelal and Narahari. If you approve of it, all that you have to do is to write a letter and put it into operation. About salaries, Narahari and Kaka have decided something. I have not meddled in that. I should like you to free yourself from the burden of this dispute.

[Before September 21, 1934]

[GANDHIJI:] So you wanted to take the citadel by storm?

[AKARTE:] Yes, rather. But the preacher is a believer in the removal of untouchability, and I had told the Secretary that he should hold the kirtan in a temple which was open to the Harijans.

You did not approach the preacher himself?

No, Sir.

The preacher himself had no prejudice against the Harijans, for, you yourself say he went to the Harijan quarters and gave them a kirtan?

True. He had no prejudices, but he should not have yielded to the Secretary.

You know that the temple was not open to the Harijans, and you laid yourself open to the charge that you wanted to go in under cover of the kirtan?

But, Mahatmaji, he might have come out and held the kirtan outside.

But he did go to the Harijan quarters. Didn’t he?

Yes. But the handbills invited all the Hindus.

Quite right. But the preacher had not issued the leaflets, and, then, “all” means, in our present state of unenlightenment, the so-called Hindus, and does not include the Harijans.

No. Mahatmaji, the Hindu Sabha Secretary ought to know better.

1 Reported by Mahadev Desai, this appeared in Harijan under the title “The Wrong Way”. The Hindu Sabha of Morsi, in C. P., had arranged with one of its preachers to hold a kirtan and issued handbills inviting Hindus. The kirtan was held in a temple where Akarte, a Harijan worker, and other Harijans were not allowed. The preacher also declined to hold the kirtan outside for the benefit of the Harijans but offered to go to the Harijan quarters and give them a special kirtan. Akarte later held a protest meeting and passed a resolution condemning the preacher. Akarte then sought Gandhiji’s guidance.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
Well, well, no legal quibbles. There ought not to have been a protest meeting, at all. You might have approached the preacher in the first instance, you might have gently asked him to address a meeting of the Hindus for the removal of untouchability or to appeal to the Hindus in the course of his kirtan itself to admit the Harijans to a religious function to which they had every right. You might have asked the other Hindus to boycott the function altogether. Even now, if you have sufficient energy in you, you may serve on the temple trustees notice asking them to show cause why they prevented Harijans from entering even the precincts of the temple and thus from listening to a religious sermon. That would be a good test case; whilst temple-entry may be prohibited in law, entry into the precincts may not be. But the protest meeting and the other things you did were, perhaps, an exhibition of excessive zeal. The method of our work is unadulterated non-violence, and non-violence alone will succeed. Force is sure to fail.

I am sorry, Mahatmaji; I must confess I was in a temper. If you like, I can make a public statement to that effect.

That is hardly necessary. Your restraint in action will be more eloquent than any expression of regret.

... Though cholera is fast disappearing in Malkapur and Morsi, there are other villages where it has spread and might spread. What precautionary measures would you suggest? Could we take the help of the police in a crisis like this?

Certainly, police help may be taken, as medical help is taken. All drinking water must be boiled (and a grain of potassium permanganate should be added to it. They must be asked not to drink any other water.

But they are ignorant, they don’t listen. And how can we expect the poor people to drink boiled water, when they go to the fields.

Now, that’s not an active worker speaking! You must carry on vigorous propaganda, provide them with every facility and not rest until they have listened to you. You can provide them with extra fuel to boil the water with, pots in which to carry the boiled water to the fields and potassium permanganate. You can have Harijans whom you have inoculated to accompany you and help in the propaganda. No pains to be spared.

1 The worker had described the cholera epidemic in these villages and the steps he had taken to control it.
I quite see. I was tending a Harijan myself yesterday. I had a medical man to treat him; he was worse, I had another doctor called and I am glad he will completely recover. He got a treatment which the richest in our village might envy.

That’s vary good. Rest assured that your name has gone down in the book of God, who keeps an accurate record of all things good and bad. There is no better Accountant on earth.

47. WHY AGAINST VIOLENCE?

A correspondent argues:

Why are you against violence? Do you think that every act of violence is an expression of _himsa_? Is it not strange that we should feel a kind of horror, pity and disgust when we see a murder or assassination, and silently witness the slow sucking of blood going on every day in the world? If one believes that a successful bloody revolution would ameliorate a good deal of misery in the world, why should he not resort to arms? . . . Don’t you realize that the rulers of the world have become so callous that, to understand you or humanity, they must again become children. I don’t mean to say they are born bad. But their badness is a physical fact and, in spite of themselves, they cannot alter it.

It is because the rulers, if they are bad, are so, not necessarily or wholly by reason of birth, but largely because of their environment, that I have hopes of their altering their course. It is perfectly true, as the writer says, that the rulers cannot alter their course themselves. If they are dominated by their environment, they do not surely deserve to be killed, but should be changed by a change of environment. But the environment are we—the people who make the rulers what they are. They are thus an exaggerated edition of what we are in the aggregate. If my argument is sound, any violence done to the rulers would be violence done to ourselves. It would be suicide. And since I do not want to commit suicide, nor encourage my neighbours to do so, I become non-violent myself and invite my neighbours to do likewise.

Moreover, violence may destroy one or more bad rulers, but, like Ravana’s heads, others will pop up in their places, for, the root lies elsewhere. It lies in us. If we will reform ourselves, the rulers will automatically do so.

The correspondent seems to imagine that a non-violent person has no feelings and that he is a silent witness to the “slow sucking of blood going on every day in the world”. Non-violence is not a passive force nor so helpless as the correspondent will make it out to be. Barring truth, if truth is to be considered apart from non-violence, the latter is the activest force in the world. It never fails. Violence only seemingly succeeds, and nobody has ever claimed uniform success for violence. Non-violence never promises immediate and tangible results. It is not a mango trick. Its failures are, therefore, all seeming. A believer in violence will kill the murderer and boast of his act. But he never killed murder. By murdering the murderer, he added to it and probably invited more. The law of retaliation is the law of multiplying evil.

A non-violent man will act upon the murderer through his love. He cannot, by punishing the murderer, undo the murder already committed. But he hopes by gentleness to get the murderer to repent of his deed and change the whole course of his life. A non-violent man always and automatically turns the searchlight selfward and discovers that the best course of conduct is to do unto others as he would have others to do unto him. If he was the murderer, he would not like to be killed for his madness but would like the opportunity of mending himself. He knows, too, that he must not destroy what he cannot create. God is the sole Judge between man and man.

Harijan, 21-9-1934

48. GOD OR NO GOD

During my visit to the South I met Harijans and others who pretended not to believe in God. At one place where a conference of Harijans was being held, the chairman delivered a harangue on atheism under the very shadow of a temple which Harijans had built for themselves with their own money. But out of the bitterness of his heart for the treatment meted out to fellow Harijans, he had begun to doubt the very existence of a benevolent Power that had allowed such cruelty to flourish. There was, perhaps, some excuse for this disbelief.

But here is a specimen of disbelief of another type from another source:

Don’t you think that a preconceived idea of a God, Truth or Reality might colour the whole trend of our search and hence be a great impediment and may defeat the very purpose of our life? For example, you take certain moral truths as fundamental. But we are in search and, as long as we have not found the reality, how can we boast or assert that a certain rule of morality is the truth or it alone. is going to help us in our search.

No search is possible without some workable assumptions. If we grant nothing, we find nothing. Ever since its commencement, the world, the wise and the foolish included, has proceeded upon the assumption that, if we are, God is and that, if God is not, we are not. And since belief in God is co-existent with the humankind, existence of God is treated as a fact more definite than the fact that the sun is. This living faith has solved the largest number of puzzles of life. It has alleviated our misery. It sustains us in life, it is our one solace in death. The very search for Truth becomes interesting, worth while, because of this belief. But search for Truth is search for God. Truth is God. God is, because Truth is. We embark upon the search, because we believe that there is Truth and that It can be found by diligent search and meticulous observance of the wellknown and well-tried rules of the search. There is no record in history of the failure of such search. Even the atheists who have pretended to disbelieve in God have believed in Truth. The trick they have performed is that of giving God another, not a new, name. His names are Legion. Truth is the crown of them all.

What is true of God is true, though in a less degree, of the ‘assumption of the truth of some fundamental moralities’. As a matter of fact, they are implied in the belief in God or Truth. Departure from these has landed the truants in endless misery. Difficulty of practice should not be confused with disbelief. A Himalayan expedition has its prescribed conditions of success. Difficulty of fulfilling the conditions does not make the expedition impossible. It only adds interest and zest to the search. Well, this expedition in search of God or Truth is infinitely more than numberless Himalayan expeditions and, therefore, much more interesting. If we have no zest for it, it is because of the weakness of our faith. What we see with our physical eyes is more real to us than the only Reality. We know that appearances are deceptive. And yet we treat trivialities as realities. To see the trivialities as such is half the battle won. It constitutes more than half the search after Truth or God. Unless we disengage ourselves from trivialities, we have not even the leisure for the great search; Or is it to be reserved for our leisure hours?

Let Harijan workers know that the campaign against untouchability is a part of the great search, whether we know it or not. Untouchability is a big falsehood. We have proved it for ourselves, or we should not be devotees of the cause. We can transmit the truth to others only by diligence and due observance of the conditions of success which have been often enough set forth in these columns.

50. LETTER TO DAVID B. HART

September 21, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter of 26th July last. The Indian movement stands for complete independence. That does not exclude an honourable partnership on absolutely equal terms. But there can be no association with imperialist exploitation of India or any other country. Naturally you have heard the opinion that India could not be left on its own. Imperialism has always justified itself in that manner. I believe in the maxim that no greater evil can befall a country than that it should lose its independence.

The caste system, as it exists at present, is certainly the bane of Hindu life. Its rigour is unmitigated by the British rule. On the contrary it gains force because of the so-called neutrality necessarily observed by the ruling power for the sake of itself. The great movement of removal of untouchability is an attack on the evil underlying the caste system.

Yours sincerely,

51. LETTER TO R. V. SASTRI

September 21, 1934

MY DEAR SASTRI,

Prithuraj tells me that he wrote to you about some account in connection with Harijan. Is Ganesan up to date in his accountkeeping? Are you keeping an eye on it? You know how particular I am about prompt attention to all matters referring to account-keeping.

There is a small subscription received here. Prithuraj will be writing about it. It is a matter of debit and credit entry. I would like you to examine the ledger-keeping and give me your personal assurance that everything is kept in order. Though I like Ganesan for his energy and enthusiasm, I have never been an admirer of his businesslikeness. On the contrary I have had sad experiences. But I have nursed him because I have believed in his integrity.

I hope both you and Visalakshi are doing well and have forgotten your grief.

54. LETTER TO JUGALKISHORE

September 21, 1934

MY DEAR JUGALKISHORE,

Your letter and statement to hand.

(1) It is no use my making any public statement. If you are not going to rejoin the institution, you and those who hold the same view should publicly announce your intention of not rejoining, in any case stating definitely that you would not because of your past political activity and to save the institution from remaining under the ban if your past activity had any connection with the continuance of the ban. I think too that it is open to the trustees to move the H. C for an order compelling the Government to lift the ban. But that is a purely legal point on which they should take legal advice. The trustees should consult Sir Tej, if they have access to him. He may give legal advice and also move the Government in his capacity as a public man.

(2) You can come whenever you like next month. I am in Wardha till 19th October. I shall give you some time for the discussion of education in general and village education in particular. You may come even earlier, if you want to see Kakasaheb too in the matter. He is here at present. He is laid up with fever which is slowly going down.

Yours,

55. LETTER TO KASTURBA GANDHI

September 21, 1934

BA,

No letter from you today. You will learn the news about Sumitra from my letter to Ramdas. You must not worry on her account nor on Nimu’s. Amtussalaam and Vasumati go there regularly. Radhakisan1 is there, of course. Amala has secured a job in Santiniketan and will leave in a few days. She is very happy about it. Kakasahep was having a temperature but it is coming down gradually. I daily walk up the...

56. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ
September 21, 1934

CHI. JAMNALAL,

As the doctor here confessed his helplessness regarding Sumitra’s eyes and advised her to be immediately taken to Bombay, I have sent her with Saritabehn. I have asked her to stay in Mani Bhuvan. The responsibility of finding the doctor rests on Sardar. You will not have to worry. However, they will come and see you.

Let not the repeated postponement of your return worry you. Come only when the doctor declares it safe. Till then let there be no burden on your mind concerning the affairs here.

Most probably Madan Mohan1 will leave today. The Khan Brothers are quite comfortable. The younger brother is learning hand-spinning and the elder looks after Jones and Kaka. There is no need to worry about them. Radhakisan is an efficient worker.

I hope you follow the rules of diet suggested [by me]. What is your weight? Has Ghanshyamdas’s operation been put off?

CHI. JAMNALAL,

You probably remember a sum of Rs. 500 having been paid to Madhavadas, Ba’s brother. He duly got the money. Of the total amount, Rs. 325 was paid at the time through Thakkar Bapa and the balance seems to have been drawn from the firm’s office. That sum of Rs. 325 should now be returned to Thakkar Bapa. Send him a hundi for this amount. Particulars: ‘In repayment of Rs. 325 paid to Gandhi in Bombay.’

And now about Madan Mohan. I thought he would leave today for Bombay. But now that will not be possible. The Khan Brothers seem to need him here, though they said so only jokingly. They might give Madan Mohan some writing work, and would also like somebody whom they knew to accompany them everywhere. If you don’t specially need Madan Mohan there, let him remain here for the present. Or if you can think of somebody else to take his place, let me know. Even if, however, you cannot do that and if you need Madan Mohan, I will send him immediately. In any case I will discuss the matter with them tomorrow.

Radhakisan must have written to you about Manhar Singh.

58. LETTER TO CHHAGANLAL JOSHI

September 21, 1934

CHHAGANLAL,

I got your letter. I should say ‘letters’ rather.

I got your statement. You have fought well. Try and see if you can fight in Lakhtar\(^1\) now. If you can find anybody there who knows the Lakhtar ruler, use his good offices. Parikshitlal must have written to you about this.

I can understand that you cannot become a permanent secretary till you have come to like the place. Time and circumstances keep doing their work. We are ruled by them. That is why we sing “Thy will be done.”

Till a permanent advisory board can be appointed, let things go on as at present. If you keep up the practice of consulting people in matters on which they are qualified to advise, you will be able to form from among them the kind of board you require.

The message which I have sent to workers in Gujarat is meant for all. Whether at present there are only two or three or 20 or 30 workers who can work in that manner doesn’t worry me. I have only presented the ideal. We cannot revive the Vidyapith in the same form. Circumstances have changed and we have gone through new experiences. In the causes for despair which you have described, I see rays of hope. What one or two persons are doing today will be taken up tomorrow by ten or twenty and by two hundred or three hundred the day after. If, however, the experiment is not sound or if no worker of the right type has gone to any village, let it fail. If the experiment itself is unsound, it ought to fail or it will seem to have failed for want of the right type of expert workers. Some of us will try to make ourselves such workers. So long as we believe that India lives in her villages and not in her cities, we must go to the villages sooner or later. If so, why not today?

Neither Kaka nor Narahari has left the Vidyapith. If you say that Narahari has not gone to work in a village, that would be partly true. Anybody who lives among Harijans will be living in his mind in a village. If that is not so, he wouldn’t be able to render true service to Harijans. Where do the five or seven crores of Harijans live? You, I, Narahari and all others should have our hearts where they live.

\(^1\) Where Harijans were forbidden the use of the public reservoir

Kaka, too, has not left. Because he has ceased to be a trustee, does that mean that he has left the institution? Why shouldn’t we say, rather, that his connection with the institution has become closer? He himself thinks so. If you still do not understand, ask me again without the slightest hesitation. Kaka must be in Ahmedabad at present, and Vallabhbhai in Bombay. Swami, Kishorelal and the rest are here. Just now Devdas too is here.

I intend to take one more step. I am not discussing it here. I will ask Kishorelal to write to you today about it if he can.

Please do not feel disheartened. The examples of Bal and others show that we have to purify and strengthen our faith. Those who desert the cause obey their own nature. We need not lament what they do. I hope Rama’, Vimu’ and Dhiru’ are quite well. Where do you all stay?

59. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

September 21, 1934

BHAISHRI VALLABHBHAI,

I wish to add one more to your already numerous burdens. You will find with this the opinion of the Civil Surgeon here about Sumitra’s condition. In view of it, I am immediately sending her there with her grandmother today. They will stay in Mani Bhuvan, but you may keep them with you if you wish. Get Sumitra examined and treated by an eye-specialist. She has trachoma and also astigmatism. Both the conditions require treatment. Mani may accompany her wherever it may be necessary to take her.

My statement is being widely criticized. Please do create an atmosphere favourable to my leaving the Congress. Nobody is likely to be interested in the programme of spinning and weaving khadi, as you have rightly pointed out in your statement¹.

I sent you yesterday a copy of my reply² to Vamanrao. Aney came and saw me yesterday. He spent full two hours with me. You must have read our joint statement³. There was a wire from Nekiram informing me that Malaviyaji was coming on the 26th. It was received while Aney was here. I have replied to say that Malaviyaji should not be put to the trouble of coming here, and that it would be enough if the two parties realized that whichever was likely to be defeated should withdraw. I should certainly like Chintamani⁴ and Kunzru⁵ to get elected. They are very useful persons. I don’t know, though, how that can be assured. How can we know what the conditions in the U.P. are? Outside the U.P., I don’t think they will succeed anywhere. He says that their candidates will win in Bengal. He is also hopeful about Phukan and about a successful tour of Utkal. Most probably they will not put up any candidate against Asaf Ali. He told me that there was complete rot in the affairs of Bengal. That the Congress office should be raided in broad daylight and Congress papers should be carried away was the limit. The raiders, however, did not find the faked receipts for which they had planned the raid. It is said that among them were some well-known Congress volunteers. Kaka’s fever has yet left him completely.

64. LETTER TO NARAYAN M. KHARE

September 22, 1934

CHI. PANDITJI,

I have read your letter to Kishorelal. Kaka’s fever may be said to have come down now. But he will still have to be careful. What you write about him seems perfectly correct. There will be a great deal of misunderstanding if he leaves Gujarat. Probably you do not know the reason for his decision to resign. It is not his failure to consult the other colleagues. That was not a very serious error. And there is also some misunderstanding regarding that. But though he had not consulted the colleagues he stated in his letter to the Collector that the trustees desired to make a gift. A trustee ought not to be guilty of such a lapse. And, therefore, as atonement for it he resigned the trusteeship. This was a correct step. Neither Vallabhbhai nor anybody else had anything to do with it. It was only a question of self-purification or self-awakening. Now Kaka will refrain from leaving Gujarat at least for avoiding a misunderstanding.

No senior woman worker from the Ashram will be attached to Lakshmibehn. All of them are following their own independent paths. I like this very much. We should be satisfied with whatever progress results from this. What Lakshmibehn needs is not company but a co-worker. She seems to feel alone here. Perhaps she will feel like that everywhere and always. I think she would prefer to have three or four or some more girls entrusted to her independent charge and be completely free to manage them as she liked. She would both need and not need an adviser. That is, she would consult him whenever she was in doubt, but act according to her own judgment. This is not a defect, nor may it be a virtue; or it can be either. It can be a shining virtue when it springs solely from the spirit of service. But such is not Lakshmibehn’s case. However, she has no clear plan for the future. I, therefore, wish to discuss the problem again with her. I have already discussed it once and this is the impression I have formed. Can she stay with you? Do you desire it? How much do you earn there? For how long do you intend to stay there? You do wish ultimately to bury yourself in a village, don’t you?

1 Addressee’s wife
The Kanya Vidyalaya cannot be run today solely by women. We do not yet have a sufficient number of such women workers. A few institutions seem to be run by them, but even in their case men help indirectly. There is no harm in this. Men’s help will be needed for some years at least for running institutions in accordance with our ideals. They are part of our experiment also. There must be some men who have something of the woman too in them. If men and women can never live together without getting disturbed by sex attractions, their brahmacharya is not brahmacharya. Do not mother and son, father and daughter, brother and sister so live? Why, then, cannot men and women who are not so related live likewise? If we are sincere, we shall progress through our mistakes and realize one day that what seemed impossible has become possible.

I hope you don’t believe that there was the slightest feeling of despair in my advice to break up the Ashram. If despair was the reason, I would have declared it. The sacrifice of the Ashram was intended to add lustre to the great work it had done. It is a pure thing, not an impure one, that is given as sacrifice. The Ashram had purity enough for the cause for which it was sacrificed.

The reason behind my desire to leave the Congress is not corruption in it, but the increasing differences of principle with the intellectual section in it. We can reform the constitution to deal with corruption, but to deal with differences of opinion one of the two parties should surrender to the other or they should fight it out. The path of surrender is in conformity with ahimsa—in fighting there is mostly himsa.

About other things Kishorelal will write.

65. LETTER TO NARAYAN M. DESAI

September 22, 1934

CHI. NARAYANRAO,

May I call you Narayanrao now? Should a boy named after Narayana be timid or brave? Why should one be afraid of a minor operation like the removal of tonsils? Even little children, much younger than you, submit to such operation. Mani was brought home immediately after such an operation. Will you be brave now? If you are not, you, I, Mahadev and Durga, all of us, will be disgraced. Even that doesn’t matter, though. But the Ashram also will be disgraced. How is it that you, who never tire of singing big bhajans, are afraid of a little pain? Come, then, save our honour.

66. LETTER TO SURENDRRA

September 22, 1934

CHI. SURENDRRA,

I understand what you say about M. I have now received a letter of repentance from him. What pulled him down was his pride and his misplaced confidence about his purity. I see that even in his letter of repentance. We have now made some change in our way of living; still, I would suggest that whenever we suspect anybody we should caution him and the head of the institution in which he is working. If I had had the faintest suspicion, I could perhaps have done him some good and he would not have been permitted to continue with self-indulgence for years as he did. Sharma says that he had cautioned me. But I don’t remember. However, I had no faith at all in his judgment at that time. Even today I don’t have much. I had proved to him in two instances that he was too willing to see the evil side of a man. But when you say a thing I will certainly have to think about it.

What you say regarding girls is perfectly right for those who are vigilant. But this [freedom of] association is implied in our experiment. Because our custom has been different and the present-day ideas of unrestricted freedom are getting mixed up with our experiment, there is an appearance of failure in it. But my impression on the whole is that our experiment has not proved a failure. We should not forget that the experiment is based on the truth that the atman is its own friend or enemy. We are trying to teach the girls to learn to protect themselves. Similarly, we can only guide the young men. We may try to frame rules of propriety to serve as hedges. Sometimes our calculations may even go wrong. We should go on correcting such errors. I regard untruth to be a greater sin than sexual immorality. If we don’t get tired and don’t give up our worship of truth, it will be well with us in the end.

67. LETTER TO NARAHARI D. PARIKH

September 22, 1934

CHI. NARAHARI.

One must accept water served by anybody, unless, of course, his hand or the utensil is not clean. You may, if you wish, except that worker’s mother from this rule, though I wouldn’t like even that. If we make such an exception, it is likely to create a good deal of bitterness in the Ashram. I go even further and hold that, though the restrictions about inter-dining and inter-marrying observed outside the Ashram are all right, we should tolerate no restrictions about inter-dining in the Ashram. Hence we shall be justified in accepting anybody as a tenant only if he is ready to go as far as we do in this matter. Sometimes we may have to tolerate a person whose services we need in connection with our work but who sticks to some practices regarding untouchability. For example, an artisan whose help we require for a Harijan may tell us that he will not eat or drink anything touched by the latter, and we are unable to get anybody else; we may tolerate such a person. But your questions are not about such a case.

You have still not been able to satisfy Sardar. Try to do so if you can. The problem of the library has no connection with the question he has raised. You should see that very clearly. Sardar has not found fault with me, but Kaka’s error implies an error on my part. Moreover, even if I am not a trustee, I am looked upon as a very vigilant watchman. Looking at the matter in that light, it can be said that I should have saved Kaka even from writing that letter to the Collector. Why did I at all [allow the] mention of the other Trustees in the letter without verifying the facts? But doesn’t the poet’s line, “the powerful attract no blame”, apply to me also? It is not that I have not borne this in mind. Only, I have not involved myself in this affair. It is enough for me that I have understood the truth. And what more vigilance can I exercise? If I did not act on the assumption that everybody knew his responsibility in what he did, I would not be able to cope with as much work as I do. I have acted in this manner all my life. I have been content to accept moral responsibility.

After writing all this, the conclusion to which I come is this, that though Vallabhbhai has understood all this in his mind he has fearlessly done what he thought right. Even if, therefore, he harbours prejudice against Kaka, that cannot be deduced from this incident. Hence, if he did anything in the past, that should not be made a reason by Kaka for leaving Gujarat just now and, therefore, not a word should be uttered against Sardar. Kaka has held his view all the time and we ought to try to persuade him to change it. I did that even while I was in jail and am still trying to persuade Kaka to see the matter in that light. And since Vallabhbhai’s name has been connected with Kaka’s desire to leave Gujarat and his good name has suffered, it has become all the more Kaka’s duty not to leave Gujarat. Only then can the wings of slander be clipped. Otherwise this kabar will keep on flying.

Does this reasoning appeal to you?

69. INTRODUCTION TO “VARNAVYAVASTHA”³

September 23, 1934⁴

This booklet is a collection of all my writings on varnadharma. Its printing was complete some or perhaps many months ago but it remained unpublished in the absence of an introduction. I had agreed to write the introduction but could not do so till now on account of my Harijan tour.⁵

I

I should have loved to go through all my speeches and writings on varnashrama during the past fifteen years before writing this introduction, but it was physically impossible. perhaps it is well that I cannot do so. I have never made a fetish of consistency. I am a votary of truth and I must say what I feel and think at a given moment on the question, without regard to what I may have said before on it. The publisher too wants this.⁶ It is for the reader to find out how far my present views coincide with those formerly expressed. Wherever he finds that what I have said or written before runs contrary to what I am writing now, he should without hesitation reject the former. I do not claim omniscience.⁷ I claim to be a votary of truth and to follow to the best of my ability what seems to be the truth at a given time. As my vision gets clearer, my views must grow clearer with daily practice. Where I have deliberately altered an opinion, the change should be obvious, only a careful eye would notice a gradual and imperceptible evolution.

Varnashramadharma is a compound word known to all our vernaculars, and, though the word dharma (law) is related to both the components, varna and ashrama, the words are rarely used in separation. Hinduism is but another and imperfect name for varnashramadharma. The word ‘Hindu’ was apparently coined by foreigners and has more geographical than any other content. The dharma (religion or law) that Hindus have professed to observe is varnashramadharma. To say that the dharma of the Hindus is Aryan does not carry us very far. It simply means that the Hindus, or those who lived in the east of the Indus or believed in the Vedic dharma, called themselves Aryas and others non-Aryas. To give our dharma this kind of ethnic label is in my opinion misleading. It should have a name that declares its predominant characteristic, and everyone will admit that Hinduism is nothing without the law of varna and ashrama. It would be impossible to find any smriti of which a large part was not devoted to varnashramadharma. This law of varna and ashrama is to be traced to our most ancient scriptures —the Vedas, and so no one who calls himself a Hindu may ignore it. It is his duty to study it in all its bearings, and to reject it if it is an excrescence, and to foster it and restore it to its pristine purity, if it represents a universal law.

So far as the law of ashrama is concerned, it is extinct, alike in profession and observance. Hinduism lays down four ashramas or stages—the life of a brahmachari (continent student), the life of a grihastha (householder), the life of a vanaprastha (who has retired) and the life of a sannyasi (renunciator)—through which every Hindu has to pass to fulfil his purpose in life. But the first and the third are practically non-existent today, the fourth may be said to be observed in name to a small extent. The second is professed to be observed by all today, but it is observed in name, not in spirit. Grihasthas or householders of a kind we all are, inasmuch as we eat and drink and propagate our kind, like all created beings. But in doing so, we fulfil the law of the flesh and not of the spirit. Only those married couples who fulfil the law of the spirit can be said to observe the law of grihasta-ashrama. Those who live the mere animal life do not observe the law. The life of householders of today is one of indulgence. And as the four stages represent a ladder of growth and are interdependent, one cannot leap to the stage of a vanaprastha or a sannyasi, unless he or she fulfilled the law of the first two ashramas—brahmacharya and grihastha. The law of the ashrama, therefore, is a dead letter today. It can be revived only if the law of varna, with which it is intimately interlinked, is revived.

That brings us to a consideration of the law of varna. Varna ‘can certainly be said to exist, though in a distorted form. There are four varnas, but the distortion that passes as varna today is divided into countless castes. All the four varnas are divided into numerous castes and sub-castes, but Whilst those who belong to the first three are not ashamed to declare that they belong to them, those who belong to the fourth, viz., Shudra, prefer to declare the sub-caste as their label rather than their varna, which they regard as a badge of humiliation.

But labels never reveal a man’s character, nor does the fact that a man clings to a label show that he deserves it. A black man will not be red, no matter how repeatedly he calls himself red. In the same way, one does not become a Brahmin by calling oneself a Brahmin. Not until a man reveals in his life the attributes of a Brahmin can he deserve that name. Considered in this light, varna may be said to be extinct. If we may, indeed, claim a label, we can call ourselves Shudras, though really we are not entitled to that name either, inasmuch as we do not observe the law of that varna. This law is the law of one’s being, which one has to fulfil. The fulfilment should be spontaneous and no matter of honour or shame. How many are there who are fulfilling the law as law, i.e., spontaneously? We fulfil it because we cannot help it we are all serfs, whether we will it or no. Let no one contend that varna exists today, because all the functions of the different varnas are being performed by someone or the other and somehow or the other. Varna is intimately, if not indissolubly, connected with birth, and the observance of the law of varna means the following on the part of us all the hereditary and traditional calling of our forefathers in a spirit of duty. Those who thus fulfil the law of their varna can be counted on one’s fingers’ ends. This performance of one’s hereditary function is done as a matter of duty, though it naturally carries with it the earning of one’s livelihood. Thus, the function of a Brahmin is to study and to teach the science of Brahma (or spiritual truth). He performs the function, as he cannot do otherwise, as it is the law of his being. That secures him his livelihood, but he will take it as a gift from God. A Kshatriya will perform the function of protecting the people in the same spirit, accepting for his livelihood whatever the people can afford to give him. A Vaishya will pursue wealth-producing occupations for the welfare of the community, keeping for himself enough for his own maintenance and rendering the balance to the community in one shape or another. A Shudra will perform physical labour in the same spirit of service.

Varna is determined by birth, but can be retained only by observing its obligations. One born of Brahmin parents will be called a Brahmin, but if his life fails to reveal the attributes of a Brahmin when he comes of age, he cannot be called a Brahmin. He will have fallen from Brahminhood. On the other hand, one who is born not a Brahmin but reveals in his conduct the attributes of a Brahmin will be regarded as a Brahmin, though he will himself disclaim the label.

Varna thus conceived is no man-made institution but the law of life universally governing the human family. Fulfilment of the law would make life livable, would spread peace and content, end all clashes and conflicts, put an end to starvation and pauperization, solve the problem of population and even end disease and suffering.

But if varna reveals the law of one’s being and thus the duty one has to perform, it confers no right, and the idea of superiority or inferiority is wholly repugnant to it. All varnas are equal, for the community depends no less on one than on another. Today varna means gradations of high and low. It is a hideous travesty of the original. The law of varna was discovered by our ancestors by stern austerities. They sought to live up to the law to the best of their capacity. We have distorted it today and have made ourselves the laughing-stock of the world. No wonder that we have today amongst the Hindus a section which is bending its energies to a destruction of the institution which in their opinion spells the ruin of Hinduism. And certainly one need have no mercy for the hideous distortion, which means nothing but destruction of Hinudism.1

I do not for a moment suggest that there should be no restrictions about food and drink or about marital relations. I do not myself regard it a duty to eat whatever is offered and in whatever

1 The Gujarati original of what follows appeared in Harijanbandhu 23-9-1934. company I should chance to be, and I regard it as nothing short of self-indulgence to marry according to one’s fancy. Strict restraint is the law of life and must, therefore, govern these relations no less than others. I hold that there are rules about diet. Man is not an omnivorous animal, nor may he pick up his mate wherever he likes.
But restrictions on marital or social relations have nothing to do with varnadharma, which is a different thing altogether. I can conceive blameless marital relations between different varnas, and people of different varnas seated together to eat food permissible to all. There is evidence enough to show that in ancient times there were no watertight compartments between varnas, so far as marital and social relations went, and I have no doubt that, in making varna a mere matter of restrictions about food and drink and marriage, we have done
Hinduism grave harm.

Though the law of varna is a special discovery of some Hindu seer, it has universal application. Every religion has some distinguishing characteristic, but if it expresses a principle or law, it ought to have universal application. That is how I look at the law of varna. The world may ignore it today but it will have to accept it in the time to come.

I would define the law briefly thus: The law of varna means that everyone shall follow as a matter of dharma—duty—the hereditary calling of his forefathers, in so far as it is not inconsistent with fundamental ethics. He will earn his livelihood by following that calling. He may not hoard riches, but devote the balance for the good of the people.

The four varnas have been compared in the Vedas to the four members of the body, and no simile could be happier. If they are members of one body, how can one be superior or inferior to another? If the members of the body had the power of expression and each of them were to say that it was higher and better than the rest, the body would go to pieces. Even so, our body politic, the body of humanity, would go to pieces, if it were to perpetuate the canker of superiority or inferiority. It is this canker that is at the root of the various ills of our time, especially class-wars and civil strife. It should not be difficult for even the meanest understanding to see that these wars and strife could not be ended except by the observance of the law of varna. For it ordains that everyone shall fulfil the law of one’s being by doing in a spirit of duty and service that to which one is born. Earning of livelihood is the necessary result. But the law has to be fulfilled for its own sake. Its due observance by a large part of mankind will end the conflicting inequalities and give place to an equality in diversity. All callings would be equally reputable—whether that of the minister or of the lawyer, of the doctor or the leather-worker, of the carpenter or the scavenger, of the soldier or the trader, of the farmer or the spiritual teacher. In this ideal state of things, there would be no room for the monstrous anomaly of the three varnas lording it over the Shudra, or of the Kshatriya and the Vaishya enjoying themselves in their palaces and the Brahmin contenting himself with a cottage and the Shudra toiling for the rest and living in a hovel. This chaotic state of things indicates that the law of varna has become a dead letter.

When, if ever, the ideal state of things, as indicated above, had been reached in India, I do not know. But I do hold that it is the only ideal state that is easy enough to approach and that it is not only for the Hindus but for the whole of humanity.

Under such dispensation, all property will be held by its respective holders in trust for the community. No one will claim it as his own. The king will hold his palace in trust for his people and will collect the taxes only to be used for the benefit of the people. He has the right to have no more than is enough to keep him, the rest belongs to, and shall be spent only for, the people. Indeed, he will, by virtue of his resourcefulness as a ruler, add to what he collects from the people and return it to them manifold. The Vaishya likewise is such a trustee. The Shudra is made so. Indeed, if one may have preference, the Shudra, who performs body-labour in a spirit of service and duty, who has nothing to call his own and who has no desire for ownership, is worthy of the world’s homage; he is the lord of all because he is the greatest servant. The dutiful Shudra will, of course, repudiate any such claim, but the gods will shower their choicest blessings on him. One may not say this of the proletariat of the present day. They certainly own nothing, but I expect they covet ownership. The calling of labour and service is no pleasant duty to them. It is a painful task, for it does not satisfy even the cravings of the flesh. My praise is for the ideal labourer. It is the estate I have longed to attain.

But this duty of labour cannot be imposed on anybody. In fact, the panegyric may be uttered only by those of the three varnas who fulfil the law themselves, viz., the law of regarding and behaving themselves as the servants of the community and holding all the property in trust for it. The three varnas exist today only in name, they are supposed to invest one with a higher status than that of the Shudras and have ceased to imply any duty to be performed. There is nothing, therefore, to be surprised at, nor to be sorry for, when in such a state of things the Shudras should be jealous of the others’ possessions and their estate and seek to share them. When the law of varna was discovered, there could be no compulsion from without. The world can only be sustained by a willing and dutiful observance of it.

In an age where competition is held to be the law of life, and possession in the largest measure of the world’s goods the sumnum bonum, and when everyone counts oneself free to follow any calling one likes, this attempt to hold up varna as the law of life may well be regarded as an idle dream, and an attempt to revive it as childish folly. Be that as it may, it is my firm conviction that it is true socialism. In the language of the Gita, it is equality of the spirit, without which no other equality is possible. The performance of it, no matter how slight, bodes well both for him who performs it and for the rest of mankind.

I may add that, though the varnas are to be four, the number is not, in my opinion, unalterable. In the future reconstruction, the number may be more or even less than four. What is essential is that one must seek one’s livelihood, and no more, from following the vocation to which one is born.

70. ‘BLESSSED POVERTY’

Several years ago, a close friend and associate belonging to a rich prosperous family, who had received a high degree of education and had travelled and seen much in different parts of the world, solemnly-abjured the use of all vehicular and other means of transport and has ever since stuck to his resolve through all vicissitudes of weather and health. He has kept up correspondence with me. I have preserved one of his letters which I received during my Harijan tour, in order to share it with the readers of the Harijanbandhu. I am sure the following excerpt from it recounting some of his experiences will be appreciated by them:

Of the many vows that I took, I have found the one about travelling on foot to be the most beneficial. It has afforded me the richest experience. As a result of it, my faith in God today is much stronger than it was when I set out from Ahmedabad about a couple of years ago.

Having had experience of both riches and poverty, I am in a position to testify today that, whilst I have almost always found pride and licence threatening the life of the rich and whilst those who wielded authority could not without difficulty escape the intoxication of power, poverty alone left enough scope for a spontaneous and natural devotion to God, a spirit of service and the capacity to suffer and to endure. I have now clearly realized that the state of voluntary poverty is really a blessed state and that riches, in the worldly sense, are nothing in comparison. May God always keep me in poverty and keep me free from the slightest desire for possession or from the care for the morrow.

Everywhere I have found that men despise the sinning and the fallen, and yet who amongst us can claim to be immaculate? I have at last grasped the great secret of shunning sin but not the sinner.

This friend has travelled on foot from Gujarat to and beyond Dehra Dun, has passed through hundreds upon hundreds of villages and come in contact with the villagers. His testimony should, therefore, command our respect. Kindred spirits in all climes and ages have borne similar testimony to the joy and beauty of travelling on foot and renouncing all worldly possessions. Thoreau’s Walden in praise of walking is well known. All the great reformers of the world who have from time to time effected religious revolutions have eschewed the use of vehicles and walked thousands of miles for delivering their mission. Yet, by the intensity of their faith and the strength of their realization, they were able to achieve what we, in our aeroplane age, with all the gee-gaws at our command, could hardly aspire to. Not mad rush, but unperturbed calmness brings wisdom. This maxim holds as true today as when it was first propounded ages ago.¹

Those who hear of this aspirant’s experience will not all take to walking nor will they pray to become poor. Also they may not distinguish between the sin and the sinner and learn to love the sinner.

and abhor sin. But it will be no mean achievement if we learn the value of this attitude and try to follow it as best as we can. A Harijan worker at any rate ought to do nothing less than this.

_Harijan, 12-10-1934, and Harijanbandhu, 23-9-1934_

71. ROBBERY IN THE NAME OF RELIGION

I give below extracts from a letter¹ which Shri Chhotalal Gandhi of Ankleshwar has written to me regarding the Harijans of Sajod.

While the wound of Talaja is still fresh, here is another. Everywhere it is the same. The law says that Harijan Hindus enjoy equal civil rights with caste Hindus. Even the officials are ready to help. But the fanatic Hindus seem to care little for the law or order of the officers. How to overcome such utter ignorance? Ahimsa seems defeated and love seems to dry up. But I find the pen quoting the lines: “As long as the elephant relied on his own strength, it availed him not” and “Rama is the strength of the weak” and they comfort me. Ahimsa is true ahimsa only if it keeps shining even in the midst of darkness all around. The remedy for _himsa_ is ahimsa, for hatred love and for untruth truth, as the remedy for cold is sunshine.

If there are sincere, religious-minded reformers in Sajod, they are sure to win in the end. Let the fanatic caste Hindus do as they please. The reformers should shelter the oppressed Harijans. They should rigidly adhere to the rule that they will refuse to avail themselves of any facility not permitted to the Harijans. They should of course secure for the latter officers’ help whenever necessary. They should plead with the caste Hindus to keep within proper limits. Let the orthodox Hindus take bath or do any other expiation if the Harijans exercise their rights and enter a public place. The Shastras do not enjoin punishment of the Harijans. They only say that anybody who regards himself polluted should take a bath. No Shastra suggests that we should harass or beat the person by whom we regard ourselves polluted. This is so simple a thing that the reformers should have confidence in themselves and, keeping within the bounds of ahimsa, go on doing their duty.

The suggestion to send some well-known public worker to Sajod

and the nearby places is certainly a good one. But visits by the leaders in Ankleshwar taluka itself are likely to produce better results than a visit by someone sent from a distant place. We cannot always rely on such outside help. Ultimate success will depend on the ceaseless vigilance, ability and capacity for self-restraint of the local workers.

I have your letter and now letters from children. I am glad that they like the place. Of course you cannot give another name to your bungalow, and the expression “Vision Bungalow” is quite good and significant.

Andrews was here a week ago and he would be back on Tuesday from Santiniketan. Mira expects to be in Bombay just in time for the Congress session.

Ramdas had fever and general debility. He is now better.

I understand that the spinning-wheel was sent to Porto Novo, and I hope that it has now come to you. I would like to know the progress made upon it
How nice it would be to have you here at this time! The weather is superb—very cold, [sic] not too much sunshine and yet enough of it.

September 24, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

With reference to your letter of the 20th instant, received yesterday, it seems to me that your question can be answered in two ways. If the exhibition is to be an exhibition of things that India has been able to produce, exhibits such as you refer to have their proper place in such an exhibition. It however, the exhibition is a purely educational effort made to encourage khadi and swadeshi in terms of the millions, then I should exclude rigorously anything that has no direct bearing on the manufactures made today by the millions of villagers in the villages. I have no right to say anything further, or to give any further guidance. Your Committee are the proper judges to decide what the exhibition is for, or what it should have.

DEAR SISTER,

Govindbhai’s letter is very strange. If I were you, I should not enter into any argument with him, but simply clear the position. I would still like you to go there—not to find someone else but yourself. Pondicherry is one of the places where such a search may be fruitful. G. has written to me also. I can see no good in complete dissociation from physical human contact. You have to achieve it notwithstanding physical contact. I would like you to go [to] Mayavati or Bellur. 80. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI

September 24, 1934

CHI. RAMDAS.

I don’t like your idea of paying Sharma. His services cannot be rewarded with money. You two have become friends. There can be no giving and receiving money between friends. I think he will feel offended if you offer to pay him. If he does accept, I would be surprised. His needs are being met and I have also been doing whatever else is necessary for him. You need not, therefore, worry about his economic condition. In fact I see from his letters that he would be fully satisfied if you are completely cured physically, mentally and spiritually and if you can testify that you were cured mainly through his instrumentality—and that is as it should be. I would, therefore, advise you to give up the idea of paying him that sum. Having said this, let me repeat that you are a completely free agent and that the money belongs to you. If you think that giving it to him would be the best way of using it, by all means give it. You may rest assured that what pleases you will please me.

81. LETTER TO GOVINDBHAI R.PATEL

September 24, 1934

BHAI GOVINDBHAI.

I am surprised to see that you can positively state that our paths are different. You also seem to have forgotten the Ashram rules. As for my aim, you will see even if you read my statement just published that it is the same as yours. It is possible that our paths seem different. How innumerable are the lines which lead from the circumference of a circle to its centre? I suppose you also know that I am all the time in search of a guru. I don,t know when I will meet him, but I am striving to deserve one. The game is in God,s hands. In any case that Guru of all gurus is always there. I dance as He pulls me.

I read your letter to Khurshedbehn. She is about 40. She is a granddaughter of Dadabhai Naoroji and is a learned woman. She has toured Europe. But still she lacks peace of mind. She has read some writings of Shri Aurobindo. I have, therefore, advised her to go there and have some experience of the place. ¹ She is not a woman who would go anywhere merely out of curiosity. I found your letter to her very curt. What do you mean when you say that there will be no objection to her staying in a hotel? If now you realize that your letter was discourteous, write her a courteous letter and invite her.

Krishnadas gave me news about you. There was a letter to Brijkrishnadas from the lady-superintendent of your institution saying that you were having fever with temperature at 100º and have lost ten lb., that you can eat only once a day and felt no appetite in the evening. You occasionally write me a postcard, but it is always practically blank. I think it would be better if, instead, you didn’t write at all.

You should understand that, if they say dharma should be practised with proper regard for one,s health, while studying also one should take proper care of one,s health. Even if you were to stand first in the examination, what good would it do if, in the bargain, you were to become bed-ridden? Why don’t you study so as not to endanger your health? Can you not prepare for the same examination in Rajkot? Sushila would certainly help you. You will get there facility for studying all the subjects which you are studying now. The air and water of Rajkot have also agreed with you. Krishnadas says that you have also not been able to make any friend there. If all this is true, you should write to me so that I might write more. If you are afraid that somebody might read your letters, you should mark them ‘Private., Nobody would then read them.

85. LETTER TO KANTI GANDHI

September 25, 1934

CHI. KANTI,

I got your letter. I had already asked [them] to write [to you] before I received it.

Nobody will read your letter, though it contains nothing private and anybody who reads it is likely to learn something from it. I would like it if you send me your articles, etc. I may be able to know your progress from them.

Your time-table is good. Your hours of rising and meals seem to be all right.

I will arrange that a sum of Rs. 5 be sent to you every month as suggested by you. I should like you to let me know your needs without any hesitation. Ramachandran will not accept boarding charges for you. I will respect his wishes.

Your reading is good. Don’t mind if he teaches you poems. One should learn them too. I suppose you are learning short-hand only for my sake. I think you have unnecessarily taken up that burden. But I am not asking you to stop it now. It is certainly a useful thing. I am very glad that you are learning Malayalam. I think it would be very good if you pick it up and also Tamil. It is not difficult for one who loves languages to learn several of them. After you have had some experience there, you may spend some time in Madanapally if you wish to do so. Try to acquaint yourself with the music of that place.
I have not read the book about the renascence. You did well in quoting the passages. Many such things are being written about me. I learn something even from them. At least one learns humility. It is necessary for us to know how others see us. Sometimes they may even be right. For self-examination, such criticism is very useful indeed. Praises are of no help here. One learns very much from criticism.

Write to me regularly.

I receive letters from Harilal regularly. He at any rate says that a very good change has come over him. He is studying the Gita fairly well. I have written to him and promised to help him. Let us see what happens. Ba and Ramdas are still at Sabarmati. Ramdas is fairly well.

86. A LETTER

September 25, 1934

Did I write to you about the long letter I received from Dwarkanath? This was as different from his letter to you as an elephant is from a horse. In it he was flying in the air. He had shaken off the bondage of rules and it seemed to him easy to achieve in a matter of days what Vishwamitra had taken years to do.¹

87. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

September 25, 1934

CHI. BRIJKRISHNA,

I have your letter. The last letter I have not sent to Damodardas. If the matter is to be clarified you should write to him direct. I have no idea if I shall have any time to spare in Bombay.
I do not see any harm in accepting a maintenance allowance from your brothers. You cannot but accept it from some source or the other if you devote all your time to serving.

As your brothers cannot render service themselves there is nothing surprising if they supported one who wishes to serve; it will be a noble act. So far you could be said to have been observing aparigraha\(^1\). But accumulating the amount in balance is as good as stealing and outright possession. What can a really poor man do for his friends? Should he steal and give them money? This is not friendship but enmity which you are practising. Why should you not announce to all your friends that you are no more a Chandiwala\(^2\) but only a poor servant. Their friendship will be proved true if they remain your friends even in your poverty. Have you any idea how you and they became friends? You had money and they squandered it right and left. All that you write in this respect is only self-deception. At any rate, this is my reading. But you are not to act upon it till you have truly realized it. Your heart’s bidding should be regarded as the truth though the world may pronounce it false.

What can you possibly do in Bombay during the Congress session? Do you want to fall ill? Why need you leave the quiet of Mussoorie? Stay on and spin more, engage in deeper introspection and make yourself fit. But even in this matter your own inclination must not be repressed. For my part I am keeping everyone away.

My dear Horace,

I love you all the more, if more was possible, for your frank letter. You will be surprised to know that long before I received your letter I had expressed the opinion that Jawaharlal could present the Indian case more convincingly than I before English audiences. What you have said therefore is not new to me. But even apart from that I am quite sure that I must not leave India for the present at any rate. I can speak to you all more effectively from here. Nor do I think that any purpose can be served by sending Mrs. G. there alone. I am sure that both she and I must be dismissed from the minds of English friends in so far as our visit is concerned. I want every minute I can have for the things I have said in my recent statement.

91. LETTER TO SITARAM SASTRY

September 27, 1934

DEAR SITARAM SASTRY,

I have your letter enclosing me a report of the Khaddar Samsthan. You give me therein the speed of takli spinners. It is very poor compared to the results obtained here. Therefore my opinion is that someone should learn the method of spinning adopted here.

It is a brilliant discovery. The highest speed attained is 400 rounds per hour. It is easily learnt. The average speed attained here is over 200 rounds. Little children learn the method much more quickly than old men like me. I am trying to learn it. I have not mastered it, but I have no doubt that with a little perseverance I shall be able to do well. I am not yet satisfied with the barter method in which paddy has been adopted as the standard. It requires very careful study.

September 27, 1934

MY DEAR AMRITLAL,

With reference to our conversation of yesterday, I know that my letters and my talks about the Congress attitude in respect of the Princes and the people of the Indian States have given rise to some misunderstanding. It surprises me that anybody should think that I do not consider them to be an integral part of the Indian nation. Of course they are, even as Indians residing in the other parts of geographical India are. Though we are under different systems of Government, surely we are one. I was also surprised to be told by you that some persons attribute to me the opinion that people of the Indian States who are members of the Congress are so by sufferance. There is a definite provision in the Congress constitution for their being enrolled as members, and those who subscribe to the Congress objective and carry out the other rules governing the membership have as much right to be enrolled as members as any other Indian.

Meanwhile, Janakimaiya² came here yesterday. She had appeared at the Madhyama examination and was mentally relaxed. She has been upset since she heard this story. She cannot understand for whom you want to burden yourself with this responsibility. The sons also do not like the idea. And the servants say that since you will now have a mill of your own, you will not ask them to wear khadi. Nobody likes your decision. Please, therefore, give up this plan of buying a mill. If you have already bought it, find some means of saving yourself from this evil. Let the partners buy it if they wish. If you want to engage yourself in some business, there are many others. If you wish to earn more money so that you may spend it for public good, we shall do without such contribution. . . . Whatever is happening is for the good. One gains all this by submitting to God’s will. Whatever happens, the mind that has offered up all the acts to the Lord never feels discontented. One who is conscious of the “I” is satisfied with nothing. Know that this contains all that is worth knowing. It is true, of course, that it is difficult to cultivate the attitude of offering up all the acts to the Lord. However, if after knowing the truth we ceaselessly strive to follow it in practice our contentment will go on increasing.

100. DISCUSSION ON SWADESHI
[Before September 28, 1934]

Q. How does this new swadeshi differ from the old?

A. The old emphasized the indigenous nature of the products, irrespective of the method or the produce or the prospects of the product. I have ruled out organized industries, not because they are not swadeshi, but because they do not need special support. They can stand on their own legs and, in the present state of our awakening, can easily command a market. According to the new orientation, if it is new, I would certainly have our swadeshi organization to seek out all village industries and find how they are faring. We will have experts and chemists who will be prepared to place their knowledge at the disposal of villagers. We will, through our experts, offer to test the

1 Omission as in the source
2 This appeared under the title “More Talks on Swadeshi”. Mahadev Desai has summarized here the discussion Gandhiji had with a number of persons.
articles manufactured by village handicraftsmen and give them suggestions to improve their wares and would sell them if they would accept our conditions.

Q. Would you take up any and every handicraft?

A. Not necessarily. I should examine each one of them, find out their place in the economy of the village life and, if I see that they must be encouraged because of inherent merit, I should do so. Now, for instance, I should be loath to allow the village broom to be replaced by the modern broomstick or brush. I would ask Mrs. Gandhi and other women of the household to tell me about the relative merits of both. Mind you, I would consider the advantages from all points of view. Thus, the village broom, I should think; must be preferred because it indicates tenderness and kindness to small life, whereas the brush makes a clean sweep of those things. Thus, I should see a whole philosophy behind the broom, for I do not think the Creator makes any distinction between minute insects and (in His estimation) minute men.

Thus I should pick up all kinds of village crafts and industries which are about to die and deserve revival, both because of their intrinsic merit and their other useful aspects, and I should thus go on making discoveries. Take our trifling tooth-sticks, for instance. I am quite sure, if you were to deprive the bulk of the Bombay citizens of their tooth-sticks, their teeth would suffer. I cannot contemplate with equanimity the modern tooth-brush replacing the tooth-stick. These brushes are unhygienic. Once used, they deserve to be thrown away. However much disinfectants you may use to sterilize them, they can never be as good as fresh ones. But the babul or neem tooth-stick is used once for all and has highly astringent properties. Again, it serves the purpose of a tongue scraper. The West has yet to discover anything so hygienic as the Indian tooth-stick. You may not know that a doctor in South Africa claimed to have controlled tuberculosis among the Bantu miners by insisting on the regular use by them of these tooth-sticks. I would be no party to the advertisement of modern tooth-brushes even when they are made in India. I should declare my preference for the tooth-stick. This is cent per cent swadeshi. If I take care of it, the rest will take care of itself. Ask me to define the right angle and I should do it easily, but do not ask me to define the angles between the acutest and the most obtuse you can make. If I have the definition of a right angle, I can make whatever angle I need. Though swadeshi is eloquent enough as its own definition, I have called mine cent per cent swadeshi, because swadeshi is in danger of being watered down. Cent per cent swadeshi gives sufficient scope for the most insatiable ambition for service and can satisfy every kind of talent.

Q. You see swaraj at the end of it?

A. Why not? Once I said in spinning-wheel lies swaraj, next I said in prohibition lies swaraj. In the same way I would say in cent per cent swadeshi lies swaraj. Of course, it is like the blind men describing the elephant. All of them are right and yet not wholly right.

If we tap all our resources, I am quite sure we can be again the richest country in the world, which we were, I suppose, at one time. We can repeat the phenomenon, if we cease to be idle and profitably occupy the idle hours of the millions. All we need is to be industrious, not like a machine, but like the busy bee. You know I am now advertising what I call “innocent honey”?

Q. What is that?

A. Honey scientifically drawn by scientific bee keepers. They keep the bees and make them collect honey without killing them. That is why I call it innocent or non-violent honey. That is an industry which admits of great expansion.

Q. But can you call it absolutely non-violent? You deprive the bee of its honey, as you deprive the calf of its milk.

A. You are right, but the world is not governed entirely by logic.
Life itself involves some kind of violence, and we have to choose the path of least violence. There is violence even in vegetarianism, is there not? Similarly, if I must have honey, I must be friendly to the bee and get it to yield as much honey as it will. Moreover, in the scientific bee culture, the bee is never deprived of its honey altogether.

_Harijan_, 28-9-1934

101. SOME CONUNDRUMS

A Brahmin of Mithila writes a long letter in Hindi, but wants a reply in the English _Harijan_. From his style I can quite clearly see that he knows English well. His letter contains questions of universal importance. The original is being sent to the editor of _Harijan Sevak_.
I gladly give below the substance of the letter.

The correspondent belongs to an orthodox family, but has shed all prejudice against Harijans and permits all but those who are manifestly unclean, such as unwashed Doms, to draw water from a well which has hitherto been open only to the so-called high-class Hindus.

He says:

1. Why don’t you preach to Harijans cleanliness, abstention from carrion-eating and the like, just as you preach to caste Hindus removal of untouchability?

2. What is the distinguishing characteristic of a sanatani ‘Hindu’, Why do you claim to be a sanatani Hindu?

3. You have said that, when a man forsakes his hereditary calling, he creates confusion of caste. How far is this consistent with the meaning inferable from the use of the expression¹ in the first chapter of the Gita?

4. What have you to say to the verses in the smritis on the marriage of a Brahmin woman with a Shudra man?

5. You say there is no superiority or inferiority among the four varnas. I believe in what you say, but is it consistent with many texts one can quote from the Shastras which clearly enunciate the opposite? See what the smritis have to say of Shudras.

6. You say that varna or caste is determined generally by birth. You also say that a Brahmin who does not show in his conduct the marks of one falls. To what varna does he belong? What about a Shudra who shows the mark of a Brahmin?

7. It is said that a man becomes what he eats and that he is corrupted if he takes food or even water prepared or even touched by a corrupt person. And you say that prohibition against inter-dining is not an integral part of varna or caste rule. Is that so?

8. When workers like me work against untouchability, sanatanist opponents say all sorts of things against you. We combat most things. But your having taken the life of the dying calf in the Ashram we have not been able to explain. Are you able to throw light on this question?

The original letter is well reasoned and is written with a pure motive. I don’t know if I have, in the process of condensation, done justice to the spirit in which the original has been written. If I have not, the correspondent should know that the injustice is wholly unintended. Now for the reply.

1. I do preach to the Harijans cleanliness, abstention from carrion-eating and intoxicating drinks and drugs, necessity. Of taking education themselves and giving it to their children, also abstention from eating the leavings from caste Hindus’ plates, etc. Only, I do not put these before Harijans as condition precedent to the removal of untouchability. On the contrary, I suggest to caste Hindus that the shortcomings are not inherent in Harijans but that they are due to our criminal neglect of—even deliberate suppression of—these brethren of ours. Therefore, the disappearance of these shortcomings will take place sooner for our fraternizing with Harijans even as they are and then helping them to become better men and women. That is the least penance caste Hindus can do for the past wrongs. We must approach Harijans as penitents or debtors, not as their patrons or creditors extending generosity to the undeserving.

2. Belief in, and practice of, varnashrama dharma may be said to be the distinguishing characteristic of Hindu dharma. The translation appearing in this Harijan of a Gujarati preface1 I have written for a collection of my writings on the subject explains what I mean by varnashrama dharma. I regard myself a sanatani Hindu, because I try to the best of my ability to obey the eternal precepts of the faith as embodied in the Shastras as I understand them.

3. That a person creates confusion of caste when he leaves his hereditary calling is obvious. When a Brahmin begins to earn his bread by, say, following the profession of a barber or engineer, he does create confusion of caste, as much as when a barber or an engineer begins to impart religious instruction as a means of livelihood. In the Gita, the adjective used in reference to women is ‘wicked’. It has, therefore, reference probably to promiscuous intercourse rather than the offspring born of the sacred tie of marriage.

4. I do not regard as revelation the collection of verses printed under one cover as smritis. I have no doubt that there are many interpolations in the smritis and other scriptural books. As I have said often enough in these columns, I reject as interpolations everything in the smritis or other writings that is inconsistent with truth and non-violence or other fundamental and universal principles of ethics.

There is abundant testimony in the ancient writings to show that such marriages were permitted.

5. This question is answered in the answer to the fourth question. The idea of superiority and inferiority is repugnant to the most elementary principles of morality. A Brahmin who considers himself superior to any single creature of God ceases to be a knower of Brahma. If we are children of the same God, how can there be any rank among us? The very first mention of varna in the Vedas likens the four varnas to the four main parts of the body. Is the head superior to the arms, the belly and the feet, or the feet superior to the other three? What will happen to the body, if these members began a quarrel about rank? The law of varna is one of absolute equality among all the creatures of God. It is the basis of all the religions of the world. The verses in the smritis about Shudras deserve to be summarily rejected as being contrary to the spirit of humanity.

6. Both the Brahmin and the Shudra who forsake their svadharma are fallen. In their fallen state, they belong to no varna. They can repair their mistake by resuming svadharma—their own calling.

7. It is insolence for any person to regard a fellow-being as corrupt and, therefore, untouchable. A man is corrupted by harbouring corrupt thoughts, making corrupt speech and doing corrupt acts, never by taking water or food at the hygienically clean hands of fellow-beings. I do believe that a man has to choose the ingredients of the food he eats.

8. Workers must not seek to defend me against aspersions nor resent them. They are the common lot of reformers. Aspersions have never hurt any person in the world. What hurts is the wicked thing a man does. Workers have enough on their hands in having to defend the cause they have taken up. I have no sense of shame or repentance over the taking of the life of the dying calf, whose agony I could see but could not alleviate in any other manner. I must not dwell here on the ethics of the act. If the correspondent or any reader is curious about it, he must procure the writings in Young India and Navajivan of the time when the act was performed.

Harijan, 28-9-1934

103. LETTER TO H. G. JAGIRDAR

_September 28, 1934_

DEAR SIR,

I have your letter. It was with difficulty that I gave a message to the Columbia Company.³ I am sorry that I could not undertake to give any more messages.

104. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

September 28, 1934

BHAITHAKKAR BAPA,

Write to the Utkal [office] about the sum of Rs. 500. This matter may be considered to have been settled now. The tour expenditure is in my mind all the time. I am delaying the matter for a few days because Jamnalalji is not here.

About Surajbehn, pressure is being brought to permit her to stay in Seva Mandir for six months. I am thinking what our duty is. Can you suggest a possible line of solution?

I was taken aback by what I learnt about Satcowriebabu. I wonder how that happened. The accompanying papers are for your information. Ghanshyamdas should write to Dr. Bidhan.

If you find any difficulty in deciphering this letter, please let me know.

DEAR AKSHAYABABU,

I was distressed to hear through Deenabandhu Andrews that you were suffering from leprosy. I was, however, glad to learn that there was every chance of your getting rid of it, as the treatment was begun in the early Stage of the disease. May God give you peace.

107. LETTER TO ANANT P. GHURYE

September 29, 1934

MY DEAR GHURYE,

I have seen your letter to Sardar Vallabhbhai, and he has handed me the 10 Rupee hundi for which I thank you. I shall use the hundi for distributing khadi among deserving Harijans. But I do not like your anxiety for name and fame. Many have laid down their lives for the country. Their names are written in the Book of God, and not in that of men. Whatever is written in the books of men is bound to perish one day, and their merit in God,s books is diminished to the extent that the names appear in men’s books. Let the public celebration of such anniversaries and public recognition in other forms be reserved for those who are known to fame. But let the memory of those who are not so known remain for ever unknown. Let us cultivate the virtue of regarding virtue as its own reward.

Yours sincerely,

September 29, 1934

BA,

You must be getting my letters all right. If Ramdas does not recover his full strength you should cancel your visit to the Congress session. It is not worth attending. Nimu cannot be taken to the session where everything would be crowded. Women with encumbrances must not visit a place where one has to do with what little comfort comes one’s way. Should not Ramdas think of a change of climate only after he is perfectly all right? Please do not bother yourself about this. Use the mosquito curtain for yourself.

I read your postcard. You must have received my earlier letter. I have asked Mani to consult a doctor. I think Sumitra ought not to be given cereals. You may give her cucumbers if tender ones are available. Also tomatoes if ripe ones are available.

Cereal food might not agree with her condition. There is no harm in letting her have a few almonds, also raisins. I hope you keep well.

113. A LETTER

_September 29, 1934_

CHI . . .

I have already told you that I smell impurity in the relation between you and R. I told Kishorelal about this and he told Kaka. The latter wanted to know clearly what I meant. I think it my duty to let you know what I have told him in reply. It seems to me that consciously or unconsciously your attraction for each other is like that which obtains between a man and a woman. That such attraction may exist unconsciously to oneself is proved by experience. It does not necessarily result in action. I have tried to find some other cause for your infatuation, but have not succeeded. I have clearly observed that your relationship has benefited neither you nor R. It is not at all befitting that, because he has served you personally, you want everybody else to admire him. I am doing you no injustice by writing this. Even if there is no impurity in you, I would cease to be your loyal co-worker if I did not put before you the suspicion that might arise in my mind. You should feel neither hurt by what I have written nor get angry. Examine yourself and write to me frankly. I will believe what you state to be perfect truth. I don’t believe that you would knowingly hide any blemish in you.

115. THE HARIJANS OF SAJOD

I have already written in the previous issue something about the harassment of the Harijans of Sajod. Now a Harijan from Sajod describes how the Harijan children are being tortured. I am not publishing his letter since it contains nothing new. It is a good sign that the Harijans have now started writing and talking about the tortures they have been undergoing. Right now, I would advise patience to this friend who has written to me and also to other Harijans. Some of the so-called caste Hindus of the place have been trying to protest against these tyrannies. Let the Harijan men and women help them with courage and fearlessness. That would do for the time being. I often hear of cases where Harijans are afraid to do even this much. It happened in Talaja. I have just received a letter from Maharashtra complaining about a girl being bodily tortured, but the girl as well as her relatives are not prepared to give evidence. They apprehend more harassment if they gave evidence. Nor is their apprehension without a ground. That is why those Harijans who are prepared to testify to harassment deserve to be complimented. It is certain that such harassment is not going to last long, because, on the one hand, caste Hindus are becoming more and more aware of their duty towards Harijans, and, on the other, Harijans are becoming more

1 Younger brother of Raja Avadhesh Singh of Kalakankar who had just died and more conscious about their harassment. God always takes the side of justice. With this faith, let Harijans and caste reformers continue to do their duties.

116. SHUDRA BY CHOICE

A co-worker has sent a few questions regarding the varna system out of which I propose to take up only one. The question can be thus put in my own words:

Since you are running after varnadharma please solve some of my problems if you can. The Gita describes agriculture, animal husbandry and commerce as the natural functions of the Vaishyas. Commerce means selling by one person to another goods produced by a third. Or, the seller may produce the goods himself. The number of people engaged in agriculture and animal husbandry runs into crores. Even so Bharwads¹, Mochis², Chamars, and [some] peasants are today regarded as Shudras, whereas according to the definition given above they ought to be all regarded as Vaishyas. In my view and yours all the four varnas should be looked upon as equal, living humbly on the same level, not mounted on one another’s shoulders arrogantly crushing those below them. But we know our society has a different opinion. In these circumstances why should not such peasants, Bharwads, Chamars, etc., as are not employed as labourers but earn their livelihood by their own independent effort be regarded as Vaishyas? The peasant tends his own farm, Bharwads and Chamars engage in animal husbandry. They are not anybody’s servants. If we do not accept them as cattle-breeders, then they are traders, in so far as they themselves sell what they produce. In no way can they be covered by the definition of a Shudra. On the contrary, why isn’t anybody who is a servant a Shudra—whether he is judge or governor, soldier or scavenger?

² Cobblers
These complications are real. They crop up because the varna system has broken down. The solution does not lie in regarding shepherds, etc., as Vaishyas. Would the proud Vaishyas admit in their supposedly exclusive varna those who are regarded as Shudras? The above argument is no doubt convincing. But justice cannot be administered just by a convincing argument. For administering justice one has to reach the bottom and it can be reached only through experience.

Experience tells us that the varna system has been wiped out. So, for the restoration of varnadharma we must all voluntarily become Shudras. Of course we are Shudras but only because we cannot help it. But—there is no merit in an act done out of helplessness. It is no act of merit, if I give a few coins to somebody out of compulsion. But if I give willingly what I have hitherto given out of compulsion, it would be such an act. The same is true of the Shudra varna. He who realizes this may belong to any so-called higher varna but by considering himself a Shudra he makes a beginning of the restoration of the varna system.

Let us consider its implications. One who has become a Shudra by choice would serve others as a matter of dharma. He may or may not earn his livelihood, but with pure heart would devote himself body and mind to service. He would purposely restrict himself to marrying amongst and dining with such of the so-called Shudras who follow the rules regarding personal cleanliness, etc. He would completely identify himself with the class regarded as Shudra. He would accept their poverty as far as possible. He would try to help them get over their weaknesses. Such a Shudra in spite of his possessing spiritual knowledge of a Brahmin, the fortitude of a Kshatriya and the business acumen of a Vaishya would earn his bread only through his service. In the varna system each varna may follow the good points of all the four varnas. It ought to be so. For instance, the smriti enjoins:

“Do not kill. Speak the Truth. Do not steal. Follow the path of sanctity. Control your sense organs. This in brief is the dharma Manu has prescribed for all the four varnas.” (1)

Or,

“Do not kill. Speak the Truth. Do not steal. Do not yield to desire, anger, greed and be loving and good for all living creatures. This dharma is common to all the four varnas”. (2)

Hence, what distinguishes one varna from another is that its special characteristics are conspicuously developed in its case and through them alone should the particular varna earn its livelihood.

117. NOTES

AN ODIOUS PRACTICE

A friend\(^2\) from Dholka writes:

In the voters’ rolls for the Municipal, the Local Boards’ and the Councils’ elections that are being published at present, the names of franchise-holders, when they happen to be common folk, are, instead of being put down in full, recorded in an abbreviated form. This is, especially in the case of Harijans, an insult to the holders of the names. As I perused these lists in the papers, I felt that this was an uncalled for and gratuitous, though unintended, insult to the Harijans which must be stopped. I discussed this question with the Assistant Collector in charge of Dholka taluka. I understand that instructions have been given to the Talatis in this taluka to record the names of Harijans in full. But in other places the odious practice remains in force. What is wanted is a general declaration of the official policy in this respect.

This might at first sight appear to be a trifling matter. But it has significance. I have no doubt in my mind that the contemptuous way in which these people are treated in their daily intercourse is in some measure aggravated by this practice.

The correspondent is certainly right. By itself the matter might seem to be trivial, but it is one more instance of arrogation of caste superiority. It does, therefore, call for prompt attention. Apart from injuring Harijan feelings, the use of undignified nicknames in voters’ lists scarcely does credit to our good taste. Let us hope that all those who have the service of the Harijans at heart will henceforth scrupulously eschew this objectionable practice and that the authorities will lose no time in taking the necessary steps to discontinue it in the course of administrative routine.

September 30, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS,

I am observing silence just now. I do this frequently in order to overtake the correspondence. Before I started the silence, I had told Kishorelal to reply to your previous letter. I am now replying to your letter received today.

It seems desirable to me that, before we help Harilal to open a store, he should go round selling khadi and that, too, only in Porbandar. He himself will not find it convenient to travel from place to place just now. Even if you decide to open a store, you should not do that in haste.

119. LETTER TO VITHALDAS JERAJANI

September 30, 1934

BHAI VITHALDAS,

Please go through the accompanying figures and let me know whether they are correct. Swami has studied them and he says that 40 per cent of khadi proceeds is kept by the trader and the producer gets only 60 per cent. If this is correct, we should change it. We don’t wish to propagate untruth even unknowingly.

We should also examine how much of the 60 per cent is received each by the cultivator, the ginner, the carder and the weaver, and publish the figures.

1 This letter is not available.
2 Addressee’s younger son
You have omitted one step in the process. It should be shown how much is received by the handloom worker who weaves millyarn. And the figures relating to Indian mills are certainly not given in the right manner. The payment received by the workers should be shown separately. Also, separate figures should be given for mills which use foreign cotton and those which use indigenous cotton and the cost of machinery should be given.

Moreover, Manibehn told me that an attempt was made once to charge 15 annas a yard for a piece of khadi which was priced at 12 annas a yard. But through oversight the original price-mark on the piece was left intact. The customer noticed it and the dealer, feeling embarrassed, then charged at the rate of 12 annas. What could it mean?

The third complaint is that our prices are the highest.
Please inquire and let me know.
I hope you keep good health.

It is surprising that you did not get my letter. I had also returned your long letter with it. I had not shown it to anybody, nor had anybody read the reply, though, according to me, there was no necessity for such secrecy. I see that all your views have changed. What you regarded so long as dharma now seems adharma to you. If you are indeed right, maybe all of us are wandering in darkness. This is what Tulsidas has said: How can a man who believes untruth to be truth be delivered from his delusion? Who is to decide what is truth? Let us, therefore, bear with each other. Anybody who can do in 14 days what Vishwamitra took 14 years to do, will deserve the humblest reverence from all and his light will not remain hidden. I think, however, that you have fallen into grave error. I have been trying to lead a life in accordance with the ideals of the Ashram for nearly 50 years now. There is likely to be less chance of error in them. Dinkar had shown me your letter to him. What a contrast between that and your letter to me!

CHI. HARILAL.

I have your letter. Narandas has been a little hasty. I am sending a wire to you today as follows:

“Delay spending money received from Narandas. Await letter. Bapu”

I woke up at 2.30 and started thinking about my dharma towards you. I couldn’t go to sleep again and left the bed at 2.45. After cleaning my teeth and drinking warm water with honey, I have set down to write this.

I want the loan which Narandas may give you to be debited to his private account. Till I am quite sure, I do not wish to draw your expenses from a public fund or secure them from friends in public life. It would be compromising dharma to do so.

I do not yet believe in your regeneration. I must have independent proof of that. I, therefore, do not wish to ask you for an assurance to that effect. However, I wish to assure myself through your conduct. If you have produced a good impression on Ishvarlal with whom you are staying, ask him to write to me. And let me have your own replies to the following questions.

1. Have you touched liquor any time after you wrote your first letter to me from there?
2. Have you indulged in sexual pleasure through mind, speech or body?
3. Do you smoke?
4. Have you any other addiction?

Let there be this understanding between you and me. If at any time you break your word to me or if it is proved that you have deceived me, I should fast for at least seven days. I may fast even longer, if I wish and have the strength to do so, in case your breach of promise or misdeed pains me very much.

Though I was still hopeful about you, I had hardened my heart to stone and did not give you any monetary help. But I felt from the letter which you wrote to me from Porbandar that there had been a change of heart in you and wanted to give you whatever help I could.

---

1 This is in English.

If you have come to have trust in my way of life and my understanding of dharma, you will be convinced of the correctness of whatever demands I make or advice I give. Please do not ask me to discuss and explain, but carry out my suggestions as a patient does those of a vaid as so many orders. Do not do anything through a feeling that because I am your father you have a special dharma towards me. You may have such dharma to help me when I am completely disabled. But in this matter treat me as a friend, a vaid and a co-worker. Why are you so keen on staying in Porbandar? It would be convenient for me to help you if you stayed in Rajkot.

If, however, you decide to stay in Porbandar, I will have no objection to your staying in our ancestral house. Is any part of it vacant? Does it get good air?

Till I am satisfied, and Ramjibhai also is satisfied, that you have become steady, please give up the idea of starting a store. With the help of khadi samples, you may secure what orders you can in Porbandar.

If you have come to have the same faith in the spinning-wheel and khadi that I have, you should enthusiastically start learning spinning on the takli and the spinning-wheel, and spin daily on the former. Learn all the antecedent processes also. You can do all this more easily in Rajkot. Are you ready to live with me and under my eyes? I may like you to do that after the Congress session is over.

Kakasaheb and Kishorelalbhai are here with me. And Vinoba also, of course.

Whatever you do, do after full deliberation. Do not do anything that is beyond your strength, nor anything that does not appeal to your heart or reason. Do not try to establish good relations with me merely in order that you may be able to live. You have been able to do that somehow all these years. Doesn’t God provide for everybody, good or bad, in some manner or other? But imperfect man must continue to discriminate between good and evil till the end of his life. Nobody living in the flesh has become perfect or will ever become, for the marriage of the atman with the material body is in itself a limitation of its perfection. Marriage by its very nature is a limitation. When the atman becomes a perfect brahmachari, it will no longer create new bodies for itself. But why need I take you into all this?
May you attain the highest good. May God dwell in you. He alone is your true Guru. “Friends of the body but care for their own interests; they will keep away at the end.” You should, therefore, do as the self within bids you, with God as witness. It will not hurt me in the least if you do not accept my advice. But it will hurt me very much indeed if you deceive me. I am an old man now, and you are not a child.

134. LETTER TO SHAM LAL

_October 3, 1934_

DEAR LALA SHAMLAL,

Herewith letter from Shri Ramrichhpal Singh. I detained the letter asking the writer for permission to send it to you, as it contained statements that appeared to me to be startling and which I was not prepared to believe until I had referred the letter to you. You would please now let me have your criticism upon the letter and return the letter with it. I have not kept a copy of that letter.

_October 3, 1934_

DEAR MR. MODY,

Here is a copy of the appeal for help from Gorakhpur. The distress is untold. The signatories to the appeal are all wellknown men. Baba Raghavdas, who is in charge of relief operations, tells me that he has sent an appeal to mill-owners for cloth. He has had response from Delhi. But I understand that at the time he wrote to me there was no response from Bombay or Ahmedabad. I commend this appeal to the attention of the mill-owners of Bombay.

You will find with this a letter from Harilal and a copy of my reply1 to him. You will see from my reply what my advice is. It is true that security will have to be offered for whatever he borrows. It would not be proper to advise him to enter into such transactions [just now]. If you think it necessary that he should be given something for his daily expenses on food, etc., and if you can spare money for that, give him what he needs from your private account. If you cannot, let me know. I will think over the matter.

BHAJ THAKKAR BAPA,

Mama¹ will leave the Ashram on the 9th. As discussed between us two, I had told him that if he could not subordinate himself to your control, he must leave the Ashram. I cannot ask for his expenses from any other source. The Provincial Committee, too, would not support an independent institution. This argument has appealed to Mama. Please, therefore, write to Parikshitlal to pay the expenses up to the date of his handing over control. He has been paying the expenses up to now, but I had written to him and asked him not to pay further. Though Mama will thus be free from the Ashram, we certainly wish to support him. It would be excellent if he settles down in a village and starts working with Bhangis. If he does so, we shall have to think later how to meet his expenses.

145. LETTER TO SARITA

October 3, 1934

CHI. SARITA,

I have brought up my sons in the same manner that I was. And when they grew up, I treated them [as I was treated]. When my elders sent me as a guest to their friends in Bhavnagar and Ahmedabad, I had to suffer much more at both places than you have had to. I had sometimes to go hungry, but I did not feel unhappy about it. What else could they have done? Should they have set up a separate establishment for me? I learnt much from that experience.

For Ramdas also, what more should I do? He went to Ahmedabad only to be able to live in the Harijan Ashram. He is being looked after there very well. What did he lack here? What more can be done for Nimu? Moreover, I am a poor man. I beg for whatever I spend. However, I go even one step further. No matter how poor I am, they get some facilities which even the rich do not get. We have no right at all to such facilities, but since we get them we accept them with humility.

You have already heard about the lapse committed by Satcowriebabu. Dr. Bidhan states that he himself undertook no responsibility as regards the money matters. Therefore he acknowledges no moral obligation on his part, which is probably right. But in my view you and Bhagirathji are certainly responsible. If you two feel similarly you should make good the loss of the H. S. S.¹ I think no one could have suspected Satcowriebabu. 153. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

CHI. NARANDAS,

I read Sankaran’s letter. What he says is not correct. Malabar was included in the Harijan tour and I had met both Sankaran and Raghavan. I know about Sankaran’s school also. He is working with somebody else. It is the duty of the local Harijan Sevak Sangh to run that school. Ramachandran of the Ashram is now working in it, as also Shyamji. There is no reason whatever for Sankaran to leave Malabar.
A decision to this effect was taken when I met him. He was getting enough for his needs. In fact there was no need to send him any help.

I did not like Sankaran’s letter. I am writing to him. I shall enclose a copy of the letter.

Kanu seems to be doing well. I don’t exercise much direct supervision over his work. Mahadev and Pyarelal do that.

156. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

October 4, 1934

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

I had received your letter yesterday and, as suggested by you, had asked Kishorelal to write to you. The pressure of work is fairly heavy. I can barely cope with it. Every day something is left over. Aney came and met me yesterday. Nekiram also was here the day before yesterday. I suggested that Aney and you could still get together and have a discussion and in case there was a difference of opinion should refer the matter to an umpire. As umpires I suggested the names of Bahadurji\(^2\) or Tej Bahadur\(^3\). The suggestion didn’t appeal to Aney. He said that the names would go on changing till the scrutiny was over and that, if anything was possible, it could be done only after that. This for your information.

There is one more thing. Aney said he would have preferred the elections to take place in November. I told him that you did not postpone them just for the sake of Malaviyaji and that if he wired to you, you might extend the time. I don’t know whether this is possible.

\(^1\) Gandhiji uses the English word.
\(^2\) A Parsi advocate of Bombay
\(^3\) Tej Bahadur Sapru
I advised against postponement for the convenience of Malaviyaji’s party. If Malaviyaji himself desires postponement, it will certainly be an advantage to us in other ways. But this matter is beyond me.

You will find with this a letter from Dr. Gopichand. What he says is worth thinking over. I will only tell him in reply that I have passed the letter on to you. Please look into this carefully.

I am sending Devdas’s letter also. Tear it up after reading it. Devdas doesn’t want the matter to be discussed anywhere.

I refused it and told other friends also not to send a single pie, for in your letter you had explained your unmanly intention of doing nothing and letting yourself die. I described that as sloth and told him that he would be doing an ill turn to a friend if he encouraged such an attitude. You have now entered the third yuga. Your letter to Dinkar represented the first, your long letter to me the second and the letter following that the third. There is no independent work for Sharma for this year at any rate. 159. NEED FOR EXACTNESS

A correspondent sends a newspaper cutting containing a notice in praise of khadi. From it I take the following relevant paragraphs:

A rupee spent on foreign cloth means one anna and a half to Indians, while annas fourteen plus half an anna go direct into foreign trade’s growth.

A rupee spent on mill-cloth means half the amount for the mill-owner,

1 Literally, ‘age’. The analogy is of the four yugas of Hindu mythology representing progressive physical and moral deterioration in the people during each succeeding age.

2 Illegible in the source

annas six to instruments of production and two annas into foreigners’ pockets.

A rupee spent on khadi means the whole of the amount minus management expenses—one anna—to the producer alone.

The sender asks if it is true that every rupee invested in khadi means fifteen annas going to the producers and only one anna going to the salesmen. I can only answer that the ideal set before the managers in charge of the A. I. S. A. stores is that the prices should be so regulated as to show on the total sales a surplus, in order to cover expenses, of one anna for every fifteen annas worth of khadi received from the producing depot. The fifteen annas will, therefore, include several other items, e.g., freight, etc. Hence it is altogether wrong to say that of every rupee invested in khadi fifteen annas go to the producer.

After khadi leaves the weavers’ hands, it undergoes many processes—washing, dyeing, calendaring, storing in intermediate depots and so on. If the term ‘producer’ is confined to the grower, the picker, the ginner, the carder, the sliver maker, the spinner, the bobbin winder, the warper, the sizer and the weaver, but not the workers of the processes after weaving, the producer gets probably no more than eight annas in the rupee. It is usual and proper to exclude the other processes, as they are not necessary for fulfilling the purpose of khadi and may or may not have been done by villagers or workers properly so called. Washing, dyeing, etc., are often done through organized, i.e., capitalist concerns. Now, all those who contribute to the increase in the selling price of khadi do not divide the wages with the producer, in other words, do not take the bread out of the mouth of the producer, but help him to find a market for his manufacture, and this they do even when they are capitalist concerns. For, the latter do not at present work for their profit, but work, no matter from what motive, for the sake of the producer. Therefore the whole truth seems to me to be more conducive to the advertisement of khadi than the undoubted, though unconscious or ignorant, exaggeration in the notice under discussion. If I was the draftsman of the notice, I should say:

‘When you buy a rupee worth of khadi, know that the producer retains the full fruit of his labour, whereas, when you buy cloth manufactured by indigenous mills, you wholly deprive him of that beneficial labour, without providing him with a substitute. The agency that sells khadi gets nothing but the bare living expenses and is, therefore, on a par with the therefore,

Thus it will be found that a critical study of the economics of khadi will show that it is a crime against semi-starved humanity for any Indian to use any cloth but khadi. Such a person takes a morsel out of the mouth of some already famishing villager. Khadi suffers, not because of any intrinsic defect; it suffers because of the ignorance of its friends and foes alike.

But it is necessary to examine the buyer’s case. The advertisement is misleading from his viewpoint. Khadi will sell at half the present price, if he will revise his taste, i.e., if he will buy unbleached khadi and put all the ornamentation he likes, afterwards. He need not bother his head about it, if the cost is no consideration. But let the buyer to whom cost is a consideration know that he pays much less for unbleached and unadorned khadi than for prepared and bleached khadi. Moreover, unbleached khadi lasts longer than bleached. The public should also know that during the past twelve years khadi has become much cheaper and better in texture. It has put more money into the pockets of the individual spinners by improving their tools and increasing their skill. This could not have happened, if some educated men and women had not dedicated themselves to the task of helping the semi-starved but partially employed millions. The one key industry of India which supplemented the agricultural labour would never have died, if the distorted notion of varna or caste had not regarded these millions almost as untouchables, beneath the notice of the self-styled higher class.

No doubt there are defects in the khadi organizations: there is not complete dedication, there is not enough critical study of every problem that demands a solution. But this is not a matter of surprise. We cannot, in a moment, get rid of habits of a lifetime. We cannot, all of a sudden, develop the cunning of the hands. The science of khadi requires technical and mechanical skill of a high order and demands as much concentration as is given by Sir J. C. Bose to the tiny leaves of plants in his laboratory before he wrests from them the secrets of nature held by these fellow creatures of ours.

What is then wrong with the notice complained of is not its over-valuation of khadi but its clumsy and inadequate presentation of its case. And this comes from want of exactness due to inadequate appreciation of truth. Every one of the three paragraphs hopelessly fails when tested on that infallible anvil.

I am taking up your letter of 14th September. The Rs. 6374-8-3 which I paid to you having been spent, Rs. 80-8-6 now remains. If I send that sum, may I take it that no further help will be required?

Cannot the hostel expenses be met from the yearly budget? What suggestion would you make regarding the [estimated] deficit of Rs. 800 at the end of the year? It would be desirable now to find all the expenditure from the same account. Most of what I receive is sent to Delhi According to me, therefore, what Gujarat does not supply should come from Delhi. But that is not necessary with regard to [the needs of] Gujarat. We have a guarantee. It should be availed of judiciously. Meet Narahari and have the position clarified. We should become self-supporting in the Ashram as far as possible.

Have you collected rent from Ramdas and others who stayed there? Let me know what you got. The Ashram should not be made to bear even one pie by way of expenditure on account of anybody who is not a Harijan. This does not apply to you, Puratan and others who are there. But I suppose your expenditure is being met from the Gujarat Harijan Sevak Sangh. Indeed the Sangh should even pay something by way of rent. This is necessary for proper accounts. However, there can be difference of opinion about this.

I have an impression that I have not replied to your last letter.

I was pleased to learn that you had fully understood my statement. Your work seems to be progressing very well. Don’t widen its field. See that what you have started strikes deep roots. In this poor land, people sow grass seeds and live on what grows from them. Wheat and other grains are grass seeds. Since we don’t have enough patience to plant fruit trees, the poor never get any fruit to eat. And the rich don’t eat enough of them. They eat fruit only as dessert. Being similarly poor in the field of service we are content to sow and reap grass. If even a few of us save ourselves from committing this mistake, the fruit-trees which grow will give shade and generation after generation will eat the fruits. This will do for today.

166. LETTER TO LILAVATI MUNSHI

October 5, 1934

CHI. LILAVATI,

Thus is my reply to your letter. I am writing it for Munshi, however.

He who follows many ideals worships several gods. How can he get peace of mind? Gods have been imagined as extremely jealous and quick to take offence. The devotee of one god has only one ideal in life. He wishes to have vision of only one god of truth. Such a man is ever contented and happy. If legal practice helps one to realize that ideal, one must practise as a lawyer despite censure by the whole world. If, on the other hand, practice of law stands in the way of one’s progress towards the ideal, one must have nothing whatever to do with it. Legal practice, voluntary poverty, the Congress throne, people’s criticism—these and many other such things are but so many forms of trust. The devotee of one god who accepts praise and censure with an equal mind and lives in comfort in Malabar Hill would be equally happy in an ill-lighted chawl in Worli too. This is how Munshi wishes to live. But it is a mental experiment. Why is he, then, afraid about it? What has happened to his penetrating intellect and to all his reading of the Shastras? If one’s mind is pure one has the Ganga flowing by one’s door-step, as they say. On the other hand, I have seen many a rogue who has been to Kashi and also bathed in the Ganga there.

167. LETTER TO RAMJI

October 5, 1934

Bhai Ramji,

I have read your letter carefully. I cannot think of any changes in the programme of studies.

The problem of khadi can be solved only by a perfect study of the science of khadi. It cannot be solved by yielding to the fancies of people. Khadi has an important role in times of famine. But the inhabitants of a famine-stricken area should content themselves with the lowest payment. If there is any other occupation through which they can earn more, we should not put the spinning-wheel or the takli before them.

The money received for the purpose of self-sufficiency in cloth cannot be given to victims of famine. The State or the rich ought to buy up the khadi produced in famine areas. Till the rich identify themselves with the poor, khadi can have no place as a means of relief in times of famine. Apart from the rich, the other classes cannot consume the khadi produced during famine. The poor would be wearing the khadi produced by themselves and the middle classes would buy their requirements in the market. There has to be, therefore, extra demand for khadi produced during famine.

For further explanation, read what I am going to write in Harijan when I get time.

168. LETTER TO SARITA

Rentia Barash, October 5, 1934

CHI. SARITA,

I got your long letter. I liked it very much indeed. It reveals to me perfectly your purity of heart. You are acting as befits a true daughter, for such a daughter would not hide from her parents even her thoughts. She would frankly tell them what she thought and unburden her heart. This would enable the parents to think what they should do. You should, therefore, always write to me as you have done this time.

I would advise you to have patience. The result of work is not in our hands. What lies in our power is to do our duties. The fruit is in God’s hands. We, therefore, do not know whether Sumitra will recover. We can arrange for her treatment as best as we can. It is our dharma to do so.

We are poor people. We should not, therefore, mind suffering what other poor people do. Please put up with a little waiting at the hospital. I do not know personally any eye-specialist there. Sardar would know somebody, and he himself has selected Sardesai. I am, therefore, getting this done through him. I am writing to Swami also and asking him to send me the doctor’s report.

Sardesai is reputed to be good among the Indian doctors. There is a European doctor also who is considered to be good. But I don’t feel inclined to send Sumitra to him. None of us know him. We should not, therefore, leave Sardesai. If, however, he finds himself helpless, we should certainly inquire from some other doctor.

If you don’t like going to the sea-coast, why don’t you take a walk on the terrace? That is what I always do. The terrace is fine.

What should I say about Nimu? How can I help her if she deceives me? If she would speak out frankly as you do, I would be able to do something. If she goes on saying “I am all right and don’t worry”, what can I do? I even told her yesterday that if she did not want to tell me she could tell Amtussalaam. She has no reason to feel worried. I have not asked her again to show me the accounts. But she should form the habit of keeping accounts. It will do her nothing but good. Even a millionaire would become bankrupt if he did not keep accounts.

If you are not satisfied with this explanation, write to me again.

Keep an account of what you have to spend there. If you desire, I would arrange that money should be sent to you from here right now.

169. LETTER TO SURENDRA

October 5, 1934

CHI. SURENDRA,

For your satisfaction I will draw your monthly Rs. 15 from some other account. The matter doesn’t seem to me an important one. It may be one’s dharma to draw one’s subsistence from the source from which one is entitled to do so—there may be greater humility in doing so. It would be but proper that a person like you should be dependent on Harijans even for his subsistence. If, however, you cannot make the service of Harijans the mission of your life and if it cannot give perfect satisfaction to your heart, it is right for you to receive your expenses from some other account.

Your letter to Kishorelalbhai reveals the state of your mind. I still see some confusion lurking secretly in your thoughts. You still feel it necessary to choose and decide among alternative courses. Such a state of mind can be harmful to spiritual progress. He who has offered up everything to Shri Krishna has made his final choice. What scope has he for further choice? Such a person can sing, along with a man of pleasure:

“Enjoy what today brings, for who has seen tomorrow?”

Show this letter to Nath¹ and discuss the matter with him.

Your letter. There is nothing wrong in carrying over balance left from the allowance of the previous month to the next. And at the end of the year if you find any saving you may ask your brothers to remit so much less. The point is that one who observes non-possession and accepts only a subsistence allowance cannot offer donations out of it. MY DEAR RAJAGOPALAN,

I am glad you are conducting experiments with your machine. The kind of cotton used should be noted. All the yarn turned out by the machine should be classified according to the strength, evenness and count. All the waste should be weighed. The names of the spinners, their ages and sex should be given, and against each spinner should be given the total hours of work per day and information as to the continuous time given by each spinner per day. If all these facts are given, they would certainly furnish valuable information. If any [part] of the machine breaks down or requires repair while at work, that also should be noted.

176. LETTER TO B. SRIRANGASAYI

October 6, 1934

MY DEAR SRIRANGASAYI,

I have your letter. It is refreshing to know that the Socialist Party in Andhra appreciates all the amendments suggested by me. I say the Socialist Party because I take it that your letter is representative of the Party’s opinion as you have signed it in your capacity as Secretary.
But you know in what unmeasured terms the meeting in Banaras has condemned the amendments. Even when I first conceived spinning franchise as a token of the dignity of labour and its universal recognition, a friend had shown me a booklet containing the constitution of the Soviets and drawn my attention to the fact that in Russia labour franchise had a definite place. But here I do not know whether you represent the general body of Socialists. What about those who have passed the resolutions of condemnation?

You take exception to my wish that the rich should regard themselves as trustees for the whole of society rather than as owners of the wealth they might possess. Of course, it is an uphill task, but by no means impossible. Indeed I see definite signs of that idea spreading and being accepted. You suggest that the poor should be regarded as trustees for the rich. But you forget that it is implied in the proposition I have laid down. Because, have I not said that labour is as much capital as metal? Therefore, workers, instead of regarding themselves as enemies of the rich, or regarding the rich as their natural enemies, should hold their labour in trust for those who are in need of it. This they can do only when, instead of feeling so utterly helpless as they do, they realize their importance in human economy and shed their fear or distrust of the rich. Fear and distrust are twin sisters born of weakness. When labour realizes its strength it won’t need to use any force against moneyed people. It will simply command their attention and respect.

We hope you have benefited by the change and are feeling much stronger and fitter. The Khans you should have found here, but they have gone to Bengal and though they were expected to be back by the 7th, their stay is being prolonged and I wonder if they will be back earlier than the 16th.

I wrote a brief reply\(^1\) to your last letter. I said in it that I would write more and here it is.

The nine implications of khadi work which you have explained are correct. We can add some more, but these nine are enough. Let us immediately start putting into practice whichever of them apply to you and me. It was for this reason that I suggested to you to learn Khadi work. That means learning all the operations from the sowing of cotton in the fields to the manufacture of khadi and mastering the processes involved in the latter, as also learning the ways and means of selling the khadi produced. All these things should be studied scientifically.

I am making arrangements for sending the books.

I am glad to learn that you are tired of travelling. I shall prefer your staying at Rajkot instead of at Porbandar, as I think that you will be safer there. Narandas’s being in Rajkot is one more reason why I should like you to stay there. Moreover, Bali, Manu¹, etc., are also there. In your awakened state, you can serve Bali, Phuli and Manu in a great many ways. But all this will have meaning only if you can find peace of mind in that way.

I got your letter. In trying to raise 100 to 116, we may have to lose; some even out of 1001. God never obliges anyone who is excessively greedy. On the contrary, He punishes such a person.

I am more eager to leave the Congress than you are to drive me out of it. All that we have to do, therefore, is to find a way of doing it smoothly.

I do not know how big the crowd accompanying me will be, but I do like the rule that there will be no free tickets. I have always been opposing the practice of elders bringing their children along with them free of charge. I, therefore, like that rule. But it will be obeyed no better than the rule about khadi. You and I, however, shall have to observe it even if we are the only two doing so. If you push in Dilip2 as a Press reporter and Taramati3 as a volunteer, the responsibility will be yours. God will see that one wheel of your chariot gets stuck into the ground completely. If I had my way, I would bring along only Mahadev, Pyarelal, Devraj and Kanu. But I shall not be able to have my way. Prithuraj is bound to tell me that a whole year’s labour ought to be rewarded. But it is impossible to say what arrangement will be heart. One should not copy anybody else in following it. You may, therefore, do without the least hesitation whatever seems good to you.

Harilal seems to be going on well just now. He has gone to Rajkot. I get two or three letters from him every week.

Sharma has not returned yet. I had told him to stay on as long as he thought necessary.

Nimu has just now handed me your letter. May your prayers on my birthday be fulfilled. I know that I have never withheld my soul from you brothers. I strove to remain pure for your sakes even when I did not do that for anybody else. It was later that I realized that purity was something to be cultivated for its own sake. Even when I had realized that, however, the knowledge was not sufficient to keep me pure. But the sense of my dharma to you and to Ba sustained me in my striving. Your formal education, however, remained deficient. That was unavoidable. I attached little importance to such education in the new experiments I had embarked upon. My attitude remains the same today. You have not lost much through that deficiency. But in the measure that you feel discontented on that account, I also feel unhappy. If you and your brothers did not feel the deficiency, I would count myself blessed as a father.

186. WOMEN AND VARNA

An esteemed friend writes:

From your recent writing on varna in Harijan it seems that the principle of varna adumbrated by you is intended to apply only to men. What, then, about women? What would determine a woman’s varna? Perhaps you will answer that before marriage a woman would take her varna from her father; after marriage from her husband. Should one understand that you support Manu’s notorious dictum that there can be no independence for woman at any stage of her life, that before marriage she must remain under the tutelage of her parents, after marriage under that of her husband, and, in the event of her widowhood, under that of her children? . . . It is . . . the commonest thing nowadays to find a woman serving as a schoolmistress, while her ‘husband’ is doing business as a money-lender. To what varna would the woman under these circumstances belong? . . . To what varna between these would their children belong? . . .

In my opinion, the question raised is irrelevant in the circumstances prevailing today. As I have pointed out in the writing referred to, owing to the confusion of the varnas, today there are in reality no varnas, the varna principle has ceased to operate. The present state of Hindu society may be described as that of anarchy; the four varnas today exist in name only. If we must talk in terms of varna, there is only one varna today for all, whether men or women; we are all Shudras.

In the resuscitated varnadharma, as I conceive it, a girl before her marriage will belong to the varna of her father, just like her brother. Inter-marriages between different varnas will be rare. A girl will, therefore, retain her varna unimpaired even after her marriage. But should the husband belong to a different varna, then, on marriage, she would naturally adopt his varna and relinquish that of her parents. Nor need such a change of varna be understood to imply a slur against anybody or touch anybody’s susceptibilities since the institution of varna in the age of resuscitation would imply absolute social equality of all the four varnas.

I do not envisage the wife, as a rule, following an avocation independently of her husband. The care of the children and the upkeep of the household are quite enough to fully engage all her energy. In a well-ordered society the additional burden of maintaining the family ought not to fall on her. The man should look to the maintenance of the family, the woman to household management; the two thus supplementing and complementing each other’s labours.

Nor do I see in this any invasion of woman’s rights or suppression of her freedom. The saying attributed to Manu that “For woman there can be no freedom” is not to me sacrosanct. It only shows that probably, at the time when it was promulgated, women were kept in a state of subjection. The epithets used in our literature to describe a wife are ardhangana, “the better half”, and sahadharmini, “the help-mate”. The husband addressing the wife as devi or “goddess” does not show any disparagement. But, unfortunately, a time came when the woman was divested of many of her rights and privileges and was reduced to a status of inferiority. But there could be no question of depreciation of her varna. For, varna does not connote a set of rights or privileges; it prescribes duties or obligations only. And no one can divest us of our duty, unless we ourselves choose to shirk it. The woman who knows and fulfils her duty realizes her dignified status. She is the queen, not the slave, of the household over which she presides.

I need hardly say after this that, if the position set forth by me with regard to the role of the woman in society is accepted, the question of the varna of the children will cease to present any problem, as there will be no more any discrepancy as between the varnas of the husband and the wife.

MY DEAR DEORUKHKER,

So far as the modification of the communal decision is concerned, the Harijan part of it cannot be modified except with the unanimous consent of all the parties concerned, and I shall be certainly no party to any modification which worsens the position of Harijans or which has not their consent. So far as the elections are concerned, I am quite clear that it would be detrimental to the Harijan cause to involve the Harijans in any shape or form in the fight with the Government in which the Congress is engaged. There are many other and more tangible ways open to caste Hindus to show their sympathy, and more than sympathy, to the Harijans.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

The addressee, a nationalist Harijan leader of Bombay, had in a letter raised doubts about the permanency of the Poona Pact, in view of the agitation for its modification by a section of Hindus particularly of Bengal and the Punjab. He had also requested Gandhi to reconsider his views on the question of putting up Harijan candidates to contest the Assembly elections.
DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

I enclose herewith two letters about Gajbhiye. You seem to know his case. If so, please enlighten me on the matter. In reply to his first letter I asked him to define his requirements before forwarding the correspondence to you. The postcard is the result.

[PS.]¹

I have just received your letter. Fix the meeting as early as possible in November. After the Congress session my programme will be uncertain. I will return to Wardha immediately after the session. Show me the accounts then. I am of the view that the rich among the workers should pay off the sum connected with Satcowriebabu. About excusing the members, consult Ghanshyamdas. However gently, they must be informed. I certainly believe that if it is our duty to ask Surajbhen to vacate, there is no room for mercy in performing it.

I wish to return to Wardha on November 1 at the latest. But it will be as Rama wills.

Tour Kathiawar after the meeting here.

Parikshitlal’s Rs. 31 were sent by Radhakisan ten days ago. We are inquiring why he did not receive the sum.

197. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

October 8, 1934

BHAISHRI VALLABHBHAI,

I read your letters to Mahadev. If you can come with Dr. Ansari, do come.

I have received numerous wires regarding Ishwar Sharan¹. I didn’t send the others to you, but I am sending Baba Raghavdas’s with this.

Ishwar Sharan is opposed by Krishnakant². Aney has suggested that the latter may be replaced by Chintamani³ and Ishwar Sharan should be asked to withdraw, and that Bhagwandas may not be opposed. This seems to me worth doing if it can be managed. In any case, Ishwar Sharan should withdraw in favour of Chintamani. Opposition to Bhagwandas will create much bitterness. I have sent you a wire⁴ regarding this.

Next about Abhyankar. After I had sent that wire, I received the accompanying letter from Bapuji. I, therefore, need not take your time trying to explain the reasoning behind that wire.

I had long wires from Nariman and Mathuradas pleading against postponement of the Congress. The expenditure was unnecessary. I am not at all keen on postponement. I merely acted as a postman. Surely, neither you nor I can be a party to anything that might harm the Congress or the Parliamentary Board. And, moreover, I can’t judge about these things from my retreat here.

The Khan Brothers have got stuck in Bengal. It has become extremely difficult now to persuade them to go to Bombay on the 19th. What can we do? I have, of course, written⁵.

I am very much afraid that you might fall ill. However, I remember the case of William, the Prince of orange. As long as God wanted him to live and serve, he remained unharmed even in the midst of a shower of bullets.

Blessings from

198. LETTER TO M.

October 9, 1934

MY DEAR M.,

I have your letter. Your pride is still speaking in you. You want to repeat the very thing that undid you! Can pride take a man deeper? No, you must not come back here to take your penance. You will be received with open arms when the sense of sin is self-evident. Your letter is evidence of the contrary. You have not even the honesty to say to those concerned what you have actually done, if only to guide them in future. You must come down your pedestal before you can realize the enormity of the treble sin. Remember a fellow sinner is speaking to you. Only I have the sense of sin and I fly from it. You want to come to it.

Love.

201. LETTER TO KANTI GANDHI

October [9], 1934

CHI. KANTI,

I got your long letter. Nobody else will read it. I understand your feeling. I have arranged the money for you from Ramachandran. My relations with him are such that I need not hesitate about this and this is quite the right thing to do for you as well as for me. When he is there it does not look nice to send money direct from here. I shall certainly return it to him so you may draw the money without hesitation. If you do not find it enough, write to me. It is very good that you keep account of each and every pie. I understand the state of your mind which you so vividly describe. Don’t force yourself to do anything. Place your foot only where you can plant it firmly knowing all that is happening around you. It has been my experience throughout that nothing that is done in an unnatural manner endures, but that instead there is only increase in hypocrisy. That is why I am fighting to get out of the Congress. I shall be satisfied if only one quality at any rate endures among you all. Let no one give up worship of truth. He who clings to truth will in time come to see his errors. He will correct them and go ahead.

1 From the manuscript of Mahadev Desai’s Diary

Nowadays I receive letters from Harilal regularly. I have been trying to help him. He has come to Rajkot. He had asked for your address which I have sent to him. If you wish to read his recent letters to me, I shall send them to you. Contrary to my practice nowadays I am preserving his letters. If the present improvement does not prove temporary it would really be a great thing.

Your decision to do [regular] spinning is no doubt a good one. The new method with the takli is very good. 400 rounds can be spun per hour by adopting this method. A speed of 200 rounds per hour is common with this method; do try it. You must have read the article on the subject. That you should ask for slivers from here is contrary to logic. It is like a shave costing more than a head. You ought to do your own carding. All the tools are available in Nagercoil. Perhaps you might get them at your place too. Ramachandran must know because he was connected with khadi work. No doubt good quality cotton is available there. The best cotton is grown in Tinnevelly and it is not far from Nagercoil.

You might have started taking ghee and milk. Let me know what effect it has on you. Let me know also how you find the food and climate of the place.

204. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

October 10, 1934

DEAR SATISBABU,

I have your letter. As to the Ashram at Delhi, the fact that there is the other Central one should not be overemphasized. There should be an ashram or institution at the headquarters, and the idea is that the office should be taken there, with accommodation for the whole of the staff, and provision for a technical institute. If the provinces can raise sufficient money for themselves, each of them can certainly have such training centres. Karachi has almost a model institute where, under first class expert guidance, all kinds of articles are manufactured from leather. Sewing is also done there, and the ground is exceedingly well kept. The whole thing is due to the enterprise of Mohatta Bros. Now it has become so popular that even non-Harijans are applying for admission. Therefore, the idea of the Delhi institute is not in conflict with yours, but on the contrary it is in support of yours—only Delhi can’t find the funds for other centres. Bangalore is also developing such things. Kathiawar has three. But they were there prior to the establishment of the Harijan Board, and they have now come under the influence of the Central Board. The establishment of an institute at Delhi was an idea conceived by Ghanshyamdas before Sabarmati was given [over]. It is, and will remain, an all-India concern. Whether it will be so in fact depends largely upon what the management is able to make of it. I do not suppose we shall get in the near future over 100 acres of land and buildings worth over two lakhs. In acreage the Delhi plot is nothing, but the situation is very good. And

1 The message was sent through S. Satyamurthi.
Ghanshyamdas wants to develop the scheme after his own fashion, and to spend a lot of his substance on it.

I do hope that my proposal\(^1\) to Devibabu and Bhagirathji will be accepted and that we shall not have to lose the money Satcowriebabu has taken away. It is an unfortunate incident which should be redressed so far as it is possible.

The paragraph you quote from McCarrison is very interesting. McCarrison I have found to be a reliable writer, but he is somewhat hasty in generalizing. I have had considerable correspondence with him.

Are you not sweeping in your statement that starch is identified with sugar as a food? Now sugar can be given with impunity to babies. I have never heard that starch can be given to them with equal impunity. Then, starch can never be taken without cooking. Sugar requires no cooking. And even if rice is cooked, surely you do not claim the same value for rice as you would for raisins from the point of view of harmlessness.

I am testing just now the effect of unboiled milk, fresh from the udder. I have heard so much in praise of unboiled milk that I want to try its effect myself. The only difficulty is that you can’t take all the milk that you want to at one meal. You have to divide it, and you can’t get the goats or the cows, as the case may be, to yield the milk whenever you want to milk them. The question then is: Does unboiled milk retain its full quality throughout the day if you stored it in ice or kept in a corked bottle with a wet towel wrapped round it? I have tried it myself. The: milk retains the full flavour. Whether it retains the full quality, I have no knowledge. If you can throw light upon it, please do.

I shall watch the development of your researches about the full use of all the parts of carcasses.

Love.

DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

I am sending your letter to Sastri for his opinion. If it is at all possible I would certainly like to take the burden of a part of his allowance from the Central Board. I have so completely relied upon Sastri that I have not even looked upon the financial position. I know that it is wrong on my part not to do so. But sheer force of circumstances has prevented my doing many things that I would have loved to do. Now I think that you should also formally demand the accounts in order that you can satisfy yourself as to whether the assistance given by the Board is necessary or not. DEAR FRIEND,

I prize your letter. All these days I have pined to write to you about Ambujam¹. But a delicate sense of consideration for you has restrained me. Your letter gives me an opening and much relief.

You know my affection towards Ambujam. If it is not a presumption I may say I have felt towards her even as you have. It has been a rare privilege of my life to be able to occupy a place of confidence in several families. What little influence I have had over Ambujam has been exerted to persuade her to do nothing that could displease either of you. I think she has listened to my advice.

I have your letter. I will check the figures and if they are useful, I will publish them in Harijan. Is it not true that if we buy the same quantity of Japanese cloth, it will be costlier than khadi? We have to examine our case as critics.

You have given up the Magan spinning-wheel, have you not? I have examined the results of Vinoba’s modifications in the method of plying takli. In one hour, 500 rounds of yarn on takli—is not that wonderful? In competition with it, the charkha will most often lose.

BHAI KRISHNAKANT,

I got your letter just now. Sardar is sitting with me. I read it out to him. We both wonder how Babuji¹ and others told you I was displeased. In Banaras² many things came to my notice but I had formed no firm opinion. I had hardly any time. I do not recollect having expressed to anyone any opinion about you or anyone else. And Sardar of course knew nothing.

215. A GREAT HARIJAN SEVAK GONE

Rajasaheb Kalakanker, whose untimely death was announced week before last, was a great Harijan sevak. He was ailing for nearly a year. I could hardly recognize him when I saw him last in Calcutta, where he was undergoing treatment. He was a most liberal-minded zamindar of U. P. It can be truly said of him that he lived for his ryots to the best of his ability. His tastes were simple. He mixed freely with people. His love for Harijans was no less than for others. He endeavoured by his open example to have caste Hindus of his zamindari abolish untouchability and let Harijans enjoy the same rights as they themselves enjoyed. All schools, wells, temples under his own direct management were freely thrown open to Harijans. Let us hope that the bereaved Ranisaheba and other members of Kalakanker’s family will carry out the noble traditions bequeathed by him and thus perpetuate the Rajasaheb’s memory.

_Harijan, 12-10-1934_

216. WHOSE VICTORY?

Harijan servants have need to exercise the greatest forbearance at this time of their trial. The Temple-entry Bill is gone. The sanatanists are jubilant. We must not mind their joy. Only yesterday we were what they are today. We may not hate them. We must love them. Let the reformers treasure the following lines a sister sends me from AE.’s² Interpreters, which she venerates almost as a devout Christian his Bible. These are the beautiful lines:

> Love and hate have a magical transforming power. They are the great soul-changers. We grow through their exercise into the likeness of what we contemplate. By intensity of hatred, nations create in themselves the character they imagine in their enemies. Hence it comes that all passionate conflicts result in an interchange of characteristics. We might say, with truth, that those who hate open a door by which their enemies enter and make their own the secret place of the heart.

² George William Russel (1867-1935), Irish poet, philosopher and painter. The Interpreters (1920) is a symposium in the Platonic fashion.
Love is the only thing that can transform sanatanists. Let us realize that they are what they are, in spite of themselves. We have no right to judge them or become impatient with them. Surely, it is enough if we are true to ourselves, that is, if we act up to our belief and render full twenty shillings in the pound to the Harijans.

Again, let us realize that in their victory lies their defeat; in our humiliation lies our victory. Sanatanists can no longer plead the Temple-entry Bill in defence of their opposition to the entry of Harijans to our temples by our common consent. Reformers can now prosecute the temple-entry question with re-doubled zeal.

The reformers would sin, if they felt that the burial of the Bill meant the burial of the temple-entry movement. It is not so. Wherever we can, without bitterness, have temples opened by the consent of sanatanists, we must do so. It is possible that those who were holding themselves aloof from the temple-entry movement, on account of the Temple-entry Bill being prosecuted, will, now that it is out of the way, join the movement to have them opened without the aid of the law. For, be it remembered that the Bill is not dead, it is only suspended. Legislation has to come, if sanatanists do not heartily co-operate with the reformers in having temples opened to Harijans precisely on the same terms as to caste Hindus.

217. INSTRUCTIVE FIGURES

The Maharashtra branch of the A. I. S. A., whose head office is situated in Wardha, has at my request furnished me with some most instructive figures about the incidence of the distribution of every rupee spent on khadi among the various persons engaged in the manufacture and distribution of khadi. The following are the figures for white khadi of 10 to 14 counts of yarn:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Rs. A. P.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Farmer for cotton</td>
<td>0 4 6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ginning</td>
<td>0 0 6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Carding</td>
<td>0 1 0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spinning</td>
<td>0 3 6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Weaving</td>
<td>0 4 0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Freight</td>
<td>0 0 8</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
This khadi constitutes roughly 50 per cent of the stock. Therefore, on that quantity, the management gets only one anna two pies (0-1-2) in the rupee worth of khadi and workers up to the weaver Rs. 0-13-6 in the rupee. It is satisfactory to note that the farmer, the spinner and the weaver get the largest portion among themselves. In the higher counts, the farmer gets much less and the spinner tops the list. But the incidental charges increase. They go as high as 25 per cent. Then, again, on fancy articles there may be cent per cent increase on khadi. Indeed, in the cost of khadi in a fancy kerchief costing one rupee, the portion going to Daridranarayana may be only half an anna or less. For socks or stockings made of hand-spun yarn on tiny hand machines, the cost of yarn would be trifling. The cost of an Andhra sari, as it may come from Andhra, may be Rs. 25, and it may be sold after fancy work done on it at Rs. 150. The moral is obvious: the simpler the khadi, the larger the amount that goes into the pockets of the poorest workers. The fancy work no doubt makes khadi popular in homes which could not otherwise look at it. I may add also that there are some popular varieties of saris and dhotis manufactured for poor people. On these no management charges are at all added. And there is no such thing as net profit in any of the numerous stores managed by the A. I. S. A. The management charges are added in order to make khadi self-supporting. This has not yet happened. The Committee of the A. I. S. A. is constantly taxing itself so as to reduce prices and to make the management so efficient as to bring down the expenses to a minimum.

Harijan, 12-10-1934

218. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

Not revised

October 12, 1934

CHI. MIRA,

I have your letter. But as you were going to America I knew that it was no use my writing to you, and I hardly think that you expected anything from me or any of us in America. I suppose I had better not say anything now about the scolding that you read in one of my letters. I had not intended to scold you; I did intend to warn you. But I suppose it is now a forgotten thing. Moreover you are a happy family again. You will be happier for the blowing up, and I see that Agatha has been writing nicely about you all along in her correspondence to the Indian newspapers. I am looking forward to a recital of your experiences in America. It was a good thought on your part to have written to Dr. Holmes and to have gone to America. It was an experience you certainly needed.

I understand your scheme about things in England. We must discuss that when we meet. Therefore I do not propose to give any opinion just now.

Things are shaping themselves here. I do not know what is going to happen. My mind is certainly set on going out of the Congress. I feel quite sure that it will do good to the Congress and to me. I shall better influence the Congress by being outside. I shall cease to be the weight that I am just now, and yet I shall be passing my views on to the Congress whenever occasion demands it. I must not give my time to writing about these things. These have to be attended to by Mahadev and Pyarelal. Every minute just now counts.

Love.

219. LETTER TO TITUS

October 12, 1934

MY DEAR TITUS,

I have your long letter. I am glad you have written at length. I am in correspondence with Narandas and others regarding the dairy. I would like to study the figures showing how the loss was incurred. Your asking me to make arrangements for you in anticipation of your severing the connection with the dairy is altogether premature. The dairy is not to be given up light-heartedly, and if it has got to be given up, surely there must be something wrong with the management. Therefore, if you have confidence in yourself, you should make it impossible to give up the dairy. Your suggestions about the rearrangement are worthy of consideration. I must discuss these suggestions with Narandas and Shankerlal, possibly Narahari also. I shall then be better able to form a decisive judgment. I agree with you that you should separate the useless cattle from the useful ones. As soon as I have a definite scheme, I shall approach the pinjrapole people. Indeed Narandas can do so himself, and I may come on the scene later if it becomes at all necessary. The most serious news, however, that I have about the dairy is a letter from Surendraji saying that the cattle are looking most miserable, some of them are skin and bone. It seems to me to be unbelievable. I would like you, therefore, to set my mind at rest on this point, and discuss with Surendraji and know from him the full meaning of his statement.

I am glad that your wife has become acclimatized, and that she is of great assistance to you in your work.

225. LETTER TO AMRIT KAUR
October 14, 1934

DEAR SISTER,

I have your letter. You were quite right in writing to me as you have done. It may be most difficult to give two hours to the artist friend. But I shall see what is possible. I look forward to your sending me a copy of the photograph of Charlie Andrews’s head.

The rumour you have heard is correct. I am trying to retire from the Congress. But that does not mean a life of quiet for me. Indeed I do not know what is to happen to me after the Congress session is over. But I should love to undertake the mission you would like me to. I do not know what is expected of such a mission. As you know, I took up, among several other things, woman’s cause also when I began public life. And my love for that service has persisted throughout all these 45 years. I would like you to sketch for me what you would have me do, and if I feel up to it and have the opportunity, you may depend upon my taking up the mission.

Yours sincerely,

WARDHA,
October 14, 1934

MY DEAR AMBUJAM.

You have filled me with deep anxiety, and I have not known what to do. In my despair I sent a long telegram to Harihara Sharma. At first I thought I would wire to Father. Then I became afraid lest he should be angry and your position should become more awkward than it already is.

Though I have not interfered with your fast, I have not felt happy over it. However, I do hope that it ended without any injury to the body, and that you were enjoying inward happiness during the fast. You must not give way to despair if even the fast has not induced the parents to grant you the permission to come to me. You must try again and again but no more fasting should be undertaken. You should try to deserve their permission by your correct conduct and patient argument with them. I am sure that they will listen to your request when they realize that it is not in a momentary fit that you have desired to come to me, but that it is a longing of the soul which you dare not suppress.² I do hope that you will listen to me.

Love.

233. STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

October 15, 1934

So much has been written in the Press regarding my proposed retirement from the Congress that it has become necessary to state the position as it occurs to me today. No doubt is left on my mind that many Congressmen do not like my proposals\(^1\) to make the Article regarding the habitual wearing of khaddar stiffer and a more workable spinning franchise compulsory and replace by the words “truthful and non-violent” the words “peaceful and legitimate” in the Congress creed.

opinion so far expressed renders it wholly unnecessary for me to put these proposals before fellow delegates, in order to test their feelings on them. I have not and never had any desire to carry them by a mere majority. For their proper working a hearty assent of an overwhelming majority is required, by my test. I cannot be satisfied with any majority, howsoever decisive, given as a price for my remaining in the Congress. Such a position cannot flatter my pride or vanity. It can only humiliate me. I do not want to become a patron of the Congress. I regard myself as a humble servant of the nation and a fellow-worker for the sake of service.

My proposed retirement is neither a threat nor an ultimatum. It is a natural consequence of the rejection of amendments, because hearty acceptance of the amendments is necessary to enable me to render efficient service.

It is now as clear as crystal that I cannot secure that hearty assent from the Congress. Subject, therefore, to whatever the informal meeting of the members of the A. I. C. C. may have to say, I propose to retire from the Congress immediately after closing of the session. In this step, I have the fullest concurrence of Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and Dr. Anrsari. The latter tells me that he had made up his mind at Port Said where he saw my statement that my retirement was in every way in the best interests of the nation. He had no doubt also as to the time for retirement. It is wholly wrong to think, as some have done, that the recent visit of Sardar Patel and Babu Rajendra Prasad was for the purpose of pressing me to remain in the Congress. They had never any doubt as to the correctness of my position. I may also state that many of my most valued co-workers, including the Khan Brothers, have heartily endorsed the contemplated retirement. All these know that my retirement from the Congress does not mean the loss of my services. On the contrary, my services are always at the country’s beck and call and may be commanded without any Congressman feeling any the least embarrassment because of my retirement from the Congress. I feel that the presence in the Congress of a man like me, having fundamental differences on many of the most important questions, with many colleagues, must be a source of weakness rather than strength. Hence the decision.

Lest my contemplated retirement should be exploited in order to damage the Parliamentary fight in which the Congress is now engaged, I would like all Congressmen to know that I am firmer than ever in my conviction that notwithstanding whatever I have said before to the contrary, I hold the representation of the Congress on the legislatures to be necessary. Boycott of legislatures was never meant to be a permanent step. Those who have no convictions to the contrary and are otherwise free should hold themselves at the disposal of the Congress to serve the nation through entering the legislatures. The present election campaign is a fight not among men but among political principles represented by men or women professing to represent them. It is the paramount duty of voters who believe that the Congress stands in the amplest manner for the nation’s goal of independence and that it has counted and will count no sacrifice too great to achieve that goal, to give their vote to the Congress candidates.

Having cleared the ground thus for my retirement, I would invite the attention of Congressmen to the amendments appended here to giving effect to my proposal for reducing the number of delegates from 6,000 to 1,000. At the most, I hold it to be vital for the growth of the Congress. Unwieldy and merely spectacular as the Congress had become in the years before 1920, it has tended more and more again to degenerate into the same spectacular body.
Entertainments and exhibitions, good as they are in their places, have overshadowed the business part of the annual session.

My amendments remedy the evil. These amendments are to be regarded solely as my individual view. In order that the change contemplated may not come without due warning to the nation, with the consent of Sardar Vallabhbhai I have taken the liberty of placing the amendments before the public. There is no question of threat or ultimatum behind the amendments. It will be open to the Subjects Committee and then to the Congress to reject the amendments, but I would warn them against so doing without the most careful consideration. Let Congressmen understand that I am the author of the constitution¹, as it is. They will also bear in mind that I have had an exceptional opportunity of carefully studying its working. Experience has revealed several flaws in the constitution. My proposal is devised to remove them. That experience may discover other flaws in my proposal is quite likely. When they are discovered, the Congress will deal with them but so far as I can judge, my proposal meets with the present situation, and makes the whole Congress organization, if it is at all honestly worked, a most efficient body and more truly representative of Congressmen than it has ever been.

Briefly, it amounts to this. The maximum of 1,000 delegates will now be distributed not according to the population of each province but in accordance with the number of Congressmen on the Congress register in each province and there will be one delegate to every 1,000 or more Congressmen. Therefore, in order to have the full quota of 1,000 for all India, we shall need 1,000,000 Congressmen on our

¹ For the constitution as passed at the Nagpur session in 1920, vide “Congress constitution adopted at Nagpur session”, december 1920.
register. In order to keep up to its level of population, every province will at least have to make an effort to keep its register of members up to the mark. In order to check the tendency that has unfortunately grown up of buying members just for voting purposes at four annas each, the proposed change requires that no one shall be entitled to vote at any election before the expiry of six months after the date of his paying a subscription of four annas. Then again, hitherto, we have had persons in any part of India elected as delegates in any other part of India. The result has been a number of bogus delegates at all Congress sessions. Some Provincial Congress Committees have been known to have offered almost a free run to anybody who has wanted to be elected as a delegate. This is effectively dealt with under the amendments by restricting the election of delegates to only those who might be on the Congress register in the constituency for which they stand. The actual number of delegates to be elected shall depend upon and vary with the total number of Congressmen of six months’ standing on the Congress register for the whole of India. In order to ensure the election of delegates who are real representatives, choice is confined to Congressmen on the registers of the different constituencies whose number would vary from year to year with the number of Congressmen on the register. Under this proposal, the expenses of election are reduced to a minimum. The possibility for fraud, too, is reduced, where there is desire for tolerable honesty. No constitution that human intelligence can devise will ever be foolproof or knave-proof.

Another change of importance is that delegates themselves become the A. I. C. C. members for the year, thus obviating the necessity for election of an A. I. C. C. and delegates from their provinces become the Provincial Congress Committee members in their respective provinces. Thus I have combined three elections in one and ensured continuity of work.

Then there is the amendment making Calcutta a separate province. When I was in Calcutta, it was suggested to me that I should induce the Working Committee to propose the amendment. If the idea commends itself to Congressmen, the same facility may be extended to some other cities. The experiment has worked well in Bombay.

There is a proposal to replace the new A. I. C. C. by 1,000 members elected by the delegates who will attend the Congress. If this suggestion is fantastic or too hastily conceived, it will have to be withdrawn. But seeing that we might not have another session of the Congress before the beginning of 1936, I thought that it would be better if the change was inaugurated by a more representative A. I. C. C. delegates assembled will have to divide themselves into provincial blocks and each block will elect, for the present, its quota according to the existing proportion.

Congressmen will note, too, that in the amendment there is no provision for the taluk and district committees. This is a deliberate omission. The duty of creating some organization in taluks and districts devolves upon the Provincial Congress Committees, which will appoint committees or agencies or have committees elected in accordance with the spirit of the amendments, i.e., by dividing districts and taluks into constituencies or circles for the purpose of electing committees, which must necessarily be small. At present, provincial organizations contain an unwieldy number. The result has been much cry and little wool.

I may note two more important changes. The Congress has always insisted, in resolutions, on the use of Hindi in the conduct of its business, but members have not, in any appreciable measure, responded to their own oft-repeated resolutions. I have sought, therefore, to introduce a slight education test by requiring every applicant for membership to sign his or her name in Devanagari or the Urdu script. This much can be learned in one hour. I remember having given no more time to my wife and a 60-year-old client for teaching them to sign their names in English script. Is it too much to expect an aspirant after Congress membership to give one hour for the sake of the nation?

The other change contemplated is to regularize the convention of giving the President power of appointing his own colleagues of the Working Committee, including Secretaries and Treasurer. The idea is to save time and some degree of vexation. Not to accept the recommendation of the President in such a matter would be a vote of no-confidence. No president can work if his colleagues are imposed upon him.

Now I come to two other resolutions. One is to free the Reception Committee from the burden of elaborate arrangements for entertainments and exhibition. These have been, according to the idiosyncrasies of the Reception Committees, entrusted more or less to the All-India Spinners’ Association, as they should have been always entirely left to it. I have held special views about exhibitions which I do not wish to reiterate here. The resolution I have suggested regularizes the usually-held convention. The idea behind my suggestion is that the primary and only function of the Reception Committee should be to make the annual session of the Congress a thorough success from the practical business point of view. The present mode makes it impossible for important village or district centres to invite the Congress. The result has been that its educative influence has never travelled outside the principal cities. There is no reason whatsoever why the Congress should not be able to meet even in a village. If they have business ability, the village that invites the Congress will financially not only not lose but gain. There are many important stations on the railway line throughout India, where the Congress can easily meet without the slightest inconvenience to its members. All this can only happen when we develop the instinct for identifying ourselves with the masses and desire to know them and their wants and to appreciate the beauty of village life, when it is shorn of the squalor and poverty that make it what it is today in India.

That brings me to the last resolution. That resolution seeks to bring into being an association that will look after village industries. I have named the spirit behind it, cent per cent swadeshi. What goes under the name swadeshi is no doubt good enough but that swadeshi is bound to make progress without any effort on the part of the Congress. Special effort was, in the early stages, necessary when the deliberate fashion was to despise everything that was swadeshi, and when it was a mark of civilization, if not also of patriotism, to adopt foreign manners and customs and to use fashionable foreign articles. I well remember my student days when we, the students, used to look with admiration at the fashionable dresses of our teachers which were made of foreign stuff and were looking forward to the day when we should be able to afford the necessary freedom to be dressed even as they were. The Congress can certainly claim to have changed all this and evoked a spirit of swadeshi but it must not rest on its past achievements and move in a circle. It has now to penetrate into the villages and not be satisfied with the ability of the cities to manufacture articles of use and luxury, in imitation of the foreign ones. It has now to understand which village industry has died and why. Whilst the Government has perhaps the largest share in pauperizing the villages, cities, that have developed out of ruin to villages, cannot escape their responsibility for the growing pauperism of the dumb millions and it is not yet too late to resuscitate villages by organizing their industries as far as possible. By so doing, we can surely put many millions of rupees into the pockets of the villagers without much, if any, capital output.

Let me quote some startling figures. The All-India Spinners’ Association is serving over 5,000 villages and through them supporting 220,000 spinners and weavers and 20,000 carders. During the ten years of its existence, over 2 crores of rupees have been distributed amongst these villagers. In other words, at least that much wealth was produced in the country through the efforts of the Association and the whole of it contributed to the prosperity of villagers, not by destroying any of their industries but by utilizing their idle hours. Out of the two and a quarter crores of rupees, three quarters went into the pockets of spinners alone and 95 lakhs of rupees into the pockets of farmers, for cotton which the Association bought for the spinners. On an average, these three classes of workers, spinners, weavers and carders, added Rs. 12 per year to their earnings. In individual cases, it has been found as much as 43 per cent has been added to the earning of spinners. This is not a fairy tale. These are figures specially prepared at my instance and can be verified by any research scholar who cares to. The figures I have given are an under-estimate, but the A. I. S. A. touches the centre of village life. I admit that its organization presents little attraction to those who are not saturated with the village spirit, but the organization which I have now in view presents varied scope for Indian talent. Some of the perishing industries must be revived, if villagers are to live. I am quite convinced that some of these village industries can be revived and are worth reviving. With a little scientific research and a little organizing ability the proposed new association can do a vast amount of work, if, of course, it has the backing of the people, which will be the main capital it will start with. If such an association is to succeed, it must be in the hands of those who have some knowledge of the work and abundant faith in their mission and have love for the villagers. It must be autonomous like the A. I. S. A. A political, democratic organization like the Congress cannot meddle with the work of experts, without spoiling their work and damaging the prestige of the Congress. I, therefore, strongly recommend the adoption of the resolution for creating an All-India Village Industries Association.

\[1\] The Bombay Chronicle, 16-10-1934, here adds: “Roughly this means a 20 per cent addition to their annual earning.”

VOL.65: 16 SEPTEMBER, 1934 - 15 DECEMBER, 1934  179

The exhibition that I have referred to in my resolution regarding the Reception Committee contemplates the exhibition of the result of the activities of the All-India Village Industries Association as now contemplated. The two together will bring before the public the marvellous result that can be produced through the industries of villagers in their own homes. It is my certain conviction that if the so-called higher classes will but identify themselves with the so-called lower classes and lend them the support of their intelligence and ability, India can become a land flowing with milk and honey and can also achieve her economic independence without deadly war, either with the Government or with the capitalists. Political independence will follow as a matter of course, without the intervention of civil disobedience.

The vital amendments of the constitution and the two resolutions have all been conveyed in that spirit and no other. For me, complete independence of India is an impossible dream without the higher classes merging themselves in those millions who are miscalled the lower classes. And I would like to examine all the three resolutions in that spirit and no other.

APPENDIX

The following are the proposed amendments to the constitution:

1. Any person over the age of 18 years, who believes in Article I of this constitution, shall, on making a written declaration and presenting an application in the form hereto and on payment of four annas, be entitled to be placed on the register of Congress members, kept at any office duly authorized thereto —within his own district.

1. (a) The application shall be presented in duplicate and may be handed in personally or sent by post or messenger.

2. It shall state in full, name, age, sex, occupation and address (stating distinctly village, taluk, district and province) of the applicant and shall have been duly signed in his own or her handwriting in Devanagari or Urdu character.

3. On receiving the application and on finding it to be in order, the registering officer shall file the application marking on it the date of receipt, serial number and such other particulars as may be prescribed, and shall send one of the duplicates to the Provincial Headquarters.
4. An applicant, on being enrolled, shall receive a certificate of membership as per schedule hereto and printed on durable paper, either in the language of the province in which the applicant resides or in Hindi, in Devanagari or Urdu script.

5. (a) No member shall be entitled to vote at an election of members of any Congress committee, unless he shall have been continuously on the Congress register for six months prior to the date of election.

(b) A member shall be entitled to vote or be eligible for an office only within the registration area mentioned in his certificate.

6. In addition to the existing provinces, the city of Calcutta shall be constituted an independent Congress province.

7. In the case of towns and villages having a population of 2,000 or more inhabitants, the Provincial Congress Committee concerned shall divide it into suitable circles, provided that no circle shall contain less than 1,000 inhabitants. Each such circle shall constitute a village.

8. The delegation to the Congress shall be reduced from 6,000 to not more than 1,000 and shall be in proportion of one to every 1,000 or more members on the Congress rolls, kept in the several provinces.

9. (a) Each Provincial Congress Committee shall report by letter or wire to the Working Committee the total strength of the original members of not less than six months standing, in terms of Article 5(a). Each report must reach the office of the Working Committee on or before the date and time fixed by the Working Committee in that behalf. (b) Only the members so reported shall be entitled to vote at election of delegates in that province and in case of failure to report in time, the province may be disentitled to elect its delegates.

10. On receipt of figures for total number of eligible voters, the Working Committee shall fix dates for the election of delegates and the proportion for each province, in accordance with their strength of membership, and call upon the provincial committees to proceed with the election of their quota of delegates. All elections shall take place according to single transferable vote.

11. Thereupon each province shall be divided into as many constituencies as would give five delegates to each constituency.

12. No village or circle shall have voting unless it has at least ten duly qualified members on its roll.
13. No one, not being a duly qualified voter on any of the registers, in his constituency, shall offer himself for election as delegate.

14. Each province shall complete its elections on or before the time appointed by the Working Committee.

15. A complete certified list of delegates shall reach the office of the Working Committee not later than the date fixed by the Working Committee.

16. Delegates so elected shall constitute a provincial quota of the A. I. C. C. of the Congress, as also the P. C. C. of that province, and shall represent the respective organizations as from the date of the annual session of the Congress till the commencement of the next following session. The whole of the Congress delegates shall constitute the A. I. C. C.

17. The A. I. C. C. shall meet at least once again during the period before the next session and oftener if required by the Working Committee or by a joint requisition addressed to the Working Committee by not less than 100 members.

ELECTION TO A. I. C. C.

18. (a) For the period following the current session of the Congress, an A. I. C. C. containing 1,000 members shall be elected by the existing delegates and they shall replace the existing A. I. C. C. and the several P. C. Cs. The number of delegates allotted to each province shall be according to its existing quota. Delegates shall vote only for representatives of their own provinces.

(b) The Working Committee shall forthwith proceed to form the new province of Calcutta and a Provincial Committee for it out of the Bengal P. C. C.

19. No Provincial Congress Committee and no subordinate Committee shall be reconsidered by the Working Committee, unless it has complied with all the conditions laid down in this constitution or any rules framed thereunder by the Working Committee.

20. On failure on the part of any provincial organization to function in terms of the constitution, the Working Committee may form one to carry on Congress work in that province.

21. The Working Committee shall appoint one or more Inspectors to examine the records, papers and account books of all Congress organizations which shall furnish all information and give to Inspectors access to offices and records.

22. The Working Committee shall have the power to frame rules and issue instructions in matters not provided for in the constitution and for the proper working of the constitution.

23. The President shall select from among delegates members of the Working Committee including Secretaries and Treasurers for his year of office.

ALL-INDIA VILLAGE INDUSTRIES ASSOCIATION

Whereas organizations claiming to be swadeshi have sprung up all over the country with and without the assistance of Congressmen, whereas much confusion has arisen in the public mind as to the true nature of swadeshi, whereas the aim of the Congress has been from its inception progressive identification with the masses, whereas village reorganization and village reconstruction is one of the items in the Congress constructive programme, whereas such reconstruction necessarily implies revival and encouragement of dead or dying village industries, besides the central industry, hand-spinning, and whereas this work is possible only through concentrated special effort unaffected by and independent of the political activities of the Congress, Mr. Kumarappa is hereby authorized to form under the aegis of the Congress and as part of its activities, an autonomous organization under the advice and guidance of Gandhiji called the All-India Village Industries Association with power to frame its own constitution, to raise funds and to perform such acts as may be considered necessary for the advancement of its objects.

FUNCTION OF RECEPTION COMMITTEE

Whereas, under the vital changes made in the constitution, the annual function will be wholly occupied with serious business before it, there shall be no distraction inside the enclosure containing the central pandal and out-houses and whereas it is desirable to free the Reception Committee from the burden of making elaborate arrangements for entertainments and providing spectacular demonstrations, the work of organizing exhibitions and spectacular demonstrations shall be entrusted to the All-India Spinners’ Association and the All-India Village Industries’ Association, which bodies shall organize them so as to combine instruction with entertainment for the benefit of the people flocking from villages.

DEAR DR. SARDESAI,

I thank you for your letter. I have had a talk with Jamnalalji, and he tells me that the Ruiya Charities Trust is not yet in operation. But when it is, Jamnalalji says that he would undoubtedly bear your hospital in mind. But he wants me to warn you against building any hope on it just now.

Little Sumitra\(^1\) is living on milk, fruit and some non-starchy vegetables such as marrow, green leaves and the like. Will you please tell me if it is necessary for her to add anything to this diet? I ask this question because her grandmother wrote to say that you had advised that she should take ordinary food. She was taking that food before, but she has always been constipated. What is more, she has had fever off and on. I then put her on the diet she is now having and it seems to have suited her well. There was an interruption only for one day. She had a little chapati, and the next day she developed high fever. I stopped the chapati and the fever stopped and has not returned since. If you do not hold it absolutely necessary for her to have bread, rice and dal, I would far rather not take the risk and let her go on with as much milk and fruit as she can take.

Once more thanking you for the attention you are giving her,

Yours sincerely,

242. LETTER TO HARILAL GANDHI

October 17, 1934

CHI. HARILAL,

You are constantly in my thoughts. If I had time, I would go on inflicting long letters on you. If the change that you have described endures, a painful episode in my life would end and I would be extremely happy in this the last stage of my life.

I do not wish that you should do anything beyond your strength. Only as much as your reason and heart accept will endure and seem natural. I am sure that if you followed rules of diet, etc., you would be completely all right. Do not regard yourself as an old man.

I would not be pained if you could do nothing, but I would certainly be pained if you were to break your word to me or do anything which might amount to breach of trust with anybody.

At the moment, it is I who trust you most. Others, that is Ba, Ramdas, Devdas, Kanti, etc., are less hopeful for they have memories of bitter experiences. I have them, too, but I had never given up hope about you, and always believed that one day you would be reformed. I believe that that day has come now. May God help you.

Write to me and give me exact details of your debts and the names of the parties to whom you owe them. I wish to help you as much as I can consistently with my dharma. Do you have to pay interest on the loans?

I see that you have not been able to give up smoking. So long as you find it absolutely necessary to smoke, you may do so as if you were taking medicine. Perhaps you do not know that it is not in the least difficult to give up smoking. It can be done by adopting a simple diet. What do you eat? Are you ready to make changes in your diet?

I had a long letter from Maneklal. He says that you are afraid of temptations in Rajkot. If there is the slightest truth in that, let me know. Have no hesitation at all in telling me the exact truth. Write to me frankly and open out your heart as you would do to a very intimate friend. You made many friends in the past. Forget now the harm that those friendships did you. Now regard me as your only friend. That will certainly do you no harm. And, moreover, there is a Supreme Friend between you and me, who dwells in our hearts and, therefore, knows our thoughts.

I very much wish to send for you here and keep you with me. But my condition is quite peculiar just now. I don’t enjoy a moment’s leisure. I rise up at 2.30 every morning. Today I rose at 1.45. It is nearing 3.30 now. If I called you, I would feel tempted to talk with you, which, however, I cannot afford to do. I can’t stop thinking about you all the times, though. Maybe, father’s love doesn’t fall away from even a devotee of Mother Gita, or perhaps the Gita teaches that I should be thus concerned with you. Be that as it may. If you have no fear just now of being overcome by temptations, remain there for the time being and learn spinning on the takli, etc., thoroughly.

If you are not keeping a diary, start doing so.

A letter for Manu is enclosed. Ramdas is fairly well. He is still in hospital, though. There is no fever, but he has not regained strength.

Bhai Arjunlal,

I have your letter which I find difficult to understand. Jamnalalji has no part at all in this matter. I too am totally ignorant. I have never taken interest in such controversies. Sardar is not partial to anyone. He fights with me too. But we are agreed on one thing, that is, to do only what we hold as truth. If your aim is but to serve, what concern can you have for office! He who craves for office can never serve. I had thought you were now free of the fascination for office. Now tell me, what I can do? You must have seen my statement. Please understand that after a short while I shall have nothing to do with these things. And later no one may even consult me on such controversial matters, but my services will certainly be available if needed.

Give up your infatuation, serve with a pure heart and be a silent worker. I had approached you precisely with this hope which again prompted me to write this.

You ask me to give my opinion upon the statement attributed by the Maharashtra to Dr. Moonje. I am very sorry to have to tell you that my memory can give me no help in this matter. I have no recollection of having sent any such message to Dr. Moonje but if Dr. Moonje would kindly coax my memory, give me, if he remembers them, the details surrounding the sending of the message and the names of persons concerned, it is quite possible I might be able to recollect the circumstances.

I cannot help expressing my regret that if Dr. Moonje did make the statement attributed to him, before making public use of a message so important as to make him alter his decision, he should have first had his recollection confirmed by me.

254. FOR HARIJANS’ SAKE

A correspondent asks:

Why do you insist on sacrificial spinning or self-spinning? Sacrificial spinning is spinning to give away. Self-spinning is to convert your own yarn into khadi for personal use. In either case, you take away something from the mouth of the poor spinner, whom you call the lowliest paid worker. In sacrificial spinning, you do serve the poor a little by assisting to lower the price of khadi. In the other, it is sheer snatching the bread from a poor spinner’s mouth.

This would be partly or wholly true, if spinning had become universal. But today there are some Harijans whose wage-earning capacity has been reduced by 50 per cent because they, being weavers, have no hand-spun yarn to weave from. They are now trying to eke out a precarious living anyhow. These would not be reduced to this sad condition, if there was sacrificial spinning going on in the country on any large scale. I have already stated in these columns how in Orissa representatives of nearly ten thousand weavers, who are almost (because unclassified) Harijans, were starving for want of work, which is the same thing as saying want of hand-spun yarn.

It is useless to say that they can weave mill-spun yarn. These ten thousand weavers were doing it. But, owing to Japanese competition, the demand for hand-woven mill-spun cloth has considerably decreased. It is possible for khadi weavers to find a local market for their khadi, not for hand-woven cloth of mill-spun yarn. Time was when there was an abundance of hand-spun yarn because there were hundreds, if not thousands, of sacrificial spinners, and there was a dearth of weavers. Now sacrificial spinning has gone out of vogue, and there is practically a plethora of weavers who would gladly weave hand-spun yarn. Therefore, for a long time to come and so long as there is demand for khadi on the market and until spinning has become so general as to supply the demand, both sacrificial and self-spinning have a definite place in national economy. It means definite, tangible service of the poor and, among them, specially Harijans.

Moreover, such spinning, seeing that it has to be done by intelligent, educated men and women, becomes allied to art and thus admits of great development. The marvellous improvements that have taken place in the wheel and its accessories, the handgin and the carding-bow, are all due to the interest that the educated middle-class men and women have taken in the movement. All the readers of Harijan do not know that the Secretary of the A. I. S. A. is an M. A. and the son of a distinguished and successful banker of Bombay, that 1 Vide “Will they do it?”, 25-5-1934.

2 Shankerlal Banker
its President⁴ is one of the ablest businessmen India has produced, that the controller of the khadi organization in Tamil Nad is an equally distinguished ex-lawyer⁵, that the organizers in Bengal are an able physician³ and an able chemist⁴, and in U. P. an ex-Principal⁵ of a national college. These are but a few names, out of many such I can give, who have dedicated themselves to the service of Daridranarayana, through khadi. But for this band of devotees, the substantial progress that it has made would have been impossible, and the half crore rupees that have been distributed among, say, two hundred and fifty thousand workers, not as doles but wages for honest labour, during the years that the spinning movement has been going on, would not have been distributed. In no other or better manner could such quick work have been done than through the wheel. It has brought the lowliest in living touch with some of the most cultured men and women in the country, it has brought a ray of light into dark hovels, it has put heart into sinking bodies, it has provided milk for thousands of milkless children, enabled villagers who would care to have automatic famine insurance, reduced idleness and reclaimed thousands from a beggar’s life.

And yet the work is only in its beginning stages. The workers are too few. Those that are need more consecration and greater concentration. Many more hundreds can be absorbed by this national and humanitarian effort.

Therefore, it is wrong to say that sacrificial spinning or selfspinning is harmful to the wage-spinners. It is the peremptory duty of all who can to devote at least half an hour daily to spin for the sake of Harijans—the outcastes of India.

Harijan, 19-10-1934

255. NOTES

A SEVAK’S DIFFICULTY

A Lyallpur correspondent asks the following pertinent questions:

1. G. D. Birla
2. C. Rajagopalachari
3. Dr. B. C. Roy
4. Satis Chandra Das Gupta
5. Acharya Jugal Kishore
(1) In many chawls where the Harijans are settled, there is a Muslim or a Sikh population. There are practically no Hindus, or if there be two or three Hindu shopkeepers, they are exclusively under the thumb and control of those zamindars, whose orders they cannot disobey or whose displeasure they cannot incur. Thus, those Hindus are incapable of rendering any help to the Harijans in supplying water to them. How to solve this difficulty?

(2) There is an anti-propaganda of ‘Adi-Dharmis’, who wean them away from the Hindu society. How to meet or counteract that propaganda?

(3) There is an untouchability within several sects of untouchables.

As to the first question, the first obvious step is to plead with the Muslims and Sikhs to permit the Harijans to use the common well. The second is, side by side with the method of persuasion or after its failure, for the caste Hindus themselves to supply the necessary quantity of water to Harijans. Of course, there is the recourse to the law-courts. Harijans are by law entitled to use common wells, roads, etc., in the same manner as the rest of the public. But this remedy has to be used most sparingly.

For the second question, nothing but progressive repentance and consequent change on the part of caste Hindus can prevent the growing estrangement between them and the Harijans. AdiDharmis are themselves Hindus. Their separation is a revolt against caste Hindus for the latter’s oppression. They will return to the fold when they see that untouchability has been entirely removed.

As for the third question, the removal of untouchability as between the various sects of untouchables will progress almost, if not entirely, in the same ratio as the removal of untouchability on the part of caste Hindus. For, the observance of untouchability among untouchables is a direct result of its observance by caste Hindus.

“DARIDRANARAYANA” AND HARIJAN

There is a struggle going on between Daridranarayana and Harijan: Which includes the other? Thoughtlessly the answer would be, ‘of course, Harijan’. But a moment’s reflection shows that Daridranarayana is the larger form. Harijans are undoubtedly Daridranarayana but they are ranked the lowest by the well-to-do.
Hence they are the nearest and dearest to Hara or Hari—God. For, has He not called Himself Servant of His servants? And whom will He serve most, if not those who are the most neglected by the world? Daridranarayana however includes, besides Harijans, all those many millions who are not branded outcastes from their birth. Therefore, service of Harijans necessarily includes that of Daridranarayana, but that of Daridranarayana may not always be also service of Harijans. Writers for Harijan will, therefore, do well always to bear this distinction in mind. For they should remember that the Harijan is a weekly wholly devoted to the Harijan cause and, therefore, excludes everything that has no bearing on that cause either directly or indirectly. It is necessary to bear this distinction in mind, since I am devoting its columns freely to many matters which I have appeared to have hitherto excluded from them. The fact is that during the hurricane tour I had little leisure to think, as I am now doing, of many efforts at construction, much less to write about them. For their allround amelioration, there is limitless scope. Do they not represent numerically a large part of humanity and, in point of usefulness, rank perhaps the highest in society? Indian humanity would soon disintegrate, if they suddenly ceased to do the work they are doing at present with the brand of the outcaste on their foreheads for reward.

THE REFORMER’S PRAYER

A correspondent sends the following apposite prayer from Tagore’s Gitanjali:

Here is Thy footstool and there rest Thy feet, where live the poorest and lowliest and lost.

When I try to bow to Thee, my obeisance cannot reach down to the depth where Thy feet rest among the poorest and lowliest and lost.

Pride can never approach to where Thou walkest in the clothes of the humble among the poorest and lowliest and lost.

My heart can never find its way to where Thou keepest company with the companionless among the poorest, the lowliest and the lost.

256. LETTER TO PRABHASHANKAR PATTANI

October 19, 1934

SUNA BHAISHRI,

I got your long letter dictated in the train.

The information that Kumarsaheb had completely recovered was welcome news. On reading that you had fallen ill as a result of your labour for his recovery, I remembered the story of Babar. Didn’t Babar die while saving Humayun? You also have taken up the role of a Prince’s father and are draining away your health.

Your caution regarding me is justified. But you and I are helpless in the matter. I will go where Rama leads. He has not yet spoken clearly. Everything will be clear in Bombay. I don’t even think about what will happen.

Vain is it to lament
What pleases the Master of the world at the moment,
Nothing happens as we wish,
Thus shall we save ourselves from worrying over things.

These lines of Narasinh Mehta I have been chanting to myself since 1893. I have also tried to the best of my ability to live according to them, looking upon them as holy words of the Vedas. Such utterances are included in my definition of the Vedas. My God who inspires the Vedas speaks through all languages.

I hope Ramabehn’s wife will remain kind to me. I do trust women like her will carry on the burden when the Congress drops spinning from its programme. I know, however, I cannot ask you also to do that.

257. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI

October 19, 1934

CHI. RAMDAS,

I got your letter. You must have received my letters. I will take care to write to you even from Bombay. You may take codliver oil and eat eggs if you find it necessary to do so. If the doctor leaves the choice to you, between the two, eggs are preferable. Crores of rupees are spent in the preparation of codliver oil, and I do not know how much cruelty is involved in catching the fish. It seems to me to be a Satanic type of medicine. Eggs matured according to modern methods seem to be quite innocuous. We can see this for ourselves by making experiments, whereas we cannot prepare cod-liver oil ourselves. All the same, you know that I encouraged Prabhudas to take cod-liver oil, as also Radha and others. None of us can overcome the desire to live. There is neither sin nor shame in this desire. Cod-liver oil also is one of the means of keeping oneself alive. Even men who are reputed to be spiritually enlightened use it. Who am I, then, to stop you from taking it? This is a matter in which nobody should interfere in another’s case. Ultimately, everyone should be his own judge as to what his dharma is. You practise self-examination and are eager to acquire knowledge from others. I have, therefore, tried to tell you about both things as much as I know. You may now take either of them if and when it may be necessary to do so. Stay in the hospital as long as the doctor wants you to do so. All that experience will be useful to you.

1 Addressee’s wife

And now about Nimu. I don’t write much, or anything, to you regarding her, thinking that she writes to you about everything. I have been giving her fairly detailed guidance in regard to food and have made arrangements for teaching her English. Other subjects she is already learning. I send her milk and fruit in sufficient quantity. Prabhavati and Sharma look after her and she remains quite cheerful. During my absence, these two will look after everything. If you have any suggestion to make, write to me. Do you think that I should go there after the Congress session is over, that is, towards the end of this month? Does Ba want it? When you are able to walk about, I should like you to go to Wadhwan and other places. Maneklal will feel very happy if you go to the new place where he has been transferred. He is very keen that you should go. He praises the air of the place very much. But you will not get fruits there. There is Chorwad too. Stop thinking altogether. If you make your mind light, there will be no danger at all to your life. If you thus go out to these places, Ba may come and stay with me at Wardha for some time. In that case I need not go to Ahmedabad at all. Wherever I go, I am bound to have some public business to attend to. I, therefore, wish to avoid going there. But if you think I must go there I will. Let me know frankly what you wish.
I understand your earnest desire that I should call Ba to Bombay. But I think it will be more proper if she remains there. It will be proper for her to leave only when you can fully look after yourself. I am not taking with me any girl this time. From among the men, too, I will take as few as possible. I shall be accompanied by Kishorelalbhai and Gomatibehn. Kakasaheb and Professor Akshayachandra also will be coming. I don’t remember other names at the moment. Let us see what happens in Bombay.

What you say about the danger of my remaining in the Congress being exploited is perfectly correct. It is for such reasons that I am trying to leave it. However, it is not easy to leave such a great institution without doing it harm. There are many pure men, too, in it.

Jamnalalji will remain here. I am not taking even him to the Congress session. I have dissuaded many others, too.

258. LETTER TO AMBALAL SARABHAI

October 19, 1934

SUJNA BHAJI,

I got both your letters. I understand your inability to be one of the Trustees of the Harijan Ashram. I don’t wish to press you too hard. But may I assume that, in regard to the Harijan work itself, you will meet the needs of the work in Gujarat from time to time?

I accept your decision regarding the dairy. The loss during the last year was very heavy indeed. I am looking into the matter. I shall be satisfied if you meet the loss up to December. I should, however, like to see you adhere to your original assurance. I will not readily let the burden of even Rs. 4,000 fall on you. If the loss was due to no negligence on our part, I will not hesitate to stretch my hand before you. I don’t wish to run the dairy at a loss even for one year. Narandas is going through all the accounts. In the budget for next year prepared three or four months ago, the aim is indeed to balance the two sides. Meanwhile I learnt about the loss of Rs. 4,000. Narandas will now go to Sabarmati and guide me. My intention in writing all this is to assure you that, having secured your support in this scheme
... I have not become indifferent to the losses. It would be against my nature to go on burdening you with losses, however big they may be. In all public activities under my charge throughout my life, I have always tried to balance the two sides. I do not hesitate to incur a loss when I think it necessary to do so, but then I do it knowingly. When conducting research in tanning, or when hoping for profit from Ramachandran lift, I did foresee the possibility of loss and had put an outer limit to it. I had involved the late Revashankarbhai in the business of the Ramachandran lift and he had to make good Rs. 5,000. The scheme was then withdrawn. In tanning, we may still have to continue to put up with losses. It is an industry in which it is absolutely necessary that we should take interest. Part of the loss in it will be met by Ghanshyamdas. Into this modest venture in the service of the cow, I have drawn you. It will mean loss of my reputation if you now withdraw. I have inflicted this long explanation, which I have done after first accepting your decision, because I do not wish to lose my reputation with you. You know very well that I have the utmost admiration for your frankness. I don’t mind your decision at all. All my business ventures rest wholly on my reputation. The paper of bank-notes, worthless in itself, is backed by some gold at least. The paper of my notes is backed by nothing but Ramanama. With whom, therefore, may I plead if not with a man like you?

263. NEW LIFE FOR KHADI

[Before October 21, 1934]

Even though khadi is the most powerful means for attaining freedom, our khadi organizations are carrying on the work only as an economic activity. An element of democracy can be introduced in these organizations only to a certain extent. Conflict and even competition can have a place in democracy. But these cannot be permitted in an economic organization. Can we think of different or opposing groups in a commercial firm? The whole administration of the firm would be thrown out of gear if such a thing happens. Moreover, the khadi organizations are not merely economic organizations; they are benevolent institutions too. Their aim is not to serve anybody’s selfish interests but to promote public welfare. In democracy it is a rule to carry on work by humouring public opinion. The aim of our khadi organizations is to attain not merely preya but sreya for the people. Hence, at times they may have to carry on their work independently of the ever-shifting public opinion. They cannot be allowed to become the means of nurturing individual ambitions.

1. This is a summary of a discussion with some khadi workers about the need to reorganize khadi work.

While thinking about the reorganization of khadi production you should not forget that in certain matters the economics of khadi and the commonly prevalent economics are poles asunder. I am always reminded of one thing which the well-known British economist Adam Smith has said in his famous treatise The Wealth of Nations. In it he has described some economic laws as universal and absolute. Then he has described certain situations which may be an obstacle to the operation of these laws. These disturbing factors are the human nature, the human temperament or altruism inherent in it. Now, the economics of khadi is just the opposite of it. Benevolence which is inherent in human nature is the very foundation of the economics of khadi. What Adam Smith has described as pure economic activity based merely on the calculations of profit and loss is a selfish attitude and it is an obstacle to the development of khadi; and it is the function of a champion of khadi to counteract this tendency. Hence, the tactics normally adopted in a profiteering business have no place in khadi activity. For instance, cheating, fraud, falsehood, adulteration, exploiting people’s addictions or their baser feelings things practised in mill industries and ordinary trade—are to be completely shunned in khadi activity. The policy of paying minimum wages to the weaver or spinner with a view to increasing profits can have no place in khadi activity. At the same time, khadi activity cannot be carried on by incurring losses as a result of unpractical attitudes. The reason why our khadi organizations incur losses today is the inefficiency of our workers. In khadi activity spinners and other workers get full reward of their labour but the middlemen and organizers get nothing more than their due share.

2 Spiritual welfare

Now take the case of standardization, i.e., producing khadi with a uniform policy. Such uniformity cannot be expected in khadi. Rajagopalchari had once remarked that a poor woman cannot be expected to spin yarn of uniform quality as in a mill. She is not a lifeless machine, but a human being. She has her own happiness and unhappiness, she has feelings and is subject to illness. Sometimes she may not be well, sometimes her child or some other relative. may be ill and she may be upset and this cannot but affect the quality of her spinning. Unless your heart is made of stone, you must accept her yarn irrespective of its quality provided she does not deliberately spin bad yarn. Her yarn must be dear to us, for it has been sanctified by her honest labour. A mill product does not have that personal touch. Hence, it cannot bring us this spiritual satisfaction. Mechanically produced goods can merely please the eye, but the art of khadi appeals to our human feelings. It touches the heart. Outer beauty is a secondary matter in khadi. That is why I have protested against the sale of bleached khadi. Bleaching increases cost of production, weakens the material and it then becomes difficult to detect any malpractice. Our duty is not to indiscriminately pamper the people’s taste, but to canalize it in the proper direction. The starch in khadi automatically goes out after two or three washings and it becomes spotlessly white. Not only this, but it also acquires a kind of softness which is destroyed by bleaching. If the khadi-wearer himself undertook these minor processes subsequent to weaving, the cost of khadi would be much less. It is up to the khadi experts to think of the best way of inducing people to take up such processes.

If khadi activity is to be carried on not merely as a business but as a means to uplift the starving masses, we shall have to penetrate the spinner’s home. We shall have to persuade him to wear the clothes made from the khadi produced by himself. This no doubt means a great reduction in the cost of khadi production; it is also a total saving of the expenditure on sales. So far we have been producing khadi, keeping the urban people in view. From a negligible beginning khadi sales have reached millions of rupees. We now produce many varieties of khadi. But all this does not satisfy me. My ambition in respect of khadi is very much higher than this. It now extends to completely wiping out conditions of starvation from our villages. It can be achieved only when the village people themselves produce khadi and send to the cities whatever remains after local consumption. The secret of the power of khadi lies in the fact that it can find customers right in the place of its production. It is not necessary to go out anywhere in search of a market for it.

The proportion of expenditure on management in khadi production pains me. We can reduce this expenditure a lot if all the time we keep in view the main purpose of khadi. As I have stated earlier, the methods of reducing the cost of production of manufactured goods adopted by the industries that are run for profit cannot be applied in the case of khadi. In the case of khadi the use of machinery can be increased only within certain limits. But there is no limit to increasing art, skill, efficiency and honesty. If we have no faith in these we must wash our hands off khadi. If we want to bring down the cost of khadi production, we must retain only the minimum personnel to manage the organization, and these too should be altruistic, and we should dispense with all the intermediaries and brokers. As a matter of fact, when the khadi activity has fully developed it would have no need of an outer organization. Self-sufficiency and self-propaganda are the natural characteristics of khadi.

The science of khadi is still in its infancy. It is making steady progress. As I go deeper into it, and do research on its laws and understand them, I realize my own limited knowledge of the subject. With the exception of China, there is hardly any country in the world having greater resources than ours. For today, no other country except China has man-power greater than we have. But today this wealth of ours is lying unutilized. The spinning-wheel is a means to put this wealth to use.

Hitherto we have been carrying on khadi work along proper lines. Consequently, we have reached so far. Not only was it inevitable, but in the situation that prevailed it alone was relevant and proper. The real uphill task is ahead of us. For traversing the remaining distance we shall have to follow accordingly higher standards and think of appropriate measures. Hence, if Andhradesha aspires to have provincial autonomy in the matter of khadi, it can have it for the asking. It would not be difficult even to pay up the liabilities of your organization. That is why I have no doubt that if you wish to work along the lines I have suggested, you would be able to do it without any hindrance.

October 22, 1934

CHI. PRABHAVATI,

I was pained to read your letter. I stopped you out of regard for your own sreya. How very bad it is to desire to come here after having taken up some work there! According to me there is nothing specially attractive here. Please remember this, that out of thirty crores even one lakh people cannot come here. I am sure you didn’t wish to come here to see a stage play. Since Om and the other girls have come, it should be all the more plain to you that you cannot come. I shall probably reach there on Tuesday.

270. SPEECH AT VITHALBHAI PATEL’S DEATH ANNIVERSARY

BOMBAY,
October 22, 1934

I knew Vithalbhai from the time that I came to India in 1915. You would be surprised to know that when I first met him I had no idea that he was a Hindu. I later came to know that he made no distinctions between Hindus, Muslims, Parsis and Christians. He even dressed like that. He used to grow a beard and wear a Turkish cap and a jacket. I remained under that impression for a long time. Then we met at Godhra in 1917. There I saw him dressed like a fakir. A meeting was arranged in the Harijan colony. At that time very few Hindus had come there. Vithalbhai was one of them. In the mean time I came to know that he was a Hindu and Sardar’s elder brother. At that time he had come dressed in short dhoti, a _paheran_ and a cap, and so I did not recognize him. He burst out laughing.

After this we came closer day by day. I could see that he was a great servant of the country and that he did not care for money, nor accumulated it for personal pleasure. I used to hear about his brave work in the Bombay Legislative Assembly. After that I also saw his career in the Congress and realized that it was no easy thing to join issue with Vithalbhai. At times Vithalbhai opposed me; but it was a sweet opposition. It never had any bitterness about it. Thus we carried on together.

Vithalbhai was a fighter. The President has described how he fought in the Central Legislative Assembly. From the salary he received as Speaker of the Assembly, he kept a portion for himself and sent the rest to me. That amount of Rs. 40,000 is still lying with me. I have not been able to use it. Then came the weary struggle. I knew his views. His money is lying safe with me. I knew about Vithalbhai’s charity. I read in the _Chronicle_ this morning that Vithalbhai had property worth Rs. 12 lakhs out of which he had given away. Rs. 1 lakh in charity at the time of his death. I thought that the Vithalbhai who had Rs. 12 lakhs with him could not be the same. If he had given that money to Vallabhbhai, my hand would certainly delve into the latter’s pocket. But Vithalbhai was too shrewd [to make a mistake]. So, I thought the Chronicle must have made a mistake. It could not be that Vithalbhai had left behind Rs. 12 lakhs out of which he gave only one lakh in charity and kept 11 lakhs for his relatives. So I thought the compositor must have made some mistake. If the Chronicle is right, Vithalbhai must have stolen the money. Vithalbhai must have been a speculator. But the only speculation he ever did was about swaraj.

We have gathered here to remember him on his death anniversary. On my way here I heard in the train that Bhulabhai is the chairman of a committee appointed to erect a memorial to him. It is not enough that you merely hear his praises and go away. If you resolve to give for Vithalbhai’s memorial something from what you may be getting, you would have done your bit to repay the debt we owe to Vithalbhai. I remember many instances of Vithalbhai’s sharp intelligence and efficiency, but I have no time to narrate them now. I have spoken in brief of his sacrifice and service and of how we can emulate his patriotism.

271. SPEECH AT SUBJECTS COMMITTEE MEETING,
A.I.C.C. ¹

October 23, 1934

In the course of his statement Mahatmaji said that he hoped that the members of the Subjects Committee would agree with him in his decision that his retirement was a necessity at the present moment. He would certainly work and help the Congress while remaining outside. The conclusion which he had arrived at after a long deliberation would not be changed. He had already informed² the public the reasons that had prompted him to take the decision to retire. He had felt that he had become a drag, a hamper on the natural progress of the Congress. It had been the experience of the Mahatma that during the past few years Congressmen had begun to follow and obey his orders and accepted whatever he had told them although they did not believe in what he said. Under the circumstances he felt that if he continued any further it would not be in the interests of the country or of the Congress. He had remained at the helm of affairs for long and had taken the Congress as far as he could and he felt that he could not lead them any further. It would be wrong to say, said the speaker, that Congressmen had not co-operated with him in the progress that has so far been made. According to the speaker certain things were necessary for the attainment of purna swaraj and he felt that they would strengthen the Congress.

He was not going out as a protest against anything inside the Congress. He was going out so that Congressmen could think and act for themselves. So far Congressmen had acted like blind men going round and round the same pole. His retirement did not in any way mean that he was not ready to come back whenever his help was needed. He was not going out with any bad intention in his mind. He was not anxious to do any harm to the Congress, nor was he going to form a strong party outside the party. The speaker asked as to what purpose he would be serving if he went out to form a party in his 65th year and what more help and co-operation could he expect to get from those outsiders than what the Congressmen had so far given in trying to achieve the objective.

Continuing, Gandhiji said that he hoped that he would be given permission by the members of the Subjects Committee to retire. Although he had come to the decision to retire, he had felt it his duty to consult the members of the Subjects Committee. It is possible that some might say that they had expressed their opinion on his retirement and amendments in the Press but still Gandhiji felt that he should discuss it with Congressmen.

The members of the Working Committee had discussed the question with him. Some of them thought that his retirement would be a disaster to the cause of the country, while there were others who agreed with him that he should retire, and it would help the country, the Congress and himself. That would help the Congress to get a clear view of things.

He had proposed in his original statement three amendments to the Congress constitution. The first was about the creed and that was not acceptable to many. Let it not be taken for granted that he would remain inside the Congress if all the three amendments, which would be moved by some of the members of the Working Committee, would be accepted. He had come to a decision and would stick to it. Whether the Subjects Committee accepted one or all the three or threw away all of them, it did not alter the decision he had taken. Because even if all the amendments are passed, there are several things which had made him come to the conclusion about
If something miraculous happened or if they convinced him that his presence was essential in the interest of the country, he might some day return to them.¹

Several members from Madras and Bengal supported the suggestion. Mahatma Gandhi was surprised that there were members of the A. I. C. C. who did not know Hindustani.²

[GANDHIJI:] This request is a sound reason why I should leave the Congress. (Laughter)

The member concerned, not baffled, said, “We want you here, to be able to learn Hindi”, to which Mr. Gandhi retorted:

If you couldn’t learn it in the last 15 years, I have proved an indifferent teacher and it is time you changed your teacher. (Laughter)

Addressing the meeting in English, Mr. Gandhi said:

What I said in Hindi is that if I retire from the Congress, I want to retire, if possible, with your blessings. I want you to feel also that I do not retire in a huff and that I strongly desire to go out of the Congress in order that the Congress may flourish and grow to its full height and grow to its natural height. At the present moment, somehow or other, I am weighed down with the feeling that the Congress is being suppressed by my presence and that the Congress is not giving natural expression to its views. Therefore, it has become an artificial body and nothing can be so harmful to the growth of an institution or a nation than that it allows itself to be suppressed even for the sake of love. It is not then love or, even if it is love, it is of a repressive quality. This excess ought to be thrown out.

Take my own position. The feeling has been creeping over me not for a few days but for months past. I do want you to dismiss from your mind the idea that has been expressed in some quarters that certain letters from Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru had anything whatever to do with this intense yearning for retirement. These letters perhaps hastened the announcement of the decision, but nothing else. This feeling was given expression to by me to friends in Bengal. I told Dr. Roy and others on the railway station platform that if we cannot get rid of artificiality, of corruption and overpowering desire to wrangle, if we cannot possibly cleanse ourselves of these things, I must retire from the Congress. You will find expressions like these uttered even before they were said in Bengal. This idea has been possessing me day after day till the time came when I could restrain it no longer. That is the history of that decision.

¹ Sarojini Naidu then suggested that for the sake of those who did not understand Hindustani, Gandhiji might summarize his statement in English.
² What follows is from The Hindu.

There is not the slightest desire on my part to forsake the post of duty or give up Congress work. I am leaving the Congress to lift the weight which has been suppressing it, in order that it may grow and I may grow myself. After all I cannot withhold this much from you, that I am leaving in order to develop the power that non-violence has—non-violence in thought, word and deed, unadulterated non-violence. I borrowed the expression ‘Civil Disobedience’ and extended its meaning by calling it civil resistance. I have no doubt purna swaraj cannot be achieved without civil resistance. We may not offer resistance till I shall feel confident that the spirit permeates not one or two men like myself or even a thousand men like ourselves, but that it permeates the entire society.

Mr. Gandhi added that human nature was pervaded by non-violence and his own researches and experiments had borne that out.

I do not believe—I must frankly confess to you—in the so-called constitutional means for giving liberty to any people. I know no historical instance of pure constitutional agitation, as we have been told and as it has been described to us in text books, having ever clothed a nation with liberty. I cannot claim to have read the history of all nations. I have not the historical instinct, but from what I know I can say that constitutional agitation never regained lost liberty. It is in the nature of things impossible. It is not a gift that can be made by one nation to another or by one person to another.

Mr. Gandhi recalled that the use of the expression that there shall be non-violence in thought, word and deed, did not get inserted by accident, but after a big debate, at the Ahmedabad Congress\(^1\), initiated by Mr. Hasrat Mohani. Mr. Gandhi

\(^1\) In December 1921: vide “Speech at subjects committee meeting, Ahmedabad”, 27-12-1921 and “Speech on Hasrat Mohani’s Motion-1”, 28-12-1921.
I tacked civil resistance to the spinning-wheel and to other acts of mine. I consider them all one. I have said that Hindu-Muslim unity is necessary, not unity in the form of patched-up pacts between politicians, but living unity.

Mr. Gandhi said that he had agreed previously to launching the campaign of civil resistance, like a drowning man catching at a straw and added:

I felt if it went wrong, I will have no hesitation in pulling up even at the risk of incurring your strong displeasure. I plunged into these things merely by way of experiment, but if we are to prove it by our experiment, we have to admit that it was civil resistance which was not non-violent in thought, word or deed. Civil Disobedience cannot be taken up until there is the atmosphere for it. If I remain in the Congress, I shall be imposing myself upon you. You may say that I am not imposing myself, but I feel that I am and it is better that I retire. And if you prove that you are non-violent, then whether I am on Mount Everest or have gone down to the bowels of the earth, I shall appear and lead you to your goal and we shall march in perfect safety. If we are non-violent in word, thought and deed, then this ordinance rule would have been utterly impossible.

I cannot change my mind on the cardinal doctrines of the charkha, Hindu-Muslim unity and removal of untouchability, without which you cannot even understand the principles of nonviolence or free the Congress from greed and selfishness. These fundamental things, which are part of our creed, should come naturally to us. I may be told that I am asking human nature to give me too much. That may be so. It does not show that I am wrong in not being able to remain in this institution.

Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan told me that he had made up his mind in Hazaribagh that I should retire and he with me. I told him, ‘‘If you are a soldier, you must remain at your post and see whether you cannot take the nation up to the point where you have arrived, in spite of the fact that you have come from a land steeped in violence.” I, therefore, plead with you to let me go with your blessing and not plead with me that ‘if you remain, we shall do this’. I want you to give me nothing as a bargain. I have not come in a bargaining spirit. I have been struggling with the Working Committee, a majority of whom are in favour of my going out with a blessing. There is a tough minority which says I must not go out, though the minority has also come to the conclusion that if I feel that, even after listening to their argument, I cannot change my view, I must go. I must not be held down by simple force, even the force of love. I must act up to the dictates of my intellect and my faith.

Another point is in connection with the three vital amendments. They have felt so convinced of the necessity of the substance of those three amendments that they will be putting them before you presently in spite of the fact that, as soon as I receive your blessing, I shall retire at the end of the session.¹

Mahatmaji told the members that they should make no speeches. He would give them only 20 minutes to express their views briefly.

Let me be a dictator for 20 minutes. (Laughter)

In reply to a question, Mahatmaji said like Columbus he would go out of the Congress to discover a method to convince them of the value of nonviolent civil resistance and like all discoverers would return to them triumphantly with his discovery.²

Mr. Sri Prakasa said that Mr. Gandhi had stated that wrangles in the Congress organization were responsible for his decision.

MR. GANDHI: No, I said I had become a deadweight on the Congress.

Mr. Sri Prakasa appealed to Mr. Gandhi to help them to set their house in order.

Just after Mr. Sri Prakasa had finished his speech the time-limit was over and Pandit Malaviya wanted to address the House. Gandhiji said that the time-limit was over but if Panditji did want to speak no power on earth could stop him from doing so.

Pandit Malaviya made an impassioned appeal to Mr. Gandhi not to leave the Congress at this juncture, when it was in the midst of its fight for the freedom of the country. . . . He said that, if there were mistakes and shortcomings on the part of the ³ The following paragraph is from The Bombay Chronicle.

Congressmen, he should point them out and see that these were rectified but should not make them the justification for leaving the Congress. He had no right to leave the Congress, after having led it for 13 or 14 years. “Whatever you want to do from outside the Congress you can do from within it,” added the Pandit. “The farther away you are from the Congress, the greater will be the sorrow of the country.” He asked Mr. Gandhi not to be too strict with the masses in regard to the observance of truth and non-violence in the same degree as he (Mr. Gandhi) himself was observing. “You have a proper cabinet with you. Your soldiers are ready to follow you in the fight. Why do you want to leave all these to themselves and go out of the Congress? I make a personal appeal to you, with all my love and regard for you not to retire at this juncture.”

Gandhiji, replying to the several questions that had been raised by the speakers, said that he had considered Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya as his elder brother since 1915. If the speaker could carry out the wishes of the Pandit, he would have very gladly done so, considering his wishes as the command of an elder brother. But he felt that he could not help but leave the Congress under the circumstances. He was leaving the organization because he was anxious to strengthen it. He was going out to get shanti (peace). He was going out so that he might develop strength to serve the Congress and the country. He said:

I feel today that I have lost the power to persuade you to my view. I have become helpless. It is no use keeping a man like me at the helm of affairs, who has lost his strength. You have said nothing that will make me reconsider my decision. I do not think that it is hasty on my part to do so, but rest assured that even when I go out I will be a humble servant of the Congress.

Mr. Gandhi stated that it was doubly profitable for them to allow him to retire, for thereby they would have his services, whenever they needed them, but at the same time, they would not have to pay a price for it, as they had to do at present.

He would certainly give his opinion, if asked for on any question.

At present, he was leaving the Congress with the main intention of working for the Congress.

Pandit Malaviya, interrupting, said that it was not fair on the part of the Mahatma to retire without sufficient notice. It was the duty of every servant, whether paid or honorary, to give proper notice of retirement from the work that had been entrusted to him. He said, “It is for 14 years that you have been at the head of the

2 The following paragraph is from The Bombay Chronicle.
Congress. Do not be in haste to retire. Give these people time to make proper arrangements for the great work of reorganizing the Congress, which is before them. Give them at least four or six months, if not more."

Replying to the charge of being hasty, Mr. Gandhi said he was a fighter and knew his duty as a soldier. The first duty of a satyagrahi was to stick to his post. He felt that he was not leaving his post of duty. If he felt it was a mistake on his part to have retired from the Congress, he would come back without even waiting for an invitation.

But the position at present is that I am absolutely helpless. My mind does not work. I am not a foolish general to continue to be at the head of the force when I feel that no good would come out of it.

A man who gave an ultimatum to Lord Reading, the Governor General of India, regarding Bardoli cannot be expected to run away from the battle.

Unless a miracle happened there was no possibility of his continuing to lead the Congress. He hoped that God would give strength both to him and Congressmen so that they might come together again soon.

As for the fear that his retirement would create difficulties for the Congress Parliamentary Board, Mr. Gandhi said that he did not believe it.

I am certain that you will not lose one single vote during the coming elections. If I had feared that it would harm your work, I would not have retired. I finally appeal to you to allow me to retire and tolerate me, just as a family willingly tolerates any of its helpless members.

Whereas organizations claiming to advance swadeshi have sprung up all over the country with and without the assistance of Congressmen and whereas much confusion has arisen in the public mind as to the true nature of swadeshi and whereas the aim of the Congress has been from its inception progressive identification with the masses and whereas village re-organization and reconstruction is one of the items of the constructive programme of the Congress and whereas such reconstruction necessarily implies the revival and encouragement of dead or dying village industries, besides the central industry of hand-spinning, and whereas this work, like the reorganization of hand-spinning, is possible only through concentrated and special effort unaffected by and independent of the political activities of the Congress, Mr. J. C. Kumarappa is hereby authorized to form under the advice and guidance of Mr. Gandhi an association called the All-India Village Industries Association, as part of the activities of the Congress.¹

The said Association shall work for the revival and encouragement of the said industries and for the moral and physical advancement of the villages and shall have the power to frame its own constitution, to raise funds and perform such acts as may be necessary for the fulfilment of its objects.

Commending the resolution to the house, Gandhiji said: ² During my Harijan tour this year, a large number of people used to come to me to narrate their tales of woe. Never before had I travelled as I did during this tour. And, in Utkal, I had an extraordinary experience since I was touring on foot. There is no limit to the state of unemployment in our seven lac villages. The people subsist on agriculture. And millions of people suffer losses in agriculture. And what can we say about the present state? Today the farmers do not produce enough even for the seeds. You can hardly find such poverty anywhere else. That is also one of the reasons why people disposed of gold worth lacs of rupees. This has of course its political reason. But the helplessness of the people was also one reason. The spinning-wheel has emerged to meet this unemployment. Apart from India there is perhaps no other country where people depend so completely on agriculture. Madhusudan Das had said that village people must be provided with some additional occupation. He had gone to Germany and learnt leather work. I have always remembered his one remark that those who always work with oxen must have bovine intelligence. Our farmers lost their work and became dull-minded.

A friend left a socialist paper with me. It contains a nice article. It says that the people of India are being reduced to subhuman state. Ten years ago there were many industries, but now they have become dependent solely on agriculture, and this has led to increase in unemployment. The only point I learnt from it was regarding the remedy for this unemployment. When I thought about it the concept of swadeshi emerged in its precise form. We are able to provide work to 2,20,000 women spinners through khadi alone. We have given them three crores in ten years. There are 1,100 men from the middle class who supervise this work and earn their bread. This amount has been distributed through them. This work is being carried on in five to six thousand villages. The capital involved is not more than 20 lacs.

But this is not enough to solve completely India’s problem of unemployment. Let me cite the instance of carpenters. Our carpenters were good craftsmen at one time. Today they have lost the skill. Today the village carpenters cannot make even a spinning-wheel. Take Bihar for instance. There sand has piled up in the fields and tilling has become impossible. Instead of giving free food to the starving people there, it was decided to provide them with spinning-wheels. But from where to find the spinning-wheels? The local carpenters could hardly make them.

In our country the urban population is only 30 million. The remaining 320 million live in the villages with a population of less than ten thousand. We have never cared for them. Rather than being concerned about what they eat, drink and what occupations they follow we have simply got upon their backs. I am asking you to adopt the spinning-wheel for their sake. But you do not like even that. Now the Charkha Sangh is providing the spinning-wheels for them. But the work that remains to be done after that will be undertaken by this new Association. It will be found that other occupations apart from the spinning-wheel can be carried on by people in their homes. They will revive the industries that can be revived. They will devise ways and means of improving the quality of what is already being produced, and find out what new things can be produced. They will thus bring a few more millions to the poor. You have not taken as much interest in the spinning-wheel as I had expected. It was hoped to save through the spinning-wheel and khadi the 600 million rupees going out of the country in the purchase of foreign cloth. But this hope has not been fulfilled.¹

His proposal did not mean that they should part with their money and gift it to villagers. All he meant was that, instead of spending money on buying other goods, they should buy goods manufactured by villagers. Thus they would keep the money in India and distribute among villagers crores of rupees. He appealed to the House to vote on the resolution on its merits and not because they might persuade him to remain in the Congress. On this latter subject, he would hear what more Mr. Sidhwa had to say, if the President allowed the resolution to be moved.

He also made it clear that he was not setting up an association with a view to using it to rouse political consciousness among the masses. He did not propose even to mention the name of the Congress in the course of this work, in the same way as he had not asked workers in the Spinners’ Association to join the Congress. To him, however, political consciousness had a different meaning. If the Association succeeded in reviving industries and improving the present method of work in villages, that would be enough political consciousness.¹

This Association will be related to the Congress exactly like the Charkha Sangh. Shankerlal, Jamnalalji and others manage the Charkha Sangh but the Congress can still look into its working. Kumarappa belongs to the Congress. At present he is keeping account of our millions of rupees in Bihar. He was the Secretary of the committee appointed by the Congress to inquire into the liabilities thrust on India by the Government. He is a chartered accountant and he has made a great sacrifice. He does not crave for money. He is interested in this kind of work. I have discussed the matter with him and he has agreed to do this work under my supervision.

I do not wish to take up this work as a political activity, but to help the poor unemployed village people earn a few coins. That is why I wish to keep this work free from politics. You will be surprised to know that not a single person from among the 2,20,000 spinners, 20,000 carders and 20,000 weavers to whom the Charkha Sangh provides work is a member of the Congress. The Congress constitution has accepted spinning franchise. Hence, they can all become members if they want to. But we have made no such effort. Even by not joining the Congress they are not going to remain unacquainted with the political activity in the country. But they must know that we have gone to them to serve them and not with the intention of exploiting them for our political objectives. This resolution involves no financial responsibility for the Congress, only the name of the Congress is required. Accept this resolution if you are in favour of it.\(^1\)

Gandhiji in replying to the several questions that had arisen from the discussions said that the first amendment wanted that the words “dead and dying” should be deleted from the resolution while the second wanted the replacement of certain words.\(^2\) The work of the Association would be to revive the industries that were ruined or dead or were in the state of dying. The work as to which of the industries should be revived and which should be allowed to die away was to be left to the Association. By the revival of the village industries it was the intention of the resolution not only to help the villages financially but improve them morally and physically as well. It was not the intention of the movers of the resolution that the villagers should be exploited, but they wanted to help them.

The Congress was not going to approach the villagers as anybody’s agents. It was the intention of the Congress to find out why people were working for 18 hours, if there were any so working. The speaker wanted that everyone would work not more than 9 hours and that could be done by increasing the earning capacity of the villagers. For this the speaker wanted the help of those who were well off and could sacrifice a little more for the sake of the villagers by paying for the articles manufactured by the village artisans. Today the condition was such that even if they worked for 18 hours they did not get enough to make both ends meet. This could be done by the speaker and others of the Association when they went and mixed with the villagers freely and gained their confidence.

Continuing, Gandhiji said that his report that would be submitted to the Congress at a future date would be to say what the condition of the village industries was when he took up the work and what it had achieved in so many days. For such a work in the seven lacs of villages in India it was necessary that Acharya Kripalanis and Dr. Roys and advocates should work hand in hand.

\(^1\) Khan Abdul Ghaffar Khan seconded the resolution. What follows is from The Bombay Chronicle.

\(^2\) Dr. Sanyal in his second amendment wanted the words “the said industries and for the moral and physical advancement of the villages” to be replaced by “such village industries as after due enquiry are found to possess sufficient economic vitality and are likely to bring permanent economic relief to the people”.
Referring to Mr. Muzumdar’s amendment, Gandhiji said that he was bewildered when he found that a man of the type of Mr. T. Prakasam supported the amendment and said that because Congressmen were going to the Assembly the work could be better achieved by them inside the Legislature.

Gandhiji wanted to assure the Subjects Committee that the duty of the Parliamentarians did not end by their entering the Legislature. They would certainly be expected to work for the Industries Association also. But it must be understood that the organization would have no connection with politics.

Explaining why he wanted the organization to be independent of politics, Mr. Gandhi said that if he tried both things at one time, he would not be able to achieve either.

There is a special reason why this Association has been kept out of the Congress politics. This work must continue irrespective of the political situation. We go to the people to serve them. Let us not whisper politics in their ears. We go to them to improve their health, to free them from disease, to raise them from squalor, to reduce unemployment by giving them occupation. We cannot bring in politics if this is our aim. Even when the Congress was banned the Charkha Sangh was not banned and its work went on. That Association belongs to the Congress none the less. But it has kept away from Congress politics. The new Association too will have the same position.

I had said the same thing at Karachi. Those who opposed me at that time told me afterwards that what I had said was correct. My advice was that the Anti-untouchability League and the Prohibition Committee be kept away from politics, and it was sound advice. A friend pointed out that Kumarappa and others would attend to this work; in that case, what work would be left for the Congressmen? It is not so. It will have a place for every Congressman who has faith in this programme. Today, there are 1,100 workers in the Charkha Sangh who are all Congressmen.

5 The following paragraph is from The Bombay Chronicle.
Referring to the suspicion that seems to be entertained in certain quarters against his starting these organizations outside the Congress with little connection with the parent body, Gandhiji said that it should not be forgotten that even a Mahatma and an economic expert put together could achieve very little, if the whole scheme was not going to be worked out by Congressmen themselves. Though outside help would also be taken, the main help had to come from amongst the tried workers of the Congress.¹

Bhai Govind Sahai says that I am talking things of the bygone ages and that I am an arch enemy of machines. He has read my writings with a distorted view.² Is not this charkha in front of me a machine? We do want machines but do not wish to become their slaves. We should make the machine our slave. ‘Our slave, means slave not of the rich but of the poor. I accept money from the rich for the sake of the poor, but does it therefore lay me under an obligation to help them if I may collect five thousand rupees from a mill-owner or an iron manufacturer? Those who would give must do it with the idea that they should give something for the benefit of the poor from whom they have taken so much. In this way I plunder the rich [yet] some people say that I am an agent of the rich. I am no more than a labourer. I have laboured with the labourers. I have lived with them. I have shared food with them. I claim to be a representative of the working class for whom I obtain help from the rich. I see no socialism in it. My concept of socialism implies that people should be self reliant. That is the only way they can be prevented from being exploited. I have been trying to persuade the workers that if the capitalists have their gold and silver, we have our hands and feet. These too are assets. A capitalist will never be able to carry on without labour. Let no one misunderstand that the Sangh is going to serve the purpose of the capitalists, thereby making the workers slaves. On the contrary it proposes to release them from slavery, by making them self-reliant. How can this involve enslaving? I have given deep thought to the whole scheme before putting it before you. This is the only way of reviving the village industries and I am seeking your help for the purpose.¹

² Govind Sahai was ‘opposed to the principle underlying the resolution” “not because he grudged seven crores of rupees being distributed among the villagers”, but because, according to him, real economic freedom for the masses of India could be attained only when they were educated and taught how they were being exploited. He appealed to Gandhiji to change his methods and programme.

Whatever the fiscal policy of the Government was, nobody could stop the villagers becoming economically independent by developing village industries. Many Congressmen like Mr. Mathuraprasad were asking what they should do after the election campaign was over. Gandhiji said that there was the All-India Spinners’ Association and the All-India Village Industries Association where both Dr. Sanyal and Mr. Muthey could work.²

274. POLISHED v. UNPOLISHED

In my writing³ on cent per cent swadeshi, I have shown how some aspects of it can be tackled immediately with benefit to the starving millions both economically and hygienically. The richest in the land can share the benefit. Thus if rice can be pounded in the villages after the old fashion, the wages will fill the pockets of the rice-pounding sisters and the rice-eating millions will get some sustenance from the unpolished rice instead of pure starch which the polished rice provides. Human greed, which takes no count of the health or the wealth of the people who come under its heels, is responsible for the hideous rice-mills one sees in all the rice-producing tracts. If public opinion was strong, it would make rice-mills an impossibility by simply insisting on unpolished rice and appealing to the owners of rice-mills to stop a traffic that undermines the health of a whole nation and robs the poor people of an honest means of livelihood.

But who will listen to the testimony of a mere layman on the question of food values? I, therefore, give below an extract⁴ from The Newer Knowledge of Nutrition by Mr. Collum and Simmonds which a medical friend, to whom I had appealed for help, has sent with his approbation.

A young Englishman who has lived in Madras for two years writes from his home in Essex:

\[\ldots\] I believe that, of the Hindu population, untouchables are in the majority. Of course I may be wrong but if correct, then, I consider the most effective measure to adopt in righting and preventing the grievous humiliations put upon this great body of people is not to approach the perpetrators (high castes) but the development of a ‘line of defiance’ through the untouchables themselves.

The forming of a Brotherhood amongst themselves that will encourage the development of an existence, entirely independent of those to whom they appear to be objectionable, should, by degrees, build up a “strong point” and cause these now humbled folk not to cow, but to scorn and ignore the spurning and lashes now directed at them.\[\ldots\]

The writer evidently does not know that there is a cult among Harijans which is trying to do exactly what he advises me to do. But that way does not lie the salvation of Harijans, certainly not of caste Hindus. The logical result of what is preached by the correspondent must be another problem akin to the Hindu-Muslim one, only much more intense. That way is the way of hate which is violence. The way I am trying to follow is the way of love which is non-violence. Having belonged to the oppressor class and having by choice made the attempt to become one with the oppressed, I have learnt that the true way of securing justice is to inculcate mutual respect, in other words, to evoke the spirit of equality or brotherhood in the place of that of superiority and inferiority. This can best be done by the ‘superior’ class being induced to descend from its fancied height. The so-called ‘inferior’ class has to be taught, not to scorn, but to be induced to shed the fear that is born of a consciousness of inferiority.

Therefore the Harijan Sevak Sangh is performing the double duty of asking the caste Hindus, on the one hand, to repent of the injustice that they have done to the Harijans and is working, on the other hand, among the Harijans by spreading education among them and by bringing to their notice the evils that oppression always breeds.

among the oppressed. To deprive a man of his natural liberty and to deny to him the ordinary amenities of life is worse than starving the body. It is starvation of the soul—the dweller in the body. Harijans are a powerful illustration of this process of starvation of the soul. No amount of mere literary education or even economic betterment will restore the lost dignity of man. That restoration can only come when self-realization comes. This realization will not come without repentance on the part of the superior class. Superiority complex and inferiority complex are two faces of the same coin. Both are equally bad. Both require treatment. Mere transference of scorn from the ‘superior’ caste Hindu to the ‘inferior’ Harijan does not remedy the disease, it only aggravates it. ‘Not to cow’ is sound advice. But ‘to scorn’ is as bad as cowing. ‘Love one another’ is, therefore, the only advice an impartial observer can give. And I hope that the writer of the letter sees the weakness of the formula.

276. SPEECH AT SUBJECTS COMMITTEE MEETING,
A.I.C.C.

_October 26, 1934_

You have in your affection misread the whole of my position. If you have given me the position of a general commanding an army, you must allow that general to judge whether he serves the army by being at its head or whether he serves the army by retiring and giving place to lieutenants who have served well.

It is always the wisest thing for the general to swing to power or office or withhold that power that came to him unsought, because there are occasions when generals have been found to consider themselves unequal to hold the reins, and in the interests of the army, the interests of the cause for which the army and its chief are fighting to give up the command. If you believe that I have been a fairly wise general, you must believe in my judgment even now when I seem to be deserting you in the hour of your defeat.

1 Earlier the Subjects Committee had unanimously passed a resolution expressing the country’s confidence in Gandhiji and requesting him to revise his decision to retire
I have said times without number that I myself share no feeling of defeat. I am not deserting the cause for which I live, and for which I love to work. I go away from you in order, as I have said, to discover if there is still greater possibilities in experiments that we have been making, and for which you have given me such a generous support. I must express to you that I seem to have come to the end of my resources. I must confess to you that I have not lost faith in the efficacy of the means that I placed at the disposal of the Congress. But I feel there is a body of opinion rising in the country which has begun to question the efficacy of this means, and it is because they question the efficacy of this means that they have the sense of defeat in them.

In the dictionary of A satyagrahi, there is no such thing as defeat. To him, the very pursuit of his battle is its own reward. But when I find some of my best companions, who have believed in truthfulness and non-violence with all its implications, are filled with doubt and feeling of helplessness, when I find that I am not able to touch them with my faith, I see all around me an impenetrable darkness. I see no ray of light. I see I cannot infect them with the faith that is in me.

Therefore I would like you not to take me literally when I say that I go, if I can get your blessing. I go with your blessing in search of greater power to discover means whereby I can give you the faith that is in me. It may be that the search will be in vain. It may be that my roaming in solitude will be in vain. But depend upon it that I shall not wait a moment longer to be called by you, when I feel the necessity. I shall come to you, and once more come to the Congress to register myself as a primary member, and do whatever I can in the interests of the Congress.

I ask you therefore not to feel dispirited, but to feel that you will be able to discharge your duty, that you will have leaders enough to lead you on to victory. When it becomes necessary for me to come to this House, I will be entirely at your disposal. Therefore, I would simply urge not to press the resolution further. You have unanimously passed that resolution. Let that be enough. Somehow or other I believe good, and only good, will come out of this decision. If you yourselves stand for the principle for which I stand, and for which you have given allegiance, which I acknowledge you have given out of your generosity, some of you no doubt blindly, some of you after having considered for yourselves, I have in all humility accepted all these allegiances. Let me now prove to myself, if it is possible, that I am worthy of it, and I invite you to prove it for yourselves also, whether I remain a member of the Congress or not, that the principle that you have more or less followed during all these long or short 14 or 15 years, you have followed because you have believed in it.

I tell you that it gives me still greater joy and pleasure, for I am able to say to myself, and if you are able to say to the world, that although I am gone you believe in the principle that you have fought for and lived for all these years and that you are going to follow them out not loosely, but still more truly and thoroughly than you have done before.

Immediately after his speech dealing with the question of his retirement Gandhi proceeded to move formally a comprehensive resolution incorporating all the recommendations of the constitution sub-committee and the Congress Working Committee. In commending the whole of the resolution for the acceptance of the House in toto, Gandhi at the outset referred to the previous day’s decision of the House turning down the Working Committee’s recommendation relating to the change of the Congress creed.

Mahatma Gandhi delivered a stirring address lasting 90 minutes in which he appealed to the Subjects Committee to adopt the revised constitution.

Mahatma Gandhi referred to Thursday’s vote and congratulated the House on the frank way in which they had voted in referring the question of change of creed to provincial committees. He said, when he had read the public and Press criticism of his proposals, he had made up his mind not to take up those amendments, but members of the Working Committee had of their own accord unanimously taken the view that the Committee would sponsor those resolutions. Gandhi added:

I was surprised to find that members of the Committee devoted two hours this morning to deliberating as to what was their duty in connection with these amendments. I told the Working Committee to carry out your resolution, but my feeling is that Mr. Sidhwa’s amendment was wholly unnecessary. You could have rejected the Working Committee’s proposal, but there was no use circulating it.

1 The Bombay Chronicle here has: In moving the amendments to the Congress constitution as adumbrated in his Press statements, Gandhi congratulated the House on its frankness in rejecting the Working Committee’s proposal to substitute ‘truthful’ and ‘non-violent’ in place of ‘peaceful and legitimate’ “But I cannot say that you acted wisely,” he added.

I listened carefully to Mr. Patwardhan’s speech. He argued ably, but either he was deceiving himself or he was acting simply as an advocate. He said that we had descended from ideals to realism. But has not socialism its ideals and if I told him to remove even a comma from their ideals he would reject my proposition. Do you suppose you will realize complete independence at any time even after fifty generations? The socialist creed goes even further. I suggest we must have a measuring rod. The day humanity ceases to believe in ideals, it will descend to the level of the beasts. Today if you believe in truthfulness and non-violence say so. It does not mean you will be cent per cent truthful. I am not cent per cent truthful.1

If I were, my words will pierce you like arrows and come out clean, but I must aspire to attain my ideals.2 Did Marx live to see his ideal realized? Is it not undergoing changes and are not meanings put to it which Marx himself never dreamt of? If you do not mean by “legitimate and peaceful” means that they are “truthful and non-violent”, then merely define your creed to be that of attaining your end by whatever means you think legitimate. Then that would be your measuring rod, but you must have a measuring rod. You must be clear about your aims and means. They are convertible terms.

You know that swaraj is your goal. It means “purna swaraj” but someone said it did not mean complete independence; so we defined it to mean “purna swaraj”. Just as you did that you must define your creed so that it may not be open to double interpretation. No one can draw a right angle, yet Euclid drew it up in imagination and gave the engineers a measuring rod by which the world has progressed. There is a right angle which is treasured in the Tower of London.

The Working Committee on Friday asked you to define your measuring rod. You sent it round for circulation. That was not the right course to take. Let us not tell the world that there is one thing on our lips and another in our thoughts.

1 The Bombay Chronicle here has: I have never dared to make such a claim.

2 The Bombay Chronicle here has: If I was cent per cent truthful, every word of mine would pierce you like an arrow and emerge uncontaminated and fill you with truth, but I aspire to be cent percent truthful. If humanity were to give up its ideals, it would descend to the level of beasts. Ideals we must have and ideals always recede.

Mahatma Gandhi next explained the main purpose of the amendments proposed in the constitution. He said:

Do not pass these changes buoyed up with the hope that I will reconsider my decision. If I began my unofficial leadership of the Congress by the constitution for which I was primarily responsible I am also tendering you a humble gift in the shape of this amended constitution so that you may get the benefit of the judgment and experience of one who has endeavoured to live that constitution in closest communication and communion with you and has discovered its faults. I want you, therefore, to pass these amendments after touching them up.

You can take a day for consideration after hearing me and do whatever lobbying you like and give your verdict. You must first make up your mind to reduce your delegates from 6,000 to 1,000. If you reject that, the entire scheme falls through.

The second point is that the delegates should be real representatives of the people. We are indirectly representative of the nation’s dumb millions. We are their mouthpiece, their voice and their thought. That is what the Congress has stood for since 1885, but indirectly we are representatives only of our electors.

Can anyone among us say whom he represents, as to whether he is in living touch with his constituents and knows their feelings? Even the tallest amongst us cannot claim that. Sardar Vallabhbhai is the uncrowned king of Gujarat, but which electorate does he represent, whom do I represent, I do not know. I challenge anyone to produce the Congress register of electors. We must have constituencies and electors and each member shall represent his constituency and be in living touch with it. Then alone you will have your measuring rod.

The third principle I have put forward is that three things be combined in one election. It will not merely mean greater convenience and saving of money, it is rich with promise if you adopt it. Delegates will then be elected by their electorate. They will not assemble as now for three days in a year and then disappear from the horizon. They will remain active Congressmen as members of the A. I. C. C. and will take up work all the year round.

Today only 350 out of 1,530 are members of the A. I. C. C. Then again a body of 1,000 can be accommodated in Sardar Vallabhbhai’s Ras or Bardoli. I have got a complete scheme ready for a successful session being held in the village of that character. Those villages can slave for you but they cannot give you money for your Reception Committee. You must have people who know the business of running a Congress meeting and even importing provisions and the Reception Committee shall not waste lakhs on its arrangements.

I question the wisdom of the Reception Committee wasting lakhs on tamashas and in building triumphal arches. Where is our triumph? We are a slave nation and all we want the Reception Committee to do is to give us the hospitality, not of pudding and ice-cream, but ordinary food. Our scheme is to relieve the Reception Committees of their heavy burden. If I had been in Nariman’s position I would have become a lunatic.

Mahatma Gandhi, reverting to his plea that the matter be not referred to Provincial Committees, said:

Why do you want to refer it to the provinces? Why shirk your duty? You are super-delegates because you are the Subjects Committee. Others are mere delegates, but mere delegates representing 350 millions. Then I say it is for them to hammer out a constitution and not shirk the duty. I promise you fair consideration of every criticism you have made. I am giving you an iron constitution from which not one single man can go away. If there is any corruption you can detect it unless everyone becomes a fraud. No constitution can be robber-proof and thief-proof. I have sufficient faith in my countrymen that they will never betray their country.

Sri Prakasa says our present constitution is rotten. Then are we to waste another year in waiting for what we shall do? I am sure that the position will remain where it is and we will not receive a single report during the next twelve months. Make such use as you can of the wisdom you say is possessed by me whom the world holds as a fool. But wisdom sometimes does come out of the mouth of fools. I would like you to accept my suggestions and I will be ready for compromise. Already, when Mr. Masani came to me, I assured him that I wanted Socialists to be represented. They are the advance wing. There is nothing to be feared from their activity. They call themselves Congressmen and while they are Congressmen they are supposed to believe in the Congress creed and loyally follow the discipline of the Congress. If they fail to follow the Congress discipline, they will fail in their own creed. I have agreed to their suggestion regarding the single transferable vote. This constitution has been revised by able lawyers like Mr. Bhulabhai Desai and Mr. K. M. Munshi and many others have been consulted. I may also make it clear that there will be plural constituencies in urban areas, but their number is not defined. The Working Committee is entirely in your hands in these matters of detail, but do not postpone these matters.

You are going to have a Parliamentary Board. They will look after the Assembly work. In the Assembly it is not a battle between men, but between principles; our members will go to represent the principles which will not require eloquence, but will be enunciated in unequivocal terms.

Hereafter you will have your register of electors and you will be in living touch with them. Mr. Nageshwara Rao says that there are 7,000 voters for one seat. My scheme is modest. It wants only 1,000 voters for one seat. I will be satisfied if you are the representatives of one million and then we can have more and more. But I do submit that we will lose one precious year in the life of the nation by referring these matters to Provincial Committees.

Proceeding, Mahatma Gandhi referred to the amendments seeking to incorporate the existing convention of allowing the President to select his colleagues of the Working Committee in the Congress constitution. Gandhiji said that there had been no single instance in the past wherein the President’s choice in this matter had been overridden by the A.I.C.C. But he thought it would be better to incorporate this convention in the constitution so as to avoid difficulties attendant on selection of candidates. The President under this amendment would not have to stand the fire of cross-examination at the A.I.C.C.

There must be some occasions in the life of the Working Committee when they would have to say: “If you want us to carry on then we ask you to arm us with certain powers and if you cannot trust us then you must look for better men to fill our place.” For the same reason he had sought that the Secretaries and the Treasurer should also be the President’s choice.¹

277. SPEECH AT SUBJECTS COMMITTEE MEETING, A. I. C. C.

October 27, 1934

When the Subjects Committee met on the morning of the 27th Mr. Gandhi continued his speech on his amendments to the Congress constitution. He said that when they discovered so many breaches in the walls of their house, they should fill them in quickly. There was nothing in the new constitution requiring study or reference to outside authority. If they wanted to circulate it, he would take it to mean that they did not want it. If they were not convinced about the absolute necessity of passing the constitution, he would beseech them to reject it. Referring to the question of reducing the strength of the Provincial Congress Committees, he said that he had had bitter experience of unwieldy bodies losing sight of the work before them. That was why he was desperately in earnest about it. The essence of democracy did not lie in numerical strength but the spirit behind even one person. Even one man could represent a whole democracy. In England, he said, it was not the House of Commons but it was the Bank of England that dictated policies to the British Ministers. Recently the Bank had finished its business in the record time of 13 minutes. If the Bank could manage such huge affairs in 13 minutes, the Congress should be able to manage its affairs in five minutes. Mr. Gandhi then moved that the Subjects Committee should accept the principle underlying the new constitution and appoint a sub-committee to consider the constitution and place their recommendations before the Subjects Committee by 8 a.m. on the 28th.

Replying to the debate, Mr. Gandhi said he had been asked whether he would reconsider his decision if the Committee accepted his amendments without changing a comma. He assured them that there was no “danger” of his remaining in the Congress in any event. He asked them to accept the new constitution only if they had confidence in it.¹

¹ Gandhiji then accepted M. S. Aney’s resolution which read: “The Subjects Committee accepts the principle underlying the proposed amendments to the constitution and appoints a sub-committee of the following 15 members to examine the details thereof and place its recommendations before the Subjects Committee for approval by the morning of the 28th.” For the report of the sub-committee, vide “Speech at Subjects Committee Meeting, A. Since Sjt. Shoorji Vallabhdas started this Swadeshi Bazaar, it has attracted my attention and I had promised that I would visit the stores at the earliest opportunity. That happy opportunity has been postponed due to various reasons up to this day, and even today I have had to snatch some time from my other engagements to fulfil my promise and as I have to return soon, unfortunately, I will not be able to give you much of my time. I have repeated very often that as long as the charkha does not hum in every village, we will not be able to attain swaraj nor will we be able to safeguard religion. Before our very eyes crores of our own brothers and sisters are not getting sufficient meals even once a day, while we enjoy two square meals. These crores are starving not because they do not wish to work, but because they do not find work. If you would place the charkha in their hands or if you can find out any other work for them superior to the charkha you may give that first and then the charkha. But do give these starving millions some work and then alone you will be able to bring food for their famished bodies.

Suppose you set the charkhas going, what about the khadi that will be manufactured? You all want to put on cheap and good-looking clothes in preference to khaddar, then in what way can you be of help to these poor starving people? Even if khaddar be costly it is your and my duty to use it. In our country millions upon millions have not even the bare loin-cloth to hide their shame, how can you expect them to put on khaddar? It would interest you to know that within ten years two-and-a-quarter crores of rupees have been distributed as wages amongst the spinners. This sum has gone direct into the hands of the poor. By putting on khaddar you can help these people. But to my utter regret I find that in Bombay many of you—both men and women—do not put on khaddar. If you do not wish to put on khaddar, where is the sense in being present at meetings which are addressed by me? I have come here with the hope that you would cast

Today, I have not been able to go into the details of all the articles that are exhibited here, but on a future occasion I mean to interest myself in details with regard to each and every article to be found here. That this Bazaar is not making profit has been realized by you and yet whenever it makes profits they will be ours. I would, therefore, urge upon you that whenever you wish to purchase any article please make it a point to visit this Bazaar.

279. SPEECH AT SUBJECTS COMMITTEE MEETING, A. I. C. C.

October 28, 1934

Mahatma Gandhi formally moving for the acceptance of the report stated that the sub-committee met on Saturday from 2 to 9 p.m. and had prepared their report. He himself sat up till 1 a.m. and Mr. Kishorelal sat up the whole night drafting the report. After Kishorelal had drafted the report, Messrs Munshi and Bhulabhai Desai sat over it and gave the legal touches to it. The speaker said that he did not want anything to be hurried, so that they might not think of an aftermath change which would have to be incorporated into the report. The members of the sub-committee sat with the determination of bringing out a unanimous report and considered all the recommendations of the Working Committee.\(^1\)

Mahatma Gandhi explained the changes that had been made in the constitution. It had been suggested several times that the name of the United Provinces should be changed to Hind and the name of C. P. (Hindi) as Mahakoshal. The speaker had not the courage himself to suggest the change, but since some of the members of the sub-committee suggested the change, he accepted it.

The Committee also had made a slight verbal change in Article V of the constitution. In that Article, the word “officer” had been restored. Another important clause which had been added at the suggestion of some of the members, whose point the speaker appreciated very much, was regarding no member of the Congress being a member of any communal or anti-national organization. There was some reluctance on the part of some of the members to introduce this clause, but the opposition was borne down and the clause was accepted.

Then, regarding the reduction in the Congress delegation, the original proposition wanted that there should be only 1,000 delegates and they themselves form the All-India Congress Committee, but it had been suggested by some of the members that the number of delegates should be 2,000, each delegate representing 500 Congressmen instead of 1,000 as suggested originally. The delegates from the urban constituencies shall in no case be more than 511, while the rural delegation should not be more than 1,489.

For the benefit of many minorities, it had been suggested that there should be multiple constituencies, each constituency consisting of at least five members. The election should take place under the single transferable vote system. This was an intricate subject to understand, said Gandhiji, but the system would make it physically impossible to have a constituency of less than five members.

Gandhiji explained in detail the system of the single transferable vote and multiple constituency. The idea was to make the position of the minorities secure.

Gandhiji continuing said that he would like the House to discuss it without loss of time and accept it as a whole even though the acceptance might be done reluctantly. There could be little ado or difficulty for the Committee to accept the report, which had amended the amendments. The number of delegates allotted to the provinces looked ugly, though it did not read ugly. Bombay had been given the right to send in 21 delegates. This was in recognition of the importance of the city and the part it had taken in the political fight. Including the All-India Congress Committee members today, Bombay was sending 30 delegates to the Congress and that number had been reduced to 21. This was not according to the population system. Bombay had been a veritable gold mine for developing the political conscience of the country. It was only on Bombay that this rare honour had been conferred. According to the system laid down under the constitution, Bombay would be entitled to send in only six delegates.

Continuing, Gandhiji said that the A. I. C. C. would consist of 166 members as suggested by the sub-committee instead of the present 350. This was in the proportion of one A. I. C. C. member for every twelve delegates. This would be nearly half of the present number. According to Gandhiji, it was not a bad change. The A. I. C. C. became a still more business-like and responsible body. Instead of the suggested A. I. C. C. of 1,000 members, the A. I. C. C. had been reduced to 166.

This has been done at the suggestion of many friends on the Committee who wanted that there should be an intermediary body between the Congress and the Working Committee. It has also been laid down that no person can get into the A. I. C. C. from any other province than his own. If a province does not produce the requisite number of members on the All-India Congress Committee or of Congress delegates, then that province goes only with that number and nothing more. Each province will send at least ten delegates to the Congress.

The new changes had not been thrust on the speaker.

Then Gandhiji referred to the election of the President. He said that since Nagpur he did not like the idea, and it had been decided by the sub-committee that the President should be elected by the delegates of the provinces who would send in their recommendations to the Working Committee who, after receiving all the recommendations, would declare the President of the year. The present system of the Reception Committee electing the President was not understandable. What had the Reception Committee to do with the President of the Congress, while the delegates with whom the President had to confer and decide the future work of the Congress were imposed with a President about whose selection they had nothing to do.

This sort of anachronism ought to go and that is why the sub-committee has decided that the delegates from the provinces should elect their President. The same meeting of the Provincial Congress Committee will elect their nominees on the All-India Congress Committee. The P. C. C. will elect their quota of delegates less the number of the A. I. C. C. members who ipso facto become delegates also. The work of the P. C. C. will be to carry out the programme and policy laid down by the Congress.

Gandhiji also discussed the powers of the Working Committee and stated that it was for the Working Committee to carry out the policy and programme enunciated by the Congress. But it was the work of the Working Committee to interpret the decisions of the Congress. The instance of the resolution\(^1\) on the Communal Award and the Congress attitude towards it was one of the extreme cases when the Working Committee expressed the views of the Congress. The Working Committee would be watchdog of the Congress in the country with the right of interpreting, whenever occasion arose, the decisions of the Congress. The Working Committee was not a body of dummies. It was for the All-India Congress Committee to place complete trust in the Working Committee, with amplest discriminatory powers within its jurisdiction. It was for the Working Committee to guide the policy laid down by the

\(^1\) Passed at Bombay on June 17 and 18
Congress and the A. I. C. C. Gandhiji said:

There are times when the Working Committee will have to take bold risks. Since the last many years, they have been taking risks and not an occasion had arisen when the A. I. C. C. passed a vote of no-confidence against the Working Committee. No Working Committee will be worth its salt if it does not take risks.

The sub-committee has recommended that no Provincial Congress Committee shall have more than 100 members and those who have already got more will reduce themselves, while those who have less shall remain so till the next elections. It is necessary under the proposed constitutional changes that 15 signatures should be affixed, if the meeting of the A. I. C. C. has to be called while the quorum would be 25.

After explaining the fundamental changes that had been proposed in the constitution, Gandhiji asked the House to proceed with the discussion of the report.

Mahatma Gandhi submitted the following report to the Subjects Committee:

Pursuant to your yesterday’s resolution, we have considered the Working Committee’s recommendations for the amendment of the Congress constitution and beg to submit our draft as annexed herewith. We are happy to state that we have been able to achieve complete unanimity.

The main alterations made by us in the Working Committee’s draft may be summarized as follows:

1. In Article II instead of the words “subject to the previous approval of the Working Committee” we have substituted the words, “in accordance with the rules framed by it (as Provincial Congress Committee) in that behalf and approved by the Working Committee”.

2. In Article III, we have made minor alterations; such as the change in the names of the provinces U. P. and C. P. (Hindustani) — into Hind and Mahakoshal respectively and the deletion of the last clause in C1. (c) which was superfluous.

3. In Article IV we have incorporated the labour franchise passed by the Subjects Committee with a slight verbal change so as to bring it in harmony with the khadi clause.

We have also added a new and important clause to this Article as follows:

No person being a member of any elective Congress Committee shall be a member of any similar committee of a communal organization the object or programme of which involves political activities which are in the opinion of the Working Committee anti-national and in conflict with those of the Congress.

4. In Article V, we have changed the original scheme of delegates in the following manner:

   (1) The number of delegates has been increased from 1,000 to 2,000, each representing a constituency of not less than 500 instead of 1,000 primary members.

   (2) The urban area will be entitled to have not more than 511 delegates in the aggregate and the rural area not more than 1,489. No province shall have more than its proportion of delegates that would belong to it, if it was fixed on the population basis as heretofore and every province shall be entitled to not less than ten, even though the number of its primary members may be inadequate to send that number.

   (3) The claims of the city of Bombay have been recognized by giving it a maximum of 21 delegates: for providing for this weightage we have been obliged to deprive the rural area of 11 delegates.

   (4) Where the delegates of a province exceed 100, the Provincial Congress Committee shall consist of the All-India Congress Committee members for that province plus those elected by the delegates to bring up the total to 100. Where the delegates are less than 100, the whole will constitute the Provincial Congress Committee.

   (5) The President of the Congress is to be elected by the delegates for the ensuing session in the following manner.

   Soon after the election of delegates they should meet under the Chairmanship of the President of the Provincial Congress Committee and elect the President, the Chairman registering the number of votes secured by each nominee, where there is more than one, and where there is only one nominee, he will be deemed to have received as many votes as there are delegates present at the meeting. These elections will take place simultaneously on the date fixed by the Working Committee in that behalf. These results shall be posted to the Working Committee by the Provincial Congress Committee and the nominee securing the highest number of votes shall be declared President for the ensuing year. The same meeting of delegates shall elect its quota of members for the All India Congress Committee.

(6) The number of the members of the All-India Congress Committee has been fixed at 166 as the maximum, each province having one member to every twelve delegates and every province being entitled to at least one, though it may not have twelve delegates. These members to be elected at the meeting of delegates referred to by the single transferable vote. The same meeting of delegates to elect members of Provincial Congress Committees where necessary.

Regard being had to the fact that the All-India Congress Committee has been considerably reduced, members desire to emphasize the necessity of making it clear in the constitution that the Working Committee should not initiate new policies but should merely be the executive body carrying out the policies laid down from time to time by the All-India Congress Committee.

5. The sub-committee recommends that at least one day should be invariably given for the consideration of proposals made by private members.

6. The sub-committee recommends the deletion of the Article dealing with matters affecting communal interests.

7. During the transitory period, the Provincial Congress Committees are to elect by single transferable vote the reduced quota of members of the All-India Congress Committee, the quota for the transitory period being the full strength of 166 distributed according to the existing proportions.

8. The Provincial Congress Committees to reduce themselves to 100 where they number more than 100. These elections to take place before the 15th of January.

Mr. Mazumdar from Bengal asked if it was not a fact that members were being elected directly under the proposed constitution, while the previous constitution... allowed indirect election.

Gandhiji agreed that it was so, but said that the new A. I. C. C. was not a subordinate body, it was less numerical than originally proposed by him.

Gandhiji appealed to the House not to move amendments, but make suggestion, which, if found feasible, he might accept. But if the House wanted wrangling over the report, then amendments should be moved, and the President would regulate the discussion.

Mr. Babu Purushottamdas Tandon seconded the motion.

Mr. Sampurnanand asked Gandhiji if the members of the sub-committee had freedom to vote on the question of Article I, at the open session, and Gandhiji informed him that they had.

Questioned regarding the elections in Bengal after the new constitution came into existence, Gandhiji said that the present P. C. C. would continue to function with the reduced number till the next elections.

Dr. Choithram Gidwani opposed the amendment regarding U. P. being called Hind, . . . by Hind the whole of India was meant. . . .

Sardar Sardulsingh seconded the amendment.

Mr. C. Rajagopalachari supported Dr. Choithram and said that if Hind was adopted as the name of U. P., then many changes would have to be made both in songs and national cries. . . .

Mahatmaji, at this stage, stated that he accepted the suggestion because many people had complained that they had no name for U. P. at all. But seeing that there were many who were opposed to it, he would withdraw it. He was doing it without conferring with the members of the sub-committee.

On the members saying that they had no objection to calling C. P. (Hindi) Mahakoshal, Mahatmaji, amidst laughter, said:

You seem to grudge poor Jawaharlal who is inside the Naini Jail. It was he who had suggested that U. P. should be called Hind.

Sardar Sardulsingh then moved an amendment that since Bombay had been given a weightage, the Frontier Province also should be given weightage, because they were more than entitled to it.

Mahatmaji said that he was opposed to weightage, and was prepared to cancel the number allotted to Bombay.

Gandhiji, replying to the several points, said that it was unfortunate that several amendments had been moved to the report. He wanted the House to accept or reject the report as a whole, because the report was an organic whole, and could not be changed here and there.

The suggestion that the A. I. C. C. membership should remain at 350 made that body a very loose body. It was the aim of the speaker to aim at quality and not at quantity.

Referring to the amendment of Mr. Kaleswarrao, Gandhiji said that the 15th of January had been fixed for the next elections, because many of the Congressmen would be in election fever till then, and when they survived that fever they could get together and hold the elections.

Regarding the Socialists Gandhiji said that there is nothing to be fluttered about. If a certain group cannot work the constitution it was up to that group to hand over the working of the Congress in that part to the group which was creating disturbance, saying that they would surrender everything to them. There need be no suspicion of the Socialist group, continued Gandhiji. They would certainly help all because they were also out to serve the starving humanity. If the Socialists rise in power and capture it, they have a perfect right to do so.

The speaker, referring to the single transferable vote, said that there were several occasions when he had to dodge himself out of inconvenient corners and every Congressman would have to do the same. It would be difficult as far as the village workers were concerned, but if it were the speaker, he would ask the Socialists either to join him in his work and carry on shoulder to shoulder, or leave the village to that group and go to the next village.

There was some discussion over the time of the year when Congress should be held, and it was decided that it should be held some time in February or March. It was specially being held in February or March, said Gandhiji, because the villagers in their langotis could come and the Subjects Committee members could hug them. (Cheers)

Mr. C. Rajagopalachari moved that option should be given to the provinces regarding the appliance of the single transferable vote. Mahatmaji refused to accept the suggestion, and voted against the amendment.

Gandhiji, laughing, said that if the vote had gone against him, he was about to demand a poll. (Laughter)

The sub-committee’s report was unanimously passed.

Mahatmaji thanked the Subjects Committee for unanimously approving the report. He announced that Karachi had decided to become a separate province. He also made an announcement that it would not be a surprise if members of the A. I. C. C. were asked to pay Rs. 10 each. The delegates’ fee would also be Rs. 5 and not Rs. IO as at present.
When the resolution regarding the Indian States was about to be moved, Mahatmaji stated that the problem of the Indian States was a very delicate one.

Gandhiji has prepared the following draft resolution, indicating the Working Committee’s views on the Indian States peoples. Gandhiji, however, advised that this proposal be not adopted by Congress, but that a formula be evolved by a sub-committee, in consultation with States’ subjects’ representatives. This sub-committee’s report would be placed before the next meeting of the A. I. C. C. Gandhiji’s draft formula runs:

As numerous resolutions have been received from various groups for adoption by Congress, and urging it to define its policy in regard to Indian States, it is hereby resolved as follows:

Congress adheres to its policy of the internal administration of various States. Congress, however, regards the whole of geographical India as an indivisible whole, notwithstanding the fact that it is cut up into parts governed under different systems and, therefore, expresses its regret over the tendency of some Princes to regard as foreigners Indians from parts of India other than their own, and repeats its appeal, made at the previous sessions of Congress, to establish responsible government within their jurisdiction, and recognize the necessity of guaranteeing civic and political liberty of people living in their territories. This Congress assures the people residing in different States of full sympathy with their just aspirations and for fuller self-expression.

(c) The Working Committee may after ascertaining the wishes of the Provincial Congress Committee or Committees concerned constitute a new province, or assign to a province districts from another province as also assign an Indian State to any province.

QUALIFICATIONS

ARTICLE V

(a) No member shall be entitled to exercise his vote at any election unless he has been continuously on a Congress register for six months prior to the date of the election.

(b) No member even if he is qualified under clause (a) hereof shall be eligible for election to an office or to membership of any Congress Committee unless:

(i) he is a habitual wearer wholly of hand-spun and handwoven khaddar;

(ii) he has performed some manual labour continuously for six months immediately before the date of nomination for election, on behalf of or for the Congress, equal in value to 500 yards per month of well-spun yarn of over ten counts, and in time to eight hours per month, the forms of acceptable labour alternative to spinning being prescribed from time to time by the Working Committee in consultation with the Provincial Congress Committees concerned and the All-India Village Industries Association or the All-India Spinners, Association;

(iii) at the time of offering himself for such election he is not a member at the same time of any other parallel committee.

(c) No person who is member of any elected Congress Committee shall be member of any similar committee of a communal organization, the object or programme of which involves political activities which are, in the opinion of the Working Committee anti-national and in conflict with those of the Congress.

ELECTION OF DELEGATES

ARTICLE VI

(a) At the end of every Annual Session the Working Committee shall fix a date and time not earlier than eight months after the date of such decision when every Provincial Congress Committee shall send to the Working Committee a certified list of members of its primary committees qualified to vote. The list must reach the office of the Working Committee on or before the said or any other extended date [or] time.

(b) Members included in the said list shall alone be entitled to vote at the election of delegates in that province.

(c) In the event of a Provincial Congress Committee failing to furnish the list in time, the province concerned may be disentitled to elect its delegates.

(d) On receipt of the aforesaid lists the Working Committee shall fix the date by which the election of delegates must be held and the quota of delegates which each province is entitled to return, and call upon the Provincial Congress Committees to proceed with the election of their respective quota.

(c) For the purposes of election the provinces referred to in Article IV hereof shall be divided into rural and urban areas.

NOTE. ‘Urban area’ means towns which have a population of more than ten thousand persons. ‘Rural area’ means area other than urban.

(f) The rural area as also every town with a population of more than 10,000 persons in a district shall each be entitled to elect one delegate for every five hundred duly qualified members on the rolls of its primary committees or for such other number as may be fixed by the Working Committee in accordance with clause (h) hereof subject to the following:

(i) The maximum number of delegates shall not exceed two thousand. Out of the said number 511 shall be the maximum for the urban area and 1,489 for the rural area.

(ii) No province shall be entitled to return a larger number of delegates than a proportion of one delegate; to every 1,50,000 of the inhabitants of such province including the Indian States or agencies therein, or a fraction thereof, in accordance with the census of 1921.

PROVISO I: The maximum number of delegates sent by the urban area in each province shall not exceed 25% of the total number returnable by the province as aforesaid.

PROVISO II: Bombay (City) shall have a maximum quota of 21 delegates.

PROVISO III: Every province shall be entitled to return a minimum of 10 delegates irrespective of the strength of its primary members.

(g) (i) Where the rural area of a district has a sufficient number of duly qualified members on the rolls of its primary committees, the Provincial Congress Committee shall divide such area into suitable circles, so as to include in each circle not less than five hundred duly qualified members and each such circle shall be entitled to elect a delegate.

(ii) On a demand made in writing by 500 duly qualified members enrolled on the primary committees of one or more contiguous circles of a district, the said circles, where possible, shall be combined into a plural-member constituency of not more than five seats.

(iii) Wherever possible, a town with a population of more than 10,000 persons shall be divided into plural-member constituencies of not less than five and not more than ten seats provided the constituency can have at least 500 duly qualified members to every seat. But where the number of duly qualified members is less than 2,500, the town shall be formed into a plural-member constituency with one seat to not less than 500 members each.

(iv) Election in plural-member constituencies shall be by proportional representation by single transferable vote.

(h) If and when necessary, the Working Committee may readjust the proportion of 500 duly qualified members to one delegate and prescribe a higher figure for any urban or rural area so that the total number of urban and rural delegates in each province may be in the proportion of 1 to 3 and may not in the aggregate exceed the maximum prescribed for it under f (ii).
(i) The province which has not completed its election on or before the date appointed by the Working Committee may at the discretion of the Working Committee be disentitled to be represented at the Annual Session.

(j) A certified list of delegates shall be submitted by the Provincial Congress Committees not later than the date fixed by the Working Committee in that behalf.

(k) Every delegate so elected shall, on payment of a fee of Rs. 5 at the office of the Provincial Congress Committee of his province, receive a certificate in accordance with Form C hereto annexed, duly signed by one of its secretaries. No delegate shall be entitled to exercise any of his functions or powers without such certificate.

ELECTION BY THE DELEGATES

ARTICLE VII

(a) On receipt by the Working Committee of the lists of delegates it shall fix a date on which the delegates in every province shall assemble in a meeting to transact the following business:

(i) to propose the candidate or candidates for the Presidentship of the Congress for the ensuing year and to record the vote of each of the delegates assembled on the proposals;

(ii) to elect from among themselves one-twelfth of their number as representatives of the province on the All-India Congress Committee;

(iii) in case the number of delegates for the province exceeds 100, to elect from among themselves a number of members which together with the members of the All-India Congress Committee elected under clause (ii) would amount to 100 to constitute the Provincial Congress Committee of the province.

(b) The elections in sub-clauses (ii) and (iii) of clause (a) shall be by proportional representation by single transferable vote.

(c) The Secretaries of the respective Provincial Congress Committees shall issue certificates of membership of the All-India Congress Committee to the persons elected on it.

PROVINCIAL CONGRESS COMMITTEES

ARTICLE VIII

(a) The delegates elected from a province under Article VI, or where the number of delegates is more than 100, one hundred delegates elected under Article VII(a) (iii), as the case may be, and the President and the ex-Presidents of the Congress, provided they... are duly qualified under Articles III and V, shall form its Provincial Congress Committee.

(b) Every Provincial Congress Committee shall:

(i) subject to the general control and supervision of the A. I. C. C., be in charge of the affairs of the Congress within its own province and to that end frame rules not inconsistent with this constitution, which rules shall come into operation only with the previous sanction of the Working Committee;

(ii) submit an annual report of the work in the province to the Working Committee not later than one month before the commencement of the Annual Session;

(iii) before the new A. I. C. C. meets as Subjects Committee under Article IX(g), pay to the Working Committee the fees received from the delegates, as also such subscription as may be fixed by the latter, having regard to the population, membership and financial capacity of the province. Delegates and members of the A. I. C. C. from provinces in default shall not be permitted to take part in any of the proceedings of the Congress or any committee thereof.

ANNUAL SESSION

ARTICLE IX

(a) The Annual Session shall be ordinarily held during the month of February or March. The said Session shall be held at the place decided upon at the preceding Session or such other place as may be determined by the Working Committee.

(b) The Annual Session shall consist of:

(i) the President of the Congress;

(ii) the ex-Presidents of the Congress, provided they are duly qualified under Articles III and V;

(iii) the delegates elected under Article VI.

(c) The Provincial Congress Committee concerned shall make such arrangements for holding the Annual Session as may be deemed necessary, and for this purpose shall form a Reception Committee, and may include therein persons who are not its members.

(d) The Reception Committee shall collect funds for the expenses of the Session, make all necessary arrangements for the reception and accommodation of delegates and visitors and for the printing of the report of the proceedings of the Session.
(e) The Reception Committee shall elect its Chairman and other office-bearers from amongst its own members.

(f) (i) As soon as may be, after the receipt of the report by the Working Committee of the names of Presidents proposed by the delegates of various provinces and the number of votes recorded in favour of each, the Working Committee shall announce as President-elect the name of the member obtaining the largest number of votes.

(ii) In the event of an emergency arising by reason of any cause, such as the death or resignation of the President elected in this manner, the Working Committee shall, not later than a fortnight after the emergency, elect as President the person standing next in order.

(g) The new A. I. C. C. shall meet as Subjects Committee at least two days before the Annual Session under the presidency of the President-elect. The outgoing Working Committee shall submit to it the draft programme of the work for the Session including resolutions recommended by the different Provincial Congress Committees.

(h) The Subjects Committee shall proceed to discuss the programme and shall frame resolutions for being moved in the open Session. At least one day shall be allotted for the consideration of propositions of which due notice has been given by Provincial Congress Committees or members of the A. I. C. C. other than those of the Working Committee in accordance with the rules prescribed in that behalf.

(i) At each sitting of the Congress, the order in which business shall be transacted shall be as follows:

(i) The resolution recommended for adoption by the Subjects Committee.

(ii) Any substantive motion not included in (i) and which 25 delegates request the President in writing, before the commencement of the day’s sitting, to be allowed to place before the Congress; provided, however, that no such motion shall be allowed unless it has been previously discussed at a meeting of the Subjects Committee and has received the support of at least a third of the members then present.

(j) The receipts and disbursements of the Reception Committee shall be audited by an auditor or auditors appointed by the Provincial Congress Committee concerned, and the statement of accounts together with the auditor’s report shall be submitted by the Provincial Congress Committee to the Working Committee not later than three months after the termination of the Annual Session.

SPECIAL SESSION

ARTICLE X

(a) The Working Committee may upon its own motion, or shall upon a joint requisition addressed to it, as provided in Article XI (e), convene a meeting of the All-India Congress Committee for considering a resolution for holding a Special Session. Such resolution shall be effective if passed by two-thirds majority of the members present. Thereupon the Working Committee shall summon a Special Session of the Congress at such time and place as it shall determine and the Articles of the constitution shall apply with such modification as the Working Committee may consider necessary, provided that the delegates of the preceding session shall be the delegates for such Special Session.

(b) The President of a Special Session shall be elected by the delegates.

ALL-INDIA CONGRESS COMMITTEE

ARTICLE XI

(a) The President of the Annual Session, members of the A.I.C.C. elected under Article VII (ii) and the ex-Presidents referred to in Article IX(b) (ii) shall constitute the A. I. C. C.

(b) The A. I. C. C. shall carry out the programme of work laid down by the Congress from session to session and deal with all new matters that may arise during its term of office.

(c) The A. I. C. C. shall have the power to frame rules, not inconsistent with this constitution, for regulating all matters connected with the Congress.

(d) The President of the Annual Session shall be the Chairman of the A.I.C.C.

(e) The A. I. C. C. shall meet as often as required by the Working Committee, or on a joint requisition addressed to the Working Committee by not less than fifteen members. Such requisition shall specify the purpose for which the requisitionists desire a meeting of the A. I. C. C. At such meeting additional items of business may be brought up for consideration, provided due notice thereof has been given to the members.

(f) Twenty-five or one-third of the total number of members, whichever is less, shall form the quorum.

(g) The A. I. C. C. shall hold office till the meeting of the new A. I. C. C. as Subjects Committee immediately before the next Annual Session.

(h) The A. I. C. C. shall, at its first meeting every year, nominate a panel of twelve members to enquire into and decide all election disputes coming before it. Each party to the dispute shall nominate one out of this panel to represent itself and the President shall appoint an umpire from the panel.

(i) The A. I. C. C. may from time to time affiliate to the Congress such organizations as it may deem necessary, provided such organizations are calculated to further or assist the object of the Congress.

(j) Every member of the All-India Congress Committee, ex-officio or elected, shall pay an annual subscription of Rs. 10 payable at or before the first meeting of the All-India Congress Committee. Members in default will not be permitted to take part in any meeting of the All-India Congress Committee, the Subjects Committee or in any Session.

THE WORKING COMMITTEE

ARTICLE XII

(a) The President of the Annual Session shall for his term of office select fourteen members from among the members of the A. I. C. C. to constitute his Working Committee including not more than three General Secretaries and not more than two Treasurers of the Congress.

(b) The Working Committee shall be the executive authority and as such shall have the power to carry into effect the policy and programme laid down by the A. I. C. C. and the Congress, and shall remain responsible thereto.

(c) The Working Committee shall place before every meeting of the A.I.C.C. the reports of its proceedings and the agenda of the meeting, and shall assign at least one clear day for resolutions of which due notice may have been given by the members of the A. I. C. C. other than those of the Working Committee in accordance with the rules prescribed in that behalf.
(d) The Working Committee shall appoint one or more inspectors to examine the records, papers and account-books of all Congress organizations, which shall furnish all information and give to the inspectors access to all offices and records.

(e) The Working Committee shall have the power:
(i) to frame rules and issue instructions for the proper working of the constitution and in all matters not otherwise provided for;
(ii) to superintend, direct and control all Congress Committees subject to review by the A. I. C. C.;
(iii) to take such disciplinary action as it may deem fit against a committee or individual for misconduct, wilful neglect or default.

(f) The Working Committee shall pay to the Provincial Congress Committee convening the Annual Session one-fifth of the fees recovered from the delegates within a fortnight of its termination.

(g) The Working Committee shall take steps to have a regular audit of the accounts of the Provincial Congress Committees.

Funds

Article XIII

The Treasurers shall be in charge of the funds of the Congress and shall keep proper accounts of all investments, income and expenditure.

General Secretaries

Article XIV

(a) The General Secretaries shall be in charge of the office of the A. I. C. C. and the Working Committee.

(b) The General Secretaries shall be responsible for the publication of the report of the proceedings of the Annual or Special Session in co-operation with the Provincial Committee concerned. Such report shall be published as soon as possible and not later than four months after the Session.

(c) The General Secretaries shall prepare the report of the work of the A. I. C. C. and the Working Committee during their period of office and submit it, with a full account of the funds which may have come into their hands, to the meeting of the A. I. C. C. immediately before the Annual Session.
VACANCIES

ARTICLE XV

The office of a delegate or a member of the A. I. C. C. or a Provincial Congress Committee shall be vacated by resignation, death or prolonged absence from India and such vacancy shall be filled by the Provincial Congress Committee concerned in the same manner in which the vacating member was chosen. A vacancy on the Working Committee shall be filled by the President.

FRACTIONS

ARTICLE XVI

Where there is a question of considering the value of fractions, a fraction of _ or more shall be treated as one, and less than _ as zero.

LANGUAGE

ARTICLE XVII

(a) The proceedings of the Congress, the All-India Congress Committee and the Working Committee shall ordinarily be conducted in Hindustani; the English language or any provincial language may be used if the speaker is unable to speak in Hindustani or whenever permitted by the President.

(b) The proceedings of the Provincial Congress Committees shall ordinarily be conducted in the language of the province concerned. Hindustani may also be used.

TRANSITORY PROVISIONS

ARTICLE XVIII

(a) on these amendments to the Constitution coming into force the A.I.C.C. shall consist of not more than 166 members apportioned as stated in the Appendix.

(b) The members of the Provincial Congress Committees which are functioning or are about to function shall, from among themselves, elect by single transferable vote the members of the A. I. C. C. mentioned in clause (a).

(c) Where a Provincial Congress Committee at present consists of more than 100 members, the sitting members of such committee shall elect from among themselves by single transferable vote 100 members including the A. I. C. C. members to constitute the new Provincial Congress Committee under the constitution.
(d) The Provincial Congress Committee reconstituted under clause (c) shall elect its office-bearers.

(e) The votes at the elections under clauses (b) and (c) may be recorded either at a meeting held for the purpose or on ballot papers sent by post.

(f) All such elections shall be held and a report thereon submitted to the Working Committee on or before the 15th of January 1935.

(g) Every Provincial Congress Committee shall, before the 28th of February 1935, submit for the approval of the Working Committee a report on the affairs of its province and a draft constitution for the same not inconsistent with this constitution and the rules made thereunder.

(h) The Provincial constitutions shall come into operation on their being approved by the Working Committee.

(i) No Provincial Congress Committee and no subordinate Committee shall be recognized by the Working Committee unless it has complied with the conditions laid down in this constitution or any rules framed thereunder by the Working Committee.

(j) On failure on the part of any Provincial Congress Committee to function in terms of the constitution, the Working Committee may form one to carry on Congress work in that province.

(k) Notwithstanding Articles III and V (a) and (b) (ii), a person otherwise duly qualified shall be eligible for election to an office or to membership of a committee prior to 1st July 1935.

(l) Notwithstanding the provisions relating to the election of the President by the delegates under this constitution, the President of the 48th Session of the Congress, viz, Sjt. Rajendra Prasad, shall continue to hold office as if he was elected hereunder.

(m) The President of the 48th Session of the Congress shall nominate fourteen members of the Working Committee including three General Secretaries and not more than two Treasurers from the members of the present A. I. C. C.

(n) The Working Committee may make such transitory regulations not inconsistent with the foregoing to meet any situation that may arise in the transitional period.

Report of the 48th Annual Session of the Indian National Congress, 1934
First and foremost, I crave pardon from all sisters and brothers that copies of the resolution proposing changes in the present constitution have not reached you. In spite of the trouble the Reception Committee had taken, there was so much to do that it seemed near impossible to get it done in three days; but they had resolved to complete the work within three days. Today the Subjects Committee also sat for long and therefore copies of this resolution could not be printed. There is much to amend but it is a matter for the legal pundits. I shall explain to you in a few minutes the amendments that have been accepted. We could have asked you to come again tomorrow evening for this same purpose; that means the Reception Committee would have had to spend so much money unnecessarily and your time and money would be wasted. It has never been my intention to have my resolution passed by unfair means by not letting you see it.

You are already acquainted with the present constitution. Experience has shown that 6,000 delegates were an unwieldy number. At the Nagpur Congress there were 14,000 delegates but they were not elected by any constituencies and represented mostly themselves. Now it is proposed to reduce the number of delegates to 2,000. I wanted only 1,000 delegates but yielded to the opposition and accepted 2,000. I wanted the delegates to agree to this sacrifice in number in the cause of freedom.

There is at present no direct contact between the Congress delegates and electors. This change in the constitution will not get us swaraj but will help the Congress to stand as a rival to the Assembly in showing that the Congress delegates also speak for their electorate. Hereafter, Congress inspectors will look into the registers and only such Congressmen will be allowed to vote as have been on its rolls for at least six months. Unless there are 500 Congressmen, they will not be entitled to elect a delegate to the Congress. This is too poor,

1 Gandhi first spoke in Hindi at the 48th session of the Indian National Congress, presided over by Rajendra Prasad compared to the Assembly where 8,000 voters elect one member, but I am satisfied with such a beginning for the organization representing poor people. As swaraj cannot be attained without roping villages into the Congress scheme, it has been provided that of Congress shall represent rural areas, i.e., places with a population of 10,000 and under.

Representation will be by single transferable vote and there will be plural constituencies. As for the A. I. C. C., it is always difficult to call 350 members who cannot afford the expense of frequent meetings. Thus the A. I. C. C. has been reduced to the maximum of 166. Then again, no democrat would like that the Congress President should be elected by the Reception Committee on recommendations of Provincial Congress Committees but hereafter the delegates themselves will elect the President.

Gandhiji then explained the khadi clause and the spinning franchise and said:

I do not mind if you reject these, but if you adopt them, you should do so with absolute conviction. Please vote not out of regard for me but in the interest of the motherland.

When I read the newspaper and the public comments on my proposals, I gave up the idea of publishing them for general consideration. But members of the Working Committee thought it fit to put them before you. I have listened to the opinions of others on the scheme for change. They have presented their case very ably. But they were either deceiving themselves or they were playing the role of an attorney. And they claimed that they had climbed down from idealism to practicality. But has socialism no ideals? If I told them to give up even a single one of their ideals, they would defeat my resolution. Do you ever realize that purna swaraj may come only in the next generation? The socialist ideal is higher than even this. I say we need a measuring rod.

Please [do not] think over this matter with the hope that on this resolution having passed, I may reconsider my retirement. If I began my leadership of the Congress with a constitution for which I am mainly responsible, then, while taking my leave, I wish to present you this amended constitution so that you can gain by the experience of one who tried in collaboration with you to work this constitution and found some defects in it. Therefore I wish you should carry these amendments.
One more thing is that the delegates should be sincere and truly representative of the people. Indirectly we are the representatives of the mute millions. We voice their views. From 1886 this has been the position of the Congress. But we represent the electorate only indirectly. Can any one of us say whose representative he is? Is he in contact with his own constituency and does he reflect their views? Can the biggest among us say what place he represents? Vallabhbhai is the uncrowned king of Gujarat but which constituency does he represent? Whom do I represent? I myself do not know it. I challenge everyone to submit the Congress register of his electorate. We must have a living contact with our constituency and with our voters; only then can we have our measuring rod.

The principle that I am putting before you is that the three elections should all be held simultaneously. This will be economically feasible and save some expenditure. If you accept this principle its future will be unshakable. Then the delegates will be chosen by their electorates. Then they would not, like today, gather for three days only to disappear later. They would be active members of the Congress working all through the year. Today, out of 6,350 delegates only 350 are members of the All-India Congress Committee.

Then, in Madras or Bardoli a Congress session of a hundred delegates can be called. I have made a detailed scheme for organizing such village sessions. The villagers will be at your beck and call but they will not be able to give you money for the Reception Committee. I object to lakhs of rupees being spent on buntings and arches and other fanfare by Reception Committees. Have we attained victory? Some friends even said that this subject should be transferred to the provinces. Why do you want to transfer this to the provinces? Why do you avoid doing your duty? Do not swerve from the path of your duty. I assure you that all your criticism has been duly considered. I am giving you a very complex and strict constitution from which no one can stray. If you find any fault in it, you may drop it. I wish you accept my advice. I wish to say that if you leave this matter to the provinces, you will be wasting one precious year of the nation’s life.

The procedure adopted in electing members of the Working Committee has been made part of the Congress constitution. The constitution has been so framed that there would be no difficulty in the election of the President. If you want us to carry on the work, let us have the rights we demand.
In the end, Gandhiji appealed to the representatives to adopt the new constitution with the determination to make it a signal success. (Cheers) Continuing in English, Gandhiji said:

I am now speaking in English, trying to produce the same sentiment which I conveyed in the national language. It is difficult to do that, because you cannot pour your soul twice in two different languages. The soul speaks with the deepest emotion and its sound comes out of the deepest recesses. You don’t want to examine the speaker for his ability to make a speech. You want to do national work with him. I simply want to say this that you will kindly forgive me for not giving you as full an explanation of the constitution as is required. The resolution is of a far-reaching character. It calls upon the Congress to repeat the history of self-denial and further reduce the size of the delegates and the A.I.C.C.

In conclusion, I would appeal to the delegates to adopt the new constitution with the desire to make it a glorious success.¹ (Applause)

283. STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

BOMBAY,

October 29, 1934

If Congressmen have understood the spirit underlying my retirement from the Congress, it ought to mean the redoubling of honest and persistent effort to return Congress candidates to the Assembly. I have retired not to weaken the national organization, but to strengthen it. I have seen notices from adverse parties which, under the guise of praising me, suggest that I leave the Congress in disgust. This is absolutely untrue. I entertain the highest regard for the Congress. When we achieve our goal, as we will and must, the Congress will be found to have contributed the largest share in the attainment. There is, thus, in the present fight, a battle between measures, not men. Every vote given to a Congress candidate means so much progress towards our goal. An institution that has just passed a self-denying ordinance in the shape of the new rigorous constitution, in my opinion, deserves universal support. That can just now be best expressed by sending as many Congressmen as possible to the Assembly.

¹ K. M. Munshi seconded the resolution, which was passed by a large majority.

284. STATEMENT ON SILK YARN

October 29, 1934

I have seen a newspaper paragraph attributing to me the opinion that silk yarn is drawn from some “imported stuff” and that therefore I consider it to be not fit for use. I have never expressed any such opinion. The A. I. S. A. has been for a long time certifying indigenous silk. The policy is now being revised in the interest of khadi made from cotton yarn.

BOMBAY,
October 29, 1934

DEAR HARIBHAU,

In view of the prevailing atmosphere at Ajmer, I think that you and the other office-bearers belonging to your group should give up your posts. This does not imply any censure against any of you. It is a matter of self-denial and restraint.

¹ The addressee had lost a shawl and was doing without it.
² To proceed to South Africa
I received during my silence in Bombay several queries from Pressmen, but I had no time to give written replies then. Visitors continued to pour in for whom I had to scribble out replies practically till the time of my leaving the camp. Now I answer these and some others that have cropped up since.

The first is whether I have already tendered my resignation. Formally, I had not done so till October 28, but it is presently going, in the form of a letter addressed to Rajendrababu and other officials concerned. This does not mean that I cease to take interest in the politics of the country or in its political future. Much less does it mean that I cease to take interest in the welfare of the organization for whose good I have left it. But, what will happen is that I shall cease to be interested in the details of the working of the Congress. And I shall certainly cease to shape the policy of the Congress organization as I had the privilege of doing till the last moment of the session.

Let me give one or two illustrations. Whilst I was observing silence yesterday, Rajendrababu and several members of the Working Committee came to discuss with me the composition of the new Working Committee. Hardly had we proceeded to discuss one or two names when I saw the utter incongruity of what I was doing. I, therefore, immediately wrote out on my scribbling pad, “Surely, I may not discuss these things now.” Members present immediately realized the significance of my remark and they very generously removed themselves some distance from me and began to discuss them in whispers and I may state that, up to the time of dictating this at Wardha, I am unaware of the composition of the new Working Committee. I was taking a lively interest, even up to the time of my departure, in the unfortunate Ajmer dispute. But Congressmen may understand from these two illustrations that I can no longer be looked up to for advice or guidance in such matters. If I continue to interest myself in the day-to-day working of the organization or in the domestic quarrels, not only would the whole of the salutary effect of my retirement be undone, but I would become a powerful factor for disturbance, not having the grasp of details which alone has hitherto been a predominant factor in enabling me to come to correct judgment in a vast majority of cases.

My interest in the Congress organization will, henceforth, be confined to watching, from a distance, the enforcement of principles for which the Congress stands. Congressmen may therefore expect, whenever I feel like giving it, a criticism of methods that may be pursued by the organization as a whole or its members as individuals. But this again does not mean that I should be receiving letters as I have hitherto received asking me for guidance in daily transactions in connection with the Congress. This they must henceforth seek from the President whose guidance will, I know, be invaluable or from those in whom they have confidence. I must be left free for the work which I have in mind.

Let it be borne in mind that I do not regard politics as something different in kind from other national activities. The root meaning of politics is the science of citizenship and it has also remote connection with polished manners and since the boundaries of citizenship have been extended to cover continents, the science of politics includes attainment of advancement of humanity along all lines, social, moral, economic and political, using the word ‘political’ here in the narrow sense in which we are accustomed to use it. Ever since my return to India in 1915, it has been my earnest endeavour to restore the meaning of politics to its root and if we would be truthful through and through, we should recognize that the predominant part of the Congress programme has been progressively social, moral and economic. And it becomes a powerful programme because it is intimately connected with the political, that is, the attainment of freedom of the country from foreign yoke, not from foreign friendship, that is, voluntary intercourse on terms of absolute equality with foreign nations. If Congressmen forget the constructive programme and simply confine Congress activities to winning of Assembly and Council elections and of fruitless debates in the Assembly and the Councils, they will soon find that I have taken with me the kernel of politics and they have kept for themselves only the outermost husk, without even the vitamins. But I have no such fear. Parliamentary Congressmen will advance the Congress programmes and by their votes register the will of the nation.
This session of the Congress has been a revelation to me. I had expected a battle royal with the members of the Working Committee about the vital amendments I had suggested and afterwards withdrawn, and equally vital alterations in the constitution on which I was insistent, but which had no connection whatsoever with my retirement from the Congress. But I found that, apart from my retirement, which they had ascertained was a moral certainty, members of the Working Committee wanted the amendments after their own fashion. Every one of them without exception had come to the conclusion that substitution of the words “legitimate and peaceful” by “truthful and nonviolent” was necessary, because of the ambiguity surrounding the two words. I could not prevent them from enforcing their own independent judgment.

The same revelations awaited me in the Subjects Committee. The alteration of the creed was not carried, but it was not summarily rejected. It was referred to Provincial Congress Committees for opinion. And now that I am out of the way and provinces are in a position to exercise their judgment freely and unfettered, I do hope that in order to be true to themselves and the Congress, their first act will be to pronounce their unequivocal opinion on the proposed amendments. The ambiguity is patent. Many have contested my proposition that “truthful and non-violent” are synonymous with “legitimate and peaceful”. If the Congress do not attach that meaning to the two words, they should unhesitatingly recommend their removal altogether. In adopting this recommendation they will not travel outside the terms of reference. Our creed is the measure by which we want mankind to judge us. There should surely be no uncertainty about our measure. What we insist upon in ordinary affairs of life is surely necessary in national affairs. Even as a mason without his square or a tailor without his yardstick is inconceivable, so also we cannot conceive of a big organization like the Congress without its measure. If we have any doubt about the necessity for downright truthfulness and downright non-violence for the attainment of complete independence, we should say so. There will be nothing wrong in it. That would not mean that we have abandoned truth or non-violence. It would mean that we have ceased to connect truthfulness and non-violence with independence, have ceased to see the one as the cause and the other as its inevitable result, have ceased to think that there is an indissoluble bond between the means and the end.

If there was difficulty about carrying the amendment to the creed, it was plain sailing with reference to other amendments, both in the Subjects Committee and in the open session. What I observed to my delight was also the fact that those who wanted to oppose any of the amendments did so without any hesitation and yet in courteous terms. Obedience was ungrudgingly tendered to the chair at all times, whereas I was prepared for boisterous scenes. And all the amendments were passed although members knew that I was not remaining in the Congress.

The manner in which the 1,500 delegates assembled here waived their undoubted right of having copies of the amended draft constitution was an exhibition of generosity and faith of which any nation would be proud. And yet all amendments were passed by the delegates with overwhelming majorities after they had understood what they were and what were their implications. For they listened for over an hour to my simple unvarnished explanation of all amendments. The cheers that punctuated my remarks on some of the most important amendments showed that they were following my exposition with the utmost attention. All this was possible because of perfect loudspeaker arrangements that were made as well for the Subjects Committee as for the open session.

Now that the new constitution is an established fact, the Provincial Congress Committees should realize the necessity for honestly working it. Although time has been given to them up to January 15 for holding A. I. C. C. elections and for reducing themselves to 100, where they are over 100, wherever it is possible they should at once do these two things.

Let me also utter a warning. I hope no one will think that the khaddar clause and labour franchise clause do not come into immediate operation. They do. Those who do not believe in them, those who do not want to wear khaddar as a habit, to the exclusion of all other cloth, or do not want to do some manual labour for the sake of the country, will, if they are members of any elected organization, at once tender their resignations. And Provincial Congress Committees will not elect as members of the Committees or of A. I. C. C. those who are not habitual wearers of khaddar or who do not want to do manual labour. Spinning is undoubtedly the most natural and the easiest form of labour and is connected with the khaddar clause. But those who do not believe in spinning can certainly take up any other kind of manual labour. Tailoring is quite easy, whether with the needle or with the sewing-machine. Sewing four caps would be equivalent to more than 500 yards of evenly spun yarn. A day’s cleaning of a neighbouring village would undoubtedly be such an equivalent. So would be house-to-house personal distribution for one day of, say, quinine powder or pills in malarial tracts. What is meant by this clause to be symbolical may, in the end, result in many Congressmen becoming experts in the labour they perform and make phenomenal contribution to the economic advancement of the nation. This is all civil resistance of the purest type. I plead guilty of negligence in that I had not in the past insisted on these things so as to make them a condition precedent to launching out any civil disobedience. I had been overborne by the argument that the nation would take up these things in the course of civil disobedience.

That expectation has not been realized. My retirement from the Congress may be regarded as a penance for the negligence although it was wholly unconscious. But calling myself, as I do, an expert in the science of civil resistance, I may not plead ignorance as excuse. I hope, therefore, the vital clauses of the constitution will be immediately put into operation. What I am aiming at is development of capacity for civil resistance so that there never may be any need for civil disobedience. Disobedience that is wholly civil should never provoke retaliation.

289. LETTER TO DR. B. C. ROY

October 30, 1934

DEAR DR. BIDHAN,

I have a bad cold. Therefore, instead of writing this letter, I am driven to dictating. You have let me feel that I must think you as one of my intimate co-workers to whom I could speak and write without reserve. You have even resented my reserve when you have detected it. I am taking the liberty of writing this letter without reserve.

I allowed myself to be party to a discussion over the names of the new Working Committee. Rajendrababu and other members came to me during my silence and opened the discussion. We had come to two names. I had suggested one name as a substitute for Jawaharlal whilst he was in prison, and when we came to discuss the Bengal representative, I gave my opinion. But I saw that I was doing violence to my pledge that I shall cease to be a member of the Congress after the session. I did not, therefore, attend the meeting of the A. I. C. C. that day nor of the Working Committee. I, therefore, abruptly stopped the discussion and wrote on the scribbling-pad: “Surely I may not discuss these things now.” Of course, further discussion was carried on by the members without my listening to it.

The difficulty that they had was to choose as a Bengal representative either you or Prafulla Ghosh. I wrote saying that Maulana Saheb\(^1\) alone should be given the Bengal representation, and that neither you nor Prafulla Ghosh should be in it. I wrote further that if anybody had to be elected, besides the Maulana, it must be you. It was impossible to overlook you without slighting the present Provincial Congress Committee unless you yourself chose to stand aside. It was at this stage that I discovered my error and abruptly stopped taking part in the discussion. But without any compunction, having gone as far as I did, I can write to you that I feel that the act of self-denial which I have recommended would be the best thing for Bengal politics. You know how I have three times suppressed Rajagopalachari or, rather, how Rajagopalachari has allowed himself to be suppressed. I do not think that the country has lost by that suppression. Rajagopalachari has certainly gained, and if today he is most useful in the parliamentary struggle in the South, I have no doubt that it is due to this self-denial.

But, of course, I may be wholly wrong in my judgment in this case. I felt that I would be untrue to you if I did not pass on the opinion that I formed yesterday, but which I could not express as fully as I have done here. If this letter is not helpful, you will please dismiss it from your mind altogether. But I hope that in no case would you consider it to be an impertinent interference. The fact is that, so far as I am concerned, we have been coming closer day by day. The association with you in Calcutta during my recent visit\(^2\) brought you closer to me. Your help during the strenuous time last week I appreciated very deeply, and I have not hesitated to say so to many friends. Whatever decision you take, I shall be fully satisfied if this letter does not interfere with the growth of that co-operation. I am

293. LETTER TO P. KODANDARAMIAH

October 31, 1934

MY DEAR KODANDARAMIAH,

I have your letter. I have pre-mortgaged my time for things which I may not put off. Therefore I can make no promise nor hold out any hope. I do not know what the future has in store for me. If I can see my way clear for some months to come I would love to undertake the travel you have suggested. Meanwhile if you have approached this subject as an earnest seeker, give me a vivid description of the six backward tribes. It must be readable, brief and worth publishing in the columns of Harijan. You must give me also a little more introduction to yourself. Who are you? What are you doing? What is Swaraj Ashram? What is your contribution to the cause of the aborigines?

294. LETTER TO K. M. MUNSHI

October 31, 1934

BHAISHRI MUNSHI,

Jamnalalji will give you the [draft of the] constitution. I have gone through it carefully. The changes which I have suggested should not be difficult to understand. But if I have misunderstood the meaning anywhere, delay of a day or two will not matter. If you write to me in detail, I will try to see my mistake. The copy sent by you did not include the forms. It would be good if the appendix also gives, in addition to [the list of] members of the All-India Congress Committee, the maximum number of members which each province can send. If this cannot be done, however, the printing need not be delayed on that account. The Secretary also can announce these figures.

Let Jairamdas and Kishorelal, if he is all right, go through the changes. I hope they will find no difficulty in deciphering my handwriting. Tell Jairamdas that he should issue some of the notices which have to be issued immediately. Please examine A, F(a) and such other things.

How shall I compliment you on your immense labour?

295. LETTER TO SURENDRA

October 31, 1934

CHI. SURENDRA,

Sharma’s problem is a difficult one. Hold him back as long as your influence on him works. See that he doesn’t starve or remain unprotected against the cold. His view of people is generally perverted. He regards as good those about whom we are doubtful and as bad those whom we think to be good. This is a difficult disease to cure. How can we help if people misunderstand one another? But I will not give up hope. My diagnosis is that he is deceiving himself and not the world. I see no evil in him but a transparent frankness. However, he is by nature proud and has too much confidence in his ability to judge people. If those who enjoy his trust can open his eyes, he is capable of rendering very useful service. . .

I have your letter. I am not tired and I feel no despair. You will stay in the Ashram itself when you come. Vinoba is also agreeable. On your assurance I shall be free of anxiety. You may take it that I shall not worry if you do not strain yourself.

For my part, I want to rope in Draupadi too but that can be done only when you are settled. Your shawl is not to be found. Possibly the boy who was staying here took it away. He is no longer here. But it is not wise to suffer the cold without the shawl.

297. LETTER TO DIETRICH BONHOEFFER

November 1, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. If you and your friend have enough money for return passage and can pay your expenses here, say, at the rate of Rs. 100 per month each, you can come whenever you like. The sooner the better so as to get the benefit of such cold weather as we get here. The Rs. 100 per month I have calculated as the outside limit for those who can live simply. It may cost you even half the amount. It all depends upon how the climate here agrees with you.

With reference to your desire to share my daily life, I may say that you will be staying with me if I am out of prison and settled in

2 The addressee, who had been undergoing allopathic treatment at a hospital in Ahmedabad, had returned to the Sabarmati Ashram and sought Gandhiji’s permission to go over to Wardha.
MY DEAR AGATHA,

I have been wanting to write to you every week; but it was impossible. You know the situation now. I am free and it is all to the good. Here is a copy of my statement to the Press made immediately after the breaking of silence, that is, made on the 30th. I want to devote next month at least to Harijan work and to launching out the contemplated Village Industries Association. But I want to pave the way for the Frontier even from now. I hope to be able to send my letter to the Government in a day or two. If I do, you will have a copy of it herewith. This is being dictated on 31st. This may be posted from Wardha on the 2nd November.

My desire throughout is so to act as to disarm all suspicion about the character of civil disobedience. At the present moment there is no question of others participating in it. So far as I can see the future, there is no likelihood of my initiating or precipitating mass civil disobedience for some years to come. I want to test the genuineness of public feeling by keeping myself aloof from the Congress and watching from a distance how Congressmen in general take to the constructive programme. Civil resistance can properly culminate in civil disobedience only when people learn the art of civil resistance which is nothing less and nothing more than refraining from doing anything that would keep up a system which you seek to destroy.

I observe that without breaking a single law, villagers can somewhat better their economic condition by reviving their industries. Hence the Village Industries Association. Hindu-Muslim tension also enables the system to live, and so does untouchability, so does the drink evil. People had sufficient experience now in this kind of training. I am, therefore, resisting every temptation to invite civil disobedience by the people. There is temptation enough. Even the prisoners in Bombay who were thought to be discharged are still in the various jails of the Presidency of Bombay. Buildings which have been seized by the Government are not being returned. I can multiply such instances drawn from various provinces. Nevertheless I know that I have to live down these irritations and so have fellow-workers. That appears to me just now the best form of resistance, if it may be so called. But if I may not go [to] the Frontier, and if there is no just cause for preventing me from going there, it may prove the last straw and I will again find myself utterly incapable of doing constructive work. I must receive this elementary satisfaction of the soul. Let me not anticipate. All I can say is that I shall not rush to the jail. You will have ample notice.

I hope Mira had a successful tour in America. You will share this letter with C. F. Andrews and whomsoever you like.

Did you get the balance paid to you of the expenses incurred here?

Love.

301. LETTER TO SHANKERLAL BANKER

November 2, 1934

MY DEAR SHANKERLAL,

I enclose herewith a letter from Hiralal M. Garhwal. If the figures of the Hindi-speaking population for the Ahmedabad district are correct, evidently, the arrangements for schooling of Hindi knowing children are inadequate. If what Hiralal says is true, I take it that most of the Hindi-speaking residents of Ahmedabad district are concentrated in the city and that they are mostly millhands. You will, therefore, let me know if you know anything about this and whether the Municipality is doing anything for them.

I enclose herewith also another letter. It is from Annadababu. He was here and in the course of the conversation there was an incidental reference to Dr. Sanyal’s behaviour in the Subjects Committee. Apart from his behaviour, if what Annadababu says is correct, I suppose that whoever is responsible for enhancing the rent of the stalls, after they were given for Rs. 25 each, was wrong. And if there was threat of withdrawal of certificates, the wrong was multiplied. Do you know anything about this? I remember your mentioning to me something about the reshuffling of rent. But I have no recollection of what Annadababu says as having happened.

303. LETTER TO S. GANESAN

November 2, 1934

MY DEAR GANESAN,

I was extremely sorry that I was not able to talk to you as much as I would have liked. You are hasty in your judgment about Thakkar Bapa. He is a man with a great heart. You have to win him over by your humility, meekness and precision in work. That you are precise I know to my cost. But I cling to you because I believe you to be hard-working, honest and self-sacrificing. You are taking responsibilities beyond your capacity and then find yourself always in want and distress. I would, therefore, strongly discourage you against taking up more than you can, and then do thoroughly whatever you have. You will then find that you will be able to manage your domestic problem also much more successfully than you are now doing.
You have asked me whether I could let you publish a weekly like Young India. For the reasons I have given you I cannot contemplate any such thing. I wish I could trust you to discharge that burden in an efficient manner. And then too we have not enough liberty for conducting a fearless paper of the type of Young India. Therefore, I would like you to concentrate upon what you have. You can then think of more, and I should be glad to do what I can.

Bhai Shah,

I had your letter and article. I think you might not like to stay and move with me. It is, therefore, good that you cannot spare the time just now. I would be happy if I am mistaken in my judgment.

I doubt if your son would like it either. What experience will he gain from me? Who knows what I shall be doing by the end of this month? I shall be free only when I put village industries on their feet. To put them on their feet means only to start an institution for doing the work. Whether I can contribute substantially to it depends upon my going or not going to jail. Of course, I am certainly eager to avoid such an eventuality. If I do not get the necessary freedom, there is no point in staying out of jail.

CHI. SHARMA.

Your letter. I also read Surendra’s letter. You have to come here. After that we shall see what the right course of action is. People will not be reassured simply by your staying away. You have to come even in order to remove their misgivings. Vinoba is of course fully agreeable to your coming. Babaji1 too will be glad to have you as a guest. I shall of course be happy. We shall see what to do if I find that I cannot bear with you. I have decided on a time limit of one year for you although you may continue to stay indefinitely.2 Whether you should live with Draupadi, submerge yourself in domestic duties, is for you to consider. Have we not agreed that you will do nothing under compulsion nor go beyond your strength? I want this assurance from you and I shall see to the rest. Forget about Yoganand3. Let us not bother about what he is talking outside; he has not impressed anyone here. He did not at all impress me and therefore could not arouse suspicion against you. I stick to my diagnosis: suspicion, pride and fault-finding. Time alone is the antidote for suspicion; reducing oneself to a cipher is the remedy for pride and the cure for finding faults with others is to see one’s own faults. If one regards oneself as the worst of all, one will not see faults in others and every fault will seem to be a form of illness. I shall certainly give you part of my day to discuss things but discussions alone will not help. I have plenty of manual work for you and along with it I shall take some other work also from you.

I have today sent a telegram4 asking you to come over.

MY DEAR KUMARAPPA,

You might have seen the resolution1 on the Village Industries Association and might have seen also that the burden has been put on your broad shoulders. The question is when you can come. I do not want you to neglect your work there, nor do I want you to take up this work before you can be disengaged from the responsibility there. Before you or I can ask Rajendrababu about disengaging you, you have to judge for yourself when you can safely disengage yourself. And if you cannot, you will say so. You will then give me your own views, and I shall see what can be or should be done. If you have any names of those who can form the Board, send me those names and any other suggestions that you have to make. I shall think out the constitution. 314. LETTER TO K. M. MUNSHI

November 3, 1934

Note 3: In both (a) and (b), the word “member”¹ is used to denote a primary member, whereas whenever the word “membership” occurs the reference is to an elected member. At both places, therefore, you should use either “member” or “person”. “Member” at one place and “person” at another will not be correct. The word “member” is not likely to be interpreted to mean a member holding an elective post. All the same, you should use the same word at both places, whichever you prefer.

Note 5: Bapu feels that the words “every district” throughout will serve the purposefully, or that, alternatively, the amendment suggested by him should be retained. Using the word “town” only will not permit the additional members in one town to be “amalgamated” with the additional members in another town in the same district, and will also create difficulties in forming constituencies with a minimum of five members.

Note 6: In clause (h) Bapu suggests the following amendment in place of the one suggested by you: “When the number of duly qualified primary members exceeds the minimum required for electing 2,000 delegates, the Working Committee shall reallocate the minimum of 500 duly qualified primary members required per delegate so as to maintain the maximum for all India and the balance between urban and rural areas as per clause f(1) hereof.”

Note 8: Bapu did not mean that when a special session was called the “A. I. C.

¹ This was conveyed by Swami Anand in a letter to the addressee in which he wrote: “Bapu has both the drafts of the constitution along with your notes and has gone through the changes suggested by you. He now returns the lot with the following suggestions.”

² Portions within quotes in this letter are in English.
C.” would stand dissolved and fresh elections would be held. According to the proposed arrangement, the delegates once elected will continue for the whole year and the composition of the “A. I. C. C.” also will remain the same, and the special session will be attended by the same persons, unless of course the delegates as a general body wish to dissolve the “A. I. C. C.” and elect a fresh one in its place. That right belongs to every “bigger body”. But otherwise there should be no need at all to elect a fresh “A. I. C. C.” or “W. C.” merely in order that a special session might be held.

Note 11: If an assurance was given to the “A. I. C. C.” on Monday that the conditions mentioned in Article “III” would not, till the 1st of July, be applied to members elected just now, there is nothing to be said about it. Personally, however, Bapu could not reconcile himself to giving members permission to remain idle till then. There was definitely no such understanding when the constitution was passed. If, however, the assurance was given to the “A. I. C. C.” in view of some other difficulties it must be honoured.

319. LETTER TO MARGARETE SPIEGEL

November 5, 1934

CHI. AMALA,

I was happy to have your letter. There are but a few mistakes of language. I am writing this in English lest you should fail to decipher or understand it.¹ I am glad you are happy there. Your train letter was duly received. You have asked for your wheel. Do you really want it? I hope you are keeping yourself and your surroundings tidy. Of course, the more you labour the better you will feel. I hope you will preserve your health. Of course you may come during the Xmas, if you think it worth while. You will send your mother her remittance regularly. Mahadev was detained in Bombay for his son. The latter must have undergone operation yesterday.

Do please write regularly. Do you get papers to read? You should describe your room and the people you meet.

Love,

BAPU

320. LETTER TO TITUS
November 5, 1934

MY DEAR TITUS,

I have your letter. I quite agree with you that Surendra should have brought the matter to your notice before he wrote to me about the cows. But you need not worry as I am entirely satisfied that our cattle are not in that condition and that you are in no way to blame with reference to their upkeep.

Your scheme about removing the dairy to Biraj attracts me. I would personally like to let you try. But did you not discuss the scheme with Narandas? He had written to me, but he is silent about the scheme. Please collect opinion and let me know.

I am arranging for the prompt payment of the monies that are lost. I have already asked Narandas as to what I am to do and where it is to be sent. There would be no delay after I receive the answer.

I hope both you and your wife have completely recovered.

Love to you both.

321. LETTER TO S. GANESAN
November 5, 1934

MY DEAR GANESAN,

I thought that it was understood between you and me that Khan Saheb could not come and that you would ask Kakasaheb to give you a week. I do not know whether you asked him. It is not possible for me to send anyone else.

About the Introduction to Vol. III of Young India, I do not know that I shall get the time within the limit fixed by you. Mahadev is not here and he may not be for some time. On his return he will be overwhelmed with arrears.

I have written to you already about turning your bi-weekly paper into an official organ of the Village Industries Association. So long as you are living on the brink of civil debt, I would not think of putting extra burden on you, or trusting that I would be safe in your hands. Your desire for extension of your activities is wholly inconsistent with the opening of the second paragraph of your letter wherein you say: “I have reached the limit of perfect recovery. Any further delay may mean a breakdown.” I do not know who the friend is who has promised to meet all the expenses. If I have a practical, reliable, firm proposition I would be prepared to reconsider my decision.

What will Sastri do as the editor of the Village Industries Association? It requires special knowledge, and so far as I am aware Sastri has absolutely none. I do not know what V. S. V. Chari can do. A man who writes paragraphs for The Statesman is probably the last man to handle the village industries question with effect.

But without my identifying myself with your bi-weekly you should devote its columns to the constructive programme of the Congress if you can justify the title of your bi-weekly.

I have read your correspondence with Thakkar Bapa. The only thing I shall be able to discuss with him is the bill for the Supplements to Harijan. I might incidentally have to deal with the other things. I shall see.

The enclosed letter might be of interest to you.

November 5, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. There is no doubt that any testimonial that can be devised for Jamshed Mehta will not be too much for his unique services. But how is it that you are the only person moving in the matter? I would strongly dissuade you from taking the lead. There should be a Universal appeal from the citizens of Karachi or nothing at all. And if the citizens of Karachi do not move of their own accord, I will be the last person to prompt them.

325. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI

November 5, 1934

CHI. RAMDAS,

I dare not send for you. How can I say that my treatment will surely benefit you? How can I experiment with you? Moreover, once you are here you will surely get involved in a number of things. After all, home is home. What one happens to see or hear cannot but affect one. Precisely for this reason I have left the matter entirely to you. At the moment I find my dharma of not opposing your wishes easy enough. It is the least likely to be wrong. Yet I would suggest this to help you to arrive at a decision. After much thinking I am inclined to select Poona. It has the best climate and good water. Lady Vithaldas\textsuperscript{1} has been pressing me for it. Try her treatment and as Ba would be with you, you will find the going easy. If you [decide to] go there you had better send Sumitra here. Nimu also would like to come over but if you want to take her with you, by all means do so. From all this you will see that I am inclined to keep you away [from me]. Make up your mind after considering my inclination for what it is worth. Don’t leave it to me. I do feel that you ought to come away from there. You may consult Dr. Jivraj at Bombay if he has the time. I would not mind, though, if you don’t. You are not going to come to the slightest harm. Never mind if you take time to recoup your strength. Don’t lose heart. Know that I am not at all opposed to your coming here if you like to do so. If you do come over I shall of course guide you as best as I can. But on the whole I like Mehta’s treatment. All you need to have is proper diet. The treatment of egg-diet might prove beneficial if started early. Jugatram writes to say that he knows no vegetable product which can fully replace eggs. Milk is inferior to eggs and cannot match them. This had been proved right in Manu’s case. She was given only uncooked eggs.

I trust Ba’s cold has subsided.

326. LETTER TO SRIKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

November 5, 1934

MY DEAR SRIKRISHNA\textsuperscript{2},

I have your letter. You have become guardian angel to Brijkrishna. I quite agree with you that he ought not to tinker with his health. I would like him to go back to New Delhi and not leave it till he is completely restored. His unsteadiness ruins him. I have not heard from him for some time. You tell me what he is doing. I see that Dr. Ansari is ailing in Hyderabad and therefore can’t be in Delhi for some time.

\textsuperscript{1} Premlila, wife of Vithaldas Damodar Thackersey

I see what you are doing for yourself. I wish you success. I know that you have no lack of self-confidence.

Tell Brijkrishna to write to me. If I get the time, I shall put in a note for him with this.

327. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

November 5, 1934

CHI. BRAJKRISHNA,

Why is there no letter from you? I did send a reply\(^1\) asking you to come. It was addressed to Hardwar. Srikrishna’s letter gives me to understand that you are not well. If that is so, the right thing for you would be to return to New Delhi. The best thing of course is to follow the doctor’s advice.

Damodardas met me and we had a long talk but I was not satisfied. If what he says is true, either you have misunderstood him or he has changed his statement.

328. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR

November 6, 1934

I have your letter. The previous one I sent to Chhotalal. I did get your note you left on the table. You were unnecessarily apologetic. You did not disturb my solitude. My solitude is taken in the midst of many. Are you to be held up there till Rangraoji returns? Are you doing your takli after the latest style? ‘Whatever you do, do in the name of God and therefore in the best style possible’ is a good motto.

329. LETTER TO K. M. MUNSHI

November 6, 1934

MY DEAR MUNSHI,

My mind is off the constitution now. Therefore, it is difficult for me to give you a definite opinion on your letter just received. On all the points raised by you, therefore, you should give full effect to that which was clearly understood at the sub-committee’s deliberations. I sent you my phraseology\(^1\) to meet what I thought was the prevalent view of the sub-committee. As you know, I was in it the whole of the time, but so was also Kishorelal. I would gladly prefer his memory to mine. Now for the details:

1. What was understood at the sub-committee was that, wherever, whether in rural area or urban area, contiguous places could be combined to form plural-member constituencies they should be so combined. There was no distinction between the urban area and the rural area except that in the urban area the maximum was fixed at ten members and the minimum at five, wherever such a thing [was] possible; for rural area no maximum or minimum was fixed, but wherever possible, by the process of amalgamation suggested above, plural-member constituencies were to be created. The question of amalgamating Ahmedabad, Dhanduka and Prantij does not arise at all in my conception. My difficulty arose in your drawing the distinction between the two areas. According to our definition of a town, it must have a population of more than 10,000. Any place having 10,000 or less is not a town and belongs to the rural area. I do not know if I have made my own meaning clear. If it is not clear, and if there is nobody whom you can consult as to the understanding, please enforce your own view. After all if there is any difficulty or difference of opinion among the members of A. I. C. C. it can be removed at the next session of the Congress.

2. The difficulty for Bombay in the matter of readjusting the proportion of 500 to one delegate was not before me, because it has 21 members allotted to it as the maximum. For the other provinces, I understand this to be the position. We have the maximum fixed for them and we have also the maximum fixed for urban and rural areas. Therefore, the distribution or readjustment will be according to provinces and further readjustment according to the areas in the respective provinces. My own interpretation of my draft is that both these are provided for. But if you think otherwise, then your draft should stand or any other you may frame to carry out this meaning. That the meaning is what I have given here I have no doubt whatsoever.

3. As to the special session I have no difficulty. The A. I. C. C., the Working Committee and the President will be at the disposal of the delegates. They will do whatever they like with them and I thought that our draft had so provided.

You may send me that final proof if you like, but I waive that privilege, because the publication of the constitution is overdue. If we have honestly tried to give effect to the views of the sub-committee as adopted by the Subjects Committee, our duty is done and we should stand the fire of criticism.

I hope you are not overworking yourself. I return the draft sent by you.

330. LETTER TO DR. GOPICHAND BHARGAVA

November 6, 1934

DEAR DR. GOPICHAND,

I have your letter. What you tell me about the happenings in Lahore makes me sad. But I suppose such things are inevitable. I will expect you to take only such part in the Congress as is to your liking and as enables you to keep it clean.

I hope to be able shortly to issue a statement\(^1\) about the Village Industries Association. I might have issued it earlier, but, in spite of my getting up at half past two in the morning, I have not yet overtaken the arrears. But I shall presently put on speed. Of course, I shall want your assistance and that of all solid workers who would come forward. The resolution aims at moral uplift. Therefore, it includes social work so far as it can be advanced through village industries. If Jagannath offers his services and if he is allowed to do so, he will have to be a whole-timer. Can he be spared by the Society, and has he that inclination himself?

My programme up to the end of this month is that I am here. The future I do not know except that Utmanzai is my Mecca, Jerusalem or Kashi.

331. LETTER TO P. G. MATHEW

November 6, 1934

MY DEAR MATHEW,

I am glad of your decision. Swami Anand will reach there on 9th and will take charge of you. He will put you among a band of workers. Your ultimate destination will be Thana, some miles from Bombay. Meanwhile you [ will] be living with the workers in Bombay. You will live with them and board with them. But if you choose to find your own food, you can begin to draw Rs. 15 per month at once, i.e., from the time Swami Anand takes charge of you. Rs. 15 per month will cover your food, clothing, medicine if any and all extras.

\(^1\) Vide “Statement to the press”, 8-11-1934.
But they will not cover residence which will be found for you free of charge, so long as you are in Thana or Bombay. If you are posted in a village, in which there is not much change just now, Rs. 15 will cover everything including rent. You will give 8 hours’ corporate labour and learn Hindi diligently. If you can do all this cheerfully I have no doubt that it will solve your difficulty and by God’s grace you will get over the past.

Love.

336. LETTER TO RAJARAM R. BHOLE

WARDHA,
November 6, 1934

MY DEAR RAJARAM,

I have your letter. You ought not to have gone with the Dasara Procession. You have to concentrate your attention on becoming perfectly well and exclude every activity that may interfere with your progress in that direction.

God won’t be just if He was not merciful. Justice and mercy are different terms with us imperfect human beings, not so with God who is perfection and who knows our hearts and who will rule them if you will let him. His justice is, therefore, never vindictive, never faulty and therefore descends upon us in the form of mercy.

Untouchability is not a divine institution, it is a man-made institution. That God permits evil to exist side by side with good is a mystery which we need not attempt to solve, but which we dare not ignore. Those who believe in God naturally believe also that He presides over our destinies. Even our sorrows turn into joy if we surrender ourselves completely to God.

CHI. UMA,

I suppose I should not expect any letter from you. I have not written to you, but I frequently think about you. I did not at all like your recent behaviour. Nor did I like your letter. You have tried in it to put up a specious defence of your conduct. What have you learnt by accompanying me on my tour for so many months? Will you reflect over it and write to me? During the Congress session, I saw you going from one end to the other. What a dress you were wearing on that day! I can’t describe the pain and anger I felt then. Now keep your promise. Never behave in an unnatural manner. Always let yourself be seen as you are. They are thinking about your betrothal. Express your views frankly on that matter. Be truthful always, truthful in thought and speech. If this is beyond your strength, leave me.

I shall wait for a detailed letter from you written in clear handwriting.

344. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

November 7, 1934

CHI JAMNALAL,

I get your notes. We cannot take it that the ear has been completely cured. Give me more details. It was fortunate that you went there in time.

Don’t let there be any burden of work on your mind. From the point of view of work, I don’t like your staying in Bombay. You must be getting hundreds of visitors. Don’t worry about anything whatsoever.

Don’t think about the Mahila Ashram. I am thinking about the problem. Radhakrishna also is giving all his time to it. I had a discussion with Bhagirathi. I will again discuss the matter with her. There is no fear of the institution breaking down.

I am worrying a little about Om. Don’t take any step without consulting her. A letter to her is enclosed.

Does the meeting of the Gandhi Seva Sangh fixed for the 27th still stand? You may change the date if you wish. If you have to stay there longer and if the doctors permit you to leave the place for a week, you may come here and hold the meeting.

Do you go for walks? Are you careful about diet? If you have the habit of eating between meals, give it up. In digesting such things there is considerable drain on the energy of the brain. Open air and exercise are essential. I hope you are careful about sleep.

Ghani, Khan Saheb’s son, wishes to work in your sugar factory. I don’t want you to pay him anything at present. The idea is merely that he should get some training. If it is possible to give him some experience in a factory, it should be done. Think over this and let me know if this is possible.

347. STATEMENT TO THE PRESS

November 8, 1934

I have seen newspaper paragraphs saying that a Delhi millionaire has placed at my disposal 20 lakhs of rupees for the All-India Village Industries Association which is in the process of formation. A later Press report makes me select Ahmedabad as the headquarters of the All-India Village Industries Association. Both these rumours are absolutely without foundation.

I would like the public to discount news about my movement or intention unless they are authorized by me. What is true is that I have promises of Rs. 2,500 per month, and have already received over Rs. 500 in cash. Whilst the Association will undoubtedly need funds, it needs workers more than funds. The latter will come if the former is assured. I, therefore, invite those who would work for the Association to send in their names.

only those will help who will give some time to the village or who are interested in what may at first sight appear to be uninteresting or unattractive village work. The work will be of four kinds: (1) to encourage and improve the known industries that are likely to perish for want of support; (2) to take charge of and sell the products of those industries; (3) to carry on the survey of such village industries as need to be revived and supported; and (4) to attend to village sanitation and hygiene.

Whist the Association is in the process of formation and the scheme of work is being framed, I would ask fellow-workers to set about encouraging hand-pounding of rice, grinding of wholewheat meal by village chakkis\(^1\) and popularizing gur\(^2\) and study the processes with a view to ensuring the purity of the products.

The workers will collect accurate information about these three things and other village industries that may come under their observation and pass on to me such statistics as they may be able to collect.

---

1. Manually operated grinding-stone
2. Jaggery
I would also like to emphasize the fact that the Association is to be entirely non-political. Its sole object will be the economic, moral and hygienic uplift of the villages of India and it will be open to workers drawn from all parties. The test will be full sympathy with the programme and readiness to help it with money and action wherever possible.

348. LETTER TO DR. B. C. ROY

November 8, 1934

DEAR DR. BIDHAN,

You promised to give me information about certain points I have mentioned. I summarize them below. I would like you to answer them as early as it is possible.

(1) Do you consider that unpolished rice is superior to polished rice from the nutritive standpoint?

(2) If unpolished rice is better than polished rice, is there any difference between unpolished rice turned out from mills and unpolished rice hand-pounded?

(3) Is there any difference in nutritive value between wholewheat meal stone-ground on the indigenous chakki and wholewheat meal ground in the ordinary mills?

(4) Is gur produced in the village *kolus*¹ superior to the sugar manufactured in the sugar mills? And if it is, what are the contents of gur which make it more desirable and nutritious as an article of food than refined sugar manufactured in the sugar mills?

(5) Is oil pressed in the village kolus superior to the oil pressed in the oil mills?

CHI. CHHAGANLAL,

I got your letter. My New Year¹ blessings to both of you and the children.

You should not be impatient. Everything will be all right. Do village [reconstruction] work staying where you are. The work is such that it can be done by everybody anywhere.

350. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

November 8, 1934

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your letter. You should get the money for the dairy from Ambalalbhai.² I will remit the amount. Narahari is here. You must send for the special cot, or buy one, on which Jamna can take sun-bath.

I understand what you say about Harilal.

352. HARIJAN BOARDS

What should be the qualifications of members of Harijan Boards and what should be the number constituting them, are the questions often asked. I endeavoured to answer them fairly exhaustively at the meeting of the U. P. Provincial Board in Benares the other day. It is necessary, however, to revert to the questions from time to time or till such time as one definite policy has been evolved.

If we remember that members of these Boards are servants and not patrons, much less ornaments, most of the difficulties will be automatically solved. There will then be no question of pleasing or displeasing anybody. Only those will be included who are eager to serve the cause and whose presence will promote the usefulness of the Board to which they belong and whose capacity for service will be increased by their being members of a Board.

No one should allow himself or herself to be a member of a Board, unless he or she

(1) believes in the uttermost removal of untouchability,

(2) pays something to the Board according to his or her capacity,

(3) does some definite Harijan service, e.g., having a Harijan in his or her home as a member of the family, or at least as a domestic servant, or is teaching a Harijan or Harijans, or paying a regular visit to Harijan quarters and cleaning them, or, if he or she is a doctor,

On July 29; vide “Speech at central board meeting of Harjan sevak sangh, Benares”, 29-7-1934.
(4) sends to the Board a diary containing a record of his or her service from month to month.

If some such conditions are observed, there need be no restriction on the number of members. The more, the merrier. Such Boards will meet to take notes; exchange experiences and solve mutual difficulties. They will never waste time in fruitless discussions.

There may be Advisory Committees attached to the Boards. These will lay down for themselves some minimum qualifications. Naturally the qualifications of advisers will be less stringent than those of members of regular Boards.

What if members with the qualifications I have described cannot be found is the natural question arising from the bare mention of them. I must repeat the answer I have given often enough before now. The persons invited by the Central Board to form Sanghs in their own provinces will, in the absence of members having the necessary qualifications, perform the service through agents. ‘Act True’ must be the motto of every Harijan Board, and there should never be any departure from the wholesome maxim.

353. MR. SUPPOSED INCONSISTENCY

The Editor has sent the following received by him for answer:

In the _Harijan_ of the 9th March Gandhiji is reported to have said that ‘there was no warrant in the Shastras for untouchability’... [This] does not seem to accord with his previous statement, which was that there is such sanction but he did not accept the authority of such passages because they were immoral.

Will you kindly explain the apparent inconsistency, through the columns of the _Harijan_?

I make no hobgoblin of consistency. If I am true to myself from moment to moment, I do not mind all the inconsistencies that may be flung in my face. But in the letter quoted, there is no inconsistency. If I reject certain texts in the Shastras as interpolations or inconsistent with the fundamental principles they lay down or with universal morality, surely, I am entitled to say that there is no warrant in the Shastras for the practice or belief that the objectionable texts prescribe. I have quoted the opinion of not one but several learned men in support of the contention that the Shastras do not enjoin untouchability as it is practised today. Of course, there is untouchability in the Shastras, but it is all curable in accordance with the simple methods prescribed by them. We all become untouchables every day when we attend to natural functions, and our untouchability is cured by simple ablutions. Indeed, even wicked thoughts make us untouchable, but we are cured by resisting them and purifying ourselves by taking the name of God as Rama or Vasudev or Narayan or Shiva and invoking His never-failing protection. Even so is a Harijan, whose occupation may render him untouchable, cured by prescribed purification. And certain sanatanists claim that there is an incurable untouchability which is handed down from father to son for generations and which will live to the end of Time. And what is the saddest of all is that the sanatanists claim that such untouchables are to be counted by the million. Their warrant for the belief in the existence of several million untouchables is not a Shastra, but census reports, which change from time to time and which are prepared by a host of enumerators who have no knowledge of the Hindu Shastras and, in numerous cases, are not themselves Hindus. It is thus a superstitious belief against which every lover of Hinduism should rise in rebellion.

2 Vide “Speech at women’s meeting, Mangalore”, 24-2-1934.

_Harijan, 9-11-1934_

354. RIGHT OF MINORITY

A sanatanist asks:

As a sanatanist I have a difficulty about temple-entry by Harijans. Supposing among temple-goers of a particular temple there is a majority of 99 to 1 in favour of Harijans entering the temple and the temple is opened. What about the minority of one who has objection to worshipping in a temple visited by Harijans? If reformers have their way, will it not be an undue interference with the right of worship which belongs to the sanatanists from time immemorial?

There may be a public church of the Roman Catholics as well as a public church of Protestants in an English town. Even if the Protestants be in a majority, they would not interfere with the conduct of affairs in the Roman Catholic church. Why, then, should the reformers (even though in the majority) interfere with the conduct of affairs in a public temple belonging to the sanatanists?

I should answer the questions by putting another. If the one solitary sanatanist has the right, as he undoubtedly has, what about the majority? Have they no rights? The parallel quoted does not apply. The questioner has imagined the existence side by side of two churches belonging to different denominations. It would be a monstrous impertinence on the part of Protestants to interfere with the rights of Roman Catholics or vice versa. But suppose all the Protestants but one decided to admit to their temple persons whom they had excommunicated for ages. Surely, they would have every right to lift the ban. Here there would be no question of changing one’s religion, as there is in the case imagined by the questioner. In the temple-entry movement, reformers do not seek to alter their faith. If they did, in theory at least, not even a unanimous decision of temple-goers of a temple should entitle them to use a temple for purposes never intended by the founders. Here the reformers claim that the faith they profess in common with the sanatanists permits the use of their temples by fellow-Hindus, the Harijans. It is, therefore, a question of interpretation, and in such matters, the opinion of a majority must prevail. If it did not, it would amount to the coercion of a majority by a minority, and there would be an end to all progress. Indeed, the doctrine the questioner propounds would mean decay and death to a society that subscribes to it. It should be remembered that the minority is free to build a temple for itself. And so far as I am concerned, I have given my opinion that even a minority of one should have its prejudices so far respected that a special hour may be set apart so as to enable it to offer worship free from the intrusion, whether of reformers or of Harijans.

November 9, 1934

MY DEAR DRAVID,

I was delighted to receive your letter and the cutting. Do by all means come whenever it is convenient for you and pass a half-hour with me.

I am certainly full of plans for village reconstruction which I shall unfold to you far more easily in the course of a conversation than by writing a long letter. You know that when I was in Champaran and when I had the late Dr. Dev with me, I worked in several villages. At that time, the idea was to attend to the schooling of children and adults and to sanitation and hygiene of the villagers. Since then I have added a great deal to my knowledge of the village life. You will see the Press note that I have sent yesterday. It will show you the direction in which my mind is working.

MY DEAR RAM DASS,

I was wondering how you were doing when I got your postcard today. Khan Saheb is a very correct worker. He never allows grass to grow under his feet and therefore he has been sending your statements all over for investigation. Here is a letter received by him in reply to a letter of his. You will please return that letter with your answer.

If there is something still left in you which is chronic will you be able to keep well in these parts? You should remember that you were to go to Savli to be trained for khadi work. I do not want you to collapse again, for each collapse will leave you weaker than before.

361. LETTER TO S. GANESAN

November 9, 1934

MY DEAR GANESAN,

With reference to the bill you sent to Thakkar Bapa for Rs. 84-12-0, I have discussed the matter with him and I have suggested that the bill should remain in abeyance. At the present moment we have a bill left. When the time comes for our reviewing the situation, if the life of the Harijan has to be prolonged and if the discharge of the Rs. 84-12-0 bill is of any material help to us in keeping that alive, we can take the amount of the bill from them. Otherwise the money should be written off as if the printing of the Supplement was done in the usual course. I know that I held a different view at one time; but I am overborne by the consideration that so long as we can make the two ends meet, even including this bill, we should not fall back upon the central fund. After all we are drawing upon that fund for a part of Sastri’s emolument.

You have asked for a return of Thakkar Bapa’s letters to you. Here they are.

I was incidentally discussing your general affairs with him and I can give you this assurance that he has no irritation against you. What he feels is that you overrate your ability to do things and that you are generous at the expense of your trust. As for instance, he related to me the story of outdoor boys whom you are training and for whom you are providing afternoon refreshments although it is no part of your job to do so and although the boys who come are not so poor as not to afford one or two pice for refreshments. This story was told him by one who is in sympathy with you and your work and who appreciates your self-sacrifice. Thakkar Bapa did not mention this with any sense of injustice; but he simply gave an instance of your generous nature. Generosity is a virtue when we exercise it at our own expense; it is a vice when we exercise it at the expense of the trust that might have been given to us. A trustee has to take the role of a miser in regard to his trust.

362. LETTER TO KANTI GANDHI

November 9, 1934

CHI. KANTI,

I got your letter. May the New Year prove fruitful for your body, mind and soul.

Four hundred rounds is certainly not the average speed of spinning on the takli. Bhau and others have reached that figure and are trying to go still farther. Two hundred rounds has become the average speed. One hundred and sixty should be reckoned as the minimum.

Harilal’s reformation so far seems to be permanent. Narandas seems to be satisfied.

Do continue milk and ghee.

My health has become excellent now. These days I take only unboiled milk, fruit and uncooked vegetables, the last not more than one ounce. They include cucumber, radishes, luní leaves, tomatoes, etc. My weight was taken only today and it was found to be 107_ lb. This is very good improvement indeed.

Ramdas and Ba are expected to return tomorrow. Kishorelal and Gomati arrived yesterday. Other arrivals and departures continue, as usual.

Have you received the money now?
Have you heard that Kanu is here and that Prithuraj is starting business? Jivandas also has started business.

364. INTERVIEW TO NIRMAL KUMAR BOSE

November 9/10, 1934

QUESTION . . . Should khadi be merely a sort of humanitarian work or should we use it chiefly as an instrument of political education? Our experience has been that unless the ultimate objective is kept clearly in mind, it degenerates easily into a work of no significance.

ANSWER: The two issues of khadi and political organization should be kept absolutely separate. There must be no confusion. The aim of khadi is humanitarian; but so far as India is concerned, its effect is bound to be immensely political. The Salvation Army wants to teach people about God. But they come with bread. For the poor bread is their God. Similarly we should bring food into the mouths of the people through khadi. If we succeed in breaking the idleness of the people through khadi, they will begin to listen to us. Whatever else the Government might do, it does leave some food for the villagers. Unless we can bring food to them, why should the people listen to us? When we have taught them what they can do through their own efforts, then they will want to listen to us.

That trust can best be generated through khadi. While working out the khadi programme our aim should be purely humanitarian, that is, economic. We should leave out all political considerations whatsoever. But it is bound to produce important political consequences which nobody can prevent and nobody need deplore.

Q. Could we not start small battles on local and specific issues against capitalism in the villages and use them as a means of strengthening the people or bringing about a sense of co-operation among them, in preference to the khadi method? When we have a choice between the two, which should we prefer? If we have to sacrifice all the work that we have built up in the villages in connection with khadi while fighting against the moneylender or the landed proprietor, for, say, a reduction in the rate of interest or increase in the share of agricultural produce, then what shall we do—provided the latter is more liable to evoke self-confidence among the villagers than the khadi method of organization?

A. It is a big proviso you have added at the end of the question. I cannot say if fights on local and specific issues against capitalists are more likely to generate the kind of determination and courage needed in a non-violent campaign. But if I concede you that point, then khadi

1 According to the source, Nirmal Kumar Bose met Gandhiji on November 9 and 10. The report was published after correction by Gandhiji.

2 Ibid.
would have to be sacrificed under the circumstances you quote. As a practical man, claiming to be an expert in non-violent methods, I should advise you not to go in for that type of work in order to train the masses in self-consciousness and attainment of power.

We are fighting for swaraj in the non-violent way. If many workers in different parts of India engage in local battles of the sort you describe, then, in times of necessity, people all over India will not be able to make a common cause in a fight for swaraj. Before civil disobedience can be practised on a vast scale, people must learn the art of civil or voluntary obedience. Our obedience to the Government is through fear; and the reaction against it is either violence itself or that species of it, which is cowardice. But through khadi we teach people the art of civil obedience to an institution which they have built up for themselves. Only when they have learnt that art can they successfully disobey something which they want to destroy in the non-violent way. This is why I should advise all workers not to fritter their fighting strength in many-sided battles, but to concentrate on peaceful khadi work in order to educate the masses into a condition necessary for a successful practice of non-violent non-co-operation. With their own exploitation, boycott of foreign cloth through picketing may easily be violent; through the use of khadi it is most natural and absolutely non-violent.

Q. Is love or non-violence compatible with possession or exploitation in any shape or form? If possession and non-violence cannot go together, then do you advocate the maintenance of private ownership of land or factories at an unavoidable evil which will continue so long as individuals are not ripe or educated enough to do without it? If it be such a step, would it not be better to own all the land through the State and place the State under the control of the masses?

A. Love and exclusive possession can never go together. Theoretically when there is perfect love, there must be perfect non-possessing. The body is our last possession. So a man can only exercise perfect love and be completely dispossessed, if he is prepared to embrace death and renounce his body for the sake of human service.

But that is true in theory only. In actual life, we can hardly exercise perfect love, for the body as a possession will always remain with us. Man will ever remain imperfect, and it will always be his part to try to be perfect. So that perfection in love or non-possessing will remain an unattainable ideal, as long as we are alive, but towards which we must ceaselessly strive.
Those who own money now are asked to behave like trustees holding their riches on behalf of the poor. You may say that trusteeship is a legal fiction. But if people meditate over it constantly and try to act up to it, then life on earth would be governed far more by love than it is at present. Absolute trusteeship is an abstraction like Euclid’s definition of a point, and is equally unattainable. But if we strive for it, we shall be able to go further in realizing a state of equality on earth than by any other method.

Q. If you say that private possession is incompatible with non-violence, why do you put up with it?
A. That is a concession one has to make to those who earn money but who would not voluntarily use their earnings for the benefit of mankind.

Q. Why then not have State-ownership in place of private property and thus minimize violence?
A. It is better than private ownership. But that too is objectionable on the ground of violence. It is my firm conviction that if the State suppressed capitalism by violence, it will be caught in the coils of violence itself, and will fail to develop nonviolence at any time. The State represents violence in a concentrated and organized form. The individual has a soul, but as the State is a soulless machine, it can never be weaned from violence to which it owes its very existence. Hence I prefer the doctrine of trusteeship.

Q. Let us come to a specific instance. Supposing an artist leaves certain pictures to a son who does not appreciate their value for the nation and sells them or wastes them, so that the nation stands to lose something precious through one person’s folly. If you are assured that the son would never be a trustee in the sense in which you would like him to be, do you not think the State would be justified in taking away those things from him with the minimum use of violence?
A. Yes, the State will, as a matter of fact, take away those things, and I believe it will be justified if it uses the minimum of violence. But the fear is always there that the State may use too much violence against those who differ from it. I would be very happy indeed if the people concerned behaved as trustees; but if they fail, I believe we shall have to deprive them of their possessions through the State with the minimum exercise of violence. That is why I said¹ at the Round Table Conference that every vested interest must be subjected to scrutiny, and confiscation ordered where necessary with or without compensation as the case demanded.

¹ Vide “Extract from proceedings of the federal structure committee meeting”, 19-11-1931.
What I would personally prefer would be not a centralization of power in the hands of the State, but an extension of the sense of trusteeship; as in my opinion the violence of private ownership is less injurious than the violence of the State. However, if it is unavoidable, I would support a minimum of State-ownership.

Q. Then, sir, shall we take it that the fundamental difference between you and the Socialists is that you believe that men live more by self-direction or will than by habit, and they believe that men live more by habit than by will; that being the reason why do you strive for self-correction while they try to build up a system under which men will find it impossible to exercise their desire for exploiting others?

A. While admitting that man actually lives by habit, I hold that it is better for him to live by the exercise of will. I also believe that men are capable of developing their will to an extent that will reduce exploitation to a minimum. I look upon an increase of the power of the State with the greatest fear, because although while apparently doing good by minimizing exploitation, it does the greatest harm to mankind by destroying individuality, which lies at the root of all progress. We know of so many cases where men have adopted trusteeship, but none where the State has really lived for the poor.

Q. But have not those cases of trusteeship which you sometimes cite been due to your personal influence rather than to anything else? Teachers like you come infrequently. Would it not be better, therefore, to trust to some organization to effect the necessary changes in man, rather than depend upon the casual advent of men like yourself?

A. Leaving me aside, you must remember that the influence of all great teachers of mankind has outlived their lives. In the teachings of each prophet like Mohammed, Buddha or Jesus, there was a permanent portion and there was another which was suited to the needs and requirements of the times. It is only because we try to keep up the permanent with the impermanent aspects of their teachings that there is so much distortion in religious practice today. But that apart, you can see that the influence of these men has sustained us after they have passed away. Moreover, what I disapprove of is an organization based on force which a State is. Voluntary organization there must be.

Q. What then, sir, is your ideal social order?

A. I believe that every man is born in the world with certain natural tendencies. Every person is born with certain definite limitations which he cannot overcome. From a careful observation of those limitations the law of varna was deduced. It establishes certain spheres of action of certain people with certain tendencies. This avoided all unworthy competition. Whilst, recognizing limitations, the law of ‘varna’ admitted of no distinctions of high and low, on the one hand it guaranteed to each the fruits of his labours and on the other it prevented him from pressing upon his neighbour.

This great law has been degraded and [has] fallen into disrepute. But my conviction is that an ideal social order will only be evolved when the implications of this law are fully understood and given effect to.

Q. Do you not think that in ancient India there was much difference in economic status and social privileges between the four varnas?

A. That may be historically true. But misapplication or an imperfect understanding of the law must not lead to the ignoring of the law itself. By constant striving we have to enrich the inheritance left to us. This law determines the duties of man. Rights follow from a due performance of duties. It is the fashion nowadays to ignore duties and assert or rather usurp rights.

Q. If you are so keen upon reviving varnashrama, why do you not favour violence as the quickest means?

A. Surely the question does not arise. Definition and performance of duties rule out violence altogether. Violence becomes imperative when an attempt is made to assert rights without reference to duties.

Q. Should we not confine our pursuit of Truth to ourselves and not press it upon the world because we know that it is ultimately limited in character?

A. You cannot so circumscribe truth even if you try. Every expression of truth has in it the seeds of propagation, even as the sun cannot hide its light.¹

365. LETTER TO AMRITA LAL CHATTERJEE²

DEAR FRIEND,

Gita and other scriptures you quote undoubtedly discountenance ignorant crucifixion of the body. But all insist upon selfrestraint and sacrifice. These necessarily include fasting undertaken with deliberation and discretion.

With reference to your second letter, you have to refer to the Secretary of the Working Committee of the Congress for an authentic opinion. In my opinion, the difficulty that you have to face is common to all. But I do not understand your difficulty at all. The primary members are not required to be habitual wearers of khaddar, but primary members who want to be elected as members of Committee have to be habitual wearers of khaddar. If they want to qualify, they can begin to wear khaddar as a habit, and in six months’ time they will be fully qualified candidates.

366. LETTER TO SURESH CHANDRA BANERJI

November 10, 1934

MY DEAR SURESH,

I have your letter. I do wish you to get on well. I have sent you messages through Prafulla. One thing I want to emphasize. Just as a prisoner has no right to think of the world outside the prison walls, much less to form any opinion about what he may hear of events taking place outside his little universe of the jail, so also should a sick person lying on his bed cease to apply his mind to problems of the world outside the sick room. He is no longer taking an active part in those events; he honestly becomes unfit to give a correct judgment. This is also the ideal put before the sannyasi. Immediately a man takes sannyasa he is supposed to cut himself off from the day-to-day activities of the world. If these very simple obvious facts of life were borne in mind we should be spared so much misery, misunderstanding and so many errors; and prisoners, sick people and sannyasis would lead peaceful lives and do justice to their respective stations. If you are not in pain, I would like you to do one thing: that is, to write out the medical chapters for Satisbabu’s book. I want a good guide for village workers. The conception is to produce a book after Moore’s Family Medicine or Everybody His Own Doctor.

CHI. ANASUYABEHN,

I have your sweet letter. How can it be acknowledged or answered? It is just by chance that this letter is going by the Mussoorie post. I am aware of your faith. My blessings to all the children.

370. LETTER TO SARALADEVI SARABHAI

WARDHA,
November 10, 1934

DEAR SISTER,

Mridu gave me news of you. You are not still fully cured. Gaurishankar had been trying nature cure. Did it not bring you any result? From my observation I am convinced more and more each day that it is worth giving it a trial. It is an unexplored area. It is a new field, but in the right direction. No matter by what means, I wish to see you enjoying good health.

371. LETTER TO G. S. NARASIMHACHARI

November 11, 1934

DEAR NARASIMHACHARI,

I have your letter. I have no intention of touring in connection with the All-India Village Industries Association just being formed. You will glean from the papers what I am doing. By this time you should know that I have ceased to be even a primary member of the Congress.
I never knew that there was a movement in Andhradesh against Hindi prachar. But I would myself resist any attempt to displace the rich vernaculars of the different provinces. Hindi is not intended to take their place, but it is intended to supplement them as a medium of inter-provincial intercourse. Therefore, Hindi propaganda should not only not interfere with the progress of vernaculars, but it must enrich them.

Yours sincerely,

372. LETTER TO SAM HIGGINBOTTOM

November 11, 1934

DEAR FRIEND,

I do appreciate your letter of the 8th instant just received. Do please send me all your suggestions. You would have seen the brief statement I had issued. Nevertheless I send you a copy for ready reference. It represents an outline of my mind’s working. I do not propose to tour in connection with the work, at least not at the present moment. I am holding informal discussions with friends interested in the project, and I have Prof. Kumarappa with me just now. I would love to meet you in the course of the month after a preliminary exchange of views by correspondence. That will enable us to save our time at the time of discussion.

I am sure you realize one fundamental fact. What applies to America and England does not necessarily apply to India. India has in her teeming millions so many superfluous days that she does not need to free the energy of her sons for superior or more remunerative work through highly developed machinery. In her 350 million children she has so many living ready-made machines, and if she can utilize their labour, half of which is running to waste, the double starvation of the body and the mind will cease. That is the problem that faced me when I returned to India in 1915, and has haunted me ever since.

Yours sincerely,

MY DEAR JAIRAMDAS,

What about the Nagar ashram? Thakkar Bapa wants me to produce over Rs. 1,000/- for it as I did before. He has a right to do so. But I am trying to discover a way out. Have you any suggestion? And about the future? Bapa wants me to approach Sheth Shivratan. Will you guide me?

374. LETTER TO MANILAL AND SUSHILA GANDHI

November 11, 1934

CHI. MANILAL AND SUSHILA,

I get your letters regularly. So it seems we shouldn’t expect a permit for Ramdas after all. He does want to get all right without having to go there. All the same if you can secure a permit do send it. If you cannot, tell me so plainly. We don’t want it if you have to flatter anybody to get it. We want it only if you can get it in a straight manner. Ramdas and Ba arrived yesterday. Ramdas has returned a mere skeleton. He will be under my treatment now. I am hopeful that he will be all right.

I understand about the Agent. Do what you think right. I told you what I felt, but finally the pen is in your hands. I would certainly not sit in judgment over you from this distance. I don’t wish to teach you to act unnaturally. Do only that which finds an echo in your heart. If you make a mistake, you will correct it afterwards. Listen to everybody and think over what they say, but in the end do just what seems right to you.

Mirabehn will be returning at the end of this month. She seems to have done excellent work.

Devdas, Lakshmi and Nimu are very well. Narandas’s Kanu is with me. Prithuraj has started business. Kishorelal is here. Jamnalalji’s ear still gives him trouble and he is, therefore, in Bombay.

Blessings from BAPU

You must have read everything about me in the papers. Hence I don’t write anything here. I felt sorry on reading about Omar Sheth.

375. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

November 11, 1934

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I got your letter. The ear is . . . ¹. No complaint should remain now.

Visitors must be stopped. You must not tax and tire your brain. If necessary, you should take a vow of silence for that purpose. You may talk only about matters connected with the doctor, or with attendants about your needs. Unless you do something of this sort, it will be difficult for you to remain quiet in Bombay. And treatment is possible only there. I hope you will not forget this fact. . . . Madalasa is all right.

I will explain everything to Ghani before sending him. I had showed your letter to Khan Saheb. He agrees with your view. He will not, therefore, blame you if Ghani fails. I have taken . . . after discussing it with Ghani. . . . He need not be paid just now.

Mirabehn is arriving on the 21st in an Italian steamer. She will arrive here on the 22nd. Khan Saheb’s daughter will be accompanying her. Ramdas and Ba are staying in the building

376. LETTER TO RAJENDRA PRASAD

November 11, 1934

Bhai Rajendra Prasad,

I have your letter but not the copy of the one you addressed to Dr. Roy.

I do not feel like expressing an opinion but to withhold it too does not now seem right. In my opinion no action should be taken for the present. Let there be fresh elections to the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee. After they are over we may see what we can do. If the decision already taken is just and fair, making changes simply on account of the agitation in Bengal does not seem right. But then please do whatever you think right. In that case, my opinion need not be given any weight.

I do not feel I am obliged to make any alteration in what has been submitted in respect of Suresh.

Get back your health and come here soon.

377. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

[Before November 12, 1934]¹

Bhai Ghanshyamdas,

Your two letters are lying in front of me. Regarding rice I have myself observed that only polished rice is available here. A rice-mill owner himself informed me that people preferred polished rice. Anyway enquire in Calcutta and let me know. You say that from the economic point of view our vote ought to be cast in favour of mortar and pestle. But how? It only means, doesn’t it, that the villager will save some money? Tell me if it implies anything more.

Write to me after considering the cases of sugar and jaggery from both the viewpoints. What interest will you take in this new institution² and have you thought of offering it any aid? Would you in that case make some possible changes in your life? You must be aware of Rameshwardas’s decision in this regard. How is Gajanan?

What about your operation? You must decide one way or the other.

378. LETTER TO MOTILAL ROY

November 12, 1934

Dear Motibabu,

I have your long letter and the enclosures. About the letter from All-India Spinners’ Association I need say nothing as I expect to hear from you again. With reference to the letter from Saratbabu, I have always held the opinion that there is no contradiction between real beauty and truth. Therefore, truth is always beautiful.

¹ The addressee received this letter on November 12, 1934.
² All-India Village Industries Association
Truth, therefore, in my opinion, is the whole of art. Art divorced from truth is no art, and beauty divorced from truth is utter ugliness. That in this world many ugly things pass for beauty is too true. That happens because we do not always appreciate truth.

I hope you are keeping well. You will follow the fortunes of the All-India Village Industries Association and take what part you can in it. Please pass on all the suggestions you like.

381. LETTER TO H. L. SHARMA

November 12, 1934

CHI. SHARMA.

I could understand what you say in your letter. It is written in a plain straightforward manner but it is full of your ignorance. If you go to England you must acquire a degree and it takes a minimum of seven years to attain a genuine degree and in no case less than five years. And all that you will get will be what you could have achieved here itself. You have made a grave allegation against British-educated as well as Indian-educated doctors. At present there are doctors of both the types who perform the work of a Bhangi and feel no shame in that. Rupees 3,000 is not enough these days for seven years. You should have at least Rs. 30,000. And Rs. 60,000 if you take Draupadi along with you. This is the minimum sum needed for seven years. In spite of my simple living it cost me Rs. 13,000 for three years. And the cost of living has now doubled. But the consideration of money may be looked upon as secondary. I am strongly opposed to the very idea of going to England. Going to England might be proper only after one has acquired a basic knowledge of one’s subject. I have no doubt that the basic knowledge can be easily acquired in India itself. The notion of going to England is simply mistaken and must be put an end to. If you think that you are not in error you may rebel against me and go in dependently without my blessings. You have the right to rebel as did Prahlad. A revolt is proved right only by its success. I too had defied my brother, who was like a father to me, for thirteen years. It was successful because it proved to be morally correct. You too may take recourse to defiance if you so wish.

1 Omission as in the source. Clarifying this letter Pyarelal wrote another letter to the addressee the same day which read: “Bapuji has written to you today in connection with Prabhavati. What he meant to say was that if Jayaprakash wanted to call over Prabhavati to Bombay and if you agreed she could leave for Bombay with Vinobaji’s permission after hearing from you. But this was not so in the case of going to Ahmednagar. If his letter conveys a different meaning it needs to be corrected. His intention is exactly what I have written to you.”

2 The printed source, however, has “12-12-34”.

If you would listen to me do as I say. Stay on here for the time being. Study anatomy and physiology. I can get the doctor here to help you. Do whatever work I may assign to you. You may if you wish send for Draupadi. I can arrange for some accommodation. I too don’t like Draupadi’s absence from your side. You may take it that your knowledge of physiology is very imperfect, almost nil. The love of study needed for this, I find, is lacking in you. Tell me if I am mistaken.

If you do not like my proximity you may live at a place of your own choosing and be content with correspondence. But if it comes to that I will take it to mean lack of forbearance in you. I know those who cannot live with me. You are not one of those nor should you ever be.

Ask me if all this is not clear. Try to understand it well.

I return your letter so that you may not have to prepare a copy.

“The construction of the machine should be substantial and capable of being used, say, 20 years, with occasional replacement of
