MY DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

I have your several letters. As to the second edition of Holloway’s, we must give up the idea for the time being.

As to the second Harijan day, can you tell me how much was collected on the previous Harijan day?

It is most vexing that the Hindi Harijan is taking all this time. I wonder if I sent you or Ghanshyamdas an offer from Delhi from a man to take over his weekly which he is now publishing—lat;- It might be worth while seeing him. According to his statement, Indra knows him.

The English edition would be out on Saturday. We are bringing out 10,000 copies of the first issue. It will be stopped if it does not become self-supporting, and it cannot but be self-supporting if all the Provincial Boards subscribe to a certain number of copies. They must need them for their workers if they are efficiently working organizations. Every such organization has to have a common organ. This applies to you also. So you will please telegraph to me how many copies you will want and you have to pay in advance for the copies you may need. You may send for the minimum number, so that at your end too there may be no waste. Some copies no doubt you will have to distribute free.

I would like you also to send Patwardhan a cheque or draft for Rs. 500. I had Rs. 544-6-0 with me which I wanted to transfer to you, but now I am paying that amount to Patwardhan. It would be regarded as a loan as from you to the paper, and as soon as subscriptions arrive, the loan will be refunded, unless there is a loss from the very commencement. Thus, you will credit me with Rs. 544-6-0 as having been received from me for untouchability work and debit Harijan with Rs. 544-6-0 in addition to the Rs. 500 I have asked you to send from there. Patwardhan cannot possibly need more than Rs. 1000 to go on with. Before he begins to receive subscriptions, moneys have to be disbursed for stamps, wages and paper.

If there is any news to impart for publication in Harijan you should send a telegram to Shastri; as a matter of fact, if you are receiving reports from all the Boards, you should be able to send Shastri a press telegram every week.

Yours sincerely,

BAPU

302. LETTER TO BHAGWANDAS

February 7, 1933

DEAR BABOO BHAGWANDAS,

A professor of Arabic has written to me asking for assistance in the work that he has undertaken of translating Manusmriti into Arabic. He does not know Sanskrit himself. Therefore he has to rely upon English translations. I have, however, warned him against taking the printed text going under the name of Manusmriti as the reality. When I read this book, whilst I was stirred by many verses of moral beauty, I was repelled by several verses which seemed to be so wholly contrary to the spirit of the moral teaching. I have therefore always held that the printed text is not the work of the same author nor written at the same time and that there have been many interpolations after the original verses were written. I have no authority for this statement save my own instinct. You have however made a deep study of this book and perhaps a comparative study of all the Smritis. If you have come to any decision and written something on it, I would like to have your opinion, or, if you know any person who has held the view that I hold of the Smriti or how he has reconciled the contradictory verses, I would like you to enlighten me. I am just now hard pressed owing to Harijan work falling on my shoulders. I wanted to write separately to Principal Dhruva on this matter, but I must give up that ambition and ask you to kindly pass this letter on to him so that he can let me have his own views also. I have warned Professor Haqqi against translating the printed text without examining the question from the standpoint suggested by me. But I cannot help him if he wants to be guided along the lines suggested by me unless I have some authoritative guidance myself. My instinct is good enough for my consolation but it can be no guide for others if I cannot support it with external convincing evidence.

1 The addressee had requested Gandhiji to send his blessings for the success of a Harijan candidate in a bye-election for the membership of the Bihar and Orissa Legislative Council.

Yours sincerely

303. LETTER TO N. R. KSHIRSAGAR

February 7, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter.¹ I understand what you say. If Harijans were not Hindus, samskara² would be necessary. None is necessary for Hindus before they can enter temples. Of course they have to observe the laws of ceremonial cleanliness and the rest.

Yours sincerely,

MY DEAR HARIBHAU PHATAK.

I have your letter. I am sorry that Mr. Mate should think that I betrayed any impatience or anger in carrying on the argument with him the other day. If there was any such betrayed, I must apologize to him. It was certainly not intended. He can come and discuss the whole thing with me. I promise to observe complete silence and listen to him whilst he is speaking. After all, my business is to deliver my message and convert those who think differently from me. I have no desire whatsoever to impose my views on anybody, and I cannot convert anybody by being impatient or angry. He may bring any friend he likes. Let there be a previous appointment made so as to avoid disappointment. Now that I have to attend to Harijan I must not give any appointments for Wednesdays and Thursdays. Fridays and Saturdays would be quite good.

As to the subject-matter of your letter Mr. Mate is quite wrong in thinking that any but Hindu voters will have the right of voting under the Temple-entry Bill, and I can show quite clearly that there is absolutely no question whatsoever of compulsion. Nor is there the slightest desire to see the Bill passed if the Hindu Members do not want it. The first Bill has no reference even to temples. It is the most innocent that can possibly be conceived. It simply takes untouchability out of the penal law of the land. Surely, it was wrong when the courts were first called upon to give a legal status to untouchability. I should very much like to know in what respect either Bill constitutes an interference with anybody’s liberty.

I am sorry to hear about Yashoda Bai. I shall certainly write to her.

With reference to the charkhas as you know, Kanitkar was manufacturing the very thing in Poona. His boy knows the thing. I had suggested slight improvements in the pattern that was brought to me. To have them from Bardoli would mean probably four annas railage, if not more, for each charkha, when the whole thing is capable of being made locally and cheaply. But if they must be had from Bardoli, I can easily get them.

Please thank the makers of the oils of the two bottles. I have still a lot of Narayan Thaila¹. I would plead with them not to send any more till I ask for it, and I undertake to ask for it when I have exhausted the stock so kindly sent by them.

Yours sincerely,

305. LETTER TO C. RAJAGOPALACHARI

February 7, 1933

MY DEAR C. R.,

I am sure you are doing good work there.

I do not at all like Ranga Iyer’s statements in reply to Jagadguru’s telegram. He there says, in spite of the Guruvayur referendum result, that Malabar Hindus are against temple-entry and gives a certificate to sanatanists for earnestness of purpose, conservatism and what not, and makes me out to be a fair approach to Buddha. If all the three statements were correct, one could have nothing to say against them, however embarrassing they may be. But they are all the three wrong. Apart from the Guruvayur referendum, nobody knows the opinion of Malabar Hindus. Your own evidence of Travancore is against Ranga Iyer’s opinion. The sanatanists cannot deserve a good certificate if they can produce no one who will at all listen to reason and understand the viewpoint of the reformer. They exaggerate the reformers’ claim out of all proportion, and then to describe me as Buddha is to damn the cause in advance, for orthodoxy believes Buddha to have been an atheist denying the authority of the Vedas, varnashrama and everything. They take pride in the fact that Shankar arose to drive out Buddhism and they will naturally want to drive me out if I am anything like the Buddha of their imagination. The latest statement of Ranga Iyer therefore increases my fear of advocacy.

I hope Devdas had my letter awaiting him when he reached Delhi. That letter anticipated his letter just received. I am too full of Harijan work just now to give you more or write to him separately.

Yours sincerely,

306. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS

February 7, 1933

Requested to explain further his statement of 14th January\(^1\) in view of interpretations in the Assembly yesterday, Gandhiji declared to the Associated Press:

The written words stand. I must not add to what I have already said in my statement.

Gandhiji’s attention was drawn to different interpretations put on this statement, and particularly to the reference made by Sir Harry Haig in this connection to the meaning attributed to his statement by the Bombay Congress Bulletin. Gandhiji replied:

I cannot help people putting all sorts of interpretation to my writings. It is not a new experience to me. My statement is quite explicit. You can surely find the correct meaning. I have certainly not intended the statement to be equivocal, but it should be read as one whole. You can read many meanings out of sentences detached from their context.

Always alive to the limitations to his freedom of speech, Gandhiji declined to answer more pointed questions in this connection, saying:

You are treading on slippery ground.

Replying to another question regarding the charge of inconsistency levelled against him, in so far as he, a non-co-operator, had sought the aid of the Government and the legislature in connection with temple-entry, Gandhiji said he could not answer the question without entering into the region of politics, which he could not do. He proceeded:

I must therefore take the risk of damage to my reputation. But I prize my honour above reputation, and if that remains safe, then reputation will take care of itself.

The Hindu, 8-2-1933

\(^1\) Drafted on January 7; vide “Statement to the Press”, 7-1-1933
Commenting on the letter of Jagadguru Shankaracharya of Puri to Mr. Ranga Iyer and the latter’s reply thereto, Gandhiji said in an interview to the Associated Press:

I am really sorry that the Jagadguru should have written that letter about the Bills. I venture to think that the Bills do not, in any shape or form, interfere with religious liberty. On the contrary, both the Bills jealously guard it. Nor is the analogy used by the Jagadguru correct. There is no technical question involved in the Bills requiring technical knowledge. It is always open to worshippers to determine what company they would take with them for prayer. You may call that even a change of religion if you like. But you cannot deprive the people of that right.

What is there to prevent cent per cent of the worshippers in a temple admitting whomever they choose, even though such admission may be against the Agama governing that particular temple? There is no religious interference involved in restoring to the people a right that should never have been taken away from them. And if it is admitted that cent per cent of the worshippers can, if they choose, alter the rules of admission into a temple, then it should easily be conceded that a sufficient majority should have the right of determining the question of admission so long as they do not interfere with the liberty of the minority to perform worship in isolation from the majority.

Surely, it is a serious thing for a responsible person like the Jagadguru to label reformers, who claim to be followers of the same faith and believe in the same Shastras, as renegades from sanatana dharma. It also passes my comprehension how the passage of the Bills can be considered an unconstitutional procedure.

If the Jagadguru’s letter is thus open to objection, I am afraid Mr. Ranga Iyer’s reply also needs some corrections. I am not so sure as he is, that Malabar Hindu opinion is against the Bill, and so against the temple-entry of Harijans. The results of the Guruvayur referendum may be regarded as an indication to the contrary. Eyewitnesses who have been in Malabar have also told me that popular opinion is by no means against temple-entry. But that is a matter which can be determined anywhere if both the parties agree to have an unofficial referendum under joint supervision.

Then, Mr. Ranga Iyer, in his enthusiasm and blind affection for me, has been betrayed into an unfortunate analogy. I do not consider myself in any way fit to be compared with the Buddha. I regard myself as a very common man—a poor worker, liable to all the errors mankind is prone to make. I am merely a humble truth-seeker. But the analogy is unfortunate for another reason also. Sanatanists would say that the Buddha was an atheist, and that he did not accept the authority of the Vedas and did not believe in their divinity—not that as a matter of fact he was an atheist or did not believe in the Vedas. But, what he really was, is not pertinent to our point. Therefore, if I am also considered an atheist or non-believer in the divinity of the Vedas, I am certainly out of court, as a reformer asking Hindus to reject modern untouchability as being wholly against Hindu Shastras regarded as a whole.

309. LETTER TO R. D. ATHAVALE

YERAVDA CENTRAL PRISON,
February 8, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

Sjt. V. Joshi of Sangli was here the other day to discuss matters about untouchability, and he reminded me that when I was in Sangli a part of the collections made there amounting to over Rs. 850/- was left with you. He told me too that the amount had accumulated with you together with interest and that you would not part with the amount except under my authority. As I did not remember much about the collection and as Sjt. Gangadharrao Deshpande was entrusted with the collections, I referred the matter to him, and he tells me that he has recollection of this particular collection.

Will you kindly now send the amount with interest to me, or, if it suits you better, hand it over on my behalf to Mr. Abhyankar to whom I am writing by the same post that will take this letter?

Yours sincerely,

310. LETTER TO MATHURADAS JAIN

February 8, 1933

MY DEAR MATHURADAS,

I was glad at last to hear from you. If I was to stop your fast I had to use strong and precise language. As you had taken the fast in connection with something I had done or not done, I had to assume authority and also presume that I knew you sufficiently to send you a peremptory telegram. Now that you claim to have known me through my writings and doings, evidently the authoritative tone I adopted in my wire was quite justified. You must remember that I was acting like a responsible physician to his patient and I am glad that you promptly responded by breaking your fast. I am quite sure even after receiving

312. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

[February 9, 1933]

CHI. MIRA,

Your weekly letter came in, in due course. And just two days before that was given to me your special letter describing your condition. Whereupon I sent a letter to the Government requesting your transfer to Yeravda and also an examination by specialists. I have done what I thought was my duty to do from every point of view. No prisoner has a right to demand transfer. He has to submit to the condition in which he is placed except under extraordinary circumstances. When I think of the prison life of Howard’s days and

4 John Howard (1726-90), prison reformer
I look at today’s, I marvel at the betterment in the condition. And yet to prisoners who find themselves in for conscience’s sake, there should be no difference whatsoever between that life and this. They must be prepared cheerfully to submit to the life of Howard’s days. For to them conscience is dearer than the ease of body and the pleasure of communion through physical means with the nearest and dearest ones. There should be therefore on the one hand every honest and permissible attempt to keep the body in good condition and to obtain the other amenities, on the other to receive disappointment with perfect detachment. You should continue to report the whole of your condition to the Civil Surgeon and give him the history of your previous glands. I wish you had written about them before to me. Anyway now the matter is in the Government’s hands and more in God’s hands. ‘Not a blade moves but by His will.’

The passage you quote from the Gita refers to moderate habits. That is not what I had in mind. The passage I had in mind occurs in the last chapter, 52nd verse. I should translate it thus. “Who prefers solitude, who eats meagre food, who has under perfect control thought, speech and action, who is intent on meditation, who is free always from attachments.”

You have no reason to complain of the quantity of your food. You dare not go by the abstract measurement. Double your quantity would be really meagre for many of our friends. The condition of your own body should be the sole guide as to the quantity without reference to that taken by others. All we should recognize is that voluntary meagre eating is one of the most difficult things in the world. It is a perpetual fast much more difficult than the complete periodic fasts. Meagre food voluntarily taken must lead to perfect poise, i.e., perfect health of body and mind. We can but make the attempt.

My food and weight remain what I described them to be last week. The elbow continues as before. I do not think any more about it. I thought I told you that I had resumed spinning. I did it, I think, Tuesday last week. I do it whilst I am receiving visitors. I have fixed no minimum. I have not yet reached even 160 rounds. Yesterday’s was the highest, 141. The count is over 40.

What you say about Devdas is true. His must prove a very happy marriage. Lakshmi\textsuperscript{1} too seems to be blossoming. It appears to be a case of pure love with high motive behind it. Devdas has always liked to serve Rajaji whom he regards as his English teacher. He could not have found a better.

I am, we all are, just now very busy over the forthcoming Harijan. I have a very good editor and an equally good manager. The press belongs to the Servants of India Society with which I enjoy what may be called spiritual relations. I have therefore not to worry about the details of management. God is great and compassionate if He is also terrible.

Love from us all. It is now 5.15 a.m.

DEAR FRIEND,

With reference to our conversation of the 7th instant, I do hope that the members of the Satya Shodhak Samaj\textsuperscript{2} will throw themselves heart and soul into the campaign against untouchability subject to the limitations prescribed by the Servants of Untouchables Society. I know that the Satya Shodhak Samaj is against Brahminism and against varnashrama. The present campaign does not deal with varnashrama at all and is not a campaign against Brahminism, but against untouchability, pure and simple, because the Society does not believe that untouchability is any part of Brahminism. We must not here mix up Brahmins who swear by untouchability with Brahminism. For we have a large and growing body of Brahmins who are as much opposed to untouchability as you and I can be.

You should collect money for that purpose and perhaps it may influence people. At present she is going to do this work alone. She has been detained so that she can be of service to Kathiawar. She is married to a Kathiawari, so we have a claim over her. If you wish to invite her, send me a wire and the programme. Who will tour with her? One woman should also travel with her. It would be better if Saraladevi or some other woman from there itself went with her. She could well be taken to several places in Gujarat. I shall write about this to Ahmedabad.

Mahatma Gandhi has put himself in communication with the Government in connection with the reported fast of Appasaheb Patwardhan, a political prisoner in the Ratnagiri jail, and he will decide his course of action in this matter on receipt of the Government reply.

I have no knowledge of the fast or rather his putting himself on reduced rations, apart from the newspaper report just shown to me. Of course, the news is disturbing; it has vital connection with my previous action regarding Appasaheb and untouchability in Indian prisons. I have sought authoritative information from the Government, and meanwhile, I hope the Press report is incorrect.

Asked if this fast will have his support, Gandhiji said he would prefer not to say anything at present, not having all the facts in his possession.

MY DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

I have your letters. With reference to Jitendralal Bannerji and B. C. No public controversy is needed at least at this stage.

With reference to your letter about Harijan, after the letter was sent Ghanshyamdas came here and he gave the verbal sanction. Nothing more was therefore necessary. Nevertheless, the written sanction should be recorded in your books.

With this you will have the Harijan itself. I am hoping that it will be entirely self-supporting.

February 10, 1933

DEAR SISTER,

I thank you for your letter. This time Sir Henry Lawrence was right when he told you that “Abide with me” was one of my favourite hymns. Though I am a devout Hindu, or even because I am a devout Hindu, I have no difficulty in appreciating the devotional hymns of other religions, and having had intimate contact with many Christians I came to appreciate some of the hymns even as a young ster. You will perhaps be glad to know that among them “Lead, Kindly Light” is the most favourite. But there are others also which you do not need to know.

As to the fast, let me say that you have been wholly misinformed. My fast was not directed to a political purpose at all. It was a purely spiritual act after the same style as Buddha’s, only upon an infinitely humbler scale.

I am sending you a new weekly which is being published this week. In the light of your letter you might find it of some little interest.

326. LETTER TO MARGARETE SPIEGEL

February 10, 1933

MY DEAR MARGARETE,

I do hope you have been receiving my letters. I have the lovely photographs you have sent me. Everyone admired the album.

I am glad you are able, with the consent of your mother, to keep up your vegetarianism. I hope the body will feel none the worse for it. The spirit can only prosper under that simple food. But you must not be so cock-sure about your being more economical than I. You spent 5d. on one meal. I have made occasionally 3 meals out of 6d. in London. This may be in your favour that I did it when the things were cheaper than now. I did it in London in 1890. You were not even born then, were you?

You will get by this mail the Harijan which I hope you will like.

Love.

Yours sincerely,

327. ITS IMPLICATIONS

Rev. Stanley Jones paid me a visit the other day1 before sailing for America. He said that in America he would be asked many questions about the campaign against untouchability and had, therefore, some questions which he wanted me to answer. I was glad of the visit and I readily answered his questions. I do not propose to reproduce the whole of our conversation and all his questions and crossquestions, but I propose to give to the readers the main questions

1 On February 4, 1933. Mahadev Desai’s report of this meeting appeared in Mahadevbhaini Diary, “Indian Traders in Natal”, 18-11-1899 and the substance of my answers. His first question, then, was:

Why do you restrict the movement to the removal of untouchability only? Why not do away with the caste system altogether? If there is a difference between caste and caste, and caste and untouchability, is it not one only of degree?

ANSWER: Untouchability as it is practised in Hinduism today is, in my opinion, a sin against God and man and is, therefore, like a poison slowly eating into the very vitals of Hinduism. In my opinion, it has no sanction whatsoever in the Hindu Shastras taken as a whole. Untouchability of a healthy kind is undoubtedly to be found in the Shastras and it is universal in all religions. It is a rule of sanitation. That will exist to the end of time; but untouchability as we are observing today in India is a hideous thing and wears various forms in various Provinces, even in districts. It has degraded both the ‘untouchables’ and the ‘touchables’. It has stunted the growth of nearly 40 million human beings. They are denied even the ordinary amenities of life. The sooner, therefore, it is ended, the better for Hinduism, the better for India and, perhaps, better for mankind in general.

Not so the caste system. There are innumerable castes in India. They are a social institution. They are so many trade guilds, as was well said by the late Sir William Wilson Hunter. And at one time they served a very useful purpose, as, perhaps, they are even now doing to a certain extent. This institution has superadded to it restrictions which, in my opinion, are undesirable and are bound to go in course of time. There is nothing sinful about them. They retard the material progress of those who are labouring under them. They are no bar to the spiritual progress. The difference, therefore, between caste system and untouchability is not one of degree, but of kind. An ‘untouchable’ is outside the pale of respectable society. He is hardly treated as a human being. He is an outcaste hurled into an abyss by his fellow-beings occupying the same platform. The difference, therefore, is somewhat analogous to the difference between heaven and hell.

There is one thing more to be remembered about the caste system. For me, it is not the same as varnashramadharma. Whilst the caste system is an answer to the social need, varnashrama is based upon the Hindu scriptures. Not so the caste system. While there are innumerable castes (some dying out and new ones coming into being), the varnas are, and have always been, four. I am a firm believer in varnashrama. I have not hesitated before now to consider it as a gift of Hinduism to mankind. Acceptance of that dharma is, so far as I have been able to see it, a condition of spiritual growth. But I may not here elaborate my view of these four famous divisions in Hinduism. Their consideration is irrelevant to the present purpose. But I may make this admission that today this varnashramadharma is not being observed in its purity. There is an utter confusion of varna and if Hinduism is to become a living force in the world, we have to understand its real purpose and revive it; but we cannot do so, unless the canker of untouchability is destroyed. The idea of inferiority and superiority has to be demolished. The four divisions are not a vertical section, but a horizontal plane on which all stand on a footing of equality, doing the services respectively assigned to them. A life of religion is not a life of privileges but of duty. Privileges may come, as they do come to all, from a due fulfilment of duty. In the book of God, the same number of marks are assigned to the Brahmin that has done his task well as to the Bhangi who has done likewise. The second question was:

Why do you want temple-entry for Harijans? Are not temples the lowest thing in Hinduism?

ANSWER: I do not think so for one moment. Temples are to Hindus what churches are to Christians. In my opinion, we are all idolators; that in Hinduism we have images of stone or metal inside temples makes to me no difference. Thousands of Hindus who visit temples in simple faith derive precisely the same spiritual benefit that Christians visiting churches in simple faith do. Deprive a Hindu of his temple, and you deprive him of the thing he generally prizes most in life. That superstition and even evil have grown round many Hindu temples is but too true. That, however, is an argument for temple reform, not for lowering their value for Harijans or any Hindu. It is my certain conviction that temples are an integral part of Hinduism. His third question was:

Was not your fast pure coercion?

ANSWER: If it is agreed that my fast sprang from love, then it was coercion, only if love of parents for their children or of the latter for the former, or love of husband for wife and wife for husband, or to take a sweeping illustration, love of Jesus for those who own Him as their all, is coercion. It is the implicit and sacred belief of millions of Christians that love of Jesus keeps them from falling and that it does so against themselves. His love bends the reason and the emotion of thousands of His votaries to His love. I know that, in my childhood, love of my parents kept me from sinning, and, even after fifty years of age, love of my children and friends kept me positively from going to perdition, which I would have done most assuredly but for the definite and overwhelming influence of that love. And, if all this love could be regarded as coercion, then the love that prompted my fast and, therefore, my fast, was coercion, but it was that in no other sense. Fasting is a great institution in Hinduism, as perhaps in no other religion, and, though it has been abused by people not entitled to fast, it has, on the whole, done the greatest good to Hinduism. I believe that there is no prayer without fasting and there is no real fast without prayer. My fast was the prayer of a soul in agony.

_328. DR. AMBEDKAR AND CASTE_

The following has just been received from Dr. Ambedkar:

At the end of our conversation on Saturday last you asked me to send a message for insertion in the first issue of your new weekly _Harijan_. I feel I cannot give a message. For I believe it will be a most unwarranted presumption on my part to suppose that I have sufficient worth in the eyes of the Hindus which would make them treat any message from me with respect. I can only speak as man to man. As such it may be desirable that the Hindus should know my views on the momentous issue of Hindu social organization with which you have chosen to occupy yourself. I am, therefore, sending you the accompanying statement for publication in your _Harijan_.

_STATEMENT_

The outcaste is a bye-product of the caste system. There will be outcastes as long as there are castes. Nothing can emancipate the outcaste except the destruction of the caste system. Nothing can help to save Hindus and ensure their survival in the coming struggle except the purging of the Hindu faith of this odious and vicious dogma.

_B. R. AMBEDKAR_

1 Vide “Discussion with B. R. Ambedkar”, 4-2-1933
Dr. Ambedkar is bitter. He has every reason to feel so. He has received a liberal education. He has more than the talents of the average educated Indian. Outside India he is received with honour and affection, but, in India, among Hindus, at every step he is reminded that he is one of the outcastes of Hindu society. It is nothing to his shame, for, he has done no wrong to Hindu society. His exterior is as clean as that of the cleanest and the proudest Brahmin. Of his interior, the world knows as little as of that of any of us. In spite of all this, he believes that ‘it will be a most unwarranted presumption on his part to suppose that he has sufficient worth in the eyes of the Hindus which would make them treat any message from him with respect’. This is the caste Hindus’ shame, not his, but I would like him to feel that there are today thousands of caste Hindus who would listen to his message with the same respect and consideration that they would give to that of any other leader and that in their estimation there is no person high and no person low. I would like him, too, to know that Harijan is not my weekly. So far as the proprietary rights are concerned it belongs to the Servants of Untouchables Society and, therefore, I would like him to feel that it is as much his as of any other Hindu.

As to the burden of his message, the opinion he holds about the caste system is shared by many educated Hindus. I have, however, been able to share that opinion. I do not believe the caste system, even as distinguished from varnashrama, to be an ‘odious and vicious dogma’. It has its limitations and its defects, but there is nothing sinful about it, as there is about untouchability, and, if it is a bye-product of the caste system it is only in the same sense that an ugly growth is of a body, or weeds of a crop. It is as wrong to destroy caste because of the outcastes as it would be to destroy a body because of an ugly growth in it, or a crop because of the weeds. The outcasteness, in the sense we understand it, has, therefore, to be destroyed altogether. It is an excess to be removed, if the whole system is not to perish. Untouchability is the product, therefore, not of the caste system, but of the distinction of high and low that has crept into Hinduism and is corroding it. The attack on untouchability is thus an attack upon this ‘high-and-low’ness. The moment untouchability goes, the caste system itself will be purified, that is to say, according to my dream, it will resolve itself into the true varnadharm, the four divisions of society, each complementary of the other and none inferior or superior to any other, each as necessary for the whole body of Hinduism as any other. How it can be and what that varnashrama is, it is not necessary to examine here. But, such being my faith, I have always respectfully differed from those distinguished countrymen, Dr. Ambedkar among them, who have held that untouchability will not go without the destruction of varnashramadharma. They have made no distinction between caste and varna. But that is another story. At the present moment, it is the ‘untouchable’, the outcaste, with whom all Hindu reformers, whether they believe in varnashrama or not, have agreed to deal. The opposition to untouchability is common to both. Therefore, the present joint fight is restricted to the removal of untouchability, and I would invite Dr. Ambedkar and those who think with him to throw themselves, heart and soul, into the campaign against the monster of untouchability. It is highly likely that at the end of it we shall all find that there is nothing to fight against in varnashrama. If however, varnashrama even then looks an ugly thing, the whole of Hindu society will fight it. For this campaign against untouchability is not one of compulsion, but conversion. At the end of the chapter, I hope that we shall all find ourselves in the same camp. Should it prove otherwise, it will be time enough to consider how and by whom varnashrama is to be fought.

_Harijan_, 11-2-1933

329. UNTOUCHABILITY

Untouchability as at present practised is the greatest blot on Hinduism. It is (with apologies to sanatanists) against the Shastras. It is against the fundamental principles of humanity, it is against the dictates of reason that a man should, by mere reason of birth, be forever regarded as an untouchable, even unapproachable and unseeable. These adjectives do not convey the full meaning of the thing itself. It is a crime for certain men, women and their children to touch, or to approach within stated distances, or to be seen by those who are called caste Hindus. The tragedy is that millions of Hindus believe in this institution as if it was enjoined by the Hindu religion.

Happily, Hindu reformers have recoiled with horror from this practice. They have come to the conclusion that it has no support in the Hindu Shastras taken as a whole. Isolated texts torn from their context and considered by themselves can no doubt be produced in support of this practice, as of any evil known to mankind. But there is abundant authority in the Shastras to warrant the summary rejection, as being un-Hindu, of anything or any practice that is manifestly against the fundamental principles of humanity or morality, of ahimsa or satya\(^1\).

This movement against untouchability has been daily gathering strength. It was in last September that leading Hindus, claiming to represent the whole of Hindu India, met together and unanimously passed a Resolution\(^2\), condemning untouchability and pledging themselves to abolish it by law, if possible even during the existing regime, and, failing that, when India had a Parliament of her own.

Among the marks of untouchability to be removed was the prohibition against temple-entry by Harijans. In the course of the struggle, it was discovered that the British Courts in India had recognized this evil custom, so much so that certain acts done by untouchables as such came to be offences under the British Indian Penal Code. Thus, the entry by an untouchable into a Hindu temple would be punishable as a crime under the I.P.C.

Before, therefore, the movement of temple-entry can make headway, it has become imperative to have this anomaly removed. It is for this purpose that Sjt. Ranga Iyer has given notice of two Bills to be introduced in the Central Legislature. After ascertaining the opinion of the Provincial Governments, H.E. the Viceroy has sanctioned the introduction of these Bills. But, being private Bills, they have a poor chance of becoming the law of the land, unless the Government and the members of the Assembly refrain from obstructing its consideration. It may be argued that, being pledged to neutrality in matters of religion, the Government are bound to facilitate the passage of the first Bill at any rate, inasmuch as it merely seeks to undo the effect produced by the decisions of British Indian Courts, and this it does by withdrawing legal recognition from untouchability.

There are practices in various religions professed by the inhabitants of this land whose breach is not regarded as criminal, though it would be regarded as very serious by the respective religious codes. Thus, beef-eating by a Hindu is an offence in the eye of the Hindu religious code, but rightly not punishable as a crime under the

\(^1\) Truth
\(^2\) Vide “Letter to Ramdas Gandhi”, 6-12-1932
Indian Penal Code. Is there, then, any reason why the common law of India should punish a breach of the custom of untouchability? If there are many Hindus learned in the Hindu scriptures who find support in them for the present practice of untouchability, there are quite a number of equally learned Hindus holding the opposite view. Though this opinion of the pandits has already appeared in the Press, it is reproduced elsewhere for ready reference. Let it be noted that the signatories are all orthodox Hindus, as much lovers of their faith as are the learned men of the opposite school. On the 25th of January 1933 was held the session of the All-India Sanatan Dharma Sabha, presided over by Pandit Malaviyaji and attended by over one hundred learned men. It passed a resolution to the effect that Harijans were as much entitled to temple-entry as the rest of the Hindus.

If the Bills are not passed, it is obvious that the central part of the reform will be hung up almost indefinitely. Neutrality in matters of religion ought not to mean religious stagnation and hindrance to reform. With due regard to the sanatanists, it is difficult to understand the cry of ‘religion in danger’. Under neither Bill will a single temple be opened against the will of the majority of temple-goers in question. The second Bill expressly says so. The first Bill takes up a neutral attitude. It does not help a Harijan to force his way into a temple. The reformers do not seek to compel the opponents to their will. They desire, by the fairest means possible, to convert the majority or the minority, as the case may be, to their view of untouchability.

It is said that the Harijans themselves do not want temple-entry and that they want only betterment of their economic and political condition. The reformer, too, wants the latter, but he believes that this betterment will be much quicker brought about, if religious equality is attained. The reformer denies that the Harijans do not want temple-entry. But it may be that they are so disgusted with caste Hindus and Hindu religion itself as to want nothing from them. They may in sullen discontent choose to remain outside the religious pale. Any penance on the part of caste Hindus may be too late.

Nevertheless, the caste Hindus who recognize that untouchability is a blot on Hinduism have to atone for the sin of untouchability. Whether, therefore, Harijans desire temple-entry or not, caste Hindus have to open their temples to Harijans, precisely on the same terms as to other Hindus. For a caste Hindu with any sense of honour, temple prohibition is a continuous breach of the pledge taken at the Bombay meeting of September last. Those, who gave their word to the world and to God that they would have the temples opened for the Harijans, have to sacrifice their all, if need be, for redeeming the pledge. It may be that they did not represent the Hindu mind. They have, then, to own defeat and do the proper penance. Temple-entry is the one spiritual act that would constitute the message of freedom to the untouchables and assure them that they are not outcastes before God.

330. TO THE READER

The English edition of _Harijan_ is being published by and for the Servants of Untouchables Society at my request and, therefore, in accordance with the views I have long held regarding reform journals.

It is being published on the assumption that

1. unfortunately, the Hindi edition cannot as yet serve the South and probably, Bengal,

2. it is necessary for the people in the different Provinces to know the progress of the reform from week to week in the Provinces other than their own,

3. since the movement, though essentially Hindu, has a worldwide significance and seeks the sympathy, if possible, of the whole of humanity, it is necessary to keep the world acquainted with its implications and progress.

If these assumptions are correct, _Harijan_ will supply a felt want and should, therefore, become self-supporting. If it does not, it must stop publication. If it is published at a loss, it will mean so much money taken from the mouths of Harijans. An endeavour is being made to expend every pice of subscription received on behalf of the Society for the sole service of Harijans and the advance of the movement for the removal of untouchability.

You will note that no advertisements are being taken for the upkeep of the paper. It has to depend solely upon the subscriptions received.

You can send the subscription for yourself or your friends, Indian or foreign, or for institutions, such as libraries, or for poor and deserving Harijans.

Ten thousand copies are being printed for the time being. Some copies will be sent free, either by way of compliment or exchange, but the list can only be limited. It is possible for you to extend it. I would like every English-knowing Harijan student and every untouchability worker to have a free copy on a certified application. This is possible only through the active co-operation of the reader who can afford to pay more than his own subscription.

The provincial organizations should send and pay for their own copies of which they should send advice in time, accompanying it with cheques or money orders.

So much for the financial part of this appeal.

That part of your obligation I know you will fulfil, if you are a reformer. But the harder is the necessary consequence of your fulfilment of that part. By paying subscriptions for yourself or others, you buy the right of, and recognize the duty of, serving the great cause in every legitimate manner possible for you. Thus, you can become an active helper in spreading the message of Harijan among those who are opposing the reform. This requires special qualifications. You need to have self-restraint. The opponents are in a state of rage just now. Some of them believe that sanatana dharma is in danger, as it has never been before. They imagine much more than the reform means and, therefore, do not hesitate to ascribe motives to reformers. You have, by your gentleness and gentlemanliness, to disarm suspicions and enable them to understand what the reform means.

If you will diligently study Harijan, it will equip you for the delicate task. It will give you an epitome of the week’s doings in the various parts of India in connection with the campaign against untouchability. It will also tell you what the others are doing and what the opponents are saying. It will also lay bare the weaknesses and mistakes of workers. Will you become a fellow-worker in this movement of liberating over forty million human beings from an intolerable yoke and of purifying Hinduism?

But I do not despair of even some opponents subscribing to Harijan. I am an irrepressible optimist. I have no quarrel with the opponents. These pages will be written as much for them as for the reformers. If Harijan stands for truth and if the reformers have patience, the opponents of today will be the reformers of tomorrow.

331. WHY ‘HARIJAN’

Several correspondents have asked me why I have adopted the name ‘Harijan’ for ‘untouchable’. Some English friends have asked me for its meaning. It is not a name of my coining. Some years ago, several ‘untouchable, correspondents complained that I used the word asprishya in the pages of Navajivan. Asprishya means literally untouchable. I then invited them to suggest a better name and one of the ‘untouchable, correspondents suggested the adoption of the name ‘Harijan’, on the strength of its having been used by the first known poet-saint of Gujarat. Though the quotation he sent me did not exactly fit the case he wanted to make out for the adoption, I thought that it was a good word. ‘Harijan’ means ‘a man of God’. All the religions of the world described God pre-eminently as the Friend of the friendless, Help of the helpless and Protector of the weak. The rest of the world apart, in India who can be more friendless, helpless or weaker than the forty million or more Hindus of India who are classified as untouchables? If, therefore, any body of people can be fitly described as men of God, they are surely these helpless, friendless and despised people. Hence, in the pages of Navajivan, since the correspondence, I have always adopted Harijan as the name signifying untouchables. And, when God chose to entrust me with their service even whilst undergoing imprisonment, I could not use any other word for describing them. I recoil with horror from that word and all it implies. Not that the change of name brings about any change of status, but one may at least be spared the use of a term which is itself one of reproach. When caste Hindus have of their own inner conviction and, therefore, voluntarily got rid of the present-day untouchability, we shall all be called Harijans, for, according to my humble opinion, caste Hindus will then have found favour with God and may, therefore, be fitly described as His men.

332. SEEKING OR GIVING?

Why is it that you, who have always sworn by non-co-operation with the Government and Legislatures, are now carrying on propaganda for the passage of untouchability Bills by the present Legislatures, and are thus co-operating with both the Government and the Legislatures?

Newspaper reporters also have been plying me with the same question. I have evaded both by saying that I cannot, consistently with my obligation as a prisoner, deal with this question as fully as I would like to. But I can say this much, that there is no doctrine in the world which admits of the same kind of application under every variety of circumstance. Different circumstances evoke different applications of the same doctrine. Thus, my love for a starving man would require me to feed him. My love for my overfed child would require me to starve him, even though he may be crying for food. I am today non-co-operating with sanatanist friends, but I would like my questioners to analyse my non-co-operation, and they will find that in the very act of non-co-operation I am seeking their co-operation in my campaign. Exactly in the same manner, I may non-co-operate as much as I like with Government or any institution, but I would be a very foolish man, if I did not know that I was non-co-operating in order to secure co-operation from them. Thus, I am now seeking the co-operation of the Government and the Legislatures in order to further my purpose, which I hold to be very sacred and altogether good. Beyond this I may not go, for the reason I have already stated and which the reader should respect.

Sjt. Hiralal A. Shah writes:

The suggestion made by Sjt. Shah is certainly worthy of consideration as well by municipalities and local bodies as by individuals, but particularly by the former. Corporate cleanliness can only be ensured, if there is a corporate conscience and a corporate insistence on cleanliness in public places. Untouchability has a great deal to answer for the insanitation of our streets and our latrines, whether private or public. In its inception, untouchability was a rule of sanitation, and still is in all parts of the world outside India. That is to say, an unclean person or thing is untouchable, but immediately his or its uncleanliness is shed, he or it is no longer untouchable. Therefore, a person who is to attend to scavenging, whether it is a paid Bhangi or an unpaid mother, they are unclean until they have washed themselves clean of their unclean work. If, instead of being regarded as untouchable for ever, the Bhangi was treated as brother and was given an opportunity and even made to become clean after performing an unclean service for society, he should be as acceptable as any other member of that society. Corporations can, therefore, lead the way in this matter, but they will not unless the citizens insist. It is truly said that Corporations have no souls, that is, apart from the souls of the citizens. Whilst, therefore, commending Sjt. Shah’s suggestion to all concerned, I would advise him to concentrate his energy upon one single spot and there agitate, both amongst the public and their Corporation, for the much needed reform. Let him, therefore, devote every ounce of his spare energy to educating public opinion in Bombay, where he has his habitation, evolve concrete suggestions and get them accepted by the people in the different wards, and he will soon find that his labours are crowned with success.

Harijan, 11-2-1933

1 The letter is not reproduced here. The correspondent had suggested that sweepers should be provided facilities for becoming clean after work.
DEAR SIR,

On the 8th instant Major Bhandari communicated to me the information that Government had decided to withhold a letter addressed to me by Appasaheb Patwardhan. The next morning I saw in The Times of India a paragraph to the effect that Appasaheb had put himself on reduced rations. Thereupon the same day I wrote\(^1\) to Col. Doyle inquiring about the news and asking to know the orders of the Government of India about conservancy work in the prisons by volunteer prisoners. Not having any reply I sent yesterday a reminder.\(^2\) Since then I have a copy of the orders of the Government of India, but no reply to my inquiry about Appasaheb. For me the matter is of the gravest importance involving my honour. As a result of the protracted correspondence between the authorities and me there was a settlement about the subject-matter thereof and at the instance of Col. Doyle I sent the following wire\(^3\) to Appasaheb Patwardhan on the 6th December last.

It clearly foreshadows resumption of fast by him in the event of an unfavourable decision.

The Government will observe that any decision in this matter that affects Appasaheb affects me equally. As I read the whole of the transactions between December 1st and now in this matter, the Government have recognized the correctness of my action. I hope that they do not now intend to revise their attitude and cut me off from Appasaheb. For the moment therefore I ask whether Appasaheb is or very recently had been on a partial fast and whether he and his comrades have been now permitted to do conservancy work.

Owing to the increasing tension caused by the report of Appasaheb’s partial fast, I am requesting Major Bhandari, if he has authority, or to request Col. Doyle, if he has not, to telegraph or

339. LETTER TO RAMANANDA CHATTERJEE

February 11, 1933

DEAR RAMANANDA BABOO,

I thank you for taking so much trouble over my letter of the 20th ultimo about the Yeravda Pact. I had read all that appeared in the

1 Gandhiji’s co-worker in Champaran; vide
2 Report of a lecture by Sophia Wadia
Modern Review on the Pact and I wish that I had spared you the trouble of sending me copies by telling you that I had read them and asking you if you had any further comments to offer on the matter in view of the agitation set up in Bengal. I am not so bad as I used to be out of prison. Then, I had not a moment to read even the Modern Review let alone other magazines and papers. Inside the prison hitherto I have had time to read the Modern Review which you have been so kindly and punctually sending me from month to month.

The argument in your letter is quite clear to me though it does not convince me. I was surprised even when I read your note on the Yeravda Pact. For I had heard that you had been party to the statement made by Dr. Moonje that so far as Hindu Sabha was concerned he was quite willing that cent per cent seats were given to the depressed classes, and I was glad when I read the statement and still more so when I heard that you had heartily approved of it.

My own position is fundamentally different from yours. If there was to be any reservation at all, and I saw that there had to be, we could not afford to give it in a niggardly spirit. We were bound to give as many seats as Harijan representatives desired and certainly up to their numerical strength. My action was based on absolute trust. If we have to suffer for it no one will be to blame but ourselves. We can never suffer if we will be only strictly just to them. We can never be generous, for there is no danger for years to come of our giving them too much. I wish that I can persuade every caste Hindu as to the measure of the enormity of the wrong done by them to Harijans. Nor do I mind many who have hitherto described themselves as caste Hindus rushing to the registering officers to be classified as Harijans. I do not mind because daily we must be advancing towards effacement of the vicious distinction between caste Hindus and outcastes, so much

1 Of Octobers, 1932
2 Wherein the addressee had written: “My individual opinion is against the Poona Pact, so far as it relates to Bengal . . . Reservation of seats for the depressed will not help the really “depressed” or “untouchable” people. . . . The present “depressed” class M.L.C.s generally oppose nationalist parties and side with the pro-bureaucracy Mussalmans. Giving 30 seats out of 80 to the depressed castes would mean the practical wiping out of a nationalist opposition party in the future Bengal Council. . .” (S. N. 20155).
so that it would be a privilege for a caste Hindu to be classified as Harijan.

Indeed, in my opinion Bengal is in a better position than the other Provinces, if it is true that there are very few untouchables in the real sense of the term and I think that it is true but that many are classed as such because they are economically depressed and are suffering from other social disabilities than untouchability. So far as I am concerned, let all, everywhere, who are at all economically depressed and are suffering from any social disability get themselves registered as Harijans, if to be registered as Harijans is an optional act. That very fact will be a factor in the removal of untouchability instead of, as you fear, in hardening it.

Lastly, I do not share your fear that in many elections only those who may be called advanced Harijans will be elected. That and many other things will undoubtedly happen if the reformer either goes to sleep or is insincere. If he is sincere and active, untouchability will be a dying cult and those who are lowest in the social scale and intelligence will get their due. And if at the bottom of all your arguments and fears there is the suspicion that the reformer is not all that one would desire it to be, for a moment, but only for a moment, I would be tempted to share that suspicion, but I am a born optimist. I have faith in my sincerity and activity. Therefore I refuse to suspect my comrades. Hence the counter arguments that I have advanced. I would invite you to share my faith in the reform and the reformers and believe with me that if we are true the Harijans will be true and all will be well. If you find nothing in my letter that appeals to you I would like you to strive with me and tear my argument to pieces. You know the regard I have for you. If it admits of enhancement it would only be enhanced by your frank and fearless criticism. I am anxious that we approach the Yeravda Pact and all it means with perfect confidence in its correctness.

Yours sincerely,

I had your letter of the 6th instant. I am looking forward with interest to the proceedings of tomorrow. If you can get me a brief statement such as the opinion published in this week’s Harijan, do get it for publication in the next issue. Even an endorsement of the opinion from a well-known pandit or pandits I would like.

342. LETTER TO P. R. THAKUR

February 11, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter of the 6th instant. I have never believed that the problem of untouchability can be solved by mere temple-entry. But I do believe that it can never be solved without temple-entry on equal terms with the others, and I further believe that the economic and educational advance can be accelerated by temple-entry which is really the mark of the removal of untouchability. One may be ever so educated and ever so rich and yet be untouchable, but immediately he has got religious equality through temple-entry, untouchability is gone. At the same time, I believe with you that the educational and economic advance must not be neglected nor subordinated to temple-entry. As a matter of fact, that is being prosecuted [as] vigorously as it is possible to do.

343. LETTER TO PRABHAVATI

February 11, 1933

CHI PRABHAVATI,

I got your letter only yesterday. It was very good. Those who recite Gita give up any worry whatsoever. I do know that your fits are caused by some worry or other. If you need to write every fortnight to Jayaprakash you must write only to him and he can send me the news. If a monthly letter is sufficient for him it will be enough if I too may receive one in the month. Ba is again behind the bars, she is at Sabarmati. Mirabehn too has been transferred to Sabarmati Jail as her health was deteriorating.

Your letter to Ba I shall send to Sabarmati. You are doing well in studies. Can you understand English well? It was excellent that you were given the job of teaching.

Inform Kanta that I deliberately refrain from writing to her so that she may receive the essential mail due to her without any hindrance. Her news I continue to get through Sumangal.

Mrityunjaya and Vidyavati do not even write to me but I get the news about Father’s health. There was no serious complaint about the women inmates of the Ashram; anyway neither your nor Kanta’s name was mentioned in it. My work certainly goes on increasing, but I do have some help now that Chhaganbhai is here. Still who can share the work that only I can do? Either it remains undone or I myself do it somehow or other. Do see me on your release.

My health is perfect. I take milk and fruit. I take 1 lb. milk, oranges, dates and papaya, sometimes some roasted and crushed almonds too. The weight hovers around 103 lb. The pain in the elbow has become chronic. It should not cause any anxiety. I can spin every day but not much. It is about 100 rounds. Sardar, Mahadev and Chhaganlal are all doing well. Which newspapers can you get? Would you be allowed the Harijan that I am bringing out? Mirabehn’s letter comes every week. She is permitted to write every week as she does not see anyone.

Blessings to you both from

February 12, 1933

MY DEAR SATISBABU,

You will have got on Sunday a parcel of 500 Harijans. I do not know how you will distribute them, but I suppose you can think of better ways than I can suggest from here. From among the friends in the mofussil you will please have as many subscribers as possible and get newsboys to do the street sales. I do not know if you will want the Khadi Pratishthan to act as agents. But if you feel that the Pratishthan cannot undertake the work, please try to get as many subscribers as possible and collect the money and send a cheque for the amount and save so much money for the Harijan. In case you would have the Pratishthan to take up the agency please let the Manager know direct the maximum number of copies you will want.

346. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR

February 12, 1933

MY DEAR MARY,

I have your letters but I have also the news that you are suffering from asthma. Are you not overdoing it? You will not succeed in bending the flesh beyond its capacity. Humbly recognize your limitations. No one in the Ashram is expected to go beyond his or her strength. Do not go barefoot and do not expose your head to the sun. Do not draw water at the well. Insist on getting fruit for yourself. Let the doctor be called in if necessary. You have chosen to be a daughter. Now you have the opportunity of proving one and quickly getting well by carrying out instructions. I hope you are taking warm baths unless you are used to cold baths.

Love.

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter for which I thank you. The idea of a separate university for Harijans is attractive, but it is hardly necessary to create a separate university. In the place of that we have Mr. David’s scheme of which you must have already read and of which you will see a little more in last week’s Harijan. It is elastic and economical in the sense that every rupee obtained under the scheme goes directly for the tuition of Harijans and it is also the quickest method of giving higher education to selected Harijan students. If Mr. David’s scheme proves successful, there should be no difficulty in extending it so as to cover a further selection of students for being sent to foreign countries.

Industrial education too I should treat precisely in the same manner as I would treat higher education.

Of cinema shows I understand but little, having never attended any. An attempt is already being made to induce the better classes to engage Harijans as domestic servants and I think it is coming.

As to the caste system, I would commend the last week’s issue of Harijan to your attention for my views. I think this answers all your questions. I take it that you have sent a copy of your letter to the Central Board or at least a similar letter, if not a copy.

DEAR N.,

Kumar Diwakar Singh whom you call Devula gave me your note.

Your way of addressing me as your son is very strange. I lost my mother years ago. I am fast making daughters and sisters. But mother I have not found. Age is no bar. If you can inspire me with mother-worship towards you nothing would please me better. But let me say that your letter before me has filled me with misgivings. It smells of the hysteric. Your judgment of the friend whom you have sent is not confirmed by my talks with him. He seems to me to be a youth of unbalanced mind. He is not likely to do much in Allahabad.

But more serious still is the attack upon your character that came to me yesterday from an unexpected source. The friend who gave me the warning is a man of great worth and has no end to serve by misleading me. He simply warns me against my playing into your hands; of course the friend has no first-hand information.

But it is against my nature to keep such reports from those of whom I have them and in whose welfare I may be interested as I am in yours. Your first letters prepossessed me in your favour and I thought that I could use you for the common service of Truth. This report coupled with your latest letter have created a doubt in my mind. I should hope that it has no solid foundation.

If you have any care for my opinion, you will lay aside all work and without trumpet come to Poona, leave your luggage at the station and come to me any day after 9 a.m. and let me see you face to face and ask you some straight questions.

CHI. SHIVABHAI,

I did not find your letter incomplete in any respect. I hope you got my previous letter.

An act of expiation for violation of a vow should be directly related to the nature of the vow. If one has been guilty of telling a lie, the proper expiation for it should be observance of silence for some time and not a resolution to give up drinking, for the latter is desirable even in itself. If drinking was the cause of one’s speaking, untruth, then of course it would be one’s duty to give it up. Similarly, if you touched your wife’s body with impure thoughts, you should stop going to her room or even refrain from the sight of your wife for some days. In addition to doing this, you may give up eating sweets as reminder to yourself of your resolution. However, you are fully awake and conscious of your lapses. You will, therefore, be saved.

It should not be a matter for wonder that a young man should try to learn Sanskrit, Bengali, Urdu, Tamil, Punjabi, Sindhi, Hindi, Gujarati, Marathi, Oriya, Telugu, Kannada, Malayalam and English, for of all these the really independent languages are only three, English, Sanskrit and Tamil. The other languages are the daughters either of Sanskrit or Tamil. But you will be able to learn them only if you are really interested in them.

354. LETTER TO D. B. KALELKER

February 12, 1933

CHI. KAKA.

I got your letter. If we have trouble when we cut teeth, why should we not have it also when we lose them? Do you get pure milk? Though your experience is that a milk diet brings on weakness and causes diarrhoea, I still think that the experiment is worth making. Cereal foods should not be necessary for one to be able to digest milk. The fact that you require them indicates some weakness in the system. I cling to my belief that one can eat wheat only when one is able to digest milk and fruits. Some people believe that solid food helps in the digestion of milk. But in fact it is not digested, and is retained in the body in some harmful form which gives one the illusion of strength. If you get pure and fresh milk, it is worth while trying the experiment of drinking it without heating it. These days I drink such milk. It has done no harm so far, though I have not carried on the experiment long enough to say that it has benefited me. I started it about fifteen days ago.

You should get your knees massaged. You cannot afford to be an old man so soon. I have been rising at three these days and find Jupiter and Mars right over my head, I still indulge in my love of watching the stars. Just when my interest had become absorbing, you left me. ¹ How much I miss you! I am expecting a big telescope on Monday.

Give me your comments on Harijan, and also write on some subject if you think of one. Don’t be particular about writing artistically. If you think of any questions which you think I should discuss, send them.

355. LETTER TO BAL KALELKER

February 12, 1933

CHI. BAL,

I got your letter.

You did a very good thing in fasting as a remedy for your fever.

An innocuous egg is one from which no chick can come out. Personally I regard such eggs as acceptable food. From a medical point of view, they are beneficial in a variety of conditions. They are likely to be harmful in regard to brahmacharya, but not to persons of weak health. There are two considerations which can be urged against such eggs. From a religious point of view, they are an unnecessary addition to the number of articles which we eat, and from the point of view of vegetarianism they are as objectionable as milk. Probably it gives a hen greater pain to carry such eggs and be caged for their sake than it does a cow to be milked. However, such eggs are not in the same category as meat, which we regard as forbidden. It may be necessary in some cases to recommend innocuous eggs as medicine. This fully sums up my view on this subject. Keep a diary and do not neglect to spin for yajna.

I have received Panditji’s letter. It is disappointing. But I look upon it as a gift of love. I also am wiring to him to come and see me. If he does not come, it may be necessary for you to go there.

You should not worry about my fast. I am ascertaining the facts. I will not take a single step without careful thought, though I may not be able to convince you and others every time. Let me always remain true to myself. On the day on which I am false to myself, you may be sure that I will have fallen. “Being false to myself” means not doing what I think to be right.

Yes, the heat which is being given to me is diathermy, but it has not benefited me at all. The Chief Surgeon here says that the trouble is a symptom of old age. This hypothesis does not seem to be altogether fanciful. If it is correct, why should we be upset? The only remedy then will be simple life and less strain on the affected parts.

MY DEAR C. R.,

I have read your and G.’s appeal to the public. Why do you even so much as mention the fast and its possibility? You surely undermine its spiritual value, if the fast, if it at all comes, is to be a spiritual fast. I do not even know that the fast is a certainty if the Bills do not pass during this session or at all. I think that you should all dismiss it from your consideration altogether and let the public mind work unfettered by it. When it does come it will produce its own effect if it is a spiritual act. If it is the product of a diseased or arrogant mind, it will merely torture the body and excite pity or contempt according to the temperament of the people who may hear of it. Do take this advice as from an expert and act up to it to the fullest extent.

Then you have seriously to consider Pt. Malaviyaji’s attitude. He is strongly against the Bills especially if they are not to be circulated. Of course I do not share the view. I shall be writing to him. But you should see him if you can at all spare yourself or send Devdas alone. But on this I have no firm opinion. You will do what appeals to you most. You know the outside atmosphere firsthand. All my knowledge is secondhand and therefore worthless.

I had what must be described in one way as a very unsatisfactory interview with Dr. A. He is irreconcilable. In another way it was satisfactory. I know him better than I did.

CHI. PREMA,

It is the morning of the silence day. I got up at three and have taken up your letter to reply to it. I liked it very much indeed. You have given me in it all that I wanted. It fully answers to my imagination of what women can give me. What it gives seems small and unspectacular, but is very useful to a seeker after truth. I learn something from an objective letter like this one, and it helps me to guide you and others.

The Ashram is indeed a dharmashala. But the word has two meanings. It means a place where people can stay free, but it also means a place where one can learn dharma and try to follow it. The Ashram is a dharmashala in this second sense of the word. But dharma means truth. The Ashram, therefore, is a place where one may know the truth and try to follow it, that is, show agraha for it, and hence it is Satyagraha Ashram.

In our quest for truth, we wish to cultivate unity with all living creatures. The Ashram, therefore, is an ever-growing family. But it is something more even than that, for it is the means and dharma is the end, and not vice versa. It is also a big school, and yet it is not so; for, since it is a family, we cannot mechanically apply there rules of outward behaviour such as are followed for other types of training. The letter of the rule has to be sacrificed in order to save the spirit of the rule.

I will now apply these observations to some specific cases. In bringing up and educating Lakshmi, we, including you, are being tested. What would we do to children in our own family? What would you do to your own sister? If Lakshmi does not observe the rules, the fault is chiefly mine, and then yours. I leave out the others. I leave out Narandas, too, for if we hold him responsible for the behaviour of every person in the Ashram, he will not be able to attend to his own duties. Looking after Lakshmi is a woman’s job, and particularly of the woman to whom it is entrusted. The fault is chiefly mine because I am her adopted father and also mother. I did my duty as a father but not as a mother, because I remained away from the Ashram most of the time. I feel now that I should not have accepted Lakshmi at all. But who was I to decide? I am but a servant of God. I did not seek Lakshmi. God sent her. Let Him, then, look after her. She was under the charge of Ba first, then of Santok, then of Gangabehn, and now she is under your charge. None of you asked to have charge of her. It was time and circumstances which put her under the charge of these persons one after another. You should now do the best that you can. Whenever necessary, you may consult me. Do not get tired of your charge or despair. Have faith and bathe her with your love. God will ultimately solve the problem. She has come to us as a representative of Harijans to claim payment of the debt which we owe to them. If she is full of shortcomings and is indolent, the responsibility for that lies on you, me and on the caste Hindus. We reap as we sow. I am trying to get her married off. I have written to Lakshmidas and inquired about Maruti. I have also written to Dudabhai.

You need not get upset because more boys and girls are coming to the Ashram. They will benefit to the extent that they observe the rules. We may let them stay as long as we tolerate their laxity, and ask them to leave when we can do so no longer. People do not stay in a dharmashala permanently. Even near relations do not stay permanently. Those of them who can accommodate themselves to the discipline of the Ashram will stay, and the others will leave. Why should we care either way? Moreover, we cannot adopt any other policy in the present circumstances. As long as we can do so, we should admit people who come unasked and who seem deserving. Most of them will leave on their own. Our rules themselves will drive them away. Everybody who comes must do physical work. They should clean lavatories and eat simple food in the same manner as we swallow medicine. They will not get jaggery, nor wheat as often as they might wish. If we can daily demonstrate more and more clearly by our manner of life that the Ashram is a representative of the starving poor, we shall always be safe and happy. This means that there should be increasing simplicity in our life in the Ashram and the rules should be observed more and more strictly. If fire preserves its nature, creatures which cannot endure it simply cannot live near it. That is the virtue of fire and not its defect. It is because, unlike fire, we are not true to ourselves that all the problems arise. My suggestion about simplicity and strictness in observing the rules concerns ourselves. We should cultivate them in ever greater degree. We seek protection for ourselves in our inner selves and not outside of us “we” here means all of us who voluntarily stay in the Ashram, you, I and everybody else. And one should not observe only as many rules as the other inmates do. One must observe every rule as strictly as one can. In this lies the secret of the progress of the Ashram. The rule should be, a liberal attitude towards others and strictness towards oneself. Even so, we shall preserve some minimum decency in our attitude to ourselves, for very often our liberal attitude towards others will not be sincere and our strictness towards ourselves will be so only in appearance.

The ideal for girls is a life of inviolate brahmacharya. Training for it includes training for ideal married life. Boys and girls do not require to be instructed as to what married life means. That relation is a part of the animal nature of men and women. The institution of marriage was devised as a means of exercising some control on that nature. Its perfect control means brahmacharya. Anybody who can observe this perfect control will also be able to observe the limited control of marriage. But those who regard marriage itself as their ideal will not understand the real purpose even of marriage. What training does one require for lust? It will grow of itself. However, the girl who has accepted complete brahmacharya as her ideal must learn how to manage a home. She must learn something about child-care. She will not be a nun living in a cave. An unmarried woman marries the whole world, makes herself a mother and a daughter to all people and thereby becomes fit to manage the affairs of the whole society. May be there has been no such unmarried woman. Nevertheless that is the ideal. For all girls, therefore, the training should be the same. I think I have explained the idea clearly. If I have not done so, ask me to explain it again.

This will explain your duty towards that Muslim woman.

The real cause of fainting fits and similar ailments in girls lies in our own shortcomings. If we have made fairly satisfactory progress, even the presence of young people among us will not be dangerous to the Ashram. But whenever we see such danger, we should ask the young man or woman to leave. If you wish to stop admitting other young men or women, you may do so.

All my hopes rest on Narandas. If Narandas who is the secretary of the Ashram is the Narandas as I imagine him to be, everything will be well. My faith in him is daily increasing. If he is defeated, some other old inmate of the Ashram will grow and advance, and I am sure, therefore, that everything will be well. There are many residents in the Ashram but only a few inmates. That is why we do not get sufficient workers. In these very imperfect conditions, all of you should do the best that you can.

The Ashram is the measuring rod by which people can judge me. I take it with me wherever I go. Wherever my body may be, my soul is always in the Ashram. All the shortcomings found in the Ashram must be present, visibly or invisibly, in me too. If I have made a mistake in understanding you all, the blame must be mine and nobody else’s. If, however, I do not know myself, how can I sit in judgment over all of you? When I think of particular persons, I see that I did not invite anybody except Chhaganlal and Maganlal. All the others were sent to me by God to test me or to help me.

And now another matter. You made a mistake in not going to Dr. Patel yourself. You cannot ask a doctor’s advice through a note. Observe complete silence. Show your throat to the doctor and follow his advice. You should not be obstinate in this matter.

365. LETTER TO HINDU CENTRAL COMMITTEE

February 13, 1933

DEAR FRIENDS,

1. In continuation of my letter acknowledging yours of 4th instant I have now to say that I have read the statement of the Hindu Central Committee with much attention and when after reading the statement I saw the names of distinguished lawyers amongst other notabilities as the original members of the Committee I was filled with sorrow.

2. Take this assertion in the statement:

We feel that there is no question of inferiority complex in the divisions of Hindu society and least of all, no sin has been committed all these centuries by the orthodox Hindus who have been following the traditions established by all the merciful humanitarian sages of this land.

Is this assertion borne out by the evidence of the senses? If the Committee were to contend that there is in the Hindu Shastras no inferiority or superiority I should at once agree. But untouchability as it is practised today with the attendant system of locations and deprivation practically of all the amenities of life for the so-called untouchables is surely proof of their inferiority. These disabilities have been often enumerated in the public Press. The precept of equality therefore seems to have been systematically and cruelly disregarded by modern Hindu society. Is the Committee able to point out any act on the part of what it calls the orthodox Hindus for the amelioration of the economic and material condition of the depressed classes? And is not the very existence of a class called “depressed” sufficient contradiction of the above-quoted assertion?

3. The Committee then proceeds and says:

There are also in many places in the country large sections of the population amongst caste Hindus who are worse than Panchamas both economically and culturally.

I am unaware of any sections of caste Hindus who are both economically and culturally worse than Panchamas, and if there are I should very much like to know their names.

4. The third statement of the Committee to which I would invite attention is:

It will be a travesty of truth to suggest that the orthodox Hindus have not been generous in their dealings with the Panchamas or Harijans in the villages.

Is it a sign of generosity on the part of caste Hindus to give leavings of their dishes to Harijans, to force their labour against a starvation wage, to deny to them the services of physicians, schoolmasters, barbers and practically all the other services to which they, the caste Hindus, are used?

5. Another statement of the Committee is:

Except in the higher classes today, there is no unemployment problem in the country.

Surely, this is a sweeping statement at complete variance with known facts as found in historical and Government records.

6. The Committee then proceeds:

The first creed of the orthodox Hindu is always the gift of food to the hungry and he has always felt it as a religious duty and his first prayer has been to the Lord to vouchsafe happiness to all human beings.
The creed is undoubtedly there. Has the Committee any evidence to show any corresponding action on the part of the orthodox Hindus in connection with Harijans?

7. Then the Committee goes on to say:

It cannot be suggested for one moment that though the Congress has thrown itself whole-heartedly in favour of this agitation for the removal of untouchability and for temple-entry after the announcement of the fast of Mr. Gandhi, it has done any appreciable service for the economic and material uplift of the depressed classes.

The Committee should know that it is not possible for the Congress “to throw itself whole-heartedly into the agitation”. It is being carried on by the general Hindu population organized by the recently formed Servants of Untouchables Society. That Society invites all without distinction of party to help it to remove untouchability. This Society has planned a wide constructive programme. In so far as the Congress itself is concerned, its Hindu members have a record for the service of Harijans which is second to that of no other similar organization.

8. But the Committee goes on:

If the call to join the movement for such uplift comes from persons who are pledged to temple-entry, the orthodox Hindus on their part cannot but view it with suspicion, especially when it is preceded by Gandhi’s cry of “Leave the temple-entry to me”.

I fail to see why the orthodox Hindus should view with suspicion the call for joining the movement for uplift because it comes from persons who are openly advocating temple-entry, not by compulsion but by conversion. And what can be the meaning of emphasis on my statement “Leave the temple-entry to me”? I am charitable enough to assume that the Committee framed that sentence without knowing the context in which “Leave the temple-entry to me” was first used. It was said in answer to correspondents who were impatient to offer satyagraha and adopt energetic measures for opening other temples. In order to keep the movement within fixed limits and in order to confine direct action by way of fast for the present at least to Sjt. Kelappan and myself I said to the correspondents, “Leave the temple-entry to me and go on with the other constructive programme of economic and educational uplift”. The Committee can easily verify this from my writings. I hope therefore that the Committee will disabuse their minds of the prejudice betrayed against me in the sentence quoted.
9. The next sentence in the Committee’s statement runs:

If Mr. Gandhi and his followers will give an undertaking to save temples and other religious institutions from interference by the mixed legislatures of the land, we are willing to whole-heartedly co-operate with them.

I have shown repeatedly that the two Bills before the Legislative Assembly imply no interference with temples or other religious institutions. They seek to restore the status quo existing before certain decisions of law-courts, well known to the legal members of the Committee. I can give the assurance on my behalf and on behalf of my co-workers that we have no desire whatsoever to invoke interference by the legislatures in matters of religion and if only the Committee will co-operate in the prosecution of the general movement for the removal of untouchability, not of the desirable type such as is mentioned in the Shastras in the interests of sanitation, but of the—in my opinion—undesirable type as is being practised today, the Committee will soon discover that there is no cause whatsoever for alarm or suspicion and that if there is anything in the two Bills that can be shown to be an interference with religious liberty, the defect can undoubtedly be remedied without difficulty.

10. With the sentiment expressed in the last two sentences of the statement of the Committee I can whole-heartedly agree, for so far as I am concerned there is no desire indiscriminately “to import Western ideals of society, civilization and equality”. Perhaps, no one has written, and endeavoured as much as possible to act in accordance with the writing, against Western civilization and I have not the slightest desire to destroy the foundations of Hindu caste system, if by that is meant varnashramadharma. The movement against untouchability is on that very account deliberately circumscribed and restricted to the very things described by the Committee except temple-entry, and as to this last, it can be shown conclusively that there is no desire whatsoever to force temple-entry but by proper disciplined agitation to bring about a change in Hindu public opinion, a change not inconsistent with the spirit of the Shastras.

11. If the Committee will dispassionately read my analysis of the statement, I am not without hope that it will see that whoever has framed the statement has committed the members of the Committee to assertions which cannot be supported by existing facts. The statement though sent to me is merely a copy of what has already been sent to the Press, but on reading the statement I discovered that according to the Committee’s admissions there was a great deal that was common between the Committee and the reformers and that the assertions which were made in order to emphasize differences were mostly if not wholly imaginary and not capable of proof. I felt that I would point out to the Committee in a private communication the glaring flaws in the statement and see if there was not any possibility of meeting on a common platform.

12. If the Committee however considers that all the assertions made in the statement can be supported and that I am labouring under self-delusion, I would be glad to be corrected. If the Committee sees any good in my letter, I invite it to send one or more representatives to confer with me with a view to exploring possibilities of common action or at least of understanding the real differences in matters of principle. Pending your reply, I am not sending this letter to the Press, but if the Committee finds it to be hopeless, it is at liberty to publish it.

Yours sincerely,

BHAISHRI RAMJI,

I got your wire. Swarupbehn’s name in her husband’s house is Vijayalakshmi. Her address at Bombay is Meher Mansion, Laburnum Road, Gamdevi. I have sent her your wire and your suggestions. See that after coming there, she does not have to bear the expense. Arrange interviews with the Raja and Ranis. Introduce her to some courteous sanatanist, if there is such a one. Do not let her run up and down too much.

370. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS

February 13, 1933

Asked if permission was given to Appasaheb as a special case, Mr. Gandhi declined to answer. But it is learnt that the new orders of the Government of India, while permitting high-caste Hindus to do voluntary conservancy work, leave it entirely to the discretion of the Jail Superintendent to permit or not to permit a particular prisoner to do this.

Asked why he attached such importance to this subject, Mr. Gandhi replied that untouchability had to go everywhere, and more so in jails. Untouchability could not exist in jails where prisoners could not insist on high-class and low-class distinctions, and where they must be willing to perform all services, including those imposed on the so-called low castes.

Asked if he would advise high castes outside also to do conservancy work, Mr. Gandhi replied:

I would most decidedly expect high-caste men to render voluntarily all useful services which today are reserved to certain classes. The idea that the most necessary service in the world will be considered degrading or should carry any sin with it is abhorrent to me. Our villages will wear a different appearance altogether when sanitary services begin to be classed among the honourable occupations, nor will the streets of our cities be so dangerously dirty as they are today, when we have ceased to consider it degrading to take a brush, bucket and broom in order to do the necessary cleansing.

372. LETTER TO SRIPRAKASA

February 14, 1933

MY DEAR SHRIPRAKASH,

Though doleful, the receipt of your letter was a matter of joy for me. I have no doubt whatsoever that in the quiet of the village surroundings you will soon recover your lost health and repair your broken spirits. You are not an old man but being a man of emotion and possessing a sensitive nature, you imagine all sorts of evil. You have many years of active life and service in front of you. Many people have gone through much more distress of the body than you have and yet I see them today in possession of sound health and bright spirits. Mens sana in corpore sano you learnt in your youth and as soon as the body becomes healthy, the mind is bound to react. Meanwhile therefore your first and the last care is to regain your health and not to worry about the future of the family, the country or the world. You cannot be the architect of any of these but you can contribute your own share to the advancement of all the three. In a true scheme of life the real advancement of one conduces to the advancement of all.

You may not write anything of your experiences of the events

happening around you. That must be a sealed book to me except what I can gather through the papers that I am permitted to receive; nor, constituted as I am by nature, have I the slightest desire to know them. A prisoner is civilly dead to the outside world, and that is right. If he hankers after peeping into the forbidden land he is like the departed ghost which according to our belief misbehaves itself if it hankers after establishing communication with the world he was made by the Angel of Death to leave. A prisoner who misbehaves like the ghost fails to establish real communication with the world he has left and in the vain pursuit loses the pleasure, such as it may be, which falls to the lot even of the prisoner. Realizing this beautiful truth I have never misbehaved like the ghost.

I shall remember what you say about the spelling of your name. It was Father who gave me the idea that you were a stickler for the right spelling of your name. You have now repaid him in his own coin and retort that he is a stickler, not you. I have thrown the apple of discord between father and son. You will now fight it out amongst yourselves. I do not mind because I am out of harm’s way, and since I have your permission I shall continue to spell your name after my own fashion.

But if I am not concerned about your health I am much concerned about Shivaprasad’s. I now understand why he is silent after having promised that he would send me weekly report about his health. I am deeply distressed. I will write to him, but in any case you will continue to give me such news as you may receive, and though you may not give me the news of the outside world you must continue to write to me about your own progress.

Remember me to the children and give them the love of us all and accept the same for yourself.

MY DEAR RAJBHOJ,

I have your letter. I see that you are in a hurry. I have thought over your scheme and I have conferred with Sheth Jamnalalji also. I think that at the present moment you should concentrate your attention upon your Hostel. That will certainly absorb much of your time if you are to make it an ideal home for students and then you will want some leisure from that routine work for public engagements. If you took up the responsibility of conducting an Ashram you will have to devote yourself entirely to it and then possess qualifications which you might not have today. In any case, seeing that you have that high ambition, I would like you, when you can spare yourself, to pass at least three months at the Ashram and try to live the Ashram life. That will certainly be of use to you in every one of your activities.

I am quite sure that you should give up the idea of reviving Dalit Bandhoo. As to the Marathi edition of Harijan, I am considering the thing myself. You have seen how it is a rule with me not to issue any paper that does not become self-supporting. It is to me a test of its being wanted by the public. It is only in rare cases that a paper may be issued in the first instance at a loss.

MY DEAR GHANSHYAMDAS,

I have your letter. I understand the situation. We can but do whatever is possible and await the result. It is beyond the control of man. I have a long letter from Malaviyaji in which he opposes the introduction of the Bills altogether and in any case insists upon their circulation. I am suggesting to him that he should come over here and discuss the whole thing with me before coming to a conclusion. I have suggested to Rajaji\(^2\) that he should go to him or send Devdas. I do not know whether it is worth while your going. I leave the thing to you.

About Bengal, I hope you saw my letter\(^3\) to Ramanand Baboo. And now Dr. Ambedkar appears on the scene,

I have written to Rajaji and also telegraphed\(^4\) him as to what I feel about exploiting the possibility of my fast. I think that it should not be done. The fast must be dismissed out of consideration altogether. This exploiting robs it of any spiritual value it might possess. The knowledge that it is a possibility may colour your action but you may not use it to affect the actions of others. That would amount to illegitimate pressure. I wish you will not henceforth mention it anywhere.

Yours sincerely,

\(^1\) The addressee had written: “The Bill could be introduced with a Select committee appointed in this session and can be passed in the Simla session only if the Government help. If the Government obstruct, then of course the Bill may not be introduced even in this session. But from what I see, I hope hey will at least help the introduction of the Bill in this session, but they would not be prepared to go beyond that. They would insist on the Bill being circulated. . . .”

I got your postcard. You had said in it that you would write a long letter. I waited for it, but since none came I am writing this.
Ceaseless efforts are being made to persuade Harijans to follow the rules of cleanliness and hygiene. Others may not distinguish between the different aspects of my work for Harijans, but why don’t you do so, and help me in regard to those which you accept? I hope you don’t doubt my intention or ability to adhere to a decision firmly made. It was my elders who joined themselves in a mutual bond with the Patwari family and, following in their foot-steps, I became personally indebted to you and have, therefore, always looked upon you as a respected elder. How can I give up this respectful attitude and why do you try to make me give it up? What does it matter if there are differences of opinion between us? Haven’t I such a difference with my sister too? But she does not cease to be my elder sister for that reason. My family has had the same kind of bond with the Patwari family for half a century and I, for my part, will not break it.

382. LETTER TO R. D. ATHAVALE

YERAVDA CENTRAL PRISON,
February 14, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter of 11th instant. I referred to Sjt. Gangadharrao and he says: “So far as I can remember I do not think that you had given any authority to Mr. Chhapkhane or to anybody else to use the money as he liked. It was understood that the amount collected at the meeting should be sent either to me or to you. The amount collected in the tour was to be applied to khadi.”

Your letter appears to be positive. I myself have no recollection whatsoever but it is most unusual for me when I am touring for a specific purpose and with a responsible man like Sjt. Gangadharrao Deshpande to leave any collections with anybody and that too without any instructions whatsoever as to its use. I would therefore like a letter from Sjt. Chhapkhane himself as to what he knows about it.

I must dissent from the proposition you have laid down that a person has no control over the monies entrusted by him to another for disposal even when the amount is unspent. But the first thing to determine is what was actually intended by me when the money was left with you. I take it that from now you will not make any use of the money till the matter is finally settled as to its control and disposal.

Yours sincerely,

383. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS

February 14, 1933

I have most carefully read Dr. Ambedkar’s statement for which I cannot conceal my sorrow, but I must also confess he has a perfect right to make a statement as he has done. Harijans have laboured under grievous wrongs for ages, and Dr. Ambedkar and other educated Harijans are fully conscious of these wrongs. The marvel to me is that they are not more bitter and more resentful than they are.

Having therefore excused their position, I cannot travel the same length that Dr. Ambedkar would have me do. He has asked me a straight question, and is entitled to an equally straight answer from me.

I have described myself as a Harijan by adoption and in order to qualify myself for the privilege that it is to me, I have endeavoured to enter the very depths of their feelings. I have lived with them, dined with them, and they have always claimed the first place in my thoughts and my prayers. I have done so not to do any favour to them, but as a matter of religious duty.

I am a Hindu not merely because I was born in the Hindu fold,

1 Vide “B. R. Ambedkar’s Statement”, 13-2-1933 but I am one by conviction and choice. As I know it and interpret it, it gives me all the solace I need, both here and hereafter. It solves for me many riddles of life. But it also contains, as it is practised today, the big blot of untouchability in the sense in which it is understood today, that is, distinction between man and man, one occupying the topmost rung of the ladder and another the lowest. If this doctrine of utmost superiority and utmost inferiority, descending from father to son for evertnity, is an integral part of Hinduism without the slightest prospect of a change, then I no more want to belong to it than does Dr.
Ambedkar. But I am convinced that this doctrine of eternal damnation is a thing utterly foreign to the spirit of Hinduism and the Shastras as I have understood them. There is no superiority or inferiority in the Hinduism of my conception. Therefore I should go the whole length with Dr. Ambedkar in fighting the arrogation of superiority on the part of any individual or class over any other. My fight against untouchability is a fight against this horrid doctrine. If untouchability goes from the heart of Hindus, superiority and inferiority are also gone.

But when Dr. Ambedkar wants to fight varnashrama itself I cannot be in his camp, because I believe varnashrama to be an integral part of Hinduism. It is quite evident that the varnashrama of Dr.
Ambedkar’s conception is being practised today, but that is not my conception of varnashrama. In my opinion, at present both varnadharma and ashramadharma are in abeyance, and if I were asked what varna is in operation at present, I would say Shudra varna, not because it is the lowest, but because it is the only thing that remains, for the divine knowledge, the power behind it and wealth for the support of this knowledge and power are gone. Knowledge, power and wealth there certainly are in a way. But in the religious conception of varnadharma, these three have to be used not for personal ends, but for spiritual and social advance. The only thing that remains open for all today is service, also included in the scheme of varnashramadharma, for a spiritual end. Out of that spirit of service, it is possible to revive spiritual knowledge, the power to defend it and the wealth to sustain both. Then, those who are in possession of that knowledge, and will use it for society will be Brahmans, those who use that power for the benefit of society will be Kshatriyas, and those who gain wealth and use wealth, also for society, are Vaishyas. They will all depend for their very existence on Shudras, the embodiments of real service. For me that is true varnashramas, and there is no question of superiority or inferiority in this conception.

The Shudra is as necessary for society as the Brahmin. Each will have, more or less, all the qualities and privileges of the rest, but people belonging to particular varnas will perform the special service assigned to them. There is then, in this conception, no question of privilege, but only duty and service.

I invite Dr. Ambedkar to shed his bitterness and anger and try to learn the beauties of the faith of his forefathers. Let him curse the caste Hindus as much as he likes but let him not curse Hinduism without making an unbiased study of it, and if it fails to sustain him in the hour of need, by all means let him forsake it.

Coming to the question of temple-entry, I entirely agree with him that Harijans cannot be and must not be beggars for it. It is for the caste Hindus to open temples whole-heartedly or not at all. I would repeat that the opening of temples is one of the duties that caste Hindus owe to Harijans. I hope Dr. Ambedkar’s statement is not intended to convey the meaning that Harijans do not feel the deprivation of the right to temple-entry, for I know from personal knowledge that for thousands of them, it is a serious deprivation. The betterment of their economic and educational conditions is undoubtedly required. But no betterment of those conditions will give religious equality. That can be attained only by admission into temples and all the religious consolation to which caste Hindus are today entitled. This religious equality cannot be attained even by statute, but only when the heart of the caste Hindus is changed. The Bills before the Assembly are not intended to force open the temples to Harijans, but only to make it possible for the caste Hindus to throw them open when the hearts of the majority are changed.

Dr. Ambedkar has confined himself to the criticism of the second Bill (Temple-entry Bill on the model of Dr. Subbaroyan’s Bill). In my opinion, this Bill is designed to test caste Hindu feelings. When the hearts of the majority are changed, temples would be thrown open. Surely, Dr. Ambedkar does not want forcible opening of temples. I do not, for one moment, hold the opinion, which he does, that the majority of caste Hindus today are not prepared to open temples to Harijans. Evidence of the Guruvayur referendum, despite Dr. Ambedkar’s belittling, is undoubtedly in favour of a change of heart on the part of caste Hindus. The referendum in Madura too, recently published, points in the same direction. There will be time enough to show dissatisfaction and disappointment when caste Hindus had been given an opportunity of expressing their opinion. Dr. Ambedkar, I observe, has remained silent about the first Bill (Untouchability Bill). It withdraws the recognition of secular law from the recognition of religious belief. I hope he has no objection to this Bill, but whether he has or not, caste Hindus have a duty to perform, that is, to secure the passage of the Bills with the utmost despatch.

384. LETTER TO M. G. BHANDARI

_February 15, 1933_

DEAR MAJOR BHANDARI,

There are two matters that I have discussed with you, with which you have told me you have no authority to deal.

The first matter relates to the supply of newspapers to me in terms of the orders of the Government of India, giving me special facilities about untouchability propaganda. Somehow or other hitherto I have managed to cope with my work in spite of restrictions that you have been exercising about newspapers addressed to me. I have already drawn your attention to very important matters escaping my notice owing to the non-delivery of these papers. However careful your staff may be, they cannot always be sure of having all the cuttings relating to untouchability in the papers received. Some papers such as Dr. Ambedkar’s I have to look through fully and carefully. So far as I read the Government of India orders they contemplate no restrictions on the prompt receipt by me of correspondence and newspapers. It is obvious that I cannot carry on propaganda if I do not get such things in proper time. I therefore ask that all the newspapers received for me and which do not come under the heading of “prohibited literature” should be delivered to me as they arrive. Of course they may be taken away from me as soon as I have used them. I need hardly repeat the assurance that I have no use for them save for the one purpose to which all my energy and attention are being exclusively directed. I shall therefore thank you to obtain necessary and early instructions in the matter.

The second matter is about the new weekly _Harijan_ which is being published in Poona in the interest of the Servants of Untouchables Society. Its policy is naturally being controlled by me. as it has been published at my instance. It has therefore to deal exclusively with questions relating to untouchability only and therefore it is a purely socio-religious weekly. I ask you whether copies could be sent to my associates and fellow-prisoners whether belonging to ‘B’ class or ‘C’ class. I would thank you if you will kindly ask for Government’s instructions on my request. I may draw the attention of the Government to the fact that in 1922 when I was admitted into this Prison as a convicted prisoner and when in all other matters except food and sanitary conveniences I had no facilities given to me except what were permitted to other prisoners, there never was any difficulty about my getting newspapers of a purely socio-religious character. I hope, therefore, there will be none this time about the giving of Harijan to my friends, the fellow-prisoners.

Lastly, will you please convey my thanks to the Government for their very prompt attention to my letters¹ about Shrimati Mirabehn (Slade) and Appasaheb Patwardhan.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

385. LETTER TO JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

February 15, 1933

MY DEAR JAWAHARLAL,

In the hope of giving you a good letter against your splendid letter² I have been postponing writing to you. But I can do so no longer. Daily the work is increasing. I must therefore write now and do the best I can. I wonder if you are allowed an innocent paper like Harijan. I am sending it in the hope that you will get it. If you do, you will please let me have your opinion. The fight against sanatanists is becoming more and more interesting if also increasingly difficult. The one good thing is that they have been awakened from long lethargy. The abuses they are hurling at me are wonderfully refreshing. I am all that is bad and corrupt on this earth. But the storm will subside. For I apply the sovereign remedy of non-retaliation. The more I ignore the abuses, the fiercer they are becoming. But it is the death dance of the moth round a lamp. Poor Rajagopalachari and Devdas! They are also in for it. They are dragging out the engagement with Lakshmi and weaving round it foul charges. Thus is untouchability being supported!

Sarup and Krishna saw me the other day about untouchability and Indu as part of the domestic interview. Indu was in excellent health and seemed to be quite happy. Sarup is having a brief tour in Kathiawar and Gujarat for anti-untouchability and Krishna was to have gone to Allahabad. Devdas is in Delhi helping Raja who is moving the M.L.A.s for the anti-untouchability Bills. Our time is being wholly occupied by the untouchability work. Sardar Vallabhbhai contributes all the envelopes for the ever-increasing number of outgoing letters. He is the diligent newspaper reader who digs out odd bits of information on untouchability and what not. He is also a factory for the inexhaustible supply of mirth. The inspection day is just the same to him as any other day. He never has any request to make. With me never a day passes but I have some request to make. But I do not know which is the happier. Why may I not be as happy as he, if I can take my defeats without pulling a long face!

We all envy your solitude and your studies. It is true that our burdens are of our own making or more accurately of my making. I have dashed to pieces all Vallabhbhai’s hope of becoming a good Sanskrit scholar. He can’t concentrate on his studies in the midst of the excitement of Harijan work and the daily dish of spiced criticism which he enjoys like the Bengal footballers their game. Mahadev continues to be what Shaukat described him to be—the hamal of the party. No work is too much for him or beyond him. Chhaganlal Joshi is still finding his feet. But he is flourishing. With the spring now well on us, he cannot fail to blossom out. We are not a bad assortment. We observe the rules of the game and so make a fairly decent family strictly regulated by the code of varnashrama which between Dr. Ambedkar and me will soon provide a new sensation for the sanatanists. More trouble for me but none of my seeking, I assure

386. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

February 15, 1933

MY DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

I have your letter of the 9th instant, regarding Travancore Christian Pulayas. If they are unapproachable I don’t know that we can exclude them from our service. After all, what is the service? The admission to schools we may not refuse to Christian unapproachables, or to wells. Again we may not refuse to share the wells with them. The line has to be drawn at the temples of course. Therefore you can say that Christian unapproachables would be entitled to the same civic services as the other unapproachables. When it comes to the question of giving individual scholarships, there may be a difficulty. But I am not inclined to anticipate and provide against it now. When it comes, we shall deal with it. All this, however, is my individual view and you should take it for what it is worth.

Yours sincerely,

387. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

February 15, 1933

DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

With reference to your letter of the 11th instant, Mr. Simon’s letter cannot be disregarded. He should be definitely asked whether he and the young men who would work under his supervision can conscientiously work amongst the untouchables purely with a view to ‘service’ and without the slightest mental reservation as to making them Christians. Their ambition should be to make them better Hindus and better members of society. You should tell Mr. Simon plainly that unless we have that guarantee, we may not make the experiment of employing non-Hindu agencies. If Mr. Simon undertakes work under those conditions he should be entrusted with it and called upon not only to render at least a fortnightly report to you but to keep himself in touch with the local branch of the Society. You should also find out through Christian friends from St. Stephen’s College what they can say about Mr. Simon.

390. LETTER TO JANAKIDEVI BAJAJ

February 15, 1933

CHI. JANAKIBEHN,

It is Jamnalal’s definite opinion that Om should be separated. His next suggestion is that Om should be placed with Varutai. She will look after her carefully. If, however, you have any objection to this, she may be put either in the Ashram or in Sharda Mandir according as you wish. You should now select one of the three places, make the necessary arrangements without delay and inform me what you have done. Jamnalal thinks that you will prefer the Varutai proposal to the others, and he himself likes it most.

As for Kesarbehn, Jamnalal intends to make arrangements for separation as soon as he is released.

You should not delay in taking the necessary steps in such matters.

BHAII PARIKSHITLAL,

I got your telegram. I did not mean Saruprani, Jawaharlal’s mother, but meant Sarupbehn, his sister, wife of Ranjit Pandit, who is in Bombay. As Pandit belongs to Rajkot, Sarupbehn can be regarded as a Kathiawari. The name given to her by her husband’s family is Vijayalakshmi. She will reach Bhavnagar on 19th. Consult Ramjibhai and fix up your programme. Sarupbehn’s address is: Meher Villa, Laburnum Road, Gamdevi, Bombay. If you can, send a weekly report of the progress of work in Gujarat for publication in Harijan.

392. LETTER TO RUKMINIDEVI AND BENARSILAL BAJAJ

February 15, 1933

CHI. RUKMINI,

I forgot to reply to one question which you had asked in your postcard. If the yarn spun by a person as contribution to the Spinners Association is removed from the spindle and wound into a hank by somebody else, there will certainly be no violation of the yajna. However, the porridge will be sweet in proportion to the quantity of jaggery which you mix with it. Similarly, the yajna will be perfect in proportion to the labour which one puts in for spinning and producing yarn. If the spinning-wheel is got ready by one person, the yarn is moistened by somebody else, the length is measured by a third person and the yarn is wound into a hank by a fourth person and I only spin, I shall have done the yajna but shall deserve only pass marks. Radhika’s ship of health is certainly weak. One cannot say whether it will reach the shore safely.

DEAR DR. SAPRU,

I thank you for both your letters and your telegram. I am approaching the members of the Assembly in my own way. Though I have written to the Viceroy, there is no reply from him. Rajagopalachari and Ghanshyamdas are both doing their utmost to consolidate the opinion of the members of the Assembly. I see that you have considered only one Bill. I would like you to consider the other also. It is a very short Bill. That also is before the Assembly and it is the first of the two to receive sanction for introduction. Therefore I take it that it would be the first to be considered by the current session of the Assembly, if it is to be considered at all.

For ready reference I am sending you Rajagopalachari’s booklet containing both the Bills. If it does not come into your hands at the same time that this letter does, you will perhaps not mind sending for the first Bill from the Leader office.

I would suggest your writing to the Viceroy. Mr. Jayakar has written at my request.

Thank you for your enquiry about my health. I am keeping quite fit and well.

Yours sincerely,

1 Dated February 2 and 11. In his letter dated February 2, 1933, the addressee had expressed his sympathy and support for the campaign against untouchability and stated: “... that even a moderate measure of this character has not much of a chance in the Assembly as it is constituted. ... Meanwhile, my advice is that you should, over your own signature, address a communication to the members of the Legislature asking them to push forward this legislation. I fear an attempt will be made to secure the circulation of this Bill, which, in my opinion, will be tantamount to shelving it for the time being. Orthodox opinion may well be presumed to be hostile to it. It seems to me a clash with that opinion is inevitable.” For extracts from his letter dated February 11, vide “Dr. Sapru on Untouchability Bills”, 25-2-1933.

395. LETTER TO L. R. PANGARKAR

February 16, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I endeavoured to send you as full a reply as the time at my disposal would permit me to send.

I entirely endorse your suggestion that just as others learn from the Gods and the scriptures what they want to, so must I. Some people learn only by making blunders. I have often found myself doing so, but I don’t regret for the simple reason that at the time I made the blunders I was wholly unconscious of them. I try to be cautious, but however cautious I may be, unless I become a perfect man, I cannot become proof against unconscious errors. But so long as I retain the capacity to own them frankly and fully as soon as I become conscious, it is well with me and well even with those who may be affected by my errors. If by fear of blunder I hesitated to act at all I should never succeed in reaching truth.

I must persist in saying that the Bills before the Assembly are in no way intended to compel anybody to act contrary to his conscience. I quite see your own viewpoint. It is my misfortune that I cannot make you see mine. I can therefore only ask you to be patient with me.

398. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS

February 16, 1933

Commenting on the statement in the News Chronicle that untouchability is an evil extraordinarily difficult to uproot by legislation alone, Mr. Gandhi said:

I am not surprised at the ignorance betrayed by the writer in the News Chronicle when we have in India itself obstinate refusal on the part of many people to see that there is nothing at all in the two Bills in the shape of compulsion. I could understand the difficulty, if there was a measure to abolish untouchability by law.

Again, the writer asks whether the Government ought to regard the abolition of untouchability as a duty imposed on it by considerations of humanity such as compelled it to abolish suttee. Surely, a comparison between the Suttee Suppression Law and the present Bills is most misleading. The practice of suttee is a penal offence, whereas the present Bill merely withholds legal recognition from untouchability. In my opinion, the Government is morally bound to help the reformers to adopt reforms wherever public opinion is ripe for it.
British journalists should recognize the correctness of the reformers’ position. They do not seek to bring about reforms by compulsion. Not to pass these measures will be a block on the progress of reform, which is being prosecuted by reformers against heavy odds.

Asked if he was doing anything to persuade the members of the Assembly to facilitate the passage of the Bills, Mr. Gandhi said that he had adopted the most effective step in sending Mr. Rajagopalachariar there to present his case and seek the assistance of every member, Hindu members for supporting the Bills, and non-Hindus for facilitating consideration of the Bills in this session itself.

400. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

February 17, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

I begin this at 3.15 a.m. on Friday. It seems that now I shall get your weekly letter not on Wednesday morning but on Thursday afternoon. It suits me better. For I have no time for personal letters on Wednesdays and Thursdays, both the days being required for Harijan. Everything must go out of my hands by 6 p.m. on \(^1\)Vide the following item.

Thursday. Hence though I must write on other days as well for Harijan, I must devote Wednesdays and Thursdays entirely to it. This is almost as before.

The extra note that I thought I might have to write I did not and could not have written with but extraordinary effort.

I gather from your letter that you are not locked for the night. You must take the fullest advantage of that liberty. The best food you want is the freshest air all day and all night. Therefore you should work outdoor during the day, if, as I learn, you have many neem trees in your yard. You should sleep all night directly under the sky—not even the shade of the trees—dew or no dew. The most direct contact with the stars is absolutely essential. Dew causes no mischief so long as you are well covered from toe to neck and the head also if necessary and so long as your lips are tightly closed and you are sure that you are breathing only through the nose—to ensure this at the time of retiring you should take a few deep breaths through the nose whilst you are lying flat on your back with legs fully stretched. You should set apart certain fixed time, say, five minutes each time for taking these breaths. Then you will acquire the habit of always breathing through the nose. Those who, without practice, think that they naturally breathe through the nose, are not always right. They do not know when they breathe through the mouth. Unfortunately in the majority of cases correct breathing is an acquired habit. Tuberculosis is an impossibility with one who takes freshest air, drinks pure water, eats properly the proper quantity of the proper food and has proper exercise.

I have thanked the Government for removing you from Arthur Road. They have done it promptly and well. It is true that I had definitely asked for transfer to Yeravda. But they must have their good reasons for not transferring you there. Sabarmati is undoubtedly the next best, knowing you as I do—Sabarmati should be the best if you realized that though my body dwells in Yeravda, my spirit is to be found in Sabarmati. The body without the spirit is like the Taj without Shahjehan a tomb!

You should have reported all about the glands to the Surgeon at Arthur Road. We may not ask for transfers but we are bound to report our condition. For the authorities hold our bodies in the expectation that we shall report all about their condition to them. If we do not, we commit at least a technical, if not a full breach, of prison discipline.

288 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
You will therefore report every irregularity to the Superintendent who the Government tell me is an I. M. S. officer and therefore a fully qualified physician. You should try to make your body 100 per cent proof against disease.

It is a great joy to me that you have Ba with you and Gangabehn and Kusum. Have you no access to the others?

Tell Gangabehn\(^1\) and Kusum that I wrote to both of them. I enclose letters for them and Ba. You will hand them, if they are entitled or permitted to have them. There is nothing in them but welfare news.

My weight and food continue as usual and so also the elbows.

406. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

February 17, 1933

DEAR SATISBABOO,

Your telegram was received yesterday. A reply was sent most hurriedly. I forgot therefore to give you my opinion of the name of the Bengali edition. Why should it not be identical with the title of the English weekly, simply ‘Harijan’? You will publish the Bengali edition as of the original, but you need not give and it should be wrong to give whole translation of everything that may appear in the English weekly. You should give only a condensed translation of whatever appears in the English edition. You will even omit certain things which may not be necessary for the Bengali reader and put in many other things, but nothing inconsistent with the tenor of the English edition. You will therefore personally supervise every line that appears in it. You will send me also for the English weekly whatever news you may have about the progress of the movement in Bengal.

Perhaps you have replied to the Manager of the Harijan as to the number of copies you want per week.

How is your work in the bastis\(^1\) progressing, and how are you keeping yourself?

Yours sincerely,

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS,

I have your letter. I shall be glad to see you all on Monday next, the 20th instant, at 2.30 p.m. You will not take more than 30 minutes and if you will come with questions prepared beforehand, we should be able to go through a lot of work in 30 minutes.

408. LETTER TO MANIBEHN N. PARikh

February 17, 1933

CHI. MANIBEHN,

You should not regard anything I write as a rebuke to you. If you do that, I shall be able to write nothing which may help you. What I wrote certainly does not apply to you alone. It applies to all, not excluding even myself. We must know what an ideal mother should be. I don’t think that you have enough knowledge to be an ideal mother. Hard work may certainly help a woman to make up for part of the deficiency, but the original deficiency can be removed only by realizing it and taking the necessary steps to overcome it. The practice of making the children brush their teeth before going to bed is a good one. Massage the gums vigorously with your fingers. The babool stick is not so efficacious.

409. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

February 17, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

Wednesdays and Thursdays are devoted wholly to Harijan. I cannot, therefore, write any letters on those days. Amina’s problem seems to have been solved for the present. How painful that a Muslim boy or girl cannot be admitted in a Hindu institution? Of course Chandulal\(^1\) or Nanabhai\(^2\) are in no way to blame. They could not have given any other reply.

I don’t think you read the letter written by Suresh. It is a long one. Let me know how you found him. Mahavir wrote to me from Bombay. He wants a letter of recommendation. I don’t wish to give him one. Krishnamaiyadevi does not wish at all to work. I intend to write to her.

You will find with this a letter from Maruti. In view of what he says in it, it is best that they should be married as soon as possible. If Dudabhai or Lakshmi rejects the proposal, we will refuse further responsibility for getting her married. Read the accompanying letters.

CHI NAPOLEON,

I was very happy when I read your letter. I did not receive the one written from Navasari. It was good that you went to Visapur. What is Somabhai suffering from?

Your handwriting is certainly better than it was. But it should improve still further. How many boys are there in your class? Give me

YERAVDA MANDIR,

February 17, 1933

CHI. AMINA,

So after all you could not go to Sharda Sadan. If you are satisfied with what you can get in the Ashram you will get everything from it. You should have the desire for that. You must find time for reading and writing. I have already written to you regarding the children. Learn to write the Urdu characters correctly. It is in your hand to do that. It will be enough if you write to me in Urdu once every week. If you write every day, it will be the daily lesson. Quietly adjust your work so as to find time for reading and writing and be a good teacher to the children.

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have your letter. You will see from Harijan that I do not see any particular need to go to Panditji now. It is all to the good that the secret is out.

I can meet Ambedkar any number of times. But nothing can be done against his will. His nature also should be understood.

In most cases, there is no cause to get frightened by children’s fever.

You must get rid of your cold. Coughing is also the result of cold, is it not? Come whenever you feel like it except on Wednesday and Thursday. Send your comments on Harijan.

417. AN APPEAL TO M. L. A.S

A valued friend suggests that I should send personal letters to the members of the Assembly bespeaking their support to the consideration, during the current session, of Sjt. Ranga Iyer’s two Bills on untouchability. I hope there is no false pride in me. Having made up my mind, or, as critics would say, deceived myself into the belief, that in spite of my non-co-operation there was nothing wrong in asking the members to do what was right, I would not hesitate, if I was free, to go to them personally and show to them why it was necessary for all the members to allow the Bills to be considered without delay and for the Hindu members to back them for the sake of the purity of their religion. But I am not free and I have found in Sjt. C. Rajagopalachariar a better lobbyist than myself and perhaps better also at the art of wooing obstinate members. He is, therefore, in Delhi as my duly authorized agent to plead my cause. The public know what confidence I have in him as an exponent of and believer in whatever philosophy there may be in me. Therefore, it would be superfluous, and if it was any other agent, even discourteous to him, if I was to write directly to the members who, I hope, will regard Rajagopalachari’s appeal to them as much more than a letter to them individually.

418. SJT. JAYAKAR ON UNTOUCHABILITY

The foregoing is the text kindly sent to me by Sjt. Jayakar of the Bill on untouchability which he had sought to introduce into the Assembly while he was a member. It is important for three reasons: Firstly, it shows that he, as a distinguished lawyer and an equally distinguished Sanskrit scholar, considers that his Bill merely seeks to remove “obstacles”, created by British Indian courts’ decisions, in the way of the abolition, even by the people concerned, of customs which they may consider contrary to their welfare, morals or conscience. Secondly, it is in substance a combination of the two Bills now before the Assembly and the country; and thirdly, it shows that

1 Vide “Letter to Tej Bahadur Sapru”, 16-2-1933
2 Not reproduced here
the matter has been before the country for several years and is in no sense new. The British Indian courts’ decisions and rulings referred to by Sjt. Jayakar have acted on the Hindu society as a deadweight which has stopped its healthy growth. The two Bills, like Sjt. Jayakar’s combination, seek merely to remove the deadweight.

_Harijan, 18-2-1933_

419. WORK IN CALCUTTA BASTIS

Sjt. Vasantlal Morarka writes from Calcutta:

We have already commenced to do work amongst the Harijans. We have taken charge of 20 night and day schools in the _bastis_. Nearly 500 boys and girls are receiving instruction in these schools, and we are tackling the problem of having water-pipes laid, sanitary conveniences supplied and of carrying on propaganda for the eradication of the drink evil and other evil habits. Moreover, we had a meeting and sports organized under the chairmanship of Shrimati Saruprani Nehru. Marwadi, Harijan and other boys freely mixed together. Men and women also did likewise. There was absence of all artificiality about this gathering. Nevertheless, I must confess to you that the work in the _bastis_ is very difficult.

I know what the work in the _bastis_ is like. Sjt. Satis Chandra Das Gupta of Khadi Pratishthan has already described to me in graphic and heart-rending terms the condition of the Harijans living in the _bastis_. These difficulties may not daunt workers. If removal of untouchability was an easy job, we would have achieved it long ago. It is only now that we are having a foretaste of these difficulties. But patience and perseverance will overcome even an Everest of them.

420. IS THIS BROTHERLINESS?

As sanatanists persist in their statement that untouchability, as we know it, is not a blot upon Hinduism and that Harijans are well treated and are a happy and contented lot, and as I know that some of them, if not many, honestly believe in that statement, it becomes necessary to demonstrate the fallacy of that belief and show that the treatment actually received by Harijans cannot possibly be worse. Such demonstration will also give the reformer an idea of the work that is in front of him. Even when sanatanists and reformers join hands, as they undoubtedly will one day, there will be work enough and to spare for several thousand volunteers. Though I have written and I shall continue to write with vigour about the necessity of admission of Harijans to temples, I have never given and shall never give a back seat to the constructive work. But what I am certain about is that admission of Harijans to temples will automatically quadruple the pace of constructive reform.

Here is, then, a free translation of a letter from a Gujarati worker among Harijans in parts of Gujarat near Ahmedabad:

Harijans suffer great hardships from the so-called higher classes. In some villages they are not allowed to build verandahs for their houses. They may not build houses with an upper storey. They may not wear decent clothing, nor ride horses. There can, therefore, be no question in these villages of Harijan children receiving any education or having a decent recreation ground. The high-class people will not even tolerate any discussion about reform. The Harijans cannot take advantage of the Government instructions that they should have access to public places on the same terms as other Hindus. And now there have sprung among them false sadhus and bavas¹ who under all kinds of pretences cheat them. Then, there is the vicious habit they have copied from higher classes of having infant marriages and incurring expenses in connection with these marriages. They do not hesitate to pay 30% interest on two or three hundred rupees that they must spend on the marriage of their children, and it often happens that these little children die before they come of age and so the whole of the expense becomes a complete waste. These customs have resulted in a perpetuity of debts which continue to increase without the prospect of ever being discharged. And, of course, they have untouchability amongst themselves. The result is that those who are considered the lowest have to exist on what dirty water they can collect from anywhere.

This is from one of the latest letters. The following is taken from a letter received by Sjt. Amritlal Thakkar from one Mr. Simon, M. A., who is a missionary for Children’s Special Service in the West Godavari District.² He writes from Narsapur and says:

² Vide “Letter to Amritlal V. Thakkar”, 15-2-1933
The principal untouchables are Malas and Madigas who live on the outskirts of the main village, far from the habitations of the caste Hindus, and are the worst untouchables in the sense that they live in an appalling environment of dirt and squalour. The boys and girls live in huts under the most insanitary conditions and are ragged and dirty, as they have never understood or experienced the joy of being clean. Their parents themselves are careless of the cleanliness and the education of their children, not to say of their morality.

I believe that such a condition is due to their poverty on the one hand, and the dirt to which they have become habituated from ages. The Malapalem and the Madiga gudem are on the borders of the caste Hindus’ village, hemmed in, on all sides, by the encroachments of the paddy field owners. The Malas are a coolie class employed only for field work and the Madigas are shoemakers. The latter class eat the meat of dead animals. So, they live outside the pale of decent society, caged like wild animals, treated worse than the most uncared for village dogs.

It is not possible for me to reject any of these two pieces of evidence as exaggerated, because I have been an eye-witness to such things in other places. Nor am I disposed to underrate Mr. Simon’s evidence because of his being a foreigner, for the simple reason that his letter has been written for the sake of doing some service through the Servants of Untouchables Society and, therefore, incurs the risk of being utterly discredited if he made an exaggerated report. Even from the most selfish point of view, it can be shown that this criminal neglect of the manpower of the country is an economic waste which can never be exaggerated. The same people, if they were made honourable and equal members of Hindu society, will add to the material and moral resources of the country to an extent it is difficult to conceive. At the present moment they are a burden upon society. For, they discredit Hinduism, and the depression of 40 million human beings cannot but drag down the other 260 millions with them.

421. WHEN IS IT POSSIBLE?

I observe that Sjt. C. Rajagopalachariar and Sheth Ghanshyamdas Birla have, in a statement issued by them, referred to the possibility of another fast by me. If these two friends have thus not hesitated to exploit such a possibility, it is not unlikely that others are doing likewise without my knowing it. I have already sent a wire¹ to the two friends urging them not to repeat the mistake. And hereby I warn all friends against copying their example.

Such exploitation robs a spiritual act of all its value. The dreaded event may never come to pass. All I know is that there is, so far as I am aware, no present possibility of its coming.

Pandit Malaviyaji, whom I regard as an elder brother, has sent me a loving message of which the following is the substance:

You are in a hurry. You must go slow. Take care that pride of tapasya does not corrupt you. Tapasya without humility is of no avail and may even be harmful. There should be no more fasting.

I prize this warning. I know that pride of merit damages a soul like a heinous sin. I hope I am not consciously proud. What I am, unconsciously and in spite of myself, God only knows fully and, to some extent, those who surround me. I am not impatient with anyone.
I am, however, impatient of untouchability. But I know that its destruction is no one man’s work. God has suffered the evil to exist all these long years and He will remove it in His own good time.

Nevertheless, He expects all Hindus to do their duty. Suffering even unto death and, therefore, even through a perpetual fast is the last weapon of a satyagrahi. That is the last duty which it is open to him to perform. Therefore, fast is a part of my being as, I hold, it has been, to a large or small extent, of every seeker of Truth. I am making an experiment in ahimsa on a scale perhaps unknown in history. That I may be wholly wrong is quite possible, but quite irrelevant to the present purpose. So long as I am not conscious of the error, but, on the contrary, am sure, as far as it is humanly possible to be, of being in the right, I must go on with my pursuit to the farthest end. And in this manner, but in no other, a fast or a series of fasts are always a possibility in my life. I have undergone many before now since childhood. There should be no alarm felt if they are undertaken for public causes. Nor must anyone exploit them in anticipation. When they come, they will produce their own effect and result, whether anybody wills or no. But it is wrong to speculate over the contingency.

I, therefore, implore the public to dismiss from their minds, and be unaffected by, the remote possibility of another fast by me in this

¹ Vide “Draft Telegram to C. Rajagopalchari”, 13-2-1933 campaign against untouchability and to accept my assurance that, if such a fast does come, it will have come in obedience to the call of Truth which is God. I will not be a traitor to God to please the whole world.

422. AGREEING TO DIFFER

There are some whose friendship and co-operation I prize beyond measure. One of such men is Pandit Malaviyaji, whom from the time that we first met I have recognized as an elder brother. Nevertheless, it has been often my misfortune to disagree with him. Our disagreement, however, has never in the slightest degree diminished our mutual affection.

The correspondence published below will show the reader how we have again found it necessary to differ. Conscience is a hard taskmaster.

I do not propose to deal with all the points covered in the correspondence. I would confine myself to the vital matter referred to in it, viz., the interpretation of the Bombay Resolutions. In my opinion, with all the deference that I owe to Malaviyaji, I feel that the Bombay Resolution which I give below has only one meaning. Under it, responsible Hindus are bound to give to the Harijans through law that which only law can give. This they are bound to do now, if at all possible, and wait for the swaraj Parliament only if the legal relief becomes an impossibility now. It cannot be considered an impossibility till all effort humanly possible has been made.

My duty and that of the Hindus who accept my interpretation is quite clear. We must ask all the members of the Assembly, and especially the Hindu members, to help us to fulfil the pledge given, not merely to Dr. Ambedkar and cultured Harijans like him, but to the dumb and suffering forty millions whom they seek to represent, and whom it should be the duty and privilege of every caste Hindu to represent equally with the leaders of the Harijans. Let me repeat for the hundredth time that there is a legal bar against temple-entry which cannot be removed by any agreement on the part of all the Hindus combined. A legal bar can only be removed by a legislative act. What an agreement amongst Hindus can do is to move the Government to give effect to it as was done in connection with the political part of the Yeravda Pact. Those caste Hindus who strained themselves to ensure recognition of the political part of the Yeravda Pact are now doubly bound to give effect to the other resolutions which were the direct and natural consequence of the Yeravda Pact; and since in the course of complying with those resolutions it has been discovered that there is a legal difficulty which was not foreseen then, that difficulty has got to be removed at the earliest possible moment. Hence the two Bills.

2 Not reproduced here; for the text of the Resolution, _vide_ “Statement on Viceroy’s Decision”, 24-1-1933

But, says Malaviyaji, temple-entry, the opening of wells, etc., had to be done by persuasion, not by compulsion. I quite agree, but to remove a legal bar is not to do the desired thing by compulsion. There is the Madura temple. If I am correctly informed, the trustees of that temple are elected by the Hindu voters. They are pledged to open the temple. By an overwhelming majority, the Hindu voters have desired the opening of the temple. But, because of the legal bar, the trustees cannot open the temple to the Harijans. Will it be compulsion to have that legal bar removed by law? I can cite several other instances where willing trustees of public temples are powerless to give effect to the public demand and their own wishes. I venture, therefore, to think that there is no escape from permissive and corrective legislation. If the Bills are defective, the defect can be remedied. I have submitted the Bills to two eminent lawyers for their opinion. Sjt. Jayakar’s the public will learn from another column of this issue of Harijan. I have also approached Dr. Sapru, and I betray no confidence when I inform the public that he has already expressed his opinion in emphatic terms in favour of the second Bill, i.e., the Temple-entry Bill, to which Malaviyaji has taken strong exception. Dr. Sapru sees no compulsion in it. I have invited him to examine the first Bill also. Every legitimate difficulty can be easily met if the principle of securing immediate relief from the legal obstacle is admitted. Therefore, in my opinion, the way before the reformer is quite clear. He must invite the Government to facilitate consideration of the Bills.

1 Vide “Sjt. Jayakar on Untouchability”, 18-2-1933
2 Vide “Letter to Tej Bahadur Sapru”, 26-1-1933; for Sapru’s opinion, vide “Dr. Sapru on Untouchability Bills”, 25-2-1933.
during the current session, and appeal to the members also to give that facility. Success or failure is not his concern. But earnest and ceaseless effort is his concern and is under his control, and he must not flinch, whether he is one or many.

Malaviyaji suggests that the Bills be circulated. I have not been able to follow his reasoning. If the Bills were of a compulsory character, I should not only support circulation, but perhaps I should oppose their introduction altogether. But the Bills are purely of a permissive character. They pave the way for ascertaining Hindu opinion in accordance with rules laid down in the law itself. I should be prepared to accept any amendment that would make it impossible to force the opening of a single public temple against the will of those who have been hitherto entitled to offer worship in the particular temple. After all, what is wanted is not removal of untouchability by law. If the Hindu heart harbours untouchability, it will be there, whether the law recognizes it or not. But the aid of law cannot be invoked to regulate religious belief, as it was invoked by sanatanists when the court decisions referred to by Sjt. Jayakar were obtained. Legal interference, therefore, was invoked by the very people who are today stoutly opposing the introduction of the Bills, which seek not to impose any compulsion, but to remove the existing compulsion, that makes impossible a due fulfilment of the pledge embodied in the Bombay Resolutions.

423. TEMPLE-ENTRY AND VARNASHRAMA

It is to be hoped that the reader has read Dr. Ambedkar’s statement and my reply\(^1\) on the temple-entry question and there-on on varnashramadharma. I had intended to republish them in _Harijan_, but I see that it is not possible to do so without enlarging the size of a journal which is just entering upon the second week of its existence. I have, therefore, relied upon the reader having read both Dr. Ambedkar’s statement and my reply.

Let the reader understand that Dr. Ambedkar does want temple-entry, but he wants something more. Very rightly, he would not beg for it. Quite wrongly, he would not even help caste Hindus to do the correct thing. The more that he wants is complete destruction of varnashramadharma of his imagination. Varnashrama to him means the essence of superiority and inferiority. I admit that today varnashrama does mean that, if it also means much more, but the evil of high-and-low-ness is represented by untouchability. When, therefore, the latter is demolished, varnashrama will be purged of the very thing for which Dr. Ambedkar abhors it.

Varnashrama of my conception is a wholly different thing. It exists only in name today. Let the reader, therefore, be not led astray from the main purpose. It will be time enough to look after varnashrama when the doctrine of high and low is demolished.

It is necessary, too, not to be disturbed over my definition of varnashrama. I am aware that it will shock sanatanist friends, but they will permit me to act according to my reading of the Shastras and the whole spirit of Hinduism. The letters that I receive from sanatanists do not tell me that they believe in the doctrine of high and low. On the contrary, they protest against my statement that caste Hindus have regarded Harijans as inferiors, always to be kept at a distance. Therefore, they should join hands in purging Hinduism of the doctrine of inequality of status, irrespective of their conception of varnashrama. After all, only that conception which the masses accept will hold the field. The scope of the present campaign against untouchability is strictly limited. It will be a great pity to befog the public mind by raising before it the cry of ‘Varnashrama in danger’. I am convinced that it is more in danger from those who will be blind to what is going on in Hinduism today than from Dr. Ambedkar who courageously says: ‘I shall have nothing to do with varnashrama that would keep me and mine for ever at the bottom of the social scale.’ If we would find room for such as him in Hinduism, let us show him by our acts that varnashrama is not a vertical line but that it is a horizontal plane on which all the children of God occupy absolutely the same status, though they may be engaged in different pursuits of life and though they may have different qualities and different tastes.¹

DEAR MOTI BABOO,

I had expected to hear from you after your visit to Allahabad. Please make up the defect now.

I expect your criticism of Harijan. You should also ask some responsible people to get subscribers and send me a weekly report of the actual constructive work done by the members of the Sangh¹ among Harijans. The report should be unvarnished.

Please tell Panchanan Shastri Tarkaratna that he has keenly disappointed me. Nothing pains me so much as a breach of promise. He promised to prosecute his search for a meeting-ground between sanatanists and reformers.² I have heard nothing from him on the point. He promised twice that he would send his son or someone equally learned to put before me his own view and to answer my questions and help me generally to understand the sanatanists, standpoint. Is he still going to send some such person?

Again, his son was one of the pandits who were to have seen me. I was grieved that he should have been amongst those who, in my opinion, behaved in a manner unworthy of learned men.³ I had to exercise great self-restraint in drawing the curtain over the events of that painful day. They were painful because those who should be repositories of the real Shastras seemed to be so wanting in dignity and ordinary courtesies of life. This is the very first occasion when I have put my pen to paper in order to characterize the conduct of the learned men on that day, and I have done so because of my regard for Panchanan Shastri, and because his son was one of those Shastras. If I accept anything from Panchanan Shastri, he should know exactly where I stand, and he should know what I think of those to whom he lent the weight of his name and the services of his son.

You will either send this very extract to him or its translation or go over to him and personally tell him what I have written to you.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your very touching letter, but you must not be bewildered nor be pained. My reply was in Gujarati, but the translation you have read is fairly correct. What I have said in answer to the questions put by the ex-Dewan of Morvi I have said repeatedly in my writings. It could not have escaped you if you had followed my writings carefully. Nor is it inconsistent with the law of heredity. The law cannot be changed but if we know the law we will suit our actions in accordance with it and that is precisely what my answer means. Essential qualities are transmitted from father to son. If parties having like qualities marry, they carry out the law of heredity and therefore also the law of varna. Such marriages have taken place in Hindu society ever since the establishment of varnashrama. This ought to give you satisfaction. You do not expect me to give you a detailed reply to the conundrums you have raised. You will believe me when I tell you that I have not even the time for doing it. If you will carefully follow the pages of Harijan, all your doubts will be solved. But if they are not, you should dismiss me from your consideration. The cause is far superior to me. You and I live for the cause and work for it. If I err in the common prosecution of the common cause, you will leave me and march forward towards the goal. The limits of untouchability work are well defined. Never mind my views of extraneous matters, such as caste and varna, intermarriage and interdining. I am not presenting my views on these matters for public acceptance at the present moment. I give those views for the satisfaction of enquirers, for I would have my friends and the public to know me as I am and not picture me as something they fancy but has no likeness to me. If even this does not give you satisfaction, you must find time to come to me and discuss the whole thing with me till you have full satisfaction.

Yours sincerely,

426. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

February 18, 1933

MY DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

You have sent me draft of constitution and rules of the Society. Four people have been at it. All of us four feel that it is to be re-drafted altogether. Shastri is at it just now. You will please forgive me if I am not ready with my suggestions yet for some time. It does not matter if it takes a little time, but whatever we give must be thoroughly sound and perfectly readable.

About the Harijan Day, I think that the announcement should come from you officially. I will then support it. It might be as well if a Harijan Day is desired to be proclaimed now and again to fix a day in the month or a day every two months so that people automatically know and it becomes a kind of a monthly or six-weekly or bi-monthly religious observance. You will now do whatever you think is necessary.

Yours sincerely,

428. LETTER TO BHAGWANDAS

February 18, 1933

DEAR BABOOJI

I have your letter of 13th instant. The reversion to the longer style of addressing was purely mechanical without thinking that I had taken to the more homely style. You will please keep me to it if in the hurry of dictating correspondence I repeat the mistake.

I have already written\(^1\) to Ghanshyamdas about his promised contribution. I have no doubt that it will come if it has not already. He might have forgotten it. I will no longer belabour the point about the necessity of newspapers being self-supporting. I observe that you have sterilized my argument through your great soul theory;\(^2\) only this soul had no greatness thrust upon him when he developed and reduced to practice the proposition.

I am deeply grieved to have the disturbing news about Shivaprasad’s\(^3\) health and the death of his grandson through accident.

Yours sincerely,

MY DEAR SASMAL,

I was delighted to have your letter. I suppose we have various editions of the Kaviraj all over India. I hope you are getting your copy of Harijan and that if you are not reduced to utter poverty, as I see you are not, you will straightaway send your own subscription and subscriptions and names on behalf of others.

Yours sincerely,

\(^2\) The addressee had written: “The Aaj has, so far, been carried on by the charity of its sole proprietor, Shivaprasadji. . . . Young India has realized the ideal you describe, yet this has been possible because a ‘Great Soul’ was its editor, and it costs Providence and whole nations many crores of rupees—if the matter must be treated in terms of finance—to evolve such a Great Soul”.

430. LETTER TO M. M. ANANTA RAU

February 18, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have before me your two letters dated 8th and 14th February respectively. I would now ask you to cry a halt. I esteem the great pains you are bestowing upon your compositions, but I must tell you that your arguments produce no effect on my mind. Some of them I cannot follow at all. Some of them are wholly irrelevant to the issue. You often beg the question and equally often make assertions as if they were axioms. In my opinion that is not the way in which you will drive the truth home to anybody. I believe that I am very pervious to argument and that I have the capacity for seeing my critics’ standpoint. You have prepossessed me in your favour by your courteous language and by your quietly accepting and acting up to my suggestion about the ornamentation of your letter-paper. I therefore approach your letter[s] with a desire to find substantial help from them, but you will excuse me for saying that I do not find any. I would therefore now ask you to close this correspondence. I would be guilty of discourtesy towards you if I left you under the impression that your argument was at all going home and that therefore you could continue your correspondence.

Yours sincerely

431. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR

February 18, 1933

MY DEAR MARY,

Our letters crossed with each other. You are living up to the failing ascribed to your sex. The Ashram has been made to rid each sex of its failings. Will you get rid of yours and learn to give in your letters the things that should be there. You have omitted to mention your asthma. I hope it has left you entirely. Puniam is usually spelt panyam. You should learn the Devanagari script. You will take no more than a week giving one hour daily. Then you will know why you cannot express the original by pun iam. Even the ‘n’ does not give the original sound. There are five nasal sounds in Sanskrit.

‘Narandas’ is quite enough. But the bad habit of attaching ‘bhai’ or ‘ji’ has been the vogue and takes the place of ‘Mr.’. Strangers would use only the other suffix. But you may omit either, if you are older than Narandas. If you are younger, ‘bhai’ becomes necessary as a member of the family. Being daughter to me, you are as sister to Narandas and every other member in the Ashram. ‘Bhai’ means brother as ‘behn’ means sister. Here endeth the first lesson.

You must not be impatient with yourself, if you pick up new things slowly. They will all become easy and natural by determined practice.

Love from us all.

432. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

February 18, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I am sending a friend to you. His name is Duncan Greenlees. He is a B. A. of oxford University. He was a teacher in a school in U. P. He has also been in jail. He intends to devote himself to Harijan work. I have advised him to stay in the Ashram for some time and see how he feels there. If we and he find that he will be able to work with us, we may assign him some work. So let him stay there and give him some work. He should also do spinning and weaving. He may be given teaching work too. He is a man of simple habits and is a vegetarian. Ascertain his requirements. I am sure that he will not be a burden on you. Give him the expenses of his journey from Poona to Ahmedabad, or credit the amount to his name. It is likely to be between Rs. 10 and 12.

When it is no longer necessary for you to go to the hospital for dressing and you have regained sufficient strength, you may come and see me provided you wish to discuss with me anything connected with the problem of untouchability. There has been no harm in your having got yourself operated upon. But otherwise your explanation as to the cause of the trouble is correct. It has its origin in the stomach. 442. LETTER TO D. B. KALELKER AND B. D. KALELKER

CHI. KAKA,

I got your letter.

If milk, when taken without any other food, is not digested, it does no harm, but the milk which seems to be digested with the help of other food is not really digested but mixes with the food, and remaining in the body in the form of poison, it harms the gums, etc.
This is the view held by more and more doctors and seems to be correct. You can have with milk oranges, grapes, pineapples, pomegranates and other juicy fruits. They will prevent milk from causing constipation. You should, therefore, start the experiment of milk-diet as soon as possible and accustom your body really to digest
it. I make no distinction between milk and curds. Some doctors, 1Literally, ‘by the name of God’ probably most, believe that curds are more easily digested. The curds should not taste sour at all—the curds which we used to make by adding drops of lemon juice to milk would be the best. You should not drink the milk but sip it slowly. It would be better to take a spoonful at a time. To start with, you should take a quarter pound every hour. Do not mind if you get diarrhoea. It will stop in a few days. You may drink the fruit juice separately at any convenient time. In fruit juice, you should have the juice of six mosambis or of one pound of fresh grapes in two parts. You should take about four pounds of milk or curds, and mix with it as much butter as may be necessary. If you take milk in sufficient quantity, I doubt the necessity of butter. But it will do no harm if it can be digested even in the absence of other food. Doctors believe that, like milk, butter too does no harm if taken by itself. See how I have described the benefits of milk. But I have no choice. I can find no plant or herb which can equal milk in food value. There is certainly some truth in the belief that milk is a wholesome food even for yogis. It is the only substitute for meat. Only our vaids\(^1\) could have discovered a vegetable substitute for milk, but, lacking zeal for dharma, they made no such attempt. I have failed in my search and given it up. We do not know if anybody else will take it up and succeed. Perhaps in the West they may succeed. Among us there is no one who possesses the necessary medicinal knowledge to make such a discovery. We do not regard it as our dharma to acquire such knowledge and to make experiments with that aim. Anybody who wishes to undertake the task should be inspired with zeal for the welfare of the cow. He should be convinced that no milk other than the mother’s milk can be the proper food of a human being. Such a person should then study medicine. We do not have at present men with such a spirit. If India is destined to discover such a substitute, God will send among us a person with the necessary gifts. Till then, let us sing praises of milk and do the duty which lies before us. I hope you will feel satisfied that I have replied to your question in greater detail than you had expected. I also hope that you will understand the relative importance of the issues involved. Think over all this and do what seems right to you, for even in such matters the final decision should be one’s own. What I have said is true only about people with weak health. Those who are healthy will eat normal food and may even be able to digest it. If you want to experiment with milk-diet in a scientific manner, you can do so only in the Ashram or in the neighbourhood of a dairy where we have a right of entry; it is only then that we can get fresh milk. I suppose you know that yogis mix crushed neem leaves in milk before drinking it.

Write something for Harijan when you feel like doing so. I think innocent eggs are laid by hen without having been inseminated by a cock. You will get more information from the friend at Sangli. An innocent egg is one from which no chick can be born.

Personally, I very much liked the design for the title page of Harijan. It was entirely my choice. At first we had thought of getting a block made. But I liked the design better after it was printed and so the idea of getting a block made was dropped.

Shastra does not mean the pronouncements of men of spiritual experience in the past. It means the words of living men today who have had first-hand spiritual experience, that is, who have realized the Brahman. Shastra is something which is daily embodied in somebody's life. What exists only in books and is not followed in life may be philosophy, or it may be foolish chatter or mere hypocrisy. Shastra must be immediately capable of realization in experience, it must spring from the living experience of the person who utters it. It is only in this sense that the Veda is eternal. All else is not Veda, but theorizing about Veda.

If . . .

If it is inspired by a pure and noble ideal, it is ultimately condoned. But just now such conduct will be and ought to be disapproved. Our duty, therefore, is clear. We should not directly or indirectly give our consent to his marriage to . . . If, however, he does marry her and if the people ultimately approve the marriage, we also will join in the applause. I think . . . is now forgetting . . .

443. LETTER TO HOME SECRETARY, GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

February 19, 1933

To
THE SECRETARY
HOME DEPARTMENT
DELHI

DEAR SIR,

I thank you for the reply to my letter addressed to the Private Secretary to the Viceroy dated the 1st instant. There are two things about which I would like to make brief observations.

The Government have assumed without just cause that “education and the provision of the normal facilities of life” are not considered by me as the vital part of the Resolution referred to therein. It was wholly irrelevant to the purpose of my letter to the Private Secretary to the Viceroy to state what was being done by me or through me in connection with these things. Indeed I have shown in my writings being published in the course of the controversy that education and the like were being prosecuted with all the vigour possible and that the pace would be quadrupled by the temples being

4 Vide “Letter to Private Secretary to Viceroy”, 1-2-1933
As to the two measures now before the legislature, I may be permitted to point out that they are not intended to affect religious “customs and usages of the Hindu community”. They are specially designed to leave that question to the community itself. The law as it stands makes impossible the operation of the Hindu mind on certain religious customs and usages, and the measures are designed to release the Hindu mind from those fetters. I would submit that it is the duty of the Government, which is pledged to neutrality in religious matters, to free the reformers from the shackles of, not of religious custom, but of the law. For, had it not been for the law, it would have been open to the trustees, with the consent of the temple-goers, to change the custom. Nor may it be forgotten that the Bills have come before the legislature as a result of the formation of a very strong body of public opinion in favour of the change of custom.

February 19, 1933

DEAR MR. JAYAKAR,

I was glad to hear that at the instance of Seth Bhagoji Kir you were going to open two temples in Ratnagiri to Harijans on the 22nd instant. I hope that both caste Hindus and Harijans will appreciate this religious act of Seth Bhagoji Kir and that Harijans will take advantage of the opportunity they have now got of offering worship in these two temples.

I have no doubt that you will remind Harijan brothers and sisters that it is necessary in order to gain the full advantage of worship to conform to the obligations that lie upon all worshippers to observe the law of cleanliness, such as daily individual bath, wearing of unpolluted clothing and offering individual worship in the home, and abstain from carrion and beef eating and intoxicating liquors.

I am posting a copy of this to reach you at Ratnagiri lest this should reach Bombay after your departure for Ratnagiri.

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I have not yet got your pamphlet. When I do, I shall certainly go through it carefully and answer your argument if necessary even through the columns of the Harijan. You may depend upon it that speaking for myself personally, not even a single argument of the sanatanists has escaped me, or, so far as it was possible for me to do, remained unanswered.

I did enquire about the meeting in Calcutta that you have referred to, and the information that I received was that the statements made were gross exaggerations. I do not know if you have or can produce any proof for the charges made. I would at once ask my friends for a reply. 450. LETTER TO C. RAJAGOPALACHARI

MY DEAR C. R.,

You are not going to worry over the reference to the fast. Such errors come out of the depths of love—but love gone mad. I mended the error by magnifying it a hundred fold and driving a rich lesson home to people. I know that neither you nor Ghanshyamdas will repeat the error. Where is the cause for it? We simply work away.

Your reading of the Gita is perfect so far.

The A.P.I. news about 27 members did not disturb me in the slightest degree. You are there delivering the message to everybody who will listen. What does it matter now if nobody listens? As it is you have made considerable progress.

Nor has Malaviyaji’s bombshell1 disturbed me. It was bound to come. We have to have him with all his limitations as we consider them to be. But his so-called limitations are also his strength. It may be wise not to worry him now by sending Devdas and Shankerlal.

451. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

February 19, 1933

MY DEAR SATISBABOO,

I have your letter of the 15th instant. The description you give of smallpox in the bastis makes painful reading. I do not know how far that faith in Sitala Devi\(^2\) is to be admired, and if it is to be admired, why should we undermine it? It seems to me that by patience and perseverance we have to undermine this blind faith and show to the people that smallpox is like every other disease caused by irregular living and that it is amenable like every other disease to proper treatment.

I do not know how far you are justified in avoiding vaccination and perhaps encouraging co-workers to do likewise. Of course I myself am a fanatic about some of these matters. But I never like people to copy fanaticism. A fanatic has his own justification. He may never be copied. Fanaticism must be instinctive. It may be almost compared to the blind faith of the people whom you have described and who recklessly touch and mingle with smallpox patients. But just as you and I cannot copy their blind faith with any prospect of success, so also may nobody copy anybody else’s fanaticism; and since you have such ocular demonstration of the success of vaccination, unless you have your own independent faith and conviction that vaccination is bad you ought to be vaccinated and you should encourage your co-workers to do likewise. Anyway, I have washed myself clean of any responsibility for your daring experiment, if it is an experiment, and if it is a faith like mine, I have nothing to say. For it is not merely vaccination, but the whole of the serum treatment which to me appears as another species of superstition, not far removed from that of basti Harijans.

You should send me from week to week, if there is anything to be sent, a report of constructive work actually done in connection with Harijans in your part of the world, whether by you or others. If Suresh or anybody connected with him is doing this work, please pass on this message to them also.

Yours sincerely,

452. LETTER TO SURESH CHANDRA BANERJEE

February 19, 1933

MY DEAR SURESH,

I have been thinking of you almost every day, and not having heard from you for a long time, in my despair I dictated a message, quite selfish, to you, in my letter to Satisbaboo, and immediately I had finished that letter, Mahadev put your letter of 15th instant in my hands. You can better imagine my joy than I can describe it.

I see you have been near death’s door again. It is better perhaps to realize that we are always near death’s door, the healthy-looking people no less than the ill-looking. I know many bed-ridden people surviving the loss of dear ones who had looked pictures of health and who they had thought were bound to survive them.

Pray, do not become impatient. Understand thoroughly the distinction I have drawn between caste and varnashrama. Caste is a touch-me-not institution. If untouchability goes, you will find that touch-me-not-ism will go. According to my meaning of it varnashrama has not the slightest tinge of touch-me-not-ism. It is a spiritual law just as valid as any physical law, whether we recognize its existence or whether we do not. He who recognizes the existence of this law profits by his knowledge, even as a scientist, knowing the properties of a drop of water and the laws which are responsible for those properties, makes railway trains to move at a speed our ancestors had never thought of. So also if we recognize the law of varnashrama... and give effect to it, we can do away with many ills of life. I can understand Dr. Ambedkar in his rage against caste Hindus refusing to see the wood for the trees, but you have no excuse whatsoever for not understanding the very clear distinction I have pointed out.\(^1\) In any case I am convinced that to precipitate a fight on varnashrama today is to do a great disservice to the cause of the removal of untouchability. I must not worry you any more.

Yours sincerely,

455. LETTER TO PREMA BEHN KANTAK

February 19, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

I am determined not to make this a long letter.

If you can win over Maitri and all the three sisters improve, I will certainly regard that as your and Ashram’s victory. Narandas has tried the way of love. See if you succeed.

You must have realized that Lakshmi must be married off now, or else she should leave the Ashram. I do not think any of you should be burdened any longer with her responsibility. Maruti is an exceptional young man. Lakshmidas also has had a hand in his training. You have found that what Moti had told you about him was not correct.

The arrangements which you have made about the girls seem to be all right. I liked your suggestion about Nirmala. I have not yet been able to discuss it with Mahadev, though. I also understand what you say about Prithuraj. I am eager to know more details about the Muslim lady. Cultivate the acquaintance of the English friend whom I have sent there. He has impressed me as a man inclined to a life of renunciation. Look after his needs.

To which aspect of my behaviour, when you came to see me with Sushila, did your question refer? I do not remember anything. If you ask this question again, I will try to answer it.

I understand what you say about doctors. Once we have put ourselves in a doctor’s hand, we should get from him whatever he can give. Otherwise we shall not do him justice, and may do harm to ourselves. We must admit that doctors do succeed in some cases, though it is also well known that they spoil many others through negligence or ignorance. I would certainly respect a person who takes a vow not to consult doctors any time. Millions of people cannot consult them at all. But I think that such self-denial is beyond the capacity of the inmates of the Ashram. We may, therefore, consult doctors who are reputed to be intelligent. You may certainly seek the advice of Kisan’s uncle.

I got your letter. You should always write what you do after careful thought. Anybody who wants to be scrupulously truthful would not utter or write even one word without carefully weighing it. I had got confused by what you wrote. Now everything is clear.

You write Jai Jai to Sardar and Pranams to Mahadevbhai and Chhaganbhai. Explain the difference between the two. What does Jai Jai mean? Does it mean the same thing as Jaya Jaya? A person like me can afford to make a mistake in spelling a word. You boys and girls should always write correct Gujarati.

BOYS AND GIRLS,

I got your letters. It is not wise to keep on changing the volunteers or, shall we say, the organizers. You may if you wish keep a number of them for a certain period for the sake of giving them experience but it should not be for less than six months. There would be order only if you saw that no one left on account of quarrels or because they felt offended. Do you keep a record of your activities? You should have a few rules for your organization and then cling to them. If you do this, your progress will be speeded up.

[February 19/20, 1933]¹

CHI. NARANDAS,

Is the cost of milk, etc., which you send for Ba and Mirabehn paid by the jail authorities or is it borne by us?

I follow what you say regarding the weight of Rambhau, Jekore and others. I feel relieved. We should take care and see that the children do not feel the burden of the Ashram life. What you say about Chhotubhai is correct. Keep me informed about Liladhar. Duncan Greenlees will have arrived there and have been one of you by the time you get this letter. He will give you a letter which I have sent with him. He has produced a good impression on me. Make some arrangement to help him to learn Hindi. I hope you are not taken by surprise when I send somebody in this manner without previous warning. I could have written to you about D[uncan] G[reenlees] five days earlier, but I forgot to do so and he arrived suddenly yesterday. I knew that he might arrive any day. If, therefore, I had written to you at the same time when I decided to write to him, you would have got five days, or at least three days, notice. If you think that it is improper for me to send people like this without previous intimation, tell me so. I will not then do it again. Give him clothes and other things which he may require. Supply him the required utensils too. Ask him not to keep any money or costly article with him. I forgot to do that.

¹From the reference in the letter to the arrival of Duncan Greenlees in Poona; vide also “Letter to Narandas Gandhi”, 18-2-1933

If the digging of wells is about to be completed, write to Soniramji for money. Does Ranchhodbhai\(^1\) visit the Ashram occasionally? I wonder because I have had no letter from him at all. Let all those to whom Hariyomal has written describe to him in plain words the bitter experiences they have had. He seems to be an honest man and, therefore, such frank letters are likely to produce an effect on him. Persons like Hariyomal learn only from bitter experience.

I felt depressed after reading . . . ’s letter. You must have read it. It is likely that . . . beat her, as she says he did. Inquire and find out the truth. Ask . . . . Who writes the letters for . . . ? or is her own handwriting well-formed and firm? Where is . . . now?\(^2\)

Read what I have written to Kusum about sun-bath. Tell Dr. Talwalkar about it. If he approves of my suggestion, put up a sort of wall of hay or hessian or any other suitable material round the place where Kusum sits. The wall should be such as can be removed every day. Or you may select some other suitable place in consultation with the doctor and put up such a wall there and let her have sun-bath in that enclosure. If necessary, she may be carried there in a cot. Find out whether it is necessary to obtain Government’s permission for putting up such temporary wall on agricultural land. Patients like Kusum are known to have recovered by only taking sun-bath with their bodies completely uncovered.

Some boys ask me in their letters to write “Blessings from” at least when I write to them. Please remind all that in order to save time and spare the hand unnecessary work I don’t say it in words but leave it to be understood by the addressee. Everybody, therefore, should supply the phrase in his or her letter.

perhaps. But if we can get four or five signatures from well-known lawyers with his amongst them, I should value the thing all the more. I do not know that, it is necessary to go through the stiff course of solicitors preparing a brief and submitting it to several advocates for their opinion. I would like it to be a considered opinion of lawyers as public men applying their knowledge of law to a question of great importance. The points to which I would like them to address themselves are these:

1. Is there any element of compulsion in any of the two Bills?
2. Is there any interference with any person’s religious practice or conscience?
3. In spite of the willingness of the trustees as well as the worshippers of a particular public Hindu temple, is not one of the two Bills at least or a measure like them necessary before it is possible for a public Hindu temple to be opened in view of the English Law of Trusts and known decisions of the High Courts in India?

You should approach Mr. Bahadurji on this matter. But I do not insist; you know better what to do and how to do it.

You should attend to this as early as you possibly can.

Milk should not be drunk, but eaten. Take it with papaw. Have no doubt that, if one does not get strength with milk, the strength given by other foods is likely to be illusory. Don’t mind if you have to spare some time, but take hip-bath every day. Do go in sunshine, so that you do not feel cold at all.

We need not worry about Mahavir. Even if he is forced to resort to begging or stealing, ultimately he will come to good if it is so decreed. In the Ashram his soul was being degraded, for his life was not true there. Harilal will one day reform himself, though he drinks and goes after immoral pleasures. If, however, I had kept him in the Ashram and somehow found him the money which he wanted, he would have let his thoughts run after immoral pleasures and would have been deceiving himself and the world.

471. LETTER TO K. NATARAJAN

February 21, 1933

DEAR MR. NATARAJAN,

I thank you for your letter. I can never take amiss any intervention from you. On the contrary, I have always welcomed it. You will perhaps be interested to learn that the original draft of the Resolution on Temple-entry and the like was also framed by me and handed to Sjt. Purushottamdas and Ghanshyamdas Birla. The Resolution as passed at the Bombay meeting is undoubtedly different from the one I had worded. The essential features of my Resolution have however been kept in the Bombay Resolution. Nevertheless I must apply to it the same canon of interpretation as we apply to Government’s ordinary laws and the like. The intention of the author is irrelevant to the interpretation of his work if that intention is not carried out in his language. I have therefore mentioned the fact of my authorship of the original text as a mere matter of historical interest. If you will read the first Resolution you will find the following:

This right shall have statutory recognition at the first opportunity, and shall be one of the earliest acts of swaraj Parliament, if it shall not have received such recognition before that time.

1 The addressee had referred to the Bombay Resolution of September 25, 1932 and written: “Of course, the Pact itself was largely your doing and you are the best authority as to what it was intended to mean. But the Bombay Conference, of which I was a member, did not intend more than Malaviyaji says. Perhaps, less.”
2 Vide “Statement on Viceroy’s Decision”, 24-1-1933
Therefore, the legislative aid was clearly contemplated by the resolution. But I go a step further. The meeting further agreed by every legitimate and peaceful means to secure an early removal of all social disabilities . . . including the bar in respect of admission to temples.

In the course of the conduct of the campaign one discovered that there was a legal obstacle in the path of the progress towards reform. Surely, it is up to the caste Hindus to remove the obstacles at the earliest possible moment. Every lawyer to whom I have referred the matter has assured me that even when the trustees and temple-goers desire a particular temple to be opened, it cannot be done because of the state of the law. So far as the defects in any of the Bills are concerned, they can surely be easily remedied. If you have any doubt about the position I have taken up, I would like you, if you at all can, to come over to Yeravda and discuss the position before you differ. If, however, you have no doubt whatsoever about your view of the matter, I must not trouble you to come merely for my pleasure.

474. LETTER TO PARESHNATH BHATTACHARYYA

February 21, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter of 15th instant for which I thank you.

I endeavour to be as precise as I possibly can about anything I write and therefore when I am confronted with anything as having been said by me, in justice to me I should have the very words that I have said. You will understand what I mean when I tell you what distinction there is between what you think I have said and what I have actually said.

I do not consider “the Gita to be the only scripture of

1 The addressee wanted to publish a supplement in Tamil and Telugu every Monday containing Gandhiji’s articles in Harijan and had therefore requested for advance proofs which he wanted to reach him on Friday or Saturday.

2 A Tamil tri-weekly unquestionable authority which alone should be our true guide”. What I have said and what I still hold is that for me in view of the multitude of books claimed to be scriptural and [of] conflicting texts, Gita is the only safe guide, because it contains the concentrated essence of all that the Hindu scriptures have to teach and that I would unhesitatingly reject anything that is in conflict with the spirit of the Gita. Thus I would test the validity of every religious precept or code of conduct on the anvil of that teaching.

Thus you will see that I exclude nothing. I take in all the scriptures, but I use the Gita to unlock their meaning.

I quite agree with your view of the Samhitas, but my difficulty in applying them to daily conduct arises from the fact that there are conflicting statements in the same Samhita and there is conflict among the different Samhitas. There again I summon the Gita to my aid.

Whilst I agree also that rules of conduct will show variation from the ideal and even between man and man, to be true to the ideal they should conform to it and enable one to make a progressive approach to it. They must not take one away progressively further from it.

Examined thus, untouchability, as it is practised today, in my opinion, is clearly contrary to the Hindu scriptures. As I read your several propositions, untouchability stands condemned by them.

As to the referendum, you have evidently missed the strict limitations placed upon its scope. If I had believed that current untouchability had its roots in Hinduism and that untouchables were clearly prohibited from entering temples, there would be no question whatsoever of referendum. But since there are two schools of opinion, why should not the people decide to which school they will belong? Who will decide for the people whether they should belong to the Shaivite sect or Vaishnavite, if not they themselves? Is that not what the Hindus have done all through their great history?¹

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter of the 19th instant. I can only advise you patiently to follow the columns of Harijan. Perchance you will find some answer in them to your questions\(^1\). As you yourself admit in effect that varnashrama is irrelevant to the issue that is agitating the public mind, I must conserve the energy of myself and the public by not saying more than is necessary on varnashrama, not that there is anything to conceal; as a matter of fact, what I may say hereafter can be gleaned by a patient reader from my writings. Only I have observed repeatedly that not until a particular question has become a live issue have readers of my writings concentrated upon what I have said upon that issue before it became a live issue. You may depend upon it that Dr. Ambedkar himself will not let me off as easily as you will. You will perhaps allow yourself to be put off, not Dr. Ambedkar quite so easily. What about the intermarriage and interdining amongst the four varnas? At what age would the varna be determined? Who would supervise and be responsible for the maintenance of the order of varnashrama? If marriage or dining is immaterial, how would your varnashrama differ from the Western order of society?”

481. WHY ‘HARIJAN’

Many people have asked me why I have used the name ‘Harijans’ for people whom we commit the sin of regarding as untouchables. Years ago a Kathiawadi Antyaja had written to me that names like Antyaja, achhoot, asprishya hurt his community. I could appreciate their feelings. For me they were neither Antyas nor untouchables. It was this correspondent who had pointed out to me that the poet-devotee Narasinh Mehta in one of his bhajans had referred to the Antyajas as ‘Harijans’. In my view the bhajan he had sent to me to support his contention did not yield the meaning which he thought it did. All the same I liked the name ‘Harijan’ immensely. ‘Harijan’ means a devotee of God, beloved of God. It is God’s promise that He is the Protector of the oppressed, an ocean of compassion, the strength of the weak, the Refuge of the helpless, the Support of the lame and the Eye of the blind. One may therefore expect Him to bestow especial grace on the oppressed. Looked at from this point of view, I am sure the name ‘Harijan’ is appropriate in every way for the Antyaja brethren.

Some argue that the Antyajas became untouchables because of their actions in their previous birth. Still others say: ‘Let us suppose for a moment that we regard four crores of our brethren as untouchables. But what special miseries do they have to suffer that the other crores of people do not? The miseries that they suffer because of untouchability must be only mental and there is no remedy for it. Being the fruit of a previous birth, it must be regarded as a divine dispensation. The privations which the Antyajas suffer because of their poverty and destitute condition are the common lot of all the people of India with the exception of two or three crores of people. Why then should not all of them be called Harijans?’ This argument is utterly absurd. Untouchability as we observe today is neither the result of actions of previous births nor of God’s making. The untouchability prevalent at the present time is man’s doing. The caste Hindus are responsible for it. No one can escape the fruit of his action. But by accepting the law of karma, we acquire no right to put the blame on others. The way of karma is indeed inscrutable. No one knows what karma will bear what fruit. We are all laden with one or other shortcoming, hence we have no right whatever to judge the shortcomings or sins of others. Our right and duty is only to help one another get rid of such shortcomings. Compassion is incompatible with untouchability whether predestined or unavoidable. Four crores of Hindus have to face unparalleled hardships because we treat them as untouchables. They do not get even food or a place to live in as others do, even though they have the money as well as other means. They have no temples, or dharmsalas or hospitals or schools for them as other people have. We have crushed them so much that they have almost forgotten that they are human beings. These four crore brethren have not even the will to rise from this abject and abominable situation.

There is no exaggeration in my account of Harijans. It may be there in one respect. No one knows the exact number of Harijans. I have accepted the figure given by Shri Amritlal Thakkar. Thakkar Bapa is himself not very sure about the figure After thorough survey all that can be said is that the number of Harijans cannot be more than four crores. But irrespective of the fact whether there are four crore Harijans or one, the guilt on the part of the caste Hindus remains the same. If there is any fault in my description of Harijans it may be one of understatement and certainly not of exaggeration.\textsuperscript{1} If this oppressed class were not to have God’s grace or mercy the world would cease to have faith in God.

The truth is that He exists and He is an ocean of compassion, the Protector of the oppressed, and the Feeder of the hungry. Therefore, in India, those who are most unhappy deserve to be called Harijans. And it is my firm belief that if we do not remove the untouchability practised against the Harijans and did not treat them as our brethren, Hindu society would perish under their curse.

As Tulsidas says,

\textsuperscript{1} A Gujarati version of this article which appeared in Harijanbandhu, 12-3-1933, has the following additional sentences: “Whatever I have written can be substantiated. The facts therefore must be worse than what I have described.”
The sighs of the weak never go waste,
Bellows of carcass-hide turn iron to dust.

482. LETTER TO VERRIER ELWIN

February 23, 1933

MY DEAREST SON,

Son you have become of your own choice. I have accepted the responsible position. And son you shall remain to the end of time. The tie between you and me is much thicker and tougher than blood. It is the burning love of Truth at any cost. Therefore whatever you may do will not disappoint me. But I was sad.

I am not thinking of superiority of celibacy over marriage. I am thinking of what you had intended, almost pledged yourself to be. But I know that you had to be true to yourself and appear as you were.

I showed your letter to Jamnalalji and he too felt the same as I did.

But whilst I was trying to make time to write to you, in came Ala, tears dropping from her eyes. She put into my hands your letter and said, “How can I bear this? It was agreed between us that we were both to remain single, or if we could not, we were to marry each other.” I consoled her and advised her to send you her blessings. I do not know what she has done or written. You will tell me what understanding there was between you and her.

But taking it for granted that your word was never given to Ala as she imagines it was, you and Mary have my blessings. I have met her. I have a vivid recollection that the innocence of her face stamped itself upon my mind. I know that your joint life will be one of complete dedication to service. But if there is the slightest possibility of a breach (moral) of word given to Ala, you must both—you and Mary—be prepared to bear what will be the heaviest cross and sacrifice your cherished hope on the altar of Truth which is God. If there is a trace of suspicion of breach, you certainly and Mary and Ala—the latter two if they have the same living faith in Truth as I have credited you with—have to live single lives in spite of yourselves. Your love of Truth will transmute your desire for exclusive marriage into the universal marriage with Truth. For this divine marriage we men and women are all women and Truth is the only Lord, Master and Husband.

I need say no more. My letter is not satisfactory because it is written in ignorance of facts. But it need not be unsatisfactory as being between father and son. You can fill in the gaps. Of this you have my assurance that whatever you do, I am certain, will have been done out of obedience to Truth as it might reveal itself to you. More than that no man can do.

May God guide you and Mary.

With my deep love to you and Mary,

Yours,

BAPU

MY DEAR ELLEN,

I was delighted to hear from you. I appreciate all your affection. I have gone up hills but I have never walked along them all day long but I do know however what you mean by the mountains reaching the horizon.

The knowledge that I am a guiding varde to some friends humbles me and makes me more and more conscious of the tremendous burden that I carry on my shoulders. I have to watch myself and incessantly pray to the God of Truth that I may not prove a false guide to anybody.

February 23, 1933

MY DEAR SANTANAM,

I must dictate my letter to you to save time. I was delighted to see your old familiar hand but sorry to learn that you had not been keeping well. You must not put on fat. Though I am a quack, I am a quack who has tried experiments on himself and therefore can speak with some authority. You ought to take plenty of exercise. Walking is the prince of exercises, and you should give up all prepared fat, such as, oil or ghee, and take as little milk as possible and live on juicy fruit and brown bread without butter. In a month’s time you will find yourself a changed man. You may take green, non-starchy vegetables simply boiled. We do not realize how we become prey to disease by criminal ignorance of the right dietary and the absolute necessity of exercises in the fresh air. I shall keep a letter with this for Krishna.

I know that you will do all you can for Harijan newspaper and the Harijan cause in general.

MY DEAR TANGAI,

You have sent me a note not written by you. Therefore you cannot complain if I sent you a reply not written by me.

I know that Uncle Charlie eats much salt, but you must not copy bad habits of elderly people, and eating much salt is a bad habit, and much salt spoils the original flavour of things with which it is mixed.

Uncle Charlie has also a habit of spoiling little children by giving them too many sweets. Therefore, if I were you, I should distribute sweets amongst lots of poorer children and I should feel happy at the thought of sharing with them gifts received from friends.

Love and kisses from us both.

MY DEAR MARY,

Your Hindi letter is extraordinarily good. We all admired your very clear handwriting.

God has many definitions: as many as there are men and women on this earth. सत्य, ज्ञान, सुख are also among them, they may be rendered as Truth, Knowledge and Bliss. They are interlaced.

The selection of morning verses is designed to satisfy all wants. Every verse represents a power or powers of God the Infinite and the Indescribable.

Yes, I had a letter from Verrier. It surprised me, it did not disappoint me. I believe with Paul that men should marry rather than burn. Celibacy is good for those whose mind co-operates with the body. I do remember Mary Gillett well. Her innocent face impressed itself on me the very first time I saw her.

I am glad you are getting on well there. And now you have Duncan Greenlees to care for. You will please see to his comforts and know him too.

491. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

February 23, 1933

CHL. NARANDAS.

I got the large packet of letters sent by you. You will find with this a letter\(^1\) for Mary and one for Greenlees. Lakshmidas and Anandi have come here. Anandi has been having fever and the temperature remains at 99. It even rises by one or two points in the course of the day. It does not fall below 99. But I am completely hopeful that we shall be able to cure her fever here. For one thing, the climate of the place is excellent.

When Dudabhai comes there, have a talk with him and come to a definite decision. If he agrees, let the marriage take place as soon as possible. If he does not give his willing consent, tell him that we shall not be able to look after Lakshmi any longer. If your own experience is contrary to my inference and if you feel inclined to let her stay, you may ignore my opinion.

Impart to Amina as much as you can. It would be good if she daily practises the Urdu script. What happened about Parvati? Is Ranchhodbhai in difficulty about anything? I worry about him as I have had no letter from him. Parnerkar’s scheme which all of you have approved is an old one, though it is certainly good. Ask him to write to me. What arrangement do you propose to make for selling milk? I follow what you say regarding the land at Bidaj. Let me know how you find Duncan. If the impression which he has produced on me turns out to be correct, he is likely to prove a fine worker.

What is the composition of the plaster applied to Kanu? By whom was it recommended? In all such cases of injury, complete rest for the injured part is the most important thing. Some times the injury is to such a part that, in order to give rest to it, it is necessary to rest the whole body. But this is the quickest remedy for curing the pain. Have a talk with Prabhudas and try to help him to overcome his restlessness.

If Bhagwanji devotes himself whole-heartedly to his new job, he can do excellent work. Has Dhiru’s health improved? I am not happy that he has stopped writing to me altogether. I hope you had a talk

496. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

February 24, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

This is Friday morning 3.30 a.m. No letter from you as yet for this week! I wrote to you regularly last week. That was on Friday as yours was received Thursday afternoon. I take it your new abode and new keepers mean a temporary disturbance in the routine. I shall wait and pray and take to heart the message of Gita Mata. She is a wonderful mother. I suppose you know that she is called Mother. ‘Gita’ means ‘song’. It is used as an adjective applied to Upanishad which is in the feminine gender. It has been likened to the sacred cow, the giver of all desires. Hence Mother. Well, that immortal Mother gives all the milk we need for spiritual sustenance, if we would but approach her as babes seeking and sucking it from her. She is capable of yielding milk to her millions of babes from her exhaustless udder.

In doing the Harijan work in the midst of calumny, misrepresentations and apparent disappointments, her lap comforts me and keeps me from falling into the Slough of Despond.

So you find me laughing and free from care. My weight has become steady at 103 and the diet also the same in quantity and kind. For the time being unboiled fresh milk goes on without doing any harm. Writing for Harijan occupies most of my time and Mahadev’s. Chhaganlal too is kept fairly busy.

No more this time. I must wake up the others for prayer now.

Love to you and the others from us all.

497. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

[February 24, 1933]

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

I have your letter. You know what is happening to the Bills. It is unfortunate and it is bad. The Government have taken up, in my opinion, not an attitude of neutrality but one of partiality. I do not know if you have caught the central point of my argument. It would be partiality to the reformers and would also be interference with religion if the Government gave facilities for the consideration of a measure compelling temple-entry. It is partiality to orthodoxy in that the Government will not remove the legal bar to temple-entry created by decisions of courts of law, decisions not based on statutory law but on religious usage, thus making untouchability a crime as if it was part of the Penal Code. The Government to be neutral should lift this bar and say to either party. ‘We cannot take sides in religious matters. Untouchability may be for some of you a breach of your religion, but there is no breach in it of common law and therefore there can be no punishment under the common law.’ There are innumerable religious practices in Hinduism not even as offensive to the moral sense of the world as untouchability undoubtedly is, and yet their breach is not penal under the common law. All that the reformers want is opportunity for progress, opportunity for converting public opinion, and when and where it is converted, opportunity for giving effect to that conversion. Today even if cent per cent of Hindus entitled to worship in a particular temple desired the admission of Harijans to that temple, they could not carry out their wish because of the decisions I have referred to. The two Bills are designed to remove this anomaly. I watch, wait and pray.

Love.

Since then I had no time to dictate a reply to you, as Harijan takes up practically all my time up to Thursday evening.

I hope you are getting regularly your copy of the Harijan. I do not know whether you at all get the time to look at it. Now that the world knows the difference of outlook between you and me as to these Bills, I would like you to review the whole position in the light of what you yourself have suggested.

You say that it is possible by discussion between sanatanists and reformers to arrive at a compromise without the aid of legislation. I taxed myself as to how this could be, even assuming that there was complete agreement between sanatanists and reformers that public temples should be thrown open to Harijans. Even that agreement cannot supersede the law which lays down that Harijans cannot enter public temples.

I therefore cannot get away from the very real moral difficulty that unless we get the law altered, we are not in a position to keep the pledge given in the Bombay Resolution. We cannot plead helplessness under cover of this law, of which I knew nothing at the time I drew up the Resolution about temples. I suppose that you do know that the original draft was prepared by me. True, several changes were made after, but no change was made so as to alter the substance of my draft.

I wish therefore that for the sake of the very religion which you and I hold dearer than life itself, you will examine the moral difficulties I have presented here. And let me repeat, if it is at all necessary, what I have said in my article in Harijan that this latest difference in viewpoint between you and me does not, in the slightest degree, diminish my regard or affection for you.

February 24, 1933

CHI. PRABHUDAS,

Narandas says that you have become very restless. How is that? If you have faith in me, you can have no reason to be restless. You must joyously do what you are asked. Have you heard or sung the bhajan: “I will dance singing praises of the Lord”? Devotion to duty is singing praises of the Lord. To do as asked by a person in whom one has faith is also singing praises of the Lord. Hence the need for careful thinking before putting one’s faith in anyone. Why don’t you write to me? Stop thinking about your marriage. You may marry if you happen to come across a suitable girl. Jamnalalji says that he will try to find a match as soon as he is released. He is certain to succeed. He has now three or four months of his sentence left. As for work, do what Narandas assigns to you. But I will not mind even if you are not able to do that. 509. HIGHER EDUCATION FOR HARIJANS

I hope all those who are interested in the removal of untouchability are familiar with Mr. David’s scheme for the higher education of selected Harijans by caste Hindus. The scheme was published some time ago in the Bombay Press after being enthusiastically accepted by the Servants of Untouchables Society. In Mr. David’s words, “It aims at enabling a large number of untouchables to enjoy the benefits of the best higher education (including technical instruction) possible in this country.” Under it, “well-to-do caste Hindus are expected throughout India each to bear the expenses for such education of at least one Harijan student for a period of five years. Scholarships should be given to selected candidates and the expenses imply the provision of educational fees, books and living expenses on a modest scale”. Mr. David thinks that Rs. 500 per year per Harijan would be required for college education and half as much for high school education. He advises donors to subscribe, wherever it is possible, the whole amount covering five years in one lump sum.

“In order to build up the self-respect of Harijan scholars”, says Mr. David, “it should be laid down that each scholar would be expected to reimburse the amount originally advanced for his education as soon as he is in a position to do so. Thus a student under this scheme is provided by means of a loan and not a gift.” And if a large number of students discharge these debts of honour, Mr. David anticipates that a permanent fund will be created.

Mr. David advises the formation of a committee or committees in Provinces which will frame rules for the selection of candidates, and the disbursements of subscriptions will be subject to the recommendation of such committee or committees. He is emphatic that the scheme, if carried out, should “produce important and sustained results”, and make possible within a comparatively short period the creation of a large number of lawyers, teachers, doctors and engineers from among Harijans. The existence of a considerable number of such persons would be of material help in raising the social status of the depressed classes, and, he adds, “it is framed on strictly non-controversial lines, thus widening to the maximum its potential field of response. It should win the support of even the staunchest sanatansists. . . . It is an opportunity at hand for caste Hindus to give concrete expression of their feeling towards untouchables.”

Let me hope, with Mr. David, that the scheme will commend itself to the “staunchest sanatanists” and that in any case it would receive liberal support. I do not know whether the Central Board or the Bombay Board has received any donations. I venture to suggest to the Bombay Board that, if it has not already done so, it should form a small committee getting, if possible, a sanatanist to work on it, frame rules and get scholarships.

Whilst it would be the most proper thing to get 1,000 donors who would contribute Rs. 2,500 or 1,250, as the case may be, for full five years’ expenses, it is not necessary to confine oneself to the letter of Mr. David’s scheme, so long as its spirit is observed. The central point of the scheme is that there should be a decent fund at once collected from caste Hindus for the higher education of a select number of Harijan boys or girls. I, therefore, invite subscriptions for the scheme. They will be duly acknowledged in these columns. Donors should send moneys to the Manager, Sjt. A. V. Patwardhan, marking the envelopes ‘the David Scheme’. Acknowledgements will be published from week to week, and the money will be handed to the Central Board for their disposal strictly in accordance with the donor’s instructions. As soon as the first full subscription is received, I would advise the Central Board to make its selection. Donors may make their own choice of the Province from which Harijan boys or girls may be selected, or they may even make their own selection of such boy or girl and hand the donation to the Central Board or Provincial Board for disbursement to, and supervision of, the candidate so selected.

510. DR. SAPRU ON UNTOUCHABILITY BILLS

As the public know, I have been in communication with Dr. Sapru and Sjt. Jayakar over the two Bills which have stirred Hindu opinion. Sjt. Jayakar’s opinion I have already published. Dr. Sapru’s opinion is now before me on both the Bills. In his letter of the 11th instant on the first Bill, he says:¹

... Whatever may be my own personal views, there is no doubt that some eminent Judges (Hindus included) in Madras, Bombay and elsewhere have interpreted the law in such a way that you cannot throw open the temples everywhere to Hindus of the depressed classes except by an Act of the Legislature...

Now coming to the Bill itself.

... I am afraid the forces of orthodoxy are strong in the Assembly and I am more than doubtful whether the reformers will carry the day... I should not, however, feel surprised if dilatory tactics are adopted and the motion to circulate the Bill is carried. ... Framed as the Bill is, I should strongly oppose the motion to circulate the Bill and should enlist the sympathy and support of the members of the Legislature to go ahead with the consideration of the Bill. I appreciate the moderation of the Bill, though, speaking for myself, I should not hesitate to go much further than the Bill. ...

... In my individual capacity I can be of very little use, so far as the Assembly is concerned, but I can assure you of my support, even though I feel that the Bill is a very mild measure.²

On this I telegraphed for his opinion also on the shorter Bill of the two. His reply dated 18th instant (omitting the immaterial or personal matters) is as follows:³

... As I read this clause, it seeks to remove disabilities from which the untouchables are suffering under the existing law, but it does not seek to impose any disability on caste Hindus. So far as the latter are concerned, there does not seem to me to be anything like an element of compulsion contemplated by the Bill. If they do not wish to associate with the untouchables in the temples, they are not, by this Bill, compelled to do so. All that it requires them to do is that they must not stand in the way of the untouchables. It also lays down a rule of law for the courts which are required not to recognize any custom of untouchability for judicial purposes. I, therefore, fail to discover any element of compulsion in this Bill.

I have read in this morning’s papers the telegram of Malaviyaji to you and your reply to him. Personally I am in complete agreement with you, both as a lawyer and as a public man.

I think I owe it to you to say frankly that I look upon both these Bills as being essentially very moderate. Left to myself, I should be prepared to go much further and I have not the same horror of compulsion in a matter of this character as some others have. You are, however, taking the line of least resistance and I am prepared to stand by you. . . .

511. A SANATANIST’S CONCLUSIONS

Pandit Pareshnath Bhattacharya, M. A., Vedantaratna, writes from Cooch Behar under date 15th February, 1933:

. . .I beg to note down in brief outlines the chief points and principles on which I have failed to concur with you.

(1) You are reported to have said to the effect that the Gita is the only scripture of unquestionable authority which alone should be our true guide in matters social, religious and spiritual. . . .

(2) The sources of Hindu religion are enumerated in the first chapter of the Manusamhita. There is no valid reason for its rejection on the mere suspicion of interpolations.

(3) Scriptures are clearly distinguishable into two classes:
(a) those dealing with high principles of philosophy and directions for spiritual advancement,
(b) and others laying down laws for social discipline and prescribing penalties for lapses and crime.

(4) In dealing with society and socio-religious institutions, we must recognize and abide by the authority of the Samhitas . . .

(5) The noble ideal of Vedantic Monism, Pantheism or Panatheism has no application to the problems of social organization or reform, for the simple reason that a whole people can never soar to that height.

(6) Humanism is admittedly the highest form of religious idealism, but for all practical purposes it must remain the private property of the saints and siddha purushas. There are inequalities in the society, both in natural endowments and personal habits. No amount of love or legislative efforts will do away with these inequalities between man and man.

(7) According to the abstract theory of justice, we cannot condone invidious distinction between man and man for the mere accident of birth or the mistaken choice of profession. But in dealing with men, we must face the stern reality and admit the necessity of differential treatment between different castes and classes of people.

(8) The Hindu law-makers were not insensible to the theoretical rights of men, nor were they actuated by the pride of caste or racial hatred. . . .

(9) According to the Shastras, a sannyasin has no caste. Likewise in practice, a truly pious man is always revered irrespective of his caste. This shows the true spirit of Hindu religion. . . .

(10) Religious reform cannot be enforced on the results of referendum. For religion, unlike politics, is always cherished by a small minority and it is always for these few to guide, and for the majority to follow. Religion cannot be democratized with impunity.

With these observations, I beg to request you to reconsider the position which you have taken up with regard to the temple-entry question, and if it is not possible, to convince the orthodox people who are always open to conviction.

It would have been much better if the Pandit had quoted my very words about the Gita, as he would at once have seen the difference between what I am reported to have said and what I have actually written. This is what I wrote in my statement dated 4th November last:

It is the one open book to every Hindu who will care to study it, and if all the other scriptures were reduced to ashes, the seven hundred verses of this imperishable booklet are quite enough to tell one what Hinduism is and how one can live up to it. And I claim to be a sanatanist because for forty years I have been seeking literally to live up to the teachings of that book. Whatever is contrary to its main theme I reject as un-Aindu. It excludes no faith and no teacher.

The Pandit and the reader will see that there is a very wide difference between what I have actually said and what is attributed to me, and, that being the case, the grounds for showing the untenability of a position I have never taken up become irrelevant.
Similarly with reference to the Code of Manu, I never rejected the whole of it on “the mere suspicion of interpolation”; and as to interpolations, they are more than a suspicion, for what I consider as interpolations are clearly in contravention of the fundamentals laid down in the Gita and, for that matter, in Manu’s Code itself. The following is Manu’s touchstone of religion:

\text{विद्वत्ता सन्नित्यमः सन्नित्यमस्तेश्चार्थिभि:} \\
\text{हुँद्वेनाध्युजये यो धर्मस्तं निरीक्षयत्} \\

Whatever is always followed by the learned, the good and those who are free from anger and attachment and whatever is experienced in the heart, know that to be religion.\(^1\)

Another text is, again, from the same Code:

\[
\text{धृति क्षमा दमोहत्सवं शैवभिन्नतया नियम्यः} \\
\text{धौविधः सत्यक्रोधे दर्शने घर्षलक्षणं} \\

Steadfastness, forgiveness, restraint, non-stealing, purity, control of the senses, intelligence, learning, truth, freedom from anger, these ten are the touchstone of religion.\(^2\)

Accordingly, whatever is clearly contrary to this touchstone must be rejected as an interpolation.

The Pandit has summarily dismissed the ideals of Hinduism about equality and justice, by regarding them as the private property of the saints, forgetting that ideals and saints become perfectly useless if the practice of the poor sinners can never approach the ideals and their repositories, the saints. What is that justice “which will not condone invidious distinction between man and man but will make us face the stern reality and admit the necessity of differential treatment between different castes and classes of people”? Who are the different castes and what is the differential treatment between them? For instance, among the Banias, whom I should know best, there are about 50 castes. I know of no differential treatment between them. Nor do I find any authority for the formation of these castes in the Smritis. There are as many castes among the Brahmans as there are leaves in the little tree under which I am sitting, but I do not find any Smriti which enumerates these castes and the differential treatment.

\(^2\) Manusmriti, VI. 92
have a shrewd suspicion that these gentlemen will fight to the last ditch any attempt made to mete out differential treatment to them, and some of them may even, like my non-Brahmin friends, consign to the flames Sanskrit verses printed and stitched together and passed off as divinely inspired Smritis.

The Pandit says:

The best way, therefore, of rising superior to the stigma of social inferiority is not enfranchisement, but emancipation from the snare of the dark forces of Nature.

Who is to be emancipated from the snare of the dark forces of Nature? Evidently the Pandit means that it is not the Brahmin who has to emancipate himself from the snare of superiority, but the poor Harijan has to disengage himself from the snare of inferiority. Unfortunately, that is precisely what the modern sanatanist Brahmin is resisting, and that is precisely what Dr. Ambedkar demands almost at the point of the bayonet. For, he says, ‘the dark forces of Nature shall no longer hold me in their snare. I shall rise to the same height that the Brahmin occupies, even though I may have to demolish both him and myself in the attempt.‘ Yet that is the net result of the Pandit’s prescription.

As against the Pandit’s, my humble prescription is that it is the Brahmin whose privilege and duty it is to disentangle himself from the snare of superiority and himself become a ‘Harijan’ man of God. Then only will he vindicate the glory of varnadharma and the true message of Hinduism, for which he is supposed ‘to live, move and have his being’. I invite the Pandit to appreciate this very simple prescription.

Lastly, he has done himself and me less than justice by misreading the scope of the referendum suggested by me. Surely, worshippers in a temple have at any time the right to admit others to worship with them on the same terms as they themselves do, so long as they do not interfere with the ceremonial or the mode of worship, which undoubtedly can only be regulated by experience.

Let us know this ancient practice by its own ancient name, and perhaps it will cease to frighten the Pandit, and other orthodox friends. Have not Mahajans always decided matters of admission to temples? And Mahajans are assemblies of men and they decide by putting their heads together and taking the sense of the meeting. I presume that this would be described as a referendum in the English language. I have suggested nothing more and nothing less than this.

Harijan, 25-2-1933
I wrote to the Rt. Hon. Srinivasa Sastri for a message to the Harijan. And I received a characteristic reply marked ‘private’. The letter seemed to me to be too good to be suppressed. I, therefore, wired for permission to publish it. The reply wire was as characteristic as the letter.

Firstly inappropriate to Harijan, secondly, offensive to partisans. Ill requital for your steadfast affection. However if perchance useful please publish.

And here is the letter:

Private

SVAGATAM, MYLAPORE,
February 13, 1933

DEAR BROTHER,

Thanks for your affectionate letter, in which you ask for a message to your new baby.

I am going to change towards you. It is necessary in your interest, no matter what effort it costs me.

You live in a difficult world. Waking or dreaming, you are racked by thoughts of sin and penance, confessions and truth-quests, satyagraha and moral self-flagellation. Those that talk to you or correspond with you continually pose doubts and serious problems, only deepening the grimness and suffocation around you. Few bring lightness of talk, familiar expletives, innocent jokes, revealing banter. You badly need a privileged jester in your establishment. Have you read a story called Ardath by Ouida? The hero there has a critic whose business is to expose his errors and bring to light the flaws in his character. Being a professional fault-finder, he overdoes his part in the end and defeats his first object. I shall vary my function from time to time and disappear from the scene every now and then. But I will endeavour to awaken parts of your mind long gone to sleep and to supply elements of nourishment which it has long been without. Of course, you can stop the medicine if it disagrees and you cannot stand it. That would be a sign to me that the disease had gone too far.

You are an extraordinarily correct writer of English. The ordinary reader will not detect any slips on your part. They are not only rare but of a subtle nature. The eye of a schoolmaster, made acute by dwelling on trivialities of grammar, can alone see them. Here are some, all from the first number of the Harijan and from the parts bearing your name.

Page 3. “If it is a bye-product of the caste system, it is only in the same sense that an ugly growth is of a body”. (‘That’ is fast undergoing a change in English, but this use is far in excess of present usage. Better say ‘in which an ugly growth is a bye-product of a body’.)

Also read the whole passage again. Don’t you say in effect ‘if the caste system is a bye-product of the caste system’?

Page 3. “The outcaste-ness, in the sense we understand it, has therefore to be destroyed altogether.” (A slip similar to the above. Between ‘sense’ and ‘we’ insert ‘in which’.)

Page 4. “Caste Hindus have to open their temples to Harijans, precisely on the same terms as the other Hindus…

(Say ‘the same terms as to the other Hindus’. Else, it would mean that the other Hindus opened their temples on certain terms to Harijans.)

Page 7. “Beyond this I may not go, for the reason I have already stated and which the reader should respect.” (Insert ‘which’ after ‘reason’. The conjunction ‘and’ must not be made to connect a suppressed ‘which’ and an expressed ‘which’.)

Page 8. “Untouchability has a great deal to answer for the insanitation of our streets and our latrines.” (Idiomatically, ‘for’ is part of the verb ‘answer’, and cannot govern ‘the insanitation’. We must insert ‘in’ after ‘for’, though the sentence becomes inelegant. I would recast it: ‘Untouchability is answerable for a great deal of the insanitation etc.’).

Page 8. “Therefore, a person who is to attend to scavenging, whether it is a paid Bhangi or an unpaid mother, they are unclean until they have washed themselves clean of their unclean work.”

(The looseness is, perhaps, the result of rapid dictation unchecked by subsequent reading. ‘A person’ is left hanging in the air. The plurals ‘they’, ‘themselves’ and ‘their’ are justified by the common gender required. Still the discord of number is apparent to the point of harshness and may be avoided. Read ‘A person . . . is unclean until washed clean of the unclean work.’)

Let me add a criticism of substance. On page 7 you answer a question under the heading “Seeking or Giving?”. The paragraph has gained brevity at the expense of clearness. The difference between giving co-operation and seeking it requires more elucidation. Likewise the analogy of love leading to feeding in one case and starving in another. But you are obscure and even baffling when you say that your policy of non-co-operation with Government allows of your seeking its co-operation when ever your purpose is, in your opinion, ‘very sacred and altogether good’. Most sensible people follow this rule in ordinary life, not seeking co-operation when they don’t care and seeking it when they care. They don’t proclaim it as a policy or give it a grand name.

1 This correction has been made in the text at p. 264.

Ever yours affectionately,

V. S. SRINIVASAN

I wanted to share this letter with the public, because such a letter would help any publicist and his cause and that in an unexpected manner, more so when written without any thought of publication.

I want also to use the publication of the letter for easing the tension between sanatanists and reformers. Let them learn that closest friendships can subsist between persons of contrary temperaments. As the public know, Sastri and I have opposite views on many important questions. our mutual regard and affection have never suffered on that account. There is no reason whatsoever why the same rule cannot be extended to parties and groups representing opposite schools of opinion. The sanatanists are out to defend religion as they believe it. I take their claim at its face value and deal with it as such. Why need they impute to me political motives when I solemnly assert that for me, too, the question of untouchability is a matter purely of religion? Would that the affection subsisting between Sastri and me prove so deep and extensive as to reach and affect the whole society!

But enough of this. I almost hear Sastri’s spirit whispering to me: ‘You are misusing the medicine I prescribed to wean you from your disease of grimness and the like., Therefore, let me hasten to tell him and the public that I have in my little camp of privileged jester in Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel. He succeeds in bending me almost double every day with laughter over his unexpected sallies. Gloom hides her fiendish face in his presence. No disappointment, however great, can make him gloomy for long. And he will not let me be serious for two consecutive minutes. He will not spare even my ‘saintliness’! It may deceive simple people but never the Sardar or the sanatanists. Both tear down the mask and compel me to see myself as they delight to see me. To be just to the sanatanists, let me admit that Vallabhbhai does not see me quite as sanatanists do. But that is beside the point. The thing that Sastri wants in our little family is there cent per cent. Next time he enters the Assembly or some such place, he must vote special thanks to the Government for putting Vallabhbhai with me or me with him.

But this consoling information does not in any way release Sastri from his self-imposed obligation. For the Sardar will not do what Sastri can be trusted to do mostly. Unlike him, the Sardar has the wretched habit in the end of saying ‘ditto’ to all I say. And that is bad for anybody.

Let the student note in passing Sastri’s love for the language he has mastered as few men have done. He is a purist in everything. We badly need purists in our country. I want only purists as fellow-workers in this glorious campaign of abolition of untouchability.

As to the purity of the language of Harijan, whatever faults are found notwithstanding Sastri’s warning will be shared with me by Shastri, the Editor, and by Mahadev Desai, who shares with the schoolmaster the weakness for writing correctly in the language which for the moment he is using.

I must leave the reader to find out for himself or herself the many other beauties of Sastri’s letter. If he will do so, he must read the letter three or four times and look up all the references in the first issue of Harijan.

Harijan, 25-2-1933

513. A CAMPAIGN OF ABUSE

Correspondents have been sending me cuttings from sanatanist newspapers containing distortions of conversations with me and attributing to me things I have never said.

There is a sheet in Tamil that the Editor has been kindly translating to me. It contains nothing but libels against reformers. There is in it what purports to be a report of my conversation with a Madura Pandit1 who came to see me some time ago. One correspondent wonders if, as the report has tried to make out, I could have said that there were no chaste women in India. The whole report is a caricature, the most material portions having been omitted. But I must not fill the columns of Harijan with a transcript of the caricature and the true version of the conversation of which Mahadev Desai took notes at the time. But I reproduce the portion relating to women. Here

1Presumably Subramanya Sastrigal; vide letters to K. S. Subramania Aiyar, 25-2-1933, and K. K. Venkataram Aiyar, 25-2-1933

VOL. 59 : 13 JANUARY, 1933 - 9 MARCH, 1933
is first a free translation of the Tamil report:

GANDHI: Should a pure woman consort with her husband when he is given up to sinful ways?

THE PANDIT: Yes. The sinful husband will be metamorphosed into a virtuous man by the chastity of the wife.

GANDHI: Are there chaste women in these days?

PANDIT: How can we say there are none? There may be virtuous women for all we know. But why wander from our topic of conversation? Let us go on with our discussion.

Be it noted that the Madura Pandit or his friend took no notes. Here is the relevant portion of Mahadev Desai’s notes:

PANDIT: The temples are intended for women and Shudras. According to Shastras, Shudras only can enter the temples today, because they alone are observing their swadharma\(^1\) viz., service, and chaste women have the same right. The others are burdened with karmas and duties, which now they have ceased to perform and, therefore, not entitled to enter a temple.

GANDHI: So whilst a Brahmin may be a karma Chandala\(^2\) his chaste wife may be entitled to enter a temple.

PANDIT: The wife because of her chastity purifies her husband.

GANDHI: Then, the moment a man has a wife who is pure, he becomes pure, no matter what sort of life he lives.

PANDIT: Yes; his wife saves him.

GANDHI: A man may go to the dogs, and yet if his wife is chaste, he becomes pure?

PANDIT: Yes, his wife saves him; though what he does is wrong, his sins will be neutralized.

GANDHI: So, if a man wants to remain immune from the consequences of his acts, all that he has to do is to be armed with a chaste wife.

PANDIT: Quite so.

GANDHI: Well, then, since we are not going to impute bad character to a single woman in India, for we must assume every one of them to be pure, unless, of course, she admits that she is impure or she has been found to be impure—every married man is pure and there should be no untouchability.

PANDIT: She should be a true pativrata, a genuinely chaste woman, described

\(^1\) Duty of oneself
\(^2\) Untouchable for one’s actions in our religious books like Ramayana.

GANDHI: How are you to determine that a particular woman satisfies that definition?

PANDIT: Agni-pariksha. She must prove her chastity by undergoing the ordeal through fire, as Sita did.

GANDHI: And so, those who cannot come scatheless out of it must be declared to be impure?

PANDIT: Indeed.

GANDHI: I have done. Enough, however, about the Tamil sheet. A Gujarati sheet published by one claiming to be a sanatanist Shastri and now distributed broadcast in Hindi by sanatanist papers in North India professes to publish excerpts from my writings, sixty in all, which have the effect of proving me to be the very embodiment of everything anti-Hindu. Excerpts are torn from their context and made to bear a meaning the opposite of what they have when read in their context. Here is a sample of statements attributed to me:

> My parents and Sita were Bhangis.
> The Shastras are the productions of hypocrites, and the sages are so many Satans.
> I regard a Bhangi to be superior to a Brahmin.
> I am an iconoclast.

Now my correspondents, some of them frankly puzzled, invite me to deal with these charges. I must respectfully but resolutely decline the invitation. If there are people who will believe of me the things that are said in the writings sent to me, no refutation will save me. The public must take me as I am. What is more, the cause is everything, I am nothing. If the campaign against untouchability is just and necessary for the very existence of Hinduism, it will survive the reputation of a thousand Gandhi.

What is, however; sad, almost tragic, about these libellous statements is that they are made by responsible sanatanists reported to be learned men and presumed to be holy men fit to be religious teachers of unsophisticated simple folk. Their curious interpretations of the Shastras, their refusal to read the signs of the times, their defence of obviously superstitious and even inhuman beliefs and customs, one can understand as being honestly held. What may appear as superstitious and inhuman to the reformer may not appear so to them. But the resort by responsible pandits to untruths, distortions and suppression of truth is bound to do incalculable harm to Hindus and Hinduism. Let sanatanists put up as stubborn a fight as they like in defence of what they regard as a good cause. But I implore them to weed it of untruth.

_Harijan_, 25-2-1933

514. ‘WE DO NOT HATE’

One who is a Vedanta Shastri and Secretary of a branch Brahmin Sabha writes:

Sanatanists do not hate untouchables but hate their customs and daily actions. They are always ready to give all the Hindus, whether touchables or untouchables, every help they can. They give the untouchables priests, preceptors, Shastras with Ramnam, etc. But there are some so-called educated persons who always hate those untouchables. They are always keeping aloof from them and they want to pollute the sanatanists with the impurity brought by them from non-Hindus.

The foregoing I have taken from a fairly long letter and I have taken it as a sample from many such letters. ‘Hate, is perhaps the wrong word. I should use the word ‘despise’. And if to relegate a body of people to distant locations, to regard their touch, approach or sight as pollution, to throw at them the leavings of one’s food, to deny to them the use of public roads and institutions, even the use of public temples, is not to despise them, I do not know what the word ‘despise’ means.

The writer says that the untouchables have priests and preceptors. My own experience and the experience of numerous reformers is to the contrary. Despairing of real priests, they have raised from among themselves what must be called ‘an apology for priests’. The writer betrays the secret when he says that untouchables have the “Shastras with Ramnam”, implying that they can have no access to any other Shastras. What are their daily customs and daily actions which evoke hatred? Their daily action was described in graphic terms by the Poet in his message1 for our first issue. Save for carrion-eating, their customs are the same as those of innumerable caste Hindus. And carrion-eating is by no means common to all the untouchables so called. If a census were taken, we would be astonished to find that there are so few. I hope to present the readers of Harijan with reliable statistics in this matter. And I have not a shadow of a doubt that caste Hindus are responsible for this habit of carrion-eating and that, immediately they are welcomed as brothers and sisters and are offered the ordinary amenities of life on the same terms as caste Hindus, that habit will automatically drop out.

Lastly, the common experience is that whatever has been done for the Harijans by caste Hindus has been done by those who have received education or who are otherwise ranked as reformers. It will give me pleasure to know that sanatanists as such have done much or anything for Harijans. I would gladly publish the list of their charities or other acts of service rendered to Harijans.

Harijan, 25-2-1933

515. “HARIJAN” IN THE VERNACULARS

Some readers are anxious to know when, if at all, Harijan will be published in Hindi and other languages of the country.

The idea was to publish the Hindi edition first and the English and the other editions after. But, as there was delay in publishing the Hindi edition, the Chairman of the Central Board of the Servants of Untouchables Society authorized the publication of the English edition without waiting for the former.

I am happy to be able to inform the reader that the Hindi edition will have been out before this is in his hands. Arrangements are proceeding as fast as possible for the publication of provincial editions in the provincial languages, e.g., in Bengali, Marathi, Tamil, Gujarati, etc. My prescription has been and is that they should all be self-supporting. Moneys that are being collected for and by the Central and the Provincial Boards must be predominantly spent among the Harijans, i.e., for their educational and economic uplift. The weekly journals and leaflets are part of the necessary propaganda chiefly among caste Hindus. Therefore, they should pay for it. Except up to a point, I do not believe in presenting the public with free literature on any subject. It may be ever so cheap, but never free. I believe in the old Sanskrit proverb, ‘Knowledge is for those who would know’. But these are my personal views. I can only tender my advice to the organizations and organizers. There is no copyright in Harijan. Enterprising vernacular newspapers will publish their own editions of Harijan. Some have already written to me of their intention to do so. I can prevent no one, I can only plead with everyone to follow the advice which I have tendered and which is based on considerable experience.

DEAR MAJOR BHANDARI,

As you know I have been endeavouring during my present incarceration to study the heavens. You have kindly allowed astronomical literature to come in to me. I need a fair-sized astronomical telescope. Lady Vithaldas has one and has kindly consented to give me a loan of it. Drs. Ramnathan and Desai of the Government observatory (Poona) who put the telescope right say that I won’t be able to use it unless they gave personal directions. They need to be with me for that purpose for about half an hour after the stars are observable. If there is any objection to this lesson being given to me in the yard in which I am kept during the night, it may be given in the yard reserved for untouchability interviews.

I shall thank you if you will please ascertain the wishes of the Government in the matter.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR SAMUEL,

I had your letter of 12th January. I am writing to Hon’ble Mr. Natesan to look after you and your children on your reaching Madras. You will therefore please write to him giving him the exact date of your arrival and the name of the boat. You will not expect Mr. Natesan to do more than finding lodgings for a short time. If your children can live simply and in the Indian style, he won’t find any difficulty. Nor will he find any difficulty in supporting a high style of living if you have ample money at your disposal.

February 25, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter of the 11th instant. There was a similar letter from another friend, whose name I forget at the moment, to whom I gave my views.

I am quite convinced that sacrifice of dumb animals to appease a deity cannot have any religious or other merit about it. It is a sinful act. These sacrifices are a relic of barbarism and it would be a great sin if, in the face of the anti-untouchability movement with temple-entry as a part of it, animal sacrifices are not stopped altogether.

February 25, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. You are quite right in thinking that the object of the anti-untouchability movement is to level down the distinctions of high and low. There would be to the end of time different professions and occupations, different qualities also, but none of these differences necessitate the distinction of high and low.

The motive behind the temple-entry is from this standpoint easily understood. It is to demonstrate to the Hindu mind and to the world that in the house of God there is no one high and no one low. This is a reform wanted by those caste Hindus who have got the conviction that hitherto the treatment meted out to the so-called untouchables has been sinful and contrary to the spirit of Hinduism. Those who think that temple-entry has anything to do with Congress politics are wholly mistaken.

I thank you for your two letters, one of which is unsigned, of the 14th instant.

I quite agree with you that so far as the civil rights are concerned, we can make no distinction between Christian untouchables and Hindu untouchables, except that where Christians have special facilities for education you need not worry about them.

About the other letter, I am unable to say anything definite in the absence of fuller information, but this I can say that if the rites are intended as a condition precedent to their admission to varnashramadharma, I am wholly opposed to the performance of the rites; if on the other hand, they are meant for their betterment and as part of a spiritual instruction, they might be quite harmless and even beneficial, if the selection is properly made and the rites are performed by men, qualified both by their character and learning.

February 25, 1933

MY DEAR HARIBHAU,

I had a very long conversation with Upasak. His wife is a very unsteady woman, she may even desert him any day and she is wholly incapable of observing self-restraint. Such a couple cannot possibly go to the Ashram where brahmacharya is indispensable. I do not think also that Upasak will be able to conform to all the conditions of the Board, but he says that if the grant up to April is now paid, i.e., Rs. 22, he will try to do what he can to keep the school going and he will take his chance if he cannot. I think that this is a proposal worth considering. If, therefore, it is possible, I recommend Rs. 22 being paid to him with the absolute warning that nothing more will be paid to him thereafter.

536. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI
February 25, 1933

CHI. RAMDAS’

Khushaldas has passed away. I received both the accompanying letters yesterday evening. I have written to Shantilal and informed him. Khushaldas has indeed been released from the suffering of this life. The truth is that everybody who goes on a journey along that royal road is released from this life. For this life is given to us for repaying our debts, and nobody can leave before he has paid off his. If this idea is correct, death means that the person has paid off his debt
He who knows with perfect conviction that this life is given to us for repaying our debts can repay his debts to all, and the ancients described that as attaining moksha. Moksha means complete freedom from debt and, consequently, end of the cycle of births for the person.

I was pained to see your condition yesterday, your broken health and your mental suffering. I had no remedy for either, and was pained because you attributed to your father more power than he possessed. I felt as Harishchandra had done. He had become ready to sell his only son for the sake of dharma. I have been doing very much the same thing. Though I know the remedy for your poor health, I cannot adopt it because of my concern for dharma, nor can I end your mental suffering for the same reason.

If you follow the rule that you cannot avail yourself of facilities which other prisoners who keep bad health would not get, you can do nothing to improve your health. I can understand that you would not like to ask for special facilities for yourself but it does not seem right to me that you should not avail yourself of facilities which may be offered to you when you explain to the authorities the condition of your health. When you are outside, you enjoy more facilities than the countless millions and never think about the matter. I ask for and enjoy, both in jail and outside, facilities which they can never hope to get, and am fully aware that I do so. But I do not feel that I violate dharma thereby. If an elephant tries to crawl like an ant, he will not succeed in becoming an ant thereby and will cease to be an elephant, which means that he will have lost his true nature. An elephant like me, however, would humbly accept his big size and consume food weighing more than thousands of ants and would also draw, without the least effort, loads which those ants could never draw. An elephant is entitled to consume food which the size of his body requires. Only, he must not waste that food by not giving proportionate service in return. That is, he should carry loads proportionate to his strength. If he does that, he will have consumed as much food and given as much service as an ant. This is communism. If, therefore, you can secure the food which your body requires by legitimate means and without humiliating yourself for the purpose, you should do so and improve your health, and then serve other people to the best of your ability.

But even in trying to serve other people and securing facilities for yourself by legitimate means, you should know and understand your duty as a prisoner. A prisoner has no right except that of preserving his self-respect, for he ceases to be the master of his body as soon as he becomes a prisoner and the jail superintendent becomes its master. Even if the latter does not give the prisoner enough to eat or to drink or sufficient clothes to wear, the prisoner should remain contented and cheerful. Anybody who cannot do so is not a true prisoner. We must admit that in this age the British policy towards prisoners is comparatively more liberal than that of any other government. It is improving day by day. There is certainly room for much more improvement still, but that is another matter. A prisoner may fight to bring about such improvement. If, however, he remembers the general principle stated above, he will not be disappointed if he fails in his attempt—for he has no absolute right to enjoy any facility. If you understand this reasoning fully, I shall be relieved and you will be able to overcome your mental unrest.

I will certainly try to do what I can in regard to everything which you mentioned—but in my own way, and that is bound to take time. The delay will not make me impatient, and I wish that you also should not be. What can you or I do? Certainly we are not masters of the result.

We can only try the best that we can. You have been doing what you can, and I also will do what I can. Even if we don’t succeed, you should dance with joy, and so will I.

Be not moved by joy or sorrow; with the body were they created;
None can escape them for by the Lord of Raghu were they decreed.
Do you follow all this? Read the letter three or four times, and if you do not follow any point ask me to explain it again.

Keep me informed about the condition of your health.

MY DEAR BHRRR,!

So you have entered your eightieth year and you do not want to believe it!! Shall we say it is your eighteenth year? Being nearly 15 years younger than you, I should be a four-year-old baby expecting to grow new teeth. How nice! Then the sanatanist friends can swear at me to their heart’s content for many, many years to come.

But no such good luck for them. For with your silvery beard, even little children won’t take you to be only 18. They would vote us down as old humbugs wishing to give them no chance.

If you get your Rs. 2’000 from the Maharajah, it would be a good start.²

You should waylay all the lecturers that come there. They should give you something for the great cause.

541. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

February 26, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your letter. You will find with this a letter for Bhagwanji and one for Panditji. I believe that up to a certain quantity (12 ounces) milk is supplied to a prisoner at the cost of the jail.

Personally I am glad that you have told Hariyomal that he could come back. Such persons learn only through experience. Your suggestion regarding Parvati is excellent. If it is acted upon, both will be free.

We must bear the expenses of Prabhudas’s journeys. He is rather timid. He will probably take time to find a partner, and it may even be a difficult task. He will not get over his restlessness till he marries. The forcible repression of his strong desire to marry was the cause of his restlessness.

Your remaining firm about the problem of Lakshmi is very necessary. I cannot understand Dudabhai’s opposition. I have had no letter from Purushottam. I did ask him to write to me. I don’t think fasting will do him any harm. If he knows how to break the fast gradually, he is bound to benefit from it. If the bone-setter knows his job well, there will be no harm. It will probably be safer to get Kanu examined by Haribhai. If Mathuradas remains firm in his resolve, Motibehn will give up her opposition. It has been my unfailing experience that if one of the two parties is firm and the other party knows that he or she cannot be shaken from his or her resolve, the latter resigns herself or himself to the situation. As we forget in time our grief even over the death of one who was dearest to us, so also this folly leaves us by and by. The truth is there is some weakness in both parties and that is why they need each other’s support. Really speaking, such support is of no avail. If it helps any couple to keep their resolve, the fact must be counted as an accident. How can a blind person lead another blind person? How can one who is drowning save another in the same plight as himself? How can a person who is not free from passion help his or her partner to be so? The reasoning is quite simple.

You need not take any trouble to enlist subscribers for Harijan. We will send five copies to the Ashram addressed to no particular subscribers. You may use them in any way that you can. See if you can maintain a file with four out of the five copies, or with the copies which remain unsold. Some day they will be useful.

I got Satyarthaprakash, the slivers and the leather for the soles. Kellogg’s book must have been sent to Dhulia jail for Madhavji. Or it was with somebody in Vijapur. I am sure about this.

BOYS AND GIRLS,

Harijan children won’t listen to talk on abstinence from liquor. But coming in contact with you, they will gradually be influenced. It is a nice idea to visit them on Sundays. Try if possible to make this arrangement. It would be enough if the Friday programme is shifted to Sunday. Discuss it with Narandas. If your conduct is spotless, it will definitely influence them. It is inevitable that you should mix with older people. They also will be won over by love and service. Sometimes you may invite the Harijan children to the Ashram. Before inviting them take permission from Narandas.

I regard it as good news that the weights of most of you have gone up and also the counts of the yarn.

547. LETTER TO KALICHARAN
February 26, 1933

BHAJ KALICHARANJI,

I have your letter. I know all that is written about me. I do not think there is any remedy for it except remaining unperturbed. I hope that nobody believes it at all. And how can my denial have any effect on those who believe it? Anyway I have written something in this connection in the current issue of Harijan.¹

548. RESIST UNTRUTH WITH TRUTH

It is unfortunate that untruth is being preached these days in the name of the sanatana dharma. I am receiving many new sanatanist newspapers which abound in untruth and indecency. I have been severely attacked in them. Many correspondents ask me to write something in reply to them. What can I write? Some say I do not believe in religion. In answer to that, except for me to say that religion is my life-breath what other reply can I give? A learned religious propagandist has written in the same vein. I can only give this reply to it that every word of it is almost entirely untrue. His words are not proved untrue because I say so, just as, his mere saying so does not establish what he says as truth.

Still untruth can be resisted by truth alone. It is necessary to understand this great saying. The root of all actions is in thought. False thoughts result in false utterances; and after that, or along with it or without the utterances, action follows. In the same way right action has its roots in right thoughts. If the thought is not true then that action or utterance which seems true is only false, is erroneous. That is to say, if I am entirely truthful even in my thoughts falsehood will be warded off automatically. People will not believe these canards. This firm faith keeps me unperturbed, and my friends also should be unperturbed. This false propaganda cannot last long. It is that for a short while the atmosphere will be contaminated by it. In every agitation such things always happen.

Let the reformer remember one thing. Let him never even contemplate untruth. We have a great religious mission before us. The abolition of untouchability is the great religious task before me, an onerous duty. To eradicate untouchability is the supreme duty of every Hindu. We can never accomplish this religious task with untruth. Ultimately anger or violence is also untruth. For this reason, it is necessary for those who serve Harijans never to be angry with their opponents; never to utter lies; but to overcome anger with affection, rudeness with courtesy, falsehood with truth, and violence with non-violence. And since we cannot control the outcome but can certainly practise truth and other virtues, God has said, “You have only the right to action; and not to the fruit thereof."

1 If all those who serve Harijans will stick to truth, then the result will only be good. There is no doubt whatever in this.

549. KEEPING THE WORD

February 26, 1933

A gentleman writes:

You are very hasty. Although a non-co-operator, you even seek help from the Assembly. Why such weakness? Negotiate with the sanatanists and have the temples thrown open.

I replied to this gentleman on these lines:

I am not hasty. I am striving to fulfil my pledge. In Bombay, at the end of September, this large conference of Hindus leaders on behalf of the Hindus resolved to strive to get the temples thrown open to Harijans in as peaceful a manner as possible. Now this difficulty has cropped up in our way, namely, the British courts have decided that Harijans cannot enter many temples. Even a consensus among Hindus cannot abolish the law. Law can be abrogated by law alone. So legislation has become necessary and Shri Ranga Iyer has presented the Bill. It does not have even a hint of force or of interference with religion. According to the Bill, if the Hindu public wish so, temples can be thrown open to the Harijans. The temples will be thrown open when Hindu public decide to do so; never by the Bills. There is no question of co-operation or non-co-operation in this. But this matter is outside my province today. People should have this much faith that if I, the author of the principle of non-co-operation, am a partisan to the passing of these Bills, the possibility of the principle being violated is very little. The important thing is that it is the duty of those who made the solemn declaration in Bombay to do their utmost to remove the legal obstruction. Only then can they say:

Rather die than go back upon one’s word."

553. LETTER TO VIYOGI HARI

February 27,1933

BHAII VIYOGI HARI,
I have gone through Harijan Sevak; I did not like it. It requires more labour and more study. It contains the news of the opening of the Santram temple at Nadiad. The news is published despite the fact that the Santram temple has not been thrown open. No news item should be quoted from the papers without verifying it. Publication of such news always undermines one’s prestige and harms the cause of dharma. The prefix ‘it is reported’ is certainly there but who can thank you for it? Very many things are reported but few turn out to be true on verification. This must now be corrected. Enquire from the head of the Santram temple. The account of activities has taken up too much space. It indicates that you had nothing left to print and that is why even after so much space being used up the lower portion remained blank. And that is an eyesore. You could have found sufficient material from the two issues of Harijan lying with you. Certainly there was no lack of time. The translation of my article should have borne at the end the appellation ‘translation’. Even the translation is not satisfactory. Harijan Sevak should not be stuffed with articles but it should be a guide to the workers and should abound with news. The problems facing the sanatanists should be indicated and solutions suggested. The falsehoods of the sanatanists should be exposed at the appropriate time. Hence we must receive exhaustive reports from all provinces. The letters published already in Aaj need not be reproduced.
I am sending today a wire in this connection. I trust you will not mind my plain speaking. All this is meant not to discourage but to encourage you.

The two articles I sent yesterday must have reached you.

554. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

February 28, 1933

DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

I know you don’t believe in giving yourself rest. I propose to join you in not giving you rest. Mahadev wrote to you at my instance yesterday about the wretched get-up of the Harijan Sevak, both as to the matter and the manner. I sent even a telegram to Vyogti Hari. Today I send you what has appealed to me as an extraordinarily clever report on the Harijan organizations of the Punjab. I am dealing with it in the ensuing Harijan, but you should circulate the copies of the enclosed report among the Punjab organizations and get their replies. If you think that there is absolutely nothing to be said for the report and that it simply contains a series of exaggerations and unsupported statements, naturally you will not go to the expense of copying the report and multiply your and your staff’s work. You will then return me the report with a brief note that it is not worthy of consideration. Perhaps you know the writer; if you do, you will let me know all about him. I am still in correspondence with him. I wonder if you read the English Harijan. It is addressed to you personally as it is to every Harijan servant, because it contains suggestions for workers, appeals to them, as also arguments to arm them for their battle. Arguments and appeals you may not need at all, but suggestions you must welcome, no matter from what quarter they come. There is one suggestion of my making in my article on the Punjab report which I do not want to duplicate, because I expect you to see it in the Harijan. If you see a flaw in the reasoning, or if you find it to be impossible to carry out, you will tell me and if your counter-argument appeals to

DEAR DR. KATJU,

I thank you for your valuable letter. I am glad that your daughter is happy with her husband. I know you will do all you can for the Harijan.

I appreciate your argument about temple-entry. In my opinion, based even upon the present experience of new temples which are being opened, the donors have no fixed ideas. They simply build temples for Hindus without a rigid definition for the class of Hindus to be admitted to the temples. Hinduism has never been a rigid faith. It has kept abreast of the times. Untouchables of today were not the untouchables, say, a hundred years ago, and those who were untouchables a thousand years ago are undoubtedly not untouchables today.

Would you say that the English law of Trusts is applicable to Hindu usage? Some of the most learned Shastris who are no reformers of the Western style do not hesitate to give the opinion that Hindu public temples should never have been closed to untouchables. According to your argument, our ancestors could stop the march of Hinduism by opening temples in accordance with the usage then in existence. I would like you therefore to re-consider your position, and if there is a flaw in my deductions from your argument, I would like you to strive with me. For I have no desire to see any injustice done to any party or person.

Yours sincerely,

565. LETTER TO DUNCAN GREENLEES

March 1, 1933

Newcomers do find the routine a stiff business. But we are trying to live the life of the billions of the earth. They are toilers all the day long. They have to do their thinking whilst their bodies are working. When the routine becomes natural, it becomes pleasant and does not interfere with hard thinking. All thinking is not useful. Clear thinking is the need. That can only come through continuous sacrifice, i.e., toiling for the service of others.

Bill not reached. Next only non-official day twenty-fourth.”
566. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 1, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your mail (a big packet). I think it would be best to serve rice to Maitri and others who insist on it. We may only explain the properties of the different classes of grain and not press anybody to follow our advice. These properties are a matter of direct experience. I see from experience every day that we should consume a minimum of starches. Rice is pure starch, and so it is served to people who cannot digest any other grains. The derogatory use of the term “rice-eater”, is perfectly justified. But this argument will convince only those who use their reason. It is not at all likely to appeal to a person whose stomach will not tolerate anything but rice. I could write a great deal more on this subject, but I have no time for that.

Ramabehn saw me yesterday. You have not won her trust. Try harder. She wishes to learn English. She wishes to do so in spare time after doing her work for the Ashram. Go and meet her. Listen to what she has to say and request Mathew or Mary or Duncan to give her one hour daily. Do all you can to satisfy her desire to learn English. If any of the women who are old inmates of the Ashram wish to learn English, their desire is natural. We feel the necessity of its knowledge every hour, and also observe that as soon as a person learns English he or she goes up in the esteem of others. We cannot check this tide. There is no harm in knowing the language itself. The harm comes from the misuse of the language, from its blind worship. Women are not likely to cultivate such an attitude soon. If you see any flaw in this reasoning, point it out to me.

567. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

Morning, March 2, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

You must have received the letter which I wrote to you yesterday. Make careful preparations for Lakshmi’s marriage and see that everything goes well. Jamna and you should give away the bride, and Velanbehn should offer the bridegroom. If possible, I will send Lakshmidas there. As usual, keep a dhoti, shirt, cap, takli and a copy each of the Gita and the Bhajanvali ready for the bridegroom. Tie the marriage knot with the ends. Give a translation of the vows\(^1\) to both the bride and the bridegroom. And they should fast on that day and eat nothing till after the ceremony is over. You, Jamna and Velanbehn also should fast. Both the bride and the bridegroom should perform the ceremonial worship of the cow and the tree and recite Chapter XII of the Gita. It is not necessary to invite any friends except Anasuyabehn. We don’t want the marriage to be published in newspapers, though we do not wish to keep it a secret either. The bride and the bridegroom may leave for home by the night train and start working immediately. Velanbehn will arrange for the sari on behalf of Maruti. If you wish to ask any other question, you may do so. Invite all Harijan friends to attend the wedding. If you wish, you may serve them refreshments. In that case, I believe fruit will be the best. But consult your own convenience in all this, and make any changes which you feel necessary. Let the members of the Committee come together and plan the arrangements. Invite the senior women inmates also to the meeting of the Committee. Let the day of marriage be for us a sacred day of tapascharya and self-purification and one to be celebrated in keeping with our ideal of simplicity and self-control. Let all present shower their blessings on the bride and the bridegroom. Maruti’s letters simply fill me with admiration for him. If he remains true to the aspirations which he expresses in them, we shall believe that he must have become a member of Lakshmidas’s family blessed with the holy merit of his good deeds in previous lives. Lakshmidas’s love for him, too, must be wonderful beyond words.

And what excellent training he must have given!

Explain to everybody in the Ashram that it is the universal experience that anybody who does not give his best, physically and mentally in serving the sick, can do no other useful work, and that the Ashram exists to enable its inmates to serve others. Nobody in the Ashram, therefore, should be half-hearted in doing service.

573. LETTER TO NELLIE BALL

March 2, 1933

MY DEAR NELLIE,

Next time when you feel like writing you should trace the spelling of your name. As I read your signature I can only make out ‘Mell Bull’. I can easily read ‘Bull’ as ‘Ball’, but Esther confounds me. She has clearly spelt your name as ‘Nellie Ball’. I have therefore adopted her clear spelling in preference to your doubtful ‘Mell’. If therefore I have made any mistake you must go for Esther. But I see that you are a little philosopher with a big heart. Therefore you will exclaim, ‘What is in a name? It is the spirit that matters’. And whether I trace Mell or Nellie my spirit goes out to you, the little invalid daughter. But I propose a peremptory change in the way you describe yourself. Your body is no doubt shattered, but your spirit seems to have risen triumphant over the body. I do not want to think of you therefore as my ‘little invalid daughter’, but my ‘little daughter strong with the faith in God’. Now that C. F. Andrews is there you will certainly have the joy of receiving visits from him frequently and not only rarely. He is a genius for seeking out persons like you and going to them as often as he can. To visit people in power is a tax upon his mind. To visit people like you and me is a matter of perennial joy to him. He derives his strength from his association with those whom the world calls weak and helpless and who often but wrongly feel so themselves. But I must now stop.

You should give my love to your doctor and ask him to write to me about you.

I hope your new child will not fare as badly as the preceding one. Of course those who have read your book do not mind having read it, but these are very few. Those who do not want to know anything about your having entertained a funny little man cannot be blamed for not wanting your book. There must be quite a few thousand people who would like to know the story of Kingsley Hall and Children’s House dedicated to the service of the neglected poor. Why were you sorry that John Morris was being removed to an old workhouse? Would he not get there the same kind treatment he had at the hospital? Where is the place situated? I suppose you will see him often enough, or, is the workhouse far away from you? When you see him you should take my love to him. I see you are in your 18th year and so is the Ashram at Sabarmati. March 2, 1933

DEAR SISTER,

I continue to receive your letters fairly regularly. You must not hesitate to write as often as you like so long as you don’t always expect prompt acknowledgement from me.

I hope you got over the effects of the hurt long ere this reaches you.

I am glad you possess all the volumes of the Upanishads. Some of them will no doubt appear dry to you, but I am quite sure that you will not miss the central teaching which permeates all the principal Upanishads. But no teaching, however lofty it may be, enables us to control our nerves and our senses. That control only comes from incessant prayer from the heart and from utterly selfless service.

Yours sincerely,

March 2, 1933

DEAR MR. JAYAKAR,

I thank you for your letter. If you can give me your opinion without much tax on your energy, I would value it. Every help that comes counts in the midst of the difficulties that are being created day after day.

I hope you are fast regaining your lost strength.

You had my telegram\textsuperscript{2} in reply to yours. Whether for the moment we succeed or not, we must continue to create public opinion in favour of the Bills and make such effort as is possible to have them passed. That we did not succeed on the 27th does not worry me.

I hope you are following carefully what I am writing for the \textit{Harijan}. It is my weekly letter to you as much as it is to other co-workers. You will read what I have said about temples.

\textit{March 2, 1933}

\textsc{My dear Ghanshyamdas,}

I have received from Mr. M. I. David Rs. 2,500. So far as I know, it is the first answer to the appeal on behalf of his scheme. Mr. David wants to remain anonymous. I am sending the money to you by registered and insured packet. For the present you will please retain the money on account of the David Scheme. It would be better to put it so as to bear interest at once. We won’t need to use it all at once and I expect to get his own letter which he has promised.

I think that we ought to be able to announce a few scholarships. You blessed the scheme, the Bombay board blessed the scheme and if it ends with a solitary subscriber, and that also the creator himself, it would be a miniature disaster. Do, therefore, induce Lala Shreeram and others at least to give these paltry sums and let me announce some

I hope Viyogi Hari and Amritlal Thakkar have shown you what I had to say about the Hindi Harijan. It needs very considerable improvement. You were to have given some personal attention to it. Do please give it.

I hope you are keeping good health. Is the nose causing trouble? Whether it is or not, it should receive early attention.

580. A LETTER

March 2, 1933

You seem to have cultivated a spirit of service beyond my expectation. I, therefore, have no fear now. May you always remain what you are. It is no ordinary responsibility which you are undertaking. In your hands lies Dada’s honour and, if I may say so, of Hinduism, too, in large measure. If you shine in the life which you have adopted, even your detractors will be converted and become your admirers.

Don’t feel unhappy at my absence. Though my body will be here, my soul will be with you and watch you both and protect you.

581. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS

_March 2, 1933_

Gandhiji stated in reply to a question that, if the necessary permission was given, he would, after duly examining the terms of the permission, quite willingly make a declaration of his policy on political questions. But just now he was not thinking about it at all. Politics was excluded from his thoughts. He was deliberately practising and doing this for two reasons, firstly, that he might not be burdened with its weight when he had another subject in hand to which he had been permitted to devote attention, and secondly nothing might escape his lips, even inadvertently, which would be tantamount to a breach of faith with the Government. He was now so constituted that he could not discuss politics. He added:

_It is a wonderful gift God has given me._

Did it mean he was not interesting himself in contemporary political events? Gandhiji replied:

_Oh yes, but only as a foreigner would. I note them in passing, but I bestow little thought on them. Of course, if the ban is lifted, and I am permitted to speak, I can, without any difficulty, speak on questions of policy and fundamental principles._

He added that those agents in his brain who were now on leave would then begin to work.

Asked if in his own opinion, the Harijan movement had not diverted attention from civil disobedience, Gandhiji replied:

_Surely, it is a matter which everyone can decide for himself, because, all the materials are before him. One might as well ask me what is the height of the Himalayas when both he and I are seeing it. One will say it is 23,000 feet, another 25,000._

Asked as to what was his estimate of the height, Gandhiji replied at once.

589. ‘NO INFRINGEMENT’

The following important opinion¹, on the question of temple-entry, of Sjt. T. R. Venkatarama Sastri, ex-Law Member of the Madras Government, is taken from the daily Press.

SJT. KELKAR’S COMPROMISE

Sjt. N. C. Kelkar was good enough to pay me a visit at my request to discuss the question of temple-entry. I was anxious to know what he thought of the proposed legislation. He said that he had for years held that there was no way out of legislation in matters, even affecting religion, where a law alone could set them right, as in the case of temple-entry. Judge-made law had ordained that trustees of public Hindu temples were bound to prevent Harijans from entering them. No amount of public opinion could undo that law. It could demand the passage of a law but could not make the law permitting temple-entry.

Whilst, therefore, Sjt. Kelkar agreed that measures like Sjt. Ranga Iyer’s were necessary, he said that actual temple-entry would only be effected by amicable settlement. He had no doubt that Harijans should enter temples on precisely the same terms as caste Hindus. But public opinion might not be ripe for the former’s admission to the sanctuaries. If so, the caste Hindus should forgo the rights which Harijans could not have. He, therefore, suggested that in all the public temples there should be a common barrier set up, beyond which nobody but the priest actually in charge of the ceremonial could go. This would mean that, in some temples where now caste Hindus are able to enter the sanctuary and touch the idol, they would have to deny themselves that right, if they were not prepared to let Harijans enjoy it equally with them. I said I should have no objection whatsoever to such a compromise, provided, of course, that it was honestly carried out in practice. Nothing would please me better than to see this unseemly domestic wrangle close at the earliest moment.

590. A WAIL FROM KUMAON

A Harijan correspondent from Haldvani writes complaining that nothing is being done by caste Hindus on their behalf in his district. This complaint is a sign that the message of the September resolutions has reached the Harijan masses and that, therefore, they are expecting great things. Provincial Boards of the Servants of Untouchables Society will have to organize their work so as to penetrate the remotest village and let the Harijans know that every attempt is being made to fight the monster of untouchability.

Harijan, 4-3-1933
591. JOINT OR SEPARATE?

Correspondents suggest that there should be separate temples, schools, wells, etc., for Harijans for the time being. A general adoption of the suggestion may easily be the way to perpetuate untouchability, and we might as well have had separate electorates and elections for them, if we are to have everything else separate for them. I would certainly not have staked my life just to avoid separate electorates. I staked it, and it is still at stake, for the purpose of eradicating the present unnatural untouchability from the religion itself. I rose against separate electorates, because it would have spelt an end to the effort for the destruction of the canker. They would have meant an end to effective penance by the penitent caste Hindu. With the Yeravda Pact, such penance is a possibility, whether the penitents are in the majority or the minority. That there is a mighty upheaval in Hinduism and that we have two well-defined divisions working actively for their respective objectives is the surest justification for the Yeravda Pact. As a result of it, the religious untouchability goes or the reformer. If he is to be true to his pledge, the reformer has no other choice.

Therefore, separate temples and separate other services must be regarded with suspicion. Let us consider the limitations of the suggestion.

Till the legal obstacle in the way of opening public temples to untouchables is removed, the opening of existing temples on a large scale comes to a standstill. But the march of reform cannot be stayed. There are three ways of doing the thing.

(a) Where public opinion and trustees are quite demonstrably in favour of opening temples, trustees may open the temples under their charge and may take the risk of an injunction being issued against them.

(b) Private temples should be opened where the owners are willing to open them.

(c) Wealthy and spiritually minded people may open new temples under pure methods of consecration. (I add the adjective advisedly because I believe that all is not well with the existing temples.) These temples will be purposely designed for the Harijans as well-as for the other Hindus. These must, therefore, be situated in such localities as are easily accessible to Harijans.

Common schools and wells should be opened where the existing ones are not available for Harijans either owing to the violent and successful opposition of the neighbours or some other unavoidable cause. Harijans cannot be left uncared for in matters of necessary services till public opinion has ripened. If there is a clearly awakened body of Hindus who have the same feeling towards Harijans as if they were their own kith and kin, they will not wait for public opinion to consolidate itself before taking action. They will do their best to supply pure water and good education to their own newly found kith and kin.

There is one special consideration in favour of opening what may be called preparatory schools for Harijan children. I cannot do better than quote the reason in the words of a co-worker who has gone to live in their midst and who writes:

> My school is conducted in a Harijan verandah. Some of my scholars are . . . full of dirt. . . . My lesson, therefore, begins with telling them how to keep clean, and behave. . . . They are bad liars. Some of them are industrious and wise. I play with them and perhaps learn more than I teach. . . . I begin my class in the early morning. I sleep in a Harijan dharmasala about a furlong from the school. . . . I naturally sometimes enter their homes when they do not mind. Many of them are dark holes with inmates packed like matches. . . . But I am a novice. I know my limitations. . . . I long to fulfil God’s conditions for becoming a true Vaishnav.

This is but a sample of the condition of raw Harijan children. We want every one of these children to learn to live in a clean and decent manner. We want them all to attend the common public schools. Therefore, preparatory schools for them are an absolute essential if we mean honest business.

_Harijan_, 4-3-1933

592. CONFUSING THE ISSUE

The Secretary of the Jat-Pat Torak Mandal, i. e., Society for the Abolition of Caste, has published in the daily Press his letter to me of the 18th ultimo.

He does me the honour of calling me a ‘deep thinker’ and in the same breath withdraws it by saying:

> You have failed to see that the caste system is the origin of 1 Only extracts are reproduced here untouchability and that one cannot do without the other.

I venture to suggest to the Secretary that, if he is really honest in his paying me the compliment, he must suspend his judgement about the caste system and follow out the reasoning of the ‘deep thinker’ of his imagination; whereas if he has called me a ‘deep thinker’ in order to increase the height from which I have fallen, I fear that no reasoning of mine will affect him.

However, according to my wont, I propose to give the Secretary credit for honesty and shall, therefore, strive with him. I am one of those who think that the caste system, in so far as it is the English equivalent for varnashrama, is nothing but a division of labour or duty. Anyone who will take the trouble of looking at any religious book must find this out for himself. In that sense the divisions or classes are four and no more, and these classes are known all the world over. One is the repository of knowledge, the other is that of power, the third is that of wealth and the fourth is that of service. All these four labours are regarded as duties to be discharged by every one of them for the protection and advancement of dharma, and everyone who performs his duty to the best of his knowledge and ability gains equal merit with the rest, if the latter, too, do likewise. The merit, therefore, consists not in being one or the other, but in the performance of the duty assigned to it. Here, there is no untouchability. There is no superiority. And this is the essence of varnadharma. It may be non-existent today and it is so. That, however, in no way diminishes the force of my argument that there is no superiority and inferiority in the original conception of varnadharm and that untouchability can never be a necessary outcome of this pure division of duties. If this varnashrama cannot be revived in its original simplicity and purity, persons like me would consider it to be a calamity. Others may welcome it, but let varnadharma and untouchability stand or fall on their own merits or demerits. Confusing the two can only add to the difficulty of removal of untouchability, which all reformers and even many sanatanists desire. The caste-abolitionists must, therefore, hold their souls in patience and join the battle against the common and admitted evil of untouchability.

Varnashrama, as I interpret it, satisfies the religious, social and economic needs of a community. It satisfies the religious needs, because a whole community, accepting the law, is free to devote ample time to spiritual perfection. Observance of the law obviates social evils and entirely prevents the killing economic competition. And if it is regarded as a law laying down, not the rights or the privileges of the community governed by it, but their duties, it ensures the fairest possible distribution of wealth though it may not be an ideal, i.e., strictly equal, distribution. Therefore, when people in disregard of the law mistake duties for privileges and try to pick and choose occupations for self-advancement, it leads to confusion of varna and ultimate disruption of society. In this law, there is no question of compelling any person to follow the parental occupation against his or her aptitude; that is to say, there can be no compulsion from without as there was none for, perhaps, several thousand years, during which the law of varnashrama worked without interruption. By training, the people had recognized the duty and the justice of the law, and they voluntarily lived under it. Today, nations are living in ignorance and breach of that law and they are suffering for it. The so-called civilized nations have by no means reached a state which they can at all regard with equanimity and satisfaction.

It is easy enough to see that this conception of varnashrama has nothing to do with restrictions as to inter-dining and intermarriage. The Vedas and the Mahabharata are filled with illustrations both of inter-dining and intermarriage. But these are matters of choice, not a matter of religious regulation. No one can be compelled or required to dine with any other or contract marital relations. No doubt social habits will grow up and regulate these things more or less rigidly. But it would be wrong to dignify them by the name of religious observances. Therefore, inter-dining and intermarriage can form no part of the campaign against untouchability. In so far as they are a matter for reform, they must be treated, in my opinion, as an absolutely separate subject, unconnected either with untouchability or even with varnashrama reform. So far as the multiplicity of castes apart from varnadharma are concerned, they are essentially trade guilds or societies, with intermarriage and inter-dining restrictions of a more or less rigid character superimposed upon them. Castes are as numerous as the leaves of the famous banana tree whose every branch becomes a trunk for shooting out more branches. They are undergoing a perpetual transformation. Many have disappeared and new ones are appearing. Surely they have nothing to do with varnashrama; nor have they anything to do with religion. That today they are regarded by sanatanists as an integral part of Hinduism arises, in my opinion, from an utter ignorance of the working of these trade guilds. There are undoubtedly many undesirable practices that have crept into these corporations, but that is only because Hinduism as a religion has ceased to be a living, vitalizing force. We are today living upon capital which is itself being fast exhausted.

It is a matter of great pleasure for me to be able to announce, so far as I am aware, the very first subscription of Rs. 2,500 to the David Scheme for the higher education of Harijans.

As the reader may remember, this amount covers five years’ name of the donor¹, as he desires to remain anonymous. I hope that this announcement will result in inducing others to send in their

Rao Bahadur M. C. Rajah, M. L. A., has sent me a copy of his Bill, ‘Further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898’.²

This measure is not likely to give much relief to the Harijans from the disabilities they are suffering from. But I should welcome its passage as a nail driven in the coffin of a custom which I regard as wholly evil.

_Harijan, 4-3-1933_

“untouchables” on the ground that persons belonging to the “higher castes” might create disturbances.
595. HINDI "HARIJAN"

The Hindi edition of Harijan is at last out. The first issue was published on the 23rd ultimo. It is the same size as the English edition and has no paid advertisements. The annual subscription is Rs. 3-8-0, a single copy is one anna. It contains among other things articles by Swami Satyadeva and Sheth Ghanshyamdas Birla and me, a brief poem by the well-known Hindi poet and author, Shri Maithilisharam Gupta. There is naturally something from the pen of the Editor, who is Sjt. Viyogi Hari, well known to the Hindi literary world. For years, service of the Harijans has been a passion with Sjt. Viyogi Hari. He was for some time himself editing and publishing a journal specially devoted to the removal of untouchability. There are, too, the usual news columns. The news service leaves much to be desired. But no doubt, in this and every other respect, every succeeding number will be better than its predecessor till the desired standard is reached. The habitation of the paper is Birla Mills, Delhi, the address of the Servants of Untouchables Society, under whose auspices the paper is being published. I may inform the reader that the Bengali edition was expected to make its appearance on the 28th ultimo with Sjt. Satis Das Gupta of the Khadi Pratishthan as Editor. Satisbabu says in his letter to me that, in order to overtake the last issues of the English edition of the Harijan, his first two numbers would be double numbers. Arrangements are in progress for bringing out the Gujarati Harijan.

Harijan, 4-3-1933

596. A MAHARASHTRA SAINT’S TESTIMONY

Sjt. R. D. Paradkar,. Editor and Publisher, Moropant’s Works, writes:2

You have pointed out¹ that the use of the word ‘Harijan’ to denote the untouchable class in the present movement inaugurated in their behalf has by no means been novel and that the word had thus been used previously by a Gujarati poet. I have taken up the pen just to let you know, as the news is likely to give you particular pleasure, that the very word has been used in the same sense by Moropant, the celebrated Maharashtrian poet. The stanza¹ in question is as follows. ...

¹ Vide “Letter to Viyogi Hari”, 25-2-1933
² Only an extract is reproduced here.
³ Vide “Why ‘Harijan,’”, 23-2-1933

Similar testimony is to be found in the writings not only of the other saints of Maharashtra but also the saints of the whole of India. If industrious scholars will collect such sayings of the saints from different parts of the country, I shall gladly hand them to the Editor for publication in the Harijan, and they will be a help and an inspiration to the workers in the cause of the abolition of untouchability.

Harijan, 4-3-1933

597. AS THEY SEE US

Hardly has the great central organization of the Servants of Untouchables Society made the commencement, when complaints against it and the provincial organizations have cropped up. They come chiefly and naturally from Harijans. One of these correspondents sent to me some time ago an able letter, undertaking to give details if I desired. I took him at his word and asked him to give me details; and the letter he has sent me in reply is abler than the first. It will compete with any well-written report of an inspector. It contains a summary of reports of every organization claiming to work in the writer’s Province for the uplift of Harijans, and after giving me sufficient details, his one conclusion about all the organizations practically without exception is:

They are run principally by caste men who have their own axes to grind or who are in need of some occupation that would maintain them decently. The utmost that some of these have done is to fling a few scholarships at Harijan boys. Some others have been great at delivering lectures. All have come to us as patrons. Hardly has anyone come as a friend and equal, let alone as a servant. Your provincial organization is no exception. It is difficult for a Harijan to approach its chief man without fear and trembling. He is always in danger of being met with a frown.

My correspondent is also not without suggestions, which may be ¹Which is translated as follows: “In your superior wisdom you give Harijans names like Mahar, Yawan, Kunbi. It is the fruit of the tree that reveals the property concealed in the seed (i.e., actions reveal the man).”

summarized thus:

If you are to take advantage of the great awakening that has taken place, you must concentrate upon primary education on a mass scale. You will not drive out the ignorance of ages without spreading that education. We shall certainly help, but seeing that caste Hindus want to remove untouchability and make us one with them, there is no better way of employing their money and their labour than in imparting this education.

It is necessary to know the Harijan mind in any programme of work that may be taken up. Caste Hindus, for whom removal of untouchability is a matter of penance and purification, have undoubtedly to do much more than open schools everywhere. I have discussed elsewhere\(^1\) where such schools may be opened. The conduct of caste Hindus would be generally tested by its reaction upon the mass mind of the Harijans. If we have really changed towards them, they will feel the change in a thousand ways. Our activity, I mean that of caste Hindus, will affect every department of their lives. Even in the remotest village we are interdependent, so much so that this interdependence cannot be dissolved all at once, even if we desired it, without resulting in the greatest harm to the nation in general; and this interdependence, which is today that of slave and master, will never be corrected unless there is absolute religious equality. It is a tremendous task, but as we progress towards the goal, the truth must dawn upon every caste Hindu that there is no half-way house between abject slavery and perfect religious equality. Hence my humble insistence upon temple-entry without losing sight of the other things we must do.

My correspondent is bitter in discussing what he considers to be the extravagant management of the different organizations that have come under his lash. As an expert organizer that I may claim to be, I have been generally guided by the rule that the cost of administration, that is, overhead charges, should never exceed 10% of the receipts—5% being the ideal—the balance going to the cause which brought the organization into being. I suggest this test to the Central Board and the Provincial Boards and all other independent Harijan organizations run by caste Hindus. Let it not be said of us that we spend more on running the organizations than upon Harijans themselves. Let us see to it that, out of every Rs. 100 received as donation for the Harijan cause Rs. 90 go straight into the pockets of Harijans. Therefore, our officials should be largely volunteers, never highly paid wherever paid service is required. Wherever it is possible, we should get Harijans. We should select candidates and train them. The correspondent says that peons in the organizations inspected by him are not drawn from the Harijan ranks.

Let every organization for the service of Harijans introspect itself in the light of the criticism I have condensed and the suggestions I have made. I know that the correspondent has painted the picture as black as he could. He has refused to see the bright side. I know something of Harijan service done by caste men in the different Provinces. I know that there is a bright side to the work of the organizations referred to by my correspondent, but it was unnecessary for me to give the bright side. It will take care of itself, if the organizations will take care of the dark side of the picture. Most organizations have a capacity for self-deception. There is a tendency towards self-glorification. The Harijan exists for the sake of giving due prominence, therefore, to every bit of criticism that can be levelled against us by Harijan critics.

Harijan, 4-3-1933

598. IS IT LOSS OF FAITH?

A co-worker writes:

Some of us feel that your ‘fasting unto death’ may mean a conscious or unconscious loss of faith in the efficacy of non-violence. Can you enlighten us, who have derived our faith in non-violence from you?

It is a flattering thought that some people have derived their faith in non-violence from me. But I would warn them that I may prove a broken reed at a critical juncture, if they have not assimilated the spirit of non-violence and if it has not become an integral part of their life. Faith in a man is a perishable quantity, for it vanishes like smoke when their idol does not come up to their expectations; but what gives us hope and courage in the nick of time is an undying faith in a cause or a principle, irrespective of persons from whom it is derived.

Having uttered this warning, let me say that my ‘fast unto death, was not due to loss of faith in non-violence, but it was, as I have already said on more than one occasion, the last seal upon that faith. Sacrifice of self even unto death is the final weapon in the hands of a non-violent person. It is not given to man to do more. I, therefore, suggest to this co-worker and all the others that in this religious battle against untouchability they must be prepared joyously even to ‘fast unto death, if such an urgent call comes to them. If they feel that they are party to the September pledge¹ given unsolicited to the Harijans and if they cannot make good the pledge in spite of ordinary effort, how else, being non-violent, will they propose to deliver the goods except by laying down their lives?

The Shastras tell us that, when people in distress prayed to God for relief and He seemed to have hardened His heart, they declared a ‘fast unto death’ till God had listened to their prayer. Religious history tells us of those who survived their fast, because God listened to them but it tells us nothing of those who silently and heroically perished in the attempt to win the answer from a deaf God. I am certain that many have died in that heroic manner, but without their faith in God and non-violence being in the slightest degree diminished. God does not always answer prayers in the manner we want Him to. For Him life and death are one, and who is able to deny that all that is pure and good in the world persists because of the silent death of thousands of unknown heroes and heroines!

599. THE BOGEY OF BOYCOTT

This is the substance of what a correspondent² writes in the course of a long letter:

Some of us caste men tried and succeeded in having certain wells in some of the Bihar villages opened to the use of Harijans. But the Brahmin _pujaris_ nearby retorted by stopping the service in the village temple, and the local Brahmans threatened to stop all religious services at _shraddha_³, marriage and the like. This frightened the simple villagers. I feel tempted to offer _satyagraha_, but I desist lest I might do so in anger. What would you advise in such cases?

² Janakdhari Prasad; _vide_ “Letter to Janakdhari Prasad”, 4-3-1933
³ The Hindu ceremony of oblation for the spirit of deceased ancestors
Not long ago there was a similar case near Trichinopoly. Dr. Rajan acted with decision. Himself a Brahmin by caste and Shudra by right of service, he defied the orthodox Brahmins who had refused even to perform the funeral rights in the case of death in a reformer’s family.

My advice, therefore, is that there is no occasion in such cases for satyagraha. Those who regard untouchability as a sin must be prepared to suffer all the hardships of boycott and the like as a part of the process of purification and penance. In all humility they must learn to dispense with the outward form. Anything done in the name of God and for His sake needs no support from an officiating priest, whether it is a death or a marriage or a shraddha. Anybody can unite a couple in marriage by reciting the sacred mantras, whether it is Ramanama of any of the known formulae according to the tradition in which one has been brought up. God is known not by His thousand names only but by millions of names. Any name which comes from the heart and by which we can recognize Him is as good as any other or, rather, the best of all for us. But these things can only be done by those who have the courage of their conviction, faith in themselves, faith in their cause and faith in a living God. This is not a movement in which faint-heartedness can be of any use. Only workers with stout hearts and irreproachable character will be able to infect the villagers with their own strong convictions and enable them to do the right thing in the face of boycott or worse persecution.

600. LETTER TO MIRABEN

March 4, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

This is Saturday before prayer time 3.30 a.m. No letter from you till Friday evening. I put off even yesterday in the hope of getting your letter in the afternoon and still posting you something yesterday but that was not to be. So each week your letter is getting later in coming. But though I look forward to it I do not worry.

The letter-writing is not a right of prisoners. Therefore there is no deprivation. What in ordinary life religion calls duty becomes or seems to be compulsion in the prison life. But that is not the case with us. We are in a way voluntary prisoners. Therefore we may not feel the compulsion as such when a certain permission is withdrawn or is regulated in the manner suited to the authorities. I can do without your letters if need be and you must train yourself to do likewise and feel happy\(^1\). In a manner everybody trains himself to do without things when he cannot get them. A follower of the Gita dharma trains himself to do without things with happiness\(^2\) called equanimity in Gita language, for happiness of the Gita is not the opposite of unhappiness. It is superior to that state. The devotee of the Gita is neither happy nor unhappy. And when that state is reached, there is no pain, no pleasure, no victory, no defeat, no deprivation, no possession. Prison life is a life of privilege if we learn to practise the Gita teaching. It is easier in the prison than outside. For outside we have the opportunity of picking and choosing. Hence we are not always able to test ourselves. In the prison, there are various jarring occasions. Are we able to bear them with equanimity? If we are, it is well with us.

I have kept your letter of 19th February which I got after I had written my weekly letter. You had Mridula in your party. I hope she is quite well. She was not quite strong and healthy. Ba should look after her jaws. Does she wear her teeth? Does she take enough exercise? Does she do any reading herself? Does she get weekly letters or fortnightly? I know last time she did not get several of my letters. I do not know what happened to them. This time I am anxious that she should get my letters. So far as I am aware prison authorities had not withheld her letters.

I do propose to write to Dr. Saunders\(^3\) about your history. But whatever the history, there is only one treatment which I have mentioned to you. There need be therefore no waiting for his report. It would be interesting to know what he has to say. Sunlight, simple food in which vitamins have not been destroyed and exercise in the open air will dissolve all glands and other affections.

Verrier has cried off the proposed marriage with Mary Gillett. But his communications are not happy. He is showing a very vulnerable spot in his character. But it is well to know our friends as

601. LETTER TO JANAKDHARI PRASAD

March 4, 1933

DEAR JANAKDHARI BABOO,

You were quite right in sending me your long letter. You will see that one portion of your letter I have dealt with in the columns of the Harijan.¹ I have purposely refrained from using your name. You will have to lead the way by defying the priesthood yourself, and you will find, as I have found elsewhere, that the boycotting priests will immediately quiet down and want to perform the ceremonies, for they would not want to lose the income that they get from the performance of these ceremonies. They proclaim the boycott today, because they think that thereby they will be able to get more money from frightened people, and you will find too that you will presently get reformers who will gladly officiate at these functions. That was what Dr. Rajan was able to do.

Do please continue to write to me whenever you feel you have something to say to me.

As for your personal struggle, no prayashchitta is necessary except that you should resolutely live apart from your wife, and you will soon find you will be quite all right. You must develop the will to enforce this resolution.

The other thing you ask is much more difficult. You attain to ‘param’ i.e., truth, by constantly practising it. The saying that a man becomes what he thinks is a scientific truth. Here thinking does not mean the mental vapours. It means perfect accord between thought, speech and deed, and when there is that completely, you are within sight of Truth. I wonder if it is clear to you.

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter. Of course I would gladly discuss the problem of untouchability with Pandit Krishnamacharya if he could possibly visit Yeravda.

The difference between Malaviyaji and myself is as you properly say unfortunate, but since the difference was there it is as well that it has come out. It promotes healthy public opinion.

603. LETTER TO BOYD TUCKER

March 4, 1933

MY DEAR BOYD1.

I have your long and good letter but none too long to mar my pleasure. You were quite right in writing the letter. The best appreciation I could show was to publish the relevant parts of it and to offer my own criticism. I had prepared the article2 for this week’s issue of the Harijan, but it had to stand aside for matters more urgent. I hope however it will go in next week. I shall then send you a proof copy and as I have said there all I had to in connection with your letter I will not repeat the argument just now. The reference to Gurudev I have not given in the Harijan. I know he has been specially tender towards me of late. Perhaps Truth suffers through his reticence if he has absolutely strong and confirmed views on the question as your letter would suggest he has. I should hold it to be a great tragedy if through the tenderness of friends, untruth had crept into my life or had passed current among the people. If what I hold is truth, it must stand the light of fiercest criticism even of friends who have hitherto worked with me. I have no end to serve but that of Truth. If my defeat means victory of Truth, I would count that defeat itself as victory. I do not regard my judgements as infallible and even though I may be right in 99 cases out of 100, I do not want to trade upon it and assume or expect other people to assume that the 100th judgement is also right. I have for that reason called Gurudev the great sentinel, and I have always appreciated his warnings even when I have not been able to depart from my course by reason of his warnings. They have put me on my mettle and made the . people think and choose. It is not good for individuals or nations to be under the hypnotic influence of any single person. It is a golden cover that hides the face of Truth. You may, if you like, read this to Gurudev, and if he is clear in his mind, after reading the article that you will see in a few days, that he has no doubt in his mind that I am in error, let him issue his warning by way either of a public statement or a letter addressed to me for publication. But if he has any doubt I want the benefit of that doubt because I do not want the people to be confused. As it is, on this temple-entry question I do not hold the field undisputed. They have all kinds of arguments put before them for examination. I do not want Gurudev’s to be one of this crowd of arguments against the simple issue. His must be an overpowering deliverance standing by itself in its strength and originality.

1 An American correspondent who was at Santiniketan at that time

I am personally not quite sure that Gurudev agrees with you in your attitude, for Santiniketan has its own temple or church or mandir, whatever you like to call it. Where two or three people gather together in a particular place in the name of God to offer worship, it becomes a temple. In Santiniketan we have a humble but beautiful building where prayers are offered, incenses burnt and sermons given. In Sabarmati we have no building, no walls, but the cardinal points are the walls, the sky is the roof and mother earth is the floor; nevertheless, the spot that has been selected for the morning and the evening prayers has all the essentials of a temple. But in accordance with your letter even that bare ground is a prostitution of religion. Surely, Gurudev will not agree with you in this attitude if I have understood it correctly.

With love from us,

Yours sincerely,

604. LETTER TO N. V. THADANI

March 4, 1933

MY DEAR THADANI,

Though I cannot immediately promote you to the rank of a privileged jester, your letter just enables you to be admitted as a candidate for that coveted service. You have therefore every reason to persevere. You have no reason to fear publicity. When you have actually been admitted to that high order, whether you fear or covet publicity, it will be there.

You had only one English educated Indian seriously to tell you that untouchability has been from the beginning of time. I discover these celebrities practically every day, and, if I was not a child of the Mother Gita all the fears that Sastri entertained would have been long ago realized in spite of the presence of a privileged jester. But thank God, the Gita is a never failing mother, and what is more, she is immortal.

605. LETTER TO MELISCENT SHEPHARD

March 4, 1933

MY DEAR SISTER,

I am glad you are back to your work. I did not know that you had come.

Yes, Benarsidas is one of the good men we have. I know him very well indeed.

Your appeal I appreciate though it is superfluous. For I began this work after my own fashion when I was 15 years old and, finding myself in the house of a prostitute\(^1\) I discovered suddenly that God had deprived me at that time, to my shame as I then thought and later as I discovered to my great pleasure and the glory of God, of the animal instinct. I knew then how man was misbehaving towards woman, and since then I have never allowed a single opportunity to pass by without making an effort to eradicate the evil. I have written strongly against it, spoken against it still more strongly. My private correspondence is filled with the same thing. At the present moment my activities in that direction must be necessarily circumscribed. But within that limit you may depend upon my doing all I can to deal with the evil. In the Harijan I won’t be able to handle the problem directly.
The reason for it is obvious.

You have no need to apologize for being a foreigner doing this service. When people realize that you have no other motive, but the simple motive of serving these fallen sisters of India and through their service also serving the fallen men of India, they will forget that you are a foreigner. Those who have other ends to serve under the guise of humanitarian service will always be treated as foreigners, whether they wear the white skin or the brown skin.

609. WHAT SHOULD HARIJANS DO?

Q. (1) What should be done to unite the several sub-castes among Harijans into one?

(2) In large cities where there is sewerage the Harijan brothers are being deprived of their livelihood. What should they do under these circumstances?

(3) In certain towns at the time of marriages and the like Harijans are not allowed to ride a horse. You have written about the duty of caste Hindus. But please write and say what the Harijans should do under such circumstances.

A. The above three questions have been sent by a Harijan brother. All the three are difficult questions. As long as there are several sub-castes among caste Hindus it is very difficult to abolish the different sub-castes among Harijans. But this much is true that if there is a great awakening among Harijans then they can march ahead by leaps and bounds, at once. I should like to see a time when Harijans will be actually far ahead of the caste Hindus. But the question here is about the present condition.

In the present circumstances, it can only be said that castes considered higher among the Harijans should attempt to mix with castes deemed lower. For example, the Mahar caste should mix with the Mang caste; they should begin to eat together and intermarry. The Mahars who mix in this way with the Mangs should be fearless and face whatever difficulties they might encounter.

The second question is common to all. In this age of transition many occupations will vanish and new ones will crop up. It has always been so. The question of sewerage can never arise in villages. Only towns can have sewerage. Scavengers are found in towns. I imagine that where there is sewerage, some scavengers must lose their jobs. It is the duty of the municipality to provide work for such unemployed scavengers. My advice is that weaving or some such occupation should be learnt by the scavengers. In Gujarat I noticed that scavengers who lost their jobs took to weaving. There is no common remedy for all in this matter. It varies with the individual.

The third question is very difficult. It is implied in the question itself that Harijans are entirely helpless and frightened. Under these circumstances, it can only be said that they should go to the police for help. Dr. Ambedkar told me that since the police belong to higher castes, they do not assist and this is quite possibly true. Therefore, it can only be said that where there is police indifference or opposition and where no help is offered by the caste Hindus and where the Harijans are not sufficiently strong, it is best to have patience. The only consolation is that there are occasions in the life of every person and every community when there is no other course open except to keep patience. Were it not so, man would become an atheist, and forget God. Therefore, if the Harijans can see no non-violent way out of a difficulty, then they had better pray to God for help.

2ibid

610. LETTER TO BHAGWANDAS

_March 5, 1933_

MY DEAR BABOOGII,

I have your letter of 28th ultimo. If you need more for the _Aaj_\(^1\) Supplement, you will please ask Sjt. Ghanshyamdas. He told me that he was writing to you to that effect. I have received 20 copies of Kokje Shastri’s opinion, for which many thanks. I am now having a weekly bulletin about Shivaprasad’s health from Calcutta. Let’s hope that the prayers of the many for his recovery will be answered.

Differences of opinion with Malaviyaji are sometimes inevitable. But I have regarded them always as blessings in disguise. One can have differences with him without the slightest bitterness, and as they are always honest they serve to educate public opinion.

612. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR

March 5, 1933

CHI. MARY.

Received your letter.¹

Your letters are never fault-finding. You need not therefore be afraid of writing as you feel, without any polish. I want you to think aloud. Polishing is often a concealment of thought. If it is relevant thought, the concealment amounts to an untruth. In ordinary life our speech is rarely 100 per cent truthful. If you will go through the translation of all the verses we sing for the morning prayer you will perhaps find what you are craving for. Only remember that Mother Earth, Mother Saraswati, etc., are all manifestations of God, even as Father God is a manifestation. No one has described the whole of Him.

The test of your yarn is not at all bad.

The coolness of a room is never the same as the coolness right under the sky. In London, I slept with the door and the window open but had the roof for fear of the rain coming down any moment. But you must not try, so long as you have any fear.

I wonder if I answered your question [as to] when I began spinning. I began it in 1919, i.e., when I was 50. I know people who began after 60. You have therefore no cause whatever for despair. And if it will give you comfort, know that I was a dunce.

Love.

Vol. 59 : 13 January, 1933 - 9 March, 1933 445
DEAR SATISBABU,

I have your letter, and I have also two copies of the Bengali Harijan. I wish my knowledge of Bengali was such as to enable me to read what you have been writing. Sjt. Ghanshyamdas has heard me say that I am studying Bengali. Unfortunately, that is untrue. What I told him was that I was studying Urdu and that if I had the time I had a great longing for studying Bengali and reviving my knowledge of Tamil. A study of Bengali, as you know, is an old dream. It was about to materialize in 1914, but I had to abruptly leave London for India and the lessons which Mrinalini Devi was giving to me had to be suspended. Therefore when Mahadev has read the paper I will send you what he has to say. The cover is certainly attractive. You will let me know what reception it has had from the public. As for the articles to be sent in advance, there are tremendous difficulties, but I shall see what can be done.

I understand your position about vaccination. Your faith will sustain you.

You will see how the report that you sent about the Bengali work was interwoven by Shastri into the “Week to Week” columns.1 Have you noticed the ‘comedy of errors, that happened in connection with the information that Hemprabha had given me about Aroon’s father’s death? When I read her letter, I could not believe my eyes. There was nothing wrong with you. You were Aroon’s [sic] father and yet the expression ‘Aroon’s father, was there right enough. I read or showed it to the 9 Sardar, Mahadev and Chhaganlal, and we all came to the conclusion that it must be another Aroon whose father was dead, because later from the language used by Hemprabha it was clear that you were to have seen Aroon’s father before he died, but you and she were too late. I had a vague recollection of Hemprabha having adopted a boy or girl, so I connected Aroon with this adoption, and yet there were not two Aroons to my knowledge. Therefore my letter2 to Hemprabha baldly referred to a strange Aroon’s father. Your letter cleared the mystery. And now comes Aroon’s postcard, but of course your letter itself was quite clear that it was your father who had died. If I had remembered, as I should have remembered, that your father was still alive, I would at once have known that Hemprabha meant grandfather instead of father. But at the time I read Hemprabha’s letter I had forgotten altogether that your father was still alive. It was only your letter which revived the recollection.

1 Of Harijan
2 Vide “Letter Hemprabha Das Gupta”, 25-2-1933

I hope you and Hemprabha, Aroon and everybody who read my letter had a hearty laugh at my expense. But if I had been there when my letter was received, I should have joined that hearty laughter, or perhaps called for a laughter at Hemprabha’s expense. I am not writing separately to Aroon. You will therefore share this portion with him. I see that he is still not quite well. And tell Aroon that I shall write to him when he has written to me the letter he has promised.

618. LETTER TO V. S. R. SASTRI

March 5, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have read your letter of 24th February from beginning to end with greatest attention. Whilst I acknowledge the great pains you have bestowed over the composition and the Sanskrit learning which you exhibit, you will permit me to say that I miss the application of that learning to the reality, and it has been a matter of very deep grief to me that in the contact I am having with so many learned sanatanists, hardly any one of them has touched the fundamental points I have raised. I state them for you.

Of all those who appear as untouchables in the census figures, who are the untouchables by birth? Where is the authority in the Vedas for regarding them as such? And if there is none in the Vedas, call the later Shastras impose disabilities or create classes not contemplated by the Vedas? What is there in the Shastras to justify the numerous disabilities which I have described in the pages of the Harijan and which are suffered by those who are classified as untouchables?
You ask me whether I claim to be a sannyasi. I do not. I claim to be a very ordinary Hindu trying to serve the faith of my ancestors in the best manner I know.

March 5, 1933

DEAR MR. DAVID,

I thank you for your letter. I duly received the notes for Rs. 2,500. You must have seen the announcement in the Harijan.¹ I shall jealously guard your wish that your name should not be published. I shall do what is possible to ensure a proper selection of the first student.

The name² that you give to the Scholarship is an impossible name, but I do not know that any name is at all necessary, and if there must be one, it must have the ancestral name, and that would be ‘The David Scheme Scholarship’.

Whilst I shall try to secure the name of a suitable student, you will not hesitate to let me know if you ever come across a good candidate. I need hardly tell you that in all I do the cooperation of Sardar Vallabhbhai is always there.

Yours sincerely,

You should ask Narandas why you have lost weight. It should not have gone down so much. Get rid of anger and envy. Ask someone there to tell you why the name of the Ashram was changed.

March 5, 1933

CHI. MATHURADAS,

Motibehn\(^1\) is again impatient. You will have to face the test once more. If you are firm, all will be well. Cling to your vow.

Don’t work at the cost of your health. Moti writes that you do not keep well. Continue to write to me.

CHI. JAMNA,

I heard that you have had another attack of asthma. How is it? You did well in writing to Purushottam not to be in a hurry to leave Santa Cruz. He had promised to write to me but till today I have had no letter from him.

You seem to have no regard for truth. You did not write any letter yourself and you demand that I should write to you.

You did well in paying a visit to your home. Now devote yourself completely to work.

Write to me regularly.

BHAISHRI MUNSHI,

I got your postcard. It seems that you are being weighed down by misfortunes. But probably man cannot be tested except through suffering. I had already given a ‘quick doctor’s’ advice to let Jagdish stay where he was if his health had deteriorated very much. Your hand does not seem to have improved yet. Take proper treatment and see that it does.

627. LETTER TO GANGABEHN VAIDYA

March 5, 1933

CHI. GANGABEHN,

I am glad that you are released. You did not get the second letter which I wrote to you, but I think they must have given it to you at the time you were released. Write to me about your experiences in jail this time. You have done right in accompanying Lakshmi. Write to me about your experience in the Ashram together with your experience in jail. And also tell me how your health was while in jail.

What did you read, and what did you think about? And what work did you do? the women prisoners here are quite well. The Jail Superintendent often tells me in joke that, when you were here, all the other women prisoners wanted medicines from you, but now nobody asks for any medicine. I replied to him, of course. But you also may send your reply, if you wish.

CHI. BUDHABHAI,

Parvati has made a serious complaint against you. Have we not made an agreement that you will not abuse her nor beat her? To abuse or beat a weak woman ought to be regarded as a terrible form of violence. Wake up, reform your ways, calm down. If a person like you cannot exercise such self-control, who else can we expect to observe ahimsa?

630. LETTER TO ASHRAM BOYS AND GIRLS

March 6, 1933

BOYS AND GIRLS,

I got your letter. It is violence to tear sheets from a notebook and use them for writing letters. Do you understand this? Don’t do it again.

If the secretary or the other office-bearers show themselves unfit or if the members harass them, in either case our progress will be arrested. When you grow up you will behave as you now do. What you do not learn now you will never learn later. I hope you do understand that. Just as mangoes cannot grow on a babul tree, you are not likely to change suddenly after ten years if you cannot work unitedly or behave with self-restraint. You should, therefore, learn to manage your body in a proper manner.

631. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

YERAVDA MANDIR, 1

March 6, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

I am starting on this letter at five sharp (Silence Day). Yours was the last letter I read from the Ashram post.

I have not been able to go beyond 75 counts with the slivers which you sent. Yarn of 75 counts should be regarded as very much below the mark. I have calculated the count on the basis of the figure you give for weight. The scales here are not good enough for weighing with any minute accuracy. I do believe, however, that if my hand was all right I would be able to go up to 100 counts.

What you write to me regarding Sushila is simply incomprehensible to me. I am not aware of having ignored her in the least. She herself made me feel that there was no need to inquire after her or advise her. So I did not ask her any detailed questions. Tell her this. How could I know that like you she also craved for a show of love and for compliments? I ought to have known that your friend would be like you. Isn’t that what you suggest? But probably Sushila herself will not admit this. Isn’t one Prema enough for me? There are other Premas, of course, but they are all different from one another and from you. However, I will be more careful in future.

How old is Vijaya? How does she behave?

Train Lakshmi thoroughly.

I also suspect something from the fact that Durga’s boils cannot still be cured. She used to write to me regularly, but she never writes now. From that, too, I suspect that she is hiding something. Inquire and find out if she is suffering from some other disease.

A diet of raw vegetables and dates is bound to help you to reduce your weight. You should also include in it two and a half ounces of unboiled milk. Among raw vegetables, you may eat tomatoes, radishes, carrots, lettuce, etc. You should exclude salt. You should take two or three lemons with water or with dates. Probably it will be better to take it with water. If, however, it sours your teeth you may not take it. You can also mix soda bicarb with it.

I cannot discuss the question asked by Rajaji and others. That would be violating truth. It can be done when a suitable opportunity arises. My writings, however, contain a reply to every doubt.

I will admit all the shortcomings of the Ashram which you may point out. But you will help me better if you also suggest suitable remedies at the same time. Even if, however, you cannot do that, I must have your criticism. I use my brain as much as I can. I know this: the Ashram’s shortcomings are not its own, but mine. If the potter makes an ill-shaped pot, is that the fault of the pot or of the potter? I literally believe what I have said, and the shortcomings of the Ashram, therefore, are a measure of my ignorance. But notwithstanding its shortcomings, I like the Ashram, for I am not ready to say positively that I do not like myself. I like myself in the measure that I do not feel the sense of “I”, and ceaselessly strive to overcome what still remains of that sense.

632. LETTER TO CHHOTUBHAI PATEL
March 6, 1933

BHAI CHHOTUBHAI,

I got your letter. Indulgence in moderation is less harmful, but brahmacharya is the best. The atman is not a body and can exist without the body, as God does. That which is bodiless can have no need for sex-gratification, and, therefore, one who has awakened from the state of ignorance also can have none. If it is one’s dharma to shed ignorance, sex-gratification is contrary to dharma and, therefore, harmful.

The earth is certainly ever alive, but man who is of earth is not. He must perish.

I cannot say whether at present people are rising or falling. It seems to me to be a futile question.

It is certainly true that we have no strength of our own except what God gives us and we must, therefore, admit it.

He who has real humility has risen far above the man who is proud, for humility is truth and pride is falsehood.

One should not brush the teeth with a babul stick after a meal, but one must clean them with a finger and gargle well.

The future will show what relations you will maintain with the Ashram after your marriage. It is needless to think of it just now.

I cannot say that I immediately recognized you on reading your letter. I cannot say that with regard to anybody.

634. LETTER TO PRABHUDAS GANDHI

YERAVDA MANDIR,
March 6, 1933

CHL PRABHUDAS,

I have your letter. I understand what you say about the girl. I am not likely to be satisfied with any sort of girl for you. Gomati had approved of her. She believed that the girl did not belong to the modh sub-caste. The only point was that if an educated girl is desirable for a match, though rather grown-up, she should be accepted and the objection on the ground of her being a Gujarati or belonging to the Bania caste, should be waived. I have no intention whatever of doing anything without your approval.

You have not said in your letter anything about honey or the school. Do they make honey there? From what do they make it? What is the quality of teaching? Who are the people who are learning?

I hope you have not completely given up your writing work or your study, have you?

I do not want to burden you with any responsibility in Almora. Let the Shail Ashram remain just a dharmashala\(^1\) for the present. We will see later what should be done.

I, too, would welcome keeping the Chandradutta brothers. If they are good men, no harm will be done. It would of course be good if Mahavirprasad accepts them. I think it would not be proper to give a big salary for the care of the Shail Ashram. But in this matter, too, Narandas will know better. If you trust his decision, you will be at peace and so will I.

635. LETTER TO VIYOGI HARI
March 6, 1933

Bhai Viyogi Hari,

Your letter. This issue is better though there is still room for improvement. It is not necessary to take everything from English nor is it necessary to translate in full all that is taken. Some article may deserve full translation, another only a summary, yet another may be rejected; in brief, the Hindi readers should get all that is worth giving. Items published in other journals too should be screened. But sometimes those translations may be faulty. For purity, simplicity and restraint our translation should read like original writing. As for the translated items appearing in newspapers, they need not be included in Hindi Harijan if the translations are accurate. I am arranging to send English articles in advance. Satisbabu wants them and so does Ganesan. I shall see what can be done. Why do you not include articles by Hindi writers? But they should not be mere essays. They should contain either the views or arguments of some sanatanists and answers to them or a discussion of problems faced by the workers or an account of the hardships suffered by Harijans. All the articles, in short, must be written with a view to solving the current and immediate problems. An abstract of the activities in Provinces should be a must every time.

From now on I shall send everything care of The Hindustan Times.

Dear Friend,

I thank you for your letter of the 26th ultimo and now your letter of the 3rd instant. Owing to pressure of work in connection with Harijan I have not been able to acknowledge your first letter earlier.

I have no ground whatsoever to dispute the facts which you seem to remember so well. Have you any recollection of the subscribers to the fund? If you have, and if you can send me their statements also, it completes for me the chain of evidence. My only interest just now is to secure as much money as I can legitimately for Harijan work, and when I was told by Sjt. Joshi that I had control over the money in question I was naturally pleased. You may depend upon it however that if I could by any chance persuade you to let me have a say in the disposal of a purse that was supposed to be presented to me, it won’t be Sjt. Joshi who would have the fund. I could not even write to you this letter if there was the slightest political motive behind my investigation of the fund.

I thank you for reminding me that I had the honour of being your guest at the time of my visit to Sangli and that the alleged presentation was only formal and was made under your roof.

639. LETTER TO RAMACHANDRA

March 7, 1933

MY DEAR RAMACHANDRA,

I thank you for your exhaustive letter of the 4th instant. I had entirely forgotten your stay at the Ashram. Your letter is quite helpful. N. . . left Poona on Saturday, the 4th instant. Your presence is now quite unnecessary. Perhaps by this time I know more about her than you do. She has been much worse than you have described her to be. She has led for years an utterly immoral and extravagant life and has been an utter stranger to truth. She has made that confession to me and has also definitely promised that she would make that confession publicly before the world and she has also promised to turn over a new leaf and lead henceforth a truthful, chaste life, and to that end she would retire from all public activity and live a beggar’s life in Harijan quarters in the poorest possible style, living on charity, unknown to the world. Whether she has the strength to carry out this promise or not I do not know. Let’s hope that she has. She thinks that she has that strength. If she is sincerely desirous of leading this life, you will render her what help you can. You are at liberty to show this letter to her and you will please tell me all about her from time to time. From her talks with me she led me to understand that she had great regard for you, but that regard has very little value because she was leading an altogether false life when she entertained this regard for you. Even here truth had not dawned upon her when she came, but if it has really come to her, it dawned slowly and unperceivably. That of course is all the better. Some of the young men at least who have surrounded her do not seem to have behaved well. But of that perhaps some other time if necessary.

Silence Day, 5.25 [Before March 8, 1933]³

CHI. NARANDAS,

Send Prabhavati the volume of Speeches. She has written to tell me that she had asked for it but has not received it.

Probably you know Parachure Shastri. He has once stayed in the Ashram. He is suffering from leprosy, but the symptoms may be considered to have dried up now. He is in jail and will be released on the 8th. He is a good man, a man of renunciation. He knows Sanskrit, is married, and has three children. The children are foolish. The wife is weak in the brain. She had once been admitted to a lunatic asylum. I think we should keep him. Give him one room. Kaka says he should be given Mirabehn’s room. The wife will of course live in the women’s wing. The children could be kept anywhere. Parachure Shastri will observe the modern hygienic rules for lepers. That is, he will not touch anyone and will keep his clothes separate. It will be necessary to send his meals to his room. Probably he will live on milk and fruit, or on a mixture of fresh milk and neem leaves. He can do a great deal of work sitting in his room. He will teach Sanskrit. He can teach even Marathi there. He will arrive there by the 10th or the 12th. He will presently go to see his wife. I will know from him what he intends to do if his wife is against his

² The first issue of Harijanbandhu came out on March 12, 1933.
³ The letter does not bear the date of writing, but in his letter to addressee dated March 8, 1923, Gandhiji says: “I have replied to Parachure Shastri. Everything will depend on your wire.” Vide “Letter to Narandas Gandhi”, 8-3-1933. Evidently, the wire expected by Gandhiji would be in reply to this letter. Again, in his letter to the addressee dated March 10, 1933, Gandhiji says, “I just received your wire about Parachure Shastri. I had been waiting for it before asking him to go there.” Ibid.
joining the Ashram. He spins a great deal. He has spun quite a lot in the jail. He will spin there, too. He was in fact a teacher in Chinchavad.
I do not think I have any further suggestion to make. I take it that no one will take fright by this news. Leprosy does not spread through the air. Personally, I doubt if it is contagious. In our country, lepers freely move about everywhere. But we should observe the prohibition about physical contact with a leper since that would be the right thing for us to do. We cannot completely ignore modern science. Shastri himself willingly observes that prohibition. If he employs the remedies I have suggested, he may even be cured of his leprosy. I have assumed that you yourself will not be reluctant to take him in. If, however, you are, send me a telegram. Ask the Managing Committee, too. It is better to consult the other permanent inmates of the Ashram as well. In fact I feel that it is my dharma to ascertain the opinion of every member in this matter. I took this step only after all of us here unanimously agreed on it. But I do not worry about it. I felt it is to be my clear dharma to take him in. He had in fact arrived with the purpose of living in the Ashram but had to leave because his wife was against it. I think we cannot reject him. However, there may be room for difference of opinion in this matter. Since he had left the Ashram once, we cannot say without further deliberation that it is our dharma to take him back again. Hence, on getting this letter, think over the matter. First yourself, then the Committee, and after that the rest. If your own view is against taking him in, I should not send him there, nor if the Committee is against it, nor if the old-time members are against it. I would not consider it essential to seek the consent of those who have joined the Ashram only for a short period. However, it would be proper to discuss the matter with all the members. I feel that I have abused the freedom which I obtained from you. Such things come naturally to me, but I have no right, without the co-workers’ consent to send anyone who might be a burden on them. I followed the same rule at Phoenix. Once, when I was practicing there, someone suffering from a dangerous disease turned up and I made Ba nurse him. I am nearing the end of my life doing such things but have still not changed my ways. That is, I act on the assumption that the co-workers, particularly those who are very close to me, will as a matter of course do what I do. Let us believe and hope that this will prove to be my last misdeed. I will settle the matter perfectly well with Parachure Shastri. Hence nobody should come to a decision on the basis of my assurance to him. After considering the matter independently and examining the Ashram’s dharma in this case send me a telegram whether the decision is ‘yes’ or ‘no’. Let no one believe that I will be shocked, whatever the decision. I had expected that I would have to give but one sheet of paper to this subject, but now it seems that I would instead be giving five. I went on writing as ideas came to me one after another. In the matter of observing one’s dharma, taking a decision in a hurry is harmful and ought to be avoided. It implies self-conceit. You will see from this something of the present state of my mind. My fitness to think about anything except what relates to Harijan service seems to be fast leaving me. To think about other things or to do anything or speak about anything else has become painful to me. I am going through painful experiences which I find impossible to describe. Even if I wished to describe them, I have no time to do so. But no more of this now. I feel perfectly at ease in pouring out my heart to you. I believe you have the capacity to respond to such things. If you have followed all I have said and wish to give the letter to others to read, I will have no objection. If you feel that what I have written is strange, keep the letter with you after reading it. I will explain it if we meet some day. What I have said is nothing mysterious. It is easy enough to understand, but it gives a glimpse into what agony one, who unswervingly follows the path of dharma, has to endure. I do feel that if someone who has not associated himself with my life were to read this, it would do much harm.

Tell Parasaram firmly what your decision is. I am writing to him. If he wants to leave despite your being straightforward in dealing with him, let him do so. If he wishes to stay in spite of it, no objection need be made. There is no room for charity in the sphere of dharma. It would be easy to acquiesce in it if we transgress the proper limit of ahimsa. But it becomes difficult to do so when in the name of ahimsa one shows undeserved compassion and is thereby guilty of a subtle form of violence. Just as we do not indulge an invalid’s fancies so also we need not indulge the fancies of a person who violates the rules. This is the way to put an end to Parasaram’s noisy complaints.

I think it will be difficult to arrange for Kusum’s trip to Almora. At present, there are just no such facilities there. I think it will be difficult to look after her there. We cannot put the burden of doing so on Prabudas, nor on Navin. If her disease gets aggravated, who will look after her there? It might be possible to send her either to Deolai or Matheran. Whether or not she can be sent to Deolali, will have to be considered. I do not think it proper for the whole family to go. Beyond this my brain refuses to work just now.

I have already written to you about Lakshmi. Lakshmidas will certainly come there. Perhaps Devdas also will come. Rajaji and Shankerlal are here at present.

[PS.]

Monday, 5.25

One thing was left out in the letter for the children. Some of them write to me to say that they have got tired of the agricultural work. Tell them that this does not become them. A duty once undertaken cannot be abandoned. Even music tires one so long as one has not learnt it well. Those who have learnt agricultural work well, do not give it up. If agricultural work were not interesting, millions in the world would not engage themselves in it. It does require hard work, but hard work is interesting, not indolence. Moreover, the hard work is only physical. But our bodies love ease and comfort and therefore we avoid hard work and in consequence suffer from diseases. I therefore hope that the children will not tire of agricultural work. Besides, the mother Gita also teaches us that it is in doing our duty that we find pleasure and agricultural work is one of our duties. I have looked into the result of the yarn-test competition. It is disappointing. Only one sample bears the mark ‘excellent’. The mark against two is ‘bad’. All other samples fall short in both respects. This defect must be remedied. Ask those whose yarns have gone through the test and the others also, to be vigilant. Spinning good quality yarn that is even and strong, requires nothing more than careful attention. If the sliver is of inferior quality, the yarn may fall short in respect of . . . 1 but it will certainly not be uneven or weak. I still consider the count of the samples low. The quality of slivers is likely to be at fault in that. It does not matter if we produce a smaller quantity of slivers and yarn, but what we do produce must be of the finest quality. Pay attention to this subject and induce others to do the same. Wake up all of them. In . . . 2 for achieving perfection, everyone must acquire speed and . . . 3 It would be good if they acquire speed in carding and ginning also.

643. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR AND DUNCAN GREENLEES

March 8, 1933

CHI. MARY AND DUNCAN,

I like your letter very much indeed. Before I argue to the contrary, let me say what I have told Narandas and I think I made clear to both of you, that you should not be treated as the other learners who come to the Ashram, that you should take only such part in the Ashram work as you like and can digest and that you should use your time as may seem most profitable to you from your own standpoint.

Now for my own opinion. The Ashram is a place where the idea is to enforce literally the maxim ‘to labour is to pray’. This labour was interpreted by Thoreau and Tolstoy to mean physical labour and Tolstoy adopted Bondaref’s maxim of bread labour being God’s law for all mankind. I read the same thing in the third chapter of the Gita. I have tested the truth of the interpretation in my own life and in the lives of many companions and I have felt that our lives have been incomplete and unsatisfying exactly to the extent that we have failed to carry out the interpretation in practice. Therefore I would say that, so long as the routine of the Ashram appears to be a slavish following of it, the spirit of the Ashram is not imbibed. I confess unhesitatingly that so few have imbibed the spirit. Many follow the routine mechanically and, therefore, slavishly. I do not grumble over the mechanical following, because even that is better than people idling away their time and I am not without hope that even those who are mechanically following the routine will some day detect the spirit and the beauty behind it. So many Englishmen and women, especially missionaries, make, in my opinion, the tremendous mistake of directing the activity of others without themselves taking a direct part in it. They, therefore, remain untouched by the activity itself and often become blind guides. As I am dictating this, illustrations from life crowd in upon my mind. I would, therefore, say that if you can appreciate and understand the spirit of my remarks and feel the truth of them, then follow the routine patiently, intelligently, whole-heartedly, till it becomes a part of your nature, lies light upon your mind and seems to speak to you its message. Then, but not till then, are you really able to write anything serious for public service. Not even every good thought is worth giving to the world unless it is repeatedly tested on the anvil of experience. All true labour is both contagious and infectious. I wonder if I have driven my meaning home. If I have not, you must reject all my argument without the slightest hesitation and do exactly as you feel you should, so as to get the best out of your experience of the Ashram.

With loving blessings from

MY DEAR MARY,

I had your two letters. You are not going to put an undue strain on your body. By all means try your utmost to live the Ashram life but not at the cost of your health. And don’t hesitate to tell me all about the Ashram drawbacks. I would like you to show my long letter to Narandas.

Love.

MY DEAR LELE,

I have your letter, being your answer to “As They See Us”. It is a very good reply, if my assumption is correct that the whole of the balance after deducting overhead charges has gone into the pockets of the Harijans. Your letter is going in this week, but I would like you to let me have the details showing how the disbursements were made.

As to the reply received by you from the Government regarding the supply of Harijan to prisoners, I must not deal with it through the Harijan. You too may regard the matter as closed.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter and I am glad you have written to me. I wish you would care to read all the numbers of the Harijan and I think that most of your doubts will be solved. You will find in them that I have unhesitatingly said that all that is bad about varnashrama and caste should be wholly removed. Temple-entry is certainly coming much sooner than you expect. It is the centre of reform because it would be a visible sign to the millions that untouchability is gone. Therefore we must prosecute the reform whether the vast mass of caste Hindus come round or not.

Anti-untouchability leagues are, I think, working satisfactorily. A great deal is being done by them for the educational advancement and you should study the columns of the Harijan to note the progress in that direction. I think that you are not doing justice to Sjt. Nageswar Rao when you say that nothing but platform lectures are being given in Andhradesa. But I am writing for fuller particulars.

If you were to start the leagues and the Birla Committee¹ were to furnish the funds, you won’t call that self-reliance. As a matter of fact, what you need is not money but men who having received education would take it to the humbler Harijans. My advice to the Harijan youths, therefore, is to take up the reform energetically among the poorest.

I do not know the effect of the Madras Services Commission. You will perhaps enlighten me on the point, but Harijan graduates and other highly educated Harijans have limitless scope for serving fellow-Harijans.

If there is no Telugu newspaper specially devoted to Harijans, I suppose it is because there are very few literate Harijans. Before, therefore, you think of starting a paper, all the educated Harijans should spread themselves among the illiterate Harijans and impart instruction to them. Every educated Harijan should, therefore, become a walking newspaper, and this you can supplement by issuing leaflets from time to time as they may be demanded.

Please keep yourself in touch with me.

648. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 8, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your big packet of mail.

My views about the teaching of English, it may be said, have changed to a certain extent. I feel that the older women in the Ashram should be permitted to learn what they wish to. They feel their deficiency at every step, and particularly, in our circumstances, their ignorance of English. They don’t mind being ignorant of arithmetic nor do they mind their indifferent Gujarati, but they feel unhappy that they don’t know English. Our connections with Englishmen will continue, ought to continue, and, therefore, we shall also continue to use the English language. Hence the women feel that if they know a little English, they will be able to use it every now and then. This argument is not altogether tenable, but there is enough truth in it to make them wish to learn English. It is certainly not immoral to learn English. I think that, if the women do not feel interested in any other subject, it would be good to teach them even English to make them study-minded. It is desirable that the older women should become interested in study, no matter how. It is also desirable that they should increase their knowledge. I, therefore, think that we should provide whatever facility we can to any older woman who may wish to learn English. Please point out to me any weakness that you may see in this reasoning. I will try to explain again.

I see from Kikabhai’s letter that a large crowd of Harijans will be attending Lakshmi’s wedding. I think that Jamna and you are the right persons to give away the bride. I hope Jamna does not harbour the prejudice of untouchability in her heart. Don’t make the Harijans who may attend sit apart from the others. Since their proportion will be large enough for the gathering, serve them some fruit as refreshment, as I have suggested. I suggest copra and raisins. If possible, I will write something to be read out to the assembled guests and enclose it with this letter.¹ You will have to give some dresses to Lakshmi as a gift from the Ashram. Think over this. If you can, see Ba and ask her advice. I should be happy if she gives one of her saris, a new one or an almost new one. If she has preserved any jewellery, she may give some of it too. Tell the Superintendent that you wish to see her specially for this reason. If he permits you, well and good, if he does not, don’t mind. Discuss with the women this question of what to give to Lakshmi. See that we omit to do nothing which would be proper on such an occasion. I will write to you again if I think of anything more. You can ignore any of my suggestions which you don’t think appropriate.

I have replied to Parachure Shastri. Everything will depend on your wire.

I have received Kellogg’s book. Gangabehn and Sharda have arrived here. They have not seen me yet. Gangabehn will not be able to do so. Sharda will see me on Saturday if she is here on that day.

You did the right thing in keeping Lakshmi’s younger sister with Anasuyabehn. I see that Dudabhai has stayed on. Dahibehn should be welcomed if she comes. You did right in agreeing to pay her the expenses of her journey.

For the present, at any rate, Anandi seems to be completely free from danger. I will give her some work every day. She lives on milk and fruit. For some time she must remain here. You may ask Lakshmidas about the remedies which are being tried for her. They will be useful to others, too. It cannot be said, though, that they will agree with everyone. But they will certainly do no harm.

I have no fear about your health so long as your diet includes milk and curds. But I should certainly like you to exclude gram from it. It makes the mental work you are doing more difficult. The best food for mental workers is milk and fruit. If you eat uncooked cabbage, it should be tender. But this is not necessary if you eat it boiled. It would be better if you drink milk without boiling it.

Jamna should take sun-bath, get her body massaged with oil, do pranayama systematically and, for food, drink milk and eat papaya, raisins and, if she wishes, some vegetable. I believe she will be all right if she restricts her diet to these things.

649. MESSAGE ON WEDDING OF LAKSHMI AND MARUTI

March 8, 1933

I feel a little unhappy that neither Ba nor I will be present in the Ashram on the occasion of the wedding of Lakshmi and Maruti, but I think that is ignorant love. One should feel happy wherever devotion to dharma may make it necessary for one to be. Since one who

1 Lakshmi’s parents. The family joined the Ashram in 1915; vide “Letter to Narandas Gandhi”, 16-9-1915
2 ibid
3 A South Indian orphan boy, brought up by Velabehn and Lakshmidas Asar follows dharma should never wish that things should be otherwise than they are, he can have no cause to feel unhappy.

Moreover, when so many elders and friends, men and women, will be assembling to give their blessings, Ba’s presence or mine should not be considered at all essential.

Lakshmi was of course eager that Ba and I should be present at her wedding. So was Chi. Maruti. I could understand their desire. But all of us felt that the marriage should take place without delay, and hence I advised both the bride and the bridegroom to have the wedding as soon as possible and they accepted my advice. Lakshmi has been brought up in the Ashram since her childhood. But we have not been able to educate and train her as well as the Ashram and I would have liked to do. We did not, therefore, think it desirable to keep a girl in the bloom of youth unmarried for very long after betrothal. The fact that Chi. Lakshmi is getting married does not mean that her education will stop. I regard Maruti as a very worthy young man. He is a man of self-control. He has received training at the hands of Bhai Lakshmidas and Velabehn. He realizes the responsibility he is undertaking. He will not only be a husband to Lakshmi, but will also be a friend and teacher to her. There can be no doubt that, if this marriage is successful, it will benefit both Harijans and Hinduism a great deal. Looked at from this point of view, this marriage is of great importance and makes the responsibility of both correspondingly greater.

Chi. Maruti and Chi. Lakshmi were betrothed some years ago. It was a big problem for the Ashram to whom Lakshmi should be married. We thought that, having regard to the training she had received in the Ashram, she would be happy only if she got a partner who had received a similar training. The Ashram believes in the principle of varnashrama and tries to follow it as well as it can. I cannot speak for all, but I have often stated that I myself believe that in the present age all Hindus can, and do, belong to one varna only. If we wish to revive the varnashrama system, we shall have to start with a clean slate. This being my view, it was my duty to find a suitable husband for Lakshmi. Velabehn came to my help and suggested Maruti’s name. Lakshmidas also liked the idea. I put the suggestion to Lakshmi, and she, too, accepted it. Her father also gave his consent and the two were betrothed. In my opinion all that we did was in conformity with dharma. I regard marriage too as a protective hedge for dharma, and we should hope that the bride and the bridegroom also will regard it in the same light.

This marriage has no connection with the present movement. Mixed marriages like this one are in no way a part of the movement for the removal of untouchability. This marriage is a recognition of the point of view of one who believes in all the various ideals of the Ashram. I hope that no one will misunderstand its significance because it is taking place at the present time when the movement for removal of untouchability is going on and because it is inspired by one who is the chief leader of that movement. I do not hold up this marriage as an example for anybody to follow. I regard marriage as a matter of the parents’ and their children’s free will. I believe that there is ample support for this view in Hinduism. However, it has no connection with the problem of the removal of untouchability. The question belongs to another field of reform in Hinduism.

650. DRAFT CONSTITUTION OF THE HARIJAN SEVAK SANGH

The following resolution was adopted on behalf of what are known as caste Hindus by a meeting of their representatives from all India held at Bombay under the presidency of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya on 25th September, 1932.²

This Conference resolves that henceforth, amongst Hindus, no one shall be regarded as an untouchable by reason of his birth and those who have been so regarded hitherto will have the same rights as the other Hindus in regard to the use of public wells, public roads and other public institutions. This right shall have statutory recognition at the first opportunity and shall be one of the earliest acts of the swaraj Parliament, if it shall not have received such recognition before that time.

It is further agreed that it shall be the duty of all Hindu leaders to secure, by every legitimate and peaceful means, an early removal of all social disabilities now imposed by custom upon the so-called untouchable classes including the bar in respect of admission to temples.

This was followed up by a public meeting convened by the Hindu leaders from all parts of the country and held in Bombay on the 30th September, under the presidentship of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, at which following resolution among others was passed:

This public meeting of the Hindus resolves that an All-India Antiuntouchability League, with its headquarters at Delhi and branches in different provincial centres, be established for the purpose of carrying on propaganda against untouchability and that for this purpose the following steps should be immediately taken:

(a) All public wells, dharmasalas, roads, schools, crematoriums, burning-ghats, etc., be declared open to depressed classes.

(b) All public temples be opened to members of depressed classes. Provided that no compulsion or force shall be used with regard to (a) and (b), but peaceful persuasion will be adopted as the only means.

This public meeting of Hindus appeals to the Hindu community to collect as large an amount as possible to be used for the removal of untouchability and cognate objects and for this purpose authorizes the President and [the] Secretary to take all necessary steps.

In pursuance of the said resolutions a society, named the All-India Anti-untouchability League subsequently named as Harijan Sevak Sangh was duly formed and a constitution was adopted by it at [Delhi] on 26th [October, 1932].

It was then considered advisable to frame a fuller constitution and the following was finally adopted at a meeting of the central board of All-India Harijan Sevak Sangh held at Delhi on . . . superseding the previous constitution.

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE HARIJAN SEVAK SANGH

REFERENCE TO PRESENT RULES

1. The name of the Society will be Harijan Sevak Sangh.

2. The object of the Sangh shall be the eradication by truthful and non-violent means of untouchability in Hindu Society with all its incidental evils and disabilities, suffered by the so-called untouchables hereinafter described as Harijans in all walks of life and to secure for them absolute equality of status with the rest of the Hindus.

3. In furtherance of its objects the H. S. S. will seek to establish contact with caste Hindus throughout India and show them that untouchability as it is practised in Hindu society is repugnant to the Shastras and to the best instinct of humanity, and it will also seek to serve Harijans so as to promote their moral, social and material welfare.

4. The affairs of the Sangh shall be managed by a Central Board constituted as hereinafter provided.

5. The Central Board shall consist of the following members and (2) the Presidents of the Provincial Boards of the Sangh with power to the President to co-opt not more than five members.

The organizing members are:

1. Sjt Ghanshyamdas Birla, President
2. Sir Purushottamdas Thakurdas, Bombay
3. Sir Lalubhai Samaldas, Bombay
4. Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, Bombay
5. Seth Ambalal Sarabhai, Ahmedabad
6. Dr. Bidhan Chandra Roy, Calcutta
7. Lala Lachmandas, Delhi
8. Rao Bahadur M. C. Rajah, Madras
9. Rao Bahadur Srinivasan, Madras
10. Dr. T. S. S. Rajan, Trichinopoly
11. Sjt. A. V. Thakkar, General Secretary
12. Mr. Baloo P. Palwankar, Bombay
13. Mr. J. P. Mandelia, Treasurer, Delhi
14. Mr. D. P. Khaitan, Calcutta
15. Shrimati Rameshwari Nehru, Lahore.

6. The Central Board may co-opt members from time to time either for life or for a fixed period. The organizing and the co-opted members together shall at no time exceed the number of ex-officio members.

7. The President shall subject to re-election retire every three years and be elected by the then existing Board.
8. The President shall have the power to remove [the] Secretary or [the] Secretaries and [the] Treasurer and appoint others in their stead provided that there shall never be more than three Secretaries or more than two Treasurers.

9. The Sangh shall have as many branches in provincial centres as the President of the Central Board may deem necessary.

10. The President of the Central Board shall select the President of each Provincial Board who, in his turn, will select as many members for his Board as he may think fit not, however, more than ten.

11. The President of a Provincial Board shall appoint a working Secretary for his Board from among its members, subject to the approval of the President of the Central Board.

12. Each Provincial Board may form as many committees or agencies as may be found necessary in the interest of the Harijan cause.

13. The Presidents of the Central and Provincial Boards and their committees shall all be honorary.

14. The office-bearers and members of the Central Board and Provincial Boards and committees and agents shall (1) sign the pledge hereto annexed, (2) pay annual subscription in advance of Rs. 6.00 payable at his will in two half-yearly instalments subject to special exemption by a President within his jurisdiction, (3) perform some definite Harijan service named by him and approved by one half of the board, (4) send a diary to competent authority from month to month containing a record of such services.

15. It shall be competent for the Sangh to acquire and hold immovable properties. Such properties shall vest in a permanent Trustee or Trustees appointed by the President of the Central Board. The Trustee or Trustees shall be entitled to deal with them only in accordance with the resolutions of the Central Board.

16. The funds of the Central Board of the Sangh shall be deposited in a bank or banks in the name of the Sangh and the account shall be operated upon by the President or his nominee or nominees.

17. The funds of the Provincial Boards and their committees shall similarly be deposited in banks as far as possible and the accounts shall be operated upon by the respective Presidents or their nominees.
18. The Central Board shall meet in any convenient place in India at least once in a year. The quorum for its meeting shall be ten.

19. It shall be competent for the Central Board to frame bye-laws for preparing and passing of the central and provincial budgets, for the custody, disposal and audit of the funds of the Sangh and for otherwise regulating its work.

20. The Central Board may function in Indian States in which there is no prohibition against its activities.

21. No member or agent of the Central Board or Provincial Boards or committees shall while holding such position in any way engage in any campaign of civil disobedience.

22. A member of any Board or agent who fails without just cause to attend three consecutive meetings of Boards to which they belong shall be deemed to have vacated office.

23. Any member of a board when required thereto fails to carry out instructions duly issued to him by a competent authority may be relieved of his office at the discretion of the Central or the Provincial Boards.

24. Any person who subscribes to the object of the Sangh and will help the Sangh by paying and collecting contributions to the Sangh and otherwise further its object can become an associate of the Sangh and shall be kept informed of the proceedings of the Sangh from time to time and shall be entitled and invited to attend the meetings of the Central Board or of the Board of his Province without however the right of voting.

25. The Central Board, the Provincial Boards and the committees shall establish contact with Harijan organizations throughout the country and invite them to send lists of advisers who will be kept informed of the activities of the Sangh and who will be invited to attend the meetings of Boards or committees and to take part in their deliberations, without however exercising the right to vote.

26. Every Board or committee shall have as many Harijan members as it is possible to secure consistently with its maximum provided that the pledge to be signed by them shall be as per form B hereby attached and that they will be exempt from other conditions laid down in sub-clauses 2, 3 and 4 of clause 14 hereof.
27. For the better administration of the affairs of the Sangh the President shall select from among the members of the Central Board executive committee of seven members including himself as Chairman and two Secretaries.

28. The E. C. shall meet every three months and oftener when necessary and have all the power exercisable by the Central Board subject however to revision of its work by the Central Board in so far as such revision is possible. The four members besides the President and Secretaries will subject to re-selection retire every year.

29. All the acts performed hitherto and transactions undertaken under the superseded constitution are hereby ratified.

30. Consistently with the foregoing, the old constitution is hereby repealed—not inconsistently with the object of the Sangh, Central Board shall have the power to revise this Constitution from time to time.

31. During the transition stage the existing organizations shall function till changes in consonance with this Constitution are completed.

32. This Constitution shall come into effect as from . . .

The English Harijan has become self-supporting already. The subscriptions received to date from street sales and annual subscribers leave a balance without the aid of the Rs. 1044 from the Central Board³. This money can, therefore, now be refunded. Will you kindly tell me how you would want this money to be sent to you? I understand that you have to pay something to the Maharashtra Board. My enquiry as to the method of refunding the money is merely with a view to saving commission on money order, draft or cheque.

Arrangements have been made to issue a Gujarati Harijan also. It is being issued from Poona. The Bombay Board has guaranteed the

THE JOINT HON. SECRETARIES
BRITISH INDIAN ASSOCIATION
18 BRITISH INDIAN STREET, CALCUTTA

DEAR FRIENDS,

I thank you for your letter of 23rd ultimo enclosing a memorandum on the Poona Pact on behalf of the British Indian Association.² I have been carrying on private correspondence with friends in this matter to ascertain Bengal opinion. My own position is quite clear. I was wholly uninterested in the number of seats reserved for untouchables or depressed classes. Once the principle of reservation was conceded, my own position was that the more they got the better it was for them and for Hinduism and, therefore, for the whole of India from every point of view. If untouchables are a part of ourselves, what can be grander than that we reserve seats for them without any reservation. That to my mind would be the very best method of killing the spirit of difference. I wholly dissent from the view that the principle of separation is left intact in the Yeravda Pact. On the contrary, the principle of joint election has been the main feature of the Yeravda Pact so far as the political side is concerned. That the candidates for joint election have to be selected by Harijan electors in the first instance is surely no drawback, if we have faith in ourselves and in our regard for them, and if all the four candidates selected happen to be anti-Hindu reactionaries it would be to me proof positive that during the period of grace we had failed to command their affection or esteem and we would have to thank our stars if we have to elect from among reactionary candidates. I do not in any way share your fear that depressed class members will not do justice to the Hindu or the national cause. Nor have I any fear that they will not be able to discharge their proper function as representatives of the people. Should it prove otherwise it will mean that we are not fit for swaraj.

All things considered, therefore, I fear that I can be no party to the revision of the Pact, and in any case I am only one of the parties concerned, and my opinion will be valueless if all the other parties consent to or desire revision of the Pact in the direction suggested by the British Indian Association.

As I do not wish to compromise your position in any way, I have not entered into a public discussion of your position nor will I do so now unless you wish me to. The very first person I wrote to was, I think, Dr. Bidhan Roy, and he told me that he was seeing all the interested parties and that he would write to me. I have not heard from him since. I am now in your hands.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR SATISBABOO,

I have your letter giving me the contents of the two issues of the Bengali Harijan. You will see the note that is to appear in the ensuing number of the Harijan.

I note what you say about smallpox. I do not know however whether it is a useful thing for us to have statistics about the distribution of smallpox among different castes.

I am glad you are keeping in touch with sanatanists. That they will not listen to the other things until we give up temple-entry is well known. My suggestion is before them that they should start their own organizations and take up the other items. If they don’t, it shows the hypocrisy of the whole thing.

As to varnashrama, I do mean that today if we must classify the whole of Hindus according to varna, there is only one varna possible, and that is Shudra. Acceptance of the fourth varna by all will represent not only the true state of Hindu society, but it will at one stroke level down all distinctions of high and low. That does not prevent anybody from attaining divine or any other knowledge, but it does mean that all live by their labour and all become entitled therefore to nothing more than simple maintenance. That in my opinion is varna dharma in a nutshell. That Hinduism has never lived up to it perfectly is true, but in my opinion it is equally true that Hinduism has in its purest period consciously lived up to it with success.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I have heard from Sjt. Chhapkhane. He gives a categorical reply confirming Sjt. Athavale’s and he also suggests that you should have gone to Sjt. Chhapkhane to have the matter cleared up. I suggest your doing it. Copies of the balance of correspondence are being forwarded to Sjt. Abhyankar. Of course there is no question of a court case. I can only plead with those who hold the money, but it is difficult for me to believe that a man like Sjt. Chhapkhane could be guilty of giving a false version of what happened during my visit to Sangli. No theory can be built upon Sjt. Gangadhar Rao’s recollection. He does not say anything with confidence and it is not possible for anyone to recollect events that happened so many years ago. Therefore, unless there is unimpeachable evidence to the contrary, Sjt. Chhapkhane’s word must be taken, and in that event I can only plead with him to use some part of the money at least in connection with Harijan work.

MY DEAR N.1,

I had hoped to hear from you today. I had your note scribbled on the back of the telegram that was received by you. You were right in refusing the Rs. 25. I did not like the subscription to your note. “Your son” looks unnaturally theatrical. If the truth has really dawned on you, you must realize the enormity of the past wrong and you ought to shed all hysteria and unnaturalness. You can only become my daughter if you would be good as you have promised to me.

I had letters from S.¹ and Sir M.² I am therefore writing to Sir M. a letter giving him the purport of your confession and your promise, naturally withholding the names you have given me and I am sending a similar letter to S. That is right, is it not? S. adds in his letter that he would be delighted if you came under my guidance and utilized your services.

May God bless you and give you strength to keep your promise.

Yours sincerely,

657. LETTER TO M.

March 9, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter about N. She was with me for a few days and I regret to have to report to you that her record is not what you describe. Bit by bit she made her confession and it made a ghastly story. She seems to have led a most extravagant and immoral life, even from tender years. She was open to the advances of practically any person, and she was no better after her acceptance of Hindu religion. She has debts amounting to nearly Rs. 10,000 spread over Europe and India. She has travelled under a false name. The only thing I am able to say in her favour is that she has been quite frank with me in her recital of her recklessnesses, though, as I have said, they came bit by bit in answer to my cross-examination. She has professed penitence and made me a definite promise to say good-bye to her past life. I have told her that I could not take her on trust but that if she proved true to her promise I would not hesitate to defend her and to guide her. I do not know what capacity she has still left for controlling herself and keeping her promises.

In giving you this painful story of her confession I am betraying no confidence, for, she was to have published a confession much like this immediately on her reaching Bangalore. She was also to give up the boarding house and with her son become a beggar relying purely upon a forgiving world’s charity and was to live in a corner in Harijan quarters the simplest possible life giving up the governess and letting her baby son share the privilege of her penitent life.

There are some further details, some other particulars of her life, which I may not disclose, nor, so far as I am aware, will she.

Her confession has made me sad. I have had many boys and girls making their confessions to me, but it has never been my misfortune to come across a case like N.’s. But I have no right to judge her. Judgment is in the hands of God. Being myself in need of pity from the world I only pity her and love to help her to the extent of my ability. I felt drawn to her when she wrote to me announcing her decision to fast with me if I had commenced the fast in the beginning of the year. I had warned her against it and the correspondence became lengthened. I had hoped that she would become an excellent member of the army of Harijan servants and her letters give all that promise.

I thank you for your personal wishes for me and kind thoughts about me.

Yours sincerely,

658. LETTER TO RAMACHANDRA

March 9, 1933

MY DEAR RAMACHANDRA,

Here is a letter which I would like you to read and hand it to N.

I would like you also to give me the full name and address of R. of the Engineering College. I understand that he has been her chief companion in connection with the scavenging work.

660. LETTER TO PANCHANAN TARKARATNA

March 9, 1933

DEAR PANDITJI,

I was amazed to receive your undated letter.

So far as your son’s visit is concerned, he was to come to me not as one of the Shastri disputants but as one desirous of answering my questions, enlightening me and to this end seeing me from day to day for 10 days or longer if necessary, and he was to come to me as your representative even as you had come without imposing any conditions on me. It surprises me that now you should describe his coming to me as one of the disputants in the nature of fulfilment of your promise. Secondly, from the very commencement of the discussions, untouchability as it is practised today was the subject-matter of discussion, and I have a letter written by Pandits on the very date that they came to the effect that that was the common ground between them and me. You, your son or anybody can see the original document in my possession. But the Pandits had imposed another condition which they thought I would never accept, but in order not to miss the discussion with them when they had come as far as the jail gate, I waived my objection and accepted their condition retaining the words “as at present practised”. Still they would not come. I cannot help saying that this was unreasonable, discourteous and unworthy of learned men. Of all the painful episodes that I have had the misfortune to face in my contact with Shastris, this was the most painful.

Of the other parts of your letter I desire to say nothing beyond this that I am unable to endorse your interpretation of the Shastras as being repugnant to common sense, universal morals and contrary to the interpretation of the Shastras by Pandits having no less learning and authority than the opposite school and in the presence of such a conflict of interpretation you will not blame me if I accept that which is more consistent with my moral sense.

As to your proposed fast, whilst I should deplore it if you ever came to undertake it, such fasts are an everyday occurrence in Hinduism and have always to be welcomed when they come from the purity of one’s heart and without anger or malice.

You would not write as you have done about the two Bills now pending before the Legislature if you had carefully studied the contents and application of these Bills.¹ In my opinion they constitute no interference with anyone’s religion or conscience. One Bill takes untouchability out of the domain of civil law which is what you and I and everybody else should desire, and the other ensures the free exercise of conscience by all, whereas today the conscience of a growing number of people is constrained.

Yours sincerely,

¹ These were unofficial Bills relating to the abolition of untouchability: one to be sponsored in the Central Legislative Assembly by Ranga Iyer and the other in the Madras Legislative Council by Dr. Subbaroyan. Ranga Iyer’s Bill was to come up for introduction first on February 27 and then again on March 24. On both occasions “protracted discussions on other non-official Bills by members who were hostile or indifferent to the anti-untouchability movement” vitiated the attempt. —India in 1932-33

CHI. NARANDAS,

I send with this my reply\(^1\) to the question asked by Mary and Duncan. Read and think over it and then pass it on to them. I wrote to you\(^2\) yesterday regarding Lakshmi and also sent a message for the occasion. Most probably Devdas will arrive there on Sunday.

I am becoming convinced that the source of asthma also is in the stomach. If, therefore, Chimanlal and Jamna cling to the experiment of milk diet with determination, their asthma is bound to be cured. And they need not also think that they must drink a certain quantity of milk. I think that they will be able to digest only a very small quantity. Milk is drunk for the sake of the proteins, the ghee and the vitamins which it contains. If proteins give strength, they also diminish it if there is the slightest excess of them. Weak people, therefore, can build up strength by drinking milk in a very small quantity. The chief food of such people should be vegetables and juicy fruits. Without trying other remedies, therefore, if they eat bhaji and juicy fruits in plenty and drink a very small quantity of milk for strength, they are bound to get all right. And if this regimen does not help them, I will not mind their concluding that nothing else will and doing nothing. They should drink the milk unboiled and mixed with some fruit or green vegetable. In doing so, they would be eating milk instead of drinking it, and it will then be much easier to digest. They should also regularly do pranayamas, slowly and moderately, on an empty stomach. Besides, they should take sun-bath. In this season, hip-bath also is bound to be beneficial.

I have looked into Radha’s accounts. I am returning them. I think in the present circumstances we are helpless in this matter.

Expenses on food alone come to Rs. 30. Rs. 55 account for rent, railway fare and other expenses during the journey, and Rs. 25 for the doctor’s fees, maid servant, postage, repair of watch, etc., and playing cards for bezique. There may be room for criticism in regard to this item of Rs. 25, but there can be no criticism in regard to the Rs. 30 for food, if the amount is for one month. The whole question of Ashram expenses, that is, of our way of living, is a complicated one. If we carefully watch ourselves daily and introduce greater and greater simplicity in the Ashram, we shall learn to rely more and more on God in our misfortunes in the shape of illness and accidents. Our work then will shine better. We shall feel happy with ourselves and will be safe in all circumstances. It will then be easy for us to control, without criticizing them, those others who spend too much. “We” here means most of the inmates of the Ashram who are seekers after truth and have dedicated themselves to its pursuit. Personally I feel that a time is coming when we shall have to live like sannyasis confined to the Ashram. That is, we shall have to be content with whatever treatment we can get in the Ashram itself for any illness. Almora was intended, is still intended, to supplement the Ashram. But I think it would be desirable to renounce even that. But we can do all these things only by cultivating such a climate of opinion in the Ashram. In doing so, nobody should look to what the other inmates do. Anybody who feels that he ought to practise such sannyasa should start doing so. In other words, he will not go anywhere outside the Ashram for treatment of illness or for his personal work. Just now, this is only an aspiration. I have merely taken this opportunity to put the suggestion before you so that you may think over it at leisure and discuss it with other senior inmates.

Sitla Sahai has attacked me too. But I have thrown the responsibility for the whole thing on you. He also has complained that I have shifted the responsibility. I will put up with that charge. Ask Purushottam to write a detailed letter to me. The doctor’s remarks in regard to Kanu seem justified to me. If he has carefully learnt how to do the massage, if he gives complete rest to the affected part and if it is gently massaged every day, it will certainly be cured. The improvement will of course take time.
Parashuram seems to have joined the Ashram to test your capacity for endurance. But you are strong enough and so we need not worry. You may give him divorce when you can bear it no longer. Personally, I am now ready to accept this reform in Hindu marriage. Millions of poor Hindus do have the custom of divorce. Their lives would become unbearable without it. I see no dharma in people regarding themselves as belonging to the twice-born class and forcing women to accept their ideal. Spiritual bonds must be indissoluble. But when the ideal is forced upon people through law, it ceases to be dharma. I was discussing the question of marriage with the Ashram, but I digressed and discussed the problem of ordinary marriage. Those who join the Ashram marry it, and say so. The Ashram is the wife and the person who joins it is the husband. When, however, the bond becomes unbearable to the poor wife, she has every right to ask for divorce. You may use this right whenever you wish to.

Blessings from

BAPU

TALK WITH SADASHIVRAO AND SHINDE\(^1\)

January 13, 1933

BAPU: Even after this Bill is passed the majority should not exercise their right to frighten away the minority. The temple should be kept open for a few hours daily for the sake of the minority. They too have a certain sentiment for the image and believe in its importance and power. I would say to them that they should have darshan to their heart’s content before the temple becomes ‘impure’; I would go in after that.

SADASHIVRAO: But would it not hurt their inferiority complex?

BAPU: The question of inferiority arises only in the case of Harijans. If the reformists are in a majority, the Harijans should act like seniors, and should do out of their free will what they are not bound to do by law.

I don’t want separate temples erected. But I would say to them [the sanatanists]: ‘I shall make the necessary arrangement for you. You should not go away. I do not want to pay you in the same coin. You had regarded us as low. You asked up to be content with having darshan of the tower. But we are not going to regard you as low. We shall let you precede us and we shall respect your sentiments regarding the purity of the image.’ Man compromises either through weakness or because he is strong. As a votary of truth I would make a compromise on the basis of my strength. Only yesterday I dealt with the sanatanists in this way. They asked me to sign some document. Normally I would not endorse such a statement. But in order to satisfy them I affixed my signature, but after making a couple of most essential changes. If I disclose what took place between them and me, it is not going to shed lustre on Hinduism.

SHINDE: But they think this is where the hitch comes in.

BAPU: I do not look upon it as any hitch. I do not believe that all those who

\(^1\) Vide “Letter to S. Nagasundaram”, 13-1-1933 raise objections are insincere. I don’t want to drive them out of the temples. The lives of those who go to temples with a sincere heart are linked with the temples. I say this on the strength of my mother’s example. She would not put a grain in her mouth without having darshan in a temple, however ill and bed-ridden she might be. She used to derive strength from this practice of hers. I do not want to exercise the right I have acquired as though I were a demon or a bully. I have to give a thought to a true mother. All the women who visit temples are but mothers to me. If they want to preserve the purity [of the images], they may do so. The Harijans should be charitable enough to let them do it. In fact they should let them do it of their own free will. Take the instance of spectacles and injections which are in vogue. Our ancestors would regard these as superstitions. Tomorrow there may come up somebody who may regard praying as so much superstition. Even then we ought to respect people’s sentiments. Therefore the compromise I have suggested is absolutely correct. The sanatanists would not admit it but I do see they are coming closer to me. I am myself a Harijan and I have influence over them.

SHINDE: The Harijans will of course listen to you. They are bound to listen to you. When I ask you not to make any compromise, I do not mean that there will never be any compromise.

BAPU: Mate wanted a segregated space for having darshan. That was an unfair compromise.

SHINDE: From the spiritual point of view your compromise is no compromise at all. It will gradually wear out.

BAPU: Yes, it takes for granted mutual respect and sincerity. Only then does a temple become a true temple. In the same way the sanatanists can, if they want to, have tables reserved in restaurants. While I suggest all this I take it for granted that we are in the majority. If the sanatanists are in the majority we may not set foot in the temples.

I have found out a new way of looking at compromises. The initiative for compromise should come from the stronger party. Only he who has truth on his side can arrive at such a compromise.

SHINDE: Yes, the same is true of forgiveness, which only the strong can practise.

BAPU: This compromise in no way detracts from your principles, or mine or anybody else’s. One that would do violence to other’s principles can only be called cruel.

DISCUSSION WITH A FRIEND

January 13, 1933

Q. What is meant by the Inner Voice?

A. The Inner Voice is the voice of the Lord. It is a voice other than our own. It could be the voice of Satan or of God. In order to ensure that it is God that speaks from within us, we should correctly observe the yamas and niyamas. Millions of men may claim to hear the Inner Voice but the true Inner Voice could be heard in very few. We cannot adduce proof in its support. But it does have its influence. The Inner Voice is a power beyond us but it is not an outer force. ‘Beyond us’ means ‘a power which is beyond our ego’. When the ego is lying dormant there are two forces which act upon it, the real and the unreal. When we are one with the power that is real it is said, in the language of mysticism, that God is speaking through us. When we are one with sat our ego is reduced to zero.

Q. When can man claim to have heard the Inner Voice?

BAPU: That depends upon the man. When he experiences that he is not acting on his own he can make that claim. Supposing I constantly try to hear the Inner Voice, I constantly pray to God that He should act through me and reduce me to a cipher, a moment will come when I shall feel that the Lord is letting me hear Him. At such a time I can even say that I am hearing the voice of the Lord. But how can I prove it? It is for my conduct to prove it. But that too will not be the final test. Supposing a man lies buried in a cave in the Himalayas and God sends me there to see him. Supposing I reach the place, I dig a little and meet the man. Even then quite likely it may not be that I heard the Inner Voice. It could be a mere accident or even my illusion or someone might have said it to me. The world will no doubt judge me from the result. If the result is favourable the world will say that it was a miracle. But indeed there can be no final proof in this case. Man himself does not know when he is deceiving himself, or when he is pretending. There is a greater danger in hypocrisy than in self-deception.

We find further proof when there are many instances pointing towards the same conclusion. This includes all the great men, Buddha, Krishna, Mohammed. It was not with their own power that they uttered the truths. But some occult power urged them to such utterance. Some people are worthy enough, and through them the occult power works. But we cannot be sure when it will happen.

DISCUSSION WITH DHARMADEV

January 17, 1933

BAPU: I accept heredity to the extent that the progeny of a pure Brahmin man and a pure Brahmin woman should be a Brahmin. If such a Brahmin raises his children as Shudras he should be regarded as fallen from his varna. He becomes a fallen Brahmin.

DHARMADEV: But why at all call him a Brahmin?

BAPU: There is no high and low among the varnas. We may call him only fallen because he can return to his varna by quitting his fallen state. Leave aside the talk of high and low. Suppose a carpenter gives up carpentry and takes up the work of cleaning lavatories. The Gita would describe him as fallen from dharma. “Better is death in the discharge of one’s duty.” A carpenter may not go after the work of a goldsmith. Similarly, if he tries to get instructed in the Vedas, even then I would call him a carpenter who had fallen. We want to bring about harmony between dharma and karma (i.e., practical life). Will it do if we talked of making people adventurous and asked them all to embark upon trade? Hence occupations came to be hereditary. We may only ask them to apply their talents and powers for society’s enduring welfare. Today we admire those who assault the Kanchanjungha. My heart does not admire them; it censures them. It is not that we never made any discoveries. Patanjali is responsible for the scientific discovery of ahimsa.

DHARMADEV: Does it mean that one may not develop in oneself any quality appropriate to [any other] varna? I am a Kshatriya but I have no Kshatriya quality. You are a Vaishya, but where is your Vaishya conduct?

BAPU: I was talking of a pure social order. No such order exists today. There is today a confusion of varnas because the ashrama system has disappeared. Only one ashrama remains now—the householder’s. And that too not based on dharma but on self-indulgence. And the varna that remains is the Shudra’s. Today we are slaves under an alien rule because there are no more Kshatriyas, no more Brahmins, no more Vaishyas. The Vaishyas are busy making money. And can we describe ourselves even as Shudras? We serve only under compulsion, not regarding service as our dharma. A Shastri admitted to me that we are all Chandalas by our actions. What should this Chandala community do? Should it attempt to bring about varnadharm? I don’t say that this varnadharma should have the same name. The Shastras have described dharma as without beginning but they do speak of organization into varnas. I am yet doing my sadhana. I cannot speak in this matter with any self-confidence because my sadhana is not adequate.

DHARMADEV: Then why don’t you say that you don’t believe in any varna, as there is no varna today? You have maintained that a Brahmin is born, but Brahminhood is not acquired by birth. “A man is born a Shudra.”

BAPU: I don’t agree with you on this point. The Arya Samajists have restricted their reason. My language is aphoristic, it lacks precision. It is therefore open to several interpretations.

DHARMADEV: You say that Brahmins should regain the high position they held of yore.

BAPU: Quite correct. I was born a Vaishya, but people see in me certain qualities worthy of a Brahmin and say that I am a Brahmin. But I must earn my livelihood through my qualities as a Shudra. At the Ashram everyone works eight hours a day to earn his food. This communism of mine is deduced from Hinduism. Ruskin also taught the same thing. But today the Brahmin, Kshatriya, Vaishya, Shudra all want to become multi-millionaires. Hence I maintained that everyone should have equal payment, whether a barrister or a Shudra. Everyone should dedicate his talent to the service of the community. If the whole community made sacrifices the people would not starve. Even gamblers have everything in common. We are worse than the gamblers. I have come across such generous gamblers on board who pocket nothing as their personal gains but spend it off in the company. My heart weeps at our present condition. Tears may not fall from my eyes but my heart does weep. I cry when anyone commits an untruth or succumbs to passion at the Ashram which runs on public funds. I wish that the experiment which I am carrying on at the Ashram is tried in the whole world. If I fail in this I would not mind taking a thousand births to fulfil it. Whoever employs his talent for personal gain is good for nothing. One’s talent ought to be utilized for one’s own community. I must express my thoughts in a new language.

DHARMADEV: But you also say that you accept both varna and karma [one’s actions as deciding one’s caste].

BAPU: Look, here is a matter of justice. What can we do if people do not lend us their ear however much we may carry on our propaganda? That is why man has been advised to observe silence. What else can be propagated except truth? I have declared what varnadharma is, but now I don’t propagate it because it is irrelevant. There is no feeling of high and low in varnadharma, but it is very much there in untouchability.

\[1\text{ The second half of the verse says, “He becomes a twice-born (Brahmin) through-his sacraments.”}\]
Therefore untouchability is an excrescence on varnadharma.

DHARMADEV: It was born of caste.

BAPU: Yes, from caste; but with the disappearance of untouchability the feeling of high and low among the castes will also go. The greatest reptile is the serpent of untouchability. I don’t care if the rest, such as the scorpion and so on persist. When untouchability goes . . . .

DHARMADEV: But it will not go unless we break the barriers of caste.

BAPU: Why did I undertake this fast? only to do away with that feeling of high and low.

DHARMADEV Why don’t you say it plainly? You mix up the issues of heredity and actions.

BAPU: But I do proclaim myself an enemy of caste; I am a champion of the varnas.

DHARMADEV: But you do mix up [the issues of] heredity and actions. Why should we regard Harijans as Shudras? But you have said as much.

BAPU: Now I would not repeat that statement. Now I would only say that we may not regard him as Chandala.

DHARMADEV: Why don’t you clarify the sanatana dharma? Sanatana dharma is the eternal dharma.

BAPU: Sanatana dharma might contain the eternal dharma, but if the people would not accept this position how will it remain eternal? I subscribe to the Jain theory of anekantavada. I do not accept any one thing as admitting only one solution. Hence I call this dharma the true dharma. But I would not call it sanatana—as long as the world does not accept it.

DHARMADEV: Where did you find this interpretation?

BAPU: This is the historical interpretation. The historical interpretation of goghna\(^1\) is different from its actual meaning.

DHARMADEV: No. You are not clarifying your position to the sanatanists. You ought to tell them that sanatana dharma means the eternal dharma, the Vedic dharma; all that is opposed to it is adharma. “There is no dharma higher than the Veda.” You have said in one place that the Shastras should be acceptable both to the reason and to the heart. Nothing in the Vedas is contrary to reason.

BAPU: Say, there are two Shastris quarrelling over the interpretation of the word duhitri. One says that it means a daughter, the other says it means one who milks the cows. Both of them went far in the dispute and the judge ordered both of them to be sent to the gallows because one talks of one thing and the other talks of the same thing in a different sense. Similarly we cannot carry on a discussion by each of us offering a different interpretation of sanatana dharma. Therefore I say that you are making nonsense of sanatana dharma. They say there is a sanatana dharma to marry off a ten-year-old girl. Now if the people would not support such a thing, who would call it sanatana dharma? They say they have millions of men behind them, I say there are millions of men behind me. I emphatically say that I talk of nothing but the ancient dharma which I interpret as above. Someone said that I should declare myself an Arya Samajist. I said, “Why? Is it because people might stop agreeing with me?” Should I give up the Smritis, Itihasas, Puranas? I have a different interpretation of image-worship in which I believe. I even maintain that there is image-worship in Christianity and even Islam. According to my dharma I should preserve all that is worth preserving and reject all else. Hence I say that I don’t want a new name. The name Hindu dharma is enough for me. For me Hindu dharma is an unfathomable ocean. It includes many things. Therefore I call myself neither an Arya Samajist nor a Brahmo Samajist but only a Hindu.

DHARMADEV: In what sense do you believe in image-worship? Acharya Ramadev maintains that since the temple is a public place it should be open to all. However, we should try and persuade the priests to give up image-worship.

BAPU: Here I differ with you. I believe that those who have the darshan of the Lord in Kashi Vishwanath really see Him. My mother never took a meal without having darshan of the Lord in the temple. She used to tell me that she went there to become pure, to fulfil her dharma. I bow to her. I wondered what dharma I could teach this mother. All these things are imaginary and are sustained only by faith.

DHARMADEV: But would one agree to see bread in stone?

BAPU: Yes, if a man looked upon stone as bread and ate it he will no doubt have peace at the moment. Vishwamitra took the flesh after stealing it. He bathed and performed sandhya, and then threw it away. But did he not have peace when in the first instance he took it? I am a votary of truth, I am in quest of God, I find new gems daily which I go on distributing to others. The same thing is to be found in my recent statement about civil disobedience and untouchability. It may look incomprehensible because the science of satyagraha is new, people are not used to it.

DHARMADEV: Some say that you are promulgating a new Veda with the help of your Inner Voice.

BAPU: Let them say so! I believe there can be no new Veda. The Vedas are endless. Anybody’s utterance at the inspiration of the Lord within is nothing but Veda. What Mohammed has said could also be Vedic utterance. That is precisely why truth is Veda.

DHARMADEV: Veda is truth.
BAPU: All right, but Vedas mean pure knowledge and pure knowledge cannot be opposed to truth. If you come across a statement opposed to morality or truth you should say that it is an interpolation. Or if it is a Vedic statement you do not accept it.

DHARMADEV: Do you still find Satyarthaparakash a disappointing work?

BAPU: I have not yet said that I don’t. What should I do?

DHARMADEV: At the time when you said it you wanted to bring about Hindu-Muslim unity by any means. That is why you said so.

BAPU: That means I told a lie?

DHARMADEV: No. But the atmosphere had influenced you. I request you to please read the book again. I have read it many times and every time I read it I find something new in it.

BAPU: This I can accept. But at present where can I find the time to read? But I shall see.

INTERVIEW TO “THE HINDU” CORRESPONDENT

POONA,

January 14, 1933

“Asufficient unto the day is the evil thereof” cryptically remarked Mahatma Gandhi when your correspondent met him this afternoon in the shade of a mango tree in the jail compound and asked him what would be his attitude if the Government decided on some dilatory course of action to gain time and refused immediate sanction to Dr. Subbaroyan’s Bill.

The Mahatma’s general health, I was told, is fairly good. I learn that no specialist has yet been called in to examine his right elbow. He was signing numerous replies to letters, which Mr. Mahadeo Desai had prepared earlier in consultation with him. At one corner was sitting Gandhiji’s Madrasi typist.

Gandhiji said that he would await the Government of India’s decision. He stated that he had decided to express his views on the much discussed proposition to send round a committee to gauge opinion in respect of temple-entry.

Gandhiji wanted the lawyers to examine the legal issue and pronounce their opinions irrespective of the Government’s decision on the question of giving sanction to the Bill. If the Government decided against giving sanction to the Bill, he was sure matters would not be allowed to rest there. He would try to unsettle a settled question, in the same manner as he had done in the case of the Premier’s Award. He would enter into correspondence with the highest authority and would resist with his life, if necessary, what he considered to be a piece of injustice to a section of humanity.

Press”, 18-1-1933

*STATEMENT BY MADAN MOHAN MALAVIYA*¹

The object of the special session of the Sanatana Dharma Mahasabha is to focus and voice the most informed and most esteemable orthodox opinion on some questions, including those relating to the removal of untouchability and temple-entry which has been agitating the sanatanist world on one side, and those who are described as reformers on the other. I have been distressed to note differences between the two sides becoming acute, and it is evident that if these differences are unsolved, the Hindu community would be further divided and weakened. The differences are largely due to misunderstanding, and this, in its turn, is due to a great extent on imperfect knowledge of what the Shastras have laid down for our guidance in important matters in question. It should not be necessary to say that Mahatma Gandhi cannot desire to injure sanatana dharma. He has proved to the world that he is willing and determined to throw away even his life in the attempt to serve the country by removing disabilities under which the vast number of those who belong to it labour, so that they may enjoy the full benefit of being Hindus and remain contented and happy members of the community.

It is equally necessary to say that sanatanists who do not agree with Mahatma Gandhi’s proposals or methods are not wanting in sympathy with the depressed classes. This being so, I am confident that it is possible to arrive at a solution of the problem in conformity with the Shastras which should be acceptable to both sections of sanatanist opinion—more advanced and less advanced—and which should establish peace and religious unity among the Hindu community on a basis that will endure.

From statements recently made by Mahatma Gandhi, it is clear that he is not only willing, but anxious to show every respect for the orthodox opinion.

From utterances of several esteemed exponents of sanatana dharma, it is also clear that they are willing to move forward to bring about an understanding which will be consistent with the Shastras. This being so, I believe that, by dispassionate consideration of the Shastras by those who claim to expound them, it will be generally conceded, rules of action can be laid down which would secure the most liberal and practicable advance for the humblest Hindu and satisfaction to the most orthodox conservative opinion which is willing to act in conformity not merely with the letter, but also with the spirit of the Shastras. I have convened the Mahasabha with the conviction that such a unity can be brought about among the sanatanist Hindus and appeal to all of them to make such contribution to the success of this effort as lies in their power.

To prevent misunderstanding, I wish to make the position clear. Speaking in 1923 as the President of the Hindu Mahasabha of Holy Kashi in the presence of great gathering of learned and pious men, I pleaded that opportunity should be afforded even to the humblest Hindu to have a purifying and ennobling darshan of the deity whom we adore in our temples and offer his prayer to Him. I urged that this may be done in conformity with rules which may be laid down in that behalf and further urged that other disabilities from which the depressed classes suffered should be removed. I still hold the same opinion and have publicly repeated it many times during the last few years and last few months, but have never been able to approve of recourse to satyagraha with the object of getting the temple opened to the depressed classes. I do not think it right that this kind of pressure should be exerted in a matter where religious convictions and practices come into play. Those who adhere to the orthodox view have also got their convictions which are deep-seated and come down through the ages. I believe that it is the sacred duty of those of us who differ from them to do our best to bring about a change of those convictions. But by the very nature of the case, this duty demands that we should attempt it by resort to peaceful persuasion only.

This was laid down in a resolution which was passed by the Bombay public meeting held immediately after the Poona Pact over which I presided, and at which, the All-India Anti-untouchability League was established for the purpose of carrying on propaganda against untouchability. That resolution stated that “for this purpose steps should immediately be taken to secure as early as possible that (a) all public wells, schools, roads, sarais, dharmashalas, crematoriums, burning-ghats, etc., should be declared open to the depressed classes and (b) all public temples should be open to members of the depressed classes provided that for carrying out (a) and (b) no force or compulsion be used but resort shall be had only to peaceful persuasion.” It is both just and expedient that the solution of such a question should be one that would satisfy the community as a whole. In my opinion, such a solution can be reached only by the method of argument and persuasion with the help of those scholars who are versed in the Shastras and who desire the good of every section of the community. It is to bring about such an agreement and solution that I have invited the special session of the Sanatana Dharma Mahasabha, and I am hoping and praying too that God will bless the attempt and crown it with success.

Towards this end, I intend to place the following concrete proposal before the Mahasabha, that for the uplift of the depressed classes, the following plan may be adopted:-

1 (a) Samskar and updesh—initiation and instruction—known as diksha. This will consist (a) of prayashchittam—penance and purification;
(b) tyag—giving up carrion and beef, leavings of dishes (uchchhishta), wine;
(c) diksha—receiving mantram, either ashtakshar mantram (with or without wearing tulsi bead); panchakshar mantram (with or without wearing rudraksha bead);
(d) Achara grahana—daily bath and daily prayer (morning and evening), daily reading of the sacred book (teaching every man, woman and child to read and write will be an integral part of the scheme);
(e) vrata—vows—observing five necessary vows which are prescribed for all castes, ahimsa, satya, asteya, shaucham and indriyanigraha, (hurtlessness, truth, non-stealing, purity of body and mind, and control of senses);

2 (a) freedom to join public meetings and public schools;
(b) use of public wells, roads, parks, sarais, dharmashalas, burning-ghats, etc.; and
(c) entry into public temples for devadarshana and stuti.

NOTES. If the scheme is approved, the giving of diksha should be completed within a month. The carrying out of this scheme will mean a great social, religious and spiritual uplift of the classes. It will mean making them Harijans in the full sense of the term. This will be only one of the proposals to be placed before the gathering of Acharyas and learned men. There will be many proposals before them for their consideration. There is every hope that with God’s grace result of deliberations will be one which will be welcomed with joy by all followers of sanatana dharma and all well-wishers of humanity.

TALK WITH M. G. BHANDARI

The Superintendent read the statement. When Gandhiji woke up he said, “What do you propose to do now? Let me know so that I may inform the Government. . . . But it would be better if you do not go on a fast now.”

BAPU: There is no Inner Voice urging me to go on a fast forthwith. It would be regarded as an arbitrary action if I went on a fast now. I am perturbed at the Viceroy’s decision, no doubt, but it is likely that my perturbation might be only temporary. A fast might be in the offing but not now. If it comes up in its natural course let it. I cannot say when it will come. I shall have to go on a fast only if I feel helpless—as I had been at the time of the Award when I resorted to a fast. You can inform the Government that it is not my intention to go on a fast in the immediate future. You have already seen my statement. I have nothing in my heart over and above this statement. Today I woke at 3 in the morning, and my mind was absolutely clear about what I had to write. The beautiful Chitra star was shining above.

TALK WITH DUNCAN GREENLEES

BAPU: Whatever the non-Hindus might do is not likely to touch the core of this injustice because the Harijans are still clinging to Hinduism. I know how much they are inter-twined with Hinduism. That is why I had poured out my heart in my speech at the Round Table Conference. In India the villages are mostly populated by Hindus. All the untouchables say that they are Hindus. Quite a few do not even feel the injustice. They are in such a miserable plight that the thought of renouncing their faith would not occur to them. But I shall not be surprised if some day they set out to kill the Savarnas.

G. Would they be suffering from inferiority complex?

1 Vide “Letter to Abegum Mohammad Alam”, 23-1-1933
2 Vide “Letter to Viriyala Venkata Rao”, 25-1-1933
BAPU: No, worse. In the case of inferiority complex there is the consciousness of injustice being done. But these people are not even aware of it. That is why I say that if a non-Hindu happens to be interested in this movement he should be prompted only by compassion. If a non-Hindu wants to help, he should associate himself with a Hindu organization before doing so.

G: I have been to the temples of South India.

BAPU: I want to stop this parody of Hinduism. I want pure gold. There will be political consequences of this activity, but I don’t at all think of political consequences. I would engage myself in this activity even if there were to be no political consequences, I don’t care for them. I want to bring about spiritual results and for that I am willing to sacrifice thousands of lives including mine. This is a great injustice being done to a large section of the community. To remove it we ought to work with a sense of atonement. One should work with the feeling that one has committed an injustice and one must remove it oneself. I don’t want a Gengiz Khan to descend upon us and threaten to cut the throats of the obstinate Savarnas and bring about this reform.

DISCUSSION WITH C. RAJAGOPALACHARI AND OTHERS

January 30, 1933

Today Rajaji, Devdas and Ghanshyamdas arrived and discussed the situation arising from the Viceregal sanction to Ranga Iyer’s Bill. Bapu explained that the whole question was religious and had nothing to do with politics.

My position is wholly religious. I cannot look at this thing from a political viewpoint. I must have the Bill withdrawn if people are really opposed to it. Then someone will tell me with the promptness of an arrow what I should do. We certainly do not wish to enter temples stealthily. Temple-entry is definitely a spiritual act and it must bring about a revolution in society. This whole idea of my fast is based on the belief that a large section of the people favour temple-entry, but they do not voice it. If people are on our side but the law is not, we can ask the trustees to break the law and to put up with it if someone were to bring an action against them under this law.

Bapu then stated that they should obtain a clear referendum in this regard. But Bapu thought that even if it were to take three months the work must be accomplished in the area chosen.

Birla: In that case the best referendum is that there should be fresh elections to the Legislature on this issue.

Bapu: We would easily win them. But that will not give us the ratio of the temple-going Hindus’ vote.

... Acharya invites us to go to the Varnashrama Swarajya Sangh. He is involved in it. And if we want to do so, we can, by capturing the Sangh and defeating him as it happened in 1921 when the Hindu Mahasabha was captured. But whatever it is, it is intolerable that the Bill should hang fire for two years simply because it was being circulated among the members.

Rajaji: Why should we object to it if the delay was due to the circulation of the Bill among the members?

Bapu: Because we know it is only an excuse and it is dishonest. If as a result of the referendum public opinion suddenly sways in favour of the Bill I would press for its early passage. . . .

Then they discussed the subject of Harijan Sevak. Rajaji’s objections were: (1) our journal will be read only by our own people whereas at present your statements are published in all the newspapers. (2) The journal might prove useless.

Bapu: It is very necessary for training our workers and also for tying up all loose ends. There are so many things which cannot be conveyed through A.P.I. In fact I wonder why you did not feel the necessity of a journal till now.

For conducting the referendum Birla suggested having pandits instead of laymen but added few men of character could be found among them.

Bapu: Then they are not needed. Character means clinging steadfast to one’s beliefs. The beliefs of a man who changes them for a higher fee have no worth. I would of course choose to have a sincere pandit, but I would prefer a layman to a pandit who lacks character.

January 31, 1933

Vallabhbhai had a heated discussion continuing from the previous evening about a referendum and about utilizing Rajaji in upper India for this purpose. . . . [He argued] that a referendum as such could be of no use unless we have our further aims clarified.

Bapu: My doubt increases whether the people are firmly behind us.

Vallabhbhai: We never had the opportunity to show it. . . .

Yesterday Bapu had said to Rajaji that he would be able to advise him in this matter to a certain limit only.
RAJAJI: Since you have started this movement we must work for it. . . . But if the movement would work only if I were out of it I would prefer to quit.

BAPU: If you independently and dispassionately feel that you alone would be my representative in this movement you should regard this as a clear call to work for the movement and ought to continue the work without caring for public criticism. But I always recite the verse: “Whoever, leaving secure things etc.”1 to those who have the slightest doubt in their minds and tell them that they ought to give the benefit of the doubt to their initial pledge of civil disobedience. But if you feel you have a clear call, and it seems you do, you must do Harijan work.

RAJAJI: Is the fast yet impending?

BAPU: Yes, it is unavoidable. Looking at the happenings around I think the sooner it comes the better. I have heard about a case at Kanpur. Three Harijan candidates contested the Municipal Corporation election. The other party sponsored none but three Harijan candidates to oppose them. With the result that no Harijan was elected. This has deeply hurt me. I had girded up my loins against having reserved constituencies. But now I think that had I been in Ambedkar’s place I would have opposed it much more violently. In this Kanpur case they prevented the Harijans from winning only to safeguard their own interest. The people should have only seen to it that three Harijan candidates win the election either for their own party or for the opposition. This case is a clear violation of the Poona Pact. I wrote to Hariji (Pandit Hriday Nath Kunzru).

He attempted to explain it with cool unconcern and informed me that he would further investigate it. But I want no such investigation. I have already told him to set right this injustice.

Birla and the others told Bapu that the Kanpur case was only an exception. The Hindu society was undergoing a speedy change for the better.

BAPU: I do know it. Such instances should not precipitate the fast. But such incidents do upset me. I am however consciously striving to postpone the ordeal of fast.

BIRLA: But once these Bills are passed wouldn’t there be an end to this question of the fast?

BAPU: No, my friend, not at all. The fast does not depend solely on the Bills. The question before me is not merely that of temple-entry but the whole question [of untouchability]. Day after day I feel more and more that the likelihood of my fast is not diminishing but growing. I cannot say why it is so. I do not even know what will

1 The verse runs as follows: “Whoever, leaving secure things runs after insecure ones loses the former, the latter being as good as lost.”
precipitate it but this feeling is slowly but certainly growing. I know this much that I am not at all at ease. All these incidents taken as a whole fail to make a good impression on me. True, some good things are also happening. I cannot shut my eyes to them. On the contrary, I try to close my eyes to unfavourable things. For instance look at this nasty correspondence I am carrying on with these religious teachers and legal pandits.

BIRLA: But you should be content with the speed at which the reform is proceeding.

BAPU: Yes, those who have patience will be content. But it does not at all comfort my heart. I know our workers have plunged into activity, there is no lethargy in them. But looking at the whole thing there is hardly anything that can satisfy my heart.

RAJAJI: . . . To cut a long story short I may say that you have grown impatient.

BAPU: I know, as a practical man I must hold my patience. There is no reason to be impatient. Let me assure you that I entertain no such feeling. I had taken no time to come to the decision before January 2 that I should not go on fast. And let me inform you that some of my co-workers are sore because I didn’t begin my fast on January 2. Only a few days ago a friend argued that no reasons had come up to postpone the fast which had already been decided upon.

RAJAJI: You have pampered all these co-workers. (Loud laughter)

BAPU: That is all right. But there are others too who have condemned this postponement and they are not at all known to me. One gentleman even went on an eleven-day fast protesting against me. I sent him a severe wire telling him that his fast was a sin and nothing less; only then did he give it up. Hence as far as this question goes please believe me that I am struggling within myself. Yet I cannot say to you that there will be no fast. When I say this my friends in England do not get angry with me. Whenever they have a doubt in their mind they try to believe that there must be God’s hand behind. Andrews had written to me several times expressing his doubts. Afterwards he wired to me cancelling all his letters and assured me that he had then understood the whole thing correctly.

Alluding to people’s superstitions, Rajaji said: Some people really believe that hitherto Gandhiji used to bring the rains but now he is committing an act owing to which the rains may fail.

BAPU: You are talking about the ignorant people. But I have heaps of letters from people with B.A. and B.L. degrees, which are full of anger, bitterness, venom and abuses, besides superstition.

RAJAJI: This looks like a misalliance between legal expertise and a low class master. (Laughter)
BAPU: My present feeling is that the possibility of the fast is not very far away.

How can I say when the fast will come up? When I started my fast in Bombay in 1921, I abruptly woke up Mathuradas who was sleeping by my side and told him: ‘Don’t argue with me, this is my resolution.’ The same was the case with my 21-day fast—Hakimji, Mohammed Ali all were dazed. But will anyone on that account say that the fast was wrong? I for one think that the fast did achieve its object then, it will prove useful even after 5000 years.

Mathuradas then asked what a worker should do who felt bound to offer civil disobedience but was tired.

BAPU: It is difficult to tell. But why shouldn’t such a person do Harijan work? Of course there will be one condition, that he must declare that he is tired and that therefore instead of going to jail he wants to do Harijan work. He cannot do Harijan work by concealing this fact. Rather than doing Harijan work while concealing the truth he had better sit at home doing nothing. There is courage in humbly confessing the truth. Those who want to rest should declare it and say that they want to improve their health and till then they will do Harijan work. The point is that one should not practise deceit. Deceit will benefit neither Congress work, nor the work of civil disobedience nor untouchability work.

LETTER FROM GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

[Before February 17, 1933]

The Governor-General-in-Council has carefully considered the points urged by Mr. Gandhi in his letter of the 1st February 1933, addressed to the Private Secretary to the Viceroy, in which he requests that, for the reasons stated therein, the Government of India should facilitate the progress and passage of the Bills regarding temple-entry, which will be introduced in the Assembly by Mr. Ranga Iyer and others. He is unable to accept the arguments developed by Mr. Gandhi relating to the Poona Pact, and notes that the Resolution he has quoted did not form part of the Pact as communicated to the Government of India. In the matter of the Pact, Government

1 This was received on February 17. Vide “Letter to C. F. Andrews”, 1-2-1933, “Letter to C. F. Andrews”, 17-2-1933 and “Letter to Home Secretary, Government of India”, 19-2-1933 were concerned merely to accept a modification of the representation in the Legislatures which had been provided in the Communal Award by His Majesty’s Government. But quite apart from the Pact, the Government for many years have taken an active interest in the improvement of the conditions under which the depressed classes live. That interest has been directed to the matters referred to in the Resolution which he quotes, such as education and the provision of the normal facilities of life, which were placed in the forefront of the Resolution but appear not to be regarded by him as the vital part of it. The Government have naturally taken no initiative in matters which specifically affect religious practice. In regard to that, they have nothing to add to the statement issued to the Press on 23rd January. They must reiterate that in their opinion it is essential that the consideration of a measure, which so closely affects the religious customs and usages of the Hindu community, should not proceed unless the proposals are subjected to the fullest examination in all their aspects, not merely in the Legislatures, but also outside it, by all who will be affected by them. This purpose can only be satisfied if the Bill is circulated in the widest manner for the purpose of eliciting public opinion, and if adequate time is given to enable all classes of Hindus to form and express their considered views.

DISCUSSION WITH B. R. AMBEDKAR

February 4, 1933

Discussing the propriety or otherwise of Ranga Iyer’s two Bills [Ambedkar] said: The one-paragraph Bill is a very simple one. Its fair point lies in admitting that this custom is immoral. There is no such admission in the second Bill.

BAPU: No, it is there in its preamble.

A. But it is not clear. . . . I also think that the two Bills do not go together. . .

BAPU: The one-paragraph Bill is certainly superior to the other. But the other lengthier Bill was brought forward because the first one could not be introduced in the Provincial Legislature. There is no contradiction in the two Bills. In one Bill untouchability ceases to be a disability and the law refuses to accept the argument based on untouchability. As a result of the second Bill, temple authorities are obliged to take steps under certain circumstances. If we can get both the Bills passed the trustees will not be able to put up any kind of obstacle. I take it upon myself to have all the temples opened within one month if we could get both the Bills passed. The sanatanists would prefer the second Bill. But speaking as a sincere sanatanist I would prefer the first Bill.

1 Vide “Dr. Ambedkar and Caste”, 7-2-1933

A. . . . Now the Government will have to issue orders against the sanatanists under Section 144 because they would be regarded as interfering with untouchables’ rights.

BAPU: However, I want you now to emphatically proclaim your ideas in very clear words.

A. . . . As far as we are concerned we have no immediate concern other than securing political power . . . and that alone is the solution of our problem.

. . . We want our social status raised in the eyes of the savarna Hindus.

There is another point of view also. The object of this effort could be that you want the depressed classes to be retained in the Hindu religion, in which case I am inclined to believe that it is not sufficient in the present awakened state of the depressed classes. . . . If I call myself a Hindu I am obliged to accept that by birth I belong to a low caste. Hence I think I must ask the Hindus to show me some sacred authority which would rule out this feeling of lowliness. If it cannot be I should say goodbye to Hinduism. . . . I am not going to be satisfied with measures which would merely bring some relief. . . . I don’t want to be crushed by your charity.

BAPU: I have nothing to say if you have come with a final decision that you are not going to move your little finger to have this Bill passed.

A. We have not made any decision. However, I have shown you how my mind is working.

BAPU: I told you that I could have nothing to say if you have already taken a decision.

A. We cannot ask the savarna Hindus to decide for themselves whether or not we are a part of them. You ought to demonstrate your determination by getting these Bills passed. . . .

BAPU: I am not asking you to do anything. I never wanted the depressed people to go on their knees to the savarna Hindus and ask them to get these Bills passed. Unfortunately, the solution of this problem is in the hands of a third power which is in a position to mend or worsen the situation.

A. I can set right the thing.

BAPU: That is right. Of course I agree with you that it does not behove your dignity to approach the Hindus. I take the position—you might remember since I made the speech at the Round Table Conference—that we should atone for this. If you repudiate us and go away I would think that we only deserved it.

A. The Bill mentions temple-entry but it makes no mention of entry into the sanctum sanctorum. Will they let a member of the depressed community place flowers on the idol, or will they let him offer a tray containing oblations? Malaviyaji has already declared that question of offering puja does not arise.

BAPU: Temple-entry is meant for puja if anything. But if the language of the Bill is not right it can be amended and we can say 'entry for the purpose of puja'. It seems there has been some misunderstanding somewhere in the case of Malaviyaji. He would not say what you attribute to him. Flowers, sweets or any other offerings from Harijans will surely be accepted. So we two agree on this point that there is no question of your imploring the savarna Hindus. When some savarna Hindus tell me that Harijans do not want to enter the temples I ask them to throw open the temple doors for the Harijans whether or not they wish to come in. They ought to have the satisfaction that they have done their duty. They ought to discharge the debt which they owe whether the creditor keeps it or throws it into the gutter. But I must say that you ought not to say that you are not a Hindu. In accepting the Poona Pact you accept the position that you are Hindus.

A. I have accepted only the political aspect of it.

BAPU: You cannot escape the situation that you are Hindus in spite of your statement to the contrary.

A. We ask of you that our silence should not be misconstrued. After that I accept your point.

BAPU: I go one step further. You will not be able to go ahead a single step unless you maintain your position absolutely correct. I regard temple-entry as a spiritual matter through which everything else will bear fruit.

A. The Hindu mind does not work in a rational way. They have no objection to the untouchables touching them on the railway and other public places. Why do they object to it only in the case of temples?

BAPU: We are well caught on this point. I take up the question of temple-entry first of all because these people want to cling to untouchability in the temples. Many sanatanist Hindus say that they would admit Harijans in schools and public places but not in temples. I ask them to grant the Harijans equal status before God. It will raise their status.

A. Supposing we are lucky in the case of temple-entry, will they let us fetch water from the wells?

BAPU: Sure. This is bound to follow it. And it is also very easy.

[From Gujarati]

Mahadevbhaini Diary, Vol. III, pp. 117-22
Like Angada and Krishna who had gone with the message of truce, we approach these legislators and the Government. Justice can be demanded from any source and that, too, forcefully. We fail in dharma if we do not demand justice. What does the pledge taken at Bombay imply? [It implies that] as far as possible we will abolish untouchability by law before the attainment of swaraj. We do not want to accomplish anything by force. I do not want to achieve it by undertaking a fast—God will make me undertake one [sooner or later]—for it is likely that I might be deluded into describing it as inspired by God. Kelappan had said to me that the temple would be thrown open within a couple of days. Yet I told him that though it might help throw open the temple immediately how could we continue a fast that was initiated on unjust grounds.

Now remains the question of the law. I for one want no laws. I am an anarchist. But I want to act within the limits of the law. In this case we want a law enacted in order to undo another. At present the decision of the law-courts has become as good as the shruti (Revelation) and the Government is the God who reveals it. Therefore we ask the Government to repeal it. Let us take the first Bill. The Invisible Power will punish breach of a religious commandment, a ruler does not have this authority. The wholly Hindu State might acquire this authority. But in the present case it is the Government which inflicts punishment for breach of a religious injunction. This is gross injustice. We must have it removed and thus follow our dharma. How long can we keep it pending? Whether it is a mixed legislature or even a Muslim Government, we should have it passed by them. Today we cannot follow our dharma. Even where the trustees are willing to throw open the temple the law forbids them from doing so. Now have I any other course open? Hence the Bill. With the passage of this Bill no one believing in untouchability will be compelled to give it up. I am this day prepared to give in writing that unless the sanatanists are willing to throw open the temples they will not be forced to do so.

By fighting we can get justice even from anti-national Government— rather it becomes our dharma. Malaviyaji is a Yudhishthira. He is always in doubt. In his perpetual anxiety to follow the dictates of dharma, he often fails to follow it at all. Vyasa had such wonderful power. He depicts Yudhishthira as a rather weak person; yet he is Dharmaraja. In the same sense Malaviyaji also is a Dharmaraja. We can never give him up. He has boundless love for me and whenever he loses in an argument he thinks that there must be some truth in what I say.

APPENDIX XIII

_B. R. AMBEDKAR’S STATEMENT_

Although the controversy regarding the question of temple-entry is confined to the sanatanists and Mahatma Gandhi, the Depressed Classes have undoubtedly a very important part to play in it, in so far as their position is bound to weigh the scale one way or the other, when the issue comes for a final settlement. It is, therefore, necessary that their viewpoint should be defined and stated so as to leave no ambiguity about it.

To the Temple-entry Bill of Mr. Ranga Iyer as now drafted, the Depressed Classes cannot possibly give their support. The principle of the Bill is that if a majority of municipal and local board voters in the vicinity of any particular temple on a referendum decide by a majority that the Depressed Classes shall be allowed to enter the temple, the trustees or the manager of the temple shall give effect to that decision. The principle is an ordinary principle of majority rule, and there is nothing

1 Vide “Interview to Associated Press”, 14-2-1933 and “Letter to C. Rajagopalachari”, 22-2-1933 radical or revolutionary about the Bill, and if the sanatanists were a wise lot they would accept it without demur.

The reasons why the Depressed Classes cannot support a Bill based upon this principle are two. One reason is that the Bill cannot hasten the day of temple-entry for the Depressed Classes any nearer than otherwise would be the case. It is true that under the Bill, the minority will not have the right to obtain an injunction against the trustee, or the manager who throws open the temple to the Depressed Classes in accordance with the decision of the majority. But before one can draw any satisfaction from this clause and congratulate the author of the Bill, one must first of all feel assured that when the question is put to the vote, there will be a majority in favour of templeentry. If one is not suffering from illusions of any kind, one must accept that the hope of a majority voting in favour of temple-entry will be very rarely realized if at all. Without doubt, the majority is definitely opposed today—a fact which is conceded by the author of the Bill himself in his correspondence with the Shankaracharya.

What is there in the situation as created after the passing of the Bill, which can lead one to hope that the majority will act differently? I find nothing. I shall, no doubt, be reminded of the results of the referendum with regard to the Guruvayur Temple. But I refuse to accept a referendum, so overweighted as it was by the life of Mahatma Gandhi, as the normal result. In any such calculations, the life of the Mahatma must necessarily be deducted.

If Hindu religion is to be a religion of social equality, then an amendment of its code to provide temple-entry is not enough. What is required is to purge it of the doctrine of chaturvarnya.

APPENDIX XIV

LETTER FROM JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

DEHRA DUN JAIL, January 5, 1933

MY DEAR BAPU,

Your letter is always a tonic, and when it comes after a long interval, it brings a thrill with it and its effect is all the more exhilarating. I recognized Mahadev’s handwriting on the envelope. Yours did not seem as of old. Perhaps your left hand was functioning and I am not so familiar with it.

1 Vide “Letter to Jawaharlal Nehru”, 15-2-1933
I am following of course with great interest your campaign against untouchability, as far as I can from The statesman and the Pioneer. Anything that you may do is bound to interest and fascinate. The subject itself has tremendous possibilities. Not being a man of religion, my interest is largely confined to the social aspect and to the wider issues involved.

Of course Sarup should do untouchability work if she feels like it. My suggestion about a short holiday in Ceylon was made chiefly in the interest of Krishna. I am a little worried about her. After a year in prison, with our home practically broken up, she feels rather at a loose end and does not know what to do. Ever since her childhood the poor girl has been deprived of real home life and proper education because of our preoccupations and repeated visits to prison. She grew up a rather lonely girl not having as much friendship and sympathy as she was entitled to.

Father’s death shook her up a great deal. I tried to soothe her and win her confidence and I am glad to say that I succeeded to some extent. But 1931 was for all of us a year full of work and worry and anxiety. Then came a long spell of prison for her, and for a young girl this was a far greater ordeal than it could be for most of us. As her release drew near I sensed how she must be feeling and how life in Anand Bhawan as it is today would be no joy to her. She would feel out of joint. She would want to do something and yet not know what to do, and this would rob her of peace of mind. I was myself not clear what to suggest to her. Latterly she has begun to look upon me almost as a kind of refuge in a friendless world. If I had been out I might have been of help to her but I could do little from Dehra Dun Jail.

I felt that a short holiday in neutral surroundings would ease her mind and remove the tension. Hence my proposal about Ceylon. Three weeks in Ceylon would not have solved any problem but she would have freshened up and returned with a brighter outlook on life. These were my reasons. I was thinking more of mental health than of physical health. But the proposal seems to have fallen through as nobody seems to be keen on it. In the present, therefore, Ceylon is off.

Perhaps Krishna will go to Poona to see you and you might be able to advise her about her work. I might see her also. It is easy enough to suggest odd bits of work but this must appeal to the person concerned.

As for my interviews, it is now nearly seven months since I had one. I have missed them greatly but the U. P. Govt. had been very discourteous to Mother and Kamala and I felt that I had no alternative; besides I have not yet got rid of my obstinacy—a hereditary failing in me of which you cannot be unaware. The Government made some partial amends and the Home Member, the Nawab of Chhatari, came and expressed his concern. All this was more or less beside the point and the graceful thing and the right thing was not done, but then the right thing is seldom done. I wrote again to Government. Still I decided in my mind that should special necessity arise I would withdraw my prohibition and consent to an interview. So matters have stood for the last few weeks. I did not suggest an early interview as there was some talk of my transfer back to Naini Prison.

Now that you have also written about it, what can I do but immediately to capitulate to you? So henceforth, and unless something untoward intervenes, I shall take my usual interviews. Kamala may not be able to see me for several weeks still. She [is] in Calcutta under Bidhan’s treatment. But I shall see Mother and Indu and Sarup and Krishna or such of them as can find me.

The stopping of interviews has made me retire a little more into myself. But I have had pleasing and a friendly neighbour—the Himalayas. The sight of their outline against the sky, and now their summits and sides covered with fresh snow, have meant a great deal to me. They seem to rouse in me ancient memories of the long ago when perhaps my ancestors wandered about the mountains of Kashmir and played in their snow and glaciers. I have had companions here but largely I have been left to myself, and I have grown a little contemplative, in defiance of heredity and family tradition and personal habit! But that is a thin veneer which I am afraid will rub off at little provocation. How can the Ethiopian change his skin?

I have read a lot, and if wisdom could be had in books I would be wise. But wisdom eludes me, and big question-marks confront me wherever I look. Sometimes I think of Prince Siddhartha’s old question and no answer comes:

How can it be that Brahma
Would make a world and keep it miserable,
Since, if all-powerful He leaves it so,
He is not good, and if not powerful,
He is not God?

From all accounts in the papers you are as ever the slave of industry and are over-working yourself even in prison. The new industrial system of the West is often criticized and blamed because it makes man a machine for ceaseless work and robs him of all leisure. You are supposed to be no lover of this system. And yet, you seem to personify to me often this very industrial system!

I am intrigued at your remark that eye-witnesses have told you that I am keeping fit. The information is correct but who could these eye-witnesses be who have managed to reach you? I have had no interviews for a long while and, except for a colleague who was discharged a month ago, I can think of no other likely recent eye-witness. It is true that I am poorer by four teeth. I have sacrificed them at the altar of modern science to appease the goddess of physical health.

This is a long letter for gaol. But this I am writing to you after over a year and I have not seen you for over sixteen months. My last glimpse of you was when you were sailing away to the far West and your figure grew smaller and smaller as the ship bore you away and left us, feeling rather lonely and forlorn, on the pier.

With my love to all the happy family of yours in Yeravda.

Yours affectionately,
J.

APPENDIX XV

TALK WITH MATHURADAS

February 18, 1933

[BAPU]: It is true that according to the Vedas the Shudras have no privileges; mainly they speak of only three varnas. However, the Vedas which are available to us are not the only ones. Of the thousands of books only a few have come down to us. There is religion as well as history in the Vedas. And history is not religion. The part dealing with religion is timeless and eternal whereas the one dealing with history describes the circumstances then prevailing. Who knows how long I have to live? But if I had no other task to demand my attention, I would certainly wish to take up the work of varnashramadharma. But the establishment of varnadharma needs the foundation of ashramadharma without which the whole structure would necessarily be weak. There is contentment at the root of varnashramadharma. It implies willing acceptance of one’s dharma and karma. Therefore varnashramadharma is a divine way of life whereas all the others are demoniac ones. Varnashramadharma has nobility as its predominant quality whereas the others are dominated by calculated selfishness.

Once this law is understood many other things will follow. If we know how to drink water but do not know the science behind it, then it is of no use. If we know the various forms of water such as snow, vapour and hydro-electricity, then we can be said to have understood the science of water. Similar is the case with varnashrama. This is a principle applicable in all cases.

[M.D.]: In other words, as Muslims claim that Islam means peace, and that it is the universal law meant for the whole world, you say that varnashramadharma is the universal law.

BAPU: Yes, it is in the same sense. Every religion has some eternal principles and the followers of a particular religion follow their dharma in that measure. The rest of their religion is related to the circumstances of time and place.

I would give up varnashramadharma this very day, were it not connected with birth. What would otherwise be left in it? I would maintain that the correct thing would be that the son of a carpenter should be a carpenter and not a blacksmith. If as a result there are to be hundreds of castes, let there be. So long as there is inter-dining and intermarrying among them let there be any number of castes. The restrictions about dining and marriage have turned the whole thing into a wretched affair.

I would certainly say that Dronacharya had fallen from dharma. What I mean is not that a member of one varna may never follow the profession of another varna, but that it is not proper. This varnashramadharma as I propound it is for everybody to follow not blindly but after due deliberation. Like Hindus, Muslims also may follow it. It was in this sense that I described it as ‘Hinduism’s greatest gift to mankind’. With the observance of this dharma the entire community will be saved and it will become invincible.

THE CLEANSER

(A free rendering, from the Bengal; of Satyendranath Datta’s “Scavenger”)

Why do they shun your touch, my friend, and call you unclean?
Whom cleanliness follows at every step, making the earth and air sweet for our dwelling, and ever luring us back from return to the wild?

You help us, like a mother her child, into freshness, and uphold the truth, that disgust is never for man.

The holy stream of your ministry carries pollution’s away and ever remains pure.

Once Lord Siva had saved the world from a deluge of poison by taking it himself.

And you save it every day from filth with the same divine sufferance.

Come friend, come my hero, give us courage to serve man, even while bearing the brand of infamy from him.

1. LETTER TO K. S. RAMABHADRA AYYAR
March 10, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter of 22nd ultimo. I do not encourage your advances because your letters create no favourable impression on me. They seem to be unbalanced and if what you write creates a bad impression on me your visit is not likely to improve matters, hence I do not like the idea of your wasting your money in travelling here and then wasting your time and mine. I assure you that I have not a single minute to spare.

2. LETTER TO SURENDRABA MOHAN BHATTACHARYA
March 10, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter for which I thank you.

You remind me of slave-owners of old who used to recount their services to their slaves in that they gave them food and shelter somewhat after the style in which they gave both to their cattle, only the treatment of the slaves was in many respects worse than that of their cattle and in no respect better, and it is quite evident to me that you do not even take the trouble of knowing what educated and religiously-minded Hindus have done and are doing for Harijans whom they do not consider in any shape or form lower than themselves but regard them as their own kith and kin.

I am sorry that being preoccupied I have not been able to reach your letter of the 10th February earlier than now. Even if I had reached your letter earlier I could not have sent you anything, but you are at liberty to copy anything you like from my writings in the Harijan.

March 10, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have not been able to deal with your letter of 23rd February earlier. Please excuse me.

I think that you are quite right in your contention that if the Untouchability Abolition Bill is passed, Temple-entry Bill is unnecessary. If you can therefore get the Abolition Bill passed in the Mysore Assembly, it would be unnecessary to press for the passage of the Temple-entry Bill so far as Mysore is concerned. But you will see to it that the interpretation of the Abolition Bill is accepted by the sanatanists. If that is achieved the rest may be left to the ripening of public opinion.

5. LETTER TO E. LINDSAY

March 10, 1933

DEAR SISTER,

I was delighted to have your letter and to have the beautiful anecdote about the social worker. I have just glanced through the lines you have sent me. Did I never tell you that I was very stupid at judging poetry? I shall therefore need to read your lines half a dozen times before their beauty and message will dawn upon me. Mahadev is a poet and he has no difficulty about making up his mind when he sees a piece of beautiful poetry. I shall therefore seek his assistance. He is doing his work only within a few feet of me, but we are so immersed in our tasks that we have hardly time to talk about so many common things and interests apart from the task in front of us.

8. LETTER TO USHAKANTA Mukhopadhya

March 10, 1933

Dear Friend,

I thank you for your interesting letter which I have read carefully. There is no difficulty about understanding your letter. The prescription that you have suggested is being followed in all the parts of the country. Sanskrit literature has been translated in the vernaculars and is accessible to even the illiterate masses.

As far as the law is concerned, there is no question of compelling anybody to regard any other as untouchable. The object of the Bill is to withdraw the sanction of the law to a custom which cannot be defended by any ordinary rule of morality. The law is simply meant to give the reformer the scope of bringing the message to those who will listen to it.

send anything you wish to write for the Harijan. I would love to have fresh and suitable ideas.

In your report I see you say that the Kali Temple was opened. I have heard reports to the contrary, namely, that the Kali Temple was always open to Harijans in a way and that even now it is open only in a way. You will therefore please enquire about this and let me know. I have had reports from other places also about the opening of temples and then the information was challenged.

March 10, 1933

MY DEAR LEONARD,

I have another charming letter from you. Your letters are always inside the line. Verrier is quite free from malaria now and his work seems to be steadily going forward. I suppose you know all about his intended marriage with Mary Gillett and their joint decision afterwards not to marry each other but for each to be married to the service to which they have dedicated their lives. It must have been a very bitter cup for them to drink, but they have drunk it courageously. I have not been able quite to follow the latest developments arising out of the Oxford Union resolution on the Pacifism debate.1

MY DEAR MARGARETE,

I receive your letters regularly and I have now your notes from your pupils’ papers. They make very interesting reading. What worries me is the time you have spent over the translation and copying. Is it not stealing time from your pupils? I hope you have had my letters that I have been sending you not quite every week but fairly regularly. I hope you are now satisfied that the work you may be doing there is also my work inasmuch as you are observing the rules of the Ashram and doing your work purely from a spirit of service, and I have no doubt that so long as your mother lives your duty is to be by her side.

Mahadev has all your letters. You don’t expect him to reply to all of them. Do you? He can write but once a month, but he will deal with your letters as soon as he is released in a couple of months.3

March 10, 1933

If the Hindus of Bhavnagar pass a resolution by an overwhelming majority asserting that there are no classes among Hindus who are descendants of the original Shudras or who should be regarded as untouchable, I would see no moral objection to the admission of Antyajas despite the particular clause in the agreement being against their being admitted. For, if such a resolution were passed, there would be no community which could be described as Antyajas.

We often find contradictory rules being followed in the different branches of the same institution. Since the prohibition applies to residence, I see no moral objection to the admission of Antyajas to the school. On the contrary, it would show disregard for dharma to deny admission to them.

17. LETTER TO NARAHARI PARikh

March 10, 1933

CHI. NARAHARI,

I could read your letter of the 4th only today. Your question is good. One who is convinced that there is no other way but brahmacharya should know that the right thing for him is to strive exclusively to discover the means of perfecting it and should continue his experiments to that end in the faith that large numbers of people will adopt it one day. He should also be convinced at the same time that artificial means of birth-control are dangerous from every point of view and are bound to loosen morals. Even if we assume that people will have to suffer during the interval before brahmacharya comes to be widely accepted, I see nothing wrong in that. Like an individual, a society also will reap as it sows. But God is merciful. There is mercy even in those of His acts which we regard as punishment. When the birth-rate is high, the death-rate also will be proportionately high. Mankind, therefore, will live on. It is true that such life will not be happy, and it is best that it should be so. This knowledge also will persuade people to adopt brahmacharya, for even a little experience of it will show that, when it has become habitual, it is a source of much greater happiness than indulgence can give. In order that the world may go on satisfactorily, isn’t it also necessary to obey the other laws of God? One such law is that nobody has a right to take more than the minimum he needs for his physical maintenance. If everyone obeyed this law, there would be no starvation even if brahmacharya was not observed by large numbers. Physical labour is not confined to work in the fields. Every farmer ought to use his hands and feet fully, especially the hands. In a country where the farmers have no subsidiary industry, they become almost like animals. If the company of animals is necessary, the experience of using tools is equally necessary. If all men cultivated manual skill, then even if the population went on increasing, within limits, everybody would have enough food to eat, cloth to cover his or her body with and protection against heat and cold in a home. Remember the meaning of varnadharma which I have been explaining these days.

I think I have answered all your questions, but write to me again if I have not.

I enclose with this letters for Narahari, Moolchand and Champa. I just received your wire about Parachure Shastri. I had been waiting for it before asking him to go there. In reply to a letter which I had written to him, he wrote me a beautiful letter. I am enclosing it. Preserve it there. I have, however, informed him that, if you consent he must go to the Ashram but that he should see his wife, and if she and the children are fit and are willing to stay in the Ashram, all of them should go. I will now let you know what he decides as soon as he informs me. Parachure Shastri also will keep you informed. The final decision will be based wholly on considerations of dharma. All of us, therefore, may rest assured that it will be for our good. I hope you got my previous letters in which I wrote to you about Lakshmi. I wrote one yesterday and one the day before.

CHI. NAPOLEON,

I got your letter after a long time. A letter from me is as good as one from Sardar. You do not improve your handwriting. The letters should be like pearls. It was you that paid a visit to Visapur. Write to me from time to time. Try and do some Harijan work there also.

Blessings from

20. LETTER TO MOOLCHAND AGRAWAL

March 10, 1933

BHAJ MOOLCHAND,

Your query has already been answered in Harijan.¹

The exercise of the tongue and the pen cannot be regarded physical activity. In this context it means only labour by hands and feet.

If people do not labour on the land and then starve, what can the brain do? At that time whosoever cultivates even a little will be the saviour. What is the use of a speech when the house is on fire? You will need water to fight the fire, and so on. It does not mean that brain work has no utility. It only means that ideas of those alone will bear fruit who appreciate the significance of manual labour and themselves undertake it. Both types of work should proceed side by side and the best principle is to earn one’s bread from manual labour and to employ the intellect for service only. That will secure a perfect balance. You may take it that the Ashram was founded with the same objective. You have to grasp this fact if you wish to benefit from a stay in the Ashram.

WHAT THEY TEACH

The reader should study the tell-tale figures, collected by the Editor and published in another column, of the ‘depressed classes’, otherwise called the ‘exterior castes’ of the Madras Presidency. They have eighty-six sub-divisions among them. The sanatanists would claim that they are all untouchables by birth!!! What were they before they were so classified in the census? It is interesting, too, to note that the criterion of untouchability has not been the same for all the Provinces, nor the same in every part of the same Province, nor is the untouchable of Madras necessarily untouchable in Bombay or Bengal. The more one studies these figures, the stronger will grow the conviction that this untouchability is purely man-made. The census superintendents have been the sole judges. The reader will note also that the various Governments have differed in their views as to the classification. If the untouchables are God-made, why all these differences? The time is coming when there will be a bid on the part of caste Hindus for being classified as ‘untouchables’. Signs have already begun to appear on the horizon. If untouchables were God-made, we should be able unfailingly to distinguish them without effort from the rest, as we distinguish one species from another.

And who will answer for these sub-divisions if not caste Hindus? If they will give up untouchability, there is every hope of untouchables giving up the sub-untouchability among themselves.

A Graduate’s Difficulty

A graduate correspondent wants to know why I say that the practice of untouchability is common to all mankind and religions and that it is a necessary institution.

When we perform natural functions involving uncleanness or have unclean diseases, we are untouchable till we have become clean. The extent of untouchability and the methods of becoming clean no doubt vary among the nations, but the practice of such untouchability, be its extent ever so small, is common to all, including the so-called savage nations. It is a sound hygienic rule when it is intelligently observed. But it was reserved to modern Hinduism to brand a person asuntouchable by birth and call him an offspring of sin. It is a most tragic spectacle that a religion which boasts that ahimsa is the highest thing in life should carry vindictiveness into the other world. It is against this insane untouchability that I have invited all Hindus who are proud of their faith and jealous of its purity to wage relentless war.

The same correspondent further asks, “Does not your varnadharma deprive people of all chances of rise in the social scale? Should not everyone have the permission to follow what occupation he likes?”

According to my conception of varna, all inequality is ruled out of life. Inequality of intellect or in material possessions ought not to mean inequality of social status. I do most emphatically maintain that man is not made to choose his occupation for ‘rising in the social scale’. He is made to serve his fellow-men and earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. And since the primary wants of all are the same, all labour should carry the same value.

This law Hinduism discovered and called the law of varna, and carried it out in practice more or less perfectly with amazing success. What we see today in Hinduism is its caricature. It is my certain conviction that obedience to that law alone can save the perishing world. Its conscious recognition means contentment and consequent freeing Of human energy for the moral uplift. Its disregard spells unhealthy discontent, greed, cut-throat competition and moral stagnation ending in spiritual suicide. This law, as I understand it, is not and never has been a mere ceremonial rule regulating the restrictions on eating and marrying.

WHAT IS SPIRITUAL PROGRESS?

“When you write about the spirit, the spiritual progress of Harijans, what do you mean? And why is such progress of the world retarded because that of Harijans is? Why is the spiritual progress of Harijans retarded if they are not admitted to temples?” —asks a persistent correspondent who has many other questions which need not engage us just now.

Spirit is that moral being which informs the human body and which is imperishable. Spiritual progress is that which promotes the realization of that imperishable essence. What retards the progress of my neighbour must retard mine. India is a big neighbour of other parts of the world. India’s spiritual progress cannot but be retarded if that of forty million Harijans and, therefore, of the two hundred and thirty million Hindus is.

As to temples, I have discussed elsewhere in this issue what a large part they play in the life of mankind. Spirit itself is capable of intellectual dissection only up to a point. It transcends reason, hence it is a matter of faith. Even so are places of worship matters of faith in the last resort.

THE BENGALI “HARIJAN”

Two issues of the Bengali Harijan are already out. It is published in the form of a magazine with an attractive cover with a Harijan woman carrying a basket of refuse on her head. It is published under the auspices of the Khadi Pratishthan, College Square, Calcutta, and the annual subscription is Rs. 4 including postage, and Rs. 3 without.

The first and second issues contain either full translations or substance of all the articles that have hitherto appeared in the English edition. It contains also translations of some of my previous writings on Hindu religion and editorials or editorial notes from Satisbabu’s pen, such as, “Result of Neglect”, “Solution of Some Problems of Untouchability”, “The Sanatanists’ Prayer”, “Responsibility of Municipality”, “Depressed Classes and Untouchability”.

It came out with 2,000 copies the first week, all of which were sold out. It came out with 3,000 the second week. I hope that it will receive generous support from the Bengali public.

22. A TRUE SERVANT

Experience that is being daily gained shows that the service of Harijans is perhaps the hardest of all services. There are to my knowledge many girls and grown-up women performing daily personal service. One of them gives a graphic account of her experience in scavengers’ quarters. It was with the greatest difficulty that she could restrain herself from vomiting when she first went to these quarters. I am glad women are taking their due share in the movement.

How are the Harijans living in hideous filth to be served? They have no will to be served. They curse those who go to their quarters. Some even stone workers out of their streets. Still they must be served, if we will serve ourselves. They must be raised out of this state, if we will raise ourselves. We have pressed them down and in so doing we have gone down ourselves. Not everyone can perform this high service. Let me sum up the qualities that I have found to be indispensable in a Harijan servant:

He must have true love for Harijans as if they were members of his own family.

He must have great patience and courage to bear physical injury and insults.

He must have a character above suspicion and reproach.

He must be prepared to live on the barest possible sustenance.

To go through all my correspondence and to have interviews with Harijans, sanatanists and workers is to pass through a raging fire. Harijans who have at all become vocal are naturally suspicious and often exacting. They are impatient. The sanatanists think that the Hinduism of their belief is in danger. They have money which they are using freely. New organs are daily coming into being. They impute motives, make the wildest statements about the reformers and distort the whole movement. The workers are not all an ideal team. I have seen how one worker can poison the whole atmosphere around him unless he is thoroughly trustworthy and is pure in mind and body.

If the worker is to satisfy both the Harijans and the sanatanists, he will do so only by showing the highest character, deep humility and great charity. In other words, he will have to be a man of religion. This is a movement for the purification of religion. No religion has ever been purified by brag and bluster or by men with a loose character.

Workers will have to be most circumspect. Sanatanists are reported to be resorting to goondaism and not to hesitate to resort to force to break up meetings. This is no wonder. Evil has its own vested interests. These are undoubtedly in danger. And they will put up a fight for existence. Where, therefore, there is any danger of disturbance, the workers must avoid it, even if they have to give up public meetings and the like. In such cases they must take the message of deliverance from house to house. They must not engage in vain disputations or interpretation of Shastras. They must rely upon the unfailing ability of Truth to protect itself. Truth is life and it propagates itself the moment it has got a habitation in some human personality. Mute conduct is often the most effective speech. Workers, therefore, need to have a living faith in themselves and the cause. But they know that by themselves they are nothing. Therefore, faith in themselves means faith in God. Those who empty themselves of all pride and all egotism have the greatest help from God.

Hinduism will be purified of the evil of untouchability only by the willing sacrifice of thousands of such true servants.

_Harijan_, 11-3-1933

23. ARE TEMPLES NECESSARY?

An American correspondent\(^1\) writes:\(^2\)

. . . The great religious truths which the prophets of religion have apprehended and proclaimed have always been lost when their disciples have tried to localize them in priestcraft and temples. Truth is too universal to be confined and made sectarian. Therefore, I consider temples, mosques and churches to be a prostitution of religion. . . . When religion is made a monopoly by the priesthood and temples become vested interests, the great mass of mankind becomes isolated from truth. . . .

Therefore, I can see no advantage in gaining permission for the Harijans to enter the temples. I know that justice demands that they shall have the liberty even to do wrong. But if they are to learn the lessons of self-respect which will enable them to take an equal place with caste people in the development of the future of our civilization, I think they must learn an independence of all priests and temples. . . . When you spoke in Europe that you “formerly considered that God is Truth but now you realized that Truth is God”, you struck a responsive chord in the hearts of all of us, whatever our traditions may have been. But when you become a defender of the faith of temple Hinduism, even though it be a purified type, we feel that you have lost your universal appeal, an appeal which I consider you to have made not as a Hindu, but as one of that large body of spiritual-minded Hindus who do not look to the temples for the spiritual sustenance of their lives. I do not believe that such men are outside the best traditions of Hinduism but are rather in the line of the creators of the religious spirit which has made the spirituality of India her greatest contribution to humanity.

Nor do I believe that this higher Hinduism is too high for the Harijans, whose spiritual intuitions have never been dulled by our modern type of education. Buddha, Chaitanya and Kabir all made a large appeal to this class, and the teachings of Jesus were most appreciated, not by the high and mighty, but by publicans and fishermen, who were outside the pale of respectable society. . . .

This considered opinion representing a large body of people throughout the world deserves respectful consideration. Such an opinion, however, does not appear before me for the first time. I have had the privilege and opportunity of discussing this subject with many friends in the light it is presented. I can appreciate much of the argument, but I venture to think that it is inconclusive, because it has omitted material facts. Some priests are bad. Temples, churches and mosques very often show corruption, more often deterioration. Nevertheless, it would be impossible to prove that all priests are bad or have been bad and that all churches, temples and mosques are hotbeds of corruption and superstition. Nor does the argument take note of this fundamental fact that no faith has done without a habitation; and I go further that in the very nature of things it cannot exist, so long as man remains as he is constituted. His very body has been rightly called the temple of the Holy Ghost, though innumerable such temples belie the fact and are hotbeds of corruption, used for dissoluteness. And I presume that it will be accepted as a conclusive answer to a sweeping suggestion that all bodies should be destroyed for the corruption of many, if it can be shown, as it can be, that there are some bodies which are proper temples of the Holy Ghost. The cause for the corruption of many bodies will have to be sought elsewhere. Temples of stone and mortar are nothing else than a natural extension of these human temples and though they were in their conception undoubtedly habitations of God like human temples, they have been subject to the same law of decay as the latter.

I know of no religion or sect that has done or is doing without its house of God, variously described as a temple, mosque, church, synagogue or agiari. Nor is it certain that any of the great reformers including Jesus destroyed or discarded temples altogether. All of them

1 Parsi fire-temple
sought to banish corruption from temples as well as from society. Some of them, if not all, appear to have preached from temples. I have ceased to visit temples for years, but I do not regard myself on that account as a better person than before. My mother never missed going to the temple when she was in a fit state to go there. Probably her faith was far greater than mine, though I do not visit temples. There are millions whose faith is sustained through these temples, churches and mosques. They are not all blind followers of a superstition, nor are they fanatics. Superstition and fanaticism are not their monopoly. These vices have their root in our hearts and minds.

My advocacy of temple-entry I hold to be perfectly consistent with the declaration which I often made in Europe that Truth is God. It is that belief which makes it possible, at the risk of losing friendships, popularity and prestige, to advocate temple-entry for Harijans. The Truth that I know or I feel I know demands that advocacy from me. Hinduism loses its right to make a universal appeal if it closes its temples to the Harijans.

That temples and temple-worship are in need of radical reform must be admitted. But all reform without temple-entry will be to tamper with the disease. I am aware that the American friend’s objection is not based upon the corruption or impurity of the temples. His objection is much more radical. He does not believe in them at all. I have endeavoured to show that his position is untenable in the light of facts which can be verified from everyday experience. To reject the necessity of temples is to reject the necessity of God, religion and earthly existence.

Harijan, 11-3-1933

24. WHY NOT SIMPLE ‘HINDU’?

In the course of a letter, a caste Hindu correspondent writes:

If these depressed classes are finally to be merged in the Hindus, was it not better that instead of ‘Harijans’ they should have been given the name ‘Hindus’ which would have applied to both the caste Hindus and the depressed classes? It is still time that the word ‘Harijan’ is given up in favour of the ‘Hindu’, so that the caste Hindus and the Hindu depressed classes are known in common parlour as well as in Government papers as only Hindus.

The correspondent is too late with his suggestion. If a separate register of untouchable classes had not come to stay, at least for the time being, the common name might have answered the purpose. But the separate register makes it absolutely necessary to know the untouchable classes by some name, and if such is the case, why not give them a name that truly befits them and has no ill-flavour about it. I regard ‘Harijan’ as a fitting name, because the caste Hindus cannot be properly considered God’s children, but the untouchables certainly can.

I have suggested the real method of abolishing the distinction between caste Hindus and Harijans, namely, by caste Hindus performing the purification ceremony of ridding themselves of untouchability and becoming Harijans themselves. And if it was open to anyone to be classified as untouchables in the register for untouchables, I should most decidedly advise caste Hindus to declare themselves as such and to live also as such. That will be a substantial and organic method of amalgamating the two into one body.

This is the proper place for referring to the same suggestion made by a Harijan friend but from a different standpoint. He says that the best way of getting rid of untouchability is to advise Harijans to adopt names that will never signify an untouchable and to declare themselves also as mere Hindus or as Brahmans, Kshatriyas or Vaishyas. This suggestion was made to me even as early as 1915 when I began the crusade against untouchability. This Harijan had his own experiences and told me that he had travelled from one end of India to the other, that he had freely entered all the principal places of pilgrimage without let or hindrance and that he had taken with him a party.

When he was introduced to me, I saw no mark about him of being a Harijan. He was dressed like a Brahmin, had a tilak on his forehead, a mala of tulsi or rudraksh—I forget which—and his speech was that of an ordinary Gujarati. He and his party took up their abode in dharmsalas and never had the slightest difficulty, having unhesitatingly proclaimed themselves as belonging to one varna or the other.

My visitor told me that this practice of untouchables hiding their identity was quite a common thing amongst them and that it was growing. He unfortunately received no encouragement from me. I told him that that practice might be convenient for him and the few who could afford the means and had sufficient training to be able to shed some of the habits which marked out an untouchable from the rest, but that the practice of a few, apart from its being dishonest and, therefore, tending to deterioration of manhood, would make no impression upon the tens of thousands of untouchables who could not even stir out of their villages.

The reply that I then gave applies with equal force even today. The straightest and the quickest method, therefore, is to conduct the movement openly, to know the untouchables as such and yet for caste Hindus to treat them on terms of absolute equality with themselves; and as the movement has begun on a very large scale and the declaration was made on behalf of caste Hindus in September last that untouchability was gone, it surely became necessary to know untouchables by an inoffensive name whilst the process of amalgamation was going on. ‘Harijan’ in my opinion was the best name to know them by.

_Harijan_, 11-3-1933

25. A GROUNDLESS FEAR

A sanatanist correspondent writes:

Suppose a sanatanist builds a new temple and appoints trustees for its management; suppose he throws it open to all Hindus of the four castes, but not to untouchables. According to the Anti-untouchability Bill, the disqualification of the untouchables will be inoperative. According to the Temple-entry Bill, if the reformers are in the majority, they will be able to secure the admission of untouchables. Thus, although the person who dedicates the temple may be of opinion that the temple will be polluted by the admission of untouchables, although he may be of opinion that he, and persons who are of his way of thinking, cannot worship properly if untouchables are admitted, yet untouchables will be allowed inside the temple and his express desire will be violated.

If, however, a sanatanist builds such a temple in, say, Tibet or China or Afghanistan, his desire will no doubt be respected, as there is no Anti-untouchability Law or Temple-entry Law in any of those countries. Thus a sanatanist cannot worship as he likes in a temple built by him in India if he desires that his brother sanatanists of the higher castes should have the right of entry into that temple. But he will enjoy this privilege if he builds the temple in any other country except India.

_Do you think that this position is satisfactory?_ If I was a believer in untouchability, I should not dread the Bills as my correspondent does. So far as the supposed greater freedom in Tibet, China or Afghanistan is concerned, the correspondent forgets that there is no such thing as untouchability in these three countries, so far as I am aware, and he certainly will not be able there, as he is in this country, to prevent the entry of a single person merely on the ground of untouchability. But even when untouchability ceases to be recognized by the law, that fact will not necessarily entitle the untouchables to enter any temple they choose. Thus, a sanatanist who builds a temple for certain persons exclusively builds a private temple and he will have the perfect right to exclude any person he likes, whether untouchable or touchable. All he will not be able to do is to exclude a person purely on the ground of untouchability and secure the assistance of the law in order to compass his purpose. And even public temples will successfully prevent the entry of untouchables if public opinion is against their entry. All that the first Bill does is to refuse legal sanction to the cult of untouchability. No Hindu temple will, however, be opened to the Harijans till caste Hindus have been converted. Under the second Bill, private temples are uninterfered with and public temples can only be regulated according to public usage, which is always subject to change from time to time. And when a sanatanist builds a public temple for the four varnas, it is only by implication that untouchables are excluded; but if untouchables are merged in the four varnas, surely there is no violence to the sanatanist’s will, because he could not regulate the religious belief of posterity nor stop its growth.

The only objection of the correspondent, therefore, that needs consideration is the right of the minority under the second Bill. I have ventured to suggest a compromise which jealously guards the rights of a minority even of one. For, I have no desire personally to interfere with the religious right of a single individual.

But what the correspondent hopelessly fails to do is to recognize the right of the reformers which he insists upon their recognizing in respect of himself and his co-sanatanists.

27. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

March 11, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

It is 3.15 a.m., 11th, Saturday now. The day of my writing to you has become upset owing to the uncertainty of the arrival of your weekly letter. This week I had two from you. Last week’s was received only on Tuesday and this week’s on Wednesday. But yesterday morning I thought I had still to hear from you and I devoted the morning to writing other important letters. And then when it dawned upon me that there was nothing more to come from you, I would not write to you during what you may call office hours. I love to write this letter and such others in the early morning.

I see that you are once more enjoying the company of birds and animals. Frogs have somehow or other appeared to me helpless creatures. They can’t run, they can’t fly and thus become an easy prey to the wily cat. And they seem to look at you so appealingly in their helplessness. The monkey on the other hand never excites my pity. He is a most resourceful and mischievous fellow and takes delight in overreaching you. He has no such thing as thankfulness in him. And yet I suppose all this is imagination or ignorance! If we thrive on knowledge, we seem somehow to do so on ignorance and imagination too. ‘It is folly to be wise when ignorance is bliss.’ And the shortest and the oldest Upanishad 1 says, “He overcomes death through ignorance and mounts to immortality through knowledge.” The original words are 1 अविच्छल्ला and विच्छल्ला, meaning also respectively activity and inactivity, body and spirit, attachment and detachment. They can-be made to mean several other things without doing violence to the text. It is a very simple and lofty Upanishad and is also abstruse. It is an epitome of all knowledge like the Gita. The latter is perhaps a commentary on the former. An old commentator or rather the devotee of the Gita compares the Upanishads to cows, the Gita to milk and Krishna to the cowboy who milks them. 2 But no more of this now.

I hope your progress continues and will not be interrupted by the hot weather which is on us now. Make use of the earth bandage on the forehead or a mere wet rag. It has a wonderfully cooling effect.

1 Ishopanishad, 11
2 सब्येनिन्द्रो गायो दीर्घा मेलनन्दनः ।
पाथो वल्ल: सुभाषांग्राहा छाप गीतामृते महर्षी ||
What cools the head cools the whole body. I came across a potent sentence yesterday in an American book on the eyesight, a book received from Gregg. It says that a lie heats the body and injures the eyesight. It is true if you would give an extended meaning to ‘lie’. Any departure conscious or unconscious from the laws of nature is a lie. A conscious departure from the known laws is a lie that hurts our moral fibre, not so, or not to the same extent an unconscious departure. But the body is injured in every case. Writers on pranayama claim that the ability to regulate and control breath, enables one to defy changes of climate. The Gita seems to lend support to the belief. This is a field that needs reinvestigation in the light of modern knowledge Kuvvalayananda of Lonavala is doing it. Form your lips as you would when whistling and slowly breathe the outside air and you will have an immediate sensation of cooling. When lying flat on the back, remember that the muscles of the back do not expand. Hence your breathing must be extra gentle. It is intended to create a soothing effect on the system and relax it and rest it. There is nothing apart from sleep to relieve tension of the mind and body. Therefore the deep breathing should be taken whilst sitting cross-legged with the body erect like a straight board. All these exercises have to be gentle, deliberate and rhythmic, always on an empty stomach.

Here the writing was interrupted for prayer and is now resumed after a break of 25 minutes at 4.35.

I have always found Arnold’s to be on the whole a more helpful translation than any other. “Abstemious” is a wrong word. “Spare diet” is a good expression. vYi means less than enough. What is enough is a matter of conjecture, therefore our own mental picture. The man of truth knowing that man is always indulgent to the body, said, in order to counteract the indulgence, that he should take less food than what he would think was enough; then there was likelihood of his taking what in fact was enough. So what we often think is spare or meagre is likely even to be more than enough. More people are weak through overfeeding or wrong feeding than through underfeeding. It is wonderful, if we chose the right diet, what an extraordinarily small quantity would suffice.

I am glad Ba is prospering with you and learns Hindi and makes you sing bhajans. Does Mridula sing? She ought to if she does not. She must shed her shyness if she has any still left. How otherwise does she pass the day? She should now be Ba’s secretary or letter-writer.

My weight now registers at 104. The food still remains fruit and milk (raw). I am taking just now less than one lb. of milk. It is the fruit that keeps up my weight. The elbows remain as they are. No cause for anxiety. I have reduced the spinning to a minimum—no fixed quantity. The count just now is anything round 55 and 60. This from devakapas carded on Keshu’s little invention.

Love from us all.

March 11, 1933

MY DEAR ABDUL ALIM,

I was delighted to see your postcard telling me that you had safely arrived in Calcutta and housed in “The Refuge”.¹

I had a letter from Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikari also.

You should not feel homesick. You are a wise young man. You should therefore cultivate a brotherly spirit with all the helpless inmates there and by your exemplary conduct endear yourself to the officials. And if you will only believe that God is our constant companion, guard and protector, you will not feel destitute or lonely.

I hope you have got some paper to read.

I am writing² to some friends to see you now and then.

Do keep me informed of how you are faring there.

31. LETTER TO VERRIER ELWIN

March 11, 1933

MY DEAR VERRIER,

This time too there was unavoidable delay in replying to your two letters. As if this was all God’s design, Alla came in yesterday to change the scope of my letter. I wanted this to be a mere thanksgiving letter. But Alla’s talk has not made it quite possible. She said she had a copy of your letter to me. But she was not satisfied. She insisted that there was a promise made by you. She does not want the marriage now but she does not want to be the liar. She wants you to be the liar! I gently suggested that neither need be one and that in matters of love making mistakes was the most common thing in life and that whilst you had never meant marriage, she who wanted it might easily have interpreted every word and gesture of yours to mean marriage. She would not have it that way at all and yet was loath to accuse you of untruthfulness. I told her that you were incapable of lying and that if there was the slightest suspicion of your having meant marriage you would make the admission. You will now tax your memory and if... there is anything to correct in the light of what Alla has to say, you will do her the reparation. I think that she ought not to go there yet for some time. Though you and Mary have taken the sacred and most momentous resolution, it must have been a terrific strain on your nerves. Mary does not even seem to have recovered from the shock.
Though your first letter to me is joint, Mary does not seem to have quite assimilated the truth of the dissolution of the intended tie. My whole heart goes out to her. I have no doubt that such things mean much more to woman than to man. But M. must realize that before God there is no sex or we are all women, His brides married to Him in an indissoluble tie. If she has realized the beauty of this immortal marriage, she must dance with joy that she is free from the bondage of the human marriage. The human marriage is good and necessary if the flesh is weak but if the flesh is strong it surely is hindrance for the servant of humanity that M. has become. Let her remember too, all sacrifice to be true must bring inner peace and joy. She must not therefore brood over what was to be and what was a concession to the flesh. Let her sing out the praise of God for enabling you both to triumph over the flesh. And since she has chosen to be my daughter she has got to write to me without reserve and pour out her heart to me.

But till you are both composed and have tested yourselves Alla must not go there and must not be induced to do so. She herself does not want to go until the so-called promise matter is cleared up.

32. LETTER TO MARY GILLET

[March 11, 1933]¹

MY DEAR MARY,

I have just finished my letter to V. and have now but a few moments before the prayer begins. V. will share with you my letter or as much of it as he thinks you should see; whatever he withholds will be for your sake.

Since you are a new addition to the ever growing family I do not know the right word for you. But this I know and you may be sure of [it] that my whole heart is with you. My spirit follows you. My spirit follows you like that of a mother. And this quite selfishly. I do not want to feel lonely in the incessant search after knowing and seeing God as Truth and that only. V. is my son and you are my daughter because of that invincible bond. So far as I am concerned my letter to V. is as much for you as for him. But as I know you through him he must be the judge of how much of it you may see with profit, this is not from want of trust in you but from want of confidence in my ability to diagnose and prescribe. And has not a father to know his children’s wants and prescribe for them? But I am a blind father. The infallible Father of us all will surely guide you and give you the strength you need for fully carrying out your great resolve of full surrender without any reservation whatsoever.

33. LETTER TO T. K. MENON

March 11, 1933

MY DEAR MENON,

I have had the relevant extracts in the Mathrubhumi sent by you translated for me.

Whilst there are one or two passages to which some objection might reasonably be taken, I see nothing in the articles to warrant the sweeping condemnation that you pronounced. In leading their argument, journalists will write spicy things which one may not resent except when all bounds of decency have been crossed. However, if ever you find anything highly offensive, you should send the cuttings and I shall write to the editor. He has promised to be very careful about his language.

Yours sincerely,

35. LETTER TO MULCHAND PAREKH

March 11, 1933

Only labour with one’s hands and feet is physical labour and one must earn one’s livelihood with such labour. Mental and intellectual ability should be used exclusively for the service of society. If we do not use our hands and feet, will we do agricultural work with our intellect? If there is a fire raging, will we try to put it out by composing a poem?

The maxim “Yoga is skill in work”1 is true. There should be perfect combination of physical and mental work. Mussolini was a blacksmith’s son who did hard labour in his home and who, in his youth, worked as a labourer in a factory carrying bricks to the second floor of the building 120 times a day and went to jail eleven times. But this hard life gave him valuable training. His mind was not slumbering when he did all this labour. If it had been slumbering, why, there have been millions and millions of labourers who have carried bricks and farmers who have worked in the fields but have left behind them no mark in the world.

36. TO GUJARATIS

Harijanbandhu is the Gujarati edition of the English Harijan. That the Gujarati Harijan could not be published simultaneously with the English edition is a matter of shame both to you and to me. To you because the Bombay branch of the Harijan Sevak Sangh did not have confidence that enough subscribers would be found to make Harijanbandhu self-supporting. A Gujarati gentleman had agreed to make good the loss that would be incurred. But the Gujarati edition cannot at all be conducted at a loss. Moreover, I had insisted that if there was any loss in the beginning, that should be borne either by the Bombay or Gujarat branch. Ultimately Bombay has undertaken to make an experiment for three months and has launched Harijanbandhu.¹ I hope that the Gujaratis will in the very first week reassure the Bombay branch on this point.

1 Bhagavad Gita, II. 50. The correspondent had asked: “Is a labourer only a person who does physical work? Can one who does mental and intellectual work not be called so?”

However, the object in publishing Harijanbandhu is not to take from you one anna for a copy or four rupees annually and thereby to provide maintenance for two, four or more persons. Your subscription will be a token of your desire either to do away with untouchability or to know, if you are an orthodox Hindu, what the reformers have to say. I shall take it that the subscribers to Harijanbandhu pay a fee in order to gather information about the movement to abolish untouchability. If you wish to remove the blot of untouchability from Hinduism, you ought to know what the movement is, how and by whom it is being conducted, what the Shastras have to say on the subject, what the world thinks of it, what part you can play in it and the rest. And Harijanbandhu will give you all this information.

I hope that your one anna will not be spent in vain. Do not buy Harijanbandhu to please me. I am afraid that a number of people will take Harijanbandhu out of blind love for me even though they may not feel the need. I do not want this.

I am not at all eager to publish Harijanbandhu merely for the sake of publishing it. I do not have that much time. Do not get upset by the fact that it will mostly contain translations from the English. You will find novelty in these translations. I shall have to write at least something addressed to Gujaratis only. I shall have to bear some burden therefore. To me Harijanbandhu is a special atonement. I have been pouring my soul into this movement. Removal of untouchability is not for me a recent activity, it dates back to the days before my entry into politics, to my childhood.

But as a result of the Yeravda Pact, that activity has become the subject of a pledge. My fast was a death-bed to me. In accepting the Pact, the British Cabinet honoured it in the letter. But the observance of the pledge taken by the Hindu representatives in the name of the followers of Hinduism constituted and constitutes the spirit. I had explained this to the leaders at that very time. I gave up my fast in the confidence that the pledge would be observed every moment. For that observance my body was the hostage, and it is that even today. The moment I feel that those who have taken the pledge have weakened, I must again take to my death-bed.

But I am not eager to die. I am eager to live and commit untouchability to the flames. And if I have to die in order to see that glorious hour, I am ready to die. The mantra of my life consists in making preparations for it. To live while untouchability lives is like a cup of poison to me.

Now perhaps you will have understood more clearly why my expiation lies in conducting the Harijan in English and the national and provincial languages. I must either helplessly lie on my death-bed or employ whatever strength I have to subjugate the demon of untouchability. The Harijan and other activities are there to put off death. Thereby it is my object to caution the Hindus. There may well be a greater responsibility on me for the observance of the pledge, but it rests also, to a greater or lesser extent, on every Hindu who regards untouchability as a sin. Harijanbandhu will help to show how that responsibility can be discharged.

Even an orthodox Hindu can, if he tries, learn a lot from this. Those who today have become our foes were yesterday our friends. Harijanbandhu will prove to the patient orthodox Hindus that there was no need for this to happen. There is no place here for bitter criticism. Here all the discussion will be conducted from a religious point of view. According to me, removal of untouchability is simply a religious activity. It may well have many other results, some of which may well be political even. To my mind these are mere sham if they do not have a religious foundation. Instead of enjoying the peace of imprisonment, I would never for the sake of a sham take up the burden of conducting a big movement outside. God has given me the capacity to observe limits. Hence I am able to draw inspiration from whatever circumstances I may be placed in. There may be disadvantages in being a prisoner, but for the wise it certainly offers the peace that comes from looking into one’s own soul. But at the moment I see that I can get this glimpse into my soul in conducting this huge movement while being a prisoner behind the bars. It is precisely for that reason that I have exchanged my sleep for wakefulness. And Harijanbandhu will every week call upon every Gujarati Hindu to immolate himself in this yajna to purify the Hindu religion.

VOL. 60 : 10 MARCH, 1933 - 26 APRIL, 1933 29
37. DISPOSAL OF CARCASSES

There are several sections among Harijans, e.g., the Chakkiliyans and Madigas in South India and Chamars in Gujarat, who remove and dispose of dead cattle and eat their flesh. Disposal of dead cattle is a sacred obligation and occupation. But the eating of carrion is a most filthy habit, regarded as one of the heinous sins in Hindu scriptures, and it is essential that at this hour of self-purification our Harijanbrethren should be helped to get rid of this habit. But they plead their inability to do so for various reasons. “It is a habit to which we have been accustomed for ages”, they say, “and now it is a positive delicacy which we cannot forgo any more than you can do without your finest delicacies. You should also know that removal of dead cattle is an obligation imposed upon us and we may not shirk it without risking the wrath of the Mahajans; you know, perhaps, that carrion is part of the remuneration for the removal. We are thus tied down to carrioneating for three reasons.”

The argument deserves consideration. Written and spoken appeals will be of no avail; we must show them the way out. We should first acquaint ourselves with the conditions obtaining in various parts of the country regarding the removal of dead cattle, and have them altered as circumstances may require; we should supervise the actual skinning and other attendant processes and see to the proper disposal of the remains. The removal must be made conditional on a promise not to eat the carrion, and no one should be compelled to remove dead cattle.

This work demands a fair number of volunteers. They must learn the art of skinning dead cattle in a clean manner and teach it to the Harijans who are doing it today in the old fashion. The carcasses should not be dragged as at present, as it damages the hide and decreases its value. They should be lifted and removed in an expeditious and efficient manner. The hide-curers will willingly adopt the new method, but not until the so-called high caste people have mastered it.

The way in which dead cattle are disposed of today is most uneconomical and entails a loss of crores of rupees to the country. Every bit of the carcass must be made proper use of. Much of it is wasted today. The hide, the bones, the entrails and the flesh are all useful and ought to be properly utilized. The hide is being put to use of a sort. The bones are mostly wasted. They should be carefully collected and turned scientifically into manure. The entrails are utilized for gut, etc., but there is room enough for improvement. The flesh should be saved from the filthy use it is turned to and must be made to yield fat, which will be valuable for manufacturing grease for factories. The remains should finally be converted into manure or buried deep. If volunteers make a point of remaining present throughout all these processes, the men will easily take to the new departure and will stop eating carrion.

1 This is a translation of a Gujarati item which was published in Harijan-bandhu, 12-3-1933.

There is nowhere any room for compulsion. Where the hidecurers are not ready for the change, they must be left undisturbed. They are no more bound to remove the dead cattle than the caste organizations are bound to get them removed by them. It should be a matter of mutual adjustment.

But the beginning must be made by the volunteers supervising the processes, wherever, of course, the supervision is not resented. The supervision need not be delayed until the volunteers have first mastered the processes. Actual work will be a training in itself.

Municipalities and local bodies and States can immediately undertake the work of training volunteers in scientific skinning and hide-curing. This does need a little expense on buildings and experts. They should really have a training school for this purpose and invite philanthropic experts and veterinary surgeons for co-operation, suggestions and help.

38. TRUTH THE ONLY WAY

I have already summed up in an article in the last issue of _Harijan_ the qualities regarded as indispensable in a servant of the Harijans.¹ If this movement is essentially religious and has for its object the purification and protection of Hinduism, it can be carried on only by truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Truth is the very foundation of religion. If Truth is God, there can be no room for untruth in religion. Let every Harijan Sevak inscribe this fundamental principle on the tablet of his heart.

¹ The article was first published in _Harijan Sevak_, 17-3-1933.
² Gandhiji says he wrote it on this date.

I am being inundated with sanatanist literature. New weeklies and leaflets are coming in daily. Sanatanists have loosened their purse-strings. I like the awakening. How I wish it was on the right lines! The writings I see contain palpable falsehoods. Their sole object is to stop the anti-untouchability movement somehow or other. How can one answer such propaganda?

Most certainly not by untruth. Truth can be the only answer. I have indeed had complaints against reformers from sanatanists to the effect that the former are resorting to untruth and rowdyism. These complaints have been unsupported by evidence. I have requested the correspondents to supply me with it. Only in one case has an attempt been made to furnish evidence. And I have forwarded the complaints to the proper quarters for investigation. I do not wish to suggest that refusal to furnish me with evidence is proof positive that the reformers are all above reproach. These lines are being written in order to warn them against any departure from truth and non-violence.

My attempt is to know no distinction between the sanatanist and the reformer. I ask for truthfulness from both. But as the sanatanists refuse to regard me as one of their own—some even look upon me as their foe—I am afraid my appeal will have no weight with them. I should be satisfied if the reformers will listen to my appeal. For, their truth will overcome the opponents’ untruth, even as light overcomes darkness. If, therefore, the Harijan Sevak will pursue every one of his activities with truth as the guiding principle, he is sure in the end to convert the sanatanists.¹

I shall certainly declare that no one can destroy the Hindu religion or any other religion by aggression. This is a self-evident truth. That which can be destroyed by any external force is not religion. It may well be a form of social behaviour. Religion can be destroyed only by internal corruption. Untouchability is one such corruption in the Hindu religion. If that is not eradicated, Hindu religion is bound to be destroyed. Untouchability is a monstrous untruth. It can be overcome by contact. Untouchability exists in our hearts. It is a great sin to think, ‘This man belongs to the untouchable caste; so I will not touch him.’ This thought is filled with hatred, with pride, with the notion of superiority and inferiority. All this is irreligion, it is untruth. I know that untruth cannot be supported by truth, hatred cannot be supported by love, pride cannot be supported by humility. This is the reason why I see today the sanatanist newspapers full of hatred, pride and untruth. The sanatanist will ask me, ‘Do you not expose your own truth, hatred and pride in saying so?’ Perhaps it is so. I can only assert that to my knowledge I have no such thoughts. When I see them I shall eschew them, then and there. In order to perceive my own faults, I receive the critics with respect, and listen to them; what they write I read as much as I can. The harder I tried, the more the faults I found in those critics. I do not wish to write about this sad experience here.

But let the workers know that exaggeration is also a species of untruth. I receive reports about opening of temples and wells to Harijans. But sometimes it has been discovered that all the temples and wells referred to have not been opened and that the information supplied to me has been based on insufficient data. The Dhulia Anti-untouchability Committee has published a small pamphlet containing a list of temples and wells opened all over India. It is an imposing list, but I am not inclined to accept it at its face value, not because the Committee has been careless in its compilation, but because it had no opportunity of testing the accuracy of the information supplied from all-India sources. Very often workers gain their information from newspapers, instead of being themselves suppliers of information to newspapers. Statements received from Anti-untouchability Committee cannot be accepted as conclusive evidence, if they are based upon untested reports published in the daily Press. And then there is the great temptation to swell the list of temples and wells opened, for fear of my fast being precipitated. It is a disheartening thought for me and it betrays a poor opinion of the great movement. My fast was not designed to coerce people in any shape or form. It was designed merely to make Hindus think and to spur them to action. Truth is made of sterner stuff, and it must be held superior to any life or lives, be they ever so precious. It must live even if a million lives had to be sacrificed. In a big, religious movement like the drive against untouchability, which many believe to be an integral part of Hindu religion, nothing but unadulterated truth and unconquerable faith in the cause will avail. The reformers hold untouchability to be itself the biggest blot on Hinduism, a great lie. If it is, it can be defeated only by truth and gentleness.

CHI. NARANDAS.

I got the mail you posted on the 9th. I am dispatching this hoping that you will get it on Tuesday.

I had a postcard from Ramabehn. She says that you have not called on her yet. About helping her to learn English, you may discuss the matter further with me, but my understanding of the letter in which I advised you to go and see her is that the suggestion was not open to discussion. Ramabehn had told me, and that is also what she indirectly suggests in her letter, that you would never take the initiative to call on her. I had told her that that could not be so. You should prove that I was right.

Is it true that Babla' escaped drowning in the Magan tank? How and when did the accident occur?

I had received your wire about Parachure Shastri on Friday. If all of you came to the decision independently, it is to be highly welcomed. Kaka has conveyed it to Parachure Shastri. He has gone to his place just now. I will let you know what he decides. I hope Lakshmi’s wedding went off well. The bride and the bridegroom may come and see me if they wish. I think Maruti does.

I hope you got the letters posted yesterday. They contained one for Lakshmudas in which I wrote to him about Anandi.

44. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

March 12, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

Your argument is worthy of an M.A. “If someone can hang himself upside down, why can I not play music?” Many other questions like this can be framed. The only reply is that no reason can be given why you may not. If one person can do one thing, why may another person not do something else?

But it is certainly possible that someone who hangs himself upside down may be able to give a valid reason even for such an action, while a person like me who then starts playing music may not be able to give a convincing reason for doing so. But let that pass. You should now put your proposal before the other inmates of the Ashram and, if a majority supports it, by all means go ahead and make the necessary preparations. Being a prisoner, I myself will not be able to join that marriage procession. And a prisoner has no vote either, so you need not consult me. Q.E.D.

I will patiently wait for Dhurandhar’s letter.

Whether you reply to my question or not, I will keep on inquiring about your health. Tell me, therefore, is it all right? Is the throat all right and can you speak? How is the backache? Is your weight increasing?

When the time comes for giving away the yarn which I am spinning with the slivers sent by you, I will certainly give it to you if you continue to deserve it even then. I hope you will be satisfied with this answer. The count of the yarn will not exceed 75. There are fairly numerous rough particles in the slivers. It is possible that even Keshu’s machine is not good enough for devkapas. I hope you know that this variety of cotton cannot be carded with the ordinary bow.

I don’t know anything about Mahadev having been offended. Nor did I know that he had written to anybody about the matter. I knew something from Narandas’s letter. I knew about disrespect only from your letter. Mahadev has told me nothing. Nor did I know, when I asked him to spin [with your slivers], that he found himself in a moral dilemma. In this matter your case seems to be perfectly correct. I did not feel disrespect to anybody in your remark or your request. I don’t know why Mahadev felt it. I am observing silence just now, otherwise I would have asked him. I did feel, however, that your request sprang from ignorant attachment. Why should you have such attachment for me? One should eschew attachment for a person who cannot belong to any one individual but daily strives to belong to all. Such attachment can avail nothing. But this is one thing. To deduce from it a dislike for others is a different thing.

Sardar, I believe, was only joking, as is his wont.

And now see how I valued your love. Surely you will agree that I should make what I believe to be the best use of the slivers sent by you. Wouldn’t that be the best way of showing how I valued your love? If a vaid, out of his great love for me, sends me gold bhasma, would it not be right to give it to my neighbour to whom it might be more useful than to me? Or, if somebody sends me a carriage to drive and if my neighbour can drive it more safely than I can, would I not show better appreciation of the donor’s love by letting that neighbour drive it for me? The same argument applies to slivers. Among us here, Mahadev can make the best use of such fine slivers, and so I gave half the quantity to him. This will test his skill and increase national wealth and I also will feel happier. You should, therefore, change your nature which makes you wish that your gift should be used only by the person to whom it is given. If you make a gift, you should do so unconditionally. Sushila’s description of you was correct. If Kisan was not likely to get in time the fruit which were brought for her, you would have served both Sushila and Kisan by eating it yourself. It was foolish of you to have let them rot. Q.E.D. again.

I am sorry I cannot reply to your last question.

1 The addressee had inscribed on a gift parcel of slivers to Gandhiji: “To revered dear Mahatmaji”. Mahadev Desai, therefore, had felt that it would not be proper for him to spin them.

Your experience this time was splendid. You read well and also kept good health. Mirabehn did write about you. Let me have your impressions of her.

In all jails there is the same story about letters. I do not expect much improvement in that state of affairs just now. Wouldn’t we submit even if they did not permit us to write any letters? We should, therefore, feel satisfied with whatever freedom we are allowed. A prisoner means a person over whose body the imprisoning authority assumes complete control. Those who court such imprisonment voluntarily should know that it would be their duty to remain contented even if they were given nothing to eat. That is the secret of living which the Gita teaches.

I hope you got my previous letter. I will eagerly wait for your letters.

I must dictate this. I have your letter describing Babla’s exploits. He is in many ways a precocious child and therefore you will find him having picked up all kinds of odds and ends, many of them quite correctly, and if you were to ask him where he picked them up he might not even be able to tell you, because in things one picks up there is no conscious effort.

I am glad you are sleeping out. After years of experience I can say that there is nothing like sleeping directly under the sky to soothe one, so much so that even the roof of a mosquito-net has proved a hindrance for me as if there was an obstacle to the direct contact with mosquitoes. I don’t want you to have malaria in the Ashram through mosquito bites.

You are quite right and wise in not making for speed till you have got control over the strength and evenness of your yarn. When you have both, the speed will come for the trying.

I am wholly unconscious of any danger or difficulty surrounding me, and don’t you give way to any forebodings. One step enough for me is the command we may not break.

I have not yet got your Hindi written at Parashuram’s dictation.
When I get it I shall examine it and let you know the result of my examination.

I hope you duly got my letter addressed to you jointly with Duncan in reply to your joint letter.

Love.

53. LETTER TO GAURISHANKAR BHARGAVA

March 13, 1933

MY DEAR GAURISHANKAR,

I have your letter together with resolution of the Rajasthan Oppressed Classes Conference. I fancy that I missed the Times of India report.1 Anyway, I have no recollection of it. Nevertheless, I am glad you have drawn my attention to it as also to the feelings of the Harijan friends there. I wish you would explain to them the origin of the word ‘Harijan’ as it is given in the earliest issue of the Harijan.2
The word has had a mixed reception. The majority of those who have written to me rather like the name. After all, it was adopted at the suggestion of some Harijans themselves, and those who suggested the name were themselves representatives.

1 The report, published in the Times of India of March 2, had said that the Conference had been critical of Gandhiji. This, according to the addressee, was a misrepresentation of the proceedings of the Conference.
So far as the suggestion that the whole movement should be “left in the hands of the depressed classes” and that the Board or Boards should only assist them by their guidance, [is concerned], it is not practicable in that the penance has got to be done by caste Hindus, therefore, it is they who have to prove their sincerity by conducting the movement. No doubt it should meet with the approval of Harijans if it is at all possible to secure it. But the penance has naturally to be done by the penitent himself and not by deputy. I can well understand a parallel movement of reform by Harijans and it should be there. It must also be the natural consequence of sincere penitence by caste Hindus.

As to the third suggestion, I do not know whether Sjt. Sarda is a proper representative of the Board or not. As to that, you should write to the Central Board.

Lastly and fourthly, the programme of the anti-untouchability movement is in no way confined to the temple-entry, but it is designed to improve the economic, social and educational conditions of these classes. Temple-entry is a part of the programme, and it is contended that it not only ensures for Harijans religious equality but it conduces to the acceleration of the pace of economic, social and educational programme. You will please explain this to all the Harijan friends and others whose misgivings you have expressed in your letter. You were quite right in bringing to my attention the various points.

Yours sincerely,

54. LETTER TO N.

March 13, 1933

MY DEAR N.,

I dictate this letter to save time, and you have nothing to hide from anybody.

I was glad to have your letter though later than I had expected. I wrote to you the other day a letter care of Ramachandra, and I am sending this also under his care till you advise me to the contrary.

I am glad you have moved to Harijan quarters and that you were able to fix up everything with the landlady. You should give me your detailed programme from day to day. Avoid all conversation save such as may be absolutely necessary, and you should interest S.\(^1\) also in all acts of service. That will be the truest education for him if you will let him understand what he is doing and why. You will also naturally give him such literary education that you are capable of giving.

Tell me what food you are getting and how and what arrangements are there for bathing, washing clothes, etc., and whether you are doing the washing yourself. I want you to get cent percent marks in the test you have put yourself to. We often talk of you and think of you. My prayers are ever with you.

55. LETTER TO RAMACHANDRA

March 13, 1933

MY DEAR RAMACHANDRA,

I have your letter. I am glad you are keeping me informed of the happenings there. If N. cannot stay in the Cantonment, she should shift at once. If she cannot remain in Bangalore anywhere, she should stay in Poona. I cannot send her anywhere else till she has gone through the ordeal.

I do not know what can be done for the landlady. Of course N. is primarily responsible, but so is the landlady herself. She ought to have insisted upon advance payment and if she did not want to do so, she should at least have insisted upon weekly payments. The only thing I can now suggest is that those young men who hovered round N. should collect subscriptions from amongst themselves and for very shame discharge the whole or part of the debt due to the landlady.

Enclosed is a letter for N. You may share this too with her if you like.

DEAR DR. BIDHAN,

I thank you for your letter. I have handed the management the names of the 12 subscribers. Probably the money will have been received there. I have also given instructions that Satcowribaboo should have 100 copies sent to him every week at the address given by you. Payments are all expected in advance. You will please therefore give strict instructions that the money should be sent for the 100 copies regularly from week to week and that when they do not need them they will send a wire.

58. LETTER TO SATYAMURTHI

March 13, 1933

MY DEAR SATYAMURTHI,

I was delighted to have your letter enclosing little Kamala’s letter addressed to me in Hindi. She thinks that she is too young to be my daughter and therefore she has become granddaughter. You ought to learn Hindi if only in order to appreciate the joke and with all your talents I promise you will learn enough Hindi in one month’s time to understand the joke and you have now an army of Hindi teachers in the South. Meanwhile, I must let Kamala interpret the joke to you as you hand the enclosed letter to her, and you must take away the gold pendant from her if she cannot explain the joke to you. Sardarsaheb says it is high time you got quite well and strong again. We are all keeping well and pretty busy as you can imagine.

59. LETTER TO PRABHASHANKAR PATTANI

March 13, 1933

SUJNA BHAISHRI,

I got your letter. I would be content to accept from you as much as you can give. I must, therefore, make my request and leave the matter to your discretion. In relation to you, I am in the same position as Ramabehn. If she does not get something from you, will she complain about that to me?

You seem to believe that you are immortal and that, therefore, the people are safe. But the truth is that in matters in which action by the Ruler is essential, he must act. “Ruler” here may mean, if you wish, his Executive Council or the Assembly. Responsibility must vest with some individual or body so that a tradition may be maintained. When I analyse even your method, I discover the same thing, namely, that power is being exercised, though secretly. You may deceive yourself and the people that things go on by themselves, but the truth is that nothing goes on by itself. Hence in regard to such problems as removal of carrion, admission to schools, etc., about which something ought to be done and about which public opinion also is favourable, legislation is essential. Where there are no laws, there can be no government but only anarchy or misrule. Even Mussolini pretends to run a government. Nobody should object to a declaration that the Durbar, that is, Bhavnagar State, does not recognize untouchability. Sanatanists may, if they wish, continue to follow the practice and enforce it by social sanctions. You follow many principles in your own family, but try and see if you can enforce them in your immediate circle in which you have influence. You will not succeed. You can declare, without hurting anybody, that for the Ruler all subjects are equal. Having done that, don’t mind if no child from the so-called untouchable communities can attend your schools. I have written a note in the Gujarati Harijan about the problem of carcasses.¹ Find some time and read it. Some of what I have said there is addressed to you, though no particulars of name or place are mentioned. Though both of us are old, we are greedy. We have even the courage to do service. We give away all the money we may have. But you have to run a State, and your hair has become grey under the burden. You should also cultivate the company of persons like me. You have accepted a difficult Superficially it might seems that your path and mine are different. Both of us have the same aim and pursue the same goal. Must you, then, insist every time that you will follow your own method? Well, have it your own way. I am concerned with the result and leave niceties of methods to politicians. I will be happy if you can satisfy the Harijans somehow.

I am afraid I have not expressed myself very well but I hope you will generously overlook the insufficiency of the letter.

Take care of your health. I have received much from you, and wish to have much more still.

With good wishes for the welfare of Harijans from,

Mohanadas

60. LETTER TO RANCHHODDAS PATWARI

March 13, 1933

RESPECTED BHAI,

I have your letter. I will not give up hope of you, nor should you give up hope of me. Many have been able to get along together in this way. It has also happened that some were not able to do so. I shall not dismiss our case as belonging to the latter category. It is in God’s hands. However, I shall go on trying.

All reformers are not pure. Nobody is pure. But many struggle to be pure, many love dharma. They believe that untouchability is really an inner matter and that it has no external sign. We must all keep away from such untouchability. No one is born an untouchable. If there is anything in Hinduism which is not to be found in any other religion, which promotes dharma, it should be amenable to rational proof. And its result should be manifest to the eye. The theory of untouchability by birth neither appeals to reason nor has it any visible beneficial effect. If you say that Antyajas should be helped except in the matter of admission to temples, why should you not regard it your dharma to give such help? If you don’t wish to give such help through me, you may give it independently.

You also see the continual degradation of dharma. But do you think it can be prevented by laying exclusive stress on external cleanliness? I am not averse to such cleanliness. I think I observe all rules of cleanliness which I know, but I don’t believe that their observance purifies me spiritually. They help me to preserve physical cleanliness. For preserving spiritual purity, it seems to me that what is necessary is observance of rules of internal cleanliness. These we have forgotten altogether. The result is that, though we have forsaken dharma, lost our spiritual strength and remain absorbed in worldly pursuits, we believe that our dharma is safe and, if somebody like me comes forward to wipe out the blot of untouchability, a loud cry of dharma being in danger is raised and lies are spread against that person. I do wish that people like you should not lend your support to such activities and that is why I plead with you. On matters on which we differ, we should try to understand each other’s point of view and, in regard to other things about which we have no differences between us, we may work separately but with the same aim. If all of us do this, the waste of energy that is taking place at present would stop.

Read this letter when your mind is free from other worries. I am sure you will be able to get some time in Adhoi.

March 13, 1933

DEAR SISTER,

I got your letter. I was looking forward to it.

I have a letter from Jawaharlal in which he has given an account of your health and stated that you have lost much weight. Poona should be the place for you as soon as you can come. I shall try this time to arrange for you a different accommodation. Jawahar too has written about it.

As for Calcutta you should follow your own inclination. I have no opinion in this respect, I do not even have the right to hold any.

Kamala must be by now leaving for Dehra [Dun]. In a few days Sarup will be here Her Kathiawar tour was satisfactory. Indu’ and Chand’ visited me on Saturday. They were fine. Tara’ of course has hardly any time left from playing to come to me. Jamnalal’s Kamalnayan and Ramakrishna are also at the same school.

Do inform me in advance of your coming.

HOME DEPARTMENT
DEAR SIR,

With reference to my application for permission to Drs. Ramnathan and Desai of the Meteorological Department to come to the Yeravda Central Prison in the evening just after dark to show me the use of an astronomical telescope, the Superintendent has just informed me that the Government cannot see their way to grant the permission for reasons stated in the order. I cannot help saying that I was wholly unprepared for this decision. I have known both Yeravda Central Prison and Ahmedabad Central Prison to be opened at night. My application was for the admission not of strangers, but of Government officials, on a day convenient to the authorities only for half an hour for innocent instruction. As I would not like to think that the Government would reject such a simple request, I renew my application. But should the Government refuse to reconsider, would they allow the above mentioned officials to give me such instruction as may be possible just before the prison gates are closed?

65. LETTER TO DR. HIRALAL SHARMA

March 14, 1933

DEAR DR. SHARMA,

I have your letter today and I reply at once before deciphering Amtussalaam’s. What I would like you to do is to go over to the Ashram, see the patients who are still there and will be for some time, and see whether they can be treated there without being removed to a cooler climate. After all, it is not quite so hot in Ahmedabad as one may think till April. The nights are perfectly cool and I have not found even the summer to be trying. I have not hesitated to take my own cure in the Ashram more than once, even though I was advised by some doctors to go to a hill station or at least to a seaside place. But you shall judge for yourself, and then if you find it to be necessary I shall endeavour to select a cooler place. Your going to the Ashram will serve a double purpose. You will know the place and surroundings and you will have your first experience of it. You will also be able to deal with cases of obstinate constipation which are common enough in the Ashram. There are two patients there who are chronic asthmatics and who do not generally go to watering places and try to keep as much as possible in the Ashram itself. You can go to the Ashram whenever you like, and if you want to take Amtussalaam with you, you can do that also.

I am glad your daughter was cured of smallpox through natural treatment.

If you propose to go to the Ashram, you have simply to send a telegram or a letter telling them when you will reach there. I will send a copy of this letter to the Manager.

66. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

March 14, 1933

DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

I have been very slow in sending you the draft constitution.1
Now I have your telegram. I was ready with it only last Sunday and then it awaited the dictating of this letter when your telegram was received. You will see what labour has been put into it. The draft as it comes to you is the 3rd draft prepared by Mahadev. I was simply supervising and suggesting. I think I told you that I read it first and found that it required a lot of re-drafting and thinking out. It was then handed to Shastri2. Shastri went through it carefully and made suggestions. Then Mahadev tackled it. So, you may say that it is the result of the joint labours of three persons. Before it is printed, it should be passed by the Committee of the Society. I feel that Hariji3 should apply his legal mind to it and, as a lawyer, make what amendments and additions he may think necessary before it is considered by the Committee. If he cannot give it the necessary time, then it should be put in the hands of some lawyer who is experienced in drafting constitutions for societies such as ours. No labour now given to it will be a waste of time and effort if the Society is to grow into a big and efficient organization. Constitution alone will not do it, I

2 R. V. Shastri, editor of Harijan
3 Hridaya Nath Kunzru know, it will be the workers who will perform the trick. Nevertheless, without a good workable constitution we will not be able to bind together the different units composing the organization and its branches. After you have the final draft for passing, if there is any time, I would like you to send me a copy of that draft, for, you should know that I have not examined the enclosed draft in all its details.

I am anxious to receive your impressions in detail of your Punjab tour, your experience of the Harijan leaders. Swatmanandji\(^1\) appears to me to be an able man. He is a polished Hindi writer and seems to have original ideas. He tells me that he met you. He has sent me a copy of the representation that was submitted to you by his Society. As you have seen from his report which I have sent you he has no faith in the chief caste Hindus working the different anti-untouchability organizations. We have to give him as much satisfaction as is possible, and if there is nothing whatsoever in his charges, we should be able to tell him so and support our statement with convincing evidence.

I know I have deprived you of the only secretary who was giving you the fullest satisfaction. If you had pleaded your inability to part with Shastri, I should have managed somehow. I have not the courage now to say, “You can have Shastri if you wish”. At the same time I know that you must not remain without an efficient secretary. Would you like me to make a search? If you will, let me know your exact requirements and what you are prepared to pay.

Whenever you make a mistake, I will correct you. I wrote about Jamnalalji to reassure you. Go on with your search within the limits of propriety. It will please me if you get married before Jamnalalji comes out. Do not let even Narandas’s warning upset you. I both understand and fail to understand your partiality for Gujarat. Surely I can have no aversion to a Gujarati girl. It will therefore be quite good if you can find a suitable Gujarati girl. There will be nothing to object in the girl you ultimately get since we do not wish to form an unsuitable connection. Your being easy in mind makes me so, too. Now it is indeed time for you to leave for Almora. Even so, I leave it to you when to go.

You have not even told me Motiba’s name. To whom should I address the letter? However, I have managed somehow. The letter is enclosed.

No point now remains to be answered. I cannot think of anybody to send from the Ashram for Chhaganlal. Can you suggest any name? I will deal with Varnas in Harijan. A copy of Hindi Harijan will go to Shail Ashram.

Two or three Parsi ladies who do Harijan work and a daughter of Lilavati Munshi take turns. Premililabehn and Lilabehn, Lakshmidas’s sister, are with Anandi all the time. She gets a little temperature during day-time, but the doctor says that is common. She drinks fruit juice and milk and is quite happy and cheerful. There is no cause for worry at all. But she was saying that she would be happy if Velabehn was with her. Premililabehn, therefore, seems to have sent a wire. If Velabehn cannot resist her desire, she may certainly come. 72. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

MY DEAR GHANSHYAMDAS,

I am able only today to reach your letter of 8th March.

What I meant about a Selection Board was this. You should appoint a small and efficient committee consisting of, say, a man like Thadani and someone from St. Stephen’s College and another person as Secretary with you and Thakkar Bapa as members ex-officio. This Committee would invite applicants for the David Scheme Scholarships. It will examine the applications and recommend them to the Board. The Board will, if it accepts the recommendations, grant the scholarships. This Committee will also be invited to frame a scheme giving conditions under which scholarships should be given describing the qualifications of the candidates and it will be under these conditions that applications would be invited. I would suggest the Committee keeping in touch with Mr. David in so far as he may be willing to assist the Committee with his informal guidance and advice.

1 This was signed for Gandhiji by Mahadev Desai.
2 The scheme was to collect a fund from “caste Hindus for the higher education of a select number of Harijan boys and girls”. Vide “Higher Education for Harijans”, 25-2-1933.
So much about the Selection Board.

With reference to the donations, I am not satisfied with what you say. I had the fear that there might not be an adequate response to an appeal for such donations. I had said as much to Mr. David when I told him why even though I liked his scheme I was reluctant to back it publicly. I advised him therefore to consult you and to consult the Bombay Board which he did, and both of you warmly took it up. You even advertised it in the draft constitution. I therefore felt encouraged after having waited for a long time to bless the scheme in the Harijan. I do feel that there must be some earmarked donations apart from the general collections. I do not like the idea of setting apart sums from the general collections already made. We must draw, if we at all can, some sanatanists among the donors. Anyway, that’s my idea, and that’s also Jamnalalji’s, Sardar Vallabhbhai’s and of all of us. I have already approached Janaki Devi to give the scheme Rs. 2,500/-and I am presently going to write to others. I would like to include your name among the donors and publish it.

Before writing anything in the Harijan, I shall await your considered reply to this.

73. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

March 16, 1933

Dear Satisbabu,

I have your letter. I am making use of the translation you have sent me, and of the same thing in Bengali Mahadev has given a translation for Gujarati Harijan. I had already seen the translation of your article in the Hindi Harijan. What you say about the imperfection of the latter has been before me also and I have drawn the Editor’s pointed attention to it. He is a willing worker and accepts all suggestions with good grace. You will therefore notice a steady improvement in it.

I shall continue to send you the English articles as they get ready. My writing or dictating them has got to be finished by Thursday morning. Nothing begins before Monday. The bulk is finished between Tuesday and Wednesday.

Your analysis of the 48 columns is interesting. No wonder you

1 “Kabuli Zulam”, published in Harijan, 1-4-1933 are commanding an ever-increasing circulation. All this is work after your heart and it is a good thing. There is no reason why you should not command a circulation of 10,000 or even more. I hope you have a good staff of workers. You must not break under the strain. I should love to learn Bengali, if only to read your articles, but, for the time being, that must remain only a dream.

I see you have already sent me the first form of your Hindi introduction to the Ramayana. I am keeping it by me to read it as soon as I find the time.

Yours sincerely,

74. LETTER TO G. K. DEVDHAR

March 16, 1933

MY DEAR DEVDHAR,

I have your letter about Prof. Purandare. The thing is this. He had delivered some addresses in Poona. He was brought to me by Haribhau. Haribhau told me that his addresses were well received, and so in order to begin the propaganda and in order to help Purandare I suggested that his speeches should be published in book form. He was quite agreeable. He told me that his wants were very few and that he would gladly dedicate himself to the cause. I asked him to tell me what he would require for his labour in collecting the speeches, perhaps even rewriting them, examining proofs, etc. He would not name the sum although I pressed him hard. But he told me that he would be entirely satisfied with whatever I named and got from the Central Board. When the book was finished and the time came for payment I hesitated to name the sum. I therefore referred the matter to Haribhau. He suggested Rs. 125. I immediately accepted the amount and had the cheque prepared, when, lo and behold, Prof. Purandare declined to accept the money and wanted “Rs. 1000, if not Rs. 3,000”.

Since then the story is one of my receiving angry letters of abuse and nothing else. That, however, is not a matter of much moment. I told him that he could have the book against payment of the printing charges. He disputed the reasonableness of the printing bill saying that it was exorbitant. I said I would accept any sum that might be fixed by an independent arbitrator. He would not accept that. There is much more that I could write, but I think this is enough.

Now, I am acting as a Trustee for the Central Board. How can I possibly ask the Central Board, without the slightest justification, to pay more? The translation rights, etc., he can have. There is not much demand even for the books that we have. I would gladly say that if there is any surplus left after discharging the printers’ bill, he should have it. What more is it possible to offer?

75. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

March 16, 1933

MY DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

I promised to write to you at length in reply to your complaint of the 11th instant.¹ You have done well in writing as freely you have done. That enables me to explain what I have done. Perhaps your letter was dictated without your having seen the Harijan. I dealt with Swatmadas’s letter without mentioning his name, or the Province, or the organizations and purposely gave it a general colouring, so that even Swatmadas could not make out that I had built my article² on his letter, and you will be agreeably surprised to know that Lele thought that it had reference to Bombay. This is the way I have successfully dealt with so many things for over a generation. But at the same time I did not want to wait till you had dealt with the report yourself and were able to send me your observations. That would have been a long drawn out agony, whereas what I wanted to do was to drive a lesson home as early as possible. The particular Province and the particular complaints about particular organizations were left untouched and awaited treatment till after you had examined the whole question. Do you see anything wrong in this method? Have the Punjab organizations been compromised in any manner or Swatmadas given undeserved credit? In the hypothetical article in the Harijan I have not even said that the writer’s complaints were true. I simply called for self-introspection on the part of the uplift organizations throughout India. And let me tell you that that article is serving its purpose. It is still open to you, and I want you to investigate all the complaints of Swatmadas and give me your reply so that I can deal with them. I know that the Punjab organizations mentioned by Swatmadas are not all affiliated to the central organization. That should not matter. Nor need these organizations take it amiss if we made courteous enquiries of them. Their reception of your enquiry would naturally depend upon the manner of it. You, I know, would always write in a courteous tone and perfectly friendly manner, and make your intention perfectly clear that you wanted to help them as a friend and not approach them in an inquisitorial manner. However, that is really my suggestion. You will do whatever you think is proper, and if you think that no enquiry is necessary you will say so and I shall be quite satisfied. My purpose is served if I have made it clear to you that there was nothing improper in my having dealt with the subject anonymously and in a perfectly general manner.

¹ The addressee had generally complained against Swatmadas, calling him a “young enthusiast” “without any work behind him” and, in answer to Gandhiji’s suggestion that Swatmadas’s report containing strictures against various anti-untouchability bodies be circulated among them, had said that it would not be courteous to do so.

² Vide “As They See Us”, 4-3-1933.

As to Swatmadas himself, I was not at all unprepared for your description of him. But we have to deal with and come in contact with such young men. It is inevitable. We are responsible for what they are and it serves us right. Therefore we have to deal with them in the gentlest manner possible, listen to them most patiently, and try to take what service it may be possible to take from them. I think this covers all the points raised in your letter.

I hope you had my letter sent you on the 14th, and the draft constitution went to you yesterday by registered post. I sent you a telegram also advising you of its despatch.

Your description of the Punjab Alienation of Land Act makes bad reading. Can nothing be done to correct the mischief? I would like you to send me a copy of that Act.

Yours sincerely,

76. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 16, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS.

I have your letter of the 11th. What you say is perfectly correct. This seems to be the last ordeal. I should like to sacrifice everything in it. However, if we could always to do what we liked, all of us would be kings.

I have already informed you that Parachure Shastri has gone to his place. My previous letters may have helped you to arrive at your decision, but it was my duty to leave the decision to you which in my impatience I failed to do.

From whom has Parashuram borrowed? The news has perturbed me. Who has been lending him? Give me all details. Let me know Parashuram’s weaknesses. We should tolerate much, but please remember that there is a limit even to that.

Co-operation and non-co-operation either may be one’s duty.

A pair of brass pots, a thali and a tapeli—I hope Lakshmi will not get crushed under the weight of all these things. Even these are marks of love, however, but I am glad that you refused to be a party. I am also glad that Velabehn and others decided to give something. I cannot judge from here where the limit should have been put. Didn’t I myself wish to give Lakshmi a string of beads, when I was reluctant to give anything to Rami? Love shows itself in such contradictory forms. I do not doubt your sincerity in the least [in refusing to join]. It is the wisdom of giving a pair of pots which should be doubted.

You will read the copy of my letter to Dr. Sharma which I am enclosing. I will not therefore write more on the subject. Do you agree with what I have written to him? A letter for Marybehn¹ also is enclosed.

78. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

March 17, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

This is Friday morning 3.15. Your letter came in due time.

I must be brief today as I have many other important letters to write. I have no doubt whatsoever that your progress will continue if I have succeeded in explaining my instructions about deep breathing and gentle breathing whilst lying flat on your back. With plenty of good bhaji³ constipation must yield. Whilst you have to avoid bread, paupau should be taken if available.

I suspended my saltless last week without making any change in the diet. I simply began taking salt with the fruit—not more than 30 grains altogether during the day. The only change I can report is that the weight went up yesterday to 105. There has been no increase in milk or fruit. But I am not able to say whether the increase is due to salt. We shall see.

Verrier seems to have calmed down now and definitely off the marriage. Whether they will ever accept the restriction as to intermarriage between members of the same Ashram, it is difficult to

79. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 17, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

While waiting for the others to arrive for the morning prayer, I wrote out a letter to Mirabehn and one to Ba. I made them brief and started this. I read Narahari’s letter and your two letters. I have discussed these only briefly. Where is the time? I however put down the thoughts which occur to me.

You should invite Narahari to see you and try to understand his point of view. I know his temperament very well. He is one of the few sincere workers who have come together in the Ashram. They should all learn to become one as milk with sugar. If they cannot do this, the Ashram is bound to perish. Naturally, it is the responsibility of the secretary to see that different parts of an organization work in harmony. It is my duty to explain this clearly to you. The secretary is the centre of an organization. Those who do not feel the pull of his attraction are outsiders in that organization. The secretary should either free them or give them a proper place in the organization and keep them in it. You cannot regard Narahari as an outsider. We look upon certain persons as the limbs of the body that is the Ashram. We can never imagine the Ashram without them. If we can imagine it without them, we can imagine it without ourselves too, which would mean the end of the Ashram.

I have only stated the principle. You may draw from it what lesson you can.

Narahari should be regarded as an expert in the field of education. In that field, therefore, we should subordinate our views to his. If in consequence we find that mistakes are being made, we should let them be made and draw the expert’s attention to them afterwards. There is no other way, and there can be none. If anybody tries to point out my mistake in my own field, I would not readily admit it. I must, therefore, taste the bitterness of failure. This holds true of all other fields. In this, too, I have stated only the general principle.
All persons of the category of Maganbhai should have free access to the books. If as a result some books are spoiled or lost, we should write them off rather than create unpleasantness. The rules for using the books should be pasted on the walls at numerous places. In big libraries, even ordinary members are permitted to take them out of the shelves. If they do not put them back in their places after they have done with them, they leave them on the table, and at the end of the day the librarian puts them back in the shelves. The inmates of the Ashram should have free access to the books. They can have the keys whenever they wish. If you cannot decide who should be treated as inmates of the Ashram, you may draw up a list of selected names of persons who should be permitted to take out books and ask for the keys.

If the children go to bed at 8.15 p.m., they should be permitted to sleep from 8.30 p.m. to 4.30 a.m. without fear. In addition, they should also get one full hour during day-time for sleeping. You will have to consider who may be described as children. You may respect the parents’ wishes in this matter.

A teacher should get time to prepare himself. I cannot accept Chimanlal’s excuse that he gets no time. If one undertakes a job, one must do it well, otherwise one ought not to undertake it. To undertake a job and not to do it well is a form of untruth. If a person who is driving a car does not drive it carefully, he will be committing a crime. Similarly, if a person who has undertaken to teach something does not do it well, he will commit a greater crime than that driver. Nobody should undertake anything which is beyond his capacity.

We should faithfully obey Kuvalayanandji’s instructions regarding exercise.

The conclusion to be drawn from all this is that all of you should sit with Narahari, discuss the problem frankly and do what you think best.

However, do only as much from this as you can easily do. I am far away from there. After all it is you who have to decide and act. It is you who have to run the Ashram and will have to accept the responsibility. I may, therefore, make suggestions to you but you should have complete freedom to accept or reject them. You should assume that you have that freedom.

Prema also is involved in all this. She should learn to control her tongue and restrain her obstinacy. She behaves in such a manner as to wipe out all that she does. Try to persuade her as much as you can. If you wish to free her from any responsibility, you may do so. If her working the whole day does not let her have peace of mind, she should reduce her work. If she has such peace, she should be able to listen to criticism from anybody.

80. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

March 17, 1933

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

We are all so glad that your brother is getting better.

The Harijan tells you all about the activities in connection with untouchability. Though the storm is raging on all sides, somehow or other I am enjoying perfect peace. This temple-entry question is indirectly solving many spiritual problems. It has given and is still giving the movement its real religious background. Many thought, and some still think, that the question is purely political and economic. It is now being recognized that everything else depends upon the religious conversion of caste Hindus. For, that is the significance of temple-entry. It may be that the religious conversion may not come at all in our time. It may turn out that I had underrated the strength of the superstition. Nevertheless, the issue is becoming clear day by day. Untouchability will not have gone without temple-entry and all it signifies—temple-entry not at the point of the bayonet but at the will of the people. I have not yet succeeded in showing the sanatanists that the two Bills do not seek to interfere with Hindu conscience in any shape or form. They are simply meant to remove the legal obstacle to the freest exercise of Hindu conscience. It has been a matter of great grief to me that Government have not seen this very clear intention of the two Bills. But I have purposely refrained from dwelling on that aspect in the Harijan. I have simply remained satisfied with having written¹ to the Viceroy.

Love from us all to all.

March 17, 1933

MY DEAR LELE,

I have your three letters. I must confess that I am not satisfied with your two previous letters. The letter I have published¹ was surely composed as if it was meant for publication and meant also to show that the balance had gone into the Harijan pockets. You may not have meant it for publication, but then there was no meaning in writing that letter. You are not a mere publishing department so that you can boast that your overhead charges were only 10% of the cost of your publishing activity. If you will read the resolution which brought into being these committees, my meaning will be clear to you.

I note you do not want me to publish the figures that you have sent me.

87. LETTER TO N.

March 17, 1933

MY DEAR N.,

I have your letter. I had intended to write this letter in my own hand, but that could not be done. An unexpected visitor came on the scene and I became helpless.

My spirit hovers about you as a mother’s about her lost child. I would love to own you as a child, but I have not got that trust in you yet. It may be no fault of yours, but there it is. You should know the whole of my mind. That is the only way I can guide you and the only way in which I can ever own you as a daughter.

I do feel that you are again in a trap. There is only one spiritual husband, companion and friend to all, both men and women, and that is God, whom I know more fully as Truth. Before God alone there is no sex. He alone is pure spirit. All other marriage, however lofty-minded both parties may be, is more or less carnal. For a person who has dedicated himself or herself to the service of humanity there is no such thing as exclusive relationship.

If, therefore, you will take my word, you will not travel from error to error, as you seem to me to be doing just now. Your promise is to have no exclusive or secret or private companionship. You are simply wedded to your work and nothing else.

You should write regularly.

May Truth, which is God, be your sole guide, friend, companion and rock of ages.

Yours sincerely,

Though as a vegetarian I do not like the idea of poultry-farming and chicken egg-selling, I am unable to say that no Harijan Seva Organization should do so, and if you feel like introducing that industry, you should unhesitatingly do so. Is this ordinary hatching of eggs or is it the new innocent method of the laying of sterile eggs?

89. LETTER TO MARGARETE SPIEGEL

March 17, 1933

MY DEAR MARGARETE,

Why do you want to come here for three days or at the most a fortnight? If you have at all imbibed the central truth of the Gita, it will tell you that this kind of wish has got to be subjugated and sublimated into pure action, which for you consists in doing your duty there. You should hold on to your savings, and if you cannot restrain yourself from spending them somehow, you should send them here for the Harijan cause.

I do hope you got all my previous letters, as also the Harijan which is being posted to you every week.

Love from us both.

90. LETTER TO NARAHARI D. PARIKH

March 17, 1933

CHI. NARAHARI,

Why did you tear up your letter to Mahadev? Just think how much anger and violence there was in your action. Narandas put the pieces together, reconstructed the whole letter and sent it here. It was not right for you to tear up the letter, no matter how much at fault
Narandas was. I have gone through your letter and also the brief reply Narandas has sent to Mahadev. I have conveyed to Narandas in short the impression which was produced on me, and have suggested that he should show you that letter.

It is true that my trust in Narandas is as complete as you have heard it is. That is my nature. It is not that I have such trust in him alone. I have similar trust in you, Panditji, Kaka and others whose names you yourself can supply. I would never believe anything against any of them unless I had direct evidence. Hence, there was—should have been—nothing surprising in what you heard. Apart from it, this is what I believe regarding Narandas. He has in him the qualities of efficiency, patience, power of discrimination, balance of mind, impartiality and firmness, of the highest order. They have cast a spell on me. I therefore wish that you and other co-workers should appreciate his qualities and take full advantage of his services. However, he cannot have these merits, nor can others see them in him, simply because I attribute them to him. How can you help if you fail to see them? And it is clear that if you fail to see them, you cannot avail yourself of his services even as much as you may wish. So much about my faith in Narandas. Apart from that, however, I liked your letter very much. It is not necessary, and I have not the time, to analyse the letter in detail or point out your errors that it shows. I think I have drawn from it the necessary lesson. You will see this from the suggestions which I have made to Narandas.

What I expect you to do is that you should see Narandas, have a quiet discussion with him and persuade him to make the changes which seem necessary to you. Do not press the points which Narandas finds unacceptable. I don’t think that you wish, or believe it desirable, that the charge of the Ashram should be entrusted to somebody else. Do tell me if that is what you wish or think. But if that is not so, your duty is to persuade Narandas as much as you can. You are responsible for the welfare of the Ashram quite as much as I or Narandas or others. We are what we are, and it is we who will make the Ashram what it will be. You cannot, therefore, regard yourself as an outsider and disclaim responsibility for it, since the bond among the inmates of the Ashram is an indissoluble one as that in a Hindu marriage. The Gower Bill has not still been passed into a law; but even when it has, those who wish to adhere to the present form of indissoluble marriage will certainly do so. The Gower Bill has for its subject matter forced marriages and ill-matched pairs. I am sure you will not regard our marriage as of that type. It is a marriage of choice. You should bear this in mind and know that you have no choice but to endure what is inevitable and act accordingly. I have read your letter in some haste.
If there is anything in it about which I should do something but which has escaped my attention please do let me know.

EVILS A RESULT

In the Telugu districts as well as the adjoining Tamil districts, Madigas and Malas, both of whom are at present untouchables, kill cows and buffaloes for purposes of sacrifice to Matamma Mariyamma and Gangamma. There is no doubt that a certain number of caste people also take vows before these goddesses in times of emergency and calamity, but the actual sacrifice is done by the so-called outcastes. The untouchables not only sacrifice animals in public but eat the beef. They also eat carrion. Caste Hindus do not, but they do freely eat pork. I would request you, therefore, to advise the untouchables to give up this sacrifice and carrion-eating. The latter is responsible for their physical degeneration. Could you not also send a message for us who are working in the cause of anti-untouchability?

This is a condensed extract from a long letter from the Secretary of the Andhra Provincial Ryots’ Association. There is no doubt that this habit of carrion-eating, and especially beef-eating, has a great deal to do with the prevalent prejudice, but in no other thing is the weakness of Hinduism, or rather of caste Hindus, betrayed so forcibly as in regarding a portion of fellow-Hindus to be untouchable and neglecting them in the cruellest manner possible. We have, therefore, only ourselves to thank that the untouchables are what they are. But it is not yet too late to mend. The Harijans should realize that untouchability is dead and gone. Its evil effect will persist for a long time to come. The duration will be the measure of our joint neglect.
Greater by far is the responsibility of the caste Hindus. If they will do their duty and work whole-heartedly, they will certainly succeed in stopping these sacrifices and the habit of carrion-eating. Nothing but the spread of enlightenment is required to rid the community of evil superstition and evil habits. But I cannot too often remind the reformers and caste Hindus in general that they will not purify Harijans of any single one of the evil habits, if they will make the reform the condition of the removal of untouchability. Rather let us realize that the evils are a result, and not a cause, of untouchability, anyway most decidedly not at the present moment.

So far as carrion-eating is concerned, the reader will find concrete suggestions which I have made in the Gujarati columns of _Harijanbandhu_ and which have been translated for these columns.¹

CHRISTIAN HARIJANS

‘Christian Harijans’ should be a contradiction in terms. For, untouchability that is sought to be driven out of India is the special curse (according to the reformers) or the privilege (according to the sanatanists) of Hinduism. But the Hindu contact has so infected the Christian that at least in Malabar it seems to show itself among Christians almost in the same form as among Hindus. Thus writes a Malabar Christian to Sjt. Amritlal Thakkar:²

> From the days of the famous Vaikom Satyagraha, the real condition of > the Travancore Harijans . . . has been brought to light to a very great extent, > but it is not yet suspected or detected . . . that the Christian Harijan in > Travancore is not [sic], in matter of civic or social rights and in abject > poverty, absolutely the same as his Hindu Harijan brother. Pulayas or > Cherumas, Parayas or Sambhavas with Ignaaos or Ina Pulayas and some other > minor communities number about 6,00,000 according to the last year’s census > report and are considered the lowest strata of the outcaste societies of > Travancore.

> Converted (Christian) Pulayas or Parayas as a whole are as good, or as > bad, as the others of the communities, except in a few cities like Trivandrum, > where the difference, if there is any, exists more in pretension of the > converted, though hardly any in reality, and where a handful of them may be a > little more literate or a little better employed than those of the others.

> Public institutions, roads, inns, rest houses, temples, churches, court > houses, business houses, shops, streets and even taverns that are unappro-

² Only extracts are reproduced here.
achable by the one are exactly to the same extent unapproachable by the other. To both, caste men like Nambudiris are unseeable to this day.

Prosperous (Christian communities like Nadars in the South and Syrians in the North . . . are to us what no-change sanatanists are to our Hindu Harijan brother. Hundreds of churches unapproachable by us (Harijans, either Christian or Hindu) will explain why Christian Harijans of the bottom ranks have to make common cause with their fellow outcaste brothers. . . .

Allow us to add that we, being agricultural serfs mostly, have been and are dependent on the caste Hindu and Christian masters and that, owing to increasing poverty and fragmentation of land, we are day by day reduced to greater and greater economic plight. . . .

This state of things is no doubt a disgrace to Hinduism but it is no less so to Christianity, if not more so. The present movement is automatically helping the Christian Harijans, but I should be surprised if advantage is not being taken of the movement to drive out untouchability from the church. I hope too that the numerous educated Nadars and Ezhavas are putting forth their best effort to abolish the distinctions among Harijans themselves.

93. WHAT HARIJANS THINK

The reader must have read and digested what Thakkar Bapa, as he is endearingly called in Gujarat, especially by Harijans, said in the telegraphic account of his tour in the Punjab, published in the last issue of _Harijan_. Harijan deputations that waited on him have sent me copies of the addresses they presented to him. The one from the Ad Dharma Mandal of Jullundur City and Balmic Ad Dharma Mandal of Lahore City contains these observations:

The high-class proud Hindus of the Punjab Province have degraded and lowered our position in the society to an unbreakable extent. They think themselves to be polluted if we happen to touch them. Our entry at the public places and getting water from the public wells and tanks is thought objectionable. Hindu washermen and barbers are not prepared to serve us in their respective occupations. We are not allowed to dine at Hindu hotels. We are not privileged to use bands, palanquins on the occasions of our marriage celebrations. We are forced to carry the palanquins of Hindu brides at their marriage. If we happen to put on good clothes, they irritate them. The depressed classes of the Punjab Province are faced by many troubles. High-class Hindus have pressed and degraded them from all sides. Caste question has proved very troublesome. Even the houses in which they live are not considered their property. In the villages and towns their economic condition is very much degraded, and for their uplift a vigorous campaign of propaganda is required.

If the condition is as bad as this in the advanced Punjab, what must it be in the other Provinces of India? And as would be clear from Thakkar Bapa’s wire, law seems to have conspired with the caste Hindus in depriving the Harijans of even the right of owning agricultural land. Let us hope that the numerous uplift associations of the Punjab will make a united effort to remove at once some of the numerous disabilities enumerated above.

_Harijan, 18-3-1933_

94. EVEN UNTO THESE LAST

For the heading of this article I have dared to steal from Ruskin a classical phrase stolen by him in his turn from the Bible. I have added ‘even’ to the original and changed ‘this’ into ‘these’ to bring out the whole sense of what I want to say. Among the Harijans the poor scavenger or the Bhangi seems to stand last in the list, though he is perhaps the most important and indispensable member of society, as indispensable to it as a mother is to her children in one respect. The Bhangi attends to the sanitation of society as a mother to that of her children. If the caste men had to do the scavenging for themselves, some of the methods that the Bhangi has to submit to for doing his work would have been swept away long ago. I copy the following from a letter of the Anti-untouchability Board of Muttra to its Municipal Board:¹

. . . He must be a heartless fellow who has remained unmoved at the pathetic sight of a slender, aged and emaciated woman carrying, and being crushed under, the weight of a basket full of night-soil over her head every morning from the city lanes to the trenching ground or the flushing pit. The practice, though old, is inhuman, cruel and a relic of barbaric days. It is most unhygienic. . . . The solution is simple. Just purchase hand-driven trolleys and let these speechless servants of yours use the trolley as a carrier rather than the head. Another matter for your consideration. Every privy should be provided with metal or earthen basins, so that the process of removal of night-soil may be rendered less uncleanly.

Let not the reader laugh at the somewhat high-flown language of the writer. What he has said is God’s truth. The Bhangis have hitherto done their work uncomplainingly, and therefore the caste men have not cared to know how these have served society for centuries. If we had not regarded these servants of society as untouchables, we would not have shut our eyes upon them or their work. Having chosen to do so and having confined them to infernos, we ourselves daily descend to these infernos called privies and do not care to look at the dirt about us or to notice the stink that pervades these places. What is true of the Bhangis and the municipality of Muttra is true more or less of all the Bhangis and all the municipalities of India. The reform suggested by the Anti-untouchability Board of Muttra is most desirable and can be undertaken without much cost by every municipality.

I read the other day a notice in the Leader of Allahabad of the scavenging work, inaugurated by a zamindar, in the Allahabad streets, and hardly had the work gone on for two days, when the enthusiastic young men who had undertaken this glorious service thought of replacing the baskets by a better arrangement. Let me again quote, this time from the Leader dated February 27:

An effort is being made by the anti-untouchability workers to replace the baskets at present in use by the sweepers for the disposal of rubbish from private latrines with light iron hand-carts fitted with detachable buckets. According to the proposed scheme, the cost of such carts would be borne by the employers of the sweepers. It is understood the Manager of the Allahabad Law Journal Co., has generously undertaken to have a model baby filth removal cart constructed at his own expense for propaganda work. According to the scheme, every private latrine would have to be provided with two receptacles. An anonymous donation has been received from a high caste Brahmin woman for the construction of a public bath-room at or near Kalimaika Asthan. This work would be undertaken as soon as proper drainage and water-supply arrangements are made by the municipal authorities in the locality in question.

I hope that the enthusiasm has not died down during the weeks that have intervened between the date of the report and now. Some earnest workers have simply to persist and the much-needed reform can be inaugurated in every town and city.

If the report that a Brahmin lady has generously come forward with her donation for the construction of a public bath-room is true, it would delight the heart of Sjt. Hiralal Shah, who has been energetically pursuing his proposal for bath and change of clothes for sweepers after they have performed their daily task.¹

There are thus three reforms which can be with a little forethought and very little extra cost inaugurated throughout India, resulting in comfort and cleanliness for Harijans and promotion of the health of society in general. All that is required is that we should behave ‘even unto these last’ members of society as we would unto ourselves.

95. POSERS

An iconoclast schoolmaster asks the following three questions.

1. Is it necessary for a Hindu, following the life of Shri Ramachandra, also to go and see his image in the temple? Is _darshan_ better than action?

2. If we bow our head or join our hands before a living person, he replies in return, but the image does not. Then what is the use of doing it? What is the use of writing letters to one who never replies?

3. The person, whose image a Hindu adores, might have committed some wrongs in his lifetime. Will not the adorer be harmed by copying those wrongs, which he is likely to copy if he worships his image?

Questions like these have been asked and answered often enough before now. But the temple-entry question has revived them and they torment honest doubters like the correspondent, as if they had never been raised and answered before. I must do the best I can, though I doubt if doubters like the correspondent will be satisfied.

It is not necessary for any Hindu to go to a temple to worship (the image of) Ramachandra. But it is for him who cannot contemplate his Rama without looking at his image in a temple. It may be unfortunate, but it is true that his Rama resides in that temple as nowhere else. I would not disturb that simple faith.

The sub-question in the first question is badly put. There is no question of comparison between the _darshan_ and the deed. If there was, I would unhesitatingly say that the deed is better. But the function of _darshan_ is to enable the deed to be done, to steady and purify the soul. Thus, _darshan_ is not a substitute for right doing. It is an encouragement for it.

In asking the second question, the schoolmaster has missed the whole point of temple-worship. When I bow to a living person and he returns it, it is a mutual exchange of courtesy and there is no particular merit about it. It may be a sign of good breeding. Temple-going is for the purification of the soul. The worshipper draws the best out of himself. In greeting a living being, he may draw the best out of the person greeted, if the greeting is selfless. A living being is more or less fallible like oneself. But in the temple, one worships the living God, perfect beyond imagination. Letters written to living persons often end in heartbreaking, even when they are answered, and there is no guarantee of their being always answered. Letters to God, who, according to the devotee’s imagination, resides in temples, require neither pen nor ink nor paper, not even speech. Mere mute worship constitutes the letter which brings its own unfailing answer. The whole function is a beautiful exercise of faith. Here there is no waste of effort, no heart-breaking, no danger of being misunderstood. The writer must try to understand the simple philosophy lying behind the worship in temples or mosques or churches. He will understand my meaning better if he will realize that I make no distinction between these different abodes of God. They are what faith has made them. They are an answer to man’s craving somehow to reach the Unseen.

The third question shows, perhaps, that the correspondent has not taken the trouble of understanding the Hindu theory of incarnations. For the faithful Hindu, his incarnation is without blemish. Krishna of the Hindu devotee is a perfect being. He is unconcerned with the harsh judgment of the critics. Millions of devotees of Krishna and Rama have had their lives transformed through their contemplation of God by these names. How this phenomenon happens I do not know. It is a mystery. I have not attempted to prove A. Though my reason and heart long ago realized the highest attribute and name of God as Truth, I recognize Truth by the name of Rama. In the darkest hour of my trial, that one name has saved me and is still saving me. It may be the association of childhood, it may be the fascination that Tulsidas has wrought on me. But the potent fact is there, and as I write these lines, my memory revives the scenes of my childhood when I used daily to visit the Ramji Mandir adjacent to my ancestral home. My Rama then resided there. He saved me from many fears and sins. It was no superstition for me. The custodian of the idol may have been a bad man. I know nothing against him. Misddeeds might have gone on in the temple. Again I know nothing of them, therefore, they would not affect one. What was and is true of one is true of millions of Hindus. I want my Harijan brother, if he wishes, to share this temple-worship with the millions of his co-religionists, the so-called caste men. It is the latter’s duty to throw open their temples their Harijan brethren. Temple-worship supplies the felt spiritual want of the human race. It admits of reform. But it will live as long as man lives.

_Harijan_, 18-3-1933
96. THE DANGER OF IMITATION

I am a humble student of philosophy and so I thoroughly appreciate the movement for the removal of untouchability which has hindered the progress of a large portion of mankind. I can also appreciate the way of penance by fast, but there is one difficulty in my way. You know that the Bhagavad Gita has said, “What the great ones do, the others follow”, and if a great soul like you set the example of fasting, is there no danger of others blindly imitating you, and quoting your example in support? Then again, you talk of the inner voice, and everybody will claim to speak in the name of the inner voice, and it will be held responsible for mixed marriages, mixed dinners, and consequent disruption of society. And when such reckless indiscipline takes place in the name of the inner voice, how would you propose to raise the level of the ordinary men, especially of untouchables?

I must confess that I have considerably abridged the original which is fairly long. But I am sure that the substance of the correspondent’s argument has not in any way been lost in the abridgment. My answer is simple. I accept the teaching of the Gita verse that the correspondent has quoted. Surely, it was meant to warn leaders against conduct that might, if copied, result in harm to society. It cannot possibly apply to conduct whose intelligent imitation can do no harm. For if it did, it would mean an end to all progress and the setting of good examples. There is no such thing in human affairs as insurance against all danger. There is always danger of even the most irreproachable conduct being misinterpreted and misapplied, but the right thing has got to be, and has always been, done, in spite of the risk of misinterpretation and misapplication. I hold my fast to have been wholly good and obligatory on me. If the whole of mankind imitated the fast subject to all its conditions, no harm could result. A fast that was calculated to affect a big movement for the better could not be given up because of the fear of some people abusing it. Penitential fasting is admittedly a good institution.

And lastly, fasting is its own safeguard against abuse. Not many people would be willing to fast, and much fewer still would be able to do so, even though they might be willing.

Much the same may be said about the inner voice. Nobody has to my knowledge questioned the possibility of the inner voice speaking to some, and it is a gain to the world even if one person’s claim to speak under the authority of the inner voice can be really sustained. Many may make the claim, but not all will be able to substantiate it. But it cannot and ought not to be suppressed for the sake of preventing false claimants. There is no danger whatsoever if many people could truthfully represent the inner voice. But, unfortunately, there is no remedy against hypocrisy. Virtue must not be suppressed because many will feign it. Men have always been found throughout the world claiming to speak for the inner voice. But no harm has yet overtaken the world through their short-lived activities. Before one is able to listen to that voice, one has to go through a long and fairly severe course of training, and when it is the inner voice that speaks it is unmistakable. The world cannot be successfully fooled for all time. There is, therefore, no danger of anarchy setting in because a humble man like me will not be suppressed and will dare to claim the authority of the inner voice, when he believes that he has heard it. Unbridled licence is undoubtedly in the air. Everywhere one sees unrest, whether in the religious field or any other. The spirit of independence is abroad. Youth has always been found to be most impressionable and, therefore, it has naturally fallen a prey to this spirit; and in its haste to realize independence it has missed the central fact that independence can only come out of interdependence and that it is a fruit of long training in self-restraint. It has forgotten that independence is never synonymous with indulgence. The blame for the wildnesses of youth lies, therefore, at the door of the spirit of the times. It would be wrong to impute it to the assertion of sterling independence based upon a conscious practice of self-restraint and an ever-increasing effort implicitly to obey the will of God speaking within and then known as the inner voice.

It is now, perhaps, easy enough to answer the third question of the humble philosopher. The only way to raise the level of Harijans is for the Harijan servants to raise their own level by prayer and penitential fasting and by so training their acoustic faculty as to listen to the inner voice.

97. LETTER TO DR. MOHAMMAD ALAM

March 18, 1933

DEAR DR. ALAM,

You have certainly supplied me with sufficient material to precipitate a quarrel in the family, but as I am a votary of ahimsa, you are quite safe. But whatever Begum Alam might have to say about your betrayal, you have certainly done me a good turn. For you have given me in Anwar one more charming correspondent in Urdu. Even for selfish reasons also, therefore, I shall avoid being a cause of quarrel between you and Begum Alam.

I am glad you are getting better and that you will be soon going to Calcutta for finishing the course of treatment. Let us hope that will be the last. You will be glad to know that we are all keeping well, often thinking of so many of our mutual friends.

March 18, 1933

MRS. NARGIS CAPTAIN,

I have your letter. What a frail body God has given We have to be thankful to Him that your mind remains as fresh as ever, though the body so often fails you.

I hope you will see me on your way back to Bombay.

I take it that you will pass the hot months in Panchgani. Like the poor, Harijans are with you wherever you go, therefore, even in Panchgani you will have some Harijans to move amongst and care for. That’s what Khambhatta is going to do during the two months that he wants to pass in Mahabaleshwar.

I enclose herewith a returned letter which I had sent to you at Kumbhakonam.

100. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

March 18, 1933

DEAR SATISBABU,

I did not like your telegram to the Harijan. It was published by Shastri as he did not know all the implications and had no time to refer it to me and so used his own discretion and published it. If it had come to me, I would have withheld it. My own view you will learn from the copy I am sending you herewith of my reply to the British Indian Association. As you will see, that letter too is not for publication. I think until there is any danger we should try to affect the opinion of pro-changers by arguing with them but not engaging in a public controversy which instead of easing the position, will only aggravate it. If the controversy forced itself upon our attention, we should not hesitate to take it up. So much for our conduct.

Now, for the quality of your argument. You cannot say that untouchability is a greater curse in Bengal than in Madras. That means that it is of a more virulent type in Bengal than in Madras, which is certainly not the truth. In fact, there is no pollution by touch or sight or shadow in Bengal as in Madras. Bengal untouchability is peculiar and confined to the restriction upon the handling of water. Bad as even this is, it is wholly different from the unthinkable atrocities of the Madras type. What you want to say is that the number of untouchables according to the Bengal definition is much larger in Bengal than in Madras. If you had put the argument that way, it would not have lost its force. All therefore that was necessary was to remove the offensive sentence: “I repeat . . . Madras.” And, are you right in saying that the Government definition is identical with the definition of S.U.S.? Then you cannot omit the fact that some of those who are classed as untouchables by the Bengal Government themselves resent the inclusion. You also seem to think that the councillors want to repudiate the Pact wholly and restore the original. I have not understood their demand in that light. If it was so, it would be most regrettable. I think that all that they want is to reduce the number of seats allotted to Harijans in Bengal. It will be time enough to act when they approach the parties interested in the Pact. I think that our profession of ahimsa should also guard us against rushing to print till we have tried every means of conciliation outside publication in the Press.

This is how I feel, but it may be that you had ample justification for sending the wire and wording it as strongly as you have done.

I read the Hindi translation of your preface to the Bengali Ramayana. It is a very good thing indeed, full of the devotional spirit. I look forward to the balance of proof sheets.

THE HOME SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY

DEAR SIR,

I was grieved to hear yesterday from Major Bhandari that my telegram\(^1\) to Seth Jajuji of Wardha advising Seth Poonamchand Ranka, a prisoner in Seoni Jail, C. P., to abandon his reported fast was withheld by Government. A similar telegram to the Home Member, C. P. Government, was also withheld. I thought I could understand the reason for it. But the reason for withholding the telegram to Seth Jajuji I have failed to understand. Ever since 1922\(^2\) the Government have recognized that they should allow me freely to do humanitarian services\(^3\) for which Nature has qualified me and to which among other things my life is dedicated. This telegram was along those lines. Seth Poonamchand is a co-worker. He has often been guided by me. I am sure that the Government would prize the lives of prisoners as much as the public, and therefore, would not shut out any help that might be legitimately tendered for saving them. I have no knowledge as to how Seth Poonamchand is doing. But I respectfully urge the Government to reconsider their decision and allow my telegram to go. As time is of essence, I request earliest answer.

103. LETTER TO H. KHADER KHAN

March 18, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter and a newspaper cutting from The Light.¹ My difficulty is more serious than you imagine. I do not criticize religions, because I look upon all the great faiths of the world with just as much respect as I entertain for Hinduism. I believe them all to be supplying the varying wants of humanity, and if we will realize this central fact, instead of wanting to compare religions with one another, study them, we shall find profitable things from them for ourselves. I myself approach all religions from a purely religious standpoint and therefore search them merely to find their beauties, and I would advise you to do likewise, and if you will do so, you will find sufficient in my writings to show you the way to approach the other religions of the world.

104. LETTER TO C. NARAYANA MENON
March 18, 1933

MY DEAR MENON,

I like your letter of the 9th instant. There is just one difficulty in accepting your argument, but it is a big difficulty. Your argument is as ancient as the hills. If it had held good, progress would have been impossible. Is not yours the argument of prescription? But prescription cannot run in favour of error. Therefore every practice must be tested on the anvil of universally accepted morals. Not even the so-called divine revelation can avail against a practice or belief which runs contrary to fundamentals accepted as such by mankind, and I have seen as yet no argument whatsoever from this universal standpoint in defence of the practice of untouchability.

I need not combat your argument on the Temple-entry Bill, because I know that you are carefully following the pages of the Harijan. Nor need I worry you with my answer to the other paragraphs of your letter. I believe you to be a seeker and, therefore, I have little doubt that you will reach the truth sooner or later, and if I mistake not, sooner rather than later.

March 18, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. The origin of varnadharma that you have correctly quoted I interpret quite differently from you. Comparing the four varnas to the four parts of the same body shows that all are equal though they have different functions. For, surely your contention is wholly wrong when you say that the head is superior to the arms, or the arms to the thighs, and all the three to the feet. In their own places they are all equally useful and each has to take care of the rest.

MY DEAR R.,

I hope you will not resent this letter, nor my dictating it. The impression left on my mind by long conversations with N. is that you and other young men who have come under her influence have not really benefited by it and that you have contributed to your own and her fall. She happened to show me one of your letters. I did not like the unduly familiar style of address, nor the contents of your letter. I fear very much that you have taken liberties with her which, as young men of self-restraint, you and your associates should never have taken with a stranger. riages or spiritual friendships bordering on marital relations. This is nothing but playing with fire and an echo of very subtle sensuality. I therefore fervently urge you and the other young men not to play with fire, and not to be instrumental, consciously or unconsciously, in preventing the moral progress of N. who has only just begun to perceive the immorality of her past life. You should recognize that she has a pliable nature. She has hitherto not even understood that what she was doing was horribly untruthful and essentially immoral. I hope you will not misunderstand my letter. Probably, when I was convalescing in Bangalore some years ago, I saw all of you young men, but whether I did or not, I have no other feeling towards you except that of a parent to his children, and it is under a sense of that self-chosen responsibility that I am writing this letter to you in the hope that you will put yourself right, if what I have said carries conviction to you, and by refraining from any familiarity with N. help her to outgrow her past life.

You can share this letter with your associates and I would like you to share it with N. I feel for her deeply because I believe that in spite of her untruthful and immoral past she has great capacity for sacrifice and service.

MY DEAR SRI PRAKASA,

I have your letter and I am glad that with the recovery of body you are shedding the despondency that had overtaken you and I have no doubt that you will outgrow the whole of it if you will take sufficient rest and forget all about everything else. In this matter I think that the Englishmen beat us though we are supposed to be followers of the Gita dharma which enjoins upon us the obligation of having no cares about anything and leaving the result in the all-powerful hands of God. I remember the late Lord Asquith going for a cruise in the Mediterranean under medical advice when the War was at its height, leaving the cares of State in the hands of his successors.

With reference to your letter marked 11th February—but I suppose it means 11th March—in connection with your visit to Hissar and the famine raging in that area, I have now had a letter from Dr. Gopichand also. I think that there is much substance in what Dr. Gopichand says. It is not possible to open weaving centres everywhere and expect weavers to weave indifferently spun yarn. in a spinning and weaving mill. Every branch in the latter is standardized. Nothing can be standardized to perfection in handicrafts, because each craftsman’s manufacture has its own individuality and when it comes to handling the individual work of a thousand such persons, it baffles the most skilled organizer. Relief through spinning and weaving has, therefore, like everything else, its own limitations, if it has also the largest potentiality of all relief works. If we had an agency commanding the knowledge of thousands of experts and enough pecuniary resources, we should be able to provide good remunerative work for everyone in need, and it will prove comparatively the most remunerative to the needy as also to the agency. But unfortunately we have not that army of expert workers nor sufficient pecuniary resources.

112. A WORTHWHILE SCHEME

The scheme published by Shri Hiralal Shah regarding the cleanliness of Bhangis is worthy of consideration. The aversion to the Bhangis is due to the kind of work they do. Here it is beyond doubt that the entire fault is that of the so-called high-caste Hindus. But I have not started writing this to blame anyone. We have to consider what our duty is at present and Shri Hiralal’s scheme will help us in doing so. The scheme is this: They should wear a special dress when they carry filth and after they have done the cleaning they should be encouraged to take a bath and change their clothes. Right now they would do neither of their own accord. The object may be achieved only by persuasion and by giving them requisite facilities. Municipalities can take up this work on a large scale, but all the householders who utilize the Bhangis’ service can do so in a small way. They should employ their own Bhangis, should suggest to them to bathe, should give them the facilities for bathing and should themselves provide them the separate dress. One Bhangi family serves many houses. One who is conscious of the value of cleanliness should find out the other employers of his Bhangi and should take their help in providing him with a dress; thus no one will find the expense too burdensome. If this kind of work continues for some time the Bhangis will develop the habit of remaining clean and untouchability, in so far as it stems from dislike, will be eradicated. No one should ignore this easily practicable suggestion by falling a prey to the age-old folly that everyone’s work is no one’s work. Whoever is in a position to do the work should make a beginning with it and draw other people behind him.

Along with this, there are two other reforms which can immediately be put into effect: the reform of latrines and in the mode of carrying filth. The so-called high-caste people have kept the Bhangis at a distance, so that their latrines are like the abyss of hell, and the Bhangis are compelled to carry filth in a very odd and cruel way. Improvements in latrines can be easily introduced. The main requirement is dry earth. The practice of carrying baskets of filth on the head should be done away with. This movement has already begun in Mathura and Prayag.¹ There the filth is carried in a hand-cart instead of on the head. It is possible that the cart cannot be taken everywhere. In such cases, the filth can be carried in a bucket.

hung on a rod. Where the bucket is not heavy, it can be lifted by hand. The practice of carrying the filth on the head is one which can be stopped immediately.

113. ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

Admit after Shuddhi¹

Requiring _shuddhi_ for Harijans is to grant that they are not Hindus. But then our whole movement is based on the principle that the Harijan community is an important section of Hindu society. Therefore whatever is to be done in this matter has to be done only after abolishing untouchability. Moreover, who will perform the _shuddhi_ and for whom? One should have _shuddhi_ of the heart. Only a pure, i.e., a perfect man can perform another the sacrament of shuddhi. So the very idea of going through _shuddhi_ according to certain rites is unthinkable to me. In any case, this kind of _shuddhi_ cannot be a condition for the removal of untouchability.

But I cannot prevent you or anyone else from implementing your proposals. It is clear that it will not have my support. But I will not oppose you if you can admit Harijans of your area to the Sringapatam Temple after performing the ritual of _shuddhi_ as suggested by you.

_Everything Will Be Achieved through Purity²_

Certainly, there is no end of difficulties. I am certain too that patience alone will solve them all. Our means ought to be absolutely pure. Untouchability has spread under the guise of religion. It won’t be destroyed as long as it is not confronted with pure dharma. We are not forming a new sect but are endeavouring to cleanse an existing one. He who points out a fault in another ought himself to be free from it. That is to say the extent of our progress will depend on how pure we are. The sub-division of the untouchables into Dhed, Bhangi, etc., will disappear only when we have done away with untouchability. Work with the utmost perseverance and utmost love. Soften the wrath of the sanatanists with love. Take upon yourself only such work as you can cope with. But whatever you take up, see it through. Do not stretch your legs beyond the sheet.

WHY MODERN?

I do not at all believe that untouchability is as old as or even in any way connected with sanatana dharma. Various forms of untouchability based on ideas of cleanliness are to be found, more or less, in every country and every civilization. But I do not at all believe that the decadent form of untouchability that we find today ever existed in ancient times. It is not to be found in any other religion. If this kind of untouchability were an integral part of sanatana dharma, that religion has no use for me. I am not foolish enough to lay down my life for this sanatana dharma.

I expound sanatana dharma as I understand it. If the entire people disowned me on that account my claim of being a sanatanist Hindu would have been rejected.

DO YOU BELIEVE IN TEMPLES?

I am not talking of temple-entry for the first time. I have been doing so for years—in fact right from the time I started talking about the removal of untouchability. Even before I took a pledge in public to lay down my life for ending untouchability I had announced that temple-entry for Harijans was an important element in the removal of untouchability. I have myself performed the ceremony of throwing open a number of temples and encouraged Jamnalalji to do so. I make no distinction between a temple and a mosque or a church. Men everywhere worship images in some form or other. And through the image everyone worships God alone though their attitudes and methods may differ. Perhaps you are not aware that I have in my life visited temples on a thousand occasions if not more—sometimes out of politeness, but often with sincere devotion. I did not know you were so intolerant as to regard temples as a greater evil than untouchability. Imagine the terrible consequences of abolishing the institution, thereby depriving millions of people of the temples that are a solace to them. You equate temple-entry with going to hell! So you think—do you?—that Bharat Bhushan Malaviyaji who has a temple in his

114. WHAT DOES A HINDU TEMPLE MEAN?

A Harijan worker writes:

This letter has been written with a pure and good intention and it reflects the views of some, though not of many youths; so I publish it.

To my mind there is nothing but excitement in this letter. The writer has no proof to justify what he has said about temples. Perhaps he has not visited Kashi Vishwanath, Puri and Guruvayur. Even if some malpractices are prevalent in these temples, the Hindu pilgrims and visitors are unaware of and untouched by them. One gets there what one goes in search of. A father will look upon a woman as his daughter, her husband as his wife, her son as his mother and a sensualist as his victim. Should the father, the husband and the son forsake that woman because of the sensualists? I have been to the temples at both Kashi Vishwanath and Puri. I must admit that I was not inspired by faith to visit them, but I had seen innumerable innocent souls going there with devotion. I did not pity them, but I fell in love with them and I could understand their devotion. These numerous devotees had no idea whatever of the malpractices prevalent in temples. One must bear in mind that wicked acts take place secretly and only a few people have knowledge of them. Devotees attribute perfection to God. The devotees’ God is full of innocence, that of non-devotees full of faults. The Krishna of the innumerable Hindus is a perfect incarnation. To the critics Krishna is immoral, a gambler, a liar and so on. The mind alone is the cause of bondage and of deliverance. The young correspondent must know and understand this eternal truth. Just as human beings cannot think of the atman without the body, similarly they cannot think of religion without temples. The Hindu religion cannot survive without temples. There is corruption in the temples; it may be in some persons but not in all. An idol is a stone to one who merely goes through the ritual of worship, but to a true devotee it is all life. There is room for reform in the temples. It is not proper to demolish them. Demolish the temples and you destroy religion.

1 The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had argued that the activities for promoting the welfare of Harijans would do more harm than good to the Harijans, since the temples were not the dwelling places of God but breeding grounds for vice. The sanatanist Hindus, while ill-treating the Harijans, had done one good thing indirectly by keeping the Harijans out of these temples. Gandhiji, therefore, was ill-advised in seeking the help of law to win temple-entry for Harijans.

Moreover, the putrefaction that has set in is not to be found in all temples. It is not there in many temples in villages. The many superstitions prevalent among the villagers have no connection with the temples. Temples are veritable museums of the cultures of different religions. In old times, God dwelt in the temple and godliness too; it housed a school, a dharmasala; and it was the place where the leading people of the locality met together. Such temples are still to be found in many places. Harijans have set their hearts on temples to such an extent that they build their own temples of sorts. We discern their helplessness in these temples. As long as the Harijans cannot enter the temples of caste Hindus, their helplessness will never end, their Hinduism will remain incomplete; in spite of being the sixth finger of Hinduism, they will only remain uncared for. No Hindu should doubt that the first and all-comprehensive sign of their admission into Hinduism is temple-entry. It is the height of ignorance to believe that the Harijans have fared well by remaining outside the temple. By remaining outside the temples, they have remained outside everything. And even today the attempts made by the sanatanists to keep them out of the temples suggest that they want to perpetuate their exclusion.

The letter in question makes sad reading despite the noble views expressed in it. It depicts the pitiable condition of sophisticated modern youth. Young people may perhaps be angry at this statement and may believe that people like me deserve to be pitied. But my experience clearly shows how ignorant they are.

I have visited many temples in my childhood. That did not at all have any bad influence on me. Today I see many of my friends going to the temples. They know nothing of their shortcomings, but they are aware of the vices of the temple-goers. They are quite untouched by those vices. I do not consider it a mark of greatness that I do not visit temples. I feel no need to go to temples; hence I do not visit them. To secure temple-entry for the Harijans does not necessarily mean taking them into a temple. Those will visit it who wish to. Those who go there will not get a stigma and those who do not may possibly lose something.

Now a few words about the law. In the same heat of excitement in which the writer has condemned temples with little or no justification, he has here also exposed his ignorance. In spite of having some acquaintance with me, he did not ponder over the fact that, if I who depend the least on law believe in the necessity of it in respect of temples, there must be some potent reason for it. Now he may understand that reason. Today the law says that not a single temple is open to the Harijans and a trustee who opens it for them is liable to punishment. In the circumstances, if we do not demand a law to do away with such a state of affairs, the temples will never be thrown open to Harijans. The help of the law is indispensable. A bad law can only be abolished by a good law. There is no other way at all. Here we have not sought the interference of law but the doing away of such interference. Those who concede that a law is required even to nullify a bad law can understand that the movement is to get enacted for the Harijans a law of that type.

Harijanbandhu, 19-3-1933

115. VARNADHARMA

A Harijan worker puts me the above question. I am not understood because I do not believe in what we today regard as the varna system. Varnashrama as we see it today implies restrictions as regards untouchability and intermarriage and inter-dining among the varnas. I regard today’s untouchability, in Akha’s language, as an extraneous growth fit to be rejected. It is not the Shastras but only usage that supports the restriction on intermarriage and inter-dining as part of the varnadharma.

As against this, the varnas have an intimate relation to one’s profession. The pursuit of one’s calling is one’s dharma. He who forsakes his, falls from his varna. He himself is destroyed, his spirit decays. That man causes confusion of varnas and thereby society is harmed and its organization breaks down. When everybody discards his varna, the malorganization of society grows, chaos reigns and society perishes. If the Brahmin class abjures its work of imparting education, it falls from its pedestal. If a Kshatriya gives up his work of protecting the people, he dishonours his varna. If a Vaishya discards the earning of money, he falls from his varna. If a Shudra abandons

1 Not translated here. The question was how Gandhiji could say that he wanted, not abolition, but only reform of the varna system, even though he wanted feelings of high and low among the castes to go and approved of inter-varna marriages. Gandhiji was further asked to what extent he would permit intermarriages and inter-dining.
serving, he falls. All stay in their places by remaining engrossed in their own duty. He falls who gives up his proper duty. A Shudra who does his appropriate duty is better than a Brahmin who discards his duty.

This system of varnas left no scope for privileges. It was merely a duty, an obligation. There is no room at all for feeling of high and low where it is a question of an obligation.

Today we see the disappearance of the varnadharma. If one varna discards its own duty, the whole varna system declines. Today the Brahmin has discarded the attributes of a Brahmin the Kshatriyas his fighting qualities and the Vaishya his Vaishya character. Some may ask: “Since all are engaged in earning money, what is wrong if one considers that the qualities of a Vaishya still persist?” However, it is not correct to say so. The Vaishyas of today earn wealth only for themselves, hence they would be regarded as thieves in the language of the Gita. It is the Vaishya’s dharma to earn money and, taking out of it only as much as is needed for his livelihood, to utilize the remainder for the benefit of society. One rarely comes across a person who observes such Vaishya dharma. Hence even Vaishya dharma has perished.

Now there remains Shudra dharma. How many Shudras are there who observe it? Labour involuntarily rendered is not service. There is no place for coercion in dharma. It is only labour regarded as sheer duty and rendered voluntarily for the betterment of society that can be called service. Hence we have regretfully to admit that varnadharma has been totally destroyed. By defining a Shudra as a labourer, the commentator has insulted him and has harmed Hinduism.

Nevertheless, varnadharma has come to pervade the very being of the Hindu. He may well have connected it, through lack of understanding, with inter-dining and intermarrying and with untouchability. A Hindu cannot be at peace with himself without a concept of varnadharma. Therefore its revival is possible. Without penance religious awakening or revival is improbable. Penance is the only great force whereby religion can be safeguarded and established. Penance without knowledge is no penance but merely self-torture. A blending of penance and knowledge is possible in Brahmin dharma alone. He alone who strives to acquire knowledge of the Brahman is fit to be a Brahmin. If such an endeavour is made today, Hinduism, that is to say, varnadharma, will be revived some day. Fortunately, there is a small class engaged in it today. Hence I have an unshakable faith that Hinduism—pure sanatana dharma—will once again reveal its lustre.
and point out to the world the way to its good.

My Hindu religion is all-embracing. It does not advocate antipathy towards other beliefs. Religions have been interwoven. One sees a special quality in every one of them. But no one religion is higher than another. All are complementary to one another. Since this is my belief, the speciality of any religion cannot run counter to another, cannot be at variance with universally accepted principles. Examining varnadharma from that point of view, its interpretation can only be what I have put forward. Moreover, history indicates that followers of Hinduism at one time voluntarily observed it.

In order to make observance of this varnadharma possible again, all must voluntarily accept Shudra dharma. The Shudras render service mainly through manual labour. This dharma is feasible for all. That is why it is possible—for everyone to follow it. Moreover there has been a feeling of contempt for the Shudras. If everyone regarded himself as a Shudra, religion would be well rid of this concept of high and low.

Someone may say, ‘If everyone regards himself as a Shudra, why not as a Harijan?’ I would definitely not oppose such insistence, but since there are not five varnas in Hinduism and since untouchability is on the wane, I use the word ‘Shudra’. After the pledge about Hindu awakening was taken in Bombay under the presidency of Malaviyaji, there is no room for untouchability in Hinduism. Hence at the time of revival of varnadharma, the talk of regarding all as Harijans will be considered out of place. If Harijans and all others stay as Shudras, all will easily be men of God.

But if, with full understanding, all begin to observe the dharma of service and to regard themselves as Shudras, it will certainly not imply that none will learn brahmavidya. Some people will learn and teach it according to their desire and ability. Some will look after the people, some will earn money. The standard of living of all will be about the same. The condition where one is a millionaire and the others beggars will not subsist. The wealth of the Vaishyas will be regarded as the wealth of the people. All these three forces will be utilized merely for social service. All will be regarded as Shudras only, so that there will be no feeling of high and low. All this will automatically promote the revival of varnadharma.

1 For the text of the pledge, vide “Draft Constitution of the Harijan Sevak Sangh”, 9-3-1933.
2 Knowledge of the Brahman
There certainly is room in varnadharma for tradition. Without that there cannot be proper order; therefore, the progeny of those who impart knowledge will observe the same vocation. All cannot all of a sudden become brahmajnani. There is no objection if they do. And, to become a brahmajnani is to reach the ultimate in service. There is not even a trace of pride or selfishness at all. And if there emerge many such brahmajnani, then the varna system can once again be rehabilitated.

Now a few words about inter-dining and intermarriages.

For those who have correctly understood the foregoing portion, there is no need to write more. No one is obliged to eat in the company of a particular person nor obliged to give his daughter in marriage to anybody in particular. Therefore, all will naturally follow their own practice and traditions in respect of giving their daughters in marriage and inter-dining. I have now thought of only one varna, and the Harijan is not excluded from it, so it will suffice to say that all will seek alliances according to their convenience and live and move and eat where their soul finds satisfaction. After untouchability has ended, there is no need to say more on this subject.

In the end, I shall repeat what I have said many times before. This question of varna system has no direct concern with the removal of untouchability. The abolition of untouchability is the highest duty of every Hindu. The Harijan Seva Sangh exists for that purpose. It has its sphere defined and I have played the chief role in making it do so. The ideas about varnadharma at present are my own. Even he who does not subscribe to them should not shirk from working for the abolition of untouchability. None need fight shy of it because I happen to be the major participant in it. If the Hindu community does not accept my ideas concerning the system of varnas, they will remain mine alone. I cannot force those on others, nor have I the desire to do so. If those ideas are contrary to Hindu religion I will be thrown out of the Hindu community like an unwanted grain. Observance of the dharma to banish untouchability is certainly the common duty of all Hindus. I do not wish to hide a single idea of mine and thereby deceive anyone. The question of varna system has indirect relationship with untouchability, hence it is understandable that my associates and others wish to know my ideas about it. That is why I have to develop those ideas. But there is not the slightest reason for anyone to feel confused because of them. Individuals do not matter at all where

1 Knowers of the Brahman

2 A Gujarati phrase
the question of religion is concerned. These will come and go. Religion is eternal, it will go on. There have been many ideas about it, and there will be many more. Just as God’s attributes are endless, the frontiers of religion are unending. No one has understood it thoroughly. All should follow it to the extent they understand it, so that the chariot of religion will keep moving forward. Knowing this, and leaving me out of account, all should do research in religion for their own sakes. The conditions of doing that research are well known. He who will observe these conditions will alone know religion to some extent. There are certain rules for getting knowledge of all type. They call for effort. Religious research requires the utmost effort. Therefore, at the very outset of that research, those with experience have suggested the observance of yamaniyamas.¹

116. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR

_March 19, 1933_

MY DEAR MARY,

I have your two nice letters before me. Of course you did a lot of body labour in the Mission as do many. That was not my point. My point was doing just as systematic body labour as the inmates and mastering the different crafts. But let me not labour this point. Body labour for bread and therefore bread labour is the ideal we are trying to reach at the Ashram. But you are to do just what and as you like. I do not want you to work under tension. I would be deeply grieved if I found you had worked under tension in order to fulfill the Ashram routine. I want you to catch the spirit of the Ashram. There should be a feeling of satisfaction and joy at the end of every period. And that comes if every minute is dedicated to God and every activity done for Him and His. No more time to say more today.

Love from us all.

117. LETTER TO KESHAV

March 19, 1933

MY DEAR BROTHER KESHAV,

I am now able to give you my opinion about your scheme.\(^1\) Kakasaheb is of opinion that you do not need any pretentious building just now. The brother who went to Sabarmati has not gained much experience. You have already two looms. They should be worked for the time being. You are not manufacturing enough yarn even to feed those two looms. You should therefore go slowly but steadily and extend only when you have a nucleus of trained spinners and trained weavers having perfect control over their work and are able to produce what may be called marketable yarn and khadi. If you do not do this, you will share the fate of several organizations that I know have started with a high purpose and a noble motive but for want of efficiency and application have died out. This is an industry which requires just as much scientific skill, application and time as any other. Indeed this requires a little more, but certainly not less.

I would therefore ask you to withdraw this public appeal and develop the work silently and unostentatiously, and when you have done that, you will find that you have money waiting for you for extension.

Yours sincerely,

118. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

March 19, 1933

MY DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

This is in reply to your letter of the 13th instant No. 921.

I am afraid I cannot take shelter under the easy solution you have suggested for my discharge from your complaint. I did mean what I said when I dictated the sentence, “I wonder if you read the English Harijan.” \(^2\) I know the kind of worker you are, and ordinarily I should certainly not expect you to read the papers and magazines that may be issued on behalf of the Society\(^3\). It would be an impossible task for any secretary to undertake. As it is, we have not many newspapers, magazines and literature published under the auspices of the Society. But even what is being published you cannot be expected to read, and if you attempted, you could only do so at the sacrifice of much more valuable work. But I wanted to single out the English Harijan and the Hindi Harijan, the English, because I write down all my thoughts in that paper, and they are as much addressed to you as to other Harijan servants, and that I do, because I am supposed to be guiding and shaping the policy of the Society; therefore it was that by politely asking the question I suggested that you should make an exception in favour of the English Harijan and make time to read it; the Hindi edition you have to read, because it is being published under your very nose, and because the latest matter can be supplied to the Hindi Harijan, but it cannot be to the English because of the distance. The Hindi Harijan has to be packed with facts and figures which I would have to copy from it and which I would love to do. You will be speaking to the innumerable workers and giving them precise instructions through that paper, or else it has no reason for existence. The Hindi Harijan need not contain essays. It should simply contain a translation of my messages and first-class authentic information from the Central Office, as also definite weekly instructions to workers. Then and then only will it justify its existence.

Now, as to the other part of your letter. I have told you already what view I take of the other organizations. We have to treat them as if they were our own, not in order to dictate, but in order to serve them and in order to harness their services, if they will give them to us. But you know best whether to approach them and how, if at all. Of course, I had and could have nothing against Lala Mohanlal1. Your and my business, however, is, as I conceive it, to investigate all complaints, good, bad and indifferent, so that we leave no loopholes for mistakes or complaints so far as it is humanly possible to do it.

This brings me to the last part of your letter—Overhead Charges. Both you and I have been lifelong workers and connected with numerous organizations. I really regard myself as an expert economist and organizer in my own way. We shall deserve the curses of posterity, if not also of the present generation, if we do not show that we have put the bulk of our collections into Harijan pockets. 10% overhead charges, therefore, I regard as a liberal estimate. Propaganda we must have, and plenty of it, both among Harijans and caste men. But we have to make the propaganda practically self-supporting, especially amongst caste men. In my opinion, the best propaganda is constructive work amongst Harijans. It will tell not only upon the latter but also upon caste men. For the present you may have two collections, one for constructive work, that is, for putting directly into Harijan pockets, and the other for propaganda. As a matter of fact, propaganda work ought to be paid for out of the sale proceeds of our weeklies and the sale of our other literature, so that the moneys we may actually collect otherwise would all find their way into Harijan pockets. Our caste-Hindu workers should therefore be volunteers or receiving just maintenance money, and we should find out every available Harijan worker whom we would pay fairly well. He may not give just now very efficient work; I would not worry, but would teach him to do the work. All this can be done only if we have workers religiously-minded, treating this movement as an essentially religious one and approaching it in the religious spirit. Then you will find that we shall have the least opposition to encounter, and no matter what opposition we encounter, the movement must flourish. If we cannot get sufficient hands to work the movement and to work it in that fashion, I, for one, will not hesitate to say that we should cease to be an organization. Without that organization you had your own great work cut out for you, and I have mine. The organization was set up in the belief that it was needed by the people, as I still believe it is, but the test that I have laid down would be the proof of that need.

I have given you only an outline of what is passing through my mind. You will share this letter with Sjt. Ghanshyamdas; if you think it worth while, you may come down here to discuss the whole thing, or, if you have caught the spirit of my letter and appreciate it, you need not trouble.

Lastly, I do not want you to reduce to practice anything of this letter because I have written it. You will only reduce to practice that which commends itself to you, and never otherwise. My duty is done when I have passed on my thoughts to you.

Yours sincerely,

From a microfilm: S.N. 20633

119. LETTER TO ASHRAM BOYS AND GIRLS

March 19, 1933

DEAR BOYS AND GIRLS.

I have your letter. You must have improved your spinning in regard to the count, evenness and the strength of the yarn. Great care, even more than about the count, should be taken about the strength and the evenness. There is bound to be a difference in the count if the cotton or the sliver is bad, but there should be no difference in the evenness and the strength. Till you reach the standard when you may be said to pass in regard to these two, it cannot truthfully be said that you have spun.

Whether one is working in the field or doing some other work, one must feel interested. Anybody who is devoted to duty is interested only in doing his duty and not in doing a particular work. Such a person never wishes to choose his own work. He does with interest whatever falls to his lot because he considers that his dharma. Anybody who does some work unwillingly is not doing it as dharma. Can anybody force himself to do any work as dharma.

120. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 19, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

As soon as I have solved one moral problem, I am faced with another. At the moment it seems that . . .¹, in whom I had put absolute trust, has fallen. He has become mad after . . .². He has been inflamed with passion. By chance his passionate letters to . . .³ fell into . . .³'s⁴ hands. He sent them to me. They give a picture of one blinded by passion. He tried to get hold of the letters by devious means, but failed. He met me yesterday with . . .⁵. Her generosity of heart is in no way less than . . .⁶. Her love of me crushes me under its weight. I see that, instead of being angry with me, she still shows me more love than a daughter to her father. On the other hand, . . .⁷ makes me tremble. He now says that it was never his intention to marry . . .⁸, but that he was only testing her. I should like to believe that this is true, though it would be bad enough. But it sounds incredible. Nobody believes it. If . . .⁹ is even now deceiving, he is showing a greater depravity than could have been imagined in him. Vallabhbhai, who had great liking for . . .¹⁰ also seems to have lost it. Personally, I have not been able to judge what is in his heart. My condition is like that of Arjuna: “I do not know where I am, nor can shake off my fear.”¹¹ I have work before me which I must do, and it helps me to forget all my pain. But, unknown even to me, a fire is raging inside.

do I know what my duty is while I am here. I do not feel that . . . has been guilty. She is a completely innocent and trustful girl. Do show this letter to Panditji, Chimanlal, Gangabehn, Durga, Lakshmibehn and Totaramji, and to others to whom you may think it desirable to show. Ask them to write and tell me what they think about this matter. If . . . is there, he also must read it. I wrote to him only the day before yesterday. I have asked Kaka to discuss the matter with . . . He was to go to . . . I have advised Kaka to detain him. I should like you to throw what light you can on this subject. I am not in a condition just now to write more, for I am in darkness as to my dharma in the situation.

I have faith that I will not fail to do my dharma and that, as always, God is clearing my path even on this occasion. Hence, even though you may see in this letter the anguish of my heart, believe that I am calm.

121. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 19, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I handed over a few letters this morning for being posted. You will have received them before this.

The letter to Lakshmidas was left behind here. It has now been posted to Bardoli.

Anandi is steadily improving. She is still weak, and gets a little temperature. I hope it is due to the operation. She is being nursed carefully.

You must have now known Parachure Shastri’s decision.

Suresh’s letter contains this remark: “In all institutions, respect is shown to the rich and never to a poor person.” I have asked him if this is true about the Ashram too. Read my letter to him. If that is his experience about the Ashram, ask him gently for evidence. If we have that defect, we should overcome it.

Have you received there a copy of Valji’s Ishucharita? If you have, let anybody who has read it write to me and tell me what he thinks about the book.1 If you have not received any, I will send one from here.

122. LETTER TO VIDYA A. HINGORANI

March 19, 1933

CHI. VIDYA,

Now that you have Mahadev3 why should you write to me? Be frank and say that because of the appearance of Mahadev in the house, you have got behindhand in writing and therefore need not apologize.

It is necessary to keep children free of constipation. You can give him castor oil even daily. Just ten drops will be more than enough. Give my blessings to Anand whenever you write to him.

I have not met Dr. Mehta again.

123. LETTER TO RAMABEHN JOSHI

March 19, 1933

CHI. RAMA,

I wrote to Narandas, who says in reply:

I have already written to you that Yamuji has started teaching Ramabehn. She must have got angry before this arrangement was made. I hope now her anger will disappear. How could I say that I would never call on her? I should not even think of taking up such an attitude. I arranged for somebody to teach and talked with her for a while. And now I look in every day at her house or at the Bal Mandir. If she has no confidence in me, I shall try to win it.

So, now, you will admit that you are defeated. Or do you still adhere to your view?

From time to time send me a report of the progress in your study. How is the condition of the arm?

124. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

March 19, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

Your suspicion is baseless. As you frankly criticize other people and say about them what you feel, so did Mahadev. I asked him. He sensed disrespect for him in your repeatedly emphasizing “For Mahatmaji”! He said what he felt. You explained and the matter is over. You should learn to endure criticism of you and overcome your sensitiveness. Cultivate some sense of humour. We should not weigh all the criticism against us with the weight which we use in weighing gold; for some of it, we should use the weights with which we weigh iron or stones. And in doing so, we should take no account of half a maund this way or the other. You don’t look delicate, but your heart is very sensitive. Harden it now and make it less sensitive. Instead of reasoning with you, I am now going to order you. You may then disregard my order if you wish. You are not permitted to disregard others’ orders, but you may disregard mine as often as you like. Whether your conduct in doing so is rude or civil, whether your offence is criminal or civil, we shall decide in each case.

125. LETTER TO PARIKSHITLAL L. MAJMUDAR
March 19, 1933

BHAISHRI PARIKSHITLAL,

I received your sincere letter. It is from my own point of view that I find the figure you state to be frightening, but if I accept the other opposite standpoint it is the most reasonable. Your duty is that of a soldier. You should follow the standard laid down. It is for Thakkar Bapa and your local or provincial (or whatever they call it) Committee to lay it down. My function is only to point out the direction. You may carry out as many of my suggestions as seem practicable in the circumstances. There is every risk, and even probability, of the result being contrary to what was intended if my advice is followed mechanically. Your first duty, therefore, is to weigh my suggestion in the light of your experience and, if it does not seem sound enough, to set it aside and forget all about it. You may put it before your Committee if you find any worth in it. If the Committee also approves of it, you should take it to Thakkar Bapa and carry it out only if he also approves of it. I will not say more than this here. I am now going to discuss my suggestions in the English and the Gujarati editions of the Harijan. So you will be able to know about them.

I state here two rules for your consideration.

1. The money needed for propaganda work should be found from such work itself. In other words, it should be self-supporting.

2. Constructive activity is the best propaganda. Money invested in it will be fully rewarded.

127. LETTER TO M. G. BHANDARI

March 20, 1933

DEAR MAJOR BHANDARI,

I have more than once told you about the condition of Sardar Vallabhbhai’s nose. You know also how reluctant he is to talk about it. But we who know it are getting nervous. He suffers terribly whilst the attack lasts. All the remedies that you and Major Mehta suggested have been tried without success. The attacks are becoming more and more frequent and more and more troublesome. The worst attack was witnessed on Saturday last. The discharge from the nose and sneezing continued for more than thirty hours. The eyes were blood red and the nose naturally so. The whole day long he ate nothing, drinking only tea in the morning and having fruit and milk and boiled vegetable in the evening. He is not able to take his ordinary meals. I do feel that it is time that he was examined by his own specialists. Dr. Deshmukh is his general adviser and I should leave it to Dr. Deshmukh to bring such nose specialist as he likes. Dr. Damani has generally attended to his nose but I understand that he is suffering from smallpox and may not be available.

Will you please send this to the Government for an early decision?

Yours sincerely,

128. LETTER TO BHAU PANSE

March 20, 1933

CHI. BHAU,

Your decision to stay on there for the present is correct. It is desirable that you should get rid of your constipation completely. Can you do any work there? You should sometimes visit the villages around Rajkot. Some of them you can visit even casually while out for a walk.

You say that you tell stories to farmers in the evenings. Does this mean that you also stay with them?

I read your letter all over again. I see from it that Jamnadas does not give you any work there. Have you made any new acquaintances?

CHI. JAMNADAS,

Why are you lazy in writing to me? You do not yet seem to have been restored to health. Is there no chance of its improving?

Sarupbehn was there recently. Why have you not written anything about her? I expected an account of the visit from you.

Tell me your experience of Bhaub, and also give an account of the Harijan work there.

How is Khushalbhai now? Prabudas wrote in his letter that there was discharge of pus from the ear. How is Devbhabi?

Does Bhai help in any way?

Kanti writes in his letter that aunt wants to come to see me. Tell her that she should give up this desire born of ignorant love, and that I am very well. If she is still eager, she may certainly come. How are her eyes? I am enclosing letters for Sushila and Bhaub.

Ramdas and Jamnalalji are here and live together. They are both well. I hope you get the Harijan, both English and Gujarati. Rajaji and Devdas are at Delhi. Ba is with Mirabehn and keeps fairly well. I suppose Manilal must have been appointed a trustee now. Did you discuss about the press with West? You ought to cultivate relations with him, irrespective of whether the talks bear fruit or not.

    Is it too much to expect a letter from you?

    Either you should leave Phoenix just now, or, if you decide to stay there, you should give up doing odd jobs and also your desire to make money. Everyone who has tried to serve and to pursue his personal aims at the same time has failed in both. I expect better from you.

March 20, 1933

CHI. PRABHUDAS,

Read this letter. I have written to Shantilal that I like the idea. Let the bungalow go. The rest of the land may be kept and huts built on it in which occasional visitors may stay. To what extent this will be practicable, what arrangement can be made for water, whether occasional visitors can stay in this way and from where they will buy provisions, all this is for Shantilal and you to consider. May be the idea is impractical. They must have received the letter I wrote to Vijapur as you had suggested.

133. LETTER TO SUMANGAL PRAKASH
March 20, 1933

CHI. SUMANGAL,

I am only today able to reach your letter of February 20. I am sorry. I get no time. I hope you are now well. Prabhavati keeps me posted with news of Kanta. I hope you get English Harijan. If you do not, I will send it. I will arrange for all the issues to be sent to you.

The little booklet about health\(^1\) needs a lot of improvement. There has been some change in my views about vegetables. Vegetables are inferior to fruit but they are easier to digest than cereals. In our country they are a substitute for fruit. If therefore you cannot get fruit in adequate quantities, you should take in liberal quantities leafy vegetables and gourds. Of starchy vegetables you should take only a little or none at all.

About salt I have no definite opinion as of now. Naturopaths differ in the matter. I do not consider the opinion of the ordinary doctors reliable. But I am sure of this, that it is necessary for everyone who wants to cultivate self-control to give up salt for five or six months and afterwards from time to time. There is no reason to suppose that giving up salt altogether will necessarily cause harm. Fruits and vegetables contain salt. And it is always there in water. The quarrel is only about salt as a separate article.

I had sent a long reply to your earlier letter. Fortunately Mahadev had kept a copy, which I am therefore, enclosing and sending by registered post.

What work do you do at present?

136. LETTER TO K. R. KRISHNA IYER

March 21, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter. The marriage you refer to had no connection with the untouchability movement. It was arranged years ago. We do not know to what varna the husband of the child belongs. He was picked up as an orphan boy by one of the members of the Ashram and he has been brought up as his own child.

So far as varnashrama is concerned, I have expressed my views already in the pages of the Harijan and I have stated my belief that restriction on the intermarriage and inter-dining is no part of varnadharma and was not in the palmy days of Hinduism. I have also expressed my opinion that at the present moment in India there is in reality but one varna possible, and that is of Shudra, in other words, that of service. But you can learn my views more fully from the pages of the Harijan.

I am much touched by your letter for which you need not have apologized at all; nor were you an accused person in my estimation. I knew that you were a member of Lalajee’s Society. But workers have got to answer all kinds of charges in a detached spirit. You do not perhaps know what charges Lalajee himself had to answer. I had long discussions with him about these. As to the necessity or advisability of our temples being regularly visited by the middle-class people, it is a different matter. Much reform in temple-worship has to be undertaken before people will voluntarily desire to visit temples. I think that reform will come but in its own time.

144. LETTER TO DIWAKAR SINGH

March 22, 1933

MY DEAR DIWAKAR,

I have your letter. No doubt the less demonstrative you are the better and more permanent your work will be.

Your last paragraph makes bad reading. You say, “Sweeping of public roads has become irregular.” That’s wrong. Having started the work you should have done it with scientific precision and regularity. Your irregular scavenging will produce no effect on the public. You saw with what trumpeting the work was inaugurated and I read with pleasure that you were thinking of constructing special carts or wheelbarrows for removing the refuse. But this can be necessary only if you are doing your work thoroughly. Your energy will be frittered away if you will jump from work to work without doing anything completely. What will happen if after having half-finished a table, a cabinet maker began a chair and so on? Will you not call it all a waste of effort? That is precisely what happens generally to philanthropic undertakings. I would like you to guard yourself against that error. If you will do the street-cleaning then you must have a map and a programme according to the number of volunteers you have, and after you have begun a street, you may not leave it till its dwellers have taken up the cleaning themselves. In order to impress them with the necessity of so doing, you will have to be gentle and patient with them, and your cleaning will have to be so thorough as to excite their pleasure and admiration, and when that happens you will see that the thing will work, but you will have to concentrate your attention wholly

1 The names have been omitted.
2 ibid
upon one single piece till outsiders who are the sole judges are able to say, “It’s well done”.

I am not able to appreciate your presentation of the football to the Harijan boys. For a country like India a ball that costs Rs. 4 to Rs. 5 is an expensive thing. Harijan boys will have footballs given to them by patrons. Servants have got to exercise the greatest care and discretion in their service, especially when it is they who have to make the choice.

Your having shifted to servants’ quarters is undoubtedly a very fine idea, and if you will try to live as simply as the Harijans, consistently with your health, it would be a good thing.

MY DEAR PRAKASH,

I was glad to have your letter and to know that you had no lung trouble whatsoever. If you were taking meat foods before, you will not spoil your health by abstaining from such foods. Unless you have a religious conviction that meat-eating is wrong and if you do persist in giving up meat, you will flourish only if you will take as much milk and butter as you can, and take starchy foods sparingly, avoiding all pulses, if it is possible to do so. Whole wheatmeal chapatis or bread, green vegetables, some juicy fresh fruits, milk and butter should be an ideal complete diet.

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. Though you can read your meaning in my writing, I must confess that I am too dense to read my meaning in your writing. You are no doubt satisfied that I do not recognize any distinction between high and low. Are you equally satisfied that everyone should pursue his ancestral occupation so as to conserve national energy, national talent, avoid unequal distribution of wealth and keen competition? If you are, then you will alter the aims and objects of your Sabha, but if you are not prepared to alter the aims and objects in accordance with the idea presented, you might agree with me that your prosecution of your aims and objects is likely to create confusion and suspicion if you tack it on to untouchability. Do you not observe that I do not tack on even reformed varnadharma to untouchability? I have simply stated my position in order to avoid misunderstanding, and, what is more important still, the charge of suppressing my opinion in order to gain adherence for the cause of the abolition of untouchability.

151. LETTER TO LILAVATI ASAR

CHI. LILAVATI1.

You are a silly girl. Would you feel hurt if I told you that I tolerated you because you were a good girl and that I would take no interest in you if you were a bad girl? If not, then why should you be hurt by what I said? My remarks were prompted only by love. I expressed my love by saying that I tolerated you in spite of your unsettled state because your intentions were good, but you misunderstood my remark completely. What is one to do to a person who thus displays his or her ego?

You should know that by learning some work or by studying you may become self-supporting, but you cannot be sure that that will make you good. On the other hand, if you become good, mentally strong, and healthy in body, then your character will be sound and you will become self-supporting also. This does not mean that you should not study further or learn a craft. Do that in the Ashram as much as you can during spare time and be satisfied. Engrave in your heart the golden rule that devotion to duty includes everything else. For the present, only do this much, have full faith in Narandas and follow his advice. Do not look upon your money as your own but regard yourself as a trustee. You should not, therefore, spend it even on buying fruit for me, since I get fruit from the other people. It is the Harijans who need the money most. Keep it for them.

152. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 22, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your big packet of mail.

It was a great thing indeed that the [Chamar] children gave up buffalo flesh. But there may possibly have been violence behind this. If they parted with it through fear, what happened was bad. If they so wished they should have been given some compensation for giving it up since it was their food. Hence you or some other responsible inmate of the Ashram should go and ask them. It would be fine if they handed over the flesh of their own accord and could give up eating buffalo flesh for ever. If they are not ready to do that, we should have patience with them.

You should find out from them or from Chamars who have connections with the Ashram the money value of a carcass. Try and find out from them, if you can, what the hide, intestines, bones, etc., would fetch if sold separately and how they use these things.
If anybody else feels sick as Duncan did, you should immediately apply hot fomentation on the abdomen and give the person a piece of ice or lemon to suck. He may also drink cold water one tea-spoonful at a time. Very often the vomiting stops with these measures. If one had not eaten any poisonous food, there is no cause for alarm at all. An enema also will stop vomiting. You should tell this to all who live in the Ashram.

Impure attraction had sprung up between . . .¹ and . . .² They hid their love for quite a long time. I came to know of it by chance. They used to meet secretly and also write to each other secretly. I have still not been able to fathom what is in their hearts. I do not know how far . . .'s passion has carried him. Neither seems to have purified his or her heart of lust. We have a rigid rule, to which no exception is condoned, that all young men and women who live in the Ashram as inmates should regard one another as brothers and sisters. The love of these two had gone beyond that relationship. The men and women living in the Ashram are forbidden to meet each other alone. These two have violated that rule. And they also tried, successfully, to deceive the whole Ashram, which means that they have violated our chief vow, that of truth. Thus they have violated three important rules of the Ashram.

I had boundless trust in . . . . I had thought him to be a brahmachari of the highest purity. I had proudly believed that he would never deceive me at any rate. I had believed . . . to be an innocent and pure-minded girl who could never feel passion. I looked upon her as my first-born daughter. I have been proved wrong in my estimate. Falsehood cannot hide itself from one who scrupulously follows truth, non-violence and brahmacharya. Such a person immediately knows anybody who is lustful and all violence subsides in his presence. I have ceaselessly striven for many years to observe these three vows, but I admit that I have failed in my effort. I do not say this in pride. It is my vow of truth which compels me to make this admission. I should have discovered the true character of . . . and . . . My failure to do so is a sure sign of the imperfection of my spiritual attainment. I see that it is imperfect in regard to all the three requirements. I know my spiritual poverty. Unknown to me, falsehood, violence and passion are lurking in me.

I, therefore, feel as much compassion for . . . and . . . as anger against myself. Personally, I don’t judge them, nor should anybody from among us do so. However, my attitude towards them will appear to have changed from now onwards. In fact, it is they who will have changed. Equality consists in treating a sick person and a healthy person as each deserves. One's attitude towards both should be inspired by love. In either case, one must consider the good of the other person. My attitude towards these two will be in conformity with this principle. I will treat them as sick persons and nurse them as such. All of us should do that. How we can do so, I shall be able to explain later.

Everybody should learn from this incident. The boys and the girls should take a warning from it. Any of them who feels passion should confess the fact. They need not be ashamed of it. If I discover a snake in my bed, I cannot be blamed for it. After I have discovered it, I should remove it. Passion is like a snake in the body. One need not feel ashamed of admitting its presence. On the contrary, it is one’s duty to do so. It is a sin to let the snake remain and feed it. One’s duty is to get rid of it. If any girl or boy wishes to marry, she or he is free to do so, except that the prohibition against a brother and a sister or other near relations marrying ought to be observed. I have often cautioned people that nobody should write or receive private letters. Everybody should hand over to the Secretary his or her letter without sealing it. The Ashram is one family. Truth can have nothing private. Everybody who observes this one rule will save himself or herself from many pitfalls. However, nobody should be forced to observe it. The letters of all adult inmates will continue to be treated as they are treated now.

This is meant for all. If you would like to suggest any change in this or if you don’t feel inclined to read it out to the people there, you may hold the letter back for some time and let me know what you desire. You had warned me against . . . ‘s’ disregard of rules and his lethargy, and I had been warned by many against his excessive intimacy with . . . But I did not wake up. Let me see whether I who have been so stupid and obstinate, change now.

2 ibid
Even when you send many letters, you put them in an ordinary envelope. By the time it arrives here, it is almost completely torn. Some day some letter will get lost. You should either send in a stronger cover, or tie the envelope with a string as we do a packet sent by book post but stamp it as an ordinary letter. The risk in adopting the latter course lies in what might happen in the office here. One of the letters may slip out. If you wish to economize, let somebody make strong envelopes in the Ashram itself. Even if he makes only one every day, that will suffice. You must be receiving strong brown paper. Probably some persons will also have khadi which can no longer be used. With these materials, you can easily make cloth-lined envelopes.

Are there any persons, besides Parashuram, who know Hindi and English well? If there are, send me their names.

BAPU

[PS.]
Read my letter to Dhiru. Discuss the matter with him and let me know. You will have received the letter which I wrote yesterday. I wrote in it about Shanta Panvelkar. I have read . . .’s1 letter. I don’t see how we have a duty to let him live in the Ashram. The Ashram cannot be turned into a home for invalids. He also asks for allowance for the maintenance of his parents. We cannot pay it. Explain this to him. If he wishes to get admitted to a hospital, he may certainly do so. His mother should do some work. He may write to somebody in his town. In any case, I don’t think we can keep him.

153. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA
March 23, 1933

MY DEAR GHANSHYAMDAS,

I have your letter and the cuttings. Unless you make time for the operation I know you will never have the time. This always happens with busy people, and, therefore it is necessary to consider matters of health as real matters of business. I do not write this as a philosophic truth, but as a practical truth which I have enforced in my own life and in that of others. I hope, therefore, that you will set apart a month or so for the treatment and make an appointment with the doctors beforehand with the fixed resolution of keeping that appointment.

1The name has been omitted.

I note what you say about the work in Calcutta.

About Mr. David’s scheme I hope to hear from you further.

I shall certainly write something in the columns of the English Harijan about the Hindi edition as soon as I find the Hindi to be up to the mark. I have written fully about this to Thakkar Bapa, as also to Viyogi Hari. I need not, therefore, repeat what I have written to them. You will give to it what time it is possible for you to give, and make it brimful of instructions and information so that no workers would care to be without it.

You suggest that I should send the money due to the Central Board to your firm in Bombay. How should I save the commission thereby, unless you have meant that I should send notes through someone going to Bombay? If I do that, it would mean my having to run some risk of the money being lost. I have not that courage.

As to the denunciation of the Yeravda Pact by the Bengal Council, I have not felt much disturbed and I am not quite certain that counter-propaganda is necessary at the present moment. In no case can the Pact be revised unless all the parties to it agree. It will be time enough to apply our minds to the Bengal opposition when the parties are regularly consulted. I was consulted and I have sent my opinion, of which I send you a copy. But you and Satisbabu know much better than I can what to do in Bengal.

Yours sincerely,

154. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

March 23, 1933

DEAR SATISBABU,

I have your letter of 12th instant. In my opinion, according to the Pact, in the heading ‘untouchable’ can only be included those whose touch pollutes and who labour under the disabilities incidental to untouchability, but if the Pact can be otherwise interpreted and all those who are considered and are depressed, including the so-called backward classes [are covered], I should be delighted. I should be also delighted if it were open under the Pact to anybody to be classed as untouchable. But I see serious difficulties in the way. The inclusion of any but birth-untouchables might be resented by the latter on the ground that they would then be entitled to stand for Parliamentary elections and thus deprive birth-Harijans of the certainty that they have of election today, and they will be right in their contention, and in the present demoralizing atmosphere I do not see any chance of reason and charity having full play or any play.

This explains my opinion and my fears. I do not however ventilate my opinion just now in public, because it is irrelevant and unseasonable. When the time comes, I shall not hesitate to express it.

158. LETTER TO HOME SECRETARY,
GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY

March 23, 1933

TO
THE HOME SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY

DEAR SIR,

I have just had the Government’s reply to my letter of the 18th instant.¹ I fear that the reply raises a vital issue which I thought the Government had decided once for all in 1922². The very principle that the Government have now communicated was departed from in that year. Then too it was a question of fasting by the fellow prisoners. Major Jones was then the Superintendent. When the fasting became known to me, I sought an interview with the prisoners so that I could advise them. Major Jones would not listen to my proposal. I had to approach H.E. the then Governor, and I was permitted to see the prisoners with the happiest of results.³ Exactly the same question arose in 1930 when I was incarcerated for the second time.⁴ Major Martin was the Superintendent and he would not listen to my request to see a fasting prisoner. There was correspondence with Government in which I suggested that I was humanitarian above everything else and that I could not exist without being able to make use of my influence as such, wherever it was possible to do so. Here there was not the slightest intention of disturbing the prison discipline and at last my contention was allowed by Government and I was permitted to see prisoners every week, so as to understand their position, and wherever necessary offer helpful suggestions. So far as I am aware Major Martin never had any occasion to deplore the Government’s decision to allow me the liberty. That liberty has been continued during this incarceration, with restriction as to the number of prisoners I may see during any single fortnight. And I am not aware of any inconvenience having been thereby caused to Major Bhandari. The Superintendents under whom

I have been a prisoner and the Inspector-General of Prisons will perhaps testify that my intervention, wherever it was found necessary, has been helpful.

My present request has no connection whatsoever with special orders passed by the Government of India regarding matters arising out of untouchability. I would request Government not to disturb a decision they arrived at as long as 1922, which was after full deliberation confirmed in 1930, and which has been carried out during the present incarceration. I venture to suggest that no new circumstance has arisen for the revision of that decision. I have raised no new point. Indeed I was painfully surprised when my telegram about the reported fast of Seth Poonamchand Ranka was stopped. I therefore renew my request that the telegram to Bajaj1 (Wardha) may be sent without delay and that the decisions of 1922 and 1930 that I have referred to may be confirmed so as to set my mind at ease.

159. LETTER TO V. D. HULYALKAR

March 23, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. To all the preaching that you are doing I should add some tangible work, say, teaching Harijan children. I take it that you diligently read the weekly Harijan.

Now about your questions.

1. The Devadasi question is very little, but by the purity of your own life and perseverance you will be able to reduce the evil. The only effective argument I can suggest is that Harijans should realize that there can be no religion in reserving one daughter as Devadasi, for the simple reason that the millions of other Hindus do not do so and regard such reservation as impure. Those who have already given themselves up to an immoral life will only leave it when a sense of shame is created in Harijan circles. It will not do for you to become panicky.

1 This seems to be a slip for Bachhraj; vide “Telegram to Bachhraj”, 11-3-1933.

2. The game of mud and water will be given up if you will carry on your propaganda in perfect gentleness and if you have endeared yourself to Harijans by constructive service.

3. If Harijans can become vegetarians, nothing can be better; but if they will not, they should at least give up carrion and beef.

4. Of course it is difficult for you to find them in their homes during the day-time. Certainly, therefore, visit them at night or early in the day, but they will not be in the mood to listen to you early in the morning.

5. By constantly defending the Harijans against insults they will themselves learn to resent insults.

6. All things considered, a well-chosen vegetarian diet with the addition of pure milk is undoubtedly better than a mixed diet of meat and vegetables.

7. Smoking surely is not necessary in order to secure rest. Wherever organized labour is working, employers of labour should be induced to give rest at fixed intervals to all, smokers and non-smokers.

8. I am afraid that the argument that field labour is more paying than a peonship requiring a knowledge of the three R’s is true and therefore Harijan parents will not be easily induced to send their children to schools without being shown that it will be more profitable in the end.

9. There is no question of first and last; the awakening should be general, both amongst the Harijans and the caste men.

10. Truth and non-violence must always succeed. Tit-for-tat is the law of the beast, not of man.

11. I have no doubt that the present Harijan movement will purify Hinduism all round and will succeed in preventing disturbances or disruption.

12. Everybody is authorized to ask Harijan servants all kinds of questions, much more so their parents, therefore such questions should be patiently and courteously answered.

13. If your silence and fast on Mondays is a matter of vow, you cannot break it on any account unless you have left any loophole.

MY DEAR LELE,

I have your letter of 20th instant. I understand your point and your difficulty. You need not now worry over the thing. I must not issue any general instructions, for I have no authority. 163. LETTER TO BOYD TUCKER

March 23, 1933

MY DEAR BOYD,

You can never tire my patience, for I value the interest you are taking in everything I say or write or do. I know also that you do not argue in any spirit of controversy. I see your difficulty. You take or seem to take only one view of things. I have a profound faith in the Jain doctrine of Anekantvad. It is the many-sidedness as opposed to one-sidedness. To illustrate this celebrated doctrine we have a well-known story of ‘the elephant and seven blind men’, all of whom described the same creature in seven different ways, and the poet ends by saying ‘they were all true and they were all false’, and we may add ‘God alone is true, no one and nothing else is or can be wholly true.’

Holding this view I can appreciate and defend your attitude, but I can also defend my own. If the world will be influenced by my attitude on the question of temple-entry, not in its own way but in my way, I have no fear about its moral safety.

You will be pleased to know that I have an energetic letter from a Maharashtrian, completely defending your position and wholly dissenting from my reply1. You must have seen Gurudev’s splendid letter on the question. It came to me when the ensuing Harijan was

SUNA BHAISHRI,

I hope you remember the draft [Bill] approved by you, which Sarupbehn, that is, Vijayalakshmibehn, has shown to me. May I publish it? I will do so if you permit me. It seems to be good. It pertains to throwing open to Harijans one of the State-owned temples. In a subsequent letter you say that the idea has been dropped, as there is a danger of its leading to something like a referendum and that, in that case, the caste Hindus might stop going to the temple. The result thus might be the opposite of what is desired. May I express my view? Why should we fear the consequence of doing what is right? Let other caste Hindus not go to that temple; at any rate you and Ramabehn, the Maharaja, Ranisaheba, etc., will go. And I am sure a few other individual reformers also will go to it. It will be good if the Harijans are allowed the use of even one temple. If the reason you have given is the only one, I would request you to throw open one very popular temple even at a great risk. It seems from your letter that in Bhavnagar itself there are about four temples under State control. Even the sanatanists should not object to the Harijans being permitted to go to one of them. I hope you got my previous letter.

167. LETTER TO JAMNADAS GANDHI

[On or after March 23, 1933]¹

CHI. JAMNADAS,

I got both your letters. I hope you received the telegram I sent yesterday about the temple. It will be a fine step if you succeed about it. You are also perfectly right in what you say about receiving an order from me. One should not wait for my views every time. I have even made an earnest appeal to Pattaniji to throw open one temple at Bhavnagar. We should get as many temples opened at as many places as we can. It will of course be excellent if some people build new temples which are open to all and if sanatanists also help in doing so.

You write nothing about your health. You ought to write something. I follow what you say regarding the elders. Who can explain to them that they should now live on fruit juice, that that will keep their bodies free from impurities and their minds calm and that they do not require any other food for energy? This is, however, not for them, but only for you, so that you should know from now what you should do when you become old. If God puts me in a similar condition and I am not willing to stop eating altogether, may He grant that I wish and have the strength to live only on fruit juice. I have no doubt that when most of the organs of the body begin to fail, air and water are the only food. All this, however, is in the lap of the future.

I am returning your draft herewith.

MY DEAR N.,

I had your two letters. I like them. The poetic touch about one of them was quite in its place.\(^1\) I hope you got my telegram\(^2\) which I sent immediately I finished reading your letters approving of the idea of going to a village and living amongst its Harijans. If it is well thought out, it is an excellent plan. But there should be no hurry or hysteria about a single step which you may now take. Until Truth has become natural to you, life will certainly appear hard and you will experience what may appear to be disappointments. There is no such thing as disappointment when one is filled with Truth. It then simply shines through one and lights the whole life.

You must tell me more about Rudramani. There should be no guide for you but God, the Truth. I do not want you to be under any more spells. You may be thankful for such service as is rendered to you and is legitimate for you to accept, and mostly it can only be the food that you may need and the other necessaries of life. A servant has no further wants, and especially a servant of Harijans. I can imagine nothing nobler or more inspiring than this service. It carries with it complete satisfaction.

You will find a note for S.\(^3\) with this. It was good that you made him write those few lines, and it was good that you used the balance of the money left in the way you have described. The description made my eyes wet.

169. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

March 24, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

Your letter came in yesterday. It is now 3.15 morning.

I am glad you are free from constipation. You won’t feel the heat at all if you will continuously keep the wet cloth on the head. It cools the whole system. I do not know how they bring your milk. If it is strained as soon as it is milked or if it is bottled immediately and well corked and wrapped in a wet cloth, it should keep for many hours and drunk cold and unfired. I have given up fired milk altogether without any ill consequence. I get all the vitamins and perhaps only one pound that I take gives me more strength than more of boiled milk will. I am still on milk and paupau and oranges and dates. Oranges I take only once. This appears to be quite enough, perhaps more than enough. But what I want to tell you is that if you can manage unfired milk you will suffer less from the heat. The milk must be kept in as airtight a bottle as possible and the latter put in a wet cloth. The wet cloth keeps it ice-cold. You may strain it through a cloth before you. The cloth should be washed well immediately after use and so should the bottle. If that is done, I should feel quite at ease even though you may take your milk unfired. I think I have made my instructions quite clear. If you do not like the change and are otherwise feeling quite well, you need not make the change.

My weight stands at 104 lb. I do wonder. Though I try to live without attachment¹, I have no doubt that there are things that unconsciously affect me. You know my great regard for . . .². He has been my greatest brahmachari in the Ashram and the most truthful boy. You have also known what might even be called my partiality for . . .³. Well, both have been found making love to one another and trading on my faith in them. They have even been contemplating marriage. . . .’s⁴ letters have come into my hands. I had hopes of making . . . a proper Harijan girl. But now I do not know what will happen to . . . and . . . . I am making an effort to patch up the broken vessels. But I do not know how far I shall succeed or how far they will help. But all this is the language not of detachment but of attachment. I know the language of detachment, I am not practising the art. Hence it would be untruthful to use the language. I cannot dismiss these two lightly from my mind. I hope to do so in time. The immediate work in front of me does not permit me to brood over their sin. But because I have written to you, I see quite clearly how I stand myself. You are not going to worry over this. I am quite all right in spite of the tempest. God keeps me. I have laid bare the struggle going on within. But it is momentary. Truth will stand even if the Ashram is reduced to ashes and all my idols are broken to pieces. . . has been grand. And who knows that this discovery will not lead to a greater cleansing all round. Therefore you are not to grieve but to rejoice. Here at 4.15 the prayer began. This is after prayer and hot water and honey 4.45. Princess Aristarchi continues to send her weekly letters full of love for Harijan. She is fasting and praying and saving for the cause. If you will like to have more of the cards she has been sending, I would gladly send them. She sends you her love and so does Madeleine Rolland. The Rishi seems to be keeping fair in spite of the rigours of the winter and the collapse of order and democracy in Germany. They of course send their love to you. And for that matter all who write from Europe. But you know how indifferent I am about sending you these messages. Tell Ba I may not write to her every week.

Love.

171. LETTER TO PRINCESS EFY ARISTARCHI

March 24, 1933

Your letters are all touching. I do value your selfless love and your heart-felt prayers, and I have not a shadow of a doubt that the prayers of the pure are always answered. You are therefore absolutely correct in saying that you have to develop all possible purity in order to have your prayers for the Harijans answered. You will not therefore apologize for your long letters. They are not too long for me. If they reach me when I am too busy, I glance through the contents and then leave them aside to be read fully on finding a little leisure.

I am glad you like the Harijan. If you want any complimentary copies to be sent to anybody, please do not hesitate.

I hear weekly from Mira. I send your love to her and she sends hers to you. But I am a very indifferent carrier of such love messages. I expect friends to take these for granted.

173. LETTER TO R. B. GREGG

March 24, 1933

MY DEAR GOVIND,

I have your letter and I had the book¹ also. I am at the book now. I do want to give a trial to the method, and I would rejoice if I can throw away the spectacles I have used for years. Kakasaheb is here. He never gave the method a real trial, but he may do so now.

I hope you are regularly getting your copy of the Harijan. I want you and Radha² to read it critically and give me your suggestions.

Yours sincerely,

MY DEAR CHILD.

I have your long letter after some waiting. The account of your meeting is very interesting. It was impossible that with all the earnestness and force you could put into your words you could fail to be effective.

The Cross undoubtedly makes a universal appeal the moment you give it a universal meaning in place of the narrow one that is often heard at ordinary meetings. But then, as you put it, you have to have the eyes of the soul with which to contemplate it.

I am glad you are mothering the Muslim girl from Hyderabad. You must tell me more of her when you have known her more.

I never knew that people out there ever carried loads on their heads. Is what you saw the usual practice in your part of England? What could be the weight, and what are the receptacles made of in which the load is carried? What is the distance that is covered? Is it the ordinary house-refuse that they contain?

I hope Hans' has found an answer to his prayer.

Maria wrote to me the other day and I saw how glad she was that you were at last coming. She is weary with fatigue, both in body and mind. She is almost on the verge of breaking, and I am anxious that, whilst she is still fit, she should run away to Kashmir and give her body and mind rest for a few months. She needs it desperately.

Love from us all and kisses to the children.

175. LETTER TO N.

March 24, 1933

MY DEAR N.,

It is not enough that you will strive. It is necessary that you have the strength. Striving is enough for God. But the promise is that real striving generates always enough strength. Therefore I shall judge you in accordance with the actual result you show. Have I made myself clear? You have a fearful struggle in front of you to overcome the wretched past. But if truth really possesses you, there is nothing to fear. Light dispels the deepest darkness. Truth conquers the blackest sin which may be otherwise rendered as untruth. I want you therefore to be on the watch-tower.

Yours sincerely,

176. LETTER TO RAMACHANDRA

March 24, 1933

MY DEAR RAMACHANDRA,

I have your letter. There need be no feverish anxiety about the publication of N.’s statement. As you will see from the letter¹ enclosed herewith I have asked her to let me have a copy; if you have it, you may let me have a copy. I telegraphed to her on Wednesday on the strength of her letter that she might go to a Harijan village. After all, that is her destination, and if she can go there now, so much the better. I have asked her, but you will also tell me what will happen to her post when she goes to a village.

Yours sincerely,

MY DEAR MARGARETE,

Your letters continue to come with clock-work regularity. Of course you are not going to be upset if you are turned out as a Jewess. I shall be now eagerly waiting for your letters to know your fate.

If you will have it so, you can take the palm for economy, though you must remember the old proverb that “One swallow does not make a summer”, and for that reason your summary dismissal of the question of food does not mean that the solution is as easy as you fancy it is for you. Whilst it need not be given undue importance, it is a gross error to think that food has nothing to do with a person’s moral or even physical growth. The experience of the sages of the world shows that they have given importance, some more and some less, to it, and the majority have admitted that a bloodless diet is necessary for full spiritual enlightenment.

You need not worry over the poor comprehension that your girls have shown of ahimsa. I do not wonder. There is no response to ahimsa from the atmosphere. They have never been taught to attach the slightest value to it, and probably they have been taught to despise it. You can not expect them all of a sudden to understand the value of ahimsa in an atmosphere so hostile as yours.

Mahadev has been receiving your letters and he has got your booklet too. As I have heard of Parsifal and as it was quite a booklet I read it during odd moments in two days and I liked it very much.

Yes, Mr. Kodanda Rao also got your letter.

Yours sincerely,

178. LETTER TO HARIBHAU UPADHYAYA

March 24, 1933

BHAI HARIBHAU,

I have just read your article about ahimsa. Your ideas are good as far as they go. But the article is not worth printing. You should go still deeper into the subject. Ahimsa does not seem to me to be a simple thing to write about. Instead of trying to write an article about it, it would be better to describe the thoughts which arise and the difficulties which are experienced while putting the principle into practice. Your statement that as an ethical principle ahimsa is universally accepted is also not true, though to a certain extent it is so accepted. Many people regard it as dharma to kill deadly animals or creatures. Others regard the killing of sinful men as dharma.

Of course there would be nothing wrong in your frequently writing such articles in order to clarify your own thoughts to yourself.

How are you now?

I am returning the article.

179. LETTER TO GANGABEHN VAIDYA

March 24, 1933

CHI. GANGABEHN,

I got your long and beautiful letter. Who wrote it for you? Stay there as long as you think it necessary and solve the problems.

Why does Ramibehn carry a burden on her mind? Has she forgotten her study of Sanskrit and the Gita?

Do not spoil Mahavir and Krishnamaiyadevi. The latter must do some work. And Mahavir should keep an account of every pie. Do not let him become a beggar. He must make some return. He will be happier if he learns to face difficulties. He should not use the name of the Ashram anywhere. By all means give him whatever help you can.

We cannot meet, but you may write to me and ask any question which you may wish to.

For what was Mirabehn criticizing Ba? The latter is full of faults, no doubt, but her devotion is immeasurable. There can be no doubt that Ba is covering herself with glory. Her faults are overshadowed by her firmness of mind.

I did get the list of simple books which you read. I am now waiting for your account of your reflections.

Kaka and I meet every day. He keeps good health. At present he lives only on milk and fruit. By milk I mean curds.

180. NOTES

WILL NOT Temples BE DESERTED?

An M.A.,LL.B. enquires:

If temple-entry is allowed to Harijans, it is highly likely that the caste Hindus and the priests will desert them. In that event, of what avail would the right of temple-entry be?

My only answer to this question should be that the correspondent evidently does not follow the movement but has simply condemned it, as his question implies and as I know from his long letter from which I have taken the question. But such an answer will not be sufficient for the cause.

Let the correspondent and those who think like him understand that the contingency that they contemplate can never happen, because the movement is not designed to force entry into any single temple, whether by law or otherwise. The assistance of the Legislature is being sought in order to make it possible to throw open temples where public opinion is ripe. It is impossible today even where public opinion unanimously desires it. When, therefore, caste Hindus, as also the priests, desire the entry of Harijans into particular temples side by side with them, there can be no question whatsoever of the temples being deserted. When the temple-entry of Harijans is permitted under these voluntary conditions, the temples would be all the purer for their admission, as is the case with numerous private temples which have been opened and which have not been deserted either by the priests or the caste Hindus.

Women Workers in Cuttack

Shrimati Rama Devi of Cuttack sends me a letter in Hindi, giving an account of the work being done by the women of Cuttack amongst Harijans. I give a translation of portions of the letter:

Since October I have been working amongst Harijans, with seven other sisters. We confine our attention to Cuttack only. We are all volunteers, working under the direction of the Anti-untouchability Board. The only pecuniary assistance we receive is in the shape of books and medicine from the Municipality. The stock of medicine is supplemented by local Kavirajs. We have distributed ourselves in four bastis of Bhangis, allotting two workers to each. We give instructions in the three R’s to the girls, teach them bhajans and read to them simple religious books. We distribute medicines amongst the ailing inhabitants, clean their quarters, report their special difficulties to the Committee, and we put before the womenfolk the desirability of refraining from eating beef or carrion. They were afraid of us when we first approached them. They had no faith in what we said to them and would not even listen. Slowly they shed their fear of us and now they do listen to us to some extent. We hope to get other volunteers amongst the women of Cuttack. Some girls have already begun work with us.

I congratulate these sisters of Cuttack on their devotion to the cause of the much-desired reform. Women are special custodians of all that is pure and religious in life. Conservative by nature, if they are slow to shed superstitious habits, they are also slow to give up all that is pure and noble in life. In this struggle for religious reform, therefore, the women of India may be expected to take a leading part. I hope, therefore, that the example of the women of Cuttack will prove infectious and that the work begun by Shrimati Rama Devi and her companions will be continued in spite of the difficulties and disappointments that they might have to face.

WHAT MORE CAN I DO?

A correspondent from the South writes:

I and my friend bought Khadi worth Rs. 20 and distributed it amongst Harijan brethren. I presided at a meeting advocating removal of untouchability and I am proud to be able to say that my friends are taking steps in the direction. What more can I do?

This is a curious question. But I have not taken it literally. The writer, I am sure, does not mean to convey that he is fully satisfied with what he has done. But whether he is or not, in my opinion no one can afford, in this big campaign, to be satisfied with giving a little of his substance and occasionally presiding at meetings, assuming, of course, that he or she has much more time at their disposal. When the spirit of reform seizes one, hundreds of things will press upon one's attention. It is not, however, for me to say what a particular person should do. He must take up the whole programme of the Servants of Untouchables Society and do all those things which it may be possible for him to do, consistently with his other obligations. The programme of the Society is merely illustrative, by no means exhaustive; therefore, it is open to anyone to supplement it, so as to meet with any peculiar circumstances that may be prevalent in his own locality.

FROM EUROPE

The reader will be glad to share the following with me from a letter¹ from a friend in Europe.

Harijan, 25-3-1933

¹ Not reproduced here. The correspondent had said, “You are perfectly right to have reminded me of the useless expenses in cabling to you”, and had gone on to say that it would not happen again. He had also said that he had begun to save up for the Harijans.
A Bengali Professor¹ writes a long letter from which I take the following extracts:

You will be distressed to learn that the anti-untouchability movement in certain parts of the country has degenerated into a vile and violent propaganda against Brahminism and all that it stands for. Misleading half-truths and deliberate untruths are being assiduously circulated in order to lower the Brahmins as a class in the estimation of the general public. Is the practice of untouchability confined exclusively to the Brahmins? Are not the other caste Hindus equally guilty? Even admitting that the Shastras were made by the Brahmins, where is the proof that the Shastras enjoin a rabid type of untouchability as is practised today in certain parts of India?

Is it not a fact that the Brahmins have made a very substantial contribution towards the success of the present anti-untouchability movement? Is it not, again, true that the majority of those of our worthy M.L.A.s who have adopted an obstructionist attitude towards the Temple-entry Bill happen to be other than Brahmins? Why, then, this tirade against the Brahmins, who perhaps realize more than anybody else the gravity of the situation created by the scourge of untouchability?

Except for the writings in the papers and periodicals representing the anti-Brahmin movement which has been going on in the country for some years and which was inaugurated long before the campaign against untouchability was, I have not seen any attack, violent or otherwise, upon Brahminism. Certainly the Servants of Untouchables Society has had nothing to do with any such attack, and the writer is quite right in saying that I would be distressed if I learnt that the anti-untouchability movement had degenerated into a vile and violent propaganda against Brahminism. I have, therefore, asked the correspondent to furnish me with the evidence that may be in his possession to prove the serious statement he has made. The letter enables me, however, to reiterate my own opinion of Brahminism and Brahmins.

I believe Brahminism to be unadulterated wisdom leading one to the realization of Brahman, that is God. If I did not hold that view, I should no longer call myself a Hindu. Brahmins, however, like all the other members of the human family, are not all true representatives of Brahminism. But I have to believe that, of all the classes in the world, the Brahmin will show the largest percentage of those who have given up their all in search of knowledge, that is Truth. I know of no system other than Hinduism under which a class has been set apart from generation to generation for the exclusive pursuit of divine knowledge and consigned to voluntary poverty. That Brahmins could not keep up the high standard that they had imposed upon themselves is no special fault of theirs. Their imperfection merely proves that they were as fallible as the rest of mankind, and so corruption crept into the so-called sacred books, and we have the spectacle of the most selfless rules governing Brahmins side by side with the selfish rules also made by them in order to help their breed. But it was the Brahmins who rose against the corruptions and selfish interpolations into the sacred texts. It was they who time and again strove to purge themselves and society of evil. I confess that I have the highest reverence for Brahminism and a sneaking regard for Brahmins and that, in spite of what is to me the sorrowful spectacle of Brahmins so-called making a frantic effort against the reform movement and lending their undoubted ability to the opposition, I am consoled, and let every unbiased Hindu be consoled, by the fact that the reform movement, too, is being led by those who are born Brahmins but who today take no pride in their birth. If a census was taken of all the workers against untouchability, I think it will be found that the majority of workers who are devoted to the cause without any remuneration or with only just enough to keep body and soul together are Brahmins. But I admit that Brahmins as a class have suffered degradation. If they had not, if they had lived up to their profession, Hinduism would not be in the degraded state in which it is. It would be a contradiction in terms to suggest that Hinduism is what it is in spite of the correct life of the Brahmins. That could not be, because the Brahmins themselves have taught us to believe that they are the true custodians of the divine wisdom and that, where there is divine wisdom, there is no fear, there is no grinding pauperism, there is no high and low state, there is no greed, jealousy, war, plunder and the like. Because Brahminism went down, it drew down with it all the other classes of Hindus, and I have not a shadow of doubt in my mind that, if Brahminism does not revive, Hinduism must perish, and for me the infallible test of the revival of Brahminism, that is, Hinduism, is the root-and-branch removal of untouchability. The more I study the Hindu scriptures and the more I discuss them with all kinds of Brahmins, the more I feel convinced that untouchability is the greatest blot upon Hinduism. This conviction is amply supported by many learned Brahmins who have no axes to grind, who are devoted to the pursuit of truth and who receive nothing, not even thanks for their opinion. But today Brahmins and Kshatriyas, Vaishyas and Shudras are mere labels. There is utter confusion of varna as I understand it and as I have explained it in these columns, and I wish that all the Hindus will voluntarily call themselves Shudras. That is the only way to demonstrate the truth of Brahminism and to revive varnadharma in its true state. Because all Hindus may be classed as Shudras, wisdom and power and wealth will not disappear, but they will be all used for the service of not a sectional religion but the service of Truth and humanity. Anyway, in battling against untouchability and in dedicating myself to that battle, I have no less an ambition than to see a complete regeneration of humanity. It may be a mere dream, as unreal as the silver in the sea-shell. It is not so to me while the dream lasts, and in the words of Romain Rolland, “Victory lies not in realization of the goal but in a relentless pursuit after it.”

_Harijan_, 25-3-1933

182. IDEAL HARIJAN TEACHER

The question is being asked as to what I expect of a teacher of Harijans. I admit that my test is exacting, but it will be found also that it is none too exacting for a willing worker. Moreover, my test is the only real test, if it is granted that this movement has a purely religious motive behind it. I may also add that I tried the experiment with complete success, while it lasted, in Champaran years ago. It could not be continued, because my stay in Champaran proved to be brief, and the volunteers who had offered their services had undertaken merely to give a start, the idea being to raise local teachers of the type contemplated.

Let me briefly describe the teachers and the experiment.

The teachers were Avantikabai Gokhale, Anandibai Vaishampayan, Kasturbai Gandhi, Manibehn Parikh, Dharanidharbabu, Narahari Parikh, Babasaheb Soman, Chhotelal Jain and Devdas Gandhi.

1_Vide a “An Autobiography—Part V, Chapter XVII”._
These were all, of course, responsible men and women, some of them pleaders and graduates. None of them were trained teachers. The majority had no knowledge of Hindi except that they could, with more or less difficulty, make themselves understood. Kasturbai Gandhi was illiterate but was in no way behindhand to other teachers. These were spread out in four or five villages. I forget the exact number for the moment. They were to start with the children but finish with the men and women. A knowledge of the three R’s was only one of the items. They had to look after their health and their character. They were not to use corporal punishment on any account whatsoever. Work was to be like play. The children—boys and girls—were on no account to be tired out. The first business of the teacher was to examine the appearance of each boy and girl—their eyes, ears, teeth, hair, nails, etc., and clean them, wherever necessary, and teach the boys to keep themselves clean, to see to it that the children behaved properly towards one another and that they did not use foul language.

Let me say in parenthesis that the non-Hindi teachers learnt their Hindi from the children. They were otherwise so raw that the teachers could merely see that the children traced the alphabet correctly and count the numerals in proper sequence. The central fact was to create round the school an atmosphere of culture.

The teachers were given no domestic servants. They had to do their own cooking, washing, etc. Where there were no buildings, they were to help building bamboo huts. In every case, clean, open spaces and, in my opinion, the simple art of the rustic were insisted upon. Paraffin tin shanties or dungheap surroundings were religiously shunned. In one instance we were able to secure the site of a temple. In every case the school became the pride of the villagers and a centre of culture.

But it had also to radiate its direct influence upon the grownup men and women. They received medical aid and therethrough also object-lessons in cleanliness, etc. The teachers’ living quarters, which were adjacent to the school, or where both house and school combined, were to be the dispensary of the village and contained stock of quinine, an opening medicine, and an ointment with dressings. They were to confine their attention to constipation, malaria and simple ulcers. The dispensaries were organized under the late lamented Dr. Dev of the Servants of India Society who personally supervised this department of relief and attended to all serious cases. He penetrated the homes of the villagers and transformed little Bhitiharva in a few weeks’ time from a dung-and-mud-sodden village into a clean-looking cluster of hamlets with the willing assistance of the villagers, and if I remember rightly, without the cost of a single pice. Dr. Dev was not a mere overseer of works. He was himself the leading labourer working with the spade and the shovel.

What Dr. Dev himself did in Bhitiharva the teachers did with more or less success in the other villages. The village roads and wells were cleaned. Inroads were made into the huts with the willing consent of the dwellers. Their little yards were cleaned for them in the first instance. The teachers had to become one with the villagers, share their troubles and sorrows and point to them the way to health and happiness in that malaria-and-superstition-ridden, unknown part of India, once the land of Janak and Sita. It was in remote Bhitiharva that Kasturbai made the discovery that several women had no wardrobe but the one ragged sari on their persons. When one of the poor but dignified ladies was gently advised to bathe daily, she hotly replied, “Come into my room, see if I have a change of sari and then give me your advice. You don’t expect a lady to bathe naked, do you?” There was nothing more to be said. When I heard the tragic story, I could but drop a silent tear in shame and sorrow.

I need hardly carry the description any further. The would-be teacher of Harijans can easily fill in the details.

That was my very first experiment in village schools, as it was my first living experience of Indian villages. Fifteen years have rolled by since. My experience has widened considerably. During these years I have seen hundreds of villages. I fancy I understand their wants much better than I did in 1917. To my ideal school for Harijans, therefore, I would add handicrafts, and most certainly begin with spinning and other cotton processes. I would add night schools for both the grown-ups and the children. I would entertain no high hopes of success. I would not even attempt to carry things by storm. I would, on the other hand, approach my work in due humility and infinite faith in my mission. I would let the children and the parents dominate me before I dream of dominating them. I would seek to qualify myself as their servant by right of love, in the fullest confidence that in the end I would dominate not them but their hearts. I have already outlined this scheme before two co-workers, one a High Court pleader and the other a very well-educated sister. Each wanted to know how they could take up immediate service. And I gave them each a fair half hour inviting them to be the ideal teacher. I now present the invitation to every servant of Harijan who is in need of work. I offer no pay. But I undertake to find villages for those who cannot. Everyone has to pay his or her own expenses and if he or she is too poor, he or she has to beg enough from his or her friends. The teacher has to live like a Harijan. Therefore, not much expense is needed. The school building will be any verandah or open space that might be offered by the Harijans. “Where there’s the will there’s the way.”

_Harijan, 25-3-1933_

183. AUNDH STATE AND UNTOUCHABILITY

I had requested Pandit Satavlekar, the well-known Vedic scholar of Aundh, to acquaint me with facts about the anti-untouchability movement in the Aundh State, as I had seen reports about it in the Press. His letter traces the progress of the movement during the last ten years and recounts the difficulties in the way of the reformer. I give below a condensed rendering of his Hindi letters:

There are 72 villages in the State. The Chief is a Brahmin of advanced views and wants untouchability to go. Ten years ago, he invited the so-called untouchables in the State to fulfil the following three conditions, in order to enable him to declare them on a level with other Hindus and entitled to temple-entry:

1. giving up of carrion,
2. giving up eating leavings of food,
3. daily bath.

These simple conditions were proclaimed in all the villages. The response was not encouraging. This was in effect the reply received from every one of the villages:

1. It is impossible for us to give up carrion as we get it free. We can think of giving up carrion if we are given clean meat in lieu of it.
2. We would fain give up leavings of food. Give us clean food instead.
3. There is not enough water for bathing and washing.
(4) We are indifferent as regards temple-entry.

The matter was allowed to rest there. Then came Sjt. V. R. Shinde, the great abolitionist, who visited them in their homes and appealed to them to avail themselves of the Chief’s offer. He also asked them to abolish untouchability amongst themselves. This appeal, too, fell on deaf ears.

After this I started a village sanitation programme. We went out every morning singing prabhat pheris and offering to clean the courtyards and surroundings of houses of which the tenants were indifferent. The results were somewhat encouraging. We offered soap and other washing facilities to those who were doing scavenging. But they said it was too much to expect them to keep clean, when they had to earn their living from an unclean occupation.

This was followed up by propaganda in the shape of bhajans, kathas, and special fairs. Classes were held to familiarize the Harijans with religious books. Schools with two teachers—an untouchable and a touchable—were started to induce them to learn the three R’s. No grown-ups came forward, but youngsters did come and are still coming to these schools.

Here is an account of the present state of things:

The State schools are open to all, and they are being availed of by Harijan children. Harijans may visit temples after a bath, and they are doing so.

In October last, a Health Day was held, volunteers were posted in every Harijan quarter and the Chief was good enough to announce prizes to those whose houses and surroundings were found to pass the test of cleanliness. One month’s intensive work before the Day was enough to do the trick. Every street and every Harijan quarter was a model of cleanliness. In fact, some Harijan houses in Aundh looked cleaner than Brahmin houses. His Highness, with the Ranisaheba, made a point of visiting every quarter and in Aundh alone, 105 prizes were awarded, half of them being won by the Harijans. The Ranisaheba went into every Harijan house, made inquiries about their appointments and needs, and the Harijan women honoured her with marking with their own hands her forehead with the auspicious kumkum mark.

This led to a general awakening throughout the State. On October 26th a meeting was held in the Bhawani temple for distribution of prizes. It was attended by numerous untouchables.
Harijans have free access to the palace, and the Ranisaheba and her daughters often attend Harijan weddings. The Chief has allowed a Harijan Chamar to open his shop in a highcaste quarter. On the auspicious Makarsankranti day—14th of January—the Ranisaheba invited Harijan women to the palace and distributed Sankranti gifts to them. A Harijan kathakar gave a discourse in a famous temple and a number of caste Hindus attended it.

I may, therefore, say that, so far as the State is concerned, there is in Aundh State no recognition of untouchability. But neither the caste Hindus nor the Harijans have reaped the full benefit of this. I shall illustrate what I say. The opponents of reform are more non-Brahmins than Brahmins. Temples visited by the Harijans are boycotted for the most part by non-Brahmins. In my own press there are six Harijan workers. The Mahar among these regards himself as superior to the five Mangs. When they sit down to feed in my house, they decline to sit in the same row.

In towns untouchability is going, but villages do still seem to be a difficult proposition. In this connection, I must advert to carrion-eating once again. It has led to most unfortunate results. It seems to stand like a dead wall between Harijans and caste Hindus and has often led to quarrels, and it may lead to bloody feuds. The reason is that the Harijans do not scruple to poison cows and buffaloes and bullocks to the consternation of the poor agriculturist, who feel that association with these cow-killers is unthinkable. There were no fewer than 124 cases of cattle-poisoning in the course of four months during the last year and special provision had to be made in the Law to prevent such crime.

I would request you to guide us with suggestions for future work.

This is an instructive and truthful account of the campaign against untouchability in the Aundh State. Pandit Satavlekar is an old silent reformer of unremitting zeal. He is a great Sanskrit scholar and has dedicated himself to the spread of the mission of the Vedas. Aundh has a liberal-minded Chief who, with the Ranisaheba, deserves congratulations for abolishing untouchability from his State. Notwithstanding the existence of favourable circumstances, in Aundh, the progress of reform has been slow. For progress is lame and taxes the reformer’s patience. Pandit Satavlekar has asked for suggestions. The work has been so thorough that I can only say, ‘Continue without losing faith and success is a certainty.’

I must confess that I have no anger against the Harijans who poison cattle. We are reaping as we have sown. We dare not neglect a single limb of society without the whole of it suffering. We have wholly misinterpreted the great law of karma and virtually consigned the Harijans to their own fate. We have forced them to labour for us on utterly inadequate remuneration and never cared to know how they have lived and fared. The wonder is that they are not much worse than they have been described.

I have suggested the only infallible method of weaning them from carrion-eating. All dead cattle should be declared State property and the cattle should be treated under the supervision of reliable officers, and proper remuneration should be given to the Harijans who may be willing to skin the carcasses and dispose of the several parts thereof as they may be directed. Here there can be no quarrel, no cattle-poisoning and no carrion-eating. All the proceeds from the disposal of the skin and other parts of carcasses should be earmarked for the benefit of Harijans, thus freeing the State from suspicion of exploitation.

For further guidance on this matter, I suggest a careful perusal of my article on “Disposal of Carcasses”¹ in last week’s Harijan.

186. LETTER TO BERNARD

March 25, 1933

MY DEAR BERNARD,

I suppose if I subscribed myself ‘M. K. Gandhi’ it must have been in awe of your impending practice as a lawyer.2 As long as you remain a spinner and weaver, bottle-washer and doorkeeper, I could afford to be ‘Bapu’, but to a practising lawyer in his gown, it becomes a different proposition. I am glad that at least your luck, if not that of all the lawyers, depends upon the good luck of the producers. You are welcome to a reasonable share of their produce for encouraging quarrels between them and then professing to adjust them. It is any day better that you should thrive on their quarrels than that you should thrive on their quarrels plus poverty.

You give me bad news about Florence3. That accounts for her complete silence. So you have failed in your first examination as husband. Let’s hope you will do better next time and not grudge poor Florence a mosquito-net.

What tragedy to be killed by bandits! Where was Dr. Vishnu Ram4 killed and how and what was the cause of the murder?

I am not quite so sure as you are that you will die gladly when your debt is paid. For I am quite sure that when one debt is paid,

187. LETTER TO SATYENDRANATH GANGULI

March 25, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. For me God and Truth are one, and of all the names by which we know God, Truth has always appeared to me the most appropriate name to know Him by, and for me selfless service is contemplation and meditation, whereas the so-called meditation may be self-indulgence. For me God is formless and therefore my vision of Him does not consist of any form. I think you will realize the Truth of what I am saying if you read the Bhagavad Gita carefully in the light of my remarks and live up to the interpretation I have tried to put before you.

You can hardly ever get pure, fresh olive oil in India. I am told that there are olive trees in Kashmir and that olive oil is pressed there. I have never seen it. The olive oil one generally gets at the chemists’. It is often a year old, never less than six months, and I have ceased to believe that it can be a substitute for milk. You may therefore dismiss olive oil from your mind considered as an independent food. Fresh sweet oil that we can get abundantly in India is, medical men say, a good substitute for olive oil.

188. LETTER TO ABDUR RAHIM

March 25, 1933

DEAR PROFESSOR,

I thank you for your letter of the 14th instant. I entirely agree with you that the proper thing is to abolish all distinction between touchables and untouchables and know them both by the generic name ‘Hindu’. But so long as it is necessary to distinguish untouchables from touchables, surely it is better that they are known by an inoffensive name than by an offensive one. An undutiful or unregenerate son might call his mother ‘father’s wife’, but a dutiful regenerate son would respectfully call her ‘mother’.

As to over-emphasis on temple-entry, I shall be entirely at one with you. Temple-entry, again, you will not mind agreeing, is necessary for the untouchable if he is to be an integral part of Hindu society and an equal partner with the caste Hindus.

As to your third question, whilst all non-Hindu help would be welcome, surely penance has only to be done by those who have committed the sin. Temple-entry has got to be given by those who have robbed the Harijans of their sacred right, but I would certainly summarily put down any political differences or political exploitation. For me this is purely a moral and religious question.

189. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

March 25, 1933

DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

I have your several letters, all received today. I shall be interested to know the replies you may get from the various associations in the Punjab. Whatever may have happened in the past, we must not leave alone the Punjab Alienation Act. But the first thing is to have the full text.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
As to the disposal of the funds, I propose to carry on the discussion in the Harijan before we evolve a definite policy. You will see my article¹ in next Sunday’s Gujarati edition, and I hope to write something for the English edition² also.

As to Bengal’s quarrel with the Yeravda Pact, my own opinion is that Satisbabu was hasty in throwing down the challenge. I have written to him to that effect.³ His telegram appeared in the Harijan inadvertently. Shastri had no time to show it to me, and he used his discretion, as he soon found out, not wisely. But that does not matter. I wrote straightway to Satisbabu and gave him my view. You will have seen my reply⁴ to the British Indian Association. I have sent a copy of it to Sjt. Ghanshyamdas. When we are required to give an opinion, there should be no mincing matters, but so long as the opposers do not refer to us, we need not take any notice. The Pact is a solemn agreement and it can never be altered without the consent of all the parties to it.

With reference to your tracts, certainly all of them can be advertised in the Harijan. Send a descriptive advertisement.

Enclosed is an interesting letter⁵ from Dr. Gopichand.

March 25, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I send with this the letters written by . . . \(^1\) to . . . \(^2\) which have come into my hands. All of them were received in one envelope on the same day. You may read them if you wish. I send them for . . . \(^3\) to read. After he has seen them, send the letters to . . . \(^4\). I have kept copies with me. I have promised to return the letters to . . . . Only so is it our duty to send them back to him. Otherwise he has no right to them. It is only a question of keeping my promise.

\(^4\) ibid

The wound which has been inflicted on me has still not healed, but I do not brood over the matter either. I cannot think much about anything just now except the work for the removal of untouchability. It helps me to forget all my sorrows. But whenever I have to think about . . . ‘s conduct, the wound revives and reminds me that it has not healed.

Though . . . wrote such letters, he says that he did not wish to marry . . . , but only wanted to cure her of the desire to marry him. He admits that the evidence of the letters proves the contrary but says that he will prove his statement by his future conduct. I have lost my trust in him, however, and that is what pains me most.

I have now told . . . that he should return to the Ashram as soon as his health has improved and in future scrupulously observe all the rules of the Ashram. I have also told him that he should stop enjoying whatever freedom he enjoyed till now, and that he should excel all the others in observing the rules. He has unreservedly promised to do all this. If he does not keep his word, he cannot continue to live in the Ashram. I know that you can keep a strict watch in such matters. Do so. Give him whatever work you like. He should always have his meals in the common kitchen and should have no relations with any girl.

This is my personal view. . . . has proved by his conduct that he is not fit to live in the Ashram. But he will not reform outside the Ashram nor can we know whether he has reformed. I do believe that we should give him the opportunity which he desires. But it is possible that all of you there hold a different view. I think it is our duty to respect . . . ’s wishes in this matter. If he feels that there is a risk in letting . . . remain in the Ashram, the latter certainly cannot remain. I would not at all be pained if he thought so. But even if he agrees with me, do consult the Committee and, if all of you feel that my view is morally correct, let . . . remain. I have had a frank talk with . . . and he has promised that he will take . . . with him and return to the Ashram. Even if she falls ill there, he will not take her anywhere else. He believes that we should be content with whatever treatment is possible in the Ashram. It goes without saying that I fully agree with this view. That is the only course which is in keeping with our vow of poverty. . . . will, therefore, have my fullest support. But this means that both . . . and . . . will live in the Ashram. . . . has no objection to that. I also see no danger. I don’t think . . . will make a mistake again. And, moreover, everybody will be vigilant now.

Let all the boys and girls learn a lesson from this episode, and the grown-ups too. If any of them has impure feelings towards another or if any two have secret relations, they should confess to you orally or in a letter. We respect the privacy of everybody’s correspondence. But I think it absolutely essential for the ideal of the Ashram that nobody should have secret relations with anybody. It has been my experience over many years that such relations militate against purity of character. I hope you have shown all my letters on those subject to . . . . Other senior inmates also may read them.

192. NOTES

UNTACTHABILITY AMONG SWAMINARAYANS AND JAENS

A gentleman writes.4

I did not know this. I had always believed from my childhood that there was no untouchability at all among the Swaminarayans because the Gandhi family has had a very close relations with the followers of this sect for many years past. But I have been able to read very little literature of that sect. From the books on Jainism and my Jain friends, I have come to know that there should not be an inkling of untouchability among the Jains. But the Jains also are very much influenced by untouchability. The Poet Rajchandra often used to say that Jainism had spread mainly among the Vaniks, so the Jains who should have the highest courage were filled with cowardice and 4 The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had said that cobblers, generally considered untouchables, had been accepted by a Swaminarayan sect and allowed to enter its temples, and that among the Jains, there was an Antyaja saint known as Mahetaraj Muni, who was very popular in his time.

those who should have the best knowledge have become dry, and penance without knowledge had no power in it. Having known the Jains very well, I bear testimony to the truth in this allegation and that has always made me unhappy. The Jains have always regarded ahimsa as their exclusive virtue but its real form has been completely hidden.
Kindness towards living beings other than human beings has always assumed an acute form and the Jains do not hesitate to enforce that even by compulsion. If ahimsa in its pure form were alive among the Jains, there would have been no trace of untouchability in their midst, every Jain would be an embodiment of love and thousands of men and women social workers would have come forth from amongst them.

DHED AND BHANGI

I give below the experience of a Harijan teacher to show what kind of difficulties a person who works as a teacher among the Harijans has to face, how cautiously he has to deal with them, and how he has to identify himself completely with the children.

193. ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

ABSOlute LAW

You seem to have grown very impatient. Please examine carefully the distinction I have made between the castes and the system of varnas. Untouchability springs from the sub-castes. When untoucha-bility has been removed, the barriers of caste will also go, followed by the divisions of sub-castes. In the case of varnashrama-dharma however there is not the slightest suggestion of untouchability, i.e., in the varnashramadharma as I understand it. It is a spiritual law like physical laws, and has no exceptions. Whether or not we accept it, the 1 The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had said that Dheds considered the Bhangis as their inferiors. The Bhangis wanted to educate their children with Dhed children but the Dhed elders were opposed to their children studying with the Bhangi children and separate classes for the Bhangi children had to be started.

2 A correspondent had asked whether there might not be other Harijans who would subscribe to Dr. Ambedkar’s views. It was possible, he had argued, that in their heart of hearts there might be lurking a feeling that their serfdom would end only with the wiping out of the caste system, the varnas and everything else. Was it not Gandhiji’s aim, too, to eliminate all inequalities in the long run?
law will continue to operate. One man may rest content after knowing that water is a compound of oxygen and hydrogen; another may discover its properties and potentialities and put them to various uses. It was one such inquiring mind that invented the steam engine. Those who understand the significance of the law of varnas fall into this category. I am never tired of saying that there is no idea of superiority and inferiority in varnadharma as I understand it; where then is the need for a specific demand to remove it? Dr. Ambedkar has a right to be angry with caste Hindus because they do not speak as reasonably as they ought to. You at any rate should understand that to declare a war on varnashramadharma cannot but harm the struggle for the removal of untouchability.

ONLY ONE Varna Nowadays

If we must classify all Hindus according to varnas, there is today no varna other than the Shudra. And the ultimate good of Hindu-society lies in admitting this state of affairs. If we admitted this the distinctions of higher and lower varnas would cease to exist without our having to do anything about it. Not that after this no one may endeavour to pursue spiritual knowledge or any other branch of learning; none the less it does mean that all shall earn their bread by their own effort and through body labour and shall apply their other talents in the service of the masses. True, we have not seen varnadharma of this kind being practised; I have however no doubt that it must have been followed in what Hinduism regarded as Satyayuga.

What Will Mere Temple-entry Avail?

I have never believed that mere temple-entry would solve the problem of untouchability but certainly I do believe that untouch-ability will not disappear unless Harijans get the freedom to enter temples like the caste Hindus. And I also believe that after the temple doors open for them means of wealth and wisdom will not be difficult to find. I know very well that even a highly educated Harijan with a good income cannot gain admittance to an orthodox Hindu home, his untouchability does not leave him. But his untouchability will go if

1 A co-worker had asked, “Since you wish to preserve varnadharma how can you say that there is only one varna, viz., Shudra, although as a matter of fact, we do not deserve to be called even that?”

2 Age of Truth

3 The barrister president of a Harijan uplift society had argued that temple-entry was not the answer to all problems and that means of educational and economic progress ought to be made available first.
the temples are thrown open to Harijans, i.e., as soon as the unity of religion is found. Anyway I have never said that no constructive work can be accomplished without temple-entry; in fact constructive work is the main programme of the association for removal of untouchability.

A MATTER OF PLEDGE

You have completely lost track of [our ideal]. Would one following the path of truth care for the consequence? Temple-entry is certainly a part of the pledge the Hindu society took in the meeting of September 25 held after the Yeravda Pact. Antyajas have a right to enter temples; therefore we ought to try to keep our pledge even if the entire society is opposed to it. To a votary of truth this should be as clear as light. Society’s opposition will be only momentary in so far as we never want to force our entry. We intend to preserve dharma at the cost of our lives. How long then would the opposition last?

The resolution pledging all this includes the demand for legislation as well. With this resolution, Hindu society has given the assurance that so far as it can it would certainly get such and such things done through the present Legislatures. And if we fail to achieve it, it is no doubt going to be the first task of the swaraj Parliament. Can there be a more unambiguous pledge? I am surprised that you do not see the great difference between offering and asking for co-operation. You would not co-operate with me if I offered to lead you to a den of vice, but does it follow that you would not want, would not even ask for, my co-operation if I wanted to guide you to the house of the Lord? It was and still is our duty to ask for people’s co-operation for the will.

BRANCHES OF THE SAME TREE

The twigs, leaves and fruit of the same tree, though they are separate from one another, do not remain untouchable among themselves; on the contrary they grow, in form and substance, with one another. The human race has to live like a tree. If one branch is severed as untouchable, it dries up and the tree is weakened to that extent. This is exactly what has happened to Hindu society.

[From Gujarati]
HARIJANBANDHU, 26-3-1933

1 A worker, irked by the opposition to removal of untouchability, had suggested other non-controversial programmes. He also wanted to know if the temple-entry movement would serve any useful purpose, since it was a step side-tracking the principle of non-co-operation.

2 A correspondent had described the movement for the removal of untouchability as no less futile than crossing berries with mangoes.
194. WOMEN’S DUTY

With the passage of time, I feel that women will have to make a very big contribution to the work of serving the Harijans. The whole world knows that woman most truly protects religion because she is by instinct conservative. If she sustains superstitions, she also observes vratas. A religion cannot be safeguarded without tolerance and patience. Woman is the embodiment of tolerance and patience. Religion would not endure even a moment without faith. A man’s faith cannot measure up to a woman’s. Only linguists may know the true position, but in Sanskrit and in the languages derived from it, we find that many words indicative of virtue are feminine. Šrī, smriti, medha, dhrītī, kshama, ahimsa, pavitrata, shantī, daya, namrata, are all feminine names. And everywhere these qualities are met with in greater measure in women. I do know of saints who dismiss the proposition by saying that one glimpses these virtues in a woman because she is often illiterate. But the sum total of the experience of the whole world bears testimony to what I say. The above-mentioned virtues have no connection with knowledge of the alphabet but have a direct bearing on religion. Moreover, religion would have perished long ago if it was thought that the educated alone could preserve it. It is not many centuries since the art of printing was invented. But religion has come down to us from time immemorial. We have not heard of any religious preachers having been praised for their knowledge of the letters. On the contrary their followers have proudly affirmed that if they had any literary knowledge, it was of little significance. Whatever intelligence they had in them was only God-given. Their knowledge of the language was not bookish but was due to their penance and devotion to truth.

Whether all this is true or false, I have long held this belief and even if it is an illusion, so long as it is not removed it is to me not a falsehood but pure truth. So for the religious activity of removing

1 Beauty, grace, wealth
2 Remembrance
3 Intellect
4 Fortitude
5 Forbearance
6 Purity
7 Serenity
8 Compassion
9 Humility
untouchability, I am laying great store by women’s contribution. Without their help and goodwill, this task cannot be accomplished. Hence I reproduce the following extract from a letter received from a woman from Cuttack.\(^1\)

Because I have cited the example of Utkal, the women of Gujarat should not feel that I mean to suggest that they do no such work. They should not forthwith bring any such charge against me. But at the same time they should never imagine that they alone render such service and no one else does so. If anyone has this misconception, it is only to remove it that I have quoted the above letter. The women, and even the men, of Utkal are considered to have the least awakening. But even there women have started working. This may, perhaps, give fresh encouragement to the women of Gujarat. I do not know whether even in Gujarat the women are doing such work as the women in Cuttack do. If they are doing it, they should send me an account of it and if they are not, they should start doing so.

Men as well as women have to do two kinds of work—one among the Harijans and the other among caste Hindus. One has to bring home patiently to the caste Hindus that untouchability is a great sin and also raise fresh workers from among them. The magnitude of the work is so great and the dirt of untouchability has accumulated to such an extent that as long as several men and women do not come out to work, this monster of untouchability will not be destroyed. If fortunately there has been a genuine religious awakening, all those who have had such awakening will be able to do this work easily.

195. PROPAGANDA v. CONSTRUCTION

The summary which I gave of a Harijan’s severe criticism of the Savarna Harijan Seva Sangh of his Province has produced good effect. The workers have become vigilant. But they are also baffled. Does putting money into the pockets of Harijans mean constructive work or teaching a few children, digging a few wells and getting a few temples opened? This is work for a century. Propaganda means a countrywide effort to create among the people a feeling against untouchability through speeches, pamphlets, and social dinners, parties, etc. (The reader should understand the difference between social dinner and inter-dining. Social friendly dinners mean sitting together for meals at a social get-together, each one eating from his own plate food which is acceptable to him. While interdining means eating at each other’s home food prepared by the inviting party. Brahmins and Vanias who believe in caste restrictions will participate in social dinners but may not associate with inter-dining.) What a contrast between constructive work progressing at snail’s pace and propaganda work conducted at the speed of a hurricane! This is what puzzles the workers.

\(^1\) The letter is not translated here; for a summary of it, _vide “Notes”, 25-3-1933_.

VOL. 60 : 10 MARCH, 1933 - 26 APRIL, 1933 167

Propaganda is of course essential. But mere propaganda is likely to prove as short-lived as a bubble. Really speaking, the most effective propaganda lies in pure constructive work. But since pure constructive work is a near impossibility, propaganda is necessary to supplement constructive work. Pure constructive work means constructive activities by men and women workers of character who have perfect faith in the cause and who do their work in a missionary spirit. We, however, are imperfect. We may, therefore, sincerely do the best we can by way of constructive work and simultaneously carry on propaganda, too.

Here I wish to examine the question only from the financial point of view. One thing should be self-evident, namely, that we are bound to get a hundred per cent return on whatever money is put into the Harijans, pockets in the right manner. Whereas the money spent on propaganda work will remain an uncertain investment till we actually see the result.

I would, therefore, advise all branches of the Sangh to utilize the contributions they have received for constructive activities. We shall never have to repent for the money so spent. If we get from among caste Hindus, teachers, masons, carpenters, etc., to work without remuneration or for nominal remuneration, our constructive work will progress so fast that we shall have very little need for propaganda. In that case the entire money except what is paid as wages to the caste Hindu teachers and artisans will go to the Harijans. I would regard the money thus spent on running a school or digging a well as reaching the pockets of Harijans. Our ideal, of course, should be to see that the wages in connection with public wells or schools for Harijans should go into the pockets of Harijans. But, till such time as we are able to reach this ideal, we should humbly content ourselves with the next best thing. Every institution for Harijan welfare should maintain a separate account for such constructive work.

Propaganda work should be self-supporting. Pamphlets ought not to be distributed free of charge. A public-spirited printing press may print at nominal charge or free of charge, and the cost price of each pamphlet may be borne by the people. One who wishes to circulate the pamphlet among his acquaintances free of charge should pay for the copies himself or anyone from among the people whose interest has been aroused in the movement should pay for them.
Pamphlets received free are thrown into the waste-paper basket. Only a speculator would do such business. But even he adds such expenses to the price of the things to be sold. A religious body like the Harijan Seva Sangh simply cannot afford to indulge in such speculation.
From whom would it recover the expenses incurred? What information about eradication of untouchability can we get from a report stating that one crore copies of pamphlets were distributed?
Who can say how many people cleansed themselves of the evil of untouchability after reading them? Who can say, even, how many people read them? If, however, the reader had paid one pie at least for a copy, we may assume that he must have read some portion of it.

Propaganda work carried on along these lines would not only be self-supporting but, if it becomes popular, it would promote constructive work, too. I cherish the ambition even today that, if the Harijan weeklies become popular, we may be able to save some money from their proceeds and utilize it for constructive work. The reader may note that some of the work of these weeklies is done with the help of volunteers and that, whenever money is paid, it is paid at lower than market rates. I mention this fact merely to point out that the Harijan weeklies are in the nature of propaganda work and that they are also self-supporting. Harijan is published in Bengali, Tamil, Gujarati and Hindi. The Gujarati edition is on the point of becoming self-supporting. The Hindi has not become so. The principle for pamphlets, books, etc., should be the same as for the Harijan weeklies.

And now about the expenses on the salaries and travelling allowances of the workers engaged in propaganda activities. Most of such workers would be caste Hindus. They, however, would never ask for any payment. What effect can the speeches of paid workers have on the people? Their travelling expenses should not have to be borne by the institution employing them but should be met by the people.
That is to say, the reception committees of the places which have invited them should bear the expenses. The permanent body may arrange these things but should not bear their expenses. And lastly about the office expenses, the salary of the accountant, the travelling expenses of the secretary, the rent for the building, etc. This expenditure should not exceed ten per cent of the total budget. Any institution whose administrative expenses total up to more than ten per cent should be looked upon as a self-destroying and useless organization.
It is my firm opinion that the institution for serving Harijans which has been set up solely for the purification of religion and which exists for that one purpose cannot continue to function in any other way. If I have been able to clarify my idea the reader should be convinced that

(1) it includes a mighty organization;
(2) there is great scope for widespread propaganda;
(3) it is a test of the people’s faith and also conducive to its growth.

Finally, it is necessary to state that I am offering advice without being engaged in that field at the moment; so my views may be wrong. If they do not appeal to the workers, intellect, they deserve to be discarded. Even if they appear suitable, I do not have the right to get them accepted or put into practice, but the Harijan Sevak Sangh and its sub-committees certainly have that right. My duty is to give my opinion and to keep quiet. The institutions concerned may give thought to this article and send their suggestions to Thakkar Bapa. Then, on receiving his suggestions, all of them may act accordingly.

196. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR

CHI. MARY,

My joint letter² set forth my views not necessarily for your acceptance. You are to do just what you think is best. My letter was a help to your thoughts and no more. You can get and give the best only if you do what appears to you to be proper. You two have come to see things for yourselves and not to take a set course at the Ashram.

I know you did not suggest but I meant that many in the Ashram were unconsciously slavishly following the Ashram routine and therefore not getting the best out of it. And then many of them, unlike you, have come in the hope of forming their character and making something out of themselves. They may and can afford to follow the routine unintelligently but you may not and dare not. If you follow the routine you must do so intelligently and whole-heartedly. Therefore you should take only what you can easily digest of the routine.

You must not get malaria. You should take things easy. The bowels must be kept in order. The stomach should not be loaded. No cold bath whilst you are at all weak. No pulses, only a little bread plus milk, greens and fruit. Smear the uncovered limbs with paraffin oil. Do not be afraid of it or its smell. It does not soil anything. The mosquitoes keep away from paraffin. Do not live under tension. This is a mental process. ‘Be careful for nothing’ is both a spiritual and physiological maxim.

The Punch is quite all right in spite of the hard facts of life but the harder fact is that neither Mahadev nor I nor any other of our company can give a minute to anything outside Harijan and other kindred work. Therefore we arrange a Punch and Judy show from among the threads of our work. And it beats the original, I assure you. You may pass this on to your aunt.

Others besides you have asked me to write on Jesus. If God wants me to do it, He will find the time for me.

Love.

197. LETTER TO DUNCAN GREENLEES

198. LETTER TO ASHRAM BOYS AND GIRLS

March 26, 1933

BOYS AND GIRLS,

I have your letter. You must have heard about . . . All of you must take a lesson from what happened. If you wish to be good, and follow truth, observe the following rules:

(1) Nobody should hide anything or talk anything secret with

1 The name has been omitted.
(2) Nobody should meet anybody in private.
(3) A boy must not have friendship with a girl. It is not natural. Why should a girl wish to have friendship with a boy instead of with another girl?
(4) The boys and girls living in the Ashram are like blood brothers and sisters. Just as brothers and sisters cannot marry, so also those living in the Ashram at the same time cannot marry. The relationship between brother and sister is not friendship. It is a pure relationship and of a kind which a man or woman can have with any other woman or man. Brother and sister never wish to be alone. There is nothing secret between them.
(5) If any boy or girl feels an impure desire, they should immediately confess it before their elders.
I desire that you should observe these rules voluntarily.

199. LETTER TO JANAKIDEVI BAJAJ
March 26, 1933

CHI. JANAKIMAIYA,

What is this? You do not even reply to my letter. Are you so much afraid of me? If you feel unhappy about giving money for Harijans, tell me so. Is it that you find the purse-strings easy to loosen when you wish to send me oranges, but too tight when you have to give money for Harijan work?

200. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 26, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your mail.

I wrote to you about . . . yesterday. I have also sent his letters. I understand what you say regarding Narahari.

You did right in paying Parachure Shastri the expenses for the journey and fixing Rs. 30 to be sent to his family. Arrange a class for those who wish to learn Sanskrit, and also ask him how many hours he can give for teaching Marathi. Let me know how you find him. Write about Shantaram also. I would be very happy if his intellectual powers develop.

Read my letter4 to Titus in which I have written to him about milk. How many times does Parachure Shastri drink milk? If milk is preserved for him in a clean bottle every day and if the bottle is wrapped in thick or double or twofold wet cloth it would remain as cool as ice and he can drink it without heating it. It would be better if he drinks unboiled milk. The bottles and the corks should be washed every day in boiling water. The cork should be made of strong material. The bottle should be filled to the top, so that no air might remain inside. I think that all those who are trying the experiment of living on milk would benefit more if they drink it unboiled. I have been drinking my milk unboiled for the last six weeks. Show this letter to Purushottam. His view should be treated as final. Kusum still gets fever, and yet she is better! I don’t wish to suggest that this is impossible. If the range of temperature is going down, she may certainly be said to be better.

201. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

March 26, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

I got your beautiful letter. I hope you will always keep up this attitude. Haven’t I promised to preserve the yarn for you?

I will keep my promise. You need not refuse it. You certainly have a right to ask anything from me. Your request for the yarn was blameless. It was the manner in which you made it that was wrong. You have now rectified your mistake, and so I have nothing to say.

You see how my hopes are being reduced to ashes. How much I thought of... and of...? I could never suspect them. I had built high hopes on them, but they were like a house built on sand. What should we do to realize the ideal which the Ashram has placed before itself? It can be done only if everybody tries to do what he can independently of others. Do you do that? I hope you know my definition of brahmacharya. Do you think you can observe such brahmacharya? Likes and dislikes have no place in it at all. I don’t wish to criticize you, nor to lecture to you. I only beg. Till my begging bowl is filled, the Ashram will never become a true Ashram.

I am glad that you wrote about your health. If you eat crushed cabbage, uncooked, it may possibly do you no harm, but it will certainly do no harm if you eat it boiled. It is not necessary to eat all vegetables uncooked. It will be enough if you eat a few raw vegetables. But the main thing is that you should speak as little as possible. The delay in following this rule may lead to such serious consequences that subsequent self-control will not avail you. Everything should be done at the right time. The throat requires rest exactly when it is sensitive.

I am glad that you became acquainted with Maruti. Write to the couple from time to time. Lakshmi wants a companion from the Ashram. Is there anybody whom you can send? Also write to Lakshmidas and find out if she can stay there.

Jamnalalji told me that there were many Maharashtrian ladies in the Ashram whom he had sent there. It is his desire, which he wanted me to convey to you, that you should train some of them for the Mahila Ashram. Is there anybody whom you can train? She should be a mature woman. Let me know if there is any such. Jamnalalji wants this to be conveyed to Narandas also. I will not mention this message separately in my letter to him. I reserve for it some further explanation in connection with it.

I cannot say anything about the White Paper. Moreover, the matter is out of my sphere while I am in jail, and so I have not even read it.

202. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 26, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

This is in continuation of the message from Jamnalal which I have given in my letter to Prema. One reason why we have been able to take no service from the older women in the Ashram (after the struggle) is the Ashram’s lack of ability, that is, my lack of ability. When Jamnalal talked to me about some other ladies, I felt a stab in my heart. He also felt unhappy that he had to make the suggestion which he did. But what could he do? He had often asked me in the past for workers, but I could not do anything then. I think we have got an opportunity now. I first thought of Lakshmibehn and then of Durga. There is a Mahila Ashram in Maharashtra, and that too in Wardha. There will be Vinoba’s company and guidance, too. There is also Janakibehn. Will Lakshmibehn agree to go and stay there without Panditji? Will Panditji like that? If not, why not? Mathuri also will go and stay with Lakshmibehn. She will get the same kind of training there that she does in the Ashram. If Lakshmibehn does not agree to go or cannot go, why shouldn’t Durga go? She is in any case bound to remain separated [from Mahadev] at present, probably for some years. She will not have to do hard physical work there. She will have only to supervise. The burden will not be too heavy for her health. She may certainly take Nirmala with her if she wishes. Narayanswami also may go if he wishes. I thought about Kashi¹ too. But she is a complete invalid and so I dropped the idea. I cannot think about Santok² just now, and I do not know Jamna’s³ capacity. I think Lakshmibehn and Durga would be the best. Manibehn’, too, I think, can go. She has done such work in Champaran. I have not discussed this idea with Mahadev here. I cannot think of any other senior women. I think I have given you ample information. If any lady volunteers are willing to go, let me know. And if the Maharashtrian ladies who have recently joined wish to go, they also may go. Their services will certainly be required. But there should be a mature and experienced woman at their head who would look after all the women as her daughters and be in charge of the Ashram. The work requires maturity, purity of character and common sense. Other qualities will follow from this.

I hope Mohan⁵ has fully recovered.

I have already written about Raojibhai of Dharasana and, therefore, say nothing about him in this letter. It is not our duty to shelter him. I think it is beyond our means to do so.

I have also written to you about buffalo flesh. Sitla Sahai continues to write to me. But I tell him every time in my reply that he should convince you. Does Mahavir write to you? I have had no letter from him at all. Gangabehn has helped him to get a job of Rs. 25 per month,⁶ and she says in her letter that she will try to get some work for Krishnamaiyadevi also. How are Maitri and Durga? I had no letter from . . . ⁷. This creates a doubt in my mind whether she has fallen again.

203. LETTER TO PURUSHOTTAM GANDHI

March 26, 1933

CHI. PURUSHOTTAM.

I have your letter. I am returning the list of books. It will be worth while, when you get the time, to go through the books which I have marked in it. If you do not understand any words in them, you may take Dr. Talwalkar’s or Dr. Hariprasad’s help. The best thing to do however would be to read up one or two short books on anatomy and physiology. You would then be able to follow by and by what you may not follow now. You have sufficient patience and I am sure, therefore, that you will master the subject. The experiment of drinking unboiled milk is worth trying. Write to Gaurishankar and ask him. Do you suffer from constipation? Keep me informed about the results of the experiment of Chimanlal and Jamna.

I have your report. If you show these people the same love that you did for Gita when you nursed her without any feeling of aversion during her attack of smallpox, even their filth will smell sweet to you. I hope you take with you medicines for the sick. If you work with the patience of the Meru, you will never give way to despair. You are not the only person doing this kind of work. There are others also doing similar work in other parts of the country. I have not written about them but their work is going on. Such work should become a common thing among us.

206. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

March 26, 1933

Bhai Ghanshyamdass,

I shall write a few things just now and the rest later. Your articles are the only thing in the Hindi Harijan that we find worth reading. Your language is sweet and vigorous but I cannot be satisfied with this. A major portion of the material will have to be sent from here till proper arrangements are made there. Mahadev and I will translate as well as write original articles. Viyogiji can correct our Hindi.
Moreover the Sangh should supply notices, suggestions, provincial news, and such things. All this should go toward raising the sale of Hindi Harijan to thousands of copies. It ought to become the chief gazette of the Seva Sangh. I have refused to send items to Ramdasji or anyone else for translation. Harijan Sevak cannot be successful at all under such an arrangement. If no translators can be found in Delhi and Viyogiji cannot undertake the translation or arrange for it I would consider it necessary to discontinue the Harijan Sevak.

I notice that there is more work to do for the bastis of Calcutta.

I understand about the David Scheme. The suggestion should be considered. I shall write more. Appoint the Selection Board.

210. LETTER TO NANALAL K. JASANI

March 27, 1933

Bhai NANALAL.

I send herewith Maganlal’s letter and telegram. You will also find on the telegram form the reply I am sending to him.

It seems to me that now the only thing to do is to effect a partition. That also will require the signatures of all. Hence in my reply, I am asking Maganlal to come here. I believe that Chhaganlal also will welcome the partition. And Champa seems to be eager for it. If that is so, and if you do not think Maganlal’s presence necessary at all, you should wire to him from there asking him not to come. However if you think with me that the presence of all the three brothers will be necessary you too should send a wire to Maganlal asking him to come.

I feel worried about Champa’s and Ratilal’s attitude. Champa will naturally follow her father’s advice and Ratilal seems to be under Champa’s influence at present. I have no trust now in Prabhashankar. His motives do not at all seem to be pure. That day he showed no regard for truth or courtesy. I felt that for the sake of money he was ready to harm the interests of his daughter and son-in-law. I will not, therefore, be inclined in his favour, that is, I will not approve of his being made the guardian. However, I certainly do not think myself to be the only friend of the Doctor. I regard you and Ratubhai to be equally his friends. You may certainly, therefore, appoint Prabhashankar as the guardian if you so wish. Sardar, to whom I have shown this letter, is of my opinion. You may rest assured that I will not come in the way of anything that may be decided. I have only explained my own feeling. If it finds no echo in your heart, it should be ignored. I am writing this so that I may have a clear conscience in the matter. I will have no objection to your showing this letter to Prabhashankar. In fact I wish that you should do so. It seems best that he should know what I feel. I do not wish to write all this to Champa and Ratilal. It is not right that I should tell them all this. But just as I feel unhappy at the thought of creating ill-will towards Prabhashankar in their minds, I would be untrue to you if I did not tell you what I thought.

I am not happy that this business is getting complicated and dragging on. Please try your best to settle it as early as possible.

215. LETTER TO PRABHAVATI
March 27, 1933

CHI. PRABHAVATI,

I have been writing to you regularly. What can I do if the letters do not reach you? I wrote a letter in Gujarati on hearing from you. Why did it not reach you? That was a long letter. [All] your questions had been answered.

It is well that you did not take up the duties of a watchman.

That you do not receive regular letters or visitors does not mean that you should give up [your right to receive] either.

Even if no one or no letter comes, you must learn the art of remaining cheerful. If they come, well and good, but you must be content even if they don’t come. If they don’t come you may consider all that time well-saved for some work. But take it that however busy I may be I shall always save some time for writing to you.

I shall write to Narandas about the Mangal Pravachan.²

My weight is 104 lb. which is good. I am taking fresh milk, papaw, oranges and dates... I take it twice a day. I wake up in the morning... The Harijan practically takes up the whole day.

I hope Kanta knows that I am deliberately not writing to her so that she may receive other letters.

216. INTERVIEW TO THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

March 27, 1933

Now more than ever before redoubled efforts should be made to open all the private temples to the Harijans.

Asked if the failure of the Assembly to pass the motion for circulation of the Bill held up temple-entry, Gandhiji replied in the negative and proceeded:

It does not mean that the temple-entry question would be held up, but it does mean that what is due to the Harijans in the light of the pledge given in September last has not been paid and, therefore, every effort should be made in order to redeem that pledge. Meanwhile whatever other ways are open to educating public opinion and gaining access to temples for the Harijans should be tried and one thing that naturally suggests itself to me is the opening of all private temples to Harijans.

There is no custom in connection with the private temples which can be pleaded by the third party in order to prevent the entry of Harijans to them. They should be thrown open to them and those who have none may even build new temples for the Hindus in general and these would be the model temples with model management and model priests so that they would be a true expression of Hinduism.

217. LETTER TO VERRIER ELWIN

March 28, 1933

MY DEAR VERRIER,

Although I have often found that truth however ugly it might look in reality did good, I believe that A.¹ came nearer to you both. The fact is that even if one party is pure the others tend to become so. But when the others are striving in the same direction the success of one almost ensures the success of the others.

I did not tell her that you were being unconsciously self-deceived. She says she did not wish to convey any such meaning to you. I had no proof that you were being self-deceived. What I did say was that all of us were likely to be self-deceived but that you were incapable of conscious falsehood and that therefore you would confess your promise at once if you had ever made it.

There is no doubt that she loves you both and she wants to work with you. She is doing some Harijan work now. I have told her that it is impossible at present but if all goes well, there is no reason why she should not be able to work with you later.

And now about Mary. To me it seems quite necessary that you should separate for the time being and test yourselves. Mary or you may go to Almora or to Sabarmati or Wardha or any other place you may think fit and do there some Harijan work of a temporary character. If you have shed exclusive love altogether you should feel happy as well in association as in separation and just now there should be positive joy in separation. I have found this indispensable in all such cases and there have been several. You should think it over and give immediate effect to the proposal if you find substance in it.

And now for your health.

It is now 3.45 a.m. and I must leave you in God’s care. His care is the only true care. A human being’s is good enough only in so far as it anticipates His. You will therefore accept of my suggestions only that which finds an echo in your heart. Every moment makes me humbler and conscious of the sublime fact that man’s true effort consists only in knowing the will of God who is Truth.

You carry the love of every one of the company.

With deepest love,

March 28, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter. You have no cause whatsoever for apologizing for doing what you conceive is your duty. I give the others the same credit for honesty of purpose that I would claim for myself. All therefore I would expect you to do is never to swerve from truth even in order to gain an end which you may consider to be desirable. You will then receive congratulations from me for your fighting me, and who knows that you may not teach me to see the Light if I am enveloped in darkness. It is therefore in a friendly spirit that I shall approach your paper¹, and if I find untruthfulness, unfairness or bitterness anywhere in it, I shall draw your attention, and I would like you to do the same thing towards me if you find in the Harijan any untruth, any exaggeration, any discourtesy towards those who think differently from me. Rightly or wrongly, I regard untouchability as the greatest curse for Hindu religion. I am therefore sparing no pains to get rid of that curse. But if it is a blessing and if anybody can make me see it, I shall accept him as my deliverer, for, he would have saved me from an error which I have nursed practically for the past fifty years.

MY DEAR GHNASHYAMDASJI,

I hope you received my letter² in Hindi which I wrote the day before yesterday, i.e., 26th. I do think that we ought to find out a means of dealing with the basti problem in Calcutta as a whole, and not piecemeal. When therefore you next go to Calcutta I suggest your having an informal meeting of the principal Municipal Councillors. No matter what vested interests have grown up, they should be attacked and the problem dealt with. From what you write to me, the cheapest method evidently seems to be to demolish these bastis. The opposition to the introduction of a more humane method of carrying night-soil seems to me to be perfectly useless. Improved methods must in the beginning stages mean more expense, but undoubtedly less in the end. The question behind all the difficulties that arise resolves itself, as a rule, into apathy on the part of those who profess their appreciation of the necessity for reform, but are not prepared to sacrifice anything for it. You must therefore turn this apathy into active sympathy, and a way out will be quickly found.

As to the Hindi Harijan, I wrote to you the day before yesterday telling you that the only articles that were found worth reading were yours, except the first. Your style is pleasing, simple, idiomatic. Your method of dealing with the subject is plain, direct and easily understandable. Of course the translation of my articles was faulty, but that difficulty will now be got over by sending translations ready-made from here. The Hindi will have to be polished there. This ought to reduce expense and improve the paper.

Pray do not worry about the David Scheme. I just told you how I came to write about it. But I quite understand your difficulty. If it becomes necessary, we must naturally fall back upon the Central Fund. But let us for a while wait and see if we can get even half a dozen subscribers with the full amounts. I do not despair; only I never get time to frame nice letters. But I will do so one of these days. When I have one or two names I propose to announce your name with these.¹ There was no question of your letting me down by your enthusiastically taking up the Scheme.

Yours sincerely,
BAPU

[PS.²]

You would remember our discussion about Ramanand Sannyasi. After that, I had written to him that I had received complaints concerning his character. I enclose his reply. He now writes to me that you have asked him to produce Urdu Harijan.

221. LETTER TO ABINASH CHANDRA DAS
March 28, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I know the difficulties that you have to undergo. I am hoping and praying that untouchability has now not a long lease of life. Anyway, there are many caste Hindus who do not believe in untouchability as an integral part of Hindu religion and are prepared to give their lives in order to eradicate it. I do hope that you will not repeat the mistake that caste Hindus have made by erecting barriers amongst the so-called untouchables.

I do not know Dr. Tripathi, nor does any of the other three. But you do not want anybody to write to him, do you?

Prickly heat could be easily got over if the doctor would allow you to take Kuhne-baths, otherwise called hip-baths, in which only the hips remain under water and the legs are kept outside. Perhaps you know that.

March 28, 1933

THE SECRETARY TO GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY
HOME DEPARTMENT

DEAR SIR,

In continuation of my letter of the 23rd instant I enclose herewith a cutting from The Bombay Chronicle reporting Seth Poonamchand’s fast. In view of the report I would respectfully ask for a reply by tomorrow evening. I would urge the Government to enter into my feelings, although I am a prisoner. With all the will in the world to find my peace as a prisoner in complete obedience to authority, I cannot suppress the humanitarian in me; I cannot give up the mission of a lifetime. I would ask the Government also to realize, if I may say so with due humility, that I occupy the position of a parent to hundreds of men and women. They would not expect me to let Seth Poonamchand die without my making an effort to save him if I can.

I am asking Col. Doyle to telegraph or telephone the contents of this letter to you.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

225. LETTER TO R.

March 28, 1933

MY DEAR R.,

I thank you for your two letters but I must tell you that they do not give me any satisfaction. I did not write¹ in haste. I wrote simply on the strength of what N. Devi had told me and afterwards written to me. Even your own letters strengthen my suspicion that lurking behind your actions there is a subtle emotional love which is undesirable and which borders on the impure. That is the mildest manner in which I could put it. Nor am I satisfied about this guru of yours if that is the gentleman whom N. Devi has described. Here I am on delicate grounds, because I know nothing of him and I may be doing the gravest injustice to him. You cannot disown your responsibility about your companions. You were all working together, the central attraction being N. Devi, at that time not a fountain of purity. You cannot divest yourself of responsibility for all that happened during that period. I would like you therefore to be a little more introspective than you have been, and tell me whether the scavenging work continues unabated as it was begun, and if it is continuing, who are the workers, how is it being done, who is the leader, and what is the result up to date. If the work has evaporated, you will tell me why.

Yours sincerely,

MY DEAR N.,

I have your letters of 23rd and 24th. I expect that you left for the village on Sunday as you had intended. May Truth take care of you there!

I know from personal experience how difficult it is to wash heavy khadi if you do not have plenty of water. Generally washing comes before sewing, but if it is the same cloth that requires washing and sewing, the sewing undoubtedly precedes, because you thereby save time. Washing will tear the cloth more at the point where it requires mending, therefore more time has to be given to sewing if it is done after the washing. Your dress itself may require a little alteration when you have got rid of all the ornamental part of it and made it just so as to protect the body and satisfy the surrounding convention. The quantity required is very small, the convention being the convention of the poorest.

I am glad you heard from Sir Todd Hunter.

I am not at all satisfied with R.’s letters. There is still the old infatuation lurking, and as I read them, a disposition to justify the past. I have written to him gently drawing his attention to the inadequacy of his letters. Durgadas’s letter I like still less. The mode of address is unpardonable. He can be no guide, friend and brother to you, who, although on his own showing he knew that you were a fallen woman, did not lift his little linger to save his sister. There is no question of your resuming your correspondence. Your correspondence just now must be with God of Truth and yourself. Nothing should come between you and Him. I come in because I am witness to the promise that you have made to your Maker and because I want to be able to claim you as a permanent co-worker in the service of the Harijans, in my opinion the most suppressed in the world, but neither I nor you can render that service unless that direct touch with Truth is completely established and the utmost purity attainable by a human being has become the exclusive passion.

You must beware of cold.

If you can procure whole wheat meal you ought not to take any rice at all. You should learn how to make chapatis. It is an incredibly simple performance. Take 4 ounces of clean wheat meal, mix in water and knead it well, roll it on any smooth surface, wooden or stone, with a rolling pin—even a clean ruler will serve the purpose—and roll it slightly thinner than a cardboard piece and bake it on a flat iron disk, turning the sides while it is baked. Out of 4 ounces you can make six of these chapatis, 6 inches in diameter. These would be perfectly digestible. I am sure that the lady of the house or hut where you are to stay knows all this simple cookery. Pulses should be avoided altogether. Of tender coconut you may take one whole per day if it is very tender, and of course you use all the water in the coconut also. You ought to procure some fruit and green vegetables, not potatoes and the like, but leaves, marrow, cucumber, pumpkin, etc.

1 Vide the preceding item.

Yours sincerely,

MY DEAR RAMACHANDRAN,

It is refreshing to see your signature after so many months. I have been following you nevertheless.

Narayana Iyer I know well from his Permanent History of Bharat Varsha, and I think I met him also in Trivandrum. He is a learned man but not a very clear thinker. That was the impression that his Permanent History left on my mind. But he is an enthusiast. Anyway, I shall try to read his pamphlets.

230. LETTER TO BHAU PANSE

March 28, 1933

CHI. BHAU,

I have your letter. For the present, you should continue to stay there. You should learn how to mix with people and yet remain uninvolved. You should cheerfully clean latrines and do other physical work which other people ordinarily do not do. You should keep up the desire to return to the Ashram,¹ so that you may be able to observe all its rules. For the present, however, you should keep the wish in check, stay there, and build up good health. We only wish to serve our fellow men wherever we may be, and there, too, you have enough opportunities for service. It is very good indeed that you come in contact with labourers.

Write to me regularly. Fix a particular day of the week for that purpose and write on that day without fail.

March 28, 1933

Bhai Babulal,

1. If, in spite of your mother’s opposition, you regard eradication of untouchability as your dharma, it would be your duty to follow it as much as you can, but keeping your mother mollified.

2. Where no arrangement of clean water for Harijans exists the first duty would be to provide the facility. To that end a good well should be constructed which may be used by all but its situation should be convenient primarily to the Harijans. An explicit notice should be put up there to the effect that the well is both for touchables and untouchables but the untouchables have the first right to it.

3. The agitation for the use of other wells should be continued alongside.

Were they in need of these things? If they were it was well that the things were distributed. If there was no need I am afraid it will not help eradicate untouchability, it can possibly lead to self-delusion. Is it not possible that we forget our true duty by making such donations? 234. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS

March 28, 1933

Two large-sized telescopes\(^1\) placed in the open yard occupied by Mr. Gandhi in the Yeravda Jail presented an unusual spectacle amidst the severe simplicity of the jail surroundings. . . .

[Mr. Gandhi said:]

They are for me.

Astronomy had always interested him, Mr. Gandhi stated, but after entering the jail this time, he was devoting himself to it with greater interest than ever before. Mr. Gandhi proceeded:

Now it has become a passion with me. Every free minute I get I devote myself to it. It is a wonderful subject, and more than anything else impresses upon me the mystery of God and the majesty of the universe. To be lying on your back in the open air on a starry night and regarding universe after universe in the immeasurable expanse, you cannot help becoming a worshipper of God. My mind leaps with joy as I do so. Oh, it is marvellous!

It did not require a study of higher mathematics, Mr. Gandhi added, as his interest in astronomy was not professional. He had been reading numerous books on the subject and with the aid of the apparatus before him, he would see more of those universes with his own eyes. He could easily understand their use as their adjustments, though delicate, were simple.

235. LETTER TO P. R. LELE

March 29, 1933

MY DEAR LELE,

You have sent me a cutting from the Free Press about the opening ceremony of a school. What I should like to have from you is not Press cuttings for reproduction, but an authenticated report from you so that I can publish it under the authority of the Provincial Board. Sjt. Anjaria should have supplied you with this report of the opening of the school in Andheri.

In the report it is stated that the gathering consisted mainly of Harijan men and boys. Could that be true? An authentic report should also state how much the running of the school is likely to cost and how much has been already collected towards the cost, and there should be something of the description of the building itself. And then it is bad to have to print a report of an isolated event. There should be a connected narrative of the activities of or under the Board during a given period.¹ Do you not think so?

236. LETTER TO N.

March 29, 1933

MY DEAR N.,

I have your letter of 26th instant. You are right. I do want truth and love to peep out of every word I write, and if they do not do so, it is not due to want of effort on my part. You need not therefore be afraid about my consciously rubbing up R. the wrong way. I wrote² to him yesterday expressing about the same sentiments that you have in your letter before me. He sent me two letters in the same cover, both of them were unsatisfactory.

I could see that truth had not yet dawned upon him.

You will describe your new situation as fully as you can, your surroundings, the neighbours, the population of the village, the things that can be purchased in the village, its distance from Mysore or Bangalore or any big centre, distance from the nearest railway station, the condition of water supply, the composition of the population and the like. Tell me also whether you can have good milk there. What are the cattle in the village? And if you cannot get good cow’s milk, and if there are goats there, you will not hesitate to have goat’s milk for $1. You should learn to milk goats yourself and have the goat brought before you, so that you are sure of the purity of the milk supplied, and if there are cows there, learn to milk the cows yourself. If you feel weak or if you find that your digestive apparatus does not keep up to mark, I would like you to go back to milk and butter, but no butter so much as milk, and take unfired milk, as you saw me take it. I should then have no anxiety about your health.

Whilst I would like you to live the life of the poorest of Harijans, I do not want you to do the impossible, and therefore whatever your health peremptorily demands, you should take if you can get it for the begging. If you cannot, in a perfectly honourable way, God will give you the strength to suffer privation, but even then you will not misfeed yourself. Fasting is better than taking food that you cannot assimilate or that gives you no stamina. A few dry dates or raisins or figs well washed will at a pinch sustain you and even $1, but I am sure that if you have living faith in living truth, it will not try you beyond your capacity for endurance.

Yours sincerely,

237. LETTER TO R. F. PIPER

March 29, 1933

MY DEAR FRIEND,

I was sorry not to be able to meet you. Here are the answers to your questions:

1. By machinery I have no doubt you mean power machinery. Considered in terms of millions of the population of India, power machinery is not indispensable for their material prosperity.

1 Addressee’s son
2 The questions asked by the addressee were:
   (1) Are not machines necessary for the material development of India? (2) What can religion contribute to human progress? (3) What chiefly is faulty in Christianity? What strong? (4) By what methods do you come by your basic discoveries or insights? (5) How make man good? (S.N. 20667)
2. Mankind has found religion in some shape or other indispensable for its very existence, hence it is fair to presume that mankind will need religion and I cannot conceive the moral growth of mankind without religion.

3. It would be presumption on my part to pronounce any judgment on Christianity, or for that matter any religion other than my own.

4. By incessant and prayerful striving.

5. I know of no method whereby man can be made good, but in so far as any making is possible it can only be done by setting a personal example.

238. LETTER TO PANCHANAN TARKARATNA

March 29, 1933

DEAR PANDITJI,

I thank you for your letter which Motibabu has kindly translated for me.

On the one hand I see that you consider the matter of untouchability supersensuous and on the other you are applying mere mundane situations to the matter. Personally, I do not regard untouchability as a supersensuous matter. I regard nothing as supersensuous which is capable of being proved through the senses. Thus, I would consider the question of the existence of God as supersensuous but not so the shape of the earth, and as our Shastras teach us, it would be a misuse of spiritual gifts to apply them for the discovery or for proving the properties of material objects. Untouchability as described in the Shastras is a purely material thing. There is nothing supersensuous in it. Therefore if I apply the ordinary laws governing the examination of ordinary things I am doing no violence to the Shastras.

Thus examined, in spite of what may be said in the Shastras, hereditary untouchability has no basis, and if a Chandala, so described, did not disclose his birth, there is no test whereby he could be distinguished from the rest. What applies to him applies with much greater force to his progeny.

I am afraid that your analogy of the Red Indians, the Australian Indians and other such races has no application whatsoever to Indian conditions, and it is historically untrue to say that in India there has been no mixture of races. On the contrary, there is incontestable proof that mixture of blood has been constantly going on in India since the known beginnings of time.

As to the pandits whose testimony I have cited, several who have upheld my interpretation I have not even had the pleasure of knowing. They have accepted the same authority that you are quoting, only they have given a different interpretation to yours.

With due humility I claim that though I can make no pretension to Sanskrit learning, I know enough of Sanskrit and have read enough of the scriptures to be able to form my own judgment on conflicting interpretations being presented to me of the Shastras.

With reference to your son, my own recollection is distinct that he was to have come as your representative, not in order to have a religious disputation but to hold a discourse with me in order to present your viewpoint and in order that I could understand it, so that if it was at all possible we might find ourselves on the same platform.¹

Surely, that was an object wholly different from that of the pandits who came to engage in a set debate between rival schools of thoughts with judges to regulate the debate. Your son coming as one of these disputants was not the same as his coming as your deputy without the conditions that governed the Pandits. Of course there was nothing wrong about his being one of the pandits, but that could not be a fulfilment of your promise. If he had the intention of engaging in a friendly and personal conversation with me after the debate, he could still do so. I shall be pleased to meet him any time he comes and patiently listen to all he might have to say. I can give you my assurance that I have not shut my ears to anything that might have still to be said on behalf of the part that upholds modern untouchability as an integral part of Hinduism.

Is it truthfulness to live in the Ashram but follow a mode of life different from the Ashram ideal? I want you to get out of this. I would rather say that you lived thousands of miles away from me but followed truth than that you should stay with me and live in falsehood. I have already failed once in judging you. 243. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

March 29, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your big packet of mail today. You will find with this a detailed letter of suggestions to Purushottam. Ramabehn cannot be got operated upon immediately. In any case do get her examined by Haribhai2. So far as I can judge, the operation will not be an easy one. I also doubt its necessity. Is it likely that the arms which did not become limp all these years will become so now? I cannot be easily alarmed by such a fear.

Kanu’s3 case requires careful thinking. Get him examined again

1 Addressee’s son
2 Dr. Harilal Desai
3 Addressee’s son
by Haribhai. Let me know what he says. The pain in the arm seems to have lasted very long. I think it is not being vigorously massaged. He is likely to benefit if that part is also exposed to the rays of the sun. I have had no experience as to whether it would help better if the rays were passed through a red glass. My experience means the experience of Hanumantrai. Ask Purushottam to read Dr. Sharma’s book which we have there and to try the experiments described in it. Perhaps they may help.

I understand what you say regarding Narahari’s letter. Discuss with him and other responsible inmates of the Ashram, the suggestions which you approve of and let me know the result. I think you will find most of the suggestions acceptable. That you will be able to please Narahari is also an important consideration.

Mohan must have recovered now. His illness has lasted quite long.

It is not that I want only scholars’ criticism of Ishucharita. I want yours and the women’s too, if you and they have read the book. Since the book has been written for the layman, Valji is eager to know the opinions of all. He wants them no matter whether they are favourable or otherwise.

You should start utilizing Parachure Shastri’s services now. Has his son been given any work? Can he do anything? Can you control him?

I will wait for your next letter for your views regarding Shanta.

I have written to Santok regarding Keshu. You need not write from there. She and Damodardas are coming tomorrow to see me. I have a letter from Keshu written yesterday in which he says that he may not now go there.

If Dhiru himself wants to learn painting in a spirit of dedication and agrees to observe the [Ashram] vows in Santiniketan and live there as an ideal student, if he is also ready to learn whatever else he can learn there, I think he can do excellent service afterwards. Painting also can be of two kinds, divine and demoniac, sattvik and rajasik, moral and immoral. I believe every word of what Dhiru has said. If he is so eager to learn painting, I think we should encourage him. Just as Panditji has dedicated his art to service and people get its benefit and are likely to get it in a still greater measure in future, so also can one dedicate painting to service. Painting is silent music. We can see from our experience of paintings which excite passion that, if a painter painted pictures which would purify us of passion, their power would be felt even by the coarsest of men. There are pictures painted with this aim. But of course there are very few painters of this type. If somebody from the Ashram becomes such an artist, we should admire him. Probably you do not know that we had started training Balkrishna\(^1\) to make him such a sculptor. He had even made a few statues. He himself then gave up the work. He has even given his reason for doing so in the letter which I received from him this week. We shall not mind if Dhiru’s effort to learn painting also meets the same fate. I don’t know how they teach painting in Santiniketan. But there is no better place in India at present for learning this art. But I should also like to say that if anybody else, following Dhiru’s example, wishes to learn painting, we may not readily agree. Dhiru’s heart has been set on this art for many years and his love of it is pure. He seems to be well-behaved in other ways and has the strength and the will to observe the Ashram rules. He has also been living in the Ashram for many years. If these assumptions are not correct, we cannot send him. We cannot send him also if there is the slightest doubt about the purity of his character. He can be sent only if he understands all this, willingly accepts the conditions which I have put in my letter to him and if all of you can trust his word, and if all these requirements are fulfilled I think it is our duty to let him go. All of you should consider the case from this point of view and decide. Don’t forget to invite Narahari to join in the discussion. After the incident concerning . . .\(^2\), we should be careful. A frightened man sees a cause of fear everywhere. If Dhiru indulges in lustful fancies, if he is a boy with an impure mind, painting is likely to prove a dangerous pursuit for him. These arts are alluring. The world itself is alluring, and it is no wonder that the arts of an alluring world should be equally alluring. But just as the world, though it is alluring to the senses, can be a field, for attaining moksha, can be a manifestation of the glory of God, so can art. Out of a thousand artists one may become a bhakta. I know that nine hundred and ninety-nine become lovers of the flesh. If you have faith in Dhiru that he will be one in a thousand, if all of you feel sure about that, let him have your blessings and go. Having done so, we should trust to our fate. We will dedicate to Shri Krishna our decision to send him.

2 Vrajlal Gandhi’s son

I started writing this letter before the morning prayer and end it exactly at four o’clock. It is still ten minutes before the prayer starts.

244. LETTER TO PANNALAL JHAVERI

March 29, 1933

CHI. PANNALAL,

I have received both your letters. You have been hasty in passing judgement on Narandas. The decision about Mahavir was not his; it was mine. Considering his rudeness, the lies that he resorted to and his financial bungling, any other decision was impossible. Behind the seemingly harsh decision, there is only pity. Krishnamaiyadevi did not know the truth. Even then, after Narandas gave his opinion, Panditji, Totaramji and Chimanlal conducted an inquiry. They gave their views separately and their conclusions were the same. Only then were Mahavir and Krishnamaiyadevi asked to leave the Ashram. I had not been inclined to have women [in the Ashram]. But Narandas showed courage. I have very little to do even with the help that is to be given. I had only suggested that they should be enabled to reach Darjeeling and provided with expenses for two months.

Narandas found this course difficult and found an easier way. The Ashram was under no obligation to accommodate the Giri family. In having them there, I had saddled Maganlal with a great burden, and had stretched the rules of the Ashram. It was with great difficulty that we passed these many years. I have no regrets about it. But if I go on witnessing violations of the Ashram rules, there certainly will be reason for me to regret. Now if Mahavir continues with his tales of woe, that will be one more reason why he should go. He is not as innocent as you think. Thinking him innocent I am not prepared to make him helpless. If you have the time, go deeply into the matter and if you find you are mistaken correct the mistake. If not, and if you think I am in the wrong, show me how.

Do not judge anyone in haste, certainly not your colleagues. You have written to me that you heard many complaints against Narandas. Let me know whatever you have heard.

2 Wife of Dalbhahadur Giri
Let me know your programme if you can. Where is Gangabehn at present? She has not written to me at all after she came to meet me. It is long since I had any letter from Nanibehn.

We are all doing well.

246. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

March 30, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

Today I take this up after prayer and after writing important letters to the Ashram about the ailing persons of whom three are having the fasting cure under Purushottam’s supervision. So you are not to grumble if I give this only half an hour.

Your letter came in yesterday, i.e., record good time after your transfer.

1 According to Mahadevbhaini Diary, “Speech at Farewell Meeting”, 15-10-1901 Gandhiji was permitted by the Government to send a telegram to Jajuji but not to Poonamchand directly; vide the letters to the Secretary, Government of Bombay, “Letter to Home Secretary, Government of Bombay”, 28-3-1933 and ; 1-4-1933.
You are hard on poor babies!! You forget that you were one and I expect thankful for having survived the baby stage! Celibacy for those who can appreciate it and live up to it is a very fine thing. But it must be allowed that it is a supernatural state for embodied beings. They live in pain and will to the end of time. It is therefore perhaps improper to be impatient with the married state and its results. After all we owe Gautam Buddha, Jesus, Zoroaster, Mohammed, Rama, Krishna, St. Francis and numberless such men and women to the married state. We cannot afford to be self-righteous. We cannot fathom the mystery of God. We need therefore to be charitable at every step. We ourselves stand in need of charity every moment. Married state is the only deliverance for millions from a life of lust and misery. It is well that Verrier and Mary have been able to give up the idea of marriage but I was not going to judge them if they had married. They are both striving to do the best that is possible for them. They are brave and true souls. No one is expected to do more than the best. To live up to one’s dharma (i.e., the best in one) is better than trying (vainly), to live up to another’s dharma (i.e., his best). A sweeper who lives up to his state is superior to the Brahmin who is merely playing at his state. Is all this clear, I wonder? I did not want to deliver this sermon to you. But your references to Verrier and the poor dead twins jarred and I thought I would warn you. Do not brood over this. These are momentary things in you. Your bottom is sound and fully weather-proof. It is good that you pour out your innermost thoughts to me without staying to think how I would take them. I want to know you just as you are. And here goes the 5.30 bugle. I must not stay with you longer today. The rest you will have from Ba’s letter.

Love from us all.

247. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

March 30, 1933

DEAR SATISBABU,

I have your letter of 23rd instant. I understand what you mean. Of course I saw the sentences that followed your description of Bengal untouchability as a greater curse. There was no logical sequence between that description and what you stated. By describing it as a greater curse you prepared the reader for the greater depths of degradation but not the extent in point of numbers. And then, I suppose you are not aware of the fact that if the Bengal description of untouchability was applied to Madras, then the untouchables would be perhaps 90% of the Hindu population, for every non-Brahmin is practically an untouchable to a Brahmin in the Bengal sense of untouchability. There are only two divisions in the south, Brahmins and non-Brahmins. Are you aware that if a non-Brahmin looked at the food of a Brahmin, that food becomes polluted? Hence my insistence upon stepping into the opponent’s shoes and examining his argument from his own standpoint. I think that there is decidedly a meaning in the Bengal argument that untouchability in Bengal is of the mildest type and that real untouchability is confined to the Bhangis, Mehtars and the like, who are, after all, imported. That we have to deal with every aspect of untouchability is quite true, but we shall only be able to deal with it when we are exquisitely balanced in our statements and that balance can only come if we will give even an exaggerated importance to the arguments of the opponents. Ahimsa is a most exacting dame and it sits with the most sensitive scales noticing even an atom’s weight of himsa or want of charity. We are on the safest ground. We therefore need not be in a hurry to give them battle. It will be time enough when they reach our border. Whatever case they have, they are weakening by going about it the wrong way, but there we cannot help them. They will have to see the error themselves.

I wonder if I have made my argument quite clear. If I have not, you must hammer away at it till I see your point or you see mine.

Yours sincerely,

248. LETTER TO K. KELAPPAN

March 30, 1933

MY DEAR KELAPPAN,

I have got your long-looked-for letter. You ought not to keep me waiting so long. You do not consider that the Guruvayur affair is over. It won’t be over till every public temple, let alone Guruvayur, is open to the Harijans. Therefore it is necessary for me to keep myself in touch with you, the prime cause of making Guruvayur the centre of the temple-entry fight. All your activity therefore has to have the opening of Guruvayur as the background. Public opinion should be cultivated. The sanatanists should be converted. We do not want the temple to be opened in the teeth of their opposition, but we want them to be converted. That can only happen if we are pure, single-minded, gentle, courteous toward them and show that religion is just as precious to us as they claim it is to them.

I see what happened at the Conference. Do not now wait for any instruction from the All-India Board, but make a list of the names proposed by you as the Committee and send that list to the All-India Board and a copy to me. Give a brief description of every member of the Committee.

I am surprised that you are not getting a copy of the Harijan. I shall see to it that you get a copy. The paper is being sent to you at Shraddhanand Ashram, Payyoli. The address will now be changed. But you must enquire at the above address.

March 30, 1933

MY DEAR THAKKAR BAPA,

You have given me a capital story¹ for the Harijan. It is going in this week. It does not show you as a sentimentalist, but, thank God, it shows that you do possess sentiment. Every possessor of sentiment is not a sentimentalist. Let us hope that this advertisement would not mean loss of employment to him. Let us hope that this example will prove infectious.

MY DEAR BHRRR,

I have your letter. I hope that the heat which must have now commenced in Kathiawar was not unbearable. You have been luckier than before in your collections this time. If you had not been, the white beard would have been required to be dyed black. That it would have made you look much younger than you are is true, but one cannot have the cake and eat it also. Happily, no such transformation is now necessary and let the silvery beard continuously produce silver coins in abundance.

Yes, Raihana came to me and presented me with a Harijan song. Let her stay here as long as it is possible for her to do so. What she requires is quiet and cool air. There she would be besieged by young men requiring her advice. But she has no business to act the grandmother whilst she is so feeble in health. Kamalmian should behave better, and he must get out of the middling condition. Please give my love to Mrs. Hamidali. May she take you away to Mussoorie before May, if it is possible. Devchand Parekh is greedy. You cannot go to Africa for collections and it is a wrong thing on principle. You cannot carry on anti-untouchability work by getting money from outside. Local work must be locally paid for. If the very large population of Kathiawar cannot find sufficient money for untouchability work, it had better not be done. And after all, money is not the primary thing. The primary thing is character and application. Money won’t change the sanatanist’s heart. Untouchability campaign is service of God. You cannot summon Mammon to your assistance for rendering that service. Therefore so far as Kathiawar work is concerned your limit is Kathiawar.

Love from us all to you all.

CHI. AMINA.

Everyone writes and tells me that you are showing great courage and patience. If Imam Saheb’s daughter, brought up in Phoenix and in the Ashram, does not do that, whom else can we expect to do it? If you keep up your patience till the end, both you and I will win. I always wished to see you in excellent health and capable of complete self-control. I suppose you know that both the words, sanyam and parhejgari mean self-control. One cannot cultivate devotion to God without self-control. It was for cultivating self-control that Imam Saheb came to live with me permanently. He was very eager to see you having grown up to be a woman leading a life of self-control, and it seems that you will fulfil his hope.

256. LETTER TO MRIDULA SARABHAI

March 30, 1933

CHI. MRIDU,

Your letter came after a lapse of many days. In fact, instead of one, I received two letters, for, when you write to Sardar, it is as good as all of us receiving the letter.

Your letters reflect your composure. May you always be as calm.

Your experiences are good. Those who have an understanding of life have been able to drink draughts of joy from it. They have even been able to change their lives.

Everybody is entitled to plead for Ba. You have that right all the more, for your love is such. You may take it that as a result of your pleading I have written a very long letter to Ba. But you will be pleased to know what Ba has conveyed through Kusum. With reference to my letters to her Ba commented: “Yes, Bapu is an absolute sadhu where I am concerned.” I alone know what a humbug I am as a sadhu. But what if it is my partiality for Ba which makes me write briefly to her. Surely you have heard the saying that a lover’s love does not wait upon civilities. But Ba is fully entitled to blame me. Her words may condemn me, but her actions make her rise and since I am holding on to her, shall I not rise too? So, you should go on pleading for Ba.

It is only here that I realized that Mani has inherited her dexterity from Sardar. Motilalji had been astonished by Mani’s dexterity. I gave her room in the Ashram to Motilalji. He commented at once: “I have not seen such neatness even at Anand Bhavan.” You should at least learn this from her. She also has an amazing capacity for devotion to the person whom she has chosen for it. In fearlessness some of your girls can rival her. So I shall not draw your attention to it. I would have very much liked to have Mirabehn’s company for a longer period, but we must live as God makes us live.

I always have you before my mind’s eyes. You are of course shy by nature. So I must draw your attention to it. It is true that whatever we do should be done rightly. But rightly does not mean perfectly. God alone is perfect. All beginning is imperfect. That is why it should be considered enough if what we do is done rightly. If we join our voices in Ramdhun, we may say we sing rightly. But that does not mean that we have learnt music. The same applies to bhajans. We can in a little time develop the capacity. Cultivating music as an art is a different subject. You may do it with pleasure when the time for it comes. But you can do immediately the things mentioned above.

Bharati has forgotten me altogether.

Now there is no time to write more. I do intend writing to Ambalalbhai.

Blessings from

257. A LETTER

March 30, 1933

I discovered only here that Mani’s orderliness is inherited from her father. It astonished Motilalji who was given her room at the Ashram and he exclaimed that such neatness he had not seen even at Anand Bhawan. This is something which you can learn from her. And she has a wonderful capacity for service to anyone whom she chooses to serve. In courage some of you can compete with her, so I will not say anything about it.

[Before March 31, 1933]¹

DEAR BROTHER GOPIKANT,

Yours is to hand. Let the wells be open to one and all. Public opinion should be gathered in favour of temple-entry. Interdining is not a component part of the removal of untouchability. ‘To drink water polluted by Harijans is not a sin’—this is my personal motto. When we wish to do away with untouchability, it is not a sin to drink water ‘polluted’ by untouchables.

Whether to drink or not to drink water is a thing of individual concern. You are ever welcome to me, if there arises any necessity.

259. LETTER TO HORACE G. ALEXANDER

March 31, 1933

MY DEAR HORACE,

Your long letter pleased me immensely. You should repeat the performance whenever the spirit moves you.

You will see that I have made use in the current Harijan of one important portion of your letter.² The other important part is with reference to reproducing in the Harijan the views of Dr. Ambedkar and those of the sanatanists. This is not always possible. I gave much thought to it. To make the paper self-supporting, to refuse all advertisements, as the initiator of the movement to give my views as exhaustively as possible on the current happenings about Harijans, to combine all these things in one paper becomes almost an impossible task. And then the reproduction of sanatanist views and those of the Ambedkar school was unnecessary for the vast majority of readers, because they knew all the sides of the question and they had been published in the daily Press. It could then be of use only to the foreign readers, of whom there are naturally but a select few. Whether few or many they could not be neglected, and I knew that they were being well-supplied with the literature outside what could be handled by the Harijan. And this extra reading they had to do, whether through the Harijan or through the original sources, and I came to the conclusion that I must leave them to gather the different viewpoints through the original sources. And because I have done so, it has been possible for me, even from almost the beginning, to make the Harijan self-supporting. I have certainly taken extraordinary precaution not to give any colouring to the views of the other sides, whenever it has been necessary for me to give them. More than this I must not say.

Thus, though I am not able to give effect, as you would wish it, to this part of your letter, you know that everything you say must produce its invisible effect upon my mind, and therefore whatever you think is worth passing on to me you should do unhesitatingly. The freer and fuller the criticism of friends and associates like you, the lighter and better will my work be, and such criticism will itself be an important part of our contribution to the Harijan cause.

Please share this letter with C. F. Andrews, Jack Hoyland and others.

I hope you are now so well that there is no occasion even to make any enquiry about your health.

Love to you all from us all.

263. LETTER TO GERTRUDE S. KELLER-CHING

March 31, 1933

DEAR SISTER,

I have your long letter and I was glad to find that you had gone to a meeting addressed by Mr. Errivaz.

There is one sentiment in your letter which I should like to correct. You say: “My life is a great rush and I do not get much time to pray and meditate.” This is what people often say, but it is not right. I think the Latin proverb is literally true: “To labour is to pray.” And if you would but labour for the sake of God, then no work becomes a rush. We simply give then the best of what is in us. Then there is no feeling of utter exhaustion, and when the whole life becomes a dedication, it becomes a perpetual prayer and meditation. For meditation you do not need a special time. Meditation to be true should be interwoven with every activity of ours. Try and test the truth of this for yourself.

You have asked me how I am keeping. Thank you for the enquiry. I am keeping quite well indeed.

MY DEAR N.,

Ramachandra tells me how he saw you off for your village and how Rudramani was too late for the train and how Ramachandra had to advance Rs. 10. Who was to pay the railway fare? Was it Rudramani? Do tell me all about him, his age, his education, his occupation, and let him write to me.

I am sending you this letter to the address that, Ramachandra has given me.

Then Ramachandra says, “To her I particularly said that she must dress very much more modestly than now and live like the village womenfolk do.” This is right. You know how best to give effect to it. Of course the idea of modesty differs with different countries and different people, and if we leave our surroundings and adopt others, we have to respond to them when we want to suit ourselves to the surroundings and identify ourselves with the people as you do with the Harijans. I know that there is the question of expense involved here. You will tell me all about the proposal frankly and fully. Let me have a copy of the statement that you were to publish.

Then Ramachandra says, “Please be writing to her if possible to keep silence for some hours daily and not to talk much and get worried.” This means that you have been talking away and if that is so, again Ramachandra’s warning is correct. It would not be a bad thing at all if you actually imposed silence on yourself for a few hours daily and made a conscious attempt not to talk except when it became absolutely necessary. Let your service be your sermon, your talk, your delight.

MAJORITY v. MINORITY

A graduate from Madras sends the following quotation from Indian Home Rule:

It is a superstition and an ungodly thing to believe that an act of a majority binds a minority. Many examples can be given in which acts of majorities will be found to have been wrong, and those of minorities to have been right. All reforms owe their origin to the initiation of minorities in opposition to the majorities. If among a band of robbers, a knowledge of robbery is obligatory, is a pious man to accept the obligation? So long as the superstition that man should obey unjust laws exists, so long will their slavery exist. And a passive resister alone can remove such a superstition.¹ and writes:

Kindly permit me to invite your attention to the above extract from your Indian Home Rule. From this we see that you once held the opinion contained therein. However, the above opinion of your own has been trampled under foot in connection with the temple-entry question. Are we to take that the present position differs from then position held by you then? Apparently, the position taken up by you is inconsistent. We hope to be enlightened on the subject.

It is unjust to a writer to quote against him passages from his writings without reference to the context. Nor should I care to defend what may appear to be my inconsistencies. I should leave the readers to judge for themselves. In this instance the quotation appears to me to propound a great truth often overlooked. Anyway I believe in every word of it. The Temple-entry Bills do not violate the rule. They do not bind the minority to anything, they compel it to do nothing. But if a majority may not compel a minority to its will, nor may the latter compel the former. But the natural rule is that, where there is a dispute between a majority and a minority, the latter will, without admitting the rightness of the action of the former, let it have its way and, if it believes the majority in the wrong, refuse its co-operation. One of the Temple-entry Bills does that and nothing more. But I am myself so jealous of the rights and wishes of minorities if only because I have been always, in the beginning at least, in a minority. I have, therefore, proposed, as the reader should know, a solution whereby the minority will have its wishes also respected. The other Bill takes away no rights of anybody. It simply takes the question of untouchability from the purview of the civil law. It does not interfere with the conscience or the religious observances of anybody. In fact, the Bills are designed to protect all views and one merely provides what to do in the event of a difference of opinion. Here I see no infringement of the rule enunciated in the quotation from Indian Home Rule. It shows how a minority can protect itself.

“HARD FACTS, NOT WORDS”

For the guidance of anti-untouchability workers I quote the following from a long and instructive letter from an English friend1 from whom I had invited suggestions for improving the Harijan:

The statement of things done, of progress, from week to week, seems to be very valuable. I wish it could sometimes be expanded, and not give only the skeleton. . . . I have wondered if the new Society will undertake any local surveys and publish the results. I should like to read paragraphs like this: ‘In . . . taluka according to a survey made by a member of the Society during the last fortnight, 25 village wells are being used by all castes without discrimination. Twelve of these have been opened to the untouchables since last September. But there are still 18 village wells from which the untouchables are excluded. The figures for temples are . . . and so on.

Of course, I do not know if you have enough volunteers present for much work of this kind. Naturally, they will combine propaganda with their survey. You know that we, Britishers, prefer hard facts to many words—or at least, we think we do!

I venture to think that it is not only the Britisher who wants hard facts rather than words, that is, practice more than precept. Everyone wants deeds. Words may follow to explain the deeds sometimes. The more reports one can have of the work done and the difficulties experienced both with the sanatanists and the Harijans, the more useful will the Harijan become. There should be no difficulty in producing surveys such as has been suggested by the correspondent. We have nothing to conceal. If we find that in a particular area there are one hundred wells and only one has been opened to the Harijans, we should not be ashamed to own the fact. The shame will lie not in the confession of the fact but in its existence. The confession will be the beginning of its end. We shall learn to deal with difficulties only when we know them in their full measure.

270. PROPAGANDA v. CONSTRUCTION

The indictment¹ by a Harijan of Harijan uplift organizations that was published in these columns some time ago has given rise to interesting correspondence.

It is necessary in the light of that indictment and the correspondence to examine the pros and cons of propaganda and construction and to know exactly what is meant by the latter.

Propaganda in connection with the anti-untouchability movement has meant an energetic distribution of literature among the caste Hindus, spreading information about untouchability and holding meetings among them. The Guruvayur referendum was essentially such propaganda. It has also meant holding Harijan conferences and the like for the purpose of telling the Harijans what is being done by the caste Hindus and what is expected of Harijans in the way of internal reform, such as observance of the laws of sanitation and giving up carrion-eating and other un-Hindu practices.

Such propaganda is undoubtedly necessary. We cannot have too much of it, if we can carry it on without creating bad blood and friction. Whilst the sanatanists are organizing, themselves and imagining Hinduism to be in danger from the reformers’ activity, the latter have to be careful. We do not want to rub the sanatanists up the wrong way. Wherever, therefore, these are in a state of rage, the reformers would do well not to hold their meetings. They are bound to contradict all falsehoods and exaggerations and themselves be scrupulously careful about what they say, write or do. Falsehood will never help any cause, certainly not religion.

Such clean propaganda should be self-supporting. Insistence on making it self-supporting will help to keep it pure and within bounds and make it most effective. Leaflets and other literature must be paid for and may even leave a margin of profits to pay for the necessary expenses of travelling, etc. Let not the reader imagine that I am writing this without any experience. On the contrary, what I am saying is based on an extensive experience gained before I became a ‘Mahatma’ and whilst I was little known in the surroundings in which God had placed me. Economy of time and money (one and the same thing ) was an instinct with me. One who has faith in his mission will find it easy enough to enforce this golden rule of truthful propaganda.

This does not mean that the reader pays for his leaflet in every case. That would be an ideal state. But it does mean that the central organization does not bear the cost. The local agency requiring the leaflets should pay the central organization for them. The local agency in its turn will see that it gets the cost repaid to it, partly by readers and partly by moneyed men interested in the distribution of leaflets. In this way the cost of propaganda will be evenly distributed and not felt by anybody. Such distribution would be a fair index to the strength and popularity of the propaganda. The various editions of the Harijan are most certainly designed as propaganda. They will have to be self-supporting or they must stop. The English. and the Bengali editions have already become so. The Gujarati is on a fair way to being so. The Hindi edition is still struggling. The Tamil edition is being published by Sjt. Ganesan without any cost to the provincial organization. The publication of these editions renders it easy for local organizations to carry on their propaganda without much or any cost. They can have all interesting and instructive information published in the various editions of the Harijan, which is their organ.

There then remain the travelling charges of lecturers. It goes without saying that they must be all volunteers. If they are moneyed men, they often pay their own travelling expenses. Where this cannot happen, these expenses must be found by the inviting agency. And the general rule is for reception committees formed for the purpose to raise special subscriptions and defray the cost locally. Thus the permanent organizations, whether central or local, merely procure lecturers, give guidance, lend the weight of their name and influence, but, as a rule, incur no expense.

Thus considered, the overhead charges include merely the cost of the organizing staff, rent, stationery and the travelling expenses of the Secretary. The chief officials are often wholly honorary, or are volunteers drawing just enough for their maintenance and always below their market price. And if the general staff consists wholly, or so far as possible, of Harijans, there will be very little money going into the pockets of caste Hindus, certainly nothing like even ten percent of the collections of the organizations. Thus, Lala Mohanlal of the Punjab Provincial Branch says:

Regarding the overhead charges, I have briefly to submit that, excepting the peon and the clerk, whose bill comes up to Rs. 50 p.m., no overhead charges of permanent or temporary nature have been incurred by the Punjab Board. I am working as General Secretary of the body, but I am drawing my allowances from the Servants of the People Society of which I happen to be a life member. I think this is the minimum staff required for running a provincial organization.

The bulk of the collections will, according to the scheme suggested above, be available for constructive work, such as conducting preparatory schools for Harijans, giving scholarships, opening wells, etc. Here again, care has to be taken to see that most of the paid staff is composed of Harijans, or caste Hindu volunteers who have offered their services free or for less than their market price. But it must be our aim to replace all paid caste Hindus by Harijans. Then there is every chance of all but ten percent of the collections finding its way into Harijan pockets.

And who will deny that this will be the best and the most effective propaganda both for Harijans and caste Hindus? The latter cannot but be touched by the silent, effective and dignified selfless work of caste Hindu volunteers and the consequent rise of the Harijans in the social scale. And there is no reason why we should not have thousands of young men and women from among caste Hindus doing this noble service among those whom society has cruelly neglected for generations. Have we got these missionaries? I have already shown in these pages that we do not need highly educated persons. We want men and women of grit, immovable faith and character that will resist temptation.

Harijan, 1-4-1933
271. STUDENTS AND VACATION

The following is a condensed rendering of a Hindi letter received from a student in Dehra Dun:

In the hostel belonging to our College, hitherto the Bhangis have taken the leavings of our dishes. But since the awakening we have stopped this practice and we have been giving them clean chapatis and dal. The Harijans are dissatisfied with this. In the leavings they get some ghee and delicacies. The students cannot afford to set apart all these things for Harijans. Then there is this difficulty. We may adhere to the new practice we have adopted, but the Harijans will continue to receive leavings of caste dinners, etc. What is now to be done? And at the same time that you answer this question, I would like you also to say how best we can use our vacation which will presently be upon us.

The difficulty that the correspondent has raised is real. The Harijans have got so used to the leavings that they not only do not mind them but look forward to them. Not to receive them they will regard as a positive deprivation. But this tragic fact just shows the degradation both of Harijans and of caste Hindus. The students need not worry about what happens in other places. The first thing is for them to be in the right and I suggest to them that they should resolutely set apart for their sweepers a liberal amount of the food that is ordinarily cooked for them. The Dehra Dun student has raised the question of cost. I know something of the hostel life all over India. It is my conviction that the general body of students spend far more on delicacies and luxuries than they should. I know, too, that many students consider it undignified not to leave their plates with ample remains of the helpings they had. I suggest to them that to have any leavings whatsoever on their plates is undignified and a sign of disregard of the poor people. No one, least of all a student, has the right to take on his plate more than he could comfortably eat. A student has no business to multiply the delicacies and luxuries. The student life is meant for the cultivation of self-restraint in everything and if they will follow the method of self-restraint and adopt the clean habit of not having any leavings on their plates, they would find that they would effect a saving in their expenses, in spite of setting apart a generous portion for their sweepers from the ordinary food that may be cooked for themselves.

And then, after having done that, I should expect them to treat the Harijans as if they were their own blood relations, speak to them kindly and tell them why it is necessary for them to give up the unclean habit of eating the leavings of other people’s plates and of making other reforms in their lives. As to the use of the vacation by students, it they will approach the work with zeal, they can undoubtedly do many things. I enumerate a few of them.

1. Conduct night and day schools with just a short course, well conceived, to last for the period of the vacation.
2. Visit Harijan quarters and clean them, taking the assistance of Harijans if they would give it.
3. Taking Harijan children for excursions, showing them sights near their villages and teaching them how to study nature, and generally interesting them in their surroundings, giving them by the way a working knowledge of geography and history.
4. Reading to them simple stories from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata.
5. Teaching them simple bhajans.
6. Cleaning the Harijan boys of all the dirt that they would find about their persons and giving both the grown-ups and the children simple lessons in hygiene.
7. Taking a detailed census in selected areas of the condition of Harijans.
8. Taking medical aid to the ailing Harijans.

This is but a sample of what is possible to do among the Harijans. It is a list hurriedly made, but a thoughtful student will, I have no doubt, add many other items.

I have so far confined my attention to the service of Harijans, but there is a service no less necessary to be rendered to caste Hindus. The students can often in the gentlest manner possible carry the message of anti-untouchability to them in spite of themselves. There is so much ignorance which can be easily dispelled by a judicious distribution of clean authentic literature. The students can make a survey of those who are for abolishing untouchability and who are against and, whilst they are making this survey, they may take note of wells, schools, ponds and temples open to Harijans and of those closed to them.
If they will do all these things in a methodical and persistent manner, they will find the results to be startling. Every student should keep a log-book in which he should enter the details of his work, and at the end of the vacation a comprehensive but brief report of the results of their labours could be prepared and sent by them to the Servants of Untouchables Society of their Province. Whether other students accept all or any of the suggestions made here, I shall expect my correspondent to give me a report of what he and his associates have done.

_Harijan_, 1-4-1933

272. ‘THIS FIGHT IS NECESSARY’

The reader will appreciate the following instructive letter that Gurudev wrote on reading mine to Boyd Tucker on the place of temples, churches and mosques in religion in reply to his letter to me.¹

DEAR MAHATMAJI,

It is needless to say that I do not at all relish the idea of divinity being enclosed in a brick-and-mortar temple for the special purpose of exploitation by a particular group of people. I strongly believe that it is possible for the simple-hearted people to realize the presence of God in the open air, in a surrounding free from all artificial obstruction. We know a sect in Bengal, illiterate and not dominated by Brahminical tradition, who enjoy a perfect freedom of worship profoundly universal in character. It was the prohibition for them to enter temples that has helped them in their purity of realization.

The traditional idea of Godhead and conventional forms of worship hardly lay emphasis upon the moral worth of religious practices; their essential value lies in the conformity to custom which creates in the minds of the worshippers an abstract sense of sanctity and sanction. When we argue with them in the name of justice and humanity, it is contemptuously ignored, for, as I have said, the moral appeal of the cause has no meaning for them and you know that there are practices and legends connected with a number of our sectarian creeds and practices which are ignoble and irrational.

There is a tradition of religion connected with temple worship, and though such traditions can be morally wrong and harmful yet they cannot merely be ignored. There the question comes of changing them, of widening their range and character. There can be differences of opinion with regard to the methods to be adopted. From the point of view of the trustees of traditions, they are acting according to an inherent sense of propriety in preserving them as they are, in keeping the enjoyment of idol-worship in temples for exclusive groups of people. They not only deny the right of such worship to Christians and Mahomedans but to sections of their own community. Particular temples and deities are their own property and they keep them locked up in an iron chest. In this they are acting according to traditional religion which allows them such freedom, rather enjoins them to act in this manner. A reformer, in dealing with such morally wrong traditions, cannot adopt coercion and yet, as in fighting with other wrong and harmful customs, he must exert moral force and constantly seek to rectify them. This fight is necessary. I do not think Tucker makes this point clear.

As to the Santiniketan prayer-hall, it is open to all peoples of every faith. Just as its doors do not shut out anybody, so there is nothing in the simple form of worship which excludes peoples of different religions. Our religious service could as well take place under the trees, its truth and sacredness would not at all be affected but perhaps enhanced by such a natural environment. Difficulties of climate and season intervene, otherwise I do not think separate buildings are really necessary for prayer and communion with the Divine.

I have sent a poem1 for the Harijan—translating it from one of my recent Bengali writings. I do hope it is one in spirit with the ideals of the Harijan, which I read with much pleasure and interest. There can be no more hopeful sign for India than the fact that her repressed humanity is waking up as a result of the great fast.

With loving regards,

Yours sincerely,

RABINDRANATH TAGORE

273. KABULI ZULUM

The training in patient endurance of the Harijan has to be very generously supplemented by inviting Muslims of piety and influence to meet the Kabulis and point out to them that the taking of exorbitant rates of interest and the use of force for its recovery is contrary to law, morals and Islam and that, therefore, they should either [sic] be satisfied with the ordinary interest and recourse to law, if there is failure to pay. Similar educative propaganda has to be carried on among the Bania money-lender who charges the same unconscionable rate of interest as his Kabuli brother.

Harijan, 1-4-1933

274. ANTI-UNTOUCHABILITY IN BIHAR

The following report has been received from Bihar of the work done to the middle of March.1

It is surely not enough for the local Committees to state that certain wells having been opened to Harijans were closed. It is necessary to state what steps have been taken to mend matters. In so far as a pure water-supply is concerned, it seems to me that it is the first duty of every Committee to make a rapid survey of the conditions as to water-supply and, where it is wholly inadequate, to take steps to redress the grievance.

Harijan, 1-4-1933

1 The article under this caption, which was adapted from Bengali Harijan, and which is not reproduced here, described the plight of Harijans who had borrowed money from Kabuli and Bania money-lenders.
2 The report, not reproduced here covered various aspects of anti-untouchability work done in Bihar and gave figures concerning temples and wells opened to Harijans, Harijan boys admitted to schools and scholarships given and temperance meetings held.
275. PROTECTIVE CLOTHING

The Home Office in England published for official use a carefully prepared pamphlet entitled Protective Clothing for Women and Girl Workers Employed in Factories and Workshops. I am obliged for the pamphlet to Sjt. Hiralal Shah’s industrious zeal. It contains different patterns of protective clothing for a well-classified list of employments, and it states that protective clothing has been found to be required for safeguarding the worker against accident or injury to health, or for securing her comfort and convenience in her work, or for protecting her ordinary clothing against damage caused by the materials, machinery, etc., used in the process in which she is employed, or resulting from the conditions under which the work has to be carried [on]. It goes on to state that in the great majority of cases the need for protective clothing arises from one or other of the following causes:

1. dusty or dirty processes,
2. working about machinery,
3. climbing ladders, etc.,
4. use of acids or caustic liquids,
5. wet processes,
6. excessive heat,
7. exposure to weather, etc.

Then follows an instructive but brief description of every type of clothing recommended. There are seven such types designed for 31 employments, coming under the headings I have already given. The pamphlet is profusely illustrated.

I mention this only in order to show the care with which the lives of employees are regarded by the Government in England and to drive the truth home that such meticulous care is exercised in devising methods of not only protecting employees engaged in dirty or injurious trades but also of protecting the public. How much more care is necessary in this climate for protecting the so-called untouchables engaged in dusty or dirty processes and for protecting also the public from the contamination caused by the workers in such employment becoming living carriers of dust and dirt! Their untouchability in no way protects society. On the contrary, a false sense of security aggravates the danger of contagion or infection and this aggravation is doubled by the fact that such employees, being neglected by society, become themselves so inured to insanitation that the surroundings in which they live become positive factories for disseminating dirt and disease. Hence the necessity for adopting without delay the very simple reform advocated by Sjt. Hiralal Shah. If we did not take a crooked view of untouchability, we should go to the quarters where the untouchables reside; we would begin our study of their conditions by entering our sanitary closets with our eyes wide open. Then society will not consider any cost too great for initiating and completing the reform, by ensuring the necessary measure of sanitation not only in the closets but also in the quarters inhabited by Harijans and by providing protective clothing and conveniences for washing and change.

276. LETTER TO R. R. CHAKRAVARTI

April 1, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter\(^1\) of 28th ultimo for which I thank you. I have read Hardayalbabu’s letter\(^2\) and carefully noted the parts underlined by you. Are you not hyper-sensitive? I regard it as an inoffensive letter. The substance of it is unfortunately true. The Brahmin as a class does not show himself at his best. I hope you read my article\(^3\) about it in the _Harijan_. I would like you, if you can, to shed what appears to me to be false sensitiveness and to join the ranks of reformers for the purification of Hinduism.

277. LETTER TO HOME SECRETARY, GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY

April 1, 1933

THE SECRETARY TO THE GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY HOME DEPARTMENT

DEAR SIR,

I am thankful for the receipt in due time of the Government reply to my request about the C. P. prisoner, Seth Poonamchand Ranka, who is reported to be fasting in the Seoni Jail. I am hoping that the permission will be adequate for the purpose intended.

The permission however does not dispose of the larger issue discussed in my letter of the 23rd March. The Government’s reply raising the larger issue disturbs the whole arrangement under which I have lived as a prisoner under successive Superintendents. I would therefore like to know the Government’s decision on my request. The delay caused in my establishing contact with Seth Poonamchand has meant to me an agony I would not like to go through again.¹ governing the soul. Man may break it as often as he likes, as he is doing, but he pays the penalty for it. Obedience to it sets free a vast amount of energy for the development of the substantial self, whereas disregard of it involves the expenditure of an amount of energy far too much for the result achieved. You have got to demolish not the varnadharma itself, but its inverted form. I am at one with you in doing so, but I have endeavoured to show that true varnadharma is a great discovery of Hinduism. I can be no party to the attempt to

281. LETTER TO V. S. R. SASTRI

April 1, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I kept your letter all these days without acknowledgement, because I did not want to send you a reply without having read your letter which you have had so carefully prepared. I must thank you for all the labours that you have given to the task. The texts you have quoted are not unfamiliar to me nor the meanings that you have given. The difference arises from the application. I observe that there is a fundamental difference between you and me, if I may for the moment put myself, a layman, side by side with one so learned as you. That difference is in the interpretation. I look at the Shastras as one organic whole. You take isolated texts and prove your point. That method is as ancient as the human race, but I hold it to be altogether erroneous. It has led to the formation of innumerable sects and rival divisions without bringing us nearer to God or Truth. I will not therefore trouble you any more with my questions but will naturally always welcome anything you might wish to say.

I note also what you say about ahimsa and truth. Here again the same difficulty faces me. I can agree with the position you have taken up and yet defend my own without the slightest difficulty and on the strength of the very Shastras with which you are undoubtedly so familiar. May it not be just possible that those who have the Shastras and the different interpretations of every one of the texts by heart may miss the central point, and those who neither know them by heart nor understand the meaning of various texts may realize that central truth?

April 1, 1933

MY DEAR SONAVANE,

I have your letter. I have heard from Shree Jajuji also. Am I right in assuming that you will take the whole of your course at the Benares Hindu University? If so, have you got the syllabus and the terms? If you have not, you may make the preparations, for I am hoping that the needed scholarship will be found for you, subject of course to satisfactory certificate being received from the University from time to time.

You are asking for Rs. 10 towards the maintenance of your parents. Why do you want that assistance? Are you at present finding that amount for them? If you are not, how have they managed up to now? I understand that you have a grown-up sister or sisters. Should they not be earning something? Have they received any education? If they are willing workers, work can surely be found for them. But I am in darkness. Please give me the exact condition of your home.

The enclosed is the form I would suggest for your signature if you approve of it. If you do not, you would tell me what alterations you desire.

Yours sincerely,

April I, 1933

I have read the addition to the original legal opinion. I do not think that it is necessary to publish it now. It will simply raise an unnecessary discussion. What may prove useful is another considered opinion based on other questions altogether. I could frame them, but I have not got the time If Mr. Bahadurji could think out something original and striking, I would love it. I do not mind even if it is an anonymous contribution, but I want something solid, absolutely impartial, a study of the Bills that will compel attention and show, as I think they do show, that there is no compulsion, as it is generally understood, involved in either Bill against anybody.

Nobody in the Ashram can accept a personal gift. Anything received by any inmate belongs to the Ashram. Nobody possesses anything that is his personal property. This rule is implicit in the vow of non-possession. But I think there are some exceptions to this rule. All of you should consider what they are and commit them to writing.

CHI. MANU,

I read your letters to your father. Every word in them bespeaks the purity of your heart. But you are altogether on the wrong path, as you have forsaken your duty. It would be considered a breach of trust if a person appointed to do one thing leaves it and does another. An agent commissioned to buy vegetables has no authority to return with a precious stone, though the latter is more valuable than the former. A jewel cannot serve the same purpose as a vegetable. As you are still a student and went abroad specially for study, you ought not to marry Elizabeth even if she is as good-looking as Rambha and as faithful as Savitri. To fall in love while one is a student is against dharma. If you understand this, wake up from the spell under which you have fallen. If, however, you think that it is your dharma to cling to your error, I am helpless.

286. LETTER TO PURUSHOTTAM GANDHI

April 1, 1933

CHI. PURUSHOTTAM,

Your letters are received regularly. I have written to Amina. It will certainly be good if she gives up tobacco. If she can, let her prolong the fast. She will definitely benefit by it. After one breaks the fast only fruit should be given for a few days, afterwards milk and fruit. You may consider unboiled milk also.

Jamna and Chimanlal will certainly be benefited. There can never be any harm.

But now I am a little worried about you. You should improve your own health. If you only interest yourself in other patients, you will not benefit either. Then you need a little more study and experience of nature cure. I want that you should familiarize yourself with the experience of all such centres in India. I know most of them. I don’t know whether you are well acquainted with Gaurishanker. You have also to see whether you have mastered yogasanas. It is my desire to exact a good deal of work from you after you have gained the necessary proficiency. But we should not be hasty. For the present, you should observe and treat the patients there. This will take quite a bit of your time. You should also keep writing to me about the condition of your health. I am not concerned about weight. It is enough if the bowels are cleared regularly and you feel fresh and energetic.

287. EXPERIENCE OF A TEACHER

I have already given some experience of a teacher who has been working among Harijans. From his other letters, I give below some more of his experiences. The reader need not be startled by this teacher’s enthusiastic language. He is an emotional person. His experience is very new. We hope the English proverb about new brooms will not apply to this teacher and his enthusiasm will grow day by day. And it will only grow if he has faith. The sun of faith can melt mountains of ice. If this teacher has towards these Harijan children the same feeling of love that a mother has for her child suffering from a repulsive disease, he will not be repulsed by their uncleanness but will make them tidy and clean like other cultured children. Whether this teacher fulfils the promise or not, the conditions that he has laid down for himself are indispensable for an ideal teacher of Harjians.

288. IN KODINAR TALUKA

The well-known lawyer of Amreli, Shri Harilal Govindji, describes the workers’ tour in Kodinar taluka as follows.

I know that the pace of Harijan welfare activities in Kathiawar is slow. In spite of that if those who work there do not lose heart and give up patience, if they work with steadfast faith and love, untouchability will be uprooted from Kathiawar also. It is a very bad habit to concentrate on results. A person who gets disappointed at seeing results over which we have little control and which necessarily depend on many other factors is not a brave man but a coward. Cowards have never produced results. Those who are indifferent to results but remain engrossed in their work become instrumental in bringing about early results. Moreover, there is never any defeat for them because their success lies in their doing their duty and not in the results thereof. One is master of one’s actions, the master of results is God alone. Therefore I hope that Shri Harilalbhai and his friends will cling unto death to the resolve they have expressed in this letter.

289. LET THERE BE NO BLUNDER!

Shri Hiralal Shah sounds the following warning¹ about what I wrote concerning his scheme².

This warning is justified. If anyone’s scheme is not presented as it is, there may be terrible consequences. And one who has presented his thoughts methodically is shocked if their translation is given by someone else differently; not only that, but at times it may produce a contrary effect and a blunder may be committed.

I have presumed on the part of the readers an acquaintance with Hiralal’s scheme and have thus endeavoured to save my article from possible misinterpretation. I have made no effort to put the scheme just as it is before the reader. I have only given a summary. I have suggested that the scheme deserves consideration. My work is at present limited. I place many things before the readers. Whether to implement them or not is up to the men and women workers. It is the author’s responsibility to take care of his scheme after I have more or less introduced it [to the public]. At present I can do no more than this.

There was much else in Shri Hiralal’s letter. I have quoted only the essential part of it. Those who are interested in this scheme should write to Shri Hiralal and obtain full information and should then do what they can to implement his scheme.

[From Gujarati]
Harijanbandhu, 2-4-1933

¹ This is not translated here. The correspondent had stated that if a scheme were not properly introduced, the result would be contrary to what was desired. He had then cited the example of the uniform and added that if proper care were not taken about its use, instead of removing untouchability it might actually perpetuate it by becoming a symbol of it.

290. ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

WRATH OF HARIJANS

How can your anger be pacified? I do not quite understand what your demand is. The chief executives of the Harijan Sevak Sangh are caste Hindus because it is for them to atone for their sins. Harijans can most certainly form their own organizations and they have been doing it. They should try to provide guidance to the institutions manned by caste Hindus. Ultimately, it is for the caste Hindus to pass the test at the hands of Harijans. God alone knows whether or not they will. The caste Hindus’ burden of sin is so great that they are beyond redemption; who can save them now? If their sins have accumulated so much, they are most likely to meet their doom. But tell me what else can the caste Hindus do except regarding the Harijans like themselves and how can they make amends to the Harijans who do not regard themselves as Hindus? And, pray, what kind of amends?

IS NON-CO-OPERATION NOT APPLICABLE TO HARIJANS?

I have your letter. Convey the following to your friend: No one is surprised that the food accepted by the stomach of a sturdy man is not acceptable to the stomach of a delicate man. It is sheer lack of understanding to apply the great rule to the absolutely uneducated when it can be applied only to the sensible. All rules are not equally applicable at all times and places and to all men. Such rules could hardly be as many as the fingers of one’s hand. Many other rules have to be modified according to differences of time, place and individuals. If we thought in terms of the good society, we would realize that applying to Harijans or their children the rule we have applied to ourselves is likely to prove grossly unjust. The friend should adhere to his position and firmly participate in the giving of scholarships, etc., to Harijan children.

1 A small section of Harijans, not satisfied with the Temple-entry Bill, the services of Hindu reformers or the Yeravda Pact, had demanded the management of all Harijan welfare bodies by Harijans themselves.

2 The correspondent, Nrisinhaprasad Bhatt, a co-worker, had found it odd that the people participating in the non-co-operation movement should be called upon to help the Harijan students studying in Government schools and universities (S.N. 20714).
WHY A NEW NAME?

Your argument that all Hindus, whether touchable or untouchable, should be known as Hindus is correct. But so long as untouchability is not wiped out, why should not our brethren who are regarded as untouchables be addressed by a sweet rather than a bitter name? A wayward son can refer to his mother as his “dad’s woman”, whereas, an obedient son will address her as “honoured mother”.

291. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

April 2, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

I have your letter. You did well in writing it. It is a good one. I cannot reply to you in detail today. Though the letter is good, it shows a pride unworthy of a woman who claims to be a brahmacharini. Remember the story of Narad. The moment he felt proud of his brahmacharya, he fell. One who aspires to observe brahmacharya relies only on God, and hence he is always humble. He never trusts himself. Anybody who is incapable from birth of feeling passion is not a human being. Such a person is either God, or lacks the power which makes a man a man or a woman a woman. In other words, he or she is an incomplete human being, is diseased. How can God be proud? Is a stone proud of being a stone? A diseased person should not be proud of being so. A man or a woman can cultivate the strength to control his or her passion and put the power so conserved to better use. But as soon as he or she becomes proud of such strength, it will be lost. How do you know to what extent the power of brahmacharya which you may have in you is being wasted? Your brahmacharya is certainly not perfect. Find out the natural truth about you. If you never feel passion, are you a goddess? A goddess would be a different kind of being from what you are. You are no goddess, and I don’t think that you are diseased, since you get monthly periods. Examine yourself and write to me again.

April 2, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

The clock has just struck three and, after cleansing the teeth, I have sat down to write this letter.

You seem to feel a little defeated. That will not do. You must have observed that I tell everybody in my letters that they should do nothing mechanically unless they are convinced about it. One should accept a thing either with one’s heart or with one’s reason. One can accept a thing with the heart only if one has faith. But in either case one feels satisfied and happy. When reason does not understand a thing nor does the heart accept it, one feels discontented and slowly loses strength and energy. Though such a person works day and night without rest, his work is not well done and he becomes weaker and weaker and falls ill. This does not happen when one does work in which one has faith. ‘What can I do? I know that all this is not right, but I have to do it out of respect for my elders.’ This is not faith, but false civility. According to our definition of truth, it is also a form of untruth. This is the feeling which your letter [of the 31st] gives. Don’t do anything because Narahari or I ask you to do it. Do a thing only if you are convinced that it is right. You are completely free to reject all suggestions of Narahari, for the final responsibility is yours. Many of Narahari’s suggestions appeal to me, that is, they seem good on paper. If you feel that some of them are already being acted upon or that some others don’t deserve to be accepted, you ought to take no action about them. You should try to explain your point of view gently to Narahari, and, if he does not see it, you should be patient and have faith that he will see it in the end or that you will see your error. Meanwhile, you should not let estrangement grow between him and you and neither of you should suspect the other of deliberate hostility. In some matters everything depends on one’s method of work. You should understand Narahari’s point of view. He is particular only about two things. He is open-hearted, hard-working and sensible. He has no control over his temper and is incapable of understanding certain things. But he doesn’t worry about those things either. He is good at heart and harbours no resentment. One should be patient with such a person. You should, therefore, try to understand his suggestions patiently and reason with him. Do not get upset or lose your peace of mind.

Read the letter which I have written to Parachure Shastri. I have written in it about his diet. He should now start working.

I sent a wire to Jivraj at once yesterday. I will write to him today. We should bear all things. Just now I am probing the depths of mental leprosy. This case of physical leprosy, therefore, does not affect me much.

Umedram wants to learn music. Make the necessary arrangements for that and then arrange the rest of his programme of work.

Invite Marybehn to come again.

Personally I don’t feel at all that Kusum is improving. Did you forward to Talwalkar my letter to him? I myself have no faith in his method of treating consumption. I would prefer Sharma’s treatment if he agrees to come. Now Purushottam is our Sharma. I don’t want to load him with much work till he is sure of his health. It is desirable that he should undertake more responsibility only after his experiment on himself has succeeded. Otherwise his health would break down. We will make no change before I get Talwalkar’s reply. Nor should we upset Kusum. Talwalkar is a gentleman. He is also an experienced physician. Many patients put complete faith in him and remain under his treatment till the end. Quite a few of them die, but some recover too. It is the same with other physicians. If, therefore, we lose somebody by trusting to Talwalkar completely, we will not blame him. I have only expressed my own lack of faith in his method of treatment. I have faith only in nature-cure. When a case requires an operation, we certainly require a surgeon, but that happens in very few cases. If you have thought further about Kusum’s case and have any suggestions to make, write to me. Get from Talwalkar his reply to my letter as early as possible.

Don’t burden Purushottam with responsibility for more than four patients at a time.

... does not seem likely to come in the near future. All the

April 2, 1933

CHI. JAMNADAS,

I have your letter. I don’t think it possible to get a temple built. However, you should continue your efforts. Some day failure will change to success.

I send you with this a letter for Ranjit Pandit. He has gone there. You may give it to him if you want to and if he is there.

Who is Rana? His suggestions seem very bad and your criticism is fully justified. Stick to your stand, and don’t mind it if, in consequence, you fail in your aim. I see no objection to a temple being built even if the funds are collected from the reformers. If such a temple is built and is maintained properly on religious lines, it can become a great centre. The site must be good and the men in charge of it should be persons of character. We do need a few model temples.

Sarupbehn gives an unfavourable account of the Bhangi quarters at Rajkot. Are they quite so bad? Wouldn’t the municipality do anything to improve them?

Let me know how you are.

296. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

April 2, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

I wrote one letter\(^1\) to you today morning. You will probably get it before this. What you write about . . .\(^2\) and . . .\(^3\) is a half-truth. Everybody makes mistakes. We should not be upset if somebody makes one, but we are bound to feel unhappy when a person hides his mistake and it is brought to light in spite of him, and then he puts up an unworthy defence. If we do not feel unhappy, we shall never find a way of preventing such incidents. If we assume that such things will always happen and do nothing to prevent them, that will mean destruction of society. We must, therefore, do what we can to prevent them. We will do so only if we are shocked by such incidents. We can say that one should not feel pain or get angry for things which don’t matter, and I think you also mean only that. If you mean anything more, I am sure that you are wrong. If some other word is suggested in place of “pain” or “shock”, I might accept it. But your letter seems to spring from moh\(^4\), I cannot explain how. I cannot say whether the word moha is correct. I will be satisfied if you understand what I mean.

I have already admitted the mistake which I made.

What I want you to show is simplicity of heart, tenderness, humility, patience, forbearance and generosity towards others. You can show these things only if you come down from the sky to the earth. When will you begin to feel that you are nothing? Is it proper to bow down to Mother Earth every day and then kick her every day? If our prayer to her is sincere, we should make ourselves mere particles of dust and learn to suffer the kicks of the world. Mother Earth then will not feel our feet, as we shall have become ash, though still alive. “Scatter the dust of separateness”, as the poet says.

I have still a stock of the slivers sent by you. It was not your fault that they contain rough particles. The fault was partly that of the carding-bow and partly of the cotton. If you had carded the cotton still further, the fibres would have become weak. Other slivers do not

I have your letter.

I do not wish to issue an order, nor do I have any such right. In the end I will always be satisfied with what you do, but I will continue to tell you what I want. I attach herewith a [draft bill] approved by you. I shall publish nothing in your name without your desire or permission, and anything I might do would be not to compliment you but to serve the Harijan cause.

The suggestion is not for building a new temple and throwing it open, but for permitting the entry of Harijans to one of the four which already exist. I do wish that you should do this much if possible. I am also of the view that it should be published in the Gazette that the Bhavnagar Ruler does not approve of discrimination against anybody in regard to schools, etc. There is some such law in your State. It will be enough if this principle is explicitly declared in it. It can be enforced only to the extent that the people are ready to co-operate. I do not wish that you should force the people to do anything. All that I want is that the State subjects should be informed of the policy of the Ruler, and that not orally but through a legal declaration. In any case I do not wish to kill the goose that lays golden eggs. For my part I want no eggs at all. The milk of a milch goat would satisfy me and I would not complain even if the goat occasionally hit me with its horns.

Keep up the courage you have displayed. You are bound to get over the craving for chillies, etc. If you wish to have your body shining like gold and to devote yourself to service, you have to overcome that craving. There is no need at all to rub the teeth with tobacco. In place of it, use charcoal dust strained through fine cloth and mixed with salt. Use a neem or babul twig as brush. Since you have progressed so far, get rid of all weak habits. But do only as much as your strength permits. If one attempts such things out of regard for anybody one may be led into untruth and false show. Let them never come near you. Keep writing to me.

I have your letter. I was sorry to read your announcement, but I cannot help saying that your fast was an utterly uncalled for and an ignorant performance. I hope it has left you none the worse for it bodily. There can be no spiritual gain from such an ill-conceived fast like yours. Surely you had no data to enable you to come to the conclusion that the defeat suffered by Sjt. Deorukker was due to the sins of caste Hindus. I do not know the cause of his defeat but I am quite sure that you could not know them either. And why should you take it for granted that every Harijan candidate for election should succeed, whether he deserves or not? It would be a terrible test for caste Hindus if you expected them in open elections invariably to elect a Harijan candidate when one offers himself for election. What therefore in my opinion you need to do is to do real penance for the unjustified penance you have done and that penance consists in never again to do a single thing thoughtlessly.

Narandas warns me that the principal patients are just now out of the Ashram. I do not mind it at all. There are many things for you to examine and see from the nature-cure standpoint, and there is the common complaint about constipation which you would be able to deal with.

I am glad you have driven out Amtussalaam’s superstition that she is suffering from T. B. She has a very vivid imagination and she conjures up evil where there is none.

I want from your presence in the Ashram much more than mere treatment of a few patients. A firm believer in nature-cure myself, I would like to find in you a kindred spirit given up wholly to truthful research without any mental reservations. And if I can get such a man with also a belief in the Ashram ideals, I could regard it as a great event. I know you too are approaching the visit in that light. You will therefore please make yourself thoroughly at home at the Ashram and study it in every detail. It is my belief that a nature-cure man should be able to vanquish the climate. Millions of human beings ought to be able to live healthy life by understanding the laws of adaptability to the climate in which they find themselves. They cannot have changes that rich men can afford and I cannot imagine nature to be so cruel as to be partial to the rich and indifferent to the poor. On the contrary I believe in the Biblical saying that “it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven”, and another Biblical verse says that “the Kingdom of Heaven is within you”. Therefore I have always imagined that laws of nature are simple and understandable and capable of being followed easily by the millions.

I would ask you therefore to approach the Ashram with the set purpose of discovering the means of preserving or regaining health in the ordinary Indian climate.

Yours sincerely,

BAPU

310. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 3, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

The morning post has already been dispatched. I got your letter after it was sent.

I send with this a copy of the letter which I have written to
Dr. Sharma. You will know my views from that letter. You will also find in it answers to all your questions. I, therefore, don’t write more about the subject in this letter. Your question regarding Parachure Shastri is good. This is the difference between his and Raojibhai’s case. Parachure Shastri belongs to the Ashram. He had come to live in the Ashram as a regular member. He intended to stay at least for three years, but circumstances obliged him to leave. I, therefore, thought that it was our duty to support him. But any number of outsiders like Raojibhai may wish to live in the Ashram. I am afraid that we cannot take in all such persons. If you and I were the only inmates of the Ashram, we could please ourselves and do anything we liked.

April 3, 1933

CHI. MRIDULA,

I have received your letter. Have you received Sardar’s letter? It was written before mine. The purpose of writing this is to say that Manibehn does not seem to be getting Sardar’s letters, though Sardar has been writing regularly and I too have been scribbling a few words at the bottom. I may not have one it in a few cases. It is a mystery why Manihas not been receiving the letters. We are making enquiries. Meanwhile let Mani know this.

313. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

April 3/4 /1933

MY DEAR GHANSHYAMDAS,

I have your two letters. I have been watching the progress of the Harijan Sevak. Of course there is a steady improvement. There has to be a choice made, even of my writings; not all that I write for the English Harijan can be fit for reproduction in the Hindi edition, and I quite agree with you that what is reproduced should have the Hindi flavour about it; and not be a mere mechanical translation. I will bear your remarks in mind and will not send translations from here. Of course I want Viyogi Hari to do that. It was only because he was just now unable to cope with it that I began to translate here instead of sending the articles to Kashinath and Ramdas Goud. I quite agree with you that there should be some stories from Sanskrit or other sources, and poems too, if they are original and have first-class merit. I shall be entirely satisfied if you will look through the Harijan Sevak week to week as you have been doing recently.

I understand now what to do about the transfer for funds to you. Besides the money lying at the Press, I have received an anonymous donation of Rs. 500 today to be used for the cause at my discretion. I am having that too transferred to the Board to be used subject to the donor’s condition.

1 Wife of Dr. Sheikh Mohammad Alam of Lahore
2 This was from Dr. Behramji Khambhatta.
I am glad you have definitely decided to have the operation performed. I would be still gladder when you give me the definite date.

I understand what you say about the controversy in Bengal.

You ask me to send a copy of the Harijan to the Bengal Secretariat for His Excellency the Governor. I have a great deal of hesitation in doing so, for I do not know him personally. If therefore I send a copy to one, I should send to all the Secretariats, but that is not what you want me to do, and that is not what is necessary either, as it appears to me. I think I told you that Lord Reading and also Lady Reading used specially to subscribe to Young India. These big functionaries do not hesitate to express their wants, and it would look officious to supply them in anticipation. But you know the Governor of Bengal, and after all, the Harijan is being published under the aegis of the Central Board. It would be therefore quite proper for you to send a paper in your capacity as President to any of your big acquaintances.

Yours sincerely,

314. LETTER TO PREMNATH BHARGAVA

April 4, 1933

MY DEAR PREMNATH,

I have a copy of your letter of 27th February. My guidance consists in a radical change in outlook.¹ What I would like you to do is to satisfy the requirements set forth in my article in the Harijan on the ‘disposal of carcasses’². If you have not read it, you should procure a copy and read it. That would mean your learning the A B C of treatment. You have to begin by handling the carcass at the spot where it is found and treating it, not in a central depot but in the village near by, knowing what to do with every part of the carcass. When you have succeeded in doing this, the second step will be to take charge of the

DEAR FRIEND,

I have now gone through your collection1 over which you have laboured so much and so well.

Although the whole of the selection is good, I have omitted some of the verses, though good in themselves, as being not quite relevant to the issue.

I would like you now to make a collection of such verses, if there are any, from Gnana Dev and other saints of Maharashtra.

I shall expect in due course the information about the sweepers and Mahars in Nasik.

April 4, 1933

MY DEAR LELE,

This is what appears in a Bengali newspaper¹:

We know that on Harijans having been allowed the right of entry into a certain famous temple in Bombay, no Brahmins enter it any longer; those who are merely reformers have no liking for the worship of images. In consequence this temple is now lying forsaken...

Do you know anything about such a temple? If you do not, and if it is possible, please enquire and let me know whether there is any truth in that statement. If the statement can be substantiated, you will please let me know the name of the temple also.²

MY DEAR N.,

I have your two letters. I see that you are still struggling. I do not mind so long as each time you continue to come out unhurt. I hope you got my letter sent to your new address. In that letter I gave you two warnings and I hope that you took them both to heart. Who pays for all your little expenses? For instance, for the stamps and stationery, even an occasional telegram. You cannot give me too many details of your life. Truth peeps out through infinite details but it can be hidden from ourselves as well as from the spectators when a whole picture is presented. That is to say, a generalization can be made to cover an untruth. It will be true enough when I make a general statement, ‘I’m all right’, but that general statement will cover the untruth, namely, the fact of the bad elbow. That will only come out of a careful cross-examination of me unless I said, ‘I’m all right, but for a bad elbow’. There is a great passage in the most ancient and the simplest and I think the shortest of the Upanishads. The translation is “The face of truth is covered with a golden lid”, and then the seeker ends with prayer, “O God! remove the lid for me so that I can see truth face to face.” You now know what I mean by the golden lid.

I hope you and S. are keeping well, both in body and in mind.

MY DEAR RAJBHOJ,

I hope you got my letter sent to you as soon as I learnt that you had reached the Ashram. I have now got your own letter. In a few days' time I expect you to write to me in Hindi, for there is not much difference between Marathi, Hindi and Gujarati. They are all sister languages; a large part of the vocabulary is common to them and it is easy enough to detect a similarity in grammar.

You will resist the temptation to give. I would ask you to be in no hurry. You have gone to the Ashram for the purpose of taking, therefore quietly and persistently take in all that the Ashram has to give and when that has been done, begin giving by all means, and you will find that you are able to take much more than you had expected. Do not combine giving and taking for the time being, rather believe that you cannot fail to be unconsciously giving while you are taking properly. I am most anxious that for the time at least you should bury yourself in the Ashram, and when you have either assimilated enough of the Ashram atmosphere and attitude or rejected it as unassimilable or unsuitable, you should proceed to the next stage, and in all you do whilst you are in the Ashram, I would like you to be guided implicitly by Narandas. That seems to me to be the best way of taking the most out of any institution.

I had seen the rough draft of your reply to Dr. Ambedkar’s statement. There was not much in it and in no case could I have published it, seeing that Dr. Ambedkar’s statement was not published in the Harijan. The draft was so roughly drawn that I did not know that you would want it back. I think I destroyed it after having read it.

I am surprised at what you tell me about Sind, because there are very staunch workers. Jamshed Mehta is a host in himself. Narayandas Bechar has given himself to the Harijan cause and there are several others. The Harijans in Karachi are better housed and better looked after than elsewhere. Of course there is room for improvement, but that would be so in every case. However if you will send me concrete proposals I would gladly forward them to Jamshed Mehta. I hope that you have completely thrown off the headache you had in the beginning.

322. LETTER TO MOTILAL ROY

April 4, 1933

DEAR MOTIBABU,

I enclose herewith a cutting from the Sanatani dated 12th March. I wonder whether the cutting represents your views. If it does, you are bound fearlessly to express them even though they may be contrary to mine. I know full well that mutual regard ought not to mean always identity of views. If therefore I discovered that you hold different views from mine, my regard for you will not suffer. What binds us is a relentless pursuit after Truth at any cost.

Do you know which Bombay temple is referred to? I should like to enquire. I know that several temples that were opened during the fast have since been closed to the Harijans again, but I have not known of a temple in Bombay or elsewhere deserted by Brahmins because it has been opened to Harijans. Such threats were uttered no doubt, but they were not carried out, except in the case of individuals; at least such is my information. But we have simply to know the truth and base our action accordingly. I would therefore like to enquire more fully when I get the name of the temple. As it is, I have already written to the Secretary of the Bombay Board if he knows of any such temples referred to by the writer in the Bengali Prabartak.

There are other statements which are open to question, but they can be regarded as matters of opinion. Therefore I have not commented on them, but I have underlined the passage, for your attention.

Yours sincerely,

323. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 4, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

The packet of letters which I despatched this morning was a large one as usual. Compared to it, this will be a much smaller one. I despatched the packet in the morning because the letters were urgent.

1 Vide "Letter to P. R. Lele", 4-4-1933.
I did not find Dhanvant Raka’s letter which you say was included.

I return Narahari’s letter with this.

This is my view regarding guests. Even if every guest is given a copy of the rules to be observed by him, he should be given a seat by the side of a responsible inmate of the Ashram. The latter should take away from him his dish for cleaning and also clean the spot where he is asked to sit. These two things should be left to the guest only after he has himself started doing them. About the food also, the neighbour should explain to him that the general menu of the Ashram contains no rice, but that it is included in the special menu and he can ask to be served according to either. If there is only one solitary person who wants rice, he need not be asked. As soon as a guest arrives, somebody should elicit from him his special requirements and as many of them should be provided as possible.

Potatoes and ratalu should not as a rule be served as vegetables. I would have them served only in place of bread or rice. They are mostly starch. Vegetable means any green which contains no starch. If people would agree, I would make it a rule to serve rice only to persons who are ill. The quantity of dal served should be very small. Rice is not necessary at all. Those who get milk need very little quantity of dal. There is no doubt that our diet contains an excess of starch. It is being proved day by day that the body needs very little starch. But we cannot force this reform on unwilling people, and in any case we should watch the result.

We should not tolerate snacks being bought from the market. But we need the fullest co-operation of the families to put a stop to this practice. If people went and saw for themselves how these things were prepared, they would never eat them again.

You should insist on the children sleeping for eight hours at night.

I believe that it is not proper to withhold a meal by way of punishment. I myself, though, have been guilty of ordering such punishment. I am also becoming more and more convinced that there should be no physical punishment either. I have no doubt that the very fact that the need for punishment is felt bespeaks our imperfection. We must learn how to teach without the use of any form of punishment, and we can do that only if we refrain from punishing even in extreme cases.
The suggestion about the dictionary should be immediately implemented. A copy should be kept not only in the library but also in the office. Everybody in the Ashram should form the habit of consulting it. This will mean some expense, but it is worth incurring.

even then I generally penned something at the bottom. Sometimes possibly that was also not done. That is the reason why I am confused. You have certainly the right to complain and even be angry if you do not hear from anyone of us. You ought to feel sure that we shall never, for whatever reasons, refrain from writing to you and if we do you should know that it must be through accident.

We are all well here. Father has resumed his study of Sanskrit. I would not say that he is making rapid progress but he is doing quite well. He makes constant efforts to remember what he has learnt so far. Dahyabhai generally comes every week to see us.

My hand is as it was but it does not interfere with my work. Mahadev is in good health. Chhaganlal Joshi is also well. If you need good slivers we can send some from here, as we receive plenty of them. We had news of you from Mridula and also from Kamaladevi and Lilavati. You have created a good impression on all of them. Ba and Mirabehn are all right. Mirabehn writes to me every week. At present Kakasaheb is here and helps with the Harijan work. YERAVDA MANDIR,
April 4, 1933

DEAR BROTHER,

I am fascinated by the love both of you show for your children. But I think your anxiety for Mridula is unnecessary and harmful. Her sacrifice and her courage should delight you so that she can feel reassured. But your anxiety cannot but affect her mind. I have been impelled to write this because all your actions are guided by reason and you do nothing without proper thought. I know that reason cannot control our feelings. But this is not wholly true. Man can succeed to a certain extent if he tries to fight back feelings before they assail him. Leave Mridu under God’s protection. Her strength of character is her real shield. She will surmount all difficulties. It is the earnest wish of us all that you should have this much faith and save yourself from anxiety.

Y. M.,

THE SUPERINTENDENT

CHI. MRIDU,

I dictated a postcard very hurriedly yesterday. Today I am writing this to reply to your question. Love knows what the other person wishes and whenever it is proper and possible fulfils that wish. Our wishes are not always proper. Pure love will not feel hurt when things do not happen as wished. You should not take it as want of love but as good intention. This does not mean that we can never feel hurt by anything at all. But the hurt is momentary and does not diminish love in the least. Indeed, it strengthens love. Here I have only cited my own experience. But it is not just my experience. In short, as one’s love becomes purer the need for words becomes less. If this did not happen, love would become a burden; it would certainly never be so wide in scope. With regard to music also, learn from Mani. She has no voice of course. But she realized that if she waited till she acquired a voice, the time for reciting Ramanama would slip by. If one can learn to sing in tune with others, one can at least recite Ramanama. The voice is trained by reciting Ramanama a couple of times and singing a few bhajans.

I wrote a special letter to Mani yesterday.¹

331. LETTER TO T. TITUS
April 4, 1933

MY DEAR TITUS,

Your letter is full and very good. I shall read your report with avidity. It may be sent to me by registered post and I shall return it after reading; that would save time and labour.

You must have read literature about the qualities of unfired milk and how long such milk remains in an eatable condition without needing to be boiled. I have simply suggested its being put in an air-tight bottle or an air-tight vessel and wrapped in wet cloth under the belief that milk so kept remains for 12 hours or so without altering its quality, and if your reading confirms my belief, you should popularize the use of unfired milk in the Ashram, and begin to preserve it in the manner suggested by me. You begin the milking early. Some of the milk is not used till 10.30 or 11 o’clock. If therefore it is taken in an unfired condition, it has got to be preserved against atmospheric changes. And I think that the milkmen or milkmaids should be frequently watched and taught to wash the udders, etc., in a thorough manner.

² The addressee did this in her letter of April 11.

My recollection of the Bangalore Dairy is that the animals were taken to a special open place for the purpose of milking. Was that not so? I have a notion that Col. Smith told me that it was better to take the animals to a free open space for milking. If this is a good practice, and I think it is, we ought to adopt it. But you know better. I do not want to give you more work than is absolutely necessary. I do want our dairy to be a first-class model dairy of its kind. We cannot go in for expensive methods, but we must go in for all the methods that would ensure, through methodical labour and meticulous care, cleanliness and purity of milk. What is the lowest yield required from a cow to make her self-supporting? And what is the cost?

Now about homoeopathy. I must confess that without any specific cause I have never been able to take kindly to it, though some of my friends have often recommended it to me. I have noticed too that these friends themselves at critical moments have given up homoeopathy and gone to allopathy. Though I should like to believe to the contrary I am driven to the conclusion that allopathy, although it has great limitations and much superstition about it, is still the most universal and justifiably the most popular system; Allopathy provides opening medicines, ointments for a variety of boils and eruptions, disinfectants for various situations and includes surgery of a most wonderful type. It is an all-inclusive system. It can well include homoeopathy, biochemistry and the latest nature-cures. If therefore allopathy rids itself of the worship of mammon, which has overtaken most human activities, and could exclude vivisecion and other practices which I call black, and liberally took advantage of the new methods discovered by lay people, it would become all-satisfying and quite inexpensive.

Having said this, if you have an accurate knowledge of homoeopathy and can easily spare the time necessary for treatment, I do not mind your introducing it in the Ashram subject of course to consultation with Narandas and the other responsible people in the Ashram. I would love to think that we were independent of outside medical assistance or that it was only rarely that we have to trouble our medical friends. My ideal is to find whatever alleviation we want in the Ashram itself. It pains me when any of us have to go out for medical relief or treatment or to call in medical assistance. We may never reach that perfect state, but the nearer the approach to it the better for us. I would therefore be pleased if you could even minimize the occasions for seeking medical help from outside. Tell me what treatments you would give to Kusum, Jamna, Chimanlal and last but not least Parachure Shastri. These are all typical cases.

Yours sincerely,

I read your letter to Narandas. I liked some of the suggestions you have made in it. I suggest that you should discuss them with Narandas. My position is quite clear. The Yeravda Pact is a solemn document.² It cannot be altered except with the consent of all the parties interested in it.

337. LETTER TO SUMANGAL PRAKASH

April 5, 1933

CHI. SUMANGAL PRAKASH,

I have your letter.

(1) One cannot give reasons for everything in this world. Dharma does not lie in giving up a custom simply because no reason can be given for it. On the contrary dharma consists in respecting the customs of the society of which one is part, provided these do not go against morality. Therein lies truth and non-violence. To cause pain to anyone without reason is untruth and violence. A person who gives up a practice because he cannot see any reason for its continuance is unwise and wilful.

(2) In regard to inter-dining and inter-marriage there is not contradiction between my earlier writings and present writings. When I wrote those articles I had Lakshmi with me and I was planning to have her married outside the Dhed community. I still hold that in inter-dining and inter-marriage some restrictions are necessary. I do not think that varnashrama comes in here. There is no loss of dharma in marrying a suitable partner outside one’s varna. I may say that my views are now much clearer than before. But I hesitate to revise the views I have held for a long time. My present views supplement the views I have expressed earlier. However, if it appears that there is conflict between the two you should accept what I say now and reject what I have said before.

(3) I should not answer this question. I am also not competent to answer it. Everyone should be able to find the meaning of the vow he has taken. The meaning that I may give to your vow should be considered false, while the meaning you give it should be taken as valid. When one does not have confidence in oneself one may accept a witness’s interpretation. Here the witness is not in a position to give an interpretation. Therefore you should either interpret the vow yourself or ask other co-workers.

(4) That is because the address of the journal is changes.

Blessings from

I have left out the question about smallpox. Whether the patient is a child or an adult, I know only one treatment: apply a wet pack to the stomach. Dissolve some permanganate of potash\(^1\) in cold water, enough to make the water rose-pink. Dip a sheet, large or small, in the water and wring it. Then spread a rug on a cot and cover the rug with this wet sheet. Then wrap the whole round the patient right up to the neck. Keep him in this position for as long as he can bear it. If the patient does not get a motion in the natural course, give him an enema. For diet only fruit juice. If the tongue is clear and the patient feels hungry, milk also may be given. Give him a much water as he can drink. Add fews drops of lemon juice to the water if he likes that. The room should be well ventilated. I have heard that red curtains help.

338. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 5/6, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I send with this a letter written by a lady named Malidoshi on behalf of the labourers working in the Ashram. You may not have read it. Inquire about the matter and let me know what the facts are.

Madhavji’s brother Chatrabhuj writes to tell me that the former’s two children cannot be properly looked after in Calcutta. I have already suggested that the children’s aunt should take them to the Ashram and keep them there. She might leave after the children begin to feel at home there. You also should write to them and get the children under your charge if you can. I have written to Madhavji and Lakshmi about this.

I hope Duncan is better.

Read my letter to Titus.\(^2\) You may send the report of the dairy as it is. I will get a copy taken out here if necessary. Otherwise I will return it after reading it.

\(^1\) This is in English in the source.
\(^2\) Vide “Letter to T. Titus”, 4-4-1933.
To me also Keshu writes only a few lines every time. I have now given up hope about him. He has made up his mind to leave the Ashram. It seems Radha also wishes to live outside.

I hope you received my letter in which I wrote about Dr. Sharma and Parachure Shastri, and followed what I said. If you did not follow any point, please ask me to explain.

Tell Durga that I gave her the date of my release as May 4, but it is not correct. It is May 19. Ramdas will be released on May 1. I get Durga’s letters regularly. I will write to her in a day or so.

I had a letter from Gaur Gopal. I replied to him immediately. That was many days ago. Write to him and tell him that he may go to Shail Ashram. It has a vacant room. He will make his own arrangements for meals, etc. Prabhudas will help him in that. It is our duty to look after his comfort as much as we can.

I hope Dhananjay is being properly nursed. You know what he is suffering from. Let me know who attends on him. It would be better if he was an elderly person, for he would then run less risk of infection.

What has happened to Liladhar?

Your letter came in only yesterday. I am beginning this before prayer 3.45. I overslept myself. Being the fasting day it does not much matter perhaps.

You have done well in writing as you have done. The difficulty about the execution is threefold. (1) The Ashram site has to be removed or the other activities have to be. (2) There is no one in the Ashram who would stay on the condition you name, save perhaps Narandas. (3) The Ashram has not been conceived in the manner suggested by you.

The last is perhaps the fatal difficulty. Mine is a novel experiment, dangerous and, it may be, even impossible of achieving. The idea is to have a place where people can train themselves to lead the celibate life in the midst of ordinary temptations. . . 1 and . . .2 fell not because they could not overcome animal passion. They have not gone so far. But they suppressed truth. Now truth can only be cultivated in the midst of men and women of different temperaments and subtle temptations. It is easy enough for a few people of similar habits not to deceive one another or be found out. That is no truth. It has to be lived in the natural surroundings. Exception has been taken even to the Ashram life as being not natural.

I wonder if you have followed me so far. If you have, you must at once perceive that the first two difficulties are the natural consequence of the deliberate creation of the third. Having constituted the Ashram as it is we have the men and women and the activities that we have. And out of these men and women and the activities we cannot create what you have contemplated. What you suggest can only be done by withdrawing two or three men and women and sending them to another place to live their own life and draw some kindred spirits in due time. But that would be to admit failure. I should not mind it if it became inevitable. I am not at all convinced that it is. If out of the present experiment a few of us lived of whom it could be said that they fairly satisfied the test, I should be quite satisfied that the experiment had succeeded. In an experiment such as we are making failures must be the order of the day. Each will be a stepping-stone to success. The . . . incident has disturbed me but not baffled me at all. Prompt measures have been taken after the discovery and are still being taken.

1 The names have been omitted.
2 ibid

You should know also my diagnosis. The fault lay in my over-confidence in both these young people. The earlier fault lay in their parents. . . . had the notion that his children will better conform to the Ashram ideal if they were brought up in isolation. . . . nursed the thought. And so the children grew to be selfish, and exclusive and self-centred. The motive behind . . . was good. And so I carried out the tradition after . . .’s death. I was bound to as his heir to test its efficacy. The result we know. I am not sorry. . . . had every right to do what he thought was good for the Ashram. As for . . . the way with . . . was reverse. But . . . did not quite assist her husband. She had no policy of her own but she herself could not follow out the Ashram ideal and so . . . grew anyhow as the pet of the Ashram. The natural thing is likely to happen now. The proud family of . . . will cut themselves from the Ashram and live their natural life. That will not be bad. . . . has learnt her lesson. She will for . . .’s sake more and more conform to the ideal. . . . was the dupe, . . . was the villain (used not in its quite ugly sense). The whole Ashram knows that truth at any cost will alone save it. Things will tighten themselves along these lines.

Several other things will be gradually done. No violent changes will be made. There is not the slightest cause for alarm. You are perhaps unnecessarily harsh on Prema. She has her grave blemishes but she has contributed nothing to the incident. Her physical brahmacharya appears to me to be above suspicion and she is truthful to the point of bluntness. She is meticulous in the observance of the outward rules. She has a vile tongue. She is trying to control it. Anyway there is no one who can conduct the Ashram better than Narandas. He must be left to manage it to the best of his ability.

Now I want you to work at this exhaustive letter and give me your criticism, ideas and suggestions unhesitatingly and without reserve. You have plenty of time for hard thinking. I am unperturbed, I am taking things easy, meeting each situation as it arises. Narandas will faithfully carry out instructions. And if I felt the call I am quite capable of disbanding the whole Ashram in so far as I have the power which legally I have not. But that is nothing. The moral authority is there. You may therefore make any drastic suggestions you like.

All well here otherwise. You will explain to Ba whatever is said here in so far as it may be necessary.

Love from us all.

I have your letter. It fills me with joy. It is so frank and downright sincere. I understand every word of what you say and you shall do as truth in you guides you and it will give me full satisfaction. And, no matter where your lot is cast, I shall regard you as an Ashramite. Meanwhile, take whatever is to be taken from the Ashram without in any way forcing yourself. You have taken a great step in fasting. I hope you are letting Purushottam guide you. As much water as you can drink, hot or cold, should be taken. It can do you no harm whatsoever if it is properly taken. You know the best and cheapest method of keeping water cold. Wrap the vessel in which it is kept with wet cloth. You have to take a full enema daily and if there is a feeling of nausea, you will take a few drops of lemon with water, and even honey, if you have a sweet tooth.

April 6, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have our letter. I think that you have to give up all idea of marrying the girl. You do not seem to realize that she is only eleven years old. She cannot have any idea of marriage at her age, and if she has, it is an unhealthy and premature knowledge, which is not to be encouraged. Apart therefore from the close relationship which undoubtedly exists I think that the age of the girl is an effective bar, and you ought not to read into her eyes any message for you.

MY DEAR KESHAV,

I like your frank letter. I thoroughly understand your position, and though I may not quite agree with it, I can appreciate it. You know my own fundamental position, don’t you? I never feel that what appeals to me as the whole truth must necessarily appeal to the others as such. Truth that we see is always relative knowledge and therefore it need not have universal application. My prayer therefore for my neighbours is: “May they see the Truth as Thou the All-knowing One, would have them to see it.”

1 From the secretaryship of the Bombay Provincial Board of the Servants of Untouchables Society
MY DEAR N.,

I have your letters of 31st March and 2nd April together.

You were quite right in accepting Sreenivas Rao’s gifts and asking him to send you whole wheatmeal and dried fruit. It is a great handicap that you can get no fresh leafy vegetables. But you know that leafy vegetables are grown in no time. I had an English friend living with me in South Africa who grew sufficient cresses in a fortnight’s time. You should get some seeds, have just a little plot of land, fence it in, dig it well superficially and beat up the earth well. You can use the manure that the animals around you may give, and sow lettuce seeds, tomatoes and any of the leaves that grow easily there. You should make some explorations also in and about Chitaldrug. I cannot imagine all that place being without leafy vegetables known as bhaji. I would ask you not to abstain from milk and butter at least just now. You may take only a little quantity if you like, but I am afraid that you will become weak in due course if you do not take these two things, for you are not having enough fresh fruit nor wheatmeal.

You need not write anything to Durgadas¹ about your statement, but write it out yourself from memory and let me have it.²

I understand what you say about pulses for S. As he is very active according to the description you gave me here, perhaps there is no harm if he is given a moderate quantity.

I shall send you the book on village sanitation. I am writing to the Ashram, but let me give you the substance of Poore’s method. The theory is that 18 inches of the surface of earth is all filled with germs which do the work of scavenging for all the creatures that reside on it. These germs can work on all the filth that the creatures deposit on the surface of the earth from day to day. Poore having known this and having understood the most economical use that the Chinese make of human excreta developed his method and said that

¹ Then an editor of the Associated Press of India
² The addressee had prepared a statement about herself and sent it to the Associated Press of India for publication. It was, however, not published.
all the excreta, both liquid and solid, should be buried not more than 12 or at the outside 18 inches below the surface of the earth. He therefore does not suggest movable latrines nor the ordinary deep-pit latrines. He suggests receiving the excreta in buckets, each person covering the excreta with earth, which is ready in the closet, so that the closet remains clean and sweet-smelling all the time. These buckets are emptied in the squares, dug up and kept ready, not many yards away from the latrine itself, and then the earth, which is heaped up on the edge of the square, is taken up and the excreta covered with it. No more excreta should be heaped upon the deposit just made. Ample earth is thrown on each deposit so that dogs and other animals may not dig out the thing. Inside of a fortnight all that excreta is worked upon by the germs and turned into fine manure and the ground is ready for cultivation.

We have followed this plan most successfully at the Ashram for 17 years, that is, since its inception. The whole of the performance takes no time and there is no smell emitted out of these squares.

I hope you will have no difficulty in following what I have said. This is the cheapest method of dealing with human and other excreta. All the kitchen refuse is also dealt with in the same manner, only this cannot be mixed up with the excreta, because the work of the germs done upon vegetable rubbish is different from the work done upon the excreta. But the process is the same in all other respects. We have found in the Ashram, by observation, that wherever we have made use of this excellent manure, our crops have been much richer in quantity and quality.

If you have any difficulty in following this, please ask.

Of course you are quite right in asking the Municipality to give you all the assistance you need. If they give it, well and good; if they do not, you won’t worry or fidget. For the time being, you have your work cut out for you amongst the Harijans, and what is more, in mending yourself.

Now about the dress. You need three articles only—a loose vest somewhat after men’s shirt with short sleeves reaching up to the elbow only, skirt reaching 2 or 3 inches above the ankles, and a kuchh like mine but not so long and smaller in size. If you want to go to the trouble of sewing, you can have something after the style of men’s shorts. This makes the simplest dress. The bawis, that is, the female mendicants, wear something like this. Your saris can be turned into vests or shirts. The skirts you have should serve the purpose, and very probably you have something answering knickers or shorts.

Yours sincerely,

[PS.]

As to your addressing me Bapu, you are wrong. You will address me as such when you have confidence in yourself that you will inspire me with trust in you and will never deceive me. I am trying to trust you by signing myself Bapu.

DEAR DR. TALWALKAR,

I was delighted to have your full letter about Kusumbehn and I appreciated your having got it typed for me.¹ I understand the letter thoroughly. You have given me the information I was anxious to have. Kusumbehn is perhaps the most obedient patient you have had, at least in the Ashram, and since you have full confidence in your treatment having done her good, it shall continue without interruption, so long as she retains faith in you and in your treatment. She is disturbed, as I am also, over the frequent attacks of diarrhoea she is having. I suppose I am properly describing the frequent motions she has every few days, but if that also is a part of the treatment, then neither she nor I can have anything to say. Of course I have in mind your idea of a proper sanatorium, but that lies in the womb of the future.

[Before April 7, 1933]³

DEAR DR. DESHMUKH,

I badly need your assistance in one or two things.

(1) Is there any chemical or physiological distinction between carrion and slaughtered meat? If there is, what is it?

(2) Do you know of any medical reason for the great repugnance that even meat-eaters have against carrion?

(3) If you are of opinion that there is no difference between fresh carrion and slaughtered meat, can you say whether flesh of dead cattle treated two or three days after death or even 24 hours after death would make any difference?

(4) You may know that some Chamars poison cattle for possessing the carcasses and they are said to eat their flesh. Will not the flesh of poisoned cattle affect the eater in any way? Is the flesh not tainted by the poison, or are there any poisons which, while they kill the cattle, do not harm their flesh?"

You know all about the Bombay Corporation and, therefore, you know all about the slaughter-houses. What I would like you, therefore, to give me is the scientific method of skinning dead cattle and of separating all the different parts of the carcass and the way of disposing of all the parts in the most economical manner. You should be knowing how, apart from the meat, the skins, bones, entrails, etc., of the slaughtered cattle are disposed of.

If those in charge of slaughter-houses cannot give all the information, I would like you to go out of your way to secure the most exhaustive information for me.

I do hope you are getting the English Harijan. In that case you must have read my article about “Disposal of Carcasses”. If you have not read it, I would like you please to do so.

Harijan, 8-4-1933

356. THE LAW AND THE HEART

A sanatanist who believes in temple-entry by Harijans but who does not think that legislation to this effect will serve any purpose, in one of his letters writes.

The extract quoted above is couched in beautiful language but the writer has not attempted to understand facts relating to legislation. There is no doubt that untouchability is a mental attitude. It cannot be abolished by legislation. Law can touch the body, but not the mind. The mind can be touched only by love and persuasion.

For the spreading of dharma any other means cannot be effective, nor should they be resorted to.

1 For extracts from addressee’s letter answering these questions, vide Appendix.

2 Vide “Disposal of Carcasses”, 12-3-1933.

3 The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had questioned the desirability of legislation enabling Harijans to enter temples, on the ground that this might lead to friction. He had advocated educating public opinion for the purpose.
The correspondent is afraid of strife. This fear too in my opinion is unfounded. No one wants to have the temples opened by force. Temples will be opened only where public opinion has been prepared in favour of opening the temples to the Harijans and nowhere else.

If that is so, then why the legislation? As conditions are today, even if the Hindu temple-goers, priests and custodians of a temple desire that Harijans should be allowed inside the temple for darshan, the law prevents them from doing so. There is no doubt about this; it is a self-evident fact. Legislation is needed to have this obstructive legislation revoked. It is clear enough that only legislation can remove legislative restriction. Yes, in the new legislation that is being talked about there should be no compulsion. One compulsive legislation should not be replaced by another compulsive legislation. As far as I understand, no question of compulsion arises in either of the two bills. The idea in both is to remove legal interference only.

But, today, the orthodox are so adamant that they are not prepared to listen to anyone. They write lies, they slander, abuse, and even resort to violence. Under such conditions what are the reformers to do? If the reformers wish to safeguard dharma, their first duty is patiently to put up with the high-handedness of the orthodox, answer hatred with love, and lies with truth. Let them bear abuses and violence. Let them continue to do their duty. Let them continue their efforts to have the obstructive law repealed. Let them make attempts to have private temples opened to Harijans, and themselves keep away from temples which are barred to Harijans. The reformers should also endeavour to remove any other difficulties that the Harijans may be facing.

I have spoken and written several times that for me abolition of untouchability is a penance. Religious impurity cannot be removed without self-purification. Untouchability is the greatest impurity in Hindu religion. Even if thousands of Hindus were to fast in order to remove it I should not consider it a great thing. Perhaps, even such a great offering may not be sufficient for that great yajna. In order to find Lord Shiva what a great deal of fasting Parvati had to do! Every time man was faced with a spiritual crisis he invoked God through fasting and penance and only then was he able to overcome the crisis. Tulsidas has written:

By the strength of tapasya God created the universe,
By the strength of tapasya Vishnu protects all creation,
By the strength of tapasya Shambhu destroys,
By the strength of tapasya Shesha carries the burden of the earth.
All creation rests on the strength of tapasya. Understand this, and go forth to do tapasya.

357. THREE CONUNDRUMS

A teacher asks:

1. According to the system of varnashrama, in which varna would the Bhangis and Chamars be placed?
2. May one following one trade marry among those following another trade?
3. Since untouchability must be eradicated why should we not also inter-dine with the untouchables?

Strictly speaking all these questions have been answered in Harijan Sevak in one way or another. I shall nevertheless answer them here in the hope further to elucidate the matter.

In my view the system of varnashrama does not today exist any more. All the varnas have given up their respective functions. The Shastras say, and reason agrees, that when all the attributes of the varnas vanish the varnas themselves vanish. The varnas have today given up their dharma and so there has come about a confusion of varnas. If there is any varna that still survives it is the Shudra varna. It is under this varna that all of us, “touchables” and untouchables, ought to be classed. If this is not desired, people may choose for themselves what varna they like. The point is that varnashrama as an institution does not exist any more. Dharma is not a matter of choosing; it is not a matter of rights, only of duty. In dharma there is no one high and no one low.

The second question concerns intermarriage. I have repeatedly said that marriage is not a matter necessarily connected with the varna divisions. It is a personal matter. As a rule, however, people like to enter into matrimonial alliances with their neighbours or with people who are like them. The practice therefore of people marrying among people belonging to the same occupations as themselves will continue.
The third question is one concerning inter-dining. Removal of untouchability as it has today been defined does not include within its scope inter-dining, and rightly so. Eating and drinking are personal matters. One will eat and drink where it pleases one to. Certain norms will nevertheless remain. Everyone will not be eating everywhere indiscriminately. While no hard and fast rules can be laid down it must however be said that no considerations of high and low should apply here. Unfortunately in Hinduism today the only things that remain are these considerations of high and low, touchability and untouchability. Everyone treats others as lower than themselves and refuse to touch food or water offered by them. I see nothing of dharma in this. On the contrary in this way we only make ourselves the laughing-stock of the world.

358. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

April 7, 1933

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

I have your letters and enclosures, also copy of an article of yours in an old number of The Modern Review.¹

I understand and even appreciate the moral repulsion against ‘fasting unto death’. I have perhaps some repulsion, if not the same repulsion, against fasting unto death myself, but I remain unmoved. There are many other things I have done and am still doing against my will, because I count my will as nothing before God’s will when I see it clearly before me. I will make myself as certain as it is humanly possible to be that the will that appears to me to be God’s is really His, and not the Devil’s. But when I am clear about it, I rejoice in obeying that will, rather than mine, although I may have no human companion to endorse it. That this kind of fasting has a definite place in Hinduism, and properly so, I have not a shadow of a doubt, but it is a privilege that comes only to a few, and when it comes in obedience to a call from above, it has a mighty force, only fasting unto death is a corrupt expression. Where I used it first, it had its definite meaning.

Now it is being used torn from its context and looks certainly barbarous. But it is there, and its real meaning is unmistakable, and you can almost say that it is not so much a ‘fasting unto death’ as it is a ‘fasting unto a new life’.

All the same, I value your letter and the information you give me about the English attitude. I do want English sympathy in this big struggle. I do want also to be understood. You cannot therefore be too frank or too communicative with me. I shall never misunderstand whatever these few English friends might have to say.

Kirby Page’s article which you have sent I shall see as soon as I get time, and if there is anything worth saying, I shall reduce it to writing.

I hope that your brother’s septic teeth were extracted and that he had benefited by the extraction.

You know all about Verrier’s change of mind. He had changed it before your blessings were received, and you know the reason also for the change. Whilst I was prepared to bless the marriage, I cannot help saying that I blessed the change still more. So much depended upon Verrier’s decision. I told him that if it was a human want on his part, he must marry, no matter what misinterpretation might be put upon his action. The change came over both Verrier and Mary without any prompting from anybody at all.

Yours sincerely,

Mohan

359. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

April 7, 1933

MY DEAR GHANSHYAMDAS,

I have your letter of 28th March.

I do not mind those who have, under a mistaken notion, gone away from the Hindu fold, returning when they like. But what I cannot understand is the occasion for any expense whatsoever in connection with their return. For, if they have left the Hindu fold under a mistaken notion, as soon as they discover their mistake, it is itself a sufficient prayashchitta, and no further ceremony is necessary. So much on the merits. Assuming that there must be some expense which the returning Doms1 cannot be expected to pay, why should not the S.U.S.2 bear the expense or contribute its quota? I should give my answer in the negative, because I feel that the S.U.S. has its very defined sphere, namely, service of the Hindu Harijans. It has no connection with those who are today not Hindus. Its sphere begins after the return of the prodigals. The latter is the function of a separate organization altogether. Here therefore there is no question of fear, but it is a question of confining ourselves to the original purpose. However limited it may be, the return of the Doms is a kind of shuddhi, and the difference between the extreme shuddhi and this modified shuddhi is a difference in degree only. And once the Society takes up this modified form, it would be most difficult for it [not] to lend its assistance to the various other shades. However desirable therefore the return of the Doms to Hinduism may be, I am quite clear that its encouragement by the Society is outside the scope laid down at its very foundation.

As to the advertisement of the Titagarh Mills, I am quite clear that we may not entertain their advertisement in any shape or form, and if it is a matter of getting cheap paper, it can be had from many other mills without the slightest difficulty. We are getting the paper for the English edition at less than market-price. It was possible to have a still more reduced quotation, but I thought it would not be proper to ask for further accommodation.

As to the Hindi Harijan, I have already told you that it is getting on quite satisfactorily, and if you persist in the effort, I have no doubt that you will make it self-supporting in about a month’s time. You will see the note about it in the ensuing number of the English Harijan.¹

360. LETTER TO DR. G. V. DESHMUKH

April 7, 1933

DEAR DR. DESHMUKH,

I am very grateful to you for your most exhaustive and learned reply to my query. I liked it so much that although the editing of the ensuing number of the Harijan was finished, I made room for your letter. Of course you may hand the correspondence for publication in the local Press.

There is a domestic matter on which I want your advice. As you know, Sardar Vallabhbhai has some trouble about his nose. It has worried him all these many months, but just now the irritation has gone almost beyond endurance, as it seems to us onlookers. As you know it is not his habit to complain, but we, his companions, know what it all means to him. The prison medical men have undoubtedly done whatever they were capable of doing. But their remedies have brought no relief. I notice that he has, constantly to clean his nose, and there is always some discharge coming out. He uses a big towel for the purpose and in 24 hours it is fairly dirty all over. By a big towel I mean a bathing towel that is used in middle class Hindu households. It has appeared to me that if he cleaned his nose with warm water 3 or 4 times a day he will not have so much discharge and will not have the trouble he has in cleaning the nose. But he has been told by a doctor here that washing the nose is likely to dry it. All the affected part is therefore likely to cause greater discomfort. Though I did not have the same class of disease as Sardar Vallabhbhai has, the only way I have kept myself clean and free from any trouble has been to wash out the nose constantly, sometimes taking in the water and bringing it out through the mouth. At one time I used to have a nasal douche with a little permanganate solution added to the water and sometimes a few grains of chinosol. I do not know whether in your opinion washing of the nose with simple warm water or with anything added to it is likely to give relief to the Sardar. If you have any other suggestion to make you will please make it. I would ask you not to publish this information. I have simply written to you for my own satisfaction.

There are one or two more questions of a public character and regarding public health which I would like to ask presently if I am not unduly encroaching upon your time.

Yours sincerely,

[PS.]

You say that everything except the skin and fat should be buried for manure. But entrails are used for making guts and other purposes. And do the fresh bones become decomposed as early as they would be if they were pounded after being dried? What is the practice in the municipal slaughter-houses?

361. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 7, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got the post dispatched too, after the usual big mail. The envelope was torn. There was a remark on it by the post office that the letters were in danger of slipping out. You should get cloth-lined envelopes made there, or pay for such envelopes or tie the envelope carefully with a string. But the last course will take more time, and, if we look upon time as money, we shall stand to lose in the end. Collect some pieces of old, worn out khadi and get about a hundred envelopes made in advance. The time spent in making them will not have been wasted.
Ramabehn has complained that, as Dhiru’s weight is not increasing, you gave, at Panditji’s instance, a coupon for an additional tola of ghee, but that you deducted money for it the following month. Ramabehn’s request to raise the amount from Rs. 11 to Rs. 12 was not granted. She is afraid of talking to you about this lest she be insulted. This is the substance of her letter. Read my reply to her. Go and see her and hear what she has to say. Let me know what truth there is in her complaint. How is her arm? ... is coming to see me today. After our meeting I shall probably write to you about another painful affair. I am sure that he will now leave the Ashram.

I hope you got the letters dispatched yesterday.

364. LETTER TO NANIBEHN JHAVERI

April 7, 1933

CHI. NANIBEHN,

I liked your letter very much. You may gladly study whatever you want. However, the solution to the problem you see is contained in the idea on which the Ashram is founded. It may not appear so today but you should have no doubt in your mind that is the only solution. There is no other. This is the key to understanding a religion. First it should be grasped in all its details. Then we should consider the views of its opponents. Then if we find that it does not triumph in all experience we must not despair. Here, it is faith that works. There will be apparent oppositions and failures. But we should not be frightened by them.

If Pannalal has not received my letter, give it to him after taking permission if possible. It is at the Ashram.

365. NOTES

“HARIJAN SEVAK”

The readers know that there is a Hindi edition of the Harijan called the Harijan Sevak, which is published in Delhi by the Hindustan Times Press.

It has not yet become self-supporting, whereas the English has. If any of the editions has to show a loss, I should personally prefer that it were English, for real propaganda against untouchability has to be carried on amongst the masses and, therefore, the message has to be delivered to them. Hence the necessity for publishing correct infor-ation in the various Indian languages, and as Hindi is admittedly the most largely understood and spoken language, one would like to see a large circulation of the Hindi Sevak. It is steadily improving and, being more or less the same in substance as the English edition, it naturally contains most of the things to be found in the English edition, besides things of special interest to the Hindi reader. At the present moment about 1,000 copies are sold. At least 2,500 copies should be sold in order to make it self-supporting. I hope that the various organizations in the Hindi-speaking areas will see to an increased circulation of the Hindi edition. The workers should report their need of the kind of literature wanted in their districts.

TWO CORRECTIONS

The newly published Sanatani has a well-deserved laugh at the expense of Harijan by telling its readers that the opening of two temples in Ratnagiri reported in the issue of 25th February was repeated in that of 4th March. This was an obvious mistake for discovering which I offer the Sanatani my congratulations. Its inference, however, that, if temples continue to open as in Ratnagiri, there should be no need for Temple-entry Bills is hardly justified, inasmuch as these were private temples. And even if the trustees of a stray public temple were to run the risk of a prosecution and open the temple under their charge, the trustees of other public temples cannot be expected to do so.

The other correction to be made is on behalf of Shrimati Rama Devi of Cuttack, who says that in the general description of her activity she did not mean that she herself did the actual teaching but that the girls who accompanied her did it.

BHOR STATE AND UNTOUCHABILITY

One read in the papers that the Chief of Bhor had abolished untouchability in his State, so far as the law was concerned.

I have now got the text of the proclamation dated 1st November 1932. It is as comprehensive as it can be and advises the subjects of the State for the sake of their own religious advancement to do away with untouchability as it is observed today.

Those who have supplied me with a copy of the proclamation have also given me a bulky report of the reformers’ activity in the

\[1\text{ Vide “Notes”, 25-3-1933.}\]
Sudhagad Taluka of the Bhor State and they mention their hopes and their difficulties about their work. The workers are few, and the tremendous activity that has covered the whole of India in connection with untouchability woke up the orthodox party also in Bhor State, and so the reformers experienced unexpected opposition, so much so that the Harijans were themselves frightened to take advantage of the services that the few reformers were prepared and able to offer.

I need not take up the space of Harijan and the time of the reader by recounting the difficulties and describing the successes that the reformers had. The reading of their report has left the impression on my mind that reformers need not expect thorough success, unless they are themselves willing to suffer boycott, complete ostracism, and, maybe, even loss of their social position and their belongings. Easy chair and substantial religious reform go ill together. The orthodox party, sincerely believing that their religion is in peril, may be expected to fight every inch of the ground and to give no quarter to the reformers. They have been taught to believe that to relegate a large portion of mankind to perpetual untouchability and all it means is a just retribution. They will not hesitate to believe that those who seek to free untouchables from their shackles would deserve the same retribution and, from their own point of view, they may not be blamed. The reformer, therefore, who has a religious conviction about the necessity of reform is expected to brave all the consequences of his activity, and if a sufficient number is found all over India, the result is a certainty in spite of the opposition of orthodoxy. For I believe that truth and time are on the side of reformers, and where these are ensured, it matters little whether reformers are few or many.

As Thoreau has said so well, “All reform all the world over always began with one person taking it up.”

Harijan, 8-4-1933

366. HARIJANS AND TEMPLE-ENTRY

The other day a deputation of Harijans led by Rao Bahadur M. C. Rajah waited on H. E. the Viceroy with reference to the Temple-entry Bills. The following extract from their representation will be read with interest:

The opening of temples to our people along with other Hindu castes is a matter of the greatest importance for our social emancipation. We quite realize that we cannot hope for a permanent emancipation and betterment unless our status in the Hindu religion is improved. We, therefore, hope Your Excellency’s Government will assist the passage into Law of the Temple-entry and Anti-untouchability Bills. . . .

The courts in India are now assisting the enforcement of the superstition of untouchability. British Law has not left the superstition to its own resources, but has placed the machinery of the courts and the State at the disposal of the caste Hindus in the maintenance of those superstitious practices. Even if the Government cannot interfere in the religious practices of the Hindus, it should at least refrain from assisting in the enforcement of such practices, when they are opposed to humanity and public welfare as in the case of the treatment accorded to us. The Bill for the abolition of untouchability, sought to be introduced in the Assembly, puts an end to this anomaly and does not interfere with the religion of any person or community.

The Temple-entry Bill, for which we seek Your Excellency’s support, is drafted so as to provide a legal machinery for peaceful and gradual evolution of reform with the consent of the people concerned. Each locality will be enabled to work out a suitable compromise for solving the question of our status. We beg Your Excellency to help in the achievement of a peaceful solution of this question that so fundamentally affects the dignity and the daily life of a community of forty-six million souls who cling to the ancient Hindu religion, to which they belong, and who wish to find an honourable place in it without causing turmoil or disturbance.

In the face of the above, it is a cruel suggestion to make that the Harijans do not want temple-entry. There is undoubtedly a difference of opinion as to the emphasis laid on temple-entry as compared to the economic and political uplift. But not even Dr. Ambedkar opposes temple-entry. He will be the first man to bring it up against the caste Hindus, and rightly, if there was no movement for temple-entry. The fact is temple-entry is not a substitute for any other uplift. It is an indispensable test that religious untouchability has been abolished and that the Harijan is no longer the pariah of Hindu society. It is not impossible to conceive that untouchables may all become economically and politically superior to the caste Hindus and may yet be treated as untouchable by caste Hindus, no matter how poor and even degraded they themselves may be. There are many individual Harijans who are economically well off and are members of legislative and municipal bodies, but to the orthodox caste Hindu, they are just as untouchable as they ever were, so long as they have no right of temple-entry, as the caste Hindus have. Temple-entry prohibition and the consequent segregation that it carries with it constitute the distinguishing bar sinister of perpetual degradation. When that is lifted, and only then, will religious untouchability be said to have been abolished. The question, therefore, is not how many Harijans want temple-entry or, having got the privilege, will exercise it.

Caste Hindus have to recognize that right if they will purify Hinduism and render justice to over forty millions of fellow Hindus. The reformers may not, therefore, slacken their effort. The fact that the Bills have been hung up is no cause for despondency or going to sleep. The passage of the Bills, since they are private, will mean a mere register of the Hindu will, if they are passed by a clear Hindu majority and if they have the backing of Hindu opinion outside. They would be of no importance to me if they were forced upon Hindus by a superior power. I am interested in them because they are necessary to remove a legal hindrance in the way of reform. Whether orthodoxy represents the majority or the minority of one, it is able to stop the onward march of reform. The Bills are required for the sake of religious toleration. They have no further or other use.

That points to the necessity for legislation and the education of public opinion in the matter of Temple-entry Bills, if the public temples are ever to be opened. The pace will be accelerated if private temples, of which there are many, are opened and if temples for general worship are built where public opinion demands it. As a result of the recent brief tour of Shrimati Vijayalakshmi Pandit in Kathiawar, she told me that there was a movement in Rajkot for the building of a general temple for the use of all Hindus—Harijans, reformers and the orthodox, if the last will join.1 The temple is proposed to be built after the ancient pattern, so as to combine a school dharmashala, a place of congregation and worship. I do hope that those who have the scheme in hand will persevere with it and bring it to fruition. There need not be much money required for it. It can be built in sections as the huge temples of the South could only have been. A beginning can be made at once by securing a good open site and the services of a devout honest pujari. Mere brick and mortar is of no use, if the pujari in charge is corrupt.

But I am digressing; my purpose for the moment is to drive

1 Vide “A Model Temple”, 29-4-1933 and 30-4-1933. home the truth that the temple-entry movement must be carried on by

1. educating public opinion as to the necessity of legal provision for removing the legal difficulty,

2. inducing private owners to open their temples to the Harijans and

3. building new temples where necessary and where public benefaction would provide funds to build combination temples after the ancient manner on sites easily accessible to Harijans.

367. TUKARAM AND UNTOUCHABILITY

A controversy has been going on whether the saints, especially of Maharashtra, have favoured untouchability. Sjt. P. H. Gadre of Nasik has contended that they have not only not favoured it but written unequivocally against it and have laid it down in emphatic terms that a man is to be judged and known, not according to his birth, but according to his deeds and that devotion to God purifies all men irrespective of their caste.

I reproduce below a selection\(^1\) from the verses collected by Sjt. Gadre from the celebrated saint Tukaram.

The translation is taken, unless otherwise stated, from the work of Messrs Fraser and Marathe, who have kindly permitted Sjt. Gadre to quote from their work.

I hope that Sjt. Gadre or some other student will send a similar collection from the writings of the other saints. The reader will remember the quotation reproduced in these columns from Moropant, who describes untouchables as Harijans.

368. WHAT IT MEANS

I gave the other day an extract\(^1\) from the experiences of a new teacher of Harijans. Here is a free and condensed translation of extracts from a recent letter of his:

Within the few days that I have been teaching these children, I see that I have to give them object-lessons in everything. Cleanliness is the most difficult thing. For the past fortnight, therefore, I take the children regularly for bathing. I get them to wash their clothes with a bit of soap. Of the little children I wash the clothes myself. I supply them with brush sticks and get them to use them every day. I pare their nails and attend to every other detail. The result is that cleanliness occupies a larger place in my mind just now than giving them a knowledge of the three R’s. Their parents appreciate this personal attention that is being given to their children. Now they, too, come to my nightly gatherings. I give them stories from the Ramayana, Jatakamala and adaptations from Tolstoy, and I propose to add Nanabhai’s sketches of the heroes of the Mahabharata.

In the morning I have an attendance of about ten children. There is a double attendance in the evening. Generally I take pleasure in this work, but events happen that confound me. Sometimes drunkards appear on the scene. Sometimes there is a proper fight between husband and wife, and sometimes I have to be an unwilling listener to choice abuse. Boys try my temper at times. Once one of them went beyond limits in his pranks and I had to take him by the hand and put him out. But I have faith in God and I am hoping that this will be my life-work. I know that it is most taxing and if I did not hold on to my faith in God, I should have a recurring fit of disappointments.

You have drawn my attention to weaning them from the habit of taking leavings of food from their employers. But I shall be patient. When I have gained their confidence, I shall broach the subject to them.

I would love to learn how to skin carcasses and tan the hides. This is necessary if I am to deal with the habit of \(^1\) Vide “Notes”, 26-3-1933.

carrion-eating. Many of them add to it the drink habit and it is the commonest thing for both men and women to indulge in tobacco. The more I come in touch with them, the more I am baffled by the insanitation amongst many of them. There is a stench coming from their bodies and their clothes, especially when they have eaten carrion. Add to this the foul smell coming from the dung heaps. In order to minimize the effect of these smells, I generally sit under the open sky.

This is followed by a heart-rending description of the dirty habits of two boys. Such experiences need not dishearten any teacher. Let us remember that this is a direct result of the criminal neglect of caste men and of compulsory segregation of the most useful members of society, and all that in the name of religion. If we are to reduce our death-rate and to bring under control the diseases that are rampant among us, we will have to have hundreds like this teacher, who would work amongst Harijans with real love and unquenchable faith. We have to feel towards these children as if they were our very own. What do parents do when they have their children suffering from terrible confluent smallpox or still more dreadful diseases, filling their rooms with stench and dirt? They do not mind staking their everything in order to see their children cured. We shall have to bestow the same love on these Harijan children. We shall have to have the same patience with them even as we have for our own. Whatever may be said to the contrary, I shall proclaim from the housetops that, unless we remove the scourge of untouchability from our hearts, Hinduism is doomed. The Shastras do not warrant the neglect of a single human being in the way in which we have neglected over 40 millions, and if we would repent of our sins, I would like to have an army of voluntary workers, drawn from the so-called higher classes, offering to teach and take care of Harijan children.

370. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR

April 8, 1933

CHI. MARY,

I have your letter.

So far as I am concerned, I have no hesitation in saying ‘welcome’.² The hesitation may well be all on your part. I would love to have all nationalities and religions represented in the Ashram, but if it has not up to now succeeded in attracting them all, it is due to our limitations. We have many shortcomings to overcome.

You talk of your ‘old age’. If you can disclose it without blushing, let me have it; but I am quite sure that you are not 64, and I should be sorry to think that I am regarded as an encumbrance because of my old age. Totaramji, whom you must know by this time by his name, is older I think even than I am. Therefore you need not worry about your age. What view Narandas and the other members of the Ashram take, I shall presently ascertain. I shall ask him to give their opinion quite frankly as they should do without needing any warning from me. But even if you decide to throw in your lot with the Ashram and the Ashram gladly takes you, as a preliminary, let it be definitely for one year, for your convenience. I attach very great importance to the spiritual value of a promise, a pledge or a vow, by whichever name we may describe the act. Therefore if you take the final plunge at once it means that it will leave no door open for escape. One who has great regard for the sanctity of vows will therefore be cautious. After you have tried yourself in the Ashram for one year and found that you like the physical as well as the spiritual surroundings, then you may take the final plunge.

I hope you are both enjoying yourselves in beautiful Kashmir. Do write regularly from there.

Love from us all to you both.

371. LETTER TO M. G. BHANDARI

April 8, 1933

DEAR MAJOR BHANDARI,

A letter from Seth Poonamchand’s wife which I see is dated 27th March and two letters from Seth Jaju dated 30th March and 1st instant were received by me only yesterday about 4 p.m. These relate, as you know, to Seth Poonamchand Ranka’s fast and about which the Government have passed special orders. These are of no avail for the purpose intended, if the letters received and sent are to be held up for many days before they are delivered to me. I would like to know why they were held up in spite of the orders and whether in future I may have the correspondence in this matter promptly delivered to me.

This delay makes me more anxious than ever to receive the Government’s answer to my letter\(^1\) of the 1st instant addressed to the Secretary to the Bombay Government.

April 8, 1933

MY DEAR HARKISONDAS.

I have your letter of 7th instant. I think that it is necessary for you to give the local Press as fast as you can all the news in connection with the activities of the Board. Nothing should be kept as the first copy for Harijan. Harijan exists for the movement and not the latter for the Harijan. But I would like a fortnightly or weekly report, whichever is more convenient for you, giving in a concise form the activities of the Board, so that the news in the Harijan may reach those who have no access to the local Press or who would not look at it even if they had. Moreover, the Harijan can only publish the barest summary of your activities, whereas the local Press would be expected to give ample space to each one of the items you may supply it with. I think I have made my meaning quite clear.

Yours sincerely,

373. LETTER TO RAMESH CHANDRA

April 8, 1933

DEAR FRIEND.

I thank you for your letter.\(^1\) Is it not a universal experience that things that were at one time pure have become impure through the march of time? Both the Mahabharata and the Ramayana contain ample evidence that at one time varnadharma was followed in the sense I have described.

I never knew that it was the impression of almost all the Hindus that the caste system was the same as the varnashrama. No Hindu to my knowledge has claimed that there are innumerable varnas, but every child knows that there are numberless castes. Is it not also a fact that there are many castes claimed to belong to the same varna? So far

\(^1\) In this the addressee had contended that no varnadharma could be practised without doing away with the caste system, as I can see, the origin of caste is wholly different from the origin of varna, and except up to a certain point the function also of caste differs from that of varna.

I do claim that in ideal varna there can be no inequality whatsoever. There would be a variety, but not inequality.

374. LETTER TO SRI PRAKASA

April 8, 1933

MY DEAR SHREEPRAKASH,

I must disappoint your hope that I would stop all further correspondence, only let not the hope deferred make the heart sick. Your letters though long give me more and more insight into your mind and I like that in connection with all co-workers. You have not perceived that you have put the cart before the horse in the proposals you have made. In none of your proposals is there any effort required on our part. Everything has got to be done through the Legislatures, therefore through the Government, and that, throughout history, has been the way to perdition. All the reform that you adumbrate can only come after we have made adequate effort at least to arouse public conscience against the monster of untouchability. Untouchability is the extremist form that the oppression by the high-caste Hindus over so-called lower castes has taken. I would like you therefore to study the genesis of untouchability and its far-reaching effects far more fully than you seem to have done.

I hope you have almost regained your lost strength.

I am glad Father has been paying occasional visits.
The weekly bulletin from Calcutta shows that Shivprasad is still far from well. Let’s hope that we shall soon have better news of him.

375. LETTER TO N. V. THADANI
April 8, 1933

MY DEAR THADANI,

You have tried to cover your mischief with a jester’s tricks, but the bulky enclosures were there to tell their own tale. When the day for the weekly editing comes, I shall go through the correspondence and see whether I can extract something useful for me.

I shall look forward to your unveiling the mystery of the Mahabharata. Many have tried and failed. If you succeed, your success will be due to the accumulation of their failures, and if you also fail, it would be an additional stepping-stone to the success which your successor will unjustly seek to claim for himself, if he is a fool.

376. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

April 8, 1933

CHI. JAMNALAL,

You ought to go and see Seth Poonamchand Ranka as early as possible. Tell him that his fast is against the principle of satyagraha and on my part I feel that it cannot be defended on any grounds. Everyone is not against the classification of prisoners. Not all of the prisoners who get “A” and “B” classes willingly accept “C” class. One who is given a higher class is not bound to enjoy all the conveniences of that class. Those who avail themselves of those facilities are doing that of their own accord. How can Seth Poonamchand compel them to forsake those facilities? How can he resort to fast for that? That he may give up a number of facilities himself is a different thing altogether. I myself do not like classifications but fasting is not the means by which the changes can be effected. I hope that Shri Poonamchand Ranka will give up his stubbornness. He should know that as long as he considers himself a satyagrahi, he is obliged to observe discipline. As an originator of satyagraha I should have some right to lay down the code for a satyagrahi. From that point of view also he should listen to my advice.

May God grant you success.

CHI. KAKA,

I got your letter. I sent my reply¹ to Keshav three days ago. It was a brief one. He must have seen you by now.

do that, since the word used in the service is “wine”. It is more likely, however, that they might use grape juice which has no intoxicating effect. Some scholars do interpret “wine” in the original as “unfermented grape juice”. So in any case there must be grape juice. Such blameless juice is used in some churches, and nowadays hundreds of thousands of bottles of such grape juice are available. In Trivedi’s books also which you have sent, different methods of obtaining such grape juice are described. Hence the suggestions to use it can be immediately implemented.

It could be very good if that gentleman undertakes to publish a Marathi edition of Harijan.

378. LETTER TO GANGABEHN VAIDYA

April 8, 1933

CHI. GANGABEHN,

I have your letter.

Read the accompanying letter to Sharda¹ and give it to her.

You may not be able to provide Krishnamaiyadevi a job, but you can certainly give her some work to do. You can give her sewing and embroidery work, as you formerly used to do. My point is that she must produce something and not feel that she is living on charity.

Dharmakumar’s education should consist in his upbringing at home. That is the ideal of education in the Ashram. If children learn from their parents to be virtuous and to love bodily labour, book-learning they will get afterwards. We know from experience that book-learning does not always make a person virtuous. I am sure that anybody who possesses a good character will never starve, though he may not become rich. Misplaced compassion is not non-violence; it is, on the contrary, a form of subtle violence and one should, therefore,

¹ Daughter of Chimanlal N. Shah, an Ashram inmate guard against it all the more carefully. You should help both Krishnamaiya and Mahavir, but in the right manner. They should shake off their lethargy and work, and live contentedly. Pyare Ali says that he can help Mahavir to earn up to Rs. 40 or 50. If he does not get more than Rs. 25 at Sundardas’s place and if he satisfies Sundardas by his work, it would be better, provided of course the latter can release him, to keep him with Pyare Ali. Think over this. . . ’s whole family is leaving the Ashram. I have still not been able to understand .
. . ². He believes that he was never fit to live in the Ashram, since he wants to become a big engineer . . . ³ says that she cannot do without certain pleasures and, therefore, she also was not fit to live in the Ashram. If they leave, . . . ⁴ certainly cannot live alone in the Ashram.
Thus the whole family will leave. This is no ordinary event. But it is right that they should leave. We would not like anybody to stay against his wishes. This is our reward for having practically exempted the family from observing the Ashram rules. . . ⁵ now wishes to take up an independent job in some factory. It seems he wants to join . . . ⁶.
There will be no harm if he can do so. Of course his expenses will be high. In Deolali itself the family will spend about Rs. 100. . . ⁷ himself will spend rather freely. I, therefore, think that their expenses will come to Rs. 150. God’s will be done. The Ashram, of course, will stop giving them money. But I think we shall have to give them a month’s expenses.

You seem to be fairly occupied in solving family problems there. Do try and solve them.

If Kaku and Lakshmi have developed such relations that they even meet each other alone, I would advise that they should be married off. After they are married, they may, if they wish, live separately and may observe brahmacharya as much as they wish. But, before they are married, if they constantly think about each other, feel physical attraction towards each other and even occasionally touch each other with such feelings, that would definitely be against dharma.
An engagement may be broken off, but a marriage cannot be dissolved. If, therefore, there are occasions for them to go out together, it is desirable that they should get married. Discuss this with Kaku and Lakshmi, and also with Nath.

How much would your sister need? Meet Jamnalalji and have a talk with him and afterwards take your sister to meet him. If she is not eager to earn money, if she wants to live a life dedicated to service and has no responsibility for supporting anybody, and if she is ready to follow the Ashram way of life, I think she can live in the Ashram. But this may not perhaps be possible for her at this age.

Ask Gomati why she has stopped writing to me. I have not heard from Kishorelal of late.

If Manju\textsuperscript{1} wants to be a doctor and if you can meet her expenses, encourage her in her ambition. I don’t think it is a great achievement to be a doctor. All the same it is a form of education and one acquires knowledge. If she loves it, by all means let her have it.

379. \textbf{SIGNIFICANCE OF THE Varna SYSTEM}

A student after reading my article\textsuperscript{2} on the system of the varnas writes:\textsuperscript{3}

\begin{quote}
Yes, I believe in the hereditary division into varnas. Had it not been so, the varna system would have had no meaning at all and serve no purpose. It would be mere jargon.

The system of varnas is no man-made scheme. It emanates from the law of Nature or God. It rests with man whether or not to abide by the law. Hence, man’s individuality does not suffer in any way. Fire says you will burn yourself if you touch it. If we do not pay heed to what fire says and hold it in our hand just to assert individual freedom, we are bound to get burnt. The same applies to the law of varnas. The sages, at the end of their penances, realized that a class structure was essential for social progress and so brought about this division. It is left to us whether or not to accept it. No one is going to take us to task if we refuse to do it. But who can then stop Nature’s punishment? Why indeed call it punishment? Who can prevent what may be the \end{quote}

\textsuperscript{1}Addressee’s grand-daughter

\textsuperscript{2} Vide “Varnadharma”, 19-3-1933.

\textsuperscript{3} The letter is not reproduced here. The correspondent had asked whether Gandhiji believed that varna was determined by birth, which belief would be contrary to the doctrine of individual freedom.
natural consequence of not abiding by the laws of the varna system? So, the division into varnas can do no harm to individuality.

But why should varnas be by birth? It is not something I have produced out of my pocket. Birth is at the very root of the varna system. The very name Brahmin is suggestive of the qualities expected of a Brahmin and one would prepare his progeny for them. The same is true of a Shudra. He will cultivate in his children the qualities expected of a Shudra. This is not to imply that a Shudra is not entitled to knowledge. The system of the varnas is necessarily related to livelihood. A person shall earn his livelihood only by pursuing the occupation of the varna in which he is born. There is no objection to one varna acquiring the knowledge of all the other varnas. For individual progress and protection of freedom, all people should have the qualities generally found in all the four varnas. But each man must especially develop the qualities of his own varna.

The varna system emphasizes the curbing of material greed so that it can leave greater scope for spiritual development. Material objects and material happiness are transitory. If man gets himself entangled in acquiring that alone, makes it the sole aim of his life, he will not be able to think about his soul. This does not in any way dampen human endeavour. When man does not have to go in search of means of livelihood, when means of livelihood are ready for him, all his efforts would be directed towards the spiritual quest. It is my firm conviction that by hitting upon the varnas the Hindus have made a great spiritual discovery, and have provided means for spiritual development. In course of time we forgot this fact and the varna system became disorganized. It reduced itself to touchability and untouchability and to restrictions on inter-dining and intermarriage. This resulted in its fall, viz., the confusion of the varnas. People lost themselves in encroaching upon the vocations of the other varnas. The Brahmin gave himself to greed and abandoned his duty as a Brahmin.

If the sea catches fire, who shall put out that fire? If the salt loses its savour, wherewith shall it be salted? That is why Hindu dharma is in decline today.

_Harijanbandhu, 9-4-1933_
It is one’s duty to obey one’s parents. They are one’s teachers. They are God. Shravana achieved his salvation by regarding his parents as God. While obeying his father’s orders, Rama gave up his kingdom. Now you say that untouchability is adharma, that Hinduism will perish if that blot is not washed off. To many of us what you say sounds true. But our parents do not accept it. As one of my friends undertook to do service to Harijans, his mother left her home and could be located only after midnight. She has returned home, but a great difficulty faces my friend. What should this friend do now? This must be the case with many young people.

This is a summary of a letter. This is a real difficulty. I believe in devotion to parents. While my parents were alive, I conducted myself regarding Shravana as an ideal. I believe that whatever I have achieved is due to my devotion to my parents and the fruit of their blessings. Despite that, I think we can imagine circumstances in which disobedience to the orders of parents becomes one’s clear duty. Where the parents have been given the place of a teacher and of God, they have been thought of as perfect beings, so that to their offspring they are perfect. The children do not even entertain a doubt that what their parents say may be full of ignorance or error. They certainly are partial to their parents, because they desire their welfare. Where there exists a pure environment and the children have complete faith in their parents, the latter’s well-being consists in carrying out their parents’ orders.

But when the children have a doubt, what is to be done? The parents say, ‘Drink liquor, eat carrion, offer bribes, secure that job by telling lies, one can speak an untruth in business, marry a nine-year old girl, there is sin in touching an untouchable,’ etc., etc. What should children do when such a situation arises? I think that the answer is provided in asking the question itself. When parents issue an order which appears to the children to be clearly an adharma, it is their dharma to disobey it. But where there is the slightest room for doubt as to what is right and what is wrong, it is one’s dharma to do one’s parents’ bidding. One cannot compare any other man’s word with that of one’s parents. In such circumstances, one has to follow one’s parents’ word only. Only he may disobey his parents who feels it incompatible with his dharma to obey them.
But who can claim such religious prompting? An impudent, licentious or selfish son may get such an urge. But he does not thereby acquire the right to disobey his parents. Only a son who has restraint, thoughtfulness, renunciation, forbearance, etc., who has known what it is to obey orders, who has clearly experienced religious awakening, may alone have the obligation to act contrary to his parents’ orders. Moreover, in an age of licentiousness and independence when many sons belittle their parents, it is difficult to say who disobeys his parents’ command regarding it his dharma to do so. But because of that we cannot observe their dharma. I believe he who observes the conditions which I have pointed out will not commit a mistake.

Again, those young men and women, who act contrary to their parents’ wishes cannot claim the facilities of their parental homes and their parents’ money. They should be ready to give up home and wealth without hesitation and anger. Very often such conduct produces a good effect. The parents’ opposition calms down. Where the parents are licentious and the son is restrained, one very often sees a change brought about in the parents. One cannot say this in regard to untouchability. Here both can be restrained. Both can regard their own conduct as dharma. Such honest differences may even endure. Here one can only expect that both will conduct themselves by tolerating mutual differences. Parents should not expect their grown-up sons or daughters always to obey them. And where the parents remain obdurate or threaten to kill themselves and so on, the youths who clearly know their dharma should thoughtfully observe it.

_Harijanbandhu_, 9-4-1933
From the point of view of the correspondent there is some truth in what he says, from my point of view there is none. I have given words a wider meaning, no doubt, but I have not rejected the popular meaning. The correspondent gives up the popular meaning, and tries to accept mine. This attempt itself is misguided. If we give up the popular meaning, what meaning can we expand? I have faith also in stone and other images. The fact is that language can never completely express human thoughts. So, the meanings of words continue to expand. It is impossible, it is unnecessary, to coin new words for every sense. When the same word is used to convey opposite ideas, there is a definite danger of ambiguity and absurdity. There is no such danger here as I have only expanded the popular meaning. In fact, it is not an expansion but a clarification of the meaning. The popular meaning tells us that the stone is God. But the correct idea is not that the stone is God but that God pervades the stone. People might say that if there is God in the stone, why should we not regard the stone as God? The body is not the soul, but the soul dwells in the body. Yet millions say and believe that the body itself is the soul. It is of course true from their point of view, or rather, there is an element of truth even in what they think. It means that the popular meaning does not deserve to be abandoned altogether. As a concept grows wider, the meaning of the term would go on expanding too. What I am doing is nothing new. My ideas themselves may strike one as something new. This is inevitable because that is my sadhana. One has to think in the search for Truth. The narrow meaning does not satisfy. With contemplation the same meanings of the same words are found satisfying. It is said that the Vedas are but an expansion of Om. Tulsidas says that Rama himself is Om, Rama himself is the Vedas. Rama includes everything. He alone is, all else is illusion. But the Rama of the people is only a son of Dasharatha. Tulsidas says: “My Rama may be Dasharatha’s

1 The Gujarati translation of this appeared in Harijanbandhu, 9-4-1933.
2 The correspondent had stated that Gandhiji had used terms like ‘idolworship’ and ‘temples’ in a new sense and wanted these new meanings to be explained so as to avoid possible misunderstanding.
3 Spiritual striving son but He is also much more: He is Sachchidananda Purnabrahma.” There is no contradiction in this at all. It is the broadening of an idea, expansion of a meaning. Tulsidas meditated and in his meditation had a vision of the flawless, formless, all-pervading Rama. This has not led to any absurdity. On the contrary, we have a better understanding of the significance of the avatars. It has brought peace to our mind and heart. And we also realize how Rama has come to be known as more than Dasharatha’s son. Similarly, let us proceed from the stone to the atom and we have endless images. And we see God hidden even in the atom. Hence, the whole world is given to image-worship. The place in which the image of Jagannatha is installed is a Jagannatha temple. And the place where a few persons sit together and pray to God is also a temple. So a temple is an integral part not only of Hindu dharma but of religion as such—one may call it a church or a mosque, a gurudwara or an upashraya. As long as the body and the soul are related, temple and God will always stay together. The body is a fountain of filth as well as an abode of God. Similarly, a temple can also become a den of vice, and it is already an abode of God. “As is one’s faith, so is one’s gain.”

385. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 9, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got today the post despatched by you on the 7th and despatched today’s post from here after reading it.

Parachure Shastri had joined the Ashram for a three-year course of training with a view to doing Ashram work. His aim and mine was that he and his co-workers should work according to the ideals of the Ashram. Though, unfortunately, he had to leave before completing the period, he did Ashram work to the best of his ability and that is why I look upon him as an inmate of the Ashram. Here the phrase “inmate of the Ashram” is not interpreted literally. The meaning which I have given to it is wider, and not narrower, than the literal meaning. Did you read what I wrote in my letter to Duncan? According to me, he has already become an inmate of the Ashram. If he were to find himself in a difficult plight anywhere while doing public work, I would invite him to the Ashram. Wherever he goes, he will keep up his connection with the Ashram. I believe Parachure Shastri has done so. Some workers at Chinchvad also may. I would not say that about everyone who joins the weaving school. Some of them give up the Ashram way of life altogether after they have learnt weaving and work only for a living. If you are still not convinced, ask me again.

I accept all your criticism of Narahari’s letter. I had observed the harshness of his language which you have noticed. But I ignored it and paid attention only to his motive and his suggestions. I read it as I would have done if it were written about me. I would ignore harsh language used by anybody about me. I, therefore, paid no attention to Narahari’s harsh language about you. Moreover, I know his temperament. Your dharma is to disregard the language used about you. If your correspondent’s motive is not malicious and if his suggestions deserve consideration, we should think about them. This is the way of non-violence. It is the swan’s manner. “The creator has made all things, animate and inanimate, full of virtues and defects. The good follow the example of the swan and accept the milk of virtues and leave the water of defects.” Unless one acts thus, one cannot attain goodness and truth or preserve them for long even if attained. We may observe other people’s defects, but it is for the spotless Brahman alone, and not for an imperfect man, to judge them. Man is described by some as an embodiment of imperfections. You must not, therefore, get disheartened. I close this chapter here for today.

I have already written to you about . . . I have no hope that any of them will continue to live in the Ashram. They cannot endure the strict discipline of the Ashram rules. I, therefore, believe that they have decided to leave the Ashram after considering their capacity. They have also no respect for you and no faith in you, but I would not mind that. I would urge you, too, not to mind it, but when the truth is that they lack the strength or the will (the two things, ultimately mean the same) to observe the Ashram rules, both they and the Ashram would feel suffocated if they continued to live in it. I think both . . .\(^1\) and . . .\(^2\) can support themselves. If . . .\(^3\) were not ill, she, too, is fully capable of supporting herself. Perhaps their capacities will grow outside the Ashram and they will do quite well. They cannot conform to the mould of the Ashram life. If you believe otherwise and can tempt them to continue to live there, I should certainly be happy. I feel that their leaving the Ashram means my doing so. It has a serious implication for me, but their remaining in the Ashram against their will or in an unnatural manner would be unbearable to me and also contrary to dharma.

1 The name has been omitted.

We could not do anything here except keep a fast to mark the commencement of the National Week.

I have not received Valji’s article mentioned in your letter. Perhaps I will get it tomorrow.

In my ignorance, I have committed myself to the Board here to supply 25 Gandiva spinning-wheels at 12 annas each. After making the promise, I asked Lakshmidas the price of the wheel and he informed me that it was a rupee and a half. But I must supply 25 spinning-wheels. I had written to Keshu about this in one of my letters. But he has now left. I don’t know if there is anybody now in the factory who can attend to such work. If the spinning-wheels cannot be manufactured there, request Lakshmidas to manufacture and send them. If they cost more than 12 annas each, he should recover the balance from the Ashram. Each spinning-wheel must be fitted with a spindle-bearer, a spindle and a spring. The spinning-wheel which I had made in jail is there. The new ones should be as simple. They need not be varnished. There should be a hook at the top, so that the spinning-wheel can be hung up on a wall after the work is over. The hook can be made of tin sheet. Or a hole may be made and a string may be tied into a loop. The wheel need not have a steel axle. The one sent to me by Keshu does not have it. In the spinning-wheel which we used in the beginning, there were only two nails in the wheel. I have done plenty of spinning on such a spinning-wheel. It will be enough if they are not carelessly made and if they work smoothly. The freight will be paid by the Board.

CHI. NARANDAS,

The packet which I despatched yesterday contained a report of discussion arising out of . . .'s' affair along with two letters relating to it, a letter from Mary with my reply to her and a copy of the same for being preserved there.

I very much liked Marybehn’s letter. I am sure you will understand my reply to her. If all of you like her nature, respect her wish. But before you do that let all the inmates of the Ashram meet together and think about the suggestion independently. None of you need think that my view has to be accepted. You will see that I have made that clear in my letter to Marybehn also.

You will find with this a letter from Jekibehn’s. Her sons have grown up now. They can be easily looked after there. pillar of the Ashram. Without him, the Ashram would not have come into existence at all. It is a painful and serious thing that his family should leave the Ashram. But I believe all the same that it is necessary for the sake of dharma that they should leave. We will not cease to love them for having left the Ashram. We will continue to take interest in them wherever they are. We should wish that, even though they live away from the Ashram, they will observe its rules to the best of their ability and will never do anything to bring shame on the Ashram.

I do wish that nobody will feel superior and think that they were not perfect because they left and that those who have not left are so. Those who leave can be morally worthier than those who remain. The imperfections of those who are leaving became known to all, but who knows the imperfections of the others which may have remained unknown? We should not sit in judgment over anybody. God alone knows who is good and who is bad.

We should learn a lesson from these instances and wake up. No one should conceal his shortcomings. Everybody should become more vigilant. Let nobody do anything out of false shame. One should do only what one spontaneously can, and if anyone cannot observe the Ashram rules or does not wish to do so, it would be better for them to leave. All of us are imperfect, but if, knowing imperfections, we constantly strive to follow the Ashram ideals and do not hide our shortcomings, we are fit to live in the Ashram. We should, however, leave if we do not wish to follow those ideals or have no faith in them.

If you circulate the foregoing among all friends there, it will suffice. If you wish to suggest any changes in what I have written, you may do so.

I have your letter. Even if Maganlal does not join you, you two should divide the property and put the suggested divisions before Chhaganlal. We should hope that Maganlal will accept whatever you do. You should make the divisions with due regard for the sums earmarked by Doctor for specific purposes—that is, the total value of the property should be reduced by that much.

April 9, 1933

CHI. SHAMAL,

I welcome your question. Of course I would never say that people should give up eating carrion and eat the flesh of slaughtered animals instead. However, I do say that carrion has a very bad effect on the person eating it. It is considered bad all over the world. Yes, I do say that a person who cannot give up eating flesh may eat the flesh of a slaughtered animal. Of course it cannot be that a person accustomed to eating flesh will eat only carrion. It is certainly not that those who eat carrion do so because they think it to be against dharma to kill an animal for food. It is sheer superstition to believe that carrion is especially good for health.

April 9, 1933

CHI. PADMA,

I have your letter. If none of you can keep good health there, you should not stay on as a burden on the others. My advice then would be that you should go and stay in the Ashram. Instead of changing from place to place without any definite benefit, it would be better to live in the Ashram and be reconciled to whatever happens there. If, however, you keep good health at that place, you should settle there permanently. I shall await your reply.

I trust Shila is all right now and that Sarojini Devi is keeping good health.

I got two wires yesterday about Seth Poonamchand Ranka, dated 6th inst. According to the postmarks on them they were delivered to you on the same date. You know how important they were. This delay baffles me. The only way I can somewhat undo its effect is to send a wire direct to Seth Poonamchand. But that I know is not covered by the Government orders. If you have the power to use the telephone or the wire I would request you to secure permission from the Government to despatch the enclosed wire\(^2\) as an urgent message to Seth Poonamchand or the Superintendent of the Khandwa Jail at Government expense.\(^3\) This in my humble opinion is the least that is due to the fasting prisoner and me.

April 10, 1933

MY DEAR ABDUL ALIM,

I was glad to receive your letter. You ought not to be downhearted. God has been really merciful to you. Without the goodwill of many people, you could not have gone to the ‘Refuge’ nor to the Campbell Hospital. And you have Satisbabu and all the people of his Ashram willing to render such help as may be necessary. Whilst it is true that money can buy many things, poverty has its compensations, which money can never command. If it had no attractions, many people would not have voluntarily embraced poverty. You have read the Koran, and you know that the Prophet himself and many of his companions were very poor people and they suffered privations. You should not therefore grieve over your lot.

According to your instructions I am sending this letter care of Satisbabu.

MY DEAR GHANSHYAMDAS,

I have had two cheques for the David Scheme, in all Rs. 5,000, Rs. 2,500 from Shri Suvta Devi and another Rs. 2,500 from Shri Janaki Devi.

The first donation is to be utilized for a Rajputana Harijan student, if one with proper qualifications is available, otherwise for a Harijan student in the Bombay Presidency.

The second donation is to be used preferably for a Harijan student from C. P., Marathi, failing that, from C. P., Hindustani, both failing, for any Harijan student.

I have also Rs. 100 from Janaki Devi to be used for Harijan cause at my discretion.

I have handed the amounts to Thakkar Bapa and verbally given also the instructions accompanying the donations. This is however for your record. I have still Rs. 500 to be sent to you of which I have already given you advice, and I am hoping that Thakkar Bapa withdrew from the Arya Bhushan Press the sum of Rs. 1,044 which was the advance given on behalf of Harijan.

For the last three days or four I have not heard from you. I have developed regarding you a mother’s anxiety. I am sure it is unnecessary, but when I do not hear from you, I imagine all sorts of things. Could you have fallen ill? Or, could you have fallen from your resolution? You must not therefore fail in writing regularly as you have promised to do.

I hope you got the long letter I sent you on Friday. It contained answers to every one of your questions.

I had a satisfactory letter from Ramaswami in reply to my letter about which I wrote to you. Who is this guru of his with whom you are said to be living? How old is he? What languages does he know? Is Chitaldrug his home? How is Rudramuni behaving?

Your latest letter, that is of the 8th April, is quite satisfactory. I now understand the position better.

So far as your guru is concerned, I know it is too sacred a thing to be discussed. I suppose he is the gentleman whom Rudramuni also claims as his guru. Could you describe him? How old is he? What languages does he know? Not that a man to be good and true and advanced spiritually needs to know a single language. My enquiry is merely to satisfy my curiosity.

So far as your work amongst Harijans is concerned, I do not feel like guiding you for the moment. I can only hope that the work you

406. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

April 11, 1933

DEAR SATISBABU,

There is no doubt about it that untouchability works nowhere so cruelly as in the South. That in the South all the non-Brahmins are not classed as untouchables has a historical reason. But in its working it is the same, whether you call them untouchables or not; and hence it is that you find in Madras alone non-Brahmin constituencies. Therefore in Madras you have reservation of seats for non-Brahmins and untouchables instead of merely untouchables, and the feeling between Brahmins and non-Brahmins runs much higher and keener than between touchables and untouchables. In Bengal no doubt things are bad enough and need to be mended. The untouchables in Bengal would feel the irritation just as much as the untouchables in Madras, for they know nothing worse. But when we begin to set up comparisons we have to admit that the Madras pattern is infinitely worse than the Bengal one, and if you went to Madras and studied the question you will immediately say, ‘Bad as things are with us in Bengal, they are infinitely worse in Madras.’ Therefore I want you to work away against untouchability in Bengal as unremittingly as you have begun, but at the same time avoid comparison with the other Provinces and be more than fair in your judgment of the sanatanists.

² The addressee who was at one time in charge of the khadi work at Abhoy Ashram, Comilla, had requested Gandhiji to give copies of his statements to the Free Press of India also as he did to the Associated Press of India.

MY DEAR MARY,

It was wholly unnecessary for you both to leave the Ashram. What I thought necessary was a temporary separation. That seems to have come naturally.

I am glad that you are now happier. I hope to hear from you that all the excitement and nervousness have disappeared altogether and that you have a peace such as you never enjoyed before.

I can well understand what all these events must mean to your parents and especially to your mother.¹ It seems to me that if the way is otherwise open and if you have private means, it might be well not to wait for the imminence of a mental breakdown, but to go now at once, pay your parents a short visit, explain everything to them, and express your unalterable determination to serve in India. If this is at all possible I think you will find that it would save time and worry and also money. It is not to be expected that your parents will be able to follow your quick changes intelligently and sympathetically.

Your assurance about Verrier’s health makes me happy.

Yours sincerely,

CHI. MIRA,

Your long letter came yesterday. Your argument appeals to me. Women themselves have resisted the argument that you have advanced. I have believed it always that man is the aggressor. He is more sensual than woman. I have therefore no difficulty in following your argument. But the corollary you draw defies experience. It has been happy where it has worked. But they are rare cases and will always be so—nor is it unfortunate. The usual condition is marriage and procreation. That means breach of brahmacharya as we know it. That does not mean that we should not aim at it. We must aim at it even though there may be only one case of perfect brahmacharya out of the experiment. Many attempt, only a few will attain salvation. Therefore generally we shall have to be satisfied with married people growing to brahmacharya and a few only being life brahmacharis. If I am right, the Ashram will have to be what it is, always rising higher after every failure. . . . and . . . are infinitely better for having lived in the Ashram nor is the Ashram any the worse for their having lived in it. They would easily have been much better if I had been less imperfect and more wise and for that matter the other elders. But I was their foot-rule, so imperfect and untrue. Yet I do not consider myself an unsafe guide because I am not consciously untruthful and always attempt to discover and throw away my imperfections. All I say is that failures there must be so long as we have not in our midst a perfect man or woman. But we need not lose hope nor become unnerved on discovering instances like . . . ’s; they are attempts of the system to throw off impurities. I rejoice at the discovery, while I deplore . . . ’s error, even as I would rejoice at the discovery of a disease in my own body, though I may deplore it. Further than this I cannot carry this tremendous problem—‘one step enough for me, I do not ask to see the distant scene’. We know the fundamental truth we want to reach, we know also the way. The details we do not know, we shall never know them all, because we are but very humble instruments among millions of such moving consciously or unconsciously towards the divine event. We shall reach the Absolute Truth, if we will faithfully

\[1\text{This and the subsequent names in the letter have been omitted.}\] and steadfastly work out the relative truth as each one of us knows it.

Ba wants her letter separately because of the separate delivery. According to the date of the delivery of my letter to her, the fortnight is not yet complete. I do not understand this intricate working of the jail regulations. It differs in every jail evidently. But that ought not to cause any worry. The philosophy of prison life is that the body belongs to the keeper, i.e., the State. Therefore generally speaking it may be said that a prisoner is foolish who worries about exterior wants the supply of which depends wholly upon the keeper’s will. Thus everything given to a prisoner is a concession which may be withdrawn at the will of the State. Domestic letters fall under that category. We may thankfully receive and write them so long as they are allowed but we may not foam or fret or curse, if we are not allowed to do so. Regularity of delivery we may prize but irregularity ought not to unhinge us. Those who are prisoners for conscience’ sake should at least grasp this very simple but not generally understood truth. If you can explain it to Ba, you should do so.

I shall see about the delivery of Hindi Harijan. My weight is steady at 104.

Love from us all.

I hope when I get the time to deal with one portion of your letter in the pages of the Harijan without in any way mentioning your name.

As to the last question in your letter, the Brahmin who discoursed upon untouchability was in my opinion utterly wrong. Untouchability in the case of womenfolk is only in respect of a temporary condition and if there was untouchability observed about people in similar cases, there would be nothing to be said. But here it is a permanent untouchability with heartless conduct attached to it. Between the two conditions there is no resemblance.

417. LETTER TO HOME SECRETARY,
GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY

April 12, 1933

The Secretary to the Government of Bombay
Home Department

Dear Sir,

I have just read the Government’s reply to my request contained in my letter2 of the 1st instant.

1 The addressee had applied for the scholarship of Rs. 500, announced by the Servants of Untouchables Society, to finance the research he was conducting on the subject of untouchability in the Mahabharata under the aegis of the Bombay University.
2 Vide “Letter to Home Secretary, Government of Bombay”, 1-4-1933.
I am thankful for the correction that it was not in 1922 but in 1923 that I was permitted to see two fellow-convicts in the Yeravda prison who were fasting.

I am sorry for the decision of the Government on the issue raised by me.

Technically the Government are right in their reply. Naturally every concession lapses with the end of the prisoner’s incarceration. The limits of the current concessions I have not questioned, though I did not like them in so far as the inquiry about the treatment or conduct of other prisoners was concerned. Happily there was no occasion for definitely raising the point. My endeavour has been to avoid, as far as possible, occasion of conflict with authority. I have been content to live, as becomes a prisoner, a hand-to-mouth existence in the hope that with the march of time my conduct would inspire the Government with confidence in my desire to tender and promote prison discipline to the best of my ability and thus make my way smooth for humanitarian work that was possible for me even as a prisoner to do. And I may be pardoned for referring to a policy once established by the Government and pleading for its continuity.

But the Government would on the contrary seem to repent of past concessions and to want to curtail them. For the communication under reply says, “Government are unable to extend this concession so as to cover direct communications between him and prisoners in jails other than Yeravda.” Does this mean that I am not now to exchange communications which I have hitherto carried on with prisoners in jails other than Yeravda, and that in cases such as Seth Poonamchand’s I am not to be permitted to offer friendly intervention? I can only hope that the Government do not mean to curtail or restrict the concession already granted to me. I request an early reply as even the concession granted in the matter of Seth Poonamchand has not, in my opinion, been properly given effect to.

Yours sincerely,

418. LETTER TO P. R. LELE

April 12, 1933

MY DEAR LELE,

Of course, I know that you were attached to the cause of untouchables long before the question of saving my life occurred. You had yourself corresponded with me as editor of the Liberator. My point was that you should continue your interest along the lines chalked out by the Society, whatever your differences with the Bombay Branch. As you say, Thakkar Bapa is an institution in himself. I should be sorry indeed if it was a fact that the other agencies working for the service of the Harijans had materially weakened because of the existence of the Bombay Branch. I would like you to throw more light on it. And you mystify me by saying that you will ‘have to be satisfied with such opportunities to serve as Dr. Ambedkar allows and gives you’. Whatever the difference as to the way of working between Dr. Ambedkar and others, surely the goal is the same except for the fact that Dr. Ambedkar would not be satisfied with anything less than destruction of varnashrama, but there is absolutely common ground so far as destruction of untouchability in the sense of out-casteness is concerned. The field therefore is so vast that all can serve, whether by belonging to some of the organizations or independently.

Yours sincerely,

419. LETTER TO USHAKANTA MUKHOPADHYAY

April 12, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I am grateful to you for your very long and reasoned letter. But that letter does not convince me of the necessity of untouchability, as we observe it today, for any beneficial purpose whatsoever, and you seem to give up your case when you suggest that common temples may be built which would be accessible to all classes of Hindus so that in time to come people may forget the artificial distinctions that are observed today.

So far as the four divisions are concerned, I am wholly at one with you if you agree that they are designed to regulate the duties of the four divisions and not to set up grades of superiority and inferiority nor to erect impassable barriers as to inter-dining and intermarriage. That there would be a custom set up as to marriage and dining I can quite see, but it would not be and never was an integral part of varnadharma.

Yours sincerely,

420. LETTER TO N.

April 12, 1933

MY DEAR N.,

After having kept me waiting for four days and holding me in suspense, you have given me a long letter.

I do not like the boil on your left foot and right leg. I hope that you know the simple treatment of boils and that by the time this reaches you, nothing will have been left of them. It is much better to stop all work than to run the risk of dirt getting into them when they appear on inconvenient parts of the body. If you do not know simple treatment of simple diseases, you have got to learn it quickly. Truly, this new life is a new birth for you. May you come safely through it.

As for S. I do not know what you mean by giving him another

1 The addressee had claimed that untouchability was designed to protect the weak in the society as was the purdah in the North.
2 The names have been omitted.
chance. I hope you have written to him strongly about his unwarrantable familiarity. Unless he is truly repentant, nothing whatsoever can be accepted from him, and it would not be proper to accept his mere word in order to enable you to receive a gift from him. It is demoralizing to receive gifts from those whom you want to reform or from those with whom we had questionable relationship. Therefore S. may have all the chances for showing his repentance. Nothing whatsoever should be received from him, or, for that matter from R'. The only person whom I regard as quite reliable is Ramachandra. Get everything you need from him and no one else. I shall write to Ramachandra to look to your wants. He told me that in reply to your letter asking for soap, he offered to send you a remittance so as to enable you to buy soap locally. This was meant to save railage for a small parcel. The local purchases you could only do if you knew the bazaar prices or if you had a reliable person who would not cheat you. Somehow or other I do not feel quite safe about R'. He is for me an unknown quantity. He may be a very good man, only I do not feel quite safe.

This brings me to soap. For cleaning the body, as I told you when you were with me, no soap was required. Clean water and a rough towel is all that is necessary for keeping the body quite fit. For washing the hair there is nothing to approach the soap-nut. It is to be had all over India. A few nuts soaked overnight and then well mashed with hand in the water produces soap suds with which you can clean the hair perfectly. But I have an easier method. You have abandoned everything for the Harijan service and for self-purification. Hence, you are, to all intents and purposes, a sannyasin. Therefore you have to remove the hair from your head and have a close crop almost amounting to a shave. Mira has that. Tens of thousands of widows have that crop. If you can easily let your hair go, I need not prescribe elaborate things for keeping your hair in a clean condition. I do not want to press for the crop. I do not know what attraction your hair has for you. Much as I would like every girl in the Ashram to have her hair cropped, I have been able to persuade only a few. If you have the same partiality for your hair as these Ashram girls have, I have nothing to say. But if you would let your hair go as easily as you pare your nails, then I would say: Get hold of the closest barber, get him to wash his hands and his scissors in hot water and get him to take off your hair. If he has not the clippers, then let him do so with the ordinary scissors. It won’t be as close a crop as I would like, but it would be close enough to save you all the anxiety about your hair and it would save you also a great deal of time. If you do not want your hair to be cropped, I must write to you in my next letter what you should do to keep it clean without having to resort to soap. Remember that millions in this country do not know what soap is. Again, in asking you practically to do without soap, I am asking you to do something I have not succeeded in inducing all the Ashram people to do.

\[2\] ibid

Now for the washing of the clothes. I wonder if you have enough firewood to heat your water. If you are a bit of an engineer, you can even heat your water by the sun-heat. It requires a metal pot and a bit of piping undoubtedly. An American educational missionary, Sam Higginbottom, is heating his water by the sun-heat in Allahabad. But this is not yet for you. I am simply whetting your appetite for doing simple things in the villages. But if you can heat your water all you need to do is to obtain the crude washing soda. Add that to your water and it becomes as soft as soap water. Soak your clothes in that water while it is boiling and let them lie in that water overnight. Wash them well the next morning and they are free from dirt though not white as snow, because they take somewhat the colouring of the crude soda. But that should not matter and is in keeping with the village life. But the clothes will be as clean as if washed in a first-class hotel in America, and all you want is cleanliness.

The change you have made in your apparel seems to me to be quite suitable. You have almost anticipated me if the robe is in addition to the skirt I have mentioned in my letter. You are hard on poor Ramachandra. I think that his remark was well meant. Your argument about the women is quite logical, but unfortunately we are not governed by logic. I must not enter into the history of the women whom you see bare-bodied. You will however realize at once that you cannot afford to vie with these sisters. Truth demands that your external appearance should be as near a representation as possible of the internal condition. You cannot afford today to claim unassailable internal innocence. When you have attained it, you won’t need to demonstrate it. Do you know the story of Shukdevji and Vyas? If you don’t, you must ask me to give it to you some other day.
I am not at all satisfied about your food. The ragi bread should go. You must have got whole wheatmeal flour by this time. If you have, you must bake your own chappati. If you have not got that, you should live on milk and such dried fruit as you might have. It would keep you in good health and give you the needed energy. Milk for yourself you should beg, if the people will willingly supply to you. Buffalo milk is fairly rich and if you get one pound, it will serve the purpose. Of course S.’s portion is a first charge. Whatever fruit and vegetables you may get now and again will really be enough to give you the necessary vegetable salts and vitamins. So far as health is concerned, a daily supply of fresh vegetables and fruit is not an absolute necessity, especially when you are living out in the open air and are not called upon to undergo extraordinary physical or mental strain.

You must control your temper, even with reference to S. You should be patient with the people who surround your little cottage and would not let you have even a little bit of privacy when you want to sleep. A little reasoning with them will set them right. Whilst you are still becoming inured to your new life, you should insist on taking an hour’s sleep during the middle of the day and giving it to S. It will be good for your body and good for your temper, and if you and S. have a close crop, you will use a wet rag for the head, as you saw me use. It cools the head and the whole body instantaneously.

You should have sent me R.’s letter as he wrote it. Let me know him as he is and not as you would have him to appear.

I think I have covered all the points in your letter.

May God the Truth surround you and S. with His protecting care. I know that if you will have complete faith in Him, it will be all well with you. Here is a note for S.¹

Yours sincerely,

422. LETTER TO G. RAMACHANDRAN

April 12, 1933

MY DEAR RAMACHANDRAN,

In your otherwise exhaustive and excellent report on the conflict between Nattars and Harijans, you have omitted the dates, the respective population of the two parties, and a rough map of the area affected. But I do not want to send you this letter in order to criticize your report which Thakkar Bapa handed to me on the 6th instant, but to ask you whether you desire in the interest of the cause publicity for the report and editorial comments upon the subject-matter of it. As Thakkar Bapa was very anxious that I should take notice of it, I was preparing to do so when suddenly I came upon the paragraph of recommendations. Therein you have stated that the Committee would be trying through local influence to adjust the quarrels between the two parties. The question at once arose with me as to whether any publicity given to the report and comment would harm the progress of pacification through friendly intervention or whether it would help it. Please help me to come to a decision. Your word would be final.
And if the matter has got to be dealt with in the next week’s Harijan, you should telegraph to me. This letter should be in your hands on Saturday, and if I get your wire before or on Monday, it will answer the purpose.

423. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

April 12, 1933

CHI. JAMNALAL,

After reading Kamalnayan’s letter, I feel that, if you can become free from the work at Wardha, you should immediately go to a hill station. I like Mahabaleshwar the best. You can stay there for a full one month and a half. After that you can descend to Panchgani or go to any other place if you wish. You should not remain in the plains so long as the discharge from the ear continues.

424. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 12, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your weekly post. I found Smt. Dhanvanti’s letter, but did not find Valjibhai’s article. If you did send it, it seems to have been lost in the office here. I hope he has kept a copy. If it has not been left behind there, write to Valji and inform him, so that time may be saved. He should know that this is a jail.

Vaseline will help Amina better than ghee can. She should thoroughly mix a little boric acid powder with it.

I cannot take the final decision about Dhiru, since I do not know him well. Only you and others there who have known him for many years can do so. He has studied under Panditji. Probably Narahari also knows him well. He is working at present under your direct supervision. If what he writes to me can be trusted, it is our duty to let him go. But we cannot do that if we have the slightest doubt about him. Whether or not Santiniketan is a suitable place for him may be doubtful, but we have no choice in the matter. Besides, there is no doubt that they teach painting well there. Whether Dhiru will use his skill well or not will depend entirely on his character. I cannot judge whether he is a boy of good character, whether he is hard-working.

1 Addressee’s son
2 Poonamchand Ranka’s wife and whether he has any aptitude for painting. After writing a long letter to me, he has kept silent. I don’t feel very happy about that. But it is possible that he has not written again because of shyness or out of respect for me.

It is desirable that everybody should keep silent for some time after prayer or talk only in whispers. A person may speak about Ashram work, however. In army barracks, soldiers are not permitted to talk after the bell for retiring is sounded. In any case there should be no murmuring immediately after the prayer. This is necessary for the good of the boys as well as of the Ashram. This rule is strictly enforced in jails. Were it not so, life in a jail would be intolerable. In jails even lights are generally put out at a fixed hour. And talking in loud voices is never permitted. If, therefore, you can introduce a rule that people should be silent or talk only in whispers, you should do so immediately.

BAPU

[PS.]

I suppose you have read Dr. Sharma’s letter. Welcome him heartily when he comes. His daughter also should be welcomed. Give him the necessary facilities for his experiments. His letters carry a very good impression of him.

I have had no comments from you recently regarding the effect of the changes in food. Let me know the results. Nobody should be forced to accept these changes. If anybody desires some modification, grant his request within our limits. Chhotubhai has written to me about this. Read my reply to him.

425. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

April 12, 1933

CHI. PREMA.

I have your letter. It is enough that I have cautioned you. Your belief that I do not read your letters carefully is not correct. I had fully understood what you had said. Such cock-sureness is itself a sign of pride. The pride shows in your language. This does not mean that I want you to hide your thoughts or express them in carefully chosen words. I like you to write as you feel. According to me it is your virtue that you let me see you as you are both inwardly and outwardly. If you were to write with unnatural self-control, I would be helpless and unable to advise or admonish you.

I cannot teach you to become humble as a dust particle. If one understands what God is, one naturally feels like that. That understanding will come to you in its own time.

Nor do I mean that you do not have to endure many things from others. But the fact that you can wipe out all that in a moment makes me unhappy.

You believe that an atmosphere of prejudice against you has been created around me. You are mistaken in this. Sardar is certainly not against you. Do not take his humour as a sign of his being against you. I do not at all feel that Mahadev is against you either. What Chhaganlal has said against you is nothing new. He knows your worth, but says that till you can control your tongue you should be entrusted with no responsibility. This is his old complaint. You should know that I rarely talk with my three companions. There is, except for a little joking at meal times or during walks, no time for any discussion. We rarely talk about anybody unless there is an occasion to do so. With all my work, I never feel in a mood for talking about other things, nor could I waste my time in idle discussions. I have hardly been able to discuss even the painful episode of . . .1 and . . .2. I have contented myself with the briefest exchange of views. There is no atmosphere of prejudice against you around me, nor is there any such prejudice in my mind. If I admonish you rather harshly, it is because I regard you as my daughter and want to see you perfect. Why, then, do you feel hurt by my criticism? You may accept such of it as you think worth accepting and forget the rest. For it is perfectly possible that my criticism may be based on ignorance and that I may not have correctly understood what you said.

It is quite true that different people may see the same thing differently. We daily observe that the same energy or strength is used in different ways.

I do feel that no woman should be asked by others to do any routine work during her menses. Nobody can know when she may be

1 The names have been omitted.
2 ibid
having a pain. It would be best not to burden a woman with any work during such a period. She may do of her own free will whatever work she feels inclined to do. Some women feel nothing during menstruation and go on doing their work as usual. Some others feel unbearable pain. Some don’t feel any pain, but can do no physical work. A woman who spends the period in the right manner gains fresh energy every month. Those three or four days are for getting back lost strength, and for that the woman should be left free from all responsibility. She should be free to lie down if she wants to. Some ignorant women do not lay aside their hectic domestic work even during that period, not knowing the harm which they do themselves.
They should be properly advised. On the whole, therefore, I like Lakshmidas’s suggestion.

What you say about Kisan is possible. I was very glad to learn that she had recovered. She seems to have waited for my reply to her letter. But I do not remember having not replied to any of her letters.

I have already written to you about your slivers.

You will not lose weight by living on unboiled milk. If you eat boiled vegetables once a day, I am sure you will benefit. Probably your throat needs them; I think it does unboiled milk. Why not try?

426. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

April 13, 1933

MY DEAR CHARLIE.

You will see in this week’s Harijan a reply¹ to your difficulty about the fast. I shall anxiously await your criticism. The story of Nineveh came into my hands quite accidentally, but it fitted in so well
I thought.

In your letter of 22nd March you have asked a question about Dr. Subbaroyan’s Bill. As soon as I got the Bill I felt the difficulty about a fair majority myself and I brought it up to Rajagopalachari’s notice. I had suggested too an amendment even to the extent of three-fourths majority being required, because my idea always has been that unless the majority is a very decisive majority, the big reform contemplated could not work satisfactorily, and you must have seen how I have contemplated meeting the objection even of a minority of one, because what might be superstition to me may be a matter of life and death to that minority of one. His particular temple might be all-in-all to him and it might be his absolute faith that the temple will be no good to him if he had to offer worship side by side with a Harijan. But all these things are to be done when the proper time arrives. I have discussed them publicly too, but I do not want to reopen the discussion because nobody thinks of it just now. But you can have the assurance and give it to those who need it that when the Bill reaches the Committee stage an amendment for a decisive majority will certainly be carried, and any other amendment that might satisfy the sanatanists and that could leave the principle intact will most decidedly be accepted.

Mahadev has not yet made any guess about the name you have for me. I have no doubt that you have many names and not only one.

Thangai naturally would want to say nothing to me about your capacity for taking in dates because she knows that there at least I could always beat you and not by a bare majority.

About under-stamping of the envelope, there was no economy, false or otherwise, possible for us. Not having been ever a prisoner, you evidently fancy that we are free to do as we like even to the extent of putting on stamps. You may then know that stamps are not affixed by us. They are affixed in the prison office.

Love from us all.

Yours sincerely,

Mohan

427. LETTER TO PRINCESS EFY ARISTARCHI

April 13, 1933

I have your two letters.

You often ask me to pray for you, pray for your mother. Up to now I have never said anything about this. But today I feel tempted to put my position before you. Though I believe in temples, I do not visit them nowadays, and, as you know, the temple at the Ashram has the sky above as the roof and mother earth as the floor. The walls consist of the four directions. And in this temple there are no prayers offered for friends. The morning and the evening prayers consist of set verses in Sanskrit and hymns from a composite hymn book in Gujarati, Hindi, Bengali, Marathi, Urdu and English, the latter only when there is someone who can sing English hymns. My response therefore to requests from friends for intercessory prayers consists simply in there and then silently commending them to God. I do not know that this would be considered at all an adequate response. But I can truthfully do no otherwise. Prayer to God with me has a different meaning perhaps from the ordinary. He needs no asking. He reads our hearts even as we do not read them. He anticipates our demands and wishes. He knows what is good for us much better than we do. He has no hesitation in summarily rejecting our wishes and desires which in His estimation are unlawful. Having all this belief in me I have not the heart to approach Him with special prayers and hence there is not that definite asking as there is with so many Christian friends, and even Hindu friends. I do not want to imply that what I am doing is better than, say, what you are doing. Each one approaches God after his own manner and each manner is equally acceptable to Him if it proceeds from the heart. I thought that I would just say this much in answer to all the love you are pouring on me.

Yours,

428. LETTER TO AGATHA HARRISON

April 13, 1933

MY DEAR AGATHA,

I am not acknowledging all your letters, because I give you a long printed letter unfailingly every week.

Sastri’s letter notwithstanding, of course you are going to write naturally and not think of grammar.¹

Like his economy, Andrews’s purdah is a fraud. He pretends that he needs quiet for his writing and sits down to write in the midst of bustle and produces quiet from within.

I hope you have been visiting Vithalbhai Patel in his illness, and therefore I expect to hear from you about his condition. Brief cable messages published in the Press show that he is sinking. We are all anxious about him.

I hear from Mira every week. She is keeping fairly well. Mahadev will be leaving us shortly. Devdas is in Benares with Malaviyaji, and Pyarelal is in the Nasik Jail. I have not heard from him.

Love from us both.

April 13, 1933

DEAR SISTER,

I must answer your latest letter. Your account of your visit to Geneva is most interesting and I am glad that you made so many acquaintances.

And now you want me to give you an Indian name. There was a meaning in Mirabehn asking for an Indian name, having physically cast in her lot with Indians, but what is the meaning of your wanting an Indian name? Nobody will address you by that name. I therefore think that you should give up this desire for having an Indian name. It is enough that you have an Indian heart.

I hope that the quiet you were contemplating to have did you good. Of course the real thing is to find one’s quiet from within. Then and then only are we quite safe.

432. LETTER TO MARGARETE SPIEGEL

April 13, 1933

MY DEAR MARGARETE,

Your letter of 20th March is disturbing. Everything done in a hurry generally proves unsatisfactory when it is not positively harmful. All haste must be deprecated. From the highest standpoint, and that is the only one I am sure which you want to apply to yourself, your coming will be justified only when you are ready for the Ashram life. That clearly you are not. Your immediate duty is to be by your mother’s side. You cannot risk bringing her to India. If you are thrown out of employment and have to be in search of one, you have to courageously stand by your people and suffer the hardships that they will have to suffer, and if you have imbibed the fundamentals of the Ashram life, you might even render inestimable help to them. All your letters to 24 people in India, therefore, to get you a job should not have been written. You do not want a job in India, but you want to give your free service, the whole of yourself, to India. You cannot do two contrary things at the same time. I wish therefore you would give up the idea of the job, remain there by your mother’s side and live the Ashram life there, so that if God wills it, He will send you some day to the Ashram.

MY DEAR MUNSHIJI,

I thank you for your letter of the 5th instant and a copy of the report produced by the Committee appointed by the Allahabad Branch of the Servants of Untouchables Society.

You will be glad to know that I began reading the report as soon as I received it. I finished reading it today. It was received yesterday. Your letter came in today. As I hope to deal with the report in the pages of the Harijan, 1 I do not think I need say anything in this letter.

Two things, however, I must say here which I would not want to say in dealing with the report publicly. If the figures of the population and some other necessary figures were given and the report was condensed to half the size, it would become a valuable document. I should omit the appendices. If such a condensation is possible and if you could publish it, I have no doubt that it would be a guide for the workers, and possibly to the other municipalities.

I shall hope that as a result of the report you will take effective steps to destroy the inhumanly insanitary quarters described in the report and procure a better residential site for the Harijans.

May your friendship remain unbroken. I have shown the way of preserving it. It is self-evident that personal friendship cannot last for ever. April 13, 1933

CHI. JAMNADAS,

I got your letter. You have described things very vividly. It is of course a hard task, but persist in your efforts. Don’t worry about the result. You should not worry if the temple is situated at some distance. Actually there will be an advantage in having it at some distance. Though very few Harijans may visit it now, large crowds of them will visit it by and by if there is a school, etc., attached to it. One may take the children to the temple for darshan in the evening. And the elders might visit it on holidays. For example, Jagannath and Bhutnath temples were at one time considered to be far way. They are probably considered quite near now. So let this new temple also be thought distant. The temple should stand on a large plot of land. According to me, even ten acres would not be enough.

I feel worried about your bad health. There is a connection between it and your mind. You alone can cure it. You should do so. I want you to do so.

I should like you to write to me more frequently, so that I might be kept acquainted with your work and the state of your mind.

437. LETTER TO NANALAL K. JASANI

_April 13, 1933_

BHAI NANALAL,

I have your letter. I have been thinking a great deal about this matter. I think Ratilal has consented only to a division of the property. Chhaganlal need not be blamed. He has no control over his mind at all, and so Maganlal is naturally afraid. If the property is divided, something at least may be saved. If it is kept undivided, there is a danger of all of it being lost. If my first suggestion is accepted and implemented, the property may remain undivided, but nobody seems inclined to accept it. It was that all the three brothers should keep away for five years and leave the management of the property to trustees, accepting for themselves fixed allowances. More when we meet.

Jamnadas seems to be a fine worker. He seems to be managing the branch office there admirably. If he has produced the same impression on you, please relieve his anxiety about money. He has been worrying so much that it has told on his health.

438. LETTER TO SUBHADRA, SARALA AND JAYADEVI

_April 13, 1933_

CHI. SUBHADRA, SARALA AND JAYADEVI,

How can I say to you, you will reap as you sow? The sanatanists say: ‘The Harijans reap as they sow. How can we commit the sin of helping them to improve their condition in disregard of that law?’ If I were to apply the sanatanists’ logic to you, I would have to demolish... the little nest I have built for the Harijans. Since I can’t do that, you are safe. According to the sanatanists’ idea of justice, since you wrote your letter with a lead pencil, I should reply with a pencil made of stone, shouldn’t I? But our aim is to win over even the sanatanists. But you have shown that you deserve Nandubehn’s description of you.†
As soon as you were out, you showed your nature. You started straight away drinking leaf-water. And dry leaves at that!‡ I must say Chinese bullocks are better than Kathiawari bullocks. They also drink leaf-water but the leaves are green. If you again run away to the cattle-pen in a huff, Sardar is generous and will forgive your getting angry and so you need not be afraid.

In one sense the description given by Nandubehn seems to be perfectly apt. Has anybody ever heard of cows, bullocks, horses and other animals worrying? If animals had knowledge, they would be no less than yogis. It is said that yoga is extremely difficult for men to practise, but that it is part of women’s nature. If a woman gives up ignorant attachment, she could easily be a yogini. But all of you are only learned animals!!! Remember that if you squander away the health cultivated in the yoga school by eating all kinds of sweets, you will deserve to be punished for that.

In your next letter describe some other doings of yours, namely,
what you read, etc.

I am helpless about Manibebeh. I write to her, but she does not get my letters. After all there must be some indications that one is a prisoner.

Kevalrambhai and my elder brother were of the same age. Both were liberal and extravagant. They both loved luxuries and comforts.
In their old age, both of them lost interest in worldly pleasures and pursuits. They wrote to me, independently of each other, that they wished to join me in South Africa and spend the rest of their life there and hand over their children to my care. I gladly welcomed their desire and made preparations to receive them. But fate was unkind to me. They left me. I never got my elder brother’s children under my care, though I tried hard to get them. But I got all of you without trying. Shall we attribute this to fate ruling human relations, or to the ripening of the fruit of our deeds in past lives? Now that you have

439. A LETTER

April 13, 1933

I read your whole letter. Your sentiments are pure, but I do not at all possess the power you attribute to me. I too am a sinful being like others but am eager to see God face to face and striving to that end. I certainly wish that God may grant long life to you and your husband, inculcate a sacred spirit of service in you both and enrich your mutual and pure love. Please regard this letter as meant for you both. Hence I am not writing a separate letter to your husband.

They must also side by side guide and induce the sweepers to improve their own condition. It will be for the sevaks to see in what ways their condition can be improved. In short, individual acquaintance with the sweepers is necessary. To do this devoted and efficient sevaks are required.

442. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA
April 14, 1933

MY DEAR GHANSHYAMDAS,

I have your letter of the 10th instant about the Titaghar Paper Mill. Our letters must have crossed. I have given my firm opinion that we cannot take in advertisements at all, as a special favour, but if you hold different views about the conduct of the Harijan and would open the Harijan for receiving advertisements in general, that would be a different proposition, and I would not resist it if you came to the conclusion that advertisements should be received. As you know, I hold strange but fixed views about advertisements even in the ordinary newspapers, but these views cannot become a decisive factor

1 The Government’s sanction for the despatch of the cable was not received till the afternoon of the 19th by which date the addressee had been sent to Vienna for treatment. Gandhi therefore did not send it. Vide “Letter to Home Secretary, Government of Bombay”, 19-4-1933, where, however, the date given is April 13.

2 Kamalapat Singhania, a leading industrialist of Kanpur in the conduct of a big movement like ours, but I am quite certain that we could never defend a policy of taking one advertisement by way of exception.

Do you want me to take notice of the Rs, 3,000 received from Lala Kamalapat?

As to Ramanand Sannyasi¹, I understand what you say. I simply wanted to know whether you had found any reason to change your opinion about him. Since you still have suspicion I would suggest your sending for him and speaking to him frankly about it. If he is a good sannyasi, he would appreciate your frankness, and you will find it easier to take work from him.

I hope you received my letter² regarding donations from Suvta Devi and Janaki Devi.

April 14, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter. I do not feel as you do about worship of God through idols. You should read what I have written about it in the columns of the Harijan. Then if you wish to argue, you can do so, I have written also about varnashrama. I believe in it as I interpret it. For this also I have to refer you to the columns of the Harijan.

As to intermarriage and inter-dining, I do not regard them as essential for the removal of untouchability. I regard no person as untouchable, but that does not mean that I should be obliged to inter-dine with that particular person or have intermarriage relations with him. These stand on a different footing altogether. We

446. LETTER TO DIWAKAR SINGH

April 14, 1933

DEAR DIWAKAR,

I have your postcard. If you have resumed street-cleaning you will, I hope, stick to it quite undemonstratively, but I am going to write presently on the plague spots of Allahabad, and I would like you to read my article¹ when it appears in the Harijan, and devote your attention to that work. I shall be quite patient with you so long as you continue to work.

Perhaps you do not know what has happened to N. I feel that I should tell you at this stage what impression she left upon me ultimately. During my conversations with her I found that she was not leading a straight and moral life even whilst she was working at scavenging in Bangalore. But she seemed to me to be truly repentant. She has now thrown her lot completely with Harijans, has given up the gay life entirely and is living as much as possible like a Harijan in a Harijan village near Chitaldrug in obscurity and lives on such food as is brought to her. She has her son with her. She is supposed to be living under my guidance. I have no reason to suspect her. Her letters to me are quite satisfactory. But it is too early yet to say how she will ultimately develop. I am saying this to you because it was agreed between us that at least those who had come in contact with her should know generally about the sins of her immediate past.

MY DEAR HARJI,

I have a letter from a correspondent in Bulandshahr who says that in common with the reduction in the wages of the general staff by its Municipal Board, the scavengers also have come in for the reduction. This latter have struck against the reduction. As it is, their wages are, the correspondent contends, low enough. The Chairman of the Board does not listen to the scavengers’ complaint at all. On the face of it, the correspondent’s letter appears to me to be reasonable. Will you please enquire and do whatever is possible?

MY DEAR HARIBHAU PHATAK.

My claim to be a servant of Harijan, of Daridranarayana, has yet to be established, and I freely admit that my food is undoubtedly one of the obstacles to the successful establishment of my claim. But you should know that I do not spend anything on my food. Here it is the costly Government assisted by spendthrift friends who supply me with my food, but the fact that somebody else spends a lot of money over my food is no defence, nor perhaps is it any defence that the goat’s milk and the fruit that I take are a medical need for the body. I know that there are thousands, if not millions, whose bodies too would be pronounced to be in medical need of the kind of food that I am taking. But they have no doctors who would issue such certificates to them, and if they happen to get such a doctor, neither this Government nor our millionaires would supply them with the food that I receive.

I am an out-and-out believer in the doctrine of swadeshi, but I flatter myself with the belief that my swadeshi is not a narrow doctrine. I will take from the whole world what I cannot and do not produce in India profitably in terms of the millions. Therefore I do not hesitate to take from Arabia its health-giving dates or from Afghanistan its equally health-giving raisins. These are only a few examples of the foreign articles that I use. But my claim to be a votary of swadeshi is well established because I would take the coarsest hand-spun manufactured by Harijans in preference to the finest cloth manufactured in Indian mills.

Yes, poor Pyarelal, knowing my weakness for everything Indian, thought that he had found out dates in his paradise, the Punjab, and he did find them. These were expensive enough for those who sent them, but I had to pay nothing for them. I took them whilst they lasted at the expense of Arabia, but the latter won the day, because the Punjab dates were available only during the season which lasts only two or three months. So, on the whole, Arabia will remain the victor with me.

1 The addressee in a letter dated April 13 had expressed his agitation over hearing sarcastic remarks from friends regarding gandhiji’s diet, its cost and its indigenous quality. He wanted gandhiji’s assurance on this matter in order in answer such attacks.
because I do not propose to deny myself the dates which my body needs and by taking which I deprive no date-grower in India. I cannot give you the name of the agents because Pyarelal could not get the names, for he interested a friend of his in procuring the Punjab dates.

I am glad that the Poona Municipality has passed Sjt. Pashankar’s resolution throwing open all public reservoirs to the Harijans.

450. LETTER TO G. RAMACHANDRA RAO

April 14, 1933

MY DEAR RAMACHANDRA,

I have your letter. I wish you every success in producing an Indian Tuskegee.¹ I knew much about Booker T. Washington even when I was in South Africa and I have great regard for him. You have kept before you a worthy model, but you cannot be an Indian Booker T. Washington. Only a Harijan can be that. Therefore you have to devote yourself, might and main, to the task of producing from among Harijans a prototype of Booker T. Washington. May you succeed.

You have established your right to beg, but have you established beyond doubt your fitness for making donations yield a thousandfold fruit? I want you to be foolish enough, if that is the word you would have, to do that.

Yes, I used the ghee that was specially prepared by Lady Thackersey to the last drop, and you will be glad to know that I was free of salt during the bulk of that time. Some time after I went back to salt and did not call for more ghee when I found that neither the massage nor the saltless produced the slightest impression on the elbows. I went back to salt because I was developing a queer kind of headache. I imputed it, perhaps quite wrongly, to the omission of salt. Curiously enough, the restoration of salt eased the headaches. Whether this was an accident or a result of the return to salt, not perhaps even

CHI. RAMA,

It was only today that I could read Dr. Patel’s\(^1\) letter to Sardar. According to it, there is nothing serious in your condition. If an operation is found necessary, there will be no risk in it whatever. Let me know how much pain you suffer in the arm just now. There is no harm in moving the arm if you do it slowly. There is no fear of the arm becoming limp. That may be the ultimate result if the condition is neglected. But the trouble has been diagnosed. Hence there is no cause for worry. You should give a little exercise to the arm every day. Give me all details in every letter. I hope you are cheerful.

454. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 14, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I have your postcard.

Read my letter to Ramji. In his postcard there are sentences such as, “The stomach kicks at the head”, etc., and he asked for permission to put everything before Rajbhoj. I have told him that he could do as he wished. I simply cannot understand what has happened to him. Has he lost his reason? From his behaviour I do feel sometimes that he has. He suspects everybody, even his relations.

You will find with this letters to Dr. Sharma and Rajbhoj. Discuss with Dr. Sharma the whole problem of constipation. I hope the cracks in the skin on Amina’s thighs have disappeared.

You certainly cannot pay Manilal’s bills from the Ashram money. Who has provided Rs. 300 to Devdas? I hope he has not been given the sum from the Ashram. The Ashram funds cannot to be used for private purposes.

What did the doctor tell Kusum? That her motions do not stop is not a good sign. She will continue to be treated by Dr. Talwalkar, but do get her examined by Dr. Sharma also. We should know his opinion.

Keshu is trying to find a job.

[PS.]

I have read Dr. Patel’s letter to Vallabhbhai regarding Ramabehn. If he has come to more definite conclusion now, let me know. The arm was to be X-rayed. What happened about that? If it is necessary to pay Rs. 15 for that, it may be desirable even to do so. Follow the doctor’s advice. There is no urgent need for an operation. It seems that she has no difficulty in using the arm for light work. A letter for Ramabehn also is enclosed.

455. A LETTER

April 14, 1933

I feel that you should accept L.’s conditions without any hesitations. After all he is your husband. There is nothing degrading in pacifying his wounded feelings. By doing that you will rise not in your eyes only but in the eyes of God too. Moreover by not disregarding him you will definitely be able to win back his love. In friendship one does not have any right over the other. Husbands and wives are more than friends. That you follow different paths today should not affect your relations. Be calm and everything will be all right. The welfare of the children should be the highest consideration and it will be most looked after if you do not insist on anything. Even after doing this you have to remain satisfied. You want to see the children not for your happiness but for their well-being. Banish from your mind the thought of resorting to law and courts. I hope you understand what I say. Don’t you? May God help and guide you.

456. NOT MERELY BY BIRTH

The following three verses from Madame Wadia’s instructive address delivered the other day will bear reproduction in these pages, though they have been often quoted and published:

Listen to these words of Yudhishtira in the “Vanaprava” of the Mahabharata:

“Truth, charity, forgiveness, good conduct, gentleness, austerity and mercy, where these are seen, O King of the Serpents, there is a Brahmin. If these marks exist in a Shudra and are not in a Dvija, the Shudra is not a Shudra, nor the Brahmin a Brahmin.”

And in the Vishnu-Bhagavata we read:

“What is said as to the marks of conduct indicative of a man’s caste, if those marks are found in another, designate him by the caste of his marks (i.e., not of his body and birth).”

But some of you would prefer Manusmriti. Well, here you are. “As a wooden elephant, as a leathern deer, such is an unlearned Brahmin; these three bear only names. The Brahmin, who, not having studied the Vedas, labours elsewhere, becomes a Shudra in that very life together with his descendants.”
These and numerous other verses from the Shastras unmistakably show that mere birth counts for nothing. A person must show corresponding works and character to establish his claim by birth. Such verses also enforce the argument that

(a) a person loses varna by failing to exhibit its peculiar characteristics,

(b) inter-varna marriage or inter-dining, whatever virtue the restrictions on them may have, does not affect a person’s varna, at least not so much as the failing to live up to one’s varna,

(c) birth, while it gives a start and enables the parents to determine the training and occupation of their children, does not perpetuate the varna of one’s birth, if it is not fulfilled by works.

_Harijan_, 15-4-1933

457. SECOND HARIJAN DAY

The first Harijan Day was observed on 18th December last. Sjt. Amritlal Thakkar has been most anxious for the fixing of another Harijan Day, but I have been putting it off because of my want of faith. Thakkar Bapa was satisfied with the work done on 18th December. I was not. The fixing of a special day can only be warranted by extraordinary effort. In a sacred cause like the Harijan cause, a special day should be one of greater dedication, prayer and intensive work. Consultation with Thakkar Bapa has infected me with his hope. The last Sunday of this month has been chosen as the day of observance.

I should divide the day somewhat after this style:

1. I should begin the day from 5 a.m. with prayer and set apart for the cause some money or cloth or grain according to my means. The poorest can do this by denying themselves a meal or meals or a portion thereof without feeling the slightest deprivation. Preferably donations in kind should be converted into cash. Where this is not possible, they should be given to the most deserving and needy Harijans.

2. The work of the family Bhangi, if there is any, should be wholly done by the family or at least shared with him. This will enable one to understand the nature of the service that the Bhangi performs and may also lead to an improved method of performing such services. Not many persons have any consideration for the ‘knight of the broom’ at the time of using the sanitary conveniences. If we had no untouchability in us and if we even occasionally shared the work with the Bhangis, we would have a different method of working the home sanitary system.

3. Having done these two things, we are ready for the corporate effort for the day, which should open with house-to-house collection of donations in cash or kind. This work should be finished by a given hour. The donations should be handed to the local committee, which will in its turn hand the collection to the superior committee till it reaches the headquarters of the Province. Collectors should take with them a judicious selection of literature including leaflets, pamphlets, books and even copies of Harijan, English or vernacular edition as may be required. The literature should be sold or given away as the exigency of the moment may require. But each committee should bear the cost of the literature ordered by it. If extra copies of the Harijan are required, previous advice should be given to the publishers so as to enable them to print extra copies.

4. Harijan quarters should be visited in each place and they should be cleaned wherever necessary. Meetings of Harijans should be held and their wants noted. They should be advised as to the part they have to play in the removal of untouchability. Dr. Deshmukh’s authoritative opinion should be used in support of the plea for the giving up of carrion-eating. Children can arrange meetings and excursions for Harijan children. Possibilities of an inauguration of improved methods of sanitation should be explored and wherever possible, the scheme of Sjt. Hiralal Shah should be given effect to. It is neither difficult nor expensive if the people will shoulder the burden willingly. In the end it means a visible addition to the health and wealth of the community.

5. The day should be wound up by a general meeting of both savarnas and Harijans to pass resolutions, pledging the meeting to the removal of untouchability and emphasizing the desirability of permissive legislation regarding temple-entry.

6. Where public opinion is favourable, public wells and private temples should be opened to Harijans.

An accurate report of the work done should be sent to the Central Committee and, if possible, a copy to me to avoid delay in publication. Press messages may be sent to the Editor at press rates.

Harijan, 15-4-1933
458. THINKING ALOUD

Both C. F. Andrews and I have the habit of thinking aloud. Here is a sample from one of his letters:

I have enclosed . . . ’s1 letter because I hardly think you realize how very strong here is the moral repulsion against ‘fasting unto death’. I confess, as a Christian I share it and it is only with the greatest difficulty that I find myself able to justify it under any circumstances. I was convinced at the time last year when in desperation the way seemed open for nothing else and only this one door seemed unclosed. But even then it was an agony to me. I know also that I must bow to God’s will even when it comes in very strange forms. Also I know that it has had its place in the past in Hindu religion and I have to try to understand exactly what it means to a Hindu. All this I am trying very hard to think out. But it has not come out all clear yet.

I felt that it would be good to tell you all this at a time when there is no immediate prospect of such a thing happening. Meanwhile, I am trying to think out the whole matter. I have again and again defended over here your last fast and pointed to its results and to the fact that such a tender conscience as Gurudev’s could see in it only what was great and noble. But in the great effort that you yourself are making (and we are interpreting to the very best of our power) to convert the hearts of Englishmen, whom you love and respect, to side with you and not against you in freeing your country, the following is true:

1. It is easy to get their sympathy with the removal of untouchability. Their hearts are truly touched.
2. It is not easy to get sympathy with the idea of committing suicide by fasting unto death. The horror and repulsion are too great, and the mere threat of such a thing benumbs instead of awakening the conscience.

I know you would love me to tell you all this just now, if I have not told it to you already, because while it is not an immediate issue, I can write calmly.

I publish this letter because it deserves a public reply. I do want every ounce of real sympathy from every part of the world in the very difficult and anxious work of the purification of Hinduism, which, as I have claimed, is in a way purification of the whole human family.

I know the English repulsion to fasting for religious ends and especially ‘fasting unto death’. I should like to own also that even the fast which Deenabandhu Andrews reconciled himself to, though very reluctantly, has had untoward results in India, as I have discovered to my sorrow. Hindus had become delirious and done acts which, when they became sober, they undid. They opened temples and wells to Harijans freely during the fast. Some of these were closed soon after the end of the fast. A very large number of educated caste Hindus in Bengal do sincerely feel that, in the midst of the excitement caused by the fast, a grave injustice was done to Bengal in the allotment of seats to Harijans. I know, too, that in some other Provinces the Yeravda Pact was assented to under the pressure of the fast. All this was bad. I certainly had not anticipated it all when I embarked on the fast. But I do not repent of it. In the first place, the fast was not of my doing. Secondly, though the respective acts were done under the pressure of the fast, they were not in themselves evil. Were they evil, I should move heaven and earth to undo the evil.

1 The name is omitted in the source.

But my purpose just now is to examine, not the effects of the fast, but the fast itself as a necessary part of the Divine scheme. If it is a part of it, it ought not to need elaborate explanations each time it is undertaken.

Although the sanatanists swear at me for the fast, and Hindu co-workers may deplore it, they know that fasting is an integral part of even the present-day Hinduism. They cannot long affect to be horrified at it. Hindu religious literature is replete with instances of fasting, and thousands of Hindus fast even today on the slightest pretext. It is the one thing that does the least harm. There is no doubt that, like everything that is good, fasts are abused. That is inevitable. One cannot forbear to do good because sometimes evil is done under its cover.

My real difficulty is with my Christian Protestant friends, of whom I have so many and whose friendship I value beyond measure. Let me confess to them that, though from my very first contact with them I have known their dislike for fasts, I have never been able to understand it.

Mortification of the flesh has been held all the world over as a condition of spiritual progress. There is no prayer without fasting, taking fasting in its widest sense. A complete fast is a complete and literal denial of self. It is the truest prayer, “Take my life and let it be, always only all for Thee” is not, should be, a mere lip or figurative expression. It has to be a wreckless and joyous giving without the least reservation. Abstention from food and even water is but the mere beginning, the least part of the surrender.

Whilst I was putting together my thoughts for this article, a pamphlet written by Christians came into my hands wherein was a chapter on the necessity of example rather than precept. In this occurs a quotation from the 3rd chapter of Jonah. The Prophet had foretold that Nineveh, the great city, was to be destroyed on the fortieth day of his entering it.

So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them. For word came unto the king of Nineveh, and he arose from his throne, and he laid his robe from him, and covered him with sackcloth, and sat in ashes. And he caused it to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh by the decree of the king and his nobles, saying, 'Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste anything: let them not feed, nor drink water: but let man and beast be covered with sackcloth, and cry mightily unto God: yea, let them turn everyone from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands. Who can tell if God will turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not?' And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented of the evil, that He had said that He would do unto them; and He did it not.

Thus this was a ‘fast unto death’. But every fast unto death is not suicide. This fast of the king and the people of Nineveh was a great and humble prayer to God for deliverance. It was to be either deliverance or death. Even so was my fast, if I may compare it to the Biblical fast. This chapter from the book of Jonah reads like an incident in the Ramayana.

It is only proper that friends should know my fundamental position. I have a profound belief in the method of the fast, both private and public. It may come again any day without any warning even to me. If it comes, I shall welcome it as a great privilege and a joy.

Untouchability is a big sin. It may not be washed without the blood of many servants. But they will have to be fit instruments. The occasion will come to me if I am found worthy for the sacrifice. I would like my friends to rejoice in it, if it comes. They should neither be repelled nor unnerved.

_Harijan_, 15-4-1933
459. AN IMPATIENT WORKER

An earnest but impatient worker has been trying to have temples and public places thrown open to Harijans. He had some success but nothing to be proud of. In his impatience, therefore, he writes:

It is no use waiting for these orthodox men to make a beginning. They will never move unless compelled to do so. Drastic steps are required to wipe of untouchability. I therefore beg you to kindly favour me with your opinion if satyagraha at the entrance of the temples by workers and Harijans preventing orthodox persons from entering the temples will be an effective method. Appeals and entreaties have produced no effect, and to lose more time on these will, in my humble opinion, be sheer waste of valuable time.

Such blocking the way will be sheer compulsion. And there should be no compulsion in religion or in matters of any reform. The movement for the removal of untouchability is one of self-purification. No man can be purified against his will. Therefore, there can be no force directly or indirectly used against the orthodox. It should be remembered that many of us were like the orthodox people before our recognition of the necessity of the removal of untouchability. We would not then have liked anybody to block our way to the temples, because we in those days believed, no doubt wrongly as we now think, that Harijans should not be allowed to enter temples. Even so may we not block the way of the orthodox to the temples.

I should also remind correspondents that the word ‘satyagraha’ is often most loosely used and is made to cover veiled violence. But as the author of the word I may be allowed to say that it excludes every form of violence, direct or indirect, veiled or unveiled, and whether in though, word or deed. It is breach of satyagraha to wish ill to an opponent or to say a harsh word to him or of him with the intention of harming him. And often the evil thought or the evil word may, in terms of satyagraha, be more dangerous than actual violence used in the heat of the moment and perhaps repented and forgotten the next moment. Satyagraha is gentle, it never wounds. It is never fussy, never impatient, never vociferous. It is the direct opposite of compulsion. It was conceived as a complete substitute for violence.

Nevertheless, I fully agree with the correspondent that ‘most drastic steps are required to wipe off untouchability’. But these steps have to be taken against ourselves. The orthodox people sincerely believe that untouchability, as they practise it, is enjoined by the Shastra and that great evil will befall them and Hinduism if it was removed. How is one to cope with this belief? It is clear that they will never change their belief by being compelled to admit Harijans to their temples. What is required is not so much the entry of Harijans to the temples as the conversion of the orthodox to the belief that it is wrong to prevent Harijans from entering the temples. This conversion can only be brought about by an appeal to their hearts, i.e., by evoking the best that is in them. Such an appeal can be made by the appellants’ prayers, fasting other suffering in their own persons, in other words, by their ever-increasing purity. It has never yet been known to fail. For it is its own end. The reformer must have consciousness of the truth of his cause. He will not then be impatient with the opponent, he will be impatient with himself. He must be prepared even to fast unto death. Not everyone has the right or the capacity to do so. God is most exacting. He exacts humility from His votaries. Even fasts may take the form of coercion. But there is nothing in the world that in human hands does not lend itself to abuse. The human being is a mixture of good and evil, Jekyll and Hyde. But there is the least likelihood of abuse when it is a matter of self-suffering.

460. Rs. 5,000/- FOR DAVID SCHEME

The reader will be glad to learn that Shrimati Suvta Devi, the widow of the late Sheth Ramnarayanji, has sent a cheque for Rs. 2,500/- for the David Scheme. The donor desires that preference should be given to Harijan student from Rajputana, if one possessing the necessary qualifications can be found.

Another cheque for Rs. 2,500/- has been received from Shrimati Janaki Devi, the wife of Sheth Jamnalalji. Her preference is for a Harijan student from C.P., Marathi, failing that, from C.P., Hindustani.

I tender my congratulations to the donors for their donation and hope that their example will be followed by other wealthy persons.¹

I may state that a selection Board is in process of being formed.

DEAR FRIEND,

I went through your letter very carefully as soon as I got it. You should accept my assurance that I want to be convinced. I have no axe to grind on this earth except to find Truth. You insist upon your own interpretation, or call it the orthodox interpretation, and you swear by it. That is quite natural. Others whose learning I do not doubt for one moment swear by their own interpretation. You are doing them an injustice when you say that they do so to please me. I can only tell you what I do know and what I alone can know, and that is this: They are independent men. They are scholars known to fame. They have a character to keep. And many of them were accepted as authority on Shastras before I returned to India from my long exile. It is between these two interpretations that I have to make my choice, guided by such knowledge as I have of the Shastras, both in the original and in translations.

You suggest a meeting of the Pandits representing different schools of thought. Perhaps you do not know that I had such a meeting. I listened to their arguments with the greatest patience and with the utmost respect. I approached my task without any bias. I resist untouchability because I regard it as a great lie. If somebody convinced me that it was a great truth, I would repent of my folly and swear by untouchability. Beyond this I cannot argue.

But before closing I must answer one pointed question that you have put to me. It is only in God that everything melts into one and there is neither virtue nor vice, neither good nor evil, neither sin nor merit, neither happiness nor unhappiness, and if you will, neither truth nor untruth. That is indefinable. But so long as I am in a body I must continue to experience the duality. The obliteration of duality can only exist in my imagination as an intellectual grasp. And if any person were to put forth an opposite claim, I should have no right to question his claim, and I would gladly admit the inferiority of my position. The inferiority would not worry me because it would be in accordance with the Truth as I see it.

Yours sincerely,

CHI. MANILAL,

I have to answer two letters of yours. I had intended to reply to your previous letter, but somehow failed to do so.

I have heard that Pragji has landed in Bombay. But there is no news from him yet.

You have written to Narandas asking him to pay the bills for the press equipment, but how can it be done?¹ It is altogether improper to use Trust funds in such a manner. It would be another thing if Narandas could make some private arrangement. You should have such dealings with the traders directly, or order the goods through traders there or remit the money in advance. I understand your difficulty, but you ought not to adopt an improper course to solve it. Otherwise you will come to grief some day. One should stretch one’s legs according to the covering. It is better to draw in our knees, rather than borrow a covering from somebody else.

I hope all of you have emerged safe from the epidemic of fever there.

Do Pathar and others who come there for change of air meet their own expenses or does the burden fall on you? If it falls on you and if you can shoulder it, of course nothing like it. But if you cannot shoulder it, you should humbly tell them that everybody will have to meet his own expenses. Please know that it is against dharma to do anything beyond one’s means out of a false sense of prestige. We should let ourselves be seen as we are.

I don’t like at all your request to be allowed to shift the press to a city. That will mean that all my ideals are wrong, or that you do not believe in them or cannot live up to them. If any of these alternatives is correct, you should not remain a trustee and should leave Phoenix. You seem even to have forgotten how quickly and with what difficulties I turned my back on city life and established Phoenix. You grew up in Phoenix. It was there you atoned for your errors, lived an independent life. Sita was born there too. That you should forget all this in a moment and think of leaving Phoenix for ever—imagine the weakness and the pitiable condition of mind it

I supported you in one wrong step that you took and invited West’s criticism. That criticism was deserved to some extent. This error was about the insertion of advertisements. I did not like your action, but I did not have the courage to tell you that you could close down Indian Opinion if you wished. I don’t want you to fall further and drag me down with you. I will not let myself be dragged down. If you cannot settle in Phoenix with single-minded devotion and cannot live up to its ideals you should wind up the work. Or you and Sushila should dedicate yourselves exclusively to Phoenix. Instead of being forced to close down the settlement, I should like you to give your resignation to the Trustees and hand over the place to them and then do what you like. I will welcome your leaving Phoenix with your reputation unsullied. I shall not be pained if you do so. But I shall feel deeply pained if you are forced to leave the place in disgrace. Please remember that only recently you borrowed Rs. 10,000 from a public body here and took the money with you. Forget the past completely. Wake up from your slumber. Don’t think that I say all this merely in reply to one suggestion by you and feel hurt. That suggestion reveals your attitude of mind. It is a dangerous one and that is why I caution you against it.

There is Miss Schlesin entertaining beautiful dreams about you, and you are thinking of filthy Durban. You must have sufficient pride in you to be determined that, if you cannot bring glory to your father’s legacy, you will at any rate not disgrace it. Do you know the objects of Phoenix, or have you forgotten them as well? Read them again.

Miss Schlesin’s suggestion is certainly admirable. But I don’t think you will be able to act upon it. Kallenbach will not agree to meet the expenses of a visit to America, and you will not be able to get the money from any other source. And I also think it difficult, if not impossible, that I. O. can be kept up meanwhile. Even if you go to America and return after getting trained, I don’t think patients from all communities will come to Phoenix for nature-cure treatment. All the same, if you have self-confidence and if everything can be arranged, I would certainly like you to act upon the suggestion, for the aim behind it is noble.

I hope Sita has completely recovered now. Take the utmost care of your health.

Read this letter three or four times and then decide your future course. Think over the following questions:

(1) What is the aim in life of you both?

(2) Do you wish to live up to the ideals of Phoenix? Do you have the necessary strength for it?

(3) Can I. O. be made self-supporting?

You may take one thing as certain: We don’t wish to run Phoenix while abandoning its ideals, and I. O. must not be shifted to any other place.

Please don’t take this letter as a rebuke to you, I have written to wake up both of you. Indecision is a very bad thing.

We are quite well. The letter has become too long and I have no time either. So I cannot give any news about things here.

463. LETTER TO SUSHILABEHN GANDHI

April 15, 1933

CHI. SUSHILA,

Since the letter¹ to Manilal is intended for you both, what more can I write in this letter?

You may teach Sita only as much as you can while playing with her and without scolding or beating her. She will imbibe very little from what both of you tell her, but she will certainly follow the example which you set.

Ramdas has not been released yet. He will be released in the beginning of May.

The only change in my diet is that I do not at present take bread and vegetables. Fruit and milk suffice for me. I do not heat the milk. The pain in the elbow persists, but it seems to be only a sign of old age.

I get letters from Ba. She keeps fairly good health.

Of course I have plenty of work every day. I get up at 3 o’clock daily. To make up, I take a nap during the day.

BHAI MUNSHI,

You seem to have decided to write by turns.

How can a Gujarati who does not know about Narmadashankar\(^1\) be called a Gujarati? It was as early as in my childhood that I first came to know about him. I am never tired of singing his poem: “The bugles blow: Let us all go to battle and victory.” The fascination which began then deepened in South Africa. I had by then become a devoted lover of the \textit{Gita}. Narmadashankar’s preface to his translation of the \textit{Gita} deepened my love for it and increased my respect for him. My only regret is that my numerous activities did not permit me to acquire as much knowledge of a writer and poet like Narmadashankar as I should have liked to do.

I hope you don’t expect from me more than this just now. Even this little I have been able to write to you because I got up at 3 o’clock in the morning.

To dedicate one’s life to the service of Harijans is indeed difficult; it is still more difficult to become fit to die for them. How demanding is Satyanarayana\(^2\)! How finicky He is. He would have spotlessly pure sheep, the very best pumpkin, the heads of sinless men, and how are we to get them for Him? For, He would reject one for a single impure thought that might cross one’s mind !! Still it is impossible to leave Him. So jealous is that Poet of poets that He simply would not let me worship any other poet. To whom may I complain about this?

I assume that your pain has completely disappeared.

I hope Jagadish is improving.

Now about the Kabibai Trust.\(^3\) I have gone through all the papers relating to it. My reading of it is that there can be no objection to taking in Harijans if room is left after the so-called “high class” Hindus have been fully provided for. The Trust does not exclude Harijans. However, if all you lawyers so interpret the terms that Harijans should have no place at all even if pupils from “high-class” Hindus do not seek admission to the school in sufficient number and some benches or seats are left vacant, I have nothing to say.

The next issue is a purely educational question. On what type of education is the Trust money to be spent? This is not a subject which can be discussed through letters. I have not been able to convince many people of the correctness of my views on education. On the one hand I want selfless teachers of the type dreamt of by Gokhale and, on the other, a system of education from which the dying villagers can derive benefit. This country cannot afford to imitate any other country, and so we have got to think independently about our educational problem and devise a plan of our own. However for the present all this is only a fond dream of mine. And you also have no time just now to think about this subject.

I am progressing in your books only at a snail’s pace. But I have kept up my reading. Have you seen the tiny cart driven by the tiny Ahmedabad bullock? The speed of that bullock would put the Aga Khan’s race horse to shame, and it is at that speed that Sardar has been reading your books. Let me admit that we have a motive behind all this, as we wish to take plenty of services from both of you. Shouldn’t we fully know those from whom we expect so much?

You can know from this that we often think and talk about you.

465. INTERVIEW TO KIKABHAI AND DUDABHAI

[On or before April 16, 1933]

I will fast again if the Hindu community does not do justice to you. As you are backward in education, you might avail [yourselves] of any school including Government which is open to you.

After long discussion of several subjects Gandhiji concluded by saying that after all untouchability was fast disappearing, and would be a thing of the past shortly.

The Bombay Chronicle, 17-4-1933

2 The newspaper report carries the date April 16.
3 The interviewer had suggested that Gandhiji should not again fast unto death as it reflected discredit on Harijans.
466. TWO SAMPLES

Shri Chhotalal Pandit, representative of the Harijan Sevak Sangh of Kadi area, writes:¹

There is also another letter of this type. Its writer is a public worker but is not at present connected with Harijan work. I give the following extract from his letter:²

These two are but samples of the letters I receive from British Gujarat. I get accounts of similar experiences from Kathiawar too. After returning from her tour of Kathiawar, Smt. Vijayalakshmibehn³ called on me and gave me an account of her experiences. These too had the dark side in good measure. She could do some work because of her ability. But there was no end of difficulties. Nobody, therefore, should believe that the foregoing letters are exceptions. Gujaratis alone will read the Harijanbandhu, hence, apart from a handful of Gujaratis outside Gujarat, the rest of the country will believe that the description given in the two letters is mild compared to the true position.

Nevertheless, I refuse to believe that these pictures are without a silver-lining. God never created a cloud without a silver-lining. Darkness only means absence of life. In a vast, clear, diamond-studded sky, the clouds are no bigger than an atom as it were. And yet these clouds almost spell death to creatures extremely smaller than themselves living below on the earth. This is the condition of Harijan work at present. It seems that the clouds of their bitter experiences fill Harijan workers with despair. But says Narasinh Mehta:

When the gods were in trouble,
They remembered Him who dwells in us all,
Shri Krishna came to their rescue,

¹ & ² The letters are not translated here. The first correspondent had stated that sometimes the activities of Harijan workers themselves resulted in hardships to the Harijans. For example three Harijan children were admitted to a school for caste Hindus, on the correspondent’s initiative. For this the caste Hindus took the Harijans to task and made them give an undertaking that they would not thereafter send their children to such schools, and the teacher who had admitted the Antyaja children was fined.

³ The second correspondent had said that despite all the efforts of Gandhiji and the Servants of Untouchables Society, little progress was made in the removal of untouchability.

Narasinh Mehta’s Lord.

This also is a statement of experience. All who read this bhajan can see that the poet did not write this simply to make a good song, but that he could not help singing the truth which he wished to describe. Moreover, such experience was not Narasinh’s alone. It has been the experience of all the world’s saints. That is why one of the descriptions of God is Bhidabhanjan¹. This is a fight for dharma. We have staked our very lives on it. Hence the first thing I want to say is that workers should not lose heart but rest confident that at the critical moment God will definitely help them.

But this faith should not be weak or ignorant. Out of it must spring tremendous energy. Where a thinking man’s reason is paralysed, he who has faith can see the path through it. Where others’ eyes see nothing, the eyes of faith see as clearly as in daylight. Such a person never admits defeat, and even his resting will be for strength. It will be a sign that he will resume work with much greater energy than before. His fast will not be an expression of despair, but a sacred means of being able to live more fruitfully.

Hence my request to all men and women workers is this: Do not get angry with sanatanists and do not goad frightened Harijans. Fire-fighters do not direct water at a house which they think cannot be saved but they direct it at neighbouring buildings within the range of the flames so as to prevent the fire from spreading and thus to check its fury. It cannot live on without food from the neighbourhood, and so as soon as the area around is rendered safe, the fire dies out by itself. Similarly where the Harijans have some strength at least and are ready to accept direct help they should be given such help. One should not work where they are not so ready, but should work in nearby areas where the Harijans are more or less ready. The work done among them cannot but have effect in the other place where the Harijans seem to have no life in them.

Even in that place, however, one should certainly try to plead with the sanatanists. There will hardly be a single village which will not have even one person who loves Harijans. One can establish contact with that village through him.

Let us take the case of the school mentioned above. That the Harijan children left it, does not worry me. It was necessary that they should have joined it. If their parents are willing to entrust the children to us, we should take charge of them and educate them elsewhere. If the teacher is courageous, he should face boycott, if beaten he should put up with the beating, and bring back the Harijan children at the first opportunity. He should reason with the sanatanists. If the teacher has regard for his dharma, he should lay down his life for the sake of those three children who were under his charge. But supposing the teacher does not have so much spirit, then Shri Chhotalal should keep this village in mind and seek opportunities of once again establishing good relations with its sanatanists or Harijans or both. Those opportunities should be sought through service of both. He should seek out their friends and make use of those who carry weight with the respective parties, to awaken the sense of justice of one and removing the fear of the other. In short, while serving in other places, he should not forget either those three children or that village. He should make it his chief aim to protect the former.

Two points emerge from these letters. We have very few men and women workers who are sincere, single-minded and ready even to lay down their lives. A person who has dedicated himself to one task may be said to have dedicated himself to all. He who addresses himself to all tasks is not dedicated even to one. His condition is like that of a man living with a woman without marrying her. We have not properly understood this great truth. If we understand it, much of our work would become easy. Without dedicated workers who are ready to sacrifice their all for the cause of Harijans the blot of untouchability cannot be removed.

The second point is this. I must do what I ask others to do. That is in my nature. I started serving the country by serving Gujarat. I make no distinction among Gujarat, India, and the world. I live my life on the principle that by paying single-minded attention to one we pay attention to all. Non-violent work cannot be opposed to public good. That is the point of view from which this yajna of removal of untouchability is being carried on. When I recount the errors of the sanatanists, they are mine too. I do not regard myself as separate from them. I am impatient to do atonement, but impatience will not help. If I have in me the required purity for such atonement, God will certainly command me to undertake it. I daily pray to God to grant me such purity and the strength to obey His command.

467. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 16, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your letter.

Send Ramabehn to Baroda to be examined by Manekrao. If he undertakes to treat her, let him. If Manekrao does not know what to do in her case, she should come to Poona. There is a vaid here who is a specialist about diseases affecting bones. I will get Ramabehn examined by him and do whatever is necessary. Even ordinary medical help will be available here. If ultimately an operation is found necessary, I will consider whether it should be performed in Ahmedabad or at some other place. It will be better if the children remain there. If they cannot, they may accompany her. Najuklal¹ and others are there in Baroda and I believe that they will look after them. I don’t know what facilities he has in his house. She will be able to stay even at Abbas Saheb’s house. The place is not full just now. I don’t know whether Deshpande Saheb’s house has sufficient accommodation. Ramabehn should go to Baroda after you have written to Manekrao and received his reply. If he is not in Baroda or if he is not ready to undertake the case, she may come to Poona. Here in Poona Prof. Trivedi’s house is open to every visitor. Don’t mind if our debt to him goes on mounting. He likes to be troubled. His house does not seem to be full just now.

My opinion is definitely in favour of giving the machine to Keshu. I haven’t thought about how much he should be charged. You and Keshu alone can know that. I think that breakages and other charges also should be debited.

Madhavji’s letter is excellent. He, too, has written to Calcutta and asked them to send the children to the Ashram.

I follow what you say regarding Jeki’s sons. I have got the impression that they are well-behaved.

And now your problem. Our ideal is Rama. There were people who criticized him too. How, then, can you or I hope to be spared? We should learn from the criticism. Chhaganlal’s criticism and suggestions are enclosed with this. Most of the suggestions are old. If you think Premabehn will be able to read without being upset what he has written about her, let her read it.

¹ Najuklal Choksi, son-in-law of Lakshmidas P. Asar
I think that his suggestion about . . . is improper. Nobody can tell a father how he should treat his daughter. I have sent Chhaganlal’s criticism as it is without making any corrections because I thought it would be better for you to know what is in his mind. There are other things which seem to me to need correction but the letter would become too long if I did so. I did not know Chhaganlal outside jail as closely as I have come to know him here. I am sure that he is a man of transparent sincerity and tries to cultivate the spirit of renunciation, but he is a child. His intellect is not well developed. His power of observation is very imperfect, he does not possess a methodical mind, his memory, too, is weak, and his mind wanders after too many things so that his capacity for concentration is limited. And he is not aware of all these limitations of his. All the same, he is very eager to improve himself and to grow. He has no ill-will against anybody, but because of an imperfectly developed intellect his conclusions are one-sided and erroneous. I don’t think this analysis is mine only, though I have not discussed these impressions with anybody, except a little with Kaka. I have not told Chhaganlal what I think about him. He will know that for the first time from this letter. It became necessary to say it today because I don’t want you to form a wrong opinion about him. You may detect ill will in his remarks. But if you can you may trust that my observation of him is correct. If you do so, you will be able to see something in his criticism and suggestions which is worth accepting. In any case do give me your replies to his criticisms and suggestions. If you wish to show them to other co-workers, I will not object, though I don’t see any need for that.

You are working as a secretary because I believe that you possess many of the virtues, and possess them in good measure, which you would like to have. I am not in the least dissatisfied with your work. My opinion about you remains unchanged, and I would be surprised if others have not formed the same impression that I have. N. says in his letter that he has not. Chhaganlal thinks that others, too, have not. But nobody has complained to me.

However, as I write this, I think of Bhagwanji. His complaint had produced no effect on me. I know his nature very well. But we should listen to persons on whom we have produced an unfavourable impression. We may find it easy to secure the co-operation of those who think well of us, but we learn nothing from them. Only our critics serve us as sentinels. You may, therefore, learn as much from N. as you wish to.

If you think it proper, you may show . . . ’s and . . . ’s letters to Totaramji, Panditji, Narahari, Lakshmidas and Mathuradas, and hear them if they have anything to say. If Totaramji and Panditji offer to take charge, hand it over to them and, if they wish, work under them and look after the accounts. I look upon Totaramji as the fittest person to be regarded as father of the Ashram. We need somebody as a father. We regard the Ashram as a family. If I stayed there, I would consider myself as father of the Ashram. Even if Totaramji does not accept that place, I would not think it improper at all to treat him as one and unhesitatingly follow his advice whenever a difficult problem arises. Lakshmidas possesses all the virtues necessary in a secretary of the Ashram, but I do not know whether at present he can live there. Narahari certainly cannot do so, since he is not free, so far as I know. Chimanlal’s health is much too poor for the task. Mathuradas has still to acquire experience. These are my views about all the co-workers whom I can think of. Vinoba cannot be shifted from Wardha. His responsibility is confined to Wardha. In fact he has left even Wardha and lives in a hamlet of Harijans.\(^3\) He had my full consent for doing that. He may ultimately go and live in a hamlet still more exclusively inhabited by Harijans. You must, therefore, carry on as you are.

I have written all this merely for you to think over. In entrusting the welfare of the Ashram to your care when leaving it, I did not offer you a place of authority but burdened you with responsibility, and the position is still the same. I have observed nothing to persuade me to take away the responsibility from you. Nor can you give it up. You should, therefore, implement only those suggestions of mine which you find acceptable, having due regard to your responsibility. I cannot express any definite opinion from here. Whatever happens to the Ashram, good or ill, you will be the means. We should be thankful that I am permitted to write to you. If I was not permitted, wouldn’t you act according to your own judgment? Therefore always do what seems best to you, regarding my letters and views as of no consequence. My duty is over when I have put before you what I hear and think. I want you to remain unaffected in the midst of all this, in

I have your letter. I do not have much faith in Homoeopathy. But for that you should not postpone your going to a hill-station. I like your idea of going to Almora. There is a good Homoeopath even there. For your ailment, other than the mountain air, milk, butter, fruit, wheat roti and vegetables, you will hardly need any medicine. 469. LETTER TO ASHRAM BOYS AND GIRLS

BOYS AND GIRLS,

You have of late become irregular in writing to me. You must by now have learnt everything or something about . . . `1`. You must know something. Did you learn any lesson from it?

All the persons living in the Ashram are like blood brothers and sisters. If anyone feels even slightly lustful they should immediately confess before their elders. They should take all necessary steps to get rid of the passion.

No one should have any secrets. No one should live in privacy.

`1` The name has been omitted.
No one should dress himself up. One should be simple in body and mind as far as possible. No one should cross the bounds in any way. Only limited liberties should be taken with each other.

I would be glad if you would all write to me your opinions on these things. There is no harm if I have already written this before. It is good to have the memory of such things kept fresh.

470. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 16, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I dispatched a letter to you this morning. I have heard from Gaur Gopal. As he got my letter late, he has decided to go to Puri. I have written to him again and asked him to go to Almora.

I have had no letter at all from Prabhudas. Hasn’t he written to you also? Where is he at present?

Mahadev tells me that Poore’s book is in Maganlal’s collection. I suppose you know that all those books belong to the Ashram. If you find Poore’s book among them, send it to me. The book was also included in the list sent by Purushottam.

If Purushottam has not left for Rajkot and if he can stay on, ask him to do so. Jamna’s treatment is not over and Amina also may need his advice. But you will be better able to decide about this.

Though I did write to you this morning and sent you Chhaganlal’s criticism, I did all that with some hesitation. I felt that your, Chhaganlal’s, mine and the Ashram’s good required that. I thought it desirable that you should know even Chhaganlal’s views in their naked truth, and also that you should know my view of how his intellect works. The verse in the Ishapanishad which tells us that the face of Truth is hidden by a-golden lid echoes in my ears all the time. I feel its truth every moment of my life. We must open that lid. Anyone who can bear that being done will be affected by little else. What anyone believes about us is absolute truth to him. We must have the strength to understand it and face it. This is a form of non-violence.

472. LETTER TO RAMABEHN JOSHI

April 16, 1933

CHI. RAMA,

I got your letter. I have written¹ to Narandas in detail. I have written to him to consult Prof. Manekrao immediately and, if that is not possible, to send you to Poona. There is a bone-setter here too. If he does not succeed, we shall see later about an operation. There is no cause for worry. If it is convenient, you may keep the children in the Ashram, otherwise you may take them with you. We will find some remedy to help Dhiru to grow. I hope there is no burden of work or study on him. Have you ever considered that he may be suffering from . . . ?²

As regards your expenses, Narandas says that, excluding the expenditure on travelling, they work out at the rate of Rs. 16 per month. Probably you do not even know this fact. Eleven rupees are credited to everybody, and there is generally no ground for increasing that figure in a particular case. I see that the expenses of some inmates like you are borne by the Ashram, whether they come to eleven rupees or twenty-one rupees. You are, therefore, not concerned with the figure of eleven. It only reminds us that it is our aim not to exceed it. If you need more ghee or anything else and do not get it, you would certainly be justified in complaining about that. I would, however, request you not to keep back anything but complain frankly to anybody whom you regard as a friend. You will have to deal with Narandas till the end of your life. How can you have reserves with him? We wish to cultivate unity of heart with the whole world. Shall we, then, live with reserves among ourselves who are but a small band?

473. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

April 16, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

I have already written one letter to you. While things on every side are getting confused, I often think of you. I don’t wish to advise you, nor have I the courage now to argue with you. My condition is like that of the Elephant King. Only a little portion of the trunk is now left above the water. If that also sinks, I would be choked to death. I can, therefore, do nothing but pray for all those about whom I keep worrying. But to whom should I pray? He who is ever awake, who never rests even for a moment, who is nearer to us even than our nails and who bears and sees everything, already knows what my prayers are.

My trust in Him still keeps the little portion of the trunk above the water. He may do as He wills, keep me in what condition He wills.

CHI. NARAHARI,

I got both your letter and the postcard on the same day (yesterday). It was of course good that you got the tonsils of both your son and daughter removed; but we should realize from this what care we should take of children to keep them healthy. They need:

- fresh air as much as possible;
- correct paranayam exercises;
- regular and moderate exercise;
- clean teeth and gums;
- for food, chiefly milk, curds, fruit, vegetables and bread in right quantities;
- exclusion, at least, of rice, pulses and sugar.

Many bodily troubles result from want of care in these respects.

I have followed what you write about Narandas. Let me know, in a separately enclosed letter if you like, the shortcomings which you have observed in Narandas. I would even advise you to tell him about them. If you don’t wish to do that, it is your duty at any rate to place them before me. I find it unbearable that there should be estrangement among the handful of co-workers I have. Kaka has gone up to Sinhagad. We hope that his health will improve there.

BHAITOTARAMJI,

I liked your description, as also the bhajan you sent for Mahadev and the combination of the two was even more to my liking. Every act of ours should be the glorification of God.

I shall re-read the account. My desire is that we should produce enough fruit and vegetables to meet our needs. If we can also produce fodder for the cows and grain for the Ashram we shall achieve the highest ideal of farming. Even if this involves some increases in expenditure I shall regard it as justified. But I am aware that this is merely fool’s babbling. I have worked the least at farming and talked the most about it. What to do? Farming is one of those things that I thought of doing when half my life was over.

478. LETTER TO KRISHNA CHANDRA MUKHERJI

April 18, 1933

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. The problem you have raised is not new, and because we are surrounded by death and destruction on all sides we have the positive word “himsa”, and yet every religion that is known to mankind insists upon life as the law, but conduct prescribed has been designated by a negative word, that is, “ahimsa” or non-violence. That can only exist for a bodied life as an ideal to be reached, not to be realized in action in physical existence. Nevertheless if we recognize the law of ahimsa we would always shape our conduct so as to approach it as near as possible and therefore we would resort to as little violence as it is humanly possible, whereas if himsa was the law of our being, we would naturally do as much destruction as we could and rejoice in it. But we do not find many people rejoicing in doing violence, whereas we do find many people apologizing for what violence they did. To say that there is double law working, namely, violence and non-violence, would be to argue that two contrary laws can co-exist. This is hardly the right thing.

MY DEAR C. R.,

I have your letter after long waiting. Of course I saw what Natarajan had written. Have not seen what Kodanda Rao has written. I do not know that anything can be done beyond writing to these friends. I often do with more or less success. I commend the prescription to you. Try it with Natarajan to commence with. He is slow to perceive flaws in his argument, but he is always open to conviction. I therefore never regard him as hopeless.

Jamnalalji will be going to a hill-station for his own treatment. I do not know whom he will be taking with him. In his latest letter he was thinking of going to Almora.

I would advise you to send Narasinhm¹ and Papa² by themselves to a quiet place so that they would be sure of perfect rest, that is to say, if Narasinhm is able to take care of himself and Papa. Why not take them yourself to Nandi? And if you don’t want to stay there the whole of the time, you may come away earlier. You can still have at least five weeks there. But of course you know better. It may be that they will profit most by being with Jamnalalji.

I have a letter from P. N. Sankaranarayana Iyer in which he tells me that before the 10th of February he wrote offering the services and co-operation of his institution on behalf of the cause, but he tells me he received no reply.² I do not know whether he wrote to someone in Madras. Perhaps you know this gentleman. His address is: No. 1, 3rd Street, Gopalapuram, Cathedral Post, Madras, and he and his sister, G. Visalakshi, are connected with slum work in Madras.

I sent to Dr. Rajan some time ago a letter enclosing Rao Bahadur Rajah’s letter to me asking for help for a Harijan Library. I have not had any reply to that letter. Please enquire and see what has happened.

DEAR FRIEND,

It was good of you to have seen N. and to have written to me about her. I heard from her also at the same time that I heard from you and I decided at once to ask her to come away to Poona. I can see that she won’t be able to do the Harijan service there all alone. The companions whom you name cannot be called in to help her. Perhaps you do not know all about her life. Her past life has not been quite straight. She has turned over, I hope, a new leaf. She is under that definite promise. It is therefore better for her not to have any of her old companions, however good workers they might have been. There is nothing secret about this. She has owned up her past to all who should have known it. Probably she will have left by the time this reaches you. If she has not, you will kindly hand the accompanying letter to her, and, if she will leave for Poona, but R. cannot and does not advance 3rd class fare for her and her boy, you will kindly do it for me and I will see that you are repaid the loan.

DEAR MOTIBABU,

I have your letter and I am glad you have written to me so exhaustively.

In thinking of temple-entry, we must not think of what the Harijans want, but what is due by us to them and what was promised so solemnly at the Bombay meeting\(^1\) under the Presidentship of Malaviyaji. Temple-entry was there promised and that promise has to be fulfilled at the sacrifice of life itself. Remember the words of the Mahabharata, “Truth in one scale and all the other sacrifices in the opposite scale: the scale holding Truth will outweigh the other scale.” Breach of promise to the Harijans and to God is unthinkable. We may be as patient as possible with the sanatanists, but those who have any regard for that solemn promise must ceaselessly pursue temple-entry. I do not therefore need to examine the other part of your argument about temple-entry. Of course education has to be an active programme. Education in the widest sense of the term is wanted, not merely for the Harijans but also for the savarna Hindus. What we are today suffering from is not so much the want of education as too much of mis-education. Irreligion and hypocrisy has been taught us in the place of religion and honesty, superstition in the place of true knowledge, intolerance in the place of charity, incontinence in the place of chastity, distortion of the Shastras in the place of a true and simple interpretation thereof woven round the central truth.

I note what you say about the activities of the Sangh, and I hope that your efforts will be crowned with full success. If you will keep the central fact of hand-spinning intact, you will not yield to the temptation of taking the fine yarn from the indigenous mills. I do not know whether you have traced the history of Harijans being driven from weaving to scavenging simply because the natural cord between hand-spun and hand-woven has been broken. If you will have fine cloth, you should teach the men and women how to spin fine yarn. Out of good slivers I spin 70 counts. Mahadev has gone as much as 110 counts. This is finer than the finest spun by any mill in India, and you will be surprised to learn that a Harijan weaver at the Ashram has woven Mahadev’s 40 counts. Finer than 40 we began to spin only during this incarceration, but I have no doubt that when our stock of fine yarn can be given for spinning, the same weaver will be able to handle it. We must face the difficulty, cost what it may, in this movement of regeneration.

\(^1\) Held on September 25, 1932. For the text of the resolution.

Much as I would like to discuss the question of my coming out for the sake of the Harijan cause, prison restrictions would not admit of any such discussion.

I did not know that Arun had purposely sent the Message and Mission of the Prabartak Sangh for my opinion. I must now look it up if I can lay my hands on it and read it critically.

I think that your medical adviser is quite right. Your eyes need rest. With all the devoted workers that surround you, why should you use your eyes at all? I do not know whether you know that there is in vogue a new and strikingly convincing method of treating the eyesight. It is called Bates’s method, and there is a physician in India who knows this method. His name and address are: Dr. Agrawal [Ram Eye Hospital, Bulandshahr].

I do not know the gentleman at all. He corresponded with me and brought this method first to my notice. Since then American friends have written to me and sent literature also. If you at all feel like it, you should correspond with Dr. Agrawal.

485. LETTER TO N. V. THADANI

April 18, 1933

MY DEAR THADANI,

I had time today to go through the correspondence between yourself and the Jagatguru and I was delighted with your terse, firm but restrained and courteous letters and I was filled with humiliation, sorrow and disappointment over the rambling, utterly illogical and undignified letters of the Jagatguru. I have therefore resisted the temptation of referring to this correspondence in the columns of the Harijan. If I do I should have to criticize the Jagatguru. This I do not want to do. It cannot help the struggle in any way, yet I do not want to miss your argument. Therefore I would like you to write a letter to the Harijan, putting your case in the briefest manner possible and asking the readers of the Harijan to point out, if they can, from the Vedas any reference to the fifth caste. MY DEAR SANKARANARAYANA,

You will please forgive me for not attending to your pamphlet before this. I was helpless. As soon as I had a few moments to spare I took up your pamphlet.

You have asked me to offer remarks, suggestions, guidance and to give you my blessings. Blessings you have if you deserve them. Whether you do or not I cannot judge, because I have no personal knowledge of your activity. But I can certainly see your earnestness in your report.¹

I have gone through all the passages that you have specially marked. It is difficult for me to offer useful criticism.

Your hit at the turmoil of the temple-entry movement and at the great national leaders betrays somewhere irritation, impatience and ignorance of facts. If you had simply said that the Harijans that have come under your notice do not care for temple-entry, that would have been quite a fair statement to make; but to belittle a great religious movement without even studying it was not right. Just see what it is. In September last, representative Hindus in a public meeting entered into a solemn pledge that among other things temples should be thrown open to Harijans. From that moment it became their duty to strain every nerve to secure the opening of Hindu temples to Harijans. It is irrelevant whether Harijans want to make use of these temples or not, just as it would be irrelevant to the question of opening public schools, public wells and giving them all the other rights hitherto denied to them whether they want or do not want these rights. It is the simple duty of the suppressors to remove the weight of suppression from the heads of the suppressed. The suppressed may have become so stunted that in spite of the lifting of the weight they might not even appreciate the fact that it was lifted. But that would be no excuse for the suppressors to continue the suppression.

If you admit the justice of the argument you should have no hesitation in owning your mistake. More than this I think I need not say. Every little thing done for the sake of Harijans cannot but be welcome to me, and I think that the field of service is so vast that workers can well afford to do that service without criticizing or belittling the efforts of others except of course where the other effort is mischievous, immoral or selfish.

In the 6th paragraph of your letter you tell me that you wrote to the local Seva Sangh offering your co-operation and service but that you had received no reply. I have now written¹ to them.

491. LETTER TO NEPAUL CHANDRA

April 19, 1933

DEAR NEPAUL BABU,

We have at the Ashram a lad brought up from infancy. He has a passion for painting, not that he knows much or perhaps anything of the art, but he cannot think of anything else. We have found him to be a straight, hard-working boy, amenable to discipline. But he has a grievance against the Ashram that he is not being given facilities for developing the special faculty that he has. I have therefore offered to send him to Santiniketan for the purpose of receiving training in painting. Will you please tell me whether this young man (Dhirendra² is his name) can be admitted. He is a strict vegetarian. I believe that he will pick up Bengali without difficulty. Gujarati is his mother tongue. He knows Hindi fairly well. He is an expert spinner. If he can be taken, please tell me whether he has to fill in a form of admission, when he could be sent there, what would be the fees. Please let me have any further instructions and guidance that you may think necessary. I do not know whether you are the right person to approach. If you are not, you will perhaps pass this on to the

492. LETTER TO HOME SECRETARY, GOVERNMENT OF BOMBAY

April 19, 1933

THE SECRETARY TO GOVERNMENT
HOME DEPARTMENT
BOMBAY

DEAR SIR,

The enclosed cable¹ was sent by me on the 13th instant to the Superintendent for despatch. On the 17th I learnt on inquiry that it was sent to the Inspector-General. On the same day I complained to the Superintendent about the delay in sending the message. I have now at 2.20 p.m. 19th instant learnt that orders have been received that “there is no objection to the despatch of the cable”.

Happily Sjt. V. J. Patel seems to be in no immediate danger. I have no desire to send the cable now as it is. Nor have I got the patient’s address in Vienna where he has been sent for treatment. I am inquiring about the address.²

But I cannot help protesting against the delay in a matter involving the life of a human being, this time not a prisoner. One matter of delay in the case of a prisoner whose life is in danger is pending before Government.

Cables such as the one to Sjt. V. J. Patel, the Government will admit, are of use only if they are sent in time. I have known such cables to have given great consolation to their receivers. I cannot allow myself to think that in such a matter the Government have no regard for the feelings of persons in their custody. Was it necessary to detain the cable for seven days? I should like to have my position defined. If I have the liberty to send such cables, the Government should empower the authority in immediate custody to handle them. I venture to suggest that the present procedure is unfair and unnecessary. I need hardly point out that the cable was meant to be as well from Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel, the patient’s brother, as from me.

Yours sincerely,

493. LETTER TO DR. HIRALAL SHARMA

April 19, 1933

DEAR DR. SHARMA,

I like your letter very much.¹ It does you great credit. You have pictured to me the ideal physician. Yes, by all means wash Amtussalaam’s clothes, if necessary. Though in the Ashram, she is solely under your care. Do please insist on taking proper rest and the prescribed diet.

I would like you critically to examine everything in the Ashram and give me your impressions. Study the health of every inmate who will let you examine him or her. Of course you will frankly tell me of cases that may be beyond your skill. I would like you to examine Kusumbehn. She is today under Dr. Talwalkar’s treatment. But I would like you to tell [me] what you would have her to do, if she puts herself under you. Then there is Jamnabehn. She is a chronic asthmatic. She can be treated by you now if she will put herself under your care. Then there is Ramabehn. She has an enlarged shoulder-bone. I do not yet visualize her trouble. Possibly her case is beyond your province. If it is not, please tell me what you would have her do. Lastly, there is Anandi who has just had an operation for appendicitis. She is having my treatment only, as the others do more or less. These are the special cases I would like you to see as soon as you can and tell me all about them. There are others, too, who require attention.

Now about yourself. While I would like you to throw yourself into the Ashram routine, you must not go beyond your strength and [you] will take everything easy. Have your special needs supplied. I would feel deeply hurt if, for want of care, your own health was endangered. You will make me feel at ease, if you will treat the Ashram as your home and express your needs.

I would like you to accompany Bhagwanji once and see Harijan quarters and examine the ailing ones there and their sanitation.

I wish your children had both accompanied you. But that now later, if all goes well.

Yours,

494. LETTER TO JAMNABEHN GANDHI

April 19, 1933

CHI. JAMNA,

I have your letter. One does not have to worry about a person who, though her weight be 69 lb., can joke.

Yes, I remember very well the letters concerning enema, etc. I have an impression that I had replied to the questions in a letter to Purushottam. But it is also likely that I forgot to do so.

You can eat tomatoes, . . . 't, salt and papaw. But according to the system followed in the institution where Purushottam learnt the science, nothing but unboiled milk is permitted. Besides, you have to take bed-rest. However, Dr. Sharma is there now. Get yourself examined by him, and follow his advice if it is fully compatible with what you are doing now. I am writing to him. I don’t know him personally. I have known him only through correspondence. He does seem to have had experience in his field. Now that Purushottam, who was your vaid, has left, I will write to you more regularly. You must increase your weight.

495. LETTER TO RAMABEHN JOSHI

April 19, 1933

CHI. RAMA,

I have your letter. I have already written to you and explained what to do regarding the arm. The arrival of Dr. Sharma makes no difference to my advice. If he can understand the real nature of the trouble and is ready to treat it, by all means let him try. Otherwise you should adhere to the line I have suggested. You should do no work which causes pain to the arm. You may give it only such exercise as will cause no pain. But now there will be no need for me to give any advice. He, to whose care you must leave the arm, will put everything right.

Amina seems to be in a bad plight. Give her courage and sustain her faith. If she is not careful about food, she will again harm her health.

496. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

April 19, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

Why did you beat that girl? A teacher does not lose her self-respect by apologizing to her pupil. On the contrary, it is enhanced. The pupils also will love her better. If, therefore, you have not already apologized and if you think that it was wrong on your part to have beaten her, you should apologize to her. You may be sure that will be for your good.

Your diet is all right. If you continue it your throat is bound to improve. Consult Dr. Sharma. If he can think of anything, he will suggest it.

Why do you get impatient in your work? If you are content with what you can do slowly, the work will be faster and the result will be neater. I have had this experience thousands of times.

497. LETTER TO P. N. RAJBHOJ

April 19, 1933

BHAI RAJBHOJ,

Your Hindi letter is extremely good. I trust you are comfortable in the Ashram.

I shall make an effort to answer your questions in the Harijan Sevak. Nevertheless I may state this.

Here is one way of eliminating caste distinctions among Harijans—the caste considered higher should establish all social relations with the castes considered lower.

Wherever underground drainage is installed the Harijans should master the craft of weaving. There is no harm in seeking the assistance of the police wherever Harijans are prevented from using the palki. There are other ways also which I shall mention in the Harijan Sevak.

April 19, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your big packet. It is really big this time.

Nobody should copy my bad habits. I can even give reasons to excuse them. All the same everybody should know that they are bad habits and avoid them.

1. Nobody should read a book or a newspaper while eating. The best thing is to have in one serving as much as one wants and to eat the meal in complete silence. If one cannot do this, one may talk to one’s neighbour in whispers. It is a bad habit to do two things simultaneously.

2. Nobody should do any other work while spinning, should neither dictate letters nor teach as I do.

3. It is a bad habit to read in the lavatory.

4. It is unbearable to clean the teeth in the lavatory. The habit is unhygienic and dirty. I have never been guilty of this bad habit.

But I do the first three things. However, a person’s bad habits should not be copied. I never defend these habits as good. Moreover, I live in complete privacy. I have a separate room for lavatory and can keep books in that room. I may die any time, and cannot overcome the temptation to do as much work as I can while I live. I am not eager to overcome it either. I have these and many other reasons or excuses. But nobody else should use them to defend his bad habits. Show this to all the inmates. All these habits are also responsible for constipation and other troubles. We attach great importance to bodily labour and work in the Ashram. But there should be no impatience or excessive eagerness in doing even these. Whenever anybody feels that his work is too heavy, he should reduce it. Nobody is required to work beyond his capacity. The inmates of the Ashram do not live in it under compulsion. Nobody, therefore, should feel the burden of work there. Read my letter to Dr. Sharma. Talk to him. Do also give him whatever facilities he wants. Let him examine all the patients I have mentioned and others who may be ill. Let me know the results and your views. You will find in my letter to him that I have written at sufficient length, and I, therefore, don’t repeat all that here.

With all my efforts I could not find Valji’s article. But he came and gave me a copy.
Did I give you the address to which the Gandiva spinning-wheels should be despatched? There is a slight change in it now: Shri Haribhau Phatak, Pioneer Dyeing Works, Sadashiv Peth, Poona City.

Lakshmibehn, Narmada, Bhuskute and Amtussalam—the last if she is permitted by Dr. Sharma and if she is very keen—may come next Saturday. I am sending a wire today, for you may not get this letter in time.

Ramji has asked for permission to put his grievances before Rajbhoj. If you think it desirable, you yourself may talk to the latter. He is a man of a suspicious nature and may misinterpret even your doing that. In view of this possibility, think independently and do what seems best to you.

BAPU

[PS.]

I was forgetting one thing. You have heard about N. She came and saw me some time ago. She has a son who lives with her. I had heard reports against her and so had invited her here. She was doing Harijan work in Bangalore. She is a capable lady, and is an American married to a Greek. Her father was a theatre designer. She herself can act and knows dancing, etc. You must have read about three years ago that she had become a Hindu in Kashmir and was thinking of coming to the Ashram. The report was true. But she was also living an ignorant life. She has freely led an immoral life and even accepted money from people. When she came to me, she confessed to me all her errors one after another and gave her solemn word that she would devote the rest of her life to Harijan work. She says she is 24 years old. She left the hotel where she was staying and went to live among Harijans. At present she is living in a Harijan hamlet at some distance from Bangalore. She writes to me from time to time. I think she has changed and is on the right path now. I have wired to her and asked her to come here. I intend to send her ultimately to the Ashram. I don’t see any risk in taking her in. She will stay if she can observe the rules. Let all of you think about this and then communicate your view to me. If you wish to ask me anything more, you may do so. You

April 19, 1933

CHI. AMINA,

Do you know the meaning of Aamina? Why Aamina and not Amina? Why did you hide the fact from me out of a false sense of shame? You must not lose faith in fasting. If after ending a fast one eats what one likes one is bound to suffer a relapse. Rice is taboo; so are potatoes and chillies and other spices. You may eat onion. You should eat bread, chapatis, vegetables (green), milk and curd. And fruit when you get it. If you do this, you are bound to be cured. Keep up your courage. Why be a slave to tobacco? You will feel restless for a few days but will feel all right by and by. If you must rub the teeth with something, use charcoal powder and salt. Does Qureshi not get milk?

503. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

April 20, 1933

Begun at 3 finished at 4 a.m.

CHI. MIRA,

Your letter containing your views of the conduct of the Ashram came in yesterday, i.e., Wednesday.

There is a difference in our ideal[s] perhaps. I contemplate a composite society at any rate for some long time to come. The ideal should be what it is. Some will reach it more and some less. You will find that the only ideal that can be fully reached according to the definition is that of Truth. For Truth is what everyone for the moment feels it to be as such, there being no room left for deception. It will always be non-physical, whereas every other vow has its direct physical aspect and therefore necessarily has grades. Take ahimsa. One person will be satisfied with its mere observance with the non-killing of man and beast. Another will extend it to the insect life, yet others to the vegetable and so on. We do not consider it an unpardonable crime to kill a snake or a scorpion. Take non-possession. Even you and I have no common line. I may possess a fountain pen, you may discard it. I may possess ten yards of khadi, you may have twenty. There is no such thing as full and equal observance of these other vows which admit of a physical expression. They subserve

1 Vide “Letter to Amtussalaam”, 19-4-1933.
the one and only grand purpose and ideal, Truth. Kusum lying on her deathbed (maybe) and requiring hundreds of things I may not want, as fully lives up to the Ashram ideal as I, if both of us think, speak and act truthfully.

If you have followed me hitherto, you must at once perceive that we do not need, we must not have bifurcation. Living the composite life, each must grow to his or her full height. If I cannot even at the age of 64 live up to the life of brahmacharya, I must humbly own it and retire from the Ashram without the finger of scorn being pointed at me. I must get credit for having courage to think, speak and act the truth. There is then hope for my brahmacharya but none for say . . .1 if he has outwardly quite correctly lived a life of physical brahmacharya but has lusted after a girl or girls....2 has disgraced the Ashram, not I.

Therefore if we will practise charity and Truth we can only have one institution wherein you must have the fullest scope for your growth and Kusum the invalid for hers or . . .3 the butterfly for hers, provided that none of you deceives for one single moment and each believes in and strives to reach the Ashram ideal.

Now comes in, in a different or modified form, your proposal. A separate institution or institutions. There is one at Wardha with Vinoba at its head. He is part of the parent institution and is working out the ideals to the best of his capacity. Did I tell you that with my full consent, he had run away from Wardha and settled in a Harijan village hardly two miles from Wardha? He may leave a landmark there and go fifty miles or more away from any railway line with or without a companion still in fulfilment of the ideal of the parent [institution] and being an integral part of it. He is in no way superior to . . .4, assuming always that . . . 4 is as truthful as Vinoba and is as much carrying out the Ashram ideal as Vinoba. Are you able to perceive this fully?

There is another branch shooting out in Almora far away from the haunts of men and a long way from a railway line. Struggling Prabhudas is today in physical charge of it. But how ultimately it will

1 The name has been omitted.
2 The names have been omitted.
3 ibid
4 ibid
shape, I do not know. It may become a sanatorium for the invalids or may become a retreat, permanent or temporary, for those who want isolation for their growth. And if we succeed in continually throwing out untruth from the Ashram and learn to live only truth and for it and nothing else, we may have a million branches, none superior, none inferior, all being an expression of the hardy parent and required for it. I do not know whether I have expressed myself so as to enable you to understand me. Follow it up as much as you like. No letter going to Ba this week.

Love from us all to all.

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter of the 17th instant.1 I think that the Mahar friends who are boycotted should stick to their resolve without entering into any argument or quarrel with the Mahar Panchayat that has excommunicated them and if they suffer in dignified silence you will find that the excommunication will be ineffective. The very reason why educated Mahars are not under the ban of excommunication shows that there is no strength in it. I think that you should quietly and persistently work in their midst and try to serve those who are instrumental in excommunicating the reformers and if you will continue to serve both the parties you might form the connecting link between the two.

514. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

[April 20, 1933]

Ch. Narandas,

Some of the points in your letter in the big mail received yesterday require immediate reply, and I am, therefore, writing this letter today without delay.

I am glad that Lakshmibehn has agreed to go for one year. I will now get into correspondence with the people concerned. I think whatever is done will be done after Jamnalalji’s release. Probably it will not be necessary for two women to go at the same time.

What shall we do if Chimlanlal loses heart?

After reading Dr. Talwalkar’s letter, I feel that it will be best for Kusum to remain under his treatment.

Keep the letter for Pannalal with you and give it to him at the appropriate time.

The changes which you have made seem to be all right. The burden of work on Prema ought to be reduced. If she does not stop speaking for the present, I see a grave risk. Be strict with her in this matter.

Let Parachure Shastri conduct as many classes as he can. If people can be taught to recite the Gita verses with correct pronunciation, I will regard that as a great thing.

Do give him all the books which we have. I have explained in my letter how they should be used. Kaka tells me that the other four books which he requires are there in the Vidyapith. If Panditji asks for them or if Narahari Parikh permits, we may have them transferred to the Ashram.

We have, in any case, to ask for the transfer of some manuscripts. It is only a question of time. Ask Shastri to be patient.

BHAISHRI FULCHAND.

At last I got a letter from you after waiting for one for a long time. All of us were wondering why there was no letter and were, therefore, very much pleased when we got it.

I cannot understand what happened to my letter. My attitude in the matter is that we should write what we wish to, and not worry whether or not the letter reaches the addressee.

Our life goes on from day to day.

We often think about your enlarged family there, but feel sure that, since you are quite a few veterans there, things are going on without friction. If an accident occurs to a railway train, a good many people will die. If, on the other hand, anything happens to an old-fashioned cart, at the most the riders feel a jerk. They do a few repairs to the cart and jump on to it again. Before the age of the railway, the pace of things was slow. But we rarely find this from reading history. But we do hear about the increase in accidents and lunatic asylums. However, sanatanist friends argue that I have no right at all to talk about these things, since, though I write against trains, doctors, etc., I am eager enough to travel by train whenever I get an opportunity and a bicycle runs down to Dr. Kanuga’s dispensary the moment I have an inflammation in one of the eyes. This is quite true. But poor sanatanists, do they know that during the last fifteen months I have not stepped into a train even once nor sent anybody bicycling to Dr. Kanuga?

\(^1\) Addressee’s daughter-in-law and Maganlal Gandhi’s daughter

Tell Surendra that to get cough and low fever is against the rules of the Ashram. How did he get them? He should write to me in detail or someone else should, whose turn it may be to write. Darbari may not have used many of his turns; if so, let him use one of them for writing to me. I hope Surendra gets regulation food for a sick prisoner. I suppose Vithal knows that his father and sisters have returned to the Ashram.

I have one golden suggestion for safeguarding health. Anybody who finds that a certain item of food does not agree with him should leave it. Nobody dies for remaining hungry, whereas it can be proved that 999 people out of a thousand fall ill through over-eating or eating wrong things. I can say much else, but it will serve no purpose.

If you or any other friends wish to discuss with me any questions in connection with the movement against untouchability, you will be permitted to see me. Of course you should not ask for such permission if you have nothing to discuss with me about that subject.

And now the replies to the questions asked by Mohanlal, the school-teacher from Bavla:

1. By abhyasa the Gita means regular reading of something which is worth pondering over, though one may not feel interested in it. Such regular study enables one to maintain the current of one’s thoughts in the right direction. The Lord has coupled vairagya with abhyasa. But the two things are practically the same. Fixing one’s mind in abhyasa necessarily means withdrawing it from other things, and that is vairagya.

2. Prasad may be described as serene contentment. We feel contented when we get the things of the world which we desire, but such contentment is useless and springs from the satisfaction of the senses. Since the goods of the world are short-lived, the contentment which they bring is also short-lived. The goods of spiritual life are eternal possessions, and so the contentment produced by them is also abiding. It is an experience beyond the grasp of the senses, an experience of the mind and the heart. One can, therefore, feel true contentment only when one becomes indifferent to the happiness of the senses. This is the contentment that the Gita talks about.

Regards from us all to everybody there. I got Raojibhai’s letter. I will reply to him by and by.

518. HOW DOES THE STREAM OF BHAKTI FLOW?

[April 21, 1933]²

A lover of the Bhagavata dharma writes:³

The stream of bhakti does not flow from the pen. It is not a matter pertaining to the intellect. That stream can only flow from the cavern of the heart; and when it does flow, no power will be able to stop its current. Who can stop the current of the Ganga?

I am indeed trying for such bhakti but the effort cannot succeed through any verbal grandeur. The only way to it is karmayoga. A

¹ This cable was drafted on a telegram received on April 20, 1933 from Dr. Purushottam Patel in reply to Gandhiji’s to him dated April 19, 1933; Vide “Telegram to Purushottam Patel”, 19-4-1933.
² Vide “Letter to Viyogi Hari”, 21-4-1933.
³ The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had requested Gandhiji to write one article on bhakti in each Harijan issue so that people would not indulge in unnecessary discussions but follow the path of pure bhakti. It was his firm belief that only Gandhiji could do this in an age of atheism.
total indifference towards the result is necessary for that yoga. Karmayoga is but another name for action which is wholly devoid of any desire for results.

Hence, I do not see the need to write any article specially in order to make the stream of devotion flow. If every word of the Harijan—whether it is in English, Hindi or Gujarati—is an echo of the devotion which is within, it will automatically make an impression.

I have grasped the intention of the lover of the Bhagavata dharma. If there is devotion within me, and, to the extent that it is there, that devotion will not fail to touch others. This is because I believe that a change of heart can be brought about through the Bhagavata dharma alone. That dharma is contagious. Once it is revealed, it does not leave anyone untouched. When it is truly revealed in any of us, the Harijans and the sanatanists will automatically become aware of it. This at least I can say for myself that all my actions—writing, speaking, walking—are undertaken with the object of generating devotion within me. It is my confirmed belief that if Hinduism is to be saved, there is no other way to do so.

Religion has never been, and can never be, saved through hooliganism or hypocrisy, through rhetoric or beautiful articles. Religion can be saved only through the purification and penance professing it. And, the author of the Bhagavata has clearly stated that in this age the path of bhakti alone can be pursued of those without difficulty; perhaps it is the sole path.

The question may then arise why I write or speak. The answer is contained in what I have stated above regarding my actions. That activity itself shows that even if there has been any flowering of the Bhagavata dharma in me, it can in no way be said to have attained perfection; and my activity in that direction is for that very development. And, if that is really so, others will catch a glimpse of devotion in one or the other of these activities.

519. FIVE QUESTIONS ON VARNADHARMA

A gentleman has sent me the following questions:

1. What work should the Brahmin, the Kshatriya, the Vaishya and the Shudra do to earn their livelihood?
2. In what way should the four varnas serve?
3. Can work for livelihood be the same as work for service? Or are the two different?
4. You have written that “in order to revive varnashrama it is necessary that all should voluntarily become Shudras”. If the other three varnas (the Brahmin, the Kshatriya, the Vaishya) embrace the Shudra dharma, will they not be guilty of the sin of giving up their dharma and adopting another?
5. You have written, “A small varna aspiring to Brahmanajñana fortunately exists today through which sanatana dharma will again shine in its purity and show the world the path to happiness.” What is that varna?

I seek to prevent no one from asking questions. But I must say that if my writings were read carefully many questions that are asked would be answered of themselves. An article in which questions raised in it are not answered is considered useless. Articles treating of moral questions should not be read only once. If such an article is read over and over again with concentration, then the questions included in them solve themselves easily. I should therefore request the correspondent to reread my article on varnashrama. He will then find that what I am going to say here is already contained in it. I address this suggestion to the readers in general. Let not the correspondent think that it applies only to him. The habit of reading is increasing in us, but the habit of pondering is diminishing and therefore we have become somewhat helpless. On everything we want to know another’s opinion. We have lost the power of original thinking which comes from constant pondering. It is truly pitiable that things have come to such a pass. Once a principle is understood we should have the capacity to understand its corrolaries. With just a little practice this power can be developed.

I shall now answer the questions:
1. The Brahmin will impart to society knowledge of the Brahman. The Kshatriya will protect the country. The Vaishya will earn wealth through trade and commerce. The Shudra will do service.
All these will earn their livelihood each by doing the work of his own varna. That will be enough.

2. Varna, strictly speaking, is a duty not a right. Hence the existence of varna can only be for service, not for self. For this reason there is no one high and no one low. A man who considers himself above others, is worse than a fool despite all his wisdom. Because of his arrogance or superiority he falls from varna. Here, it is also necessary to understand that there is nothing in varnashrama to prevent a Shudra from acquiring learning or defending his country; yes, the Shudra may not barter his knowledge or take to defending his country for purposes of livelihood. It is also not enjoined that the Brahmin or the Kshatriya may not do menial work. But they must not earn their livelihood from such work. If this simple dharma were scrupulously followed, all the disorders that face society today, all the jealousies and rivalries that are rampant, all this craze to amass wealth, all the falsehood that is prevalent, all this production of weapons of war would vanish. Whether the whole world follows this principle or not, whether all Hindus do so or not, even if some follow this, the world will gain by so much. My faith that the salvation of the world lies in following varnadharmma grows stronger each day. The true meaning of varnadharmma is service. Whatever is done should be done in the spirit of service. Where is bargaining in service?

Now comes the question of manual labour. As far as I understand the Gita, it mentions many kinds of yajnas. One of them is manual labour. It is the duty of all the castes to do manual labour as yajna for the preservation of the world. No one can escape this yajna. Without body labour the journey of life itself is impossible. He who does not perform this yajna of labour is truly a thief. To say that manual labour is meant for Shudras only shows ignorance of dharma. Work of service does not necessarily mean manual work. He who washes his own dishes is doing manual work but not work of service. A watchman who earns his livelihood by standing at the gate does no manual work; but he certainly does work of service.

3. There is no need now to answer this question.

4. In asking this question, my correspondent has perhaps forgotten that in my opinion varnadharmma today is all but destroyed. Brahmins, Kshatriyas and Vaishyas have long since given up their varna duties and arrogated rights. The sin has been committed. Now the Brahmins, Kshatriyas and Vaishyas, who have fallen from
520. HOW CAN THE BIRTHLESS BE BORN?

The teacher with whose conundrums relating to temples I dealt in an earlier article\(^1\) again writes:\(^2\)

There are many principles in Hinduism which are comprehensible to reason and many others that transcend reason. The doctrine of incarnation is a matter of reason as well as of faith. In so far as it is a matter of faith, I do not think that there will be books explaining it as there are books explaining material things. There are some books on this subject in English, but even they do not fully satisfy the mind. Possibly there are works on this subject in Sanskrit but I do not know about them. I owe my faith in incarnation to Tulsidas. I would advise seekers after truth like this teacher to study the works of Tulsidas. If anyone knows any work on this subject, I would request him to inform me about it, so that I can write to the teacher. But what is needed in matters such as incarnation is not books so much as reflection.

Now let us consider the matter on the plane of reason. Whatever qualities are attributed to God, are also attributed to the atman. Just as God is unborn, unageing and undying, so is the atman. The atman is an eternal part of God, and that is why it possesses the attributes of God. The atman is birthless and yet is born in body and therefore it must be considered as a partial incarnation of God. If we take this view, there should be no difficulty in considering one in whom many qualities of God are present, an incarnation of God. Full incarnation cannot be understood through the intellect. This is a matter of imagination as well as of faith. The Hindu, from the circumstances of his past births and his present birth, will consider Rama, Krishna and others as incarnations of God. One who sees God in the whole universe, should be accepted as an incarnation of God. Just as we see a mass of water as the sea, in the same way why can we not see the world of living things as an incarnation of God? Whether we call this an incarnation or not is a different matter. We are not concerned with name. This world is pervaded by God. Wherever we look there is only God. That which has name and form is an incarnation of God; so much should be clear to the eyes of faith. If we can but have this much of faith in our hearts, it is very possible that we would keep clear of sins. Knowing well that God dwells in every heart, why should we follow the path of falsehood and why should we sin?

\(^2\) The extract quoted is not translated here. The correspondent had questioned the doctrine of incarnation, calling it un-Vedic and asked: “How can One birthless and deathless be born?”

521. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

April 21, 1933

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

I have your long letter giving me your views about the proposed visit to British Guiana, South Africa, etc. I think that these outposts have come to abide with you. I do not need any elaborate argument to convince me of it. Now and again you are bound to receive a call from them and it is best to respond to such calls. You should therefore undoubtedly go to British Guiana, and then to South Africa, then to East Africa and return via India. That will give you mental satisfaction, keep you up to date with the things for which you have qualified yourself and it will give satisfaction to the people concerned, and the work that you can do in these several parts, you alone can do. It does not matter a bit whether it appears today substantial or insubstantial, and whilst you are absent on duty from England you will believe, I shall certainly believe, that it will not suffer because you will be absent, not for your pleasure, but on duty.

April 21, 1933

MY DEAR GHANSHYAMDAS,

I have your letter. Copies of the Harijan will be sent to the six gentlemen named by you.\(^1\) The first copy will go under a covering letter from Sastri. Lord Reading and Lothian are being sent a copy of Harijan under instruction from Agatha Harrison.

I had a surprise visit from your father.\(^2\) It gave me great joy to meet him with his Shastri. We had a long and interesting discussion on untouchability. He told me that he was meeting you in Gwalior. I do hope that your daughter-in-law has already gone to Sinhagad. Of course I will see your son when he comes. I did not know that he also was not keeping good health.

I shall take note of the two donations\(^3\) in the Harijan. Viyogi Hari also writes to me expressing the hope that Harijan Sevak will be self-supporting within a short time. I see you have ceased to write for it altogether. That’s wrong. You ought to make it a point to send something every week.

I hope you will undergo the necessary operation\(^4\) at Calcutta.

I have your letter of the 18th April. After full consideration and a knowledge of how utterly neglected N. is by R., I have come to the conclusion that she should come over to Poona. There is plenty of Harijan work for her in this part of the country. I have therefore telegraphed to her to come. I have not heard from her. I wrote to a local pleader in Chitaldrug who had commenced correspondence with me to advance the necessary fare to her if R. did not give it to her. I have undertaken to refund the fare. I am now waiting to see what N. does. I shall deal with your question about the Hindu temple. Your previous letter had escaped me.

I am glad you had a visit from the Yuvaraja and a donation and that you had a donation from Shri Purusottamdas Thakurdas also.

I got your letter after three days of waiting. It seems that you are able to digest milk well. I need not, therefore, say anything more, though that book on milk diet lays great stress on rest and on hipbath in hot water. Get as strong as a horse and bring the Autobiography up to date. To expect me to do that will be a vain hope.

I did learn that Anandi had fever for a day, but I did not know about the x-ray photograph. However cheap such photographs may become, it will never be possible for the tens of millions of our countrymen to have the benefit, and I feel, therefore, that we should not go in for them. But I know quite well that such ideas of mine cannot be put into practice. How much can a broken vessel, which is me, contain? And can one offer anything from a vessel that is empty?

I did not know anything about Gangabehn. Please send me Khambhatta’s address. I shall try to spot Mercury. I had just looked a little into Golikere’s book when the book on milk diet arrived. I am glad that Bal came and saw you. Has Ghanshyamdas’s daughter-in-law arrived?

535. LETTER TO VIYOGI HARI

April 21, 1933

BHAJI VIYOGI HARI,

I have your letter and also the old articles which will be returned. It appears that with the cessation of intensive propaganda activity the work on the eradication of untouchability has slackened. But I like it. This work does not require rushing, there should be no rush in religious matters. Only what is done in a calm manner proves to be true and solid work. I think it is necessary to take a consensus of opinion, but I have some doubt about its being performed in a true spirit. Discuss this with Thakkar Bapa and Ghanshyamdas and then let me know. Only a truly religious person can take up the responsibility of this job. Have you any such person in mind?

I would prefer that even others devoted to Harijan service do not enter the temples where Harijans are not allowed. This is more difficult than the former undertaking, it may involve breach of peace and some propaganda ought to precede picketing. Talk over this matter too and write to me again. Also, who can organize this work? We must first have a picture of it before I start writing about it in the papers.

As regards the article on bhakti, one is being sent with this letter. The second article is based on some questions asked by a Harijan.

Kakasaheb is at Sinhagad taking nature-cure treatment for his digestion trouble. If possible, I shall certainly get him to write something when he comes down.

537. REMEMBER 30TH APRIL3

Those who would organize a proper concentrated programme for 30th instant, the day fixed as Harijan Day, would do well to take time by the forelock and make all preparations in a methodical manner. Every Committee is free to add to or subtract from the items I have suggested.

I hope it is clearly understood that, where no other work is at all possible, there will be at least substantial collections made. I know that collectors often despise copper collections. Let me remind them of the English proverb: “Take care of your pennies, and the pounds will take care of themselves.” And let me give a tit-bit from my own experience as an expert collector. Among the masses I remember having collected not pice, i.e., quarteranna pieces, but pies, in Orissa, and when the collections were counted, the total was a respectable amount. We are a country of many millions and, therefore, in my opinion, the copper pies of the millions have, when put together, an infinitely greater value than the rupees of a few thousand middle-class men or a few lakhs from half a dozen millionaires. If the collectors will have faith in themselves, in their cause and in the masses, they will go from door to door and collect whatever coppers are given. A pie given with a full heart will be to me a token that the giver wants untouchability to go and that he or she has contributed his or her mite towards the movement. If the Committees will make a faithful report of the results of their collections and show not only how much they have collected but also from how many people, it will give one a fair index of the strength of the movement. Needless to say, the work must be done quietly and as gently as possible, and when it is done without fuss by door-to-door visits, there need be no opposition from any quarter. Where householders are unwilling to give anything, there should be no argument with them, no ill will shown towards them. The donations must be free-will offerings.

2 Ambedkar discussed with Gandhiji the possibilities of the revision of the Poona Pact and particularly the panel system.
3 This appeared under the heading “Notes”.

One thing I would suggest to the medical fraternity. I have just had a report from the schoolmaster whose doings I am noting in these columns from time to time, showing the need Harijans have of medical assistance. In the case I have in mind, a physician, immediately a case of pneumonia was reported to him, went free of charge to the Harijan quarters and not only gave relief in this particular case, but, much to the delight of the Harijans, examined the other cases and offered to go freely whenever his assistance was needed. It will be a striking demonstration if the medical men in every part of India met together and appointed visitors from among themselves to go to the Harijan quarters, speak to the inmates on the necessity of observing the laws of hygiene and sanitation and offer medical relief wherever it was required. Naturally, this work to be done on an ambitious scale can only be done without expectation of any fees. No organization can undertake the task of rewarding the services that the medical men might render to Harijans; whereas, if the medical men took this burden upon themselves, there are so many now in India that by a judicious distribution of work no pressure will be felt by any single physician.

The third thing that occurs to me is for the women workers all over the country to combine in order to do away with the inhuman practice of giving to Harijans the leavings of food. I have a letter from a Harijan in Karachi who asks in piteous terms that the women might at least shoulder the burden of having this reform accomplished at once. He says that they think nothing of giving to Harijans food that is rotten and unfit for human consumption, food that is stinking, that is dirty beyond description, and this too, lest they might be polluted, they throw from their balconies or from their verandahs into the laps of debased Harijans; and he adds in agony, “The pity of it is that the Harijans would feel it a deprivation if these leavings were not given to them.” It would certainly be a grand thing if earnest women all over banded themselves together and made it a point of seeing their sisters and weaning them from the practice. I have every hope that in this mission of mercy and humanity even the sanatanists will co-operate; but whether they do or not, the duty before the women who realize the abomination of the practice is to bestir themselves and quicken the conscience of their sisters who do not even perhaps know that they are offending humanity by making themselves responsible for the degradation of those who are, after all, their own kith and kin. And in this connection, I would invite the attention of workers to the concrete suggestions I made the other day in answer to a Dehra Dun student.¹

1 Vide “Complaint against Women”, 23-4-1933.

_538. WHAT IT MEANS TO BE A HARIJAN_

Elsewhere² the reader will find how the Harijans fare in the city of Allahabad in the north, known to the millions of Hindus as Prayag, one of the most noted among the places of Hindu pilgrimage and situated at the confluence of the Ganges and the Jumna.

Let him turn also to the extreme south. There he will find a cluster of villages inhabited by the land-owning ryots known as Nattars and their landless ‘semi-slaves’, the Harijans. There was a conflict between these two during May, June and July last year. There was also a resolution in the Madras Council, carried by 44 votes against 22, recommending to the Government the appointment of a committee to inquire into and report on the alleged atrocities committed by the Nattars on the Harijans. Nothing is said as yet to have been done by the Government on the recommendation.

Sjt. Amritlal Thakkar has, however, sent me a fairly full report.

² Vide the following item.
The subject is still topical, inasmuch as the trouble is by no means over and may burst forth any moment. The two sections are living, as it were, in a state of armed neutrality. The inquiry was conducted by Sjt. A. Rangaswami Iyengar, Advocate, and President of the District Harijan Committee, Sjt. Lakshmiratan Bharati, Advocate, and Secretary of the District Committee, Sjt. V. E. Eapen, Advocate, and Sjt. Ramachandran, the Secretary of the Tamilnad Board, S.U.S. They visited Devakottah, Pavanakottah, Paramakkudi, Eluvankottah and Chittanur. The trouble began during the temple festival at Eluvankottah. The Harijans “till recently had to work for the Nattars on conditions prescribed by the latter”.

During the trouble the Nattars raided the village (Pavanakottah) and looted the Harijan houses. They tied some of the Harijans, who wanted to resist, to a tree.... The little schoolhouse in the Harijan quarter was burnt down. The little granaries made of cow-dung and hay in front of most Harijan houses were broken to bits and the grain looted. These granaries look more like huge jars than like rooms. We saw the ruins of a schoolhouse and the grain jars.

The report proceeds:

The Harijans themselves include two divisions—Pallas and Pariahs. The Pallas ran away at the first sign of trouble to Devakottah, leaving their women and children in the village, who were considerably harassed by the raiders. Quite a number of these Pallas were Christians even before. The Pariahs met with more trouble. The Christian pastor who did the conversion now pays a weekly visit for prayer meetings and general propaganda. He has also consented to give them a new school of their own. The Pallas returned to their homes earlier and the Pariahs a little later.

Four families consisting of 14 members embraced Christianity 3 months ago. It is expected more families will follow suit. As far as we could ascertain, there is no trouble between the converts and the Harijans. In answer to our questions, one of the converted men said that they had become Christians because the missionaries promised them protection and care.

The Harijans told the Committee:

The Nattars want us to observe exactly old customs and manners. They do not like our men to wear shirts or upper clothes as we like, or our women to put on frocks and saris. The old custom was that our clothes should not go below the knee and any upper cloth should be tied round the loins only. The women were not allowed to cover their bodies above the waist, except with their hands. In the old times, in religious processions, we had to go doing a particular dance. Even today, the Harijans on meeting a Nattar has to say “sevakam” meaning “at your service”. They do not allow us to work where we like or for whom we like. We have to work for them for what wages they give and wherever they order. They do not like us to use brass vessels and are angry when our women put on ornaments. Only two weeks ago, in a near village, Paramakkudi, a woman who went with a frock was spat upon by a Nattar and asked not to be arrogant in the Nattar street.

A Nattar Headman stated as follows:

We have no quarrel with the Harijans. Only we do not want him to go against old customs and conventions. He now refuses to work for us. He asks for high wages. We don’t much mind his putting on shirt or his women having ornaments or frocks in his own village. We only object to his parading them in our village and during the temple festival, when there are large crowds of all kinds of people. If their men and women dress as the rest of us, how can we differentiate them among the festival crowds? This results in a general mix-up and consequent pollution. We have no objection to their dress, as they want it, but our difficulty is: how are we to distinguish them in a crowd? We don’t object to their going to schools, but if they come to a common school, they must sit separate. We know very well that they cannot remain exactly where they were in old times. But we are bound to resist arrogance and revolt.

The agony need not be protracted. Instances elsewhere of resentment of and assault on Harijans dressing well or Harijan brides and bridegrooms carried in palanquins in their marriage procession have come to light.¹ It is up to sanatanists to join hands with reformers and put an end to the arrogation of superiority by one caste over another in the name of religion.

The reader will be glad to know that the Committee do not propose to be satisfied with the mere investigation they have made, important as it is. They have followed it up by a visit to the sub-collector, who has promised protection, should there be trouble, which is said to be impending in a village called Uruvatti during a coming festival. The members are also seeking the assistance of influential Nattars and other well-known men living in the neighbourhood in bringing about honourable peace between the Nattars and the Harijans.

They feel, too, that “nothing but education will finally solve the difficulty”. They have, therefore, proposed that a string of schools should be opened throughout the districts, both day and night schools. Let us wish success to the laudable efforts of the Committee in both the directions.

_Harijan_, 22-4-1933

539. IMMEDIATE DUTY

The Allahabad branch of the Servants of Untouchables Society (U.P. Provincial Board) had appointed a committee consisting of Sjts. P. N. Sapru, Bisheshwar Prasad and Ramnath Dar to report upon the condition of the Harijans of that city and to recommend measures for its amelioration. The Committee has presented an elaborate report covering fifty-eight pages of typed matter, excluding appendices. The Committee is to be congratulated on its production. One misses in the report the number of the Harijan population. The city excluding the cantonment has a population of only 1,73,895.

I do not propose to deal with the whole of this important document. Those who would study it should procure a copy from the Allahabad Office.

The Mehtars and the Doms are by far the most ill-treated and uncared for not only by the savarna Hindus but also by all the citizens represented by the cosmopolitan municipality.

This is what the Committee says about their condition:

The very approach to depressed-class quarters has a most depressing effect upon one’s mind. Some of the quarters in which they live, particularly those in the heart of the city, are literally unfit for human habitation. The houses are dark, dreary and damp. They do not look like places of human habitation. Their houses generally consist of one room of 5 square yards, in which a whole family of four to six has to live. There is no light and air in these houses, no verandah or open space in front and no arrangement for latrine, kitchen or bath. The lanes in front of these houses are extremely narrow, kutch, muddy, without any drain or light. The whole atmosphere of these localities is foul; there are hardly any arrangements for sanitation; and the sights one sees there are disgusting and loathsome. Not much can be expected of human beings who have to live not more than seven feet from scandalously dirty public lavatories. We have found taps attached to these lavatories for the domestic and bathing purposes of the sweepers living in the vicinity. One is filled with shame and horror at the discovery that there are places (in the twentieth century) in a city, which claims to be the capital of a big Province and which has a developed public life, where large groups of men, women and children lead a paralysed existence in the midst of all this filth and dirt. Who can belittle the importance of physical surroundings upon man’s character? Little wonder, then, that the “untouchable” is now lost to all sense of the clean and the beautiful in life. The tyranny of society sits tight upon him; he has little initiative and less independence left. It is hard to write with restraint about the conditions in which the Mehtar is compelled to live, and we would request earnestly all those who are interested in social welfare work to verify for themselves the accuracy of our statements by visits to, say, the Phul Talab, Bhainsa Godown or the Kali Mai-ka-Than in Allahabad.

Of Kali Mai-ka-Than the report says:

According to Municipal estimates, 1192 men and 1220 women visit these latrines daily. There is no light in these latrines, with the result that men have to ease themselves in the evening in the open space outside. The inmates of the houses facing the latrine use the space between the latrines and their houses as their courtyard and playground for their children. There is no wall round the latrine, with the result that the lower part of the person using them can be seen from the houses of sweepers. There are separate blocks for men and women in this latrine, but the wall dividing the blocks is low and a man who stands on the khuddi can see the women on the other side. There is only one tap and that, too, near the latrine and quite close to a cesspool. The water supply is irregular and wholly inadequate. The tap is used both for cleaning the latrines and bathing and domestic purposes. The cesspools attached to the latrines often overflow with urine and are in a most insanitary condition.
Sweepers have to go down into the cesspools barefooted for the purpose of cleaning them thoroughly. Both the land lying about the locality and the main lane are kutcha and get muddy in the rainy season. There is no platform for transferring night-soil from the public and private latrines into the night-soil carts. Sweepers have to mount the cart with heavy loads of dirt in order to place the night-soil into the carts. Most of the receptacles in the latrines are in a damaged condition. Being also small, they get filled up soon and filth overflows them and passes along with urine and water into the cesspools.

The number of night-soil carts is four only. We have seen sweepers throwing the contents of their tokras containing human excreta on the ground on account of the carts being too full. We claim that the facts stated above cannot be challenged.

In my estimation, everything else in the report pales into in significance compared to this. That the other cities, if there was the same investigation as at Allahabad, are likely to show the same woeful state of things or that the latter has gone on for years would be no excuse for continuing the condition revealed by the report. When a snake is discovered in a house, one does not delay its removal because it is also discovered that it had been there for years. The plague spot of Allahabad is worse than the imagined snake in the imagined house. I hope that the members of the committee and the Allahabad Branch of the Society will not rest nor give rest to the Municipality of Allahabad, till the disgraceful condition is radically altered and these most useful members of society are decently housed in a decent spot. I know a case in which fifteen hundred inhabitants of a plague spot were removed within twenty-four hours of the outbreak of plague in their midst and housed in tents till permanent quarters were found elsewhere.¹ This case demands no less summary measures. And if Allahabad leads the way, I have little doubt that the other cities will follow.

Harijan, 22-4-1933

540. A HARIJAN SEVAK’S DIFFICULTY

A Harijan sevak writes:

You know that the anti-untouchability worker has to suffer at the hands of the orthodox priests. They refuse to officiate at religious ceremonies at the homes of such workers. You have stated² in the Harijan No. 4 that the reformers should learn to dispense with the outward form. Will you not dispense with the priest altogether? The latter works only for money. Many priests to my knowledge do not even pronounce the mantras accurately; still fewer know their meaning. They trade on the gullibility of the public. What merit can such officiating carry with it? Such humbug is more rampant at places of pilgrimage than elsewhere. I am myself a Brahmin. The upanayanam ceremony was performed upon me when I was 13 years old. At the end of the ceremony, the priest said I was a Shudra up to the time that I was without the sacred thread, but that, having put on the sacred thread, I became a Brahmin. I had to repeat this formula before my parents when I went to make obeisance to ² Vide “What should Harijans Do?”, 5-3-1933. them. Here the idea given to me was that after having taken the sacred thread I had risen to a higher status. How do you reconcile this with your claim that there is no high-and-low status in Hinduism?

I want to tell you another thing. When I was at school, our class had a debate on untouchability. An orthodox teacher presided on the occasion. I remember his having said something like this: Our womenfolk become untouchable every month and are treated like any other untouchable. Then, why should we not observe such untouchability regarding those who are called untouchables?

I have considerably abridged what is a long letter from this correspondent. What he says about the ignorance of many priests and the show that they make of learning is unfortunately only too true.
The remedy for it is a general levelling up of the character of the people and the spread of the right stamp of education, including a workable knowledge of Sanskrit. I believe in the great power which Vivekananda used to ascribe to Sanskrit. We are unnecessarily frightened by the difficulty of learning Sanskrit. For a persevering student it is no more difficult than any of the other languages. I do not mean that we can easily gain a knowledge of Sanskrit that would enable us to understand the intricacies of ancient texts, but I do suggest that to gain a workable knowledge of Sanskrit, to acquire the correct pronunciation, so as to be able to know whether the priest is performing his task correctly or whether a pandit is misleading us, is not a difficult task, certainly not one-tenth as difficult as it is to acquire an equivalent knowledge of English. And then it must not be forgotten that such a knowledge of Sanskrit gives one a master-key to the knowledge of the majority of Indian languages, not excluding the Southern group.

But I must not stray away from my subject. Till this happy day arrives, we have to do the best we can with the tools at our disposal.
And if we cannot get a trustworthy Brahmin priest to officiate, the Bhagavata and the later saints have supplied us with an incredibly simple solution. At every ceremony, whether it is in connection with marriage, birth or death or any other religious function, the uttering of the sacred name from the heart is enough to ensure the presence and benediction of God at the ceremony. The fact is that God is there all the time, only we do not realize it. The recitation of the sacred name, hallowed by the practice of an unbroken line of saints, wakes us from our ignorance and works as infallibly as an electric spark, and immediately makes the presence of God felt in our midst. I say this only for those who have faith. Those who have none should dismiss it from their minds altogether. For them, even the presence of the orthodox priest is a mere mechanical act, an ignorant obedience to custom. They derive no advantage, no merit from the act. An honest orthodox priest has a place in the Hindu family. He is fast losing it by his own folly. He may be safe if he sheds his laziness, his ignorance, and, what is worse, his dishonesty. The present movement is indirectly intended to effect that reform. Seeing that the movement is one of internal purification, we shall never achieve it, unless there is a general sweeping up of all that is evil. Who can make the real beginning, if not he who calls himself a Brahmin?

As for the upanayanam ceremony, though I have discarded it myself, it has, there is no doubt, a deep meaning. The sacred thread is a sign of new birth, a regeneration. Before the adoption of the thread, there is but one birth, that is the physical. The adoption of the thread is a sign of the second birth, that is the spiritual. It is a sign of initiation—of a new life of dedication to God. It is, therefore, a higher life in the sense of greater responsibility in relation to oneself, but it gives one no greater status in relation to his neighbour. Indeed, at the time of initiation, there ought to be a definite realization that from that date one becomes a servant of the poorest and the lowliest. And to my mind, the thought that all are Shudras till the ceremony of initiation and dedication is a beautiful and ennobling thought. Unfortunately, these rites which were intended to emphasize human duties have been abused for the sake of exploitation and usurpation.

As to the comparison of the untouchability of the womenfolk with the untouchability that we observe today in respect of nearly 40 million human beings, it is a violence done to truth. The temporary untouchability of the womenfolk attaches to a temporary condition of the body. The untouchability of the untouchable millions is a hallmark of suppressed humanity and it attaches to birth, irrespective of a change in their condition. The one has in its reasonable form a rational basis for it, the other is wholly irrational and based upon an ignorant and selfish interpretation of the Shastras.

_Harijan, 22-4-1933_
541. A FRIEND’S WARNING

When you embarked on the great struggle for the liberation of the suppressed classes, I was exhilarated for the time being, but my difficulty began soon after. All these days I was debating whether to write you or not, but now the thing haunts me during my sleep and disturbs my meals. Hence this letter.

Years ago my friends and I began work for the untouchables in the hope that they and we and all would forget the very name ‘untouchable’. We dreamt that we would do away with separate schools, separate wells, separate sports and the like. When, therefore, you began your crusade, I was elated with hope that untouchability would be banished from India and that untouchables would be absorbed in the Hindu mass.

But I am stunned by what you and others are doing now. It is bound to widen the gulf—separate schools, separate scholarships, everything separate for Harijans—and you seem to delight in these things. They pain me. The 5 crores of Harijans will now become 10 crores. Some so-called sadhus or sannyasis will become their high-priests and there will come into being a new sect in a century or two hence. You will be regarded as the founder of that sect. Statues will be erected in your memory and it will be said of you that you had separated the Harijans from the Hindus. From the way things are going, it would look as if you were making them feel that they were a class apart. For they fancy that they gain by being separated from the rest of the Hindus. You have made the path of Dr. Ambedkar and Rao Bahadur Srinivasan easy and you have strengthened their hands. They will not be absorbed in Hinduism, but there will be cries of “Long live untouchables”, “Long live Harijans”.

I have not said all these things thoughtlessly, but what I see happening around me pains me. You have been trapped and if you do not courageously come out of it, you will harm the very cause for which you were prepared to lay down your life. You had intended one thing, quite the contrary has happened, let alone getting them considered as part and parcel of Hinduism. You have, instead of saving them, differentiated them by giving them a tempting name. They are not going to be Hindus by such temptation. Selfish and self-seeking preceptors will establish a new religion, a new sect, and you will be their instrument. Today Hindus, Mussalmans and Sikhs are fighting against one another. You will have added one more unit to the fighting forces. They have separate temples and more will be built, and even now different sects are fighting with one another to take possession of these. But the burden of my sorrow is this: All that in your name, with “Mahatma Gandhiki Jai” on their lips! Oh, the pity of it!!

Thus writes in effect an esteemed friend and fellow-worker. The original is in Gujarati. He is one among the very best of India’s servants. He is spending himself in her service. There is no mistaking the laceration of his heart, but I believe that his affection for me has led him astray and coloured his judgment. If untouchables are not absorbed in the Hindu mass and do not become one with the rest of the Hindus, the responsibility will not lie on my shoulders. It will lie on those of the so-called high-class Hindus who are resisting the absorption. According to them, the so-called untouchable classes have been untouchable from the beginning of time, and will, if they can help it, remain so to the end of time. Some of them have gone so far as to say that they will sacrifice themselves in the attempt to perpetuate this untouchability. What I have done is not merely to unfurl the banner of revolt against the perpetuation of what I hold to be a monstrous wrong, but I am constantly praying that I may be considered a fit sacrifice for the cause of liberation. I am inviting others to join in the prayer that they might also be deemed worthy to offer themselves as a sacrifice in this sacred cause. If, therefore, untouchability remains, it will do so, not because of what I have done, but in spite of what I have done and am doing. But that will be no new experience. Do we not know that God often upsets the plans of human beings? And it may be that His purpose demands that the so-called high-caste Hindus should harden their hearts, that they should refuse to listen to dictates of reason and justice and that Hinduism should become an extinct religion. For, refusal on the part of high-caste Hindus to regard the Harijans in every sense as equal members with the other Hindus will not now mean perpetuation of untouchability. I am quite clear in my mind that untouchability is gone. The untouchables will not remain slaves for ever. Thank God, they are being surely, if slowly, awakened. The pace is daily increasing. There are limits even to the patience of God Almighty. He gives a long rope to untruth and irreligion. But in the end, only Truth remains and nothing else. Hence Hinduism can only live minus untouchability, which is an untruth.

Whilst, therefore, I am thankful to this true friend for his warning voice and whilst I promise that I shall be more and more on the alert, I feel quite sure that the struggle was not begun a moment too soon and that it must go on against all odds,

April 22, 1933

Chi. Narandas,

I have had no letter from you for three days, that is, after the big packet and that makes me feel a little worried.

Kaka has heard that Anandi is having fever. Is that true? How is Kusum? I have sent a wire to you in regard to Lakshmibehn. I had a letter here from Narmada. I can’t tell whether anybody will come today. Probably I shall get a letter today. I am writing this before the prayer.

I worry about you also. I always send you others’ views about you. I do hope that they do not upset you. Anybody who undertakes an important responsibility should expect to be criticized. He will benefit by the criticism if he can hear it without being upset, but it would kill him if he takes it to heart. We have in the Ashram a bhajan about “Nindakababa”\(^1\). I would not say that it is a very good one.
That is, the author has not treated the detractor with generosity. But the lesson which it teaches is right. Anyway, whether you are calm or upset, I shall not feel worried if I regularly hear from you. For some time, therefore, you should drop me a postcard every day.

I have asked for your opinion regarding N. She will arrive there today. Her self-sacrifice seems just now to be as great as her former self-indulgence. On my suggesting to her to-get her hair cut in order to save expense on soap and hair oil, she did so. I have had many such experiences, but I have no time just now to write about them.

I am enclosing a letter from Kanumurti Ramamurti. He seems to have written to you about something. He wants to join the Ashram and has expressed his desire to see me. Till now I tried to dissuade him, but I will permit him now to come and see me. Meanwhile, if you have had any experience about him, let me know.

I have received an angry letter from Sitla Sahay. I have had a letter from Prabhudas too. Nothing is certain about his engagement.

I have your letter. That the paper is being regularly sent to you, there is absolutely no doubt. How it miscarries I do not know. The change of address was made as per your instructions. I will enquire again. You must get the paper regularly. Several others in Calicut are getting the paper. Therefore I hope that you have at least read all the

MY DEAR C. R.,

Your letter of 11th April was received by me only yesterday. Unfortunate, but there it is.

There is a delicacy about writing on the fate of the Bills. I would be prepared to write to the Viceroy and also to the Secretary of State, if you think it worth while, but I do not feel inclined to write about them publicly. It is hardly a dignified spectacle, a prisoner publicly criticizing a Government holding him under its custody. You will observe that I have scrupulously steered clear of any public criticism of the Government and I think that I should retain that detachment.

I would love to put Narasimhan under Dinshaw Mehta’s care, but I know that you do not believe, as much as I do, if at all, in nature-cure. Kaka is taking that cure at Sinhagad at present and Sinhagad is a very fine secluded sanatorium. It is only a few miles from Poona. If you will not send him to Sinhagad you should send him to the Mysore sanatorium.

Papa was bound to improve on your reaching there. I have made my suggestion about her also.

I make one more suggestion. It is quite likely that the Bjerrums have gone to a hill-station. They are very fine people and they will gladly take Papa. Papa knows sufficient English to be able to make herself at home with the Bjerrums. Of course you know that they are stationed at Pudukottah. If you want me to, I would gladly write to them.

Love from us all.

MY DEAR N.,

Shastri has been going to the station every morning since Wednesday and returning disappointed. Such was my anxiety about you. I am glad you have come at last and I hope that you are better. You will go straight to the Servants of India Society’s guest house and be there and come at the latest with Shastri, the editor, or ‘Harijan Shastri’ as he is called. If you do not feel hungry, you will not take even milk but simply fruit juice. If you do not feel like taking anything at all, drink only water, and come here and have the fruit juice I may provide for you. You do exactly as you feel before coming to me. It will be best not to take anything beyond fruit and milk. I hope you will be in a fit condition to come to me. If medical assistance is required before then, Shastri will see to its being procured. To S. you will give whatever food is available at the Society’s place. You will bring him with you when you come. Of course you cannot expose your bare head just now. I think I told you that you will have to tie a wet rag just as I do, and you will find that it is perfectly comfortable.

550. LETTER TO PURUSHOTTAM D. SARAIYA

April 22, 1933

CHI. KAKU,

I hope you understand why your marriage is taking place at such a time. All will be well if you and Lakshmi\(^1\) have understood that not enjoyment but self-sacrifice is the aim of marriage. After the marriage both of you should do public service with redoubled zeal, and be more vigilant in doing your duty. Both of you should perform on the marriage day the five yajnas that we have been performing.

May you both live long and be good servants of the country.

Blessings from
BAPU

[PS.]
I do not remember to have received any letter from you. A letter received by me seldom remains unanswered.

551. LETTER TO LAKSHMI JERAJANI

April 22, 1933

CHI. LAKSHMI,

The letter that I have written to Kaku is intended for you also. See that I do not lose you. You started the correspondence of your own free will, so do not stop now. Strengthen your qualities of self-sacrifice, simplicity, etc. Husband and wife are one another’s friends. The duty of friends is to help each other to rise higher and to cure each other’s weaknesses. You should protect Kaku’s purity and Kaku should protect yours. Go on rising with one another’s help in this manner. Live long and serve well. Write to me regularly.

552. LETTER TO GANGABEHN VAIDYA

April 22, 1933

CHI. GANGABEHN,

I have your letter. You have asked my blessings for Kaku and Lakshmi, but do you know that you have not given the date of the wedding? But Chandrashankar has given it. I, therefore, send the letters with this.

Kaka tells me in his letter that you fasted for three days. What was the cause? If anything happens for which you should think it necessary to fast, you should inform me about it.

. . . obtained five rupees to buy a Gandiva spinning-wheel, from which he gave three to . . . and the latter gave them to you. What is this story? Let me know. It is your duty to write to me even about such small things.

553. LETTER TO SHARDA C. SHAH

April 22, 1933

CHI. SHARDA,

How do you spend your day? What medicine do you take? What do you eat and drink? Who are your friends? How far is the sea from the house? Is it possible to go for a walk there? Do you go there? Who accompanies you? Do you write at the Ashram? To whom do you write? Answer these questions.

554. LETTER TO VISHVAMBHAR SAHAY

April 22, 1933

BHAJ VISHVAMBHAR SAHAY,

I have your letter. What more can I write on untouchability than what I am writing in the Harijan? And how shall I find the time? It is not a religious duty for anyone to eat with anyone in particular but it would be irreligious to hold that one must avoid accepting foodstuffs touched by someone on the ground of his belonging to a certain caste. But we may certainly refrain from drinking water offered by an unclean person.

555. ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

MORE ABOUT TEMPLE ENTRY

There is no doubt whatever that anyone who has no faith in image-worship is not entitled to participate in the movement for temple entry. No purpose would be served by allowing Harijans a right to have darshan\(^3\) from the spots you have indicated in the maps. only those restrictions should be applied to Harijans as are applied to the other Hindus. If the public has any objection to it, it would be better not to permit Harijans to enter the temples just now. If the trustees are keen on performing shuddhi\(^4\) of the images, they are entitled to do so. Before Harijans enter a temple they should of course be instructed about the general restrictions. In brief, I am clearly of the view that in the matter of temple entry coercion has no place at all.

It is improper to force entry of Harijans into a temple where a majority of the worshippers are opposed to it. If the worshippers approve of it, Harijans may certainly visit it. In any case, only those Harijans who abide by the rules applied to the general public are entitled to temple entry.

TRUE MAJORITY

I had recognized the difficulty about the majority at the very time the Bill was placed before me. I had told Rajaji that 51 per cent would not be proper. I had even suggested an amendment to it, for, I am clearly of the view that the great reform we are trying to bring about cannot become universal so long as there is no clear majority. And all of you would have noticed that for that very reason I have tried to accommodate the sentiments of even a lone opponent. For, what looks like a superstition to me may be a matter of life and death to him. His temple may be so dear to him that he regards it his all and it may be his honest belief that the darshan might have no efficacy if he were to have it standing by the side of a Harijan. Hence my suggestion that he may be given a separate time and the temple may undergo shuddhi for his sake.

True Majority

I have made this and many other suggestions, but I do not wish to discuss them any more just now. When the Bill comes before the committee, no reformer would hesitate to accept the amendment regarding the strength of majority and any others that deserve to be introduced. Of course, he would not compromise on principles on any account.

Inter-dining and Inter-caste Marriages

These two measures are not at all related to untouchability. No one is an untouchable in my eyes. But, for that reason, is there any justice in suggesting that I should either sit down for a meal with one whom I do not regard as untouchable or marry my son or daughter to such a one? Both these things are a matter of personal preference and individual right. But it is not a matter of right to regard any man as untouchable because of his birth. That is a gross injustice and heinous sin.

HARIJANS DON’T CARE

The question is not what they demand. The point is what we owe to them and what we have promised them in the open convention of the Hindu world in Bombay held under the presidency of Malaviyaji. We have made a promise to admit Harijans into temples and Hindus have pledged to lay down their lives to that end, if necessary. Do you remember the statement in Mahabharata? “Placetruth in one scale and a thousand yajnas in the other. The scale of truth will always be lower.” It is unbearable that we should break our promises to the Harijans and to God. I shudder at the mere thought. We can be patient with the sanatanists, we can plead with them, implore them, but how can we give up the matter of temple entry?

You say that things would sort themselves out once we educate the Harijans. But then caste Hindus themselves need to be educated as much. Not that there is no education today. But the great misfortune is that it is wrong education that is being given. The wrong education has given us wrong lessons. It teaches us that adharma is dharma, that sanctimoniousness is religion, that superstition is knowledge, that intolerance is kindness, that indulgence is restraint. And that the interpretation of the Shastras consists not in understanding their simple and straightforward meaning but in arbitrarily forcing on them a far-fetched and perverse meaning. First of all this wrong education will have to be wiped out.

THE SAME THING OVER AGAIN

Have you forgotten that at Bombay we made a promise to the Harijans without their asking for it? And what is the sense in saying that Harijans have not demanded? In many places, the poor, downtrodden, crushed Harijans do not ask for schools, they have no courage to ask for wells; nor do they demand any other rights. And so, does it behove us to say that we will grant them nothing till they ask for it. We have been riding on their shoulders. It would be enough if we got off. These poor creatures have been so oppressed that even if we got off they would not find the burden gone. But is it any justification to continue to ride on them?

556. WARNING TO ME

I do not wish to give the name of the author of this¹. But everybody knows him. He is one of the sincere servants of the country and has rendered exceptional service to the cause of Harijans. I, therefore, wish that everybody should read this letter carefully. I read it twice over, and pondered over it. The correspondent’s warning is justified, and timely. The fear he has expressed may even prove true.

If that happens, I will not repent. It will not be the first time that “Man proposes, God disposes” will have been proved true. God, though He ordains everything, takes responsibility for nothing; otherwise I would throw all responsibility on Him and disclaim any for myself. At the most I would accept responsibility only for approving of a suggestion made by an Antyaja friend to substitute the word ‘Antyaja’ by the sweeter one ‘Harijan’. I will not mind if the slogan ‘Jai to Antyajas’ is replaced by ‘Jai to Harijans’.

The sanatanists assert that the Antyajas have been a distinct class from time immemorial and say that they will sacrifice their lives to keep them so. I have been praying to God, and persuading others also to pray, to grant me the strength to sacrifice my life to secure their assimilation into the Hindu fold and end their separation. The sanatanist friends have been striving to perpetuate the separation of Antyajas and are prepared to accept responsibility for the consequences. The question of responsibility, therefore, does not arise.

¹ The extracts from the correspondent’s letter preceding Gandhiji’s comments are not translated here. The author had stated that the anti-untouchability movement being carried on in Gandhiji’s name was in effect perpetuating the Harijans’ separation from the Hindu fold.
It would be far better that Harijans should fight savarna Hindus than that they should for ever remain wretched slaves and dependent on savarna Hindus, living on their goodwill and eating their leftovers. Neither Dr. Ambedkar nor Rao Bahadur Srinivasan needs my help to prepare for such a fight. Time has been doing its work. It has brought forth these two friends and will bring forth many more like them, if, that is, savarna Hindus do not do their duty.

What had been happening before our eyes would not have ceased to happen by our pretending that it was not happening. A snake in the house will not run away by our pretending that it was not there. A disease does not get cured by our ignoring it. I look upon myself as a wise vaid in this matter. My diagnosis is quite correct, and the remedy I have prescribed is also the most appropriate for this particular disease. I have no doubt at all that if it is applied the disease is bound to be cured. What can the vaid do, however, if the patient does not apply the remedy? At the most he may start an indefinite fast at the patient’s residence. Indeed the vaid is getting ready to do so. Only, he must make himself fit to undertake such a fast. The moment he becomes so he will, not be held back by anybody.

It is not the Harijans who have got the disease; if they have got any, the cause of it is the savarna Hindus. It is the latter who have got the disease. But they deny that they have and threaten the vaid for his diagnosis. But the vaid will not hold his tongue. He has been shouting at the top of his voice, ‘Take care, the house is on fire.’

What is ordained, however, cannot be prevented. Nobody has been able to do so. If Hinduism is ordained to perish, what can anybody do? One’s sense of right and wrong is conditioned by one’s past karmas. And past karmas mean the future. savarna Hindus will be prompted to do what is in keeping with the future that is ordained for them. How can one, therefore, blame them either?

I would, therefore, suggest to this servant of the country that he should not lose patience, nor his appetite or sleep, but should go on doing his duty with single-minded devotion. He will probably say, and rightly, that he felt it was his duty to warn me and that having discharged it, he felt relieved. In that case there is no need for me to console him. He has done well indeed to warn me I will be and remain more vigilant. As to my path, I see it clear before me and will take care not to stray from it. My aim is the same as that of this servant of the country. Like him, I, too, do not want the Harijans to become a separate sect. I do not wish even in my dreams to be the Acharya of such a new sect. I wish to become and die as a true servant of the Hindus and, therefore, of the Harijans, of India and, therefore, of Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs, Parsis, Christians, Jews and all others.

The warning, however, given by this servant of the country is as much for the sanatanists as it is for me. Will they heed it?

557. HARIJAN SCHOOLS IN KATHIAWAR

Shri Mulchand Parekh, secretary of Kathiawar Harijan Committee, had suggested to me that I should write something about Harijan schools, etc., in the _Harjanbandhu_. Thereupon I asked for a report of their activities. He has sent the following report:

I have already expressed my opinion. Not a single one of those schools and ashrams which already exist should close down for want of funds. If there are only a handful of workers, they should sell their property and sell themselves even to keep the institutions going. If there are such financial difficulties, they indicate that the people of Kathiawar have no interest in Harijan welfare or they do not trust the workers. Whatever the truth, the only way to create such interest or trust is the workers self-sacrifice.

I hear suggestions of collecting funds from outside Kathiawar, from a place as far off as Africa. It is shameful if we have to do that. Those Kathiawaris who reside abroad should keep themselves informed of such philanthropic organizations and they should send contributions without being asked. Organizations like Kathiawar Harijan Samiti can easily subsist if every rich Kathiawari puts aside 10 per cent or whatever portion of his earnings he thinks proper for rendering such help.

The proper thing is that the local Kathiawaris should take

1 Not translated here. Under the auspices of the Kathiawar Harijan Samiti, 23 Harijan schools were functioning at various places in Kathiawar and giving education to 1648 Harijan pupils. But due to paucity of funds, the Samiti had decided to close down the schools. Gandhiji had then instructed them not to do so and on his advice the Samiti had issued a public appeal for funds. They had collected Rs. 7,000, but still needed another Rs. 3,000, to run the schools for a year.
interest in such organizations and identify themselves with them. It is really shameful on our part to have to trouble an old man like Abbas Saheb to help us collect funds. I, therefore, hope that after reading Shri Mulchand Parekh’s statement people will send their donations unasked and ensure the survival of the organizations.

Harijanbandhu, 23-4-1933

558. COMPLAINT AGAINST WOMEN

I give below the gist of what a Harijan from Karachi has written to me, retaining his broken language as far as possible:

The sense of pollution through touch is much stronger among women. More so against the Dhed Harijans. They throw down to them stale, dirty, rotten left-over food. The women believe that only stale and rotten food should be given to the Bhangis. They are convinced that this is proper. The Bhangi men and women as a matter of course believe that they are getting their morning meal in return for their scavenging work. If they Hindu society stops giving rotten food to the Bhangi and the other communities, I can humbly say that pollution will disappear from the women. You will have to plead further with women to shed the superstitious notion of pollution through touch.

I have given the above as the substance of a long letter. Untouchability will not be eradicated merely by women giving good food to the Harijan brethren instead of left-overs, but if they did that, certainly it would be said that they women had some compassion in their hearts. The complaint against women is a genuine one. If they wish, they can forthwith effect this reform. This does not involve a question of money but only a change of heart. The woman in whose heart God dwells can readily accept a harijan as a fellow-being. The students of Dehra Dun had raised the same question and what I wrote in reply to it applies here also. By controlling their palate, the women can give a clean share of food to the Harijans without adding to the expense by a single pie. I have a childhood memory. Many times my mother ate after feeding a sadhu. She would serve out lovingly what she herself was to eat and having fed him thus she would take here meal and feel rewarded. Similarly, how nice it would be if women took out the share for the Harijans first and then served the other! In this case, a Harijans ceases to be a beggar but becomes a family member or a guest. She would feed him lovingly and merely by doing this she would make that Harijan clean. Instead of proudly throwing food from upstairs, she would hand over the food herself to the Bhangi and, if she found his hands dirty, she would ask him to clean them. If he does not have clean clothes, she would provide them. She would buy utensils for him or would given him only dry and uncooked food or would increase his wages. When a Bhangi develops self-respect he will, others, accept payment only. Before such a time comes, I have suggested only interim reforms. Many reforms will occur to women themselves when they have had a change of heart, when the ghost of untouchability has been exorcized and when the feeling that Harijans are inferior is removed. Without waiting for anyone to take up this work on a large scale, a woman who feels the need for this reform should make a beginning with herself and then invite her neighbours to join her.

1 Vide “Students and Vacation”, 1-4-1933.

560. LETTER TO B.¹

April 23, 1933

MY DEAR . . .

Your letter of 18th April. It is utterly unworthy of belief. N.² was with me when I read your letter and I asked her whether in her opinion when she was playing with fire you were untouched by it and she said point blank ‘No’. I know of no young man—and I have known hundreds, if not thousands—who having strayed had not deceived himself as you seem to have. For I gather from your letter that all the time you were with N. you were unmoved by any animal passion whatsoever. This is impossible for any person who is not utterly impotent or who is not a God, and I suppose that you are neither the one nor the other. You should get rid of this self-deception altogether, if you will be a true man. You were no baby, nor was N. playing the part of mother when she forgot herself and the limitations of sex that God has imposed upon us human beings.

I would therefore strongly advise you to give up all sentimentality, to become a practical man and give yourself truly to Harijan service, whereas you were before now merely playing at it.

Yours sincerely,

561. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

April 23, 1933

DEAR SATISBABU,

I have your postcard and your letter, both received the same day. What correction would you send me now about your wire?³ I think the thing is all forgotten, and for the sake of truth what is now necessary is not a correction which is unwanted, but mental alertness which will not be satisfied with unsifted facts or loose arguments or expressions based upon those facts. It is not possible for me to prove with perfect logic that the extent of untouchability in Madras is much greater than in Bengal. But for our purpose, i.e., for the reformer who wants to get at the root of the evil and to serve only truth, it is a completely proved proposition that untouchability is by far the greatest in the South, because there it is not the caste Hindus on the one side and untouchables on the other, but Brahmins on the one side and non-Brahmins on the other. Non-Brahmins include all Hindus and all the non-Brahmins are undoubtedly untouchables, not perhaps in accordance with the definition of the Franchise Committee or the Census Commissioner, but most decidedly according to our definition. There is untouchability as to water, as to food and as to temple-going between Brahmins and non-Brahmins. But there are grades of untouchability, the bottom list containing the unseeable, who not only must not be seen but whose voice even must not be heard by the Brahmins. The temples are not arranged in the South as in the North. There, there are barriers for all the divisions. I do not even know the actual barriers created, but there they are, and what you and I want to remove is those barriers. I am just now to go through the illuminating chapter on untouchability in the Bengal Census Report, but you see now my point. No correction that you may make will answer the purpose, but let us understand the position thoroughly for ourselves and I would just now suggest to you: ‘Dismiss the South from you mind altogether. Don’t go by the mental state, then perhaps the comparatively more sensitive namasudra feels the comparatively lighter untouchability much more than the comparatively less sensitive unseeable feels the grossest form of untouchability. Therefore irrespective of what the South does or does not do, your own work is cut out for you: you have to get rid of the untouchability of Bengal, whether it affect 50 per cent of the Hindu population or 5 per cent.

I understand what you say about Dr. P. C. Ray and Gurudev. I think that the more you study the situation the more you will find, as I have found already, that educated Bengal does want a revision of the

1 The addressee had mentioned that though Dr. P. C. Ray was earlier in favour of the Poona Pact, he had now grown averse to it. As for Gurudev, the addressee had invited him to preside over a meeting on the Yeravda Pact or to send a message. But Rabindranath Tagore had replied that he was surveying things from a higher level and did not like to be mixed up in current politics.
Yeravda Pact' and so far as I am concerned it may have that revision if it can conciliate the Bengal Harijans and all the other parties interested, provided of course that there is no tampering with the joint system. that they are going about it the wrong way is true and unfortunate. It is equally unfortunate that non-Bengalis are being blamed for what happened. Bengalis should have come in their numbers to the meeting in Bombay. There is a very fine legal maxim in Latin which says: ‘Equity serves the vigilant, not the dormant.’ But you cannot say anything to a person who is oppressed with grievances and is angry. Therefore I have adopted complete silence. That by itself will produce a reasonable spirit, and I would advise you too to observe absolute silence. You have said enough and you have given your word to the Harijans of Bengal that so far as you are concerned the Pact is a sacred thing, not to be altered without the unanimous consent of all parties. Have I made myself quite clear to you?

I see that you are now having a proper ebb in the circulation of Harijan. But I do hope that you will not have to run it at a loss, and it comes to the losing point, you will stop publication. If bengal does not want ‘Bengali Harijan’, we may not force it upon it. The circulation of Hindi, Gujarati and English editions is steadily increasing. The English has been self-supporting almost from the beginning, and it is expected that the Gujarati and the Hindi will be, perhaps, inside of a month. Did I tell you that there was also a Tamil edition published by Ganesan? He is a very energetic worker and had given himself entirely to such causes.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR RUDRAMUNI,

I thank you for your letter. It is because you belong to the priesthood of the Harijan community that I have felt so sore about you. I cannot help feeling that you have neglected N. You should not have taken her there. You did nothing in the shape of putting her to the work for which you took her to your village and, if N. is right in what she says, you would not condescend to do any physical work. How I wish you would be an ideal priest to the Harijan and labour with them and for them, avoiding all the weaknesses and vices of the caste Hindu priests! How I wish you, by the strength of your character and learning, command respect from the most fastidious caste Hindus!

So far as I can understand, you never refunded to Ramachandra the money for the ticket that you should have purchased for N. but for which you were too late. And then N. tells me that you resented her cropping her hair. Surely, it was a matter for you to welcome when a sister who had but till yesterday been leading an unclean life suddenly resolves to throw off all uncleanness and adopt a life of renunciation, apart from the economic and the hygienic necessity of removing the hair. Do you not understand, as a Hindu, that as a sannyasini, which according to our notion she had become, she cannot keep hair or any ornamentation that would tempt base human nature?

Lastly, you have not told me that the ticket for her to come to Poona was kindly paid for by a Parsi gentleman. Please let me have his full name and address. You will understand that I have not written this letter to rebuke you. I have no right to do so. I have not known you except through N. But because I consider you to be one of my own and because I feel for you I have written this in the hope that it may serve as a warning for the future. If I have unconsciously done an injustice to you, you will please correct me.

April 23, 1933

MY DEAR RAMACHANDRA,

I have your letter with N.'s letter. She and your letter came by the same mail. So you see that I anticipated you. I was anxiously watching her progress at Chitaldrug and I saw that having been instrumental in the sudden revolution in her life it would have been sinful on my part to have allowed her to pine away in Chitaldrug without the Harijans benefiting by her presence. I have therefore no alternative but to have her directly under my care. I know that the experiment is not free from danger. I do not know, I suppose she herself does not know, whether the revolution has come to stay in her life. The break with the past is too sudden and yet I have known people to undergo such apparently sudden transformation. Looking back upon her letters I can trace the invisible working of her mind and the unconscious war between the forces of evil and forces of good that was going on within her. Let us hope that the forces of good have triumphed over those of evil.

Please tell me if you are out of pocket on her behalf and if so let me have your account. Did Rudramuni ever refund the money you paid for her ticket to Chitaldrug?

565. LETTER TO PRAGJI K. DESAI

April 23, 1933

CHI. PRAGJI,

I got your letter after craving for one for a long time. I pray that you brother may get well.

Parvati seems to have forgotten me completely. Her sending messages has no value for me. Has she ever written to me even under some pretext? She should not talk about past times. You must have received my letter. If you really wish to talk about untouchability, then only can you meet me, otherwise be content with my letter. My advice is that you should be satisfied with the letter.

I still have to reply to you about your complaint against Manilal. I will do that after you have settled down.

CHI. PREMA,

The right hand is sufficiently tired. I, therefore, wish to preserve all my strength for writing articles for Harijan. I don’t think it will require complete rest.

I wrote one letter¹ to you a few days ago. This letter, therefore, can be brief.

I will inquire about books for parachure Shastri.

Maitri will give you trouble. If she is at all likely to improve, she will do so only if we tolerate her and treat her with love. She should not feel the absence of her mother. Women may be exempted during their monthly periods from rules of work as may be thought necessary. If some or most of them abuse this freedom, the Ashram will not be responsible for that. If somebody misuses the time set apart for sleep, we cannot reduce that period on that account.

Do not lose you patience. You must always remember that a reformer a servant of the people can do no useful work unless he or she is patient. Let this be written in bold letters on you wall; inscribe it in an amulet and wear it on you arm.

If she receives permission from the Ashram, N. will come there in a very few day. She has openly led an immoral life, borrowed money and told lies. But now she has become almost a nun. I have not felt any insincerity in this. After she had realized her errors, she has done whatever I advised her to do. If she is likely to get an opportunity to adhere to here praise-worthy resolution, it is only in the Ashram that she will do. Anywhere else, she will either wither away or relapse into here old ways. she has great ability and wide knowledge. She has read the Mahabharata. If she come there, cultivate here acquaintance and introduce her to other women. Don’t ask here anything about her past. She herself will be ready to talk about it, but it would be undesirable to talk about it or make her talk about it. It is harmful to recall memories of sinful pleasures. if she takes interest in talking about her immoral past, you may conclude that she is still not free from such desires. Regard her as you your younger sister and point out her faults to her with love. You can ask me whatever you like about her past life. I have written all this today because I may not get time to write much later when she is asked to go there. Her son is a fine boy.

Before I can answer your question, you should tell me that, when Premabehn asked you, you told her that you were not playing but were trying to save the drowning ant. 568. LETTER TO HEMPRABHA DAS GUPTA

April 23, 1933

DEAR HEMPRABHA.

I got your letter.

Your resolve to write to me every Sunday has brought me immense relief. Fixing a time for a job that needs to be done saves time and energy and promotes peace of mind.

The news about Arun gave me pleasure. From what I am thinking and observing, I feel that you and Arun should give up rice and subsist on milk, curds, juicy fruits and salad. Rice is superfluous.

Write to me about the problems that crop up at the Pratishthan. Do not take them as a misfortune. “That which goes by the name of adversity is not such; nor is that prosperity which goes by that name. To forget God is adversity; ever to think of Him is prosperity.”

You need no comforting but being a self appointed father I cannot help it. God is your companion; friend, playmate, father and everything else and we identify Him with Ramanama. It so happened last night that I found sleep eluding me but it came to me as soon as I started repeating Ramanama.

569. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS OF INDIA

April 23, 1933

Dr. Ambedkar* having received several communications from Harijan friends as to the desirability of altering the panel system in the Poona Pact† came to sound my views about the proposal. The substitute suggested is that only those Harijan candidates should be declared elected who succeed in getting a fixed minimum of the votes of Harijans from among the joint electorates. Not having ever applied my mind to this formula, I was unable to give him any answer. I simply told him that he should first see the different Harijan Associations and others interested, and then let me know their views. He asked me, however, to consider the proposal independently, and write to him at London my opinion which I shall try to do.⁵

Asked why Dr. Ambedkar wanted a change, Mr. Gandhi replied that Dr. Ambedkar stated that so far as he was concerned he was quite satisfied with the panel system, and he would not go back on the Poona Pact. But pressure was being brought to bear upon him for securing the above change.

² According to the source, “Dr. Ambedkar had a forty-five-minute interview with Mr. Gandhi this morning. Messrs K. O. Chitre, K. G. Shinde and other local non-Brahmin leaders were also present. The interview was specially arranged, as Gandhiji did not see Visitors on Sundays.”

⁵ For Gandhiji’s opinion, Vide “Letter to E. Lindsay”, 10-3-1933 to “Letter to Samanera Sangharatna”, 10-3-1933.
Asked for his views on the panel system, Mr. Gandhi said:

Personally, my opinion is that the panel system is perfectly harmless so long as Harijans do not distrust caste Hindus.

Will you be prepared to accept the alteration if the others also agree?

I would not easily accept the change. I have not yet considered it. Because everybody agrees, it does not follow that I should accept it. I would examine every such proposal solely from the Harijan point of view, because it never crossed my mind that there can ever be a conflict of interest between the Harijans and the caste Hindus. My confirmed opinion is that whatever is in the real interest of the Harijans must necessarily be in the interest of the caste Hindus. As I believe I have the capacity of examining such questions from the Harijan point of view, I should not mind standing alone, and defending my position if unfortunately things came to such a pass that, for my opinion, I could not secure a single supporter.

570. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 23/24, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I was relieved to get you postcard. You must have received the letter which I wrote to you yesterday. Narmada came and saw me yesterday. She seemed to be a very good girl. She is very eager to work. I have asked her to come again with Lakshmibehn.

I will be very glad if the doctor\(^1\) fulfils our expectations of him.

N. has arrived here with her son. At present she seems to be carrying out all my instructions with wonderful promptness. If you have not written and communicated you decision before you get this letter, and if you have arrived at a decision now, send me a wire. if you have not consulted the others, please do so.

If you have copies of the Ashram rules, send a copy each in whatever languages you have them. If you remember the circumstances in which Godavari and Pandurang Choudhari had to leave, let me know. Prema is likely to know more about Godavari.

During a discussion among us about N., Chhaganlal\(^2\) expressed a view against her being admitted. I, therefore, asked him to write

---

\(^1\) Dr. Hiralal Sharma, a naturopath and chromopath

\(^2\) Chhaganlal Joshi down his view and also to say what precautions should be taken if she was admitted. I have just read his note after finishing the other letters. If you decide to take her in, we cannot put on her the restrictions which Chhaganlal suggests. They will not be for her good or that of the Ashram. We must utilize her abilities in whatever way we can, conforming to Ashram discipline. We should not send a new entrant outside the Ashram for work, but I would certainly put Hrijan children in her hands. We should admit her, assuming that she has turned a new leaf in her life, otherwise we ought not to take her in at all. But I should like to explain this point at greater length. If you consent is received, I will certainly send all necessary instructions. It will be enough for the present if you understand that she is not to be admitted as a sinner.

April 25, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS.

I got your letter. I can see—from your language that you are unhappy. I am sure your replies are not addressed to me, for I did not want them. I assume that they are addressed to Chhaganlal.

My view about your honesty and your efficiency has not changed. When it changes, I shall not be able to protect you. You should not feel concerned till it changes. I have found your reply to Chhaganlal’s complaint convincing; but I feel hidden anger in your language. There is no reason at all for you to be angry. Chhaganlal wrote down what he thought. There was no malice in it, but only his inability to see the truth. You will be able to see this inability in his letter about N. He can have no reason for malice towards her, but he was frightened by her immoral life in the past, could not overcome that fear and so thought as he did. His deficiency, therefore, is of the intellect and not of the heart. However that may be, you should learn to adopt a calm attitude towards such criticism and accept whatever may be worth accepting in it. Such strength cannot be acquired in a day. It will be enough if you keep on trying.

Whether or not it is improper for Prema or other girls to walk with their arms round each other’s neck, I cannot say unless I see myself what they do. Read that letter if you have not done so. If, after reading it, you wish to ask further questions, you may.

I may have to burden you with one more guest. You know Margarete Spiegel who stayed in the Ashram for some time and worked among Harijans. She will probably land in Bombay tomorrow. 577. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

April 25, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

I got your letter. You have imagined too much in my letter1. It did not contain any such thing. In my letter to Narandas, I had referred to the complaints against you. With them in my mind, I had said how fine it would be if, among your many virtues, you added the ability to tolerate the defects of other people generously. I had to ask Narandas not to show that letter to you. I felt unhappy when doing so and made those remarks. I did not intend to admonish you. Since there is a limit beyond which human nature cannot be changed, I did not think it proper to write anything to you.

I hope you will be satisfied with this explanation. You may now read that letter if you wish.

You yourself may decide whether or not you should go on a month’s leave. If N. goes there, I should like you to be there when she arrives. But ask Narandas and follow his advice.

I do worry about your throat. But I am helpless. If its condition worsens, I will blame you. I would be happy if you decide to stop speaking altogether. That will not come in the way of your work. Trappist monks and nuns observe complete silence and still work the whole day. You may eat uncooked vegetables, but you should crush them before eating. If you take unboiled milk and fruits, probably you can do without vegetables.

580. LETTER TO F. MARY BARR

April 26, 1933

CHI. MARY,

I was wondering what had happened to you not having heard from you after your departure from the Ashram. I was therefore delighted to have your letter. I am sorry that Maria had such a breakdown. The fact is that she postponed her rest too long. I hope however that she is now benefitting by the relaxation. For it is not so much the bracing air as the relaxation of mind and body that she needs. She must therefore give herself as much rest as she can both to body and mind, and as a quack doctor I suggest to her that she must eat sparingly restricting herself as much as it is possible to milk and fruit of which there is so much to be had. She may take salad vegetables but she does not need them. If she carries out these very simple instructions to the letter she will find that she will derive the greatest benefit from the change. She must not at present think of writing her book. She may write it when she has completely recovered her vitality and lost the haggard pensive look that she had about her when I met her. I must not omit to add that she ought not to take those two poisons, tea and coffee, so bad for nerves. I suggest a home-made substitute, hot water, Kashmir honey and a few drops of lemon. She will find this to be a complete, effective substitute for milk or coffee or cocoa.

I suggest a novel recreation for both of you. In going about for your walks, make a search for all the Harijans you can find and add to your knowledge of Hindi by trying to make yourselves understood by them and in understanding them. And do not forget the prescription for avoiding cold. Keep yourselves moving as much as possible in the open air.

Mahadev had your letter. We are all doing well and send love to you.

588. LETTER TO JAMNABEHN GANDHI

April 26, 1933

CHI. JAMNA,

I very much liked the letter you wrote to me. Whenever we see a wrong being done, one may caution and restrain the husband, the father and even the king. If the person does not listen to one immediately, one may repeat the caution again and again. But this is for the future.

I do not believe that girls who are kept under strict restraint do not feel passion. On the contrary they lose all self-control and when the parents learn the fact they too cover it up. We should try to discover the middle way. We should give freedom to boys and girls and also teach them self-restraint. Do uncovered heads arouse passion where it is not the custom to cover the head? What do you think happens in the Madras Presidency where the girls wear their hair loose? The seat of the passions is not outside oneself, but inside—in one’s eyes. The impure eye will see impurity everywhere.

Nevertheless, it is the duty of the senior women to sit together and think about the problem of the girls and draw up instructions for them, which should then be put before the girls and even before the men. I have stated above my own point of view so that all of you may think about the problem. I should like you to call a meeting of all the women and discuss it. Will you take the initiative?

I have written to Purushottam asking him not to go to Rajkot. He should stay on for your sake at least.

590. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 26, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

You must have received the letter1 which I wrote to you yesterday. I forgot to enclose in it a newspaper cutting to be shown to Dr. Sharma. I send it with this letter. These days I have to write with the left hand and so could not write yesterday all that I wished to. I hope to do so today. I felt that it would be better if Chhaganlal replied to your comments on his criticisms of you, and so pressed him to do that. Accordingly, he has given me his reply. After careful thinking I felt that I ought to send it to you, and am doing so. I don’t think it proves the necessity of your reforming your method of work in any respect, but I do see in his note his honesty of purpose. I have never felt any malice in him. But he is suspicious by nature and cannot easily put a straightforward interpretation on things. He does not readily see the virtues of the other party, and magnifies the defects. This gives an impression to other people that he lacks generosity of heart. He does not wish to be ungenerous nor is he ungenerous by nature. But people who do not understand him can easily see ungenerosity in him. If I have succeeded in convincing you of this, the anger and intolerance which are present in your reply would not be there. Your charge that some inmates of the Ashram realized the necessity of better educational facilities for children after they themselves had children, is unworthy of you. And it is not true, either. It is utterly wrong to believe that Narahari, Chhaganlal and others who subscribe to this criticism are as selfish as that. They also are loyal inmates of the Ashram and are good men. They also care for the good of the Ashram as much as we do. They may be—they are—less efficient, but you ought not to be conscious in the slightest degree of your greater efficiency or be proud of it. Even a mention of somebody else’s inefficiency is an indirect form of self-praise. I want you to avoid even that. And suppose that children are born to inmates of the Ashram and some new ideas occur to the parents when the children grow up a little, we should not detect in that their selfishness as parents. This thing is part of human nature and criticism of it is not just. All that we should expect from people is this: one should desire for others, children what one desires for one’s own and should make no distinction between one’s children and other’s children under one’s charge. We may say that in the measure that this attitude is absent in the Ashram we are imperfect. However, no inmate of the Ashram should say that the shortcomings are those of others and not his. It is as difficult to know one’s shortcomings fully as it is to attain self-realization. And I believe that for a person who can see his shortcomings fully and who ceaselessly strives to overcome them to the best of his ability, self-realization is no difficult task. I, therefore, certainly desire that, if you feel that it was improper for you to make such a statement and that it cannot be proved, you should withdraw it and apologize to your co-workers. However, I don’t want you to withdraw it only to please me if you yourself are not convinced of its impropriety. If you sincerely believe that the reason why people make this criticism against you is that they have children now, let your charge remain till in course of time you learn from experience that it is not true. In the Ashram nobody should be asked to apologize merely for the sake of form. Such apology would benefit no one. For us apology can have only one meaning; namely, that it is sincere admission of one’s error. All of us must tolerate the charges which our co-workers make against us. I don’t ask those who make charges against you to apologize to you, because they sincerely believe what they say. I can advise them to apologize only when I can change their belief. The same rule applies to you.

Chhaganlal’s second objection is against your criticism of him for occasionally requiring food to be sent to his room. Maybe when he had a guest he found it necessary to ask for a thali for him in his room. I see nothing wrong in that. If a guest turns up unexpectedly, what else can a person who does not cook in his own house do? And if a guest has turned up just at mealtime, I can understand that one might not like to bring him to the common kitchen, for it might be possible to talk to him only during the meal. I do not know whether or not Chhaganlal had these legitimate reasons, but I do not expect criticism for such things from you. Need there be any limit to generosity? Our ideal examples of generosity are king Bali, Yudhishtira and others like them. The former lost his whole kingdom through his generosity and Yudhishtira stopped the blood from flowing out of his wound in order to save king Virat from Arjuna’s wrath and, before the latter arrived, got it all cleaned by Draupadi and waited as if nothing had happened. Our aspiration is that we should be able to do easily in this age all that they could do in ancient times.

I did not read any complaint on your part in your references to Purushottam1 and Kanu2, but saw in them only an acknowledgment that things could not be otherwise in the Ashram. Mahadev, on the other hand, supports Chhaganlal’s interpretation and says that you nurse a grievance about Purushottam and Kanu having remained without a knowledge of history, geography, etc. Whether it is that or whether it is an acknowledgment on your part of what is inevitable in the Ashram, your own interpretation should be accepted as the only right one. Let me, therefore, know what the truth is. My own view is that we should not regret any boy having not learnt what passes today as history and geography. On the contrary, I believe that the boys could not have acquired anywhere else what they have in the Ashram. Moreover, they have learnt history and geography, too, of the kind to which we attach value. I do feel unhappy, but not by way of complaint against anybody. I feel unhappy about the interpretation of the Ashram itself. I know that we have not been able to give the children all that we were eager to give them. Isn’t that my own shortcoming? That people do not regard it as such is another matter. But when we try to draw up a balance-sheet and examine the credit and the debit columns, a shortcoming must be recognized as a shortcoming. The Ashram has grown according to the capacities of the persons whom I could attract and the ideas which I could implement. I can enumerate no end of shortcomings to be found in the Ashram. And still I love it, for it is chiefly my handiwork. If I had greater ability and the circumstances had been more favourable, the Ashram would be a more attractive place and there would have been no ground for the criticism which it deserves in some respects. My purpose, however, in stating all this is to persuade you not to see the shortcomings of others and not to criticize people who might criticize you, only to point out the error in their criticism and accept whatever is acceptable in it and act upon it. This will save you from many problems.

And now a few words about Chhaganlal’s note. Like his previous note, I didn’t like this one either. If I wish, Chhaganlal would readily amend it. But in that case you would not be able to know what he really thinks. What is necessary is that you and I should love him despite our knowledge of what he thinks. If we fail to do that, we cannot prove that the Ashram is a large family. And, moreover, if we cut ourselves off from everybody, one after another, for small defects, we would be left alone in the world. Nobody except God can afford that. This is why I have often stated that one should forget oneself completely and become a cypher. Nothing can equal the joy of that state. As for Chhaganlal’s note, I see an error in almost every sentence of it.

Chhaganlal’s language is offensive and betrays his thoughtlessness and intolerance. Leaving aside your anger and your charges, he has not been able to see at all the effectiveness of your reply. Even in regard to points on which you have given a convincing reply, he has again offered advice.

In writing about Chhaganlal, I have been completely frank. I know that there was no need to advise you. I have explained this to him. I had also let him read what I wrote to you; even then he has written what he has. If I did not know him, his remarks would have seemed utterly mean to me too. But I should like even you not to see meanness in them but only his lack of intelligence. I am sending such a note to you hoping that you will be able to ignore even such criticism like that with a generous heart. I believe that since I am forwarding the note to you, you are completely safe and so is Chhaganlal. It is a great good fortune of the Ashram that we are trying to tell, without any fear; even the unpleasant thoughts which we think about one another.

I will now end this letter. It is I who am loading heavier burdens on you. I don’t hesitate to put before you even criticism in which I do not believe and, by doing so, I waste your, and therefore the Ashram’s, time. But I think it was absolutely necessary to do this. But now it is enough. You need not at all reply to the accompanying note. If you understand the few point: which I have tried to explain to you, you may write a line or two accordingly. This letter, too, contains some good ideas. Do therefore, show it to others but don’t think that it is necessary for you to discuss any point with anybody. Keep on trying to do the best you can. As desired by you, I am also returning your letter.

592. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

April 26, 1933

CHI. MANI,

I got your letter only two or three days ago. Your letters, no matter how long, will never be too long for us. If, however, you expect Father or me to write very long letters, we cannot satisfy you. But I can understand your desire for such letters. We enjoy quite a number of amenities and even luxuries to which you in Belgaum are perfect strangers. But we would prove ourselves unworthy servants of the nation and unworthy parents if we used them or asked them for any but public purposes. Nobody would think well of a person who claims to be a father of hundreds of children and lets his mind soar in the clouds. So, then, we enjoy all these luxuries to the full and you or Mridula may envy our good fortune as much as you like. You had already passed a sarcastic remark in regard to Mirabehn, and have withdrawn it also. What is a father’s duty? Should he give his children what each needs, or should he give the same to all and thus not only do great injustice but, maybe, make himself responsible for the death of one of the children through his attempt to prove himself just in the eyes of the world or to his immature child? If, suppose, you are suffering from a disease and have to be given bajra bread and skimmed buttermilk, does that mean that a girl like Bharati¹, who would require to be nourished on butter, honey and light chapatis, should be given the same food as you? A father is bound to provide all that is necessary for a child’s welfare. He is free to indulge the child and give it more in so far as it is consistent with such welfare, but is not bound to do so. It should not be necessary to explain this to you after all these years. But I have to produce a long letter somehow, and so am indulging in all this philosophizing. If you were not at all angry with us, why were you making yourself miserable? Why did you show such lack of faith? Why didn’t you rest assured that one of us must have written to you? I agree that both should write if possible.
But no one would be eager to write if he found that the fate of his letters was so uncertain. One letter [a week] is regularly sent to you, and, you may rest assured, will continue to be sent in the hope that you will somehow get at least one. Father has undertaken to give a detailed reply to your letter. He will, therefore, give you the replies to your messages, and also give the replies to your queries in detail. I should certainly like to reply to some of them myself, but I resist the temptation. Anandi’s operation is an old story now. She left for the Ashram long ago and she is quite well there. She got cold and fever some time ago, but that was only for a few days. . . .² came and saw us, care of her. He is a husband, a friend, a teacher and a servant in one.

At present at any rate it seems that even her Creator could not have found a better husband for her. Whether . . . deserves him or not, God alone knows. But I myself had pointed out her weaknesses to . . .
before the marriage, and had written to him and said that he could break off the engagement without any hesitation if he did not like it.
But, trained under . . ., how would . . . go back on his decision?
Everyone had showered love on her at the time of her marriage.
Everyone gave her some present or the other. They will not have to

593. THE YERAVDA PACT

[April 27, 1933]²

Though an agitation has been going on in Bengal for some time for securing a revision of the Yeravda Pact, I have not felt called upon to take part in the discussion, if only not to embarrass the Bengal friends. The Pact is safe so long as even one party interested in it opposes any change. At the same time, any opposition for the sake of it would be foolish, if it could be demonstrated that a particular change was necessary. I do not pretend to understand the local situation in Bengal. Therefore, I felt that it would be presumptuous on my part to take part in the Bengal controversy, till it became absolutely necessary for me to do so and till all the material required for forming a judgment upon it was before me. But I assured the Harijan friends who referred to me for my opinion that I would not do anything without consultation with them and that I had till now seen nothing to alter my view.

Generally I have always held the opinion that, when the principle of reservation is accepted, not imposed, the party in whose interest the reservation is accepted should determine the quantum. In the case of Harijans, I have felt further that they could not have too many seats reserved for them, especially if the criterion were not mere untouchability but backwardness. Indeed, if I could have my way, I would throw open the list of untouchable voters to all backward classes under one generic name and permit every Hindu who chose to come under that list. That would at once correct the atmosphere, and untouchability will be banished at least from politics. To this perhaps the sanatanists, too, would have no objection. They have never, so far as I am aware, demurred to the representation of Harijans in the legislatures and they can have no objection to anyone classifying himself as a Harijan. But all this is merely by way of introduction to what I want to say.

Dr. Ambedkar's sudden visit to me has rendered it necessary for me to discuss the Pact. At the pressure and invitation of his friends, he suggested\(^1\) that the panel system provided in the Yeravda Pact should be altered to a single election by the joint electorate providing that the Harijan candidate should secure a fixed minimum of Harijan votes. I was not prepared to give any opinion during the Doctor's visit. I had not applied my mind to the question at all. Moreover, I suggested that he should first secure the opinion of different schools of thought among Harijans and of caste Hindus interested in the question and then ask me for my opinion. He said he would do that, but he made me promise that I should consider his proposal independently and give my opinion on it. The matter being too important for a private discussion, I propose to fulfil my promise by publicly stating my opinion.

The new proposal seems to me to be in no way to the advantage of Harijans. The only objection to the panel system I have heard is that it is costly. This presupposes that there would be a contest almost in every case for coming into the panel. It would have been so if the panel was confined to only two, instead of four, candidates. Selection of four candidates for contesting each seat would make it unnecessary in most cases to have the primary election. Except where Harijan parties are many and are sharply divided, there cannot be more than four candidates for one seat. Indeed, for some time to come it will be difficult even to have candidates enough to fill all the reserved seats and, in the majority of cases, there will be no contests whatsoever. It would be up to Harijan associations not to have bitter rivalries at the very threshold of their political career and it will be the duty of caste Hindus not to foment divisions in the Harijan ranks. I am hoping that the interests of Harijans and other Hindus will never clash. But should they do so, the panel system amply provides for the selection in the first instance of the right kind of the Harijan candidate—right, I mean, from the purely Harijan point of view. And yet so long as there is no bitter strife among Harijans themselves, there never need be any primary election, or, for that matter, even a joint final election.

But the alternative seems to be fraught with grave danger. As the very first choice will be general, unscrupulous political parties will put their own Harijan candidates and create divisions among the Harijan ranks with the greatest ease and demoralize the candidates and the Harijan electorate. So far as I can see and so long as the system of reservation prevails, the panel system is the best adopted for securing the selection only of those candidates who in the Harijan opinion are best fitted to serve their special interests. Whereas I can see nothing but seeds of strife and bitterness in the alternative proposal.

Though I have written decisively, I am open to reason. The argument of expense makes no appeal to me. I hope I have shown that, if anything, the panel system is calculated to avoid all needless expense. I was amazed, however, to see an interview in the Press in which Dr. Ambedkar is reported to have said his proposal made no alteration whatsoever in the substance of the Pact. I venture to differ from this view. Whereas the panel system gives an opportunity to the caste Hindus to have some say in the election of Harijan candidates, Dr. Ambedkar’s alternative may well deprive the caste Hindus of any say whatsoever in the election of Harijan candidates and thus create an effectual bar between caste Hindus and Harijan Hindus. It was just to prevent that calamity that I put forth all the force that I could command, and looking back upon the past, I do not regret having done so. I put my difficulty very mildly before Dr. Ambedkar at the Sunday interview. As I think over the difficulty, it appears to me to be insurmountable, and it is this: The candidate who gets the minimum of Harijan votes provided under the alternative need never have a single vote from the caste voters, for any Harijan candidate getting just the number of Harijan votes required under the proposal will defeat his rival even though he may otherwise top the whole of the list of candidates, Harijan and non-Harijan, if he gets just one vote less than the minimum required from the Harijans. This would amount to an utter negation of the Yeravda Pact.

It is open to Dr. Ambedkar, as it is to the Bengal friends and any other person, to say that the Yeravda Pact was arrived at under the coercion of the fast. I have no sense of shame about it. If they accepted the Pact in order to save my life, surely, they had their consideration, and it comes with ill-grace from them now to repudiate a completed bargain. The use they can make of their mistake, if such it was, is never to repeat it and not to swerve from the path of duty for fear of sacrificing the life of a person, however dear that life may be. I had staked my life not to coerce anybody to do what to them appeared to be wrong. I had staked it for achieving a purpose which I thought was altogether noble. The way to approach the question, therefore, is not to bring in the fast in the controversy but in cold blood to show to the public that the Pact is inherently bad, either on moral or public grounds. It will be time enough to seriously examine the question of reopening the Pact when such a case is satisfactorily made out in the first instance.

595. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

April 27, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

This is Thursday morning before prayer. Your letter came in yesterday with Ba’s.

A book on Astronomy is being sent to you. I enclose also a map for the month. You will find herewith so Dr. Saunders’s letter. It is satisfactory on the whole.

Letter for Ba will also accompany this.

You may pursue the conduct of the Ashram as much as you like. It won’t tire me. It will assist me. It will enable you to understand my viewpoint better. You must not accuse yourself of want of faith in me or my wisdom because you do not see a point of mine at once or because having seen it you cannot agree with me. I am not a perfect being. Why should you see eye to eye with me in my errors? That would be blind faith. Your faith in me should enable you to detect my true error much quicker than a fault-finder. What I would like your faith to do is that when you cannot convince me of my error you should think that it is likely that I see more clearly than you do in matters where I have thought and experienced more. That would give you peace of mind. Therefore you should not paralyse your thought by suppressing your doubts and torturing yourself that you do not agree with my view in particular things. You should therefore pursue the discussion of the Ashram till you have the clearest possible grasp of all my ideas about it.

You need not have argued about the man being the worse sinner of the two. I have always held that view against most, if not all, of my male friends who have expressed their opinion on the point. Of course I agree with you also that man’s superiority, if it is that, over the brute creation, consists in his capacity for observing brahmacharya. It must therefore be an Ashram ideal to be attained immediately if that were possible.

There is therefore complete agreement between us so far as the fundamental thing is concerned. The difficulty or the difference comes in when we begin to devise ways and means of encompassing the ideal.

I am becoming more and more confirmed in the view that it must go on as it is now doing, with ample liberty to the manager to regulate fresh admissions. Our life should become daily simpler and not more complex. We should be progressively more self-restrained. But we should remain a composite family that we now are.

The present composition is not the hindrance. The hindrance is that we have so few real complete brahmacharis. All were broken vessels, all had their own individual passions to conquer. But I hold that most of them were and are sincere strivers. Therefore we are blind leaders of the blind and ever stumbling. When some of us have, by constant striving, become at least matriculates in the effort, we shall certainly do better. Therefore the problem resolves itself into each one of us striving to the utmost to approach the ideal. Remember my definition of brahmacharya. It means not suppression of one or more senses but complete mastery over them all. The two states are fundamentally different. I can suppress all my senses today but it may take aeons to conquer them. Conquest means using them as my willing slaves. I can prick the ear-drum and suppress the sense of hearing by a simple, painless operation. This is worthless. I must train the ear so that it refuses to hear gossip, lewd talk, blasphemy, but it is open to the celestial music, it will hear the most distant cry for succour from thousands of miles. Saint Ramdas is said to have done so. Then how [to] use the organs of generation? By transmuting the most creative energy that we possess from creating counterparts of our flesh into creating constructive work for the whole of life, i.e., for the soul. We have to rein in the animal passion and change it into celestial passion. Read here Chapter II, Verse 64, of the Gita. The burden of the Divine Song is not “fly from the battle but face it without attachment”. Therefore you and I and every one of us have to stand unmoved in the midst of all kinds of men and women. There is no physical seclusion except temporarily for some. The Ashram is all right where it is but we must branch out for larger growth. But that would be a natural evolution coming in its own time.

Love from us all.

600. LETTER TO HARKISENDAS

April 27, 1933

MY DEAR HARKISENDAS,

Sjt. Sastri, whom the office sent me as shorthand assistant is leaving me at the end of this month. Having got from Advocate Bhulabhai’s son his typist, I am disengaging Sastri two or three days earlier so that he can attend to what little things he has to in Bombay, but you will please pay him his pay to the end of the month.

I have not yet heard from Sjt. Dhirubhai how he has sent his typist to me. I shall therefore write to you later about the terms under which the new stenographer is to work. Of course in no case will he cost the Board more than Sastri, but I am expecting that he will cost less.

Sastri is leaving me only because he wants to attend to his old father and family affairs, not having gone there for some years. Latterly, he lost a brother-in-law. But he would gladly like to be able to return if he fails to get something better inside of four months. His wants are much larger than Rs. 100 but he knows that at the present moment even Rs. 100 is a considerable sum. This is merely for your information.

If at the end of four months or earlier I cannot keep the present typist on any account and if Sastri is free to come, I would naturally take him back. He has given me full satisfaction.

DEAR MR. JAYAKAR,

I enclose herewith my opinion¹ on Dr. Ambedkar’s proposal to revise the Yeravda Pact in so far as the panel system is concerned. I hope you will agree with me that Dr. Ambedkar’s proposal is no substitute for the panel system, and that under the guise of joint electorate it sets up an effective separate electorate. The proposal copies in my opinion all the worst features of the late Maulana Mahomed Ali’s formula leaving out all its relieving features. In my opinion so long as the Harijans are filled with suspicion, and they have every reason to entertain suspicion, as to the conduct towards them of caste Hindus, they have a perfect right to have the first say in the choice of candidates, and for that, the panel system, in my opinion, cannot be excelled.

I got your letter just now. N. Devi and her son are having their meal with me, and there will be some delay in their reaching your place. Kindly forgive me for that. I am asking Dr. Spiegel also to accompany them. I was very glad to read your letter. If you can be frank like this with me, I would feel no hesitation any time. on the one hand, there would be no limit to my begging as I am admittedly a beggar. But, while making immediate demands, I should also like to respect fully the donor’s own inclination. I, therefore, always try to put the prospective donor at ease whenever I hold out my begging bowl.

I am first sending Shri Nair to the Servants of India Society and inquiring of them. If they can accommodate him, I will keep him there. In any case a car does have to come daily from there. This will mean only one trip more, and I don’t think there will be any difficulty about that. I will not fail to avail myself of your offer if there is any difficulty.

I did not know about the mangoes. I do not eat them regularly, but generally depend on papaya. I will ask Sardar and let you know how the mangoes were. However, I do not want you to worry about such small matters. None of us has a delicate palate. We eat what we get and offer thanks to God.

I got the big post yesterday. You must have received the long letter which I dictated for you yesterday. I very much liked your letter which arrived in the big post. You have exercised good restraint in your language. There are signs of impatience here and there, but not much to speak of. Your reply is pointed and brief. I did not require it at all, but, since I have received it, it will help me to pacify Chhaganlal. It will not be necessary for me now to send his complaints to you. I will struggle with him in my own way, and try to remove his error. I will not waste your time, I have wasted enough of it.

I suppose you have read Shri Rajbhoj’s¹ letter. I liked it very much. He says in it that we have used more logic than the heart in dealing with Ramji². Since you have welcomed his suggestion, the problem is over. Rajbhoj may be mistaken in his view. But it is also possible that we have been at fault. We should be able to prove to an impartial Harijan the correctness of our treatment of Ramji in all respects. I am writing this not to find fault with anybody, but only to suggest how we should behave in future. How can I blame anybody without knowing all the facts? Read the letter³ to Rajbhoj which I am going to write. He has suggested a change in the hour for the prayer.

That suggestion also deserves careful consideration. His argument is that everybody should get time to answer the call of nature immediately after getting up. He has, therefore, suggested that 45 minutes should be set apart for this purpose instead of 20 as at present. This is what he says:

Before answering the call of nature one is less likely to be able to concentrate at prayer-time. People also feel very sleepy. If the prayer is kept at 4.45, lassitude, the feeling of uneasiness arising from not having answered the call of nature and restlessness, all these three things will disappear. This suggestion was made even before. But Rajbhoj has put it in

² A Harijan weaver in the Ashram
³ Vide “Letter to P.N. Rajbhoj”, 27-4-1933.
a new way. He seems to be a thoughtful man. He is a fresh worker and is alert, and I also see in him good power of observation. He has discrimination, too. You should, therefore, have a long talk with him first and if you see some point in his suggestion, make the change suggested by him. It was I who insisted on the prayer being kept at 4.20—and I still insist on it—but the lesson of experience should prevail. If so many persons require to answer the call of nature before coming to the prayer, 45 minutes should be allowed for the purpose.
Anyone who does not feel the need may use the time in any way he likes. If you decide to make the change, I will make some suggestions about the prayer. The chief thing is that you should have a detailed discussion with Rajbhoj.

His other suggestion is as follows:

A meeting of all new workers should be held at least twice in a month. In these meetings there should be discussions as to how they should work, how they should serve meals, what the Mangalprabhat discourses are about, the significance of the vow of silence, etc. I have often observed that the volunteers who serve meals do not do their work courteously and patiently, they throw the vegetables down so carelessly that they fall outside the plate and they let the milk spill over, or serve these items in more than, or even less than, the required quantity. Those who are entrusted with washing the floor are so impatient to finish their work that they show no regard for slow-eaters and drops of water splash on the latter. It is the duty of the chief of this section to explain to the volunteers from time to time how they should work.

To save time in dictating I have given a Gujarati translation of the sentences instead of the original Hindi. However, the translation is literal. The complaint which Rajbhoj makes could also be made with equal justification when I was in the Ashram and used to take my meals in the common kitchen. I had thought that there would not be much ground for such a complaint now. But since that has not happened, I can easily guess the reason. The volunteers change frequently, and it is very necessary that they should do so. But if that is necessary, supervision over them is equally necessary. I myself have observed vegetables being served in greater or lesser quantity than required. I have also observed too much hurry when serving. I have observed rotlis being thrown into the plate as if at a beggar, and milk being spilled on the floor. And even while a fairly good number of people were still eating, the volunteers used to start washing the floor.

Inquire about this and do whatever is possible. I had a letter from . . . and I have replied to him. He is not likely to come round as quickly as I had thought. He also feels troubled about . . . and I have, therefore, replied to him that all of them have decided to leave the Ashram of their own accord. Even now they can stay on if they are ready to observe the Ashram rules. I have even advised that . . . should come and stay in the Ashram for some time. Have a talk with . . . The key is held by him. If he comes, I will be relieved. But I certainly wish that, if he comes, he should do so with a full sense of his responsibility.

I am eagerly awaiting your reply regarding N. If she is to come to the Ashram, I don’t wish to detain her here longer. If you have not written to me about this before you get this letter, send me a wire.

You say in your letter that Narahari has written to me. But the post received from you did not contain any letter from him. Did he post his letter separately? or is it that he intended to write but forgot to do so?

I have found Narahari’s letter in the post received today after I had written this letter.

I am sending a wire about N. and Dr. Margaret Spiel.

APPENDIX

EXTRACTS FROM DR. G. V. DESHMUKH’S LETTER TO GANDHIJI¹

Between carrion of an healthy animal and slaughtered meat there is no chemical or physiological difference. . . .

In the slaughter of animals, the animal bleeds and nearly all the blood being drained away, the slaughtered meat contains less blood. In the case of carrion, all the blood remains in the tissues of the animal and consequently the meat contains more blood.

Decomposition sets in in every dead animal, whether killed or dead naturally. This decomposition is liable to set in earlier in moist tissues and tissues containing more blood. Carrion, therefore, is liable to decompose earlier than slaughtered meat . . . .

You might possibly think that meat, when it starts decomposing, is universally rejected by human beings as food. It is not only the depressed classes of our country who partake of decomposing meat, but this practice is not uncommon in other parts of the world. Gypsies in Europe have been known to be fond of this practice; they go to the extent of even disinterring the dead carcasses of buried animals for food purposes. Decomposing fish is estimated to be an article of diet of more than three hundred millions of human beings in the world. . . .

DISEASED MEAT: But all this is in the case of healthy animals. This cannot hold good in the case of diseased animals. Many epidemics of meat poisoning have occurred in the West which have been proved to be due to eating of meat from diseased animals, and the diseases in animals which lead to poisoning are not the prominent diseases in cattle which kill them, such as Anthrax and Glanders, but common, pus-producing diseases which do not attract so much attention in life. Hence the necessity of meat inspection in all civilized countries. In Indian villages where this practice of eating carcasses is more common, it will be seen how dangerous this practice is likely to be, on account of animals dying of diseases to which no importance is attached but which are particularly dangerous to human beings. . . .

The meat of poisoned cattle is not poisonous to eat. . . . Poison is used by the Red Indians of America, also the Akas Tribe near Brahmaputra, in hunting for food with poisoned arrows, but the meat of this poisoned animal is eaten by them without any detriment to health.

Probably the poison used in India is strychnine (kuchala) for killing cattle, but the meat of the dead animal is not poisonous to eat. Experiments have been carried on animals, such as dogs, by feeding them on poisoned meat of the animals killed by vegetable poison such as strychnine, escerine, pilocarpine, veratrine and mineral poisons such as arsenic and antimony; and meat in all these cases has proved to be harmless. The explanation is that, although the poison is strong enough to kill the animal, the poison is further oxidised into a harmless product and the meat, therefore, remains harmless. In the case of mineral poisons and caustics, very little is absorbed into the system of animals and the meat, therefore, contains very little of the mineral poison. Meat of poisoned animals, therefore, is harmless for eating purposes.

1. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

April 27, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

This is Thursday morning before prayer. Your letter came in yesterday with Ba’s.

A book on Astronomy is being sent to you. I enclose also a map for the month. You will find herewith so Dr. Saunders’s letter. It is satisfactory on the whole.

Letter for Ba will also accompany this.

You may pursue the conduct of the Ashram as much as you like. It won’t tire me. It will assist me. It will enable you to understand my viewpoint better. You must not accuse yourself of want of faith in me or my wisdom because you do not see a point of mine at once or because having seen it you cannot agree with me. I am not a perfect being. Why should you see eye to eye with me in my errors? That would be blind faith. Your faith in me should enable you to detect my true error much quicker than a fault-finder. What I would like your faith to do is that when you cannot convince me of my error you should think that it is likely that I see more clearly than you do in matters where I have thought and experienced more. That would give you peace of mind. Therefore you should not paralyse your thought by suppressing your doubts and torturing yourself that you do not agree with my view in particular things. You should therefore pursue the discussion of the Ashram till you have the clearest possible grasp of all my ideas about it.

You need not have argued about the man being the worse sinner of the two. I have always held that view against most, if not all, of my male friends who have expressed their opinion on the point. Of course I agree with you also that man’s superiority, if it is that, over the brute creation, consists in his capacity for observing brahmacharya. It must therefore be an Ashram ideal to be attained immediately if that were possible.

There is therefore complete agreement, between us so far as the fundamental thing is concerned. The difficulty or the difference

1 The specialist at London who had treated Mirabehn for tubercular glands in 1907. Vide “Letter to Dr. Arthur Saunders”, 5-3-1933.
comes in when we begin to devise ways and means of encompassing the ideal.

I am becoming more and more confirmed in the view that it must go on as it is now doing, with ample liberty to the manager to regulate fresh admissions. Our life should become daily simpler and not more complex. We should be progressively more self-restrained. But we should remain a composite family that we now are.

The present composition is not the hindrance. The hindrance is that we have so few real complete brahmacharis. All were broken vessels, all had their own individual passions to conquer. But I hold that most of them were and are sincere strivers. Therefore we are blind leaders of the blind and ever stumbling. When some of us have, by constant striving, become at least matriculates in the effort, we shall certainly do better. Therefore the problem resolves itself into each one of us striving to the utmost to approach the ideal. Remember my definition of brahmacharya. It means not suppression of one or more senses but complete mastery over them all. The two states are fundamentally different. I can suppress all my senses today but it may take aeons to conquer them. Conquest means using them as my willing slaves. I can prick the ear-drum and suppress the sense of hearing by a simple, painless operation. This is worthless. I must train the ear so that it refuses to hear gossip, lewd talk, blasphemy, but it. is open to the celestial music, it will hear the most distant cry for succour from thousands of miles. Saint Ramdas is said to have done so. Then how [to] use the organs of generation? By transmuting the most creative energy that we possess from creating counterparts of our flesh into creating constructive work for the whole of life, i.e., for the soul. We have to rein in the animal passion and change it into celestial passion. Read here Chapter II, Verse 64, of the Gita. The burden of the Divine Song is not “fly from the battle but face it without attachment”. Therefore you and I and every one of us have to stand unmoved in the midst of all kinds of men and women. There is no physical seclusion except temporarily for some. The Ashram is all right where it is but we must branch out for larger growth. But that would be a natural evolution coming in its own time.

Love from us all.

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your long letter¹.

I had one visit from Miss Mayo when she was in India. I have read her book and I wrote also a review² on it which at that time had attracted considerable attention. It is my firm conviction that the book is filled with half-truths, innuendos and deductions drawn from stray facts as if they represented a universal situation.

April 27, 1933

MY DEAR BHAKTI,

I was delighted to have your letter which you consider is long and which for us is too short. I see that you are one in your happiness. You are one also in your erosion though you tell me that both of you had the ‘flu, at the same time. You still remain the strangest pair I have ever had the good fortune to meet. one reads of such couples in Persian poetry but does not meet them in flesh and blood. May you for ever remain inseparables.

Yes, I know, you in Europe are going through very hard tinues, both economically and spiritually. But I believe literally in the Biblical saying that “God would not destroy Sodom and Gomorrah so long as there is one good man the” I know that you have in Europe true men and women in all the odd nooks and corners of the Continent. I, therefore, feel that-in the end all will be well.

I am glad you have got a copy of my little book, Guide to Health. It is an indifferent translation and then there are some chapters I would like to revise, and if at all I get the time and permission, I would certainly do so.

Nature cure has made great strides since Kuhne’s time, and I should like to incorporate the results of new experiments. We are all keeping well, and all of us send you and Anand¹ our love. I do hear from Mira every week and write to her in return. To correspond with me every week she forgoes the pleasure of writing to and meeting other friends. I will certainly convey your love to her. A letter is going to her today.

MY DEAR HARKISENDAS,

Sjt. Sastri, whom the office sent me as shorthand assistant is leaving me at the end of this month. Having got from Advocate Bhulabhai’s son his typist, I am disengaging Sastri two or three days earlier so that he can attend to what little things he has to in Bombay, but you will please pay him his pay to the end of the month.

I have not yet heard from Sjt. Dhirubhai how he has sent his typist to me. I shall therefore write to you later about the terms under which the new stenographer is to work. Of course in no case will he cost the Board more than Sastri, but I am expecting that he will cost less.

Sastri is leaving me only because he wants to attend to his old father and family affairs, not having gone there for some years. Latterly, he lost a brother-in-law. But he would gladly like to be able to return if he fails to get something better inside of four months. His wants are much larger than Rs. 100 but he knows that at the present moment even Rs. 100 is a considerable sum. This is merely for your information.

hope you will agree with me that Dr. Ambedkar’s proposal is no substitute for the panel system, and that under the guise of joint electorate it sets up an effective separate electorate. The proposal copies in my opinion all the worst features of the late Maulana Mahomed Ali’s formula leaving out all its relieving features. In my opinion so long as the Harijans are filled with suspicion, and they have every reason to entertain suspicion, as to the conduct towards them of caste Hindus, they have a perfect right to have the first say in the choice of candidates, and for that, the panel system, in my opinion, cannot be excelled.

I did not worry about him so far, thinking that he suffered from ordinary fever; but now I feel a little worried and want to understand what exactly is the trouble with his hands.

I have read your letter to Narandas. I liked some of the suggestions you have made in it. I suggest that you should discuss the subject with Narandas. It was of course good that a meeting was held, but the person who is expected to execute them should understand them fully. I should like unity of hearts between you, if that is possible. If I do not get such permission, the wedding ceremony cannot be performed here. But you may of course come to ask for my blessings. If Chaturbhai comes along, I will certainly see him.

If Devidutt etc. are there, they as well as you should tell any guests who may arrive that no provision has been made by the Ashram for the necessary expenditure on the facilities to be provided to guests. So, everyone who comes will have to meet his or her own expense of staying, or will have to get the required amount from the Ashram. We have no right to stay in any way other than that. We cannot lead a pure life in any other way. Even if a person like Pantji sends anyone, you may ask him, too, whether or not he or she will bear his or her own expense. Just now, you have to learn the art of living within the limit of your estimated expense and cultivate the habit of plain speaking for that purpose. We are beggars and not rich people; servants and not masters.

The Devidutt Brothers have no right to ask for Rs. 60 from us if they cannot get that much from elsewhere. The people who live with us should be persons of abstemious habits. They should, therefore, be content with less from us than what they would get elsewhere. If they get more elsewhere, by all means they should go there. You see the truth of this, don’t you? You will certainly get servants to help you in your work. They will look after the Ashram and also cultivate the land.

It is necessary to be moderate in spending money even in the field of service. I think you are not at present keeping good health to be able to take up the secretaryship of the Harijan Sevak Sangh. Be content with what you can do without taking it up. Let me know how you are keeping. We will consider other things later. It will also have to be seen how you keep after your marriage. For the present, it is advisable that you have all your time to yourself.

I have not the least desire to dispose off the Ashram lands. However, if the Ashram buildings become too costly to keep, we may sell them off and put up huts on the remaining land. Jamnalalji is now out of prison. Do as he advises.

Give up your rather fond desire to call over Ramdas there. If he comes of his own accord, it would be a different matter.

Does the Bengali gentleman live there at his own expense? It is good that Navin feels at home there. He does not work beyond his strength, does he? I do have a machine for shredding vegetables in mind. As for a machine for grinding groundnut, we do have one. However, I would not think of spending money on buying such things. If, however, the expense can be incurred without inconvenience, I would not deliberately avoid buying them.

Inter-dining and inter-marriage is not an essential part of varnashrama. It is and has always been a subject unconnected with
One is not bound to eat or marry where one does not wish to. However, one does not violate one’s dharma merely by eating where it is convenient for him or her to do so or by entering into a marriage relationship which he or she chooses as suitable for himself or herself; nor does he or she violate the principle of the varna system. This is all that I mean. There is no doubt that in practice more people limit themselves to eating and entering into marriage relationship with persons belonging to the same varna. It is quite right to say that varna has no place in a sannyasi’s dharma.

Do not be tardy in writing to me.

15. LETTER TO P. N. RAJBHOJ

April 27, 1933

Bhai Rajbhoj,

Your letter I find is very much to my liking. I have written today to Narandas about this matter. Enquire from him fully and then write to me. It is bound to pain me if Ramji has not been treated generously. Do make yourself well acquainted with Mathuradas. Mathuradas is gifted with great tolerance, he does not at all believe in untouchability. If in spite of this there has been some shortcoming in the treatment meted out to Ramji it shall of course be rectified. Mathuradas is a gentle, sacrificing and sensible man. He is quite capable of realizing his own mistakes; open out your heart to him too.

Now let me give you my experience of R. I was responsible to a great extent in bringing him to the Ashram. I am very fond of him and Gangabehn; he has earned well in the Ashram. To my knowledge he has been paid adequately for his living. I have always instructed that people like R. should be paid liberally; but R. is greedy, hot-tempered and suspicious. It is extremely difficult to disabuse him of a notion once it gets into his head. You may take it that Lakshmidas has become a Harijan. Someone asked his daughter Anandi as to her identity and she called herself a Harijan girl. This happened only recently. I know it that R. harassed Lakshmidas badly. I am not writing this to point out R.’s faults. He is just like a son to me. But you have evinced such interest in the well being of the Ashram and because I have found you to be simple-hearted, I am writing all this so that you may reach the correct conclusion and guide me.

I have replied\(^1\) to several of your questions in Harijan [Sevak], which you must have seen. I now answer the rest of your questions. Spiritual progress is possible only through incessant effort. The study of philosophical works is helpful in the endeavour but I do not regard it essential because spiritual progress does not depend on the intellect but on the heart. The people were unlettered in ancient times but nobody holds the view that none of them could be spiritually advanced. We have had hundreds of saints, they were not all learned men. Jesus, Mahomed and others were unlettered. It should not at all be taken to imply that I am opposed to formal learning but the importance given to it today is beyond proportion. Hence I express my opinion whenever questions about learning are asked.

In my opinion Malaviyaji’s and Dr. Moonje’s aim in teaching the mantras and so on is the same as that of the Arya Samajists, but untouchability has become so deep-rooted in the Hindu world that mere teaching of the mantras would not suffice. They may teach the mantras, or do whatever they please, but who can bring round the Hindus? We have not yet reached the stage when this act will necessarily carry conviction with the public. Even the shuddhi performed by the Arya Samaj does not go very far although there is certainly some effect. Now we notice that the poison of untouchability has spread among the Indian Christians too. God willing, we shall, by strenuous effort and even more strenuous penance, remove this widespread poison. The yajna started in September last\(^2\) has not come to an end but is still continuing, it can end only when untouchability is eradicated and no one is considered touchable or untouchable, high or low by birth.

It is good that letters from Thakkar Bapa and Kakasaheb keep coming. Do ask unhesitatingly whatever doubts arise in your mind.

Blessings from

16. WHY NOT ‘ARYA’?

A friend writes:

Perhaps the correspondent does not know about the origin of the term ‘Harijan’. I must ask him to go through the first number of Harijan Sevak and see how the term originated. The term ‘Harijan’ was suggested by a friend who is a Harijan himself and I accepted it. The term has not been coined with a view to perpetuating the separate identity of Harijans. They have a separate identity today and a separate label to describe them. The term ‘untouchable’ savours of contempt. We wish to eradicate untouchability and it is not right to go on using the term ‘untouchable’. But in so far as untouchables have a distinct identity we must have a name by which to call them. Having accepted the necessity for such a name, what name to choose? In my view we can find no better name than ‘Harijan’. ‘Arya’ will not do because it is the name of a sect. A general name ‘Hindu’ is already there. The pity is that today a separate identity of the so-called untouchables is necessary. In Government offices they have a separate list. Everywhere they are kept separate. Let us pray that this separateness may be done away with so that all of us may become fit to be called ‘Harijans’—men of God. A friend rightly said that today caste Hindus have become ‘Arijans’—enemies of Hinduism.

17. FIVE QUESTIONS BY A YOUTH

A youth asks the following five questions:

1. When it is our claim that there is no caste among the Hindus which can be called untouchables, why should we fight unnecessarily over this word?

2. When it is our contention that varna is determined by the nature of work, why should we not reform the work of the so-called untouchables? When their work is degrading, what is the point in fighting with the higher varnas by taking sides with the untouchables?

3. When untouchability can be abolished through inter-dining and intermarriage, why should we not resort to these too?

\[1\] The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had suggested that it would be more appropriate to call the untouchables ‘Arya’ rather than ‘Harijans’.

\[2\] Dated February 23, vide Why Harijan”, 23-2-1933.
4. Can the question of temple-entry by Harijans be not solved by building separate temples for them?

5. Will the orthodox allow Harijans to enter temples when the temple-entry Bills are passed?

I hope you will be able to set my doubts at rest.

Whether I shall succeed or not, I do not know. But I shall certainly try to satisfy that youth and others like him. Success lies in the hands of God.

1. The claim that there is no such caste as untouchables is made by the reformers, not by the sanatanists. Unfortunately, the caste Hindus have dubbed several Hindu castes as untouchables. And today in Government offices also these castes are entered as untouchables. Therefore, so long as we are not able to convince our sanatanist brothers, it becomes the duty of the reformers to fight for the abolition of this caste-born untouchability.

2. Whether varna is determined by work or otherwise, is a question which does not arise here. Therefore I am leaving it. Those who wish to know my opinion in this matter should please read the previous issue\(^1\) of Harijan Sevak. So far as the work of the so-called untouchables is concerned, if by reform of their work it is meant that they should give up their trades, it is not only unnecessary but also harmful, because these trades are of the nature of public service. The washerman, the barber, the cobbler, the Dom\(^2\), the scavenger are all true servants of the people. If they were to give up their work, the people would be doomed. The reformers believe that in treating these people as untouchables, caste Hindus have made a mistake. It is the firm conviction of the reformer that the work of the scavenger and the Dom is sacred. It is the duty of the caste Hindus to improve their work. The mother removes the excrement and does the washing. The doctor cuts flesh, bone and skin. But the mother and the doctor do their work neatly and wash themselves afterwards. While doing their work they become untouchable. We should treat scavengers, etc., in exactly the same way. Just as mothers and the doctors are not untouchables by birth, so also the sweeper and others are not born untouchables, even though while doing their work they may be untouchable. When we look upon the sweeper and others as our

\(^2\) The lowest among Harijans working at cremation-grounds equals, we will not segregate them from ourselves; on the other hand we shall embrace them with love and we will endeavour to improve their work and their condition. Today, in segregating them we perpetrate tyranny on them. We do commit violence against them, offend society and bring into contempt the fundamental principles of Hinduism. Therefore, it becomes our sacred duty to work for the cause of the Harijans.

3. I do not agree that inter-dining and intermarriage can bring emancipation to anyone. Inter-dining and intermarriage are a separate question. It has no connection with caste or untouchability. It has a separate code. In any case, removal of untouchability as we have defined it today does not include inter-dining and intermarriage.

4. When we consider it our duty to remove untouchability, why should we build separate temples for Harijans? They have as much right to worship in common temples as others have.

5. No one ever said that with the mere passing of the Bills the orthodox will permit the Harijans to enter temples. But the existing law is such that even if one Hindu among the orthodox raises an objection, no public temple can be thrown open to the Harijans. When the Bill is passed this obstruction can certainly disappear.

18. LETTER TO AMRITLAL V. THAKKAR

April 28, 1933

I have several applications for financial assistance from Harijan students but I feel perplexed without an Education Board whose formation I have suggested. Will you please set up one as quickly as possible and announce the appointment, constitution and rules?

19. LETTER TO T. TITUS

April 28, 1933

MY DEAR TITUS,

I cannot recall any letter of yours remaining unanswered. You must, therefore, repeat your questions and I shall gladly answer. I shall search my file and if I discover any letters I shall give my reply without waiting for a copy of your previous questions.

You have missed my point about ‘Allopathic’ and ‘Homoeopathic’. Personally I would prefer Homoeopathy any day to Allopathy. Only I have no personal experience of its efficacy and I have told you so. Perhaps if you have confidence in yourself, and if you can really spare time from the daily work for attending to Homoeopathic remedies, so far as I am concerned I do not mind your trying them. You may discuss this thing with Narandas and if you are interested in the simple treatment of diseases I would like you to understand Dr. Sharma’s system. He has great confidence in his own method and if his experiments in the Ashram succeed it will be a great gain.

Yours sincerely,

21. LETTER TO RAMCHANDRA
April 28, 1933

MY DEAR RAMACHANDRA,

I have your letter of the 25th instant.

You are asking me to do something which I cannot do at the moment. I would ask you, therefore, to study carefully the pages of the Harijan and I think you will understand from them my idea of ‘Reformed Hinduism’. I always believe in a concrete programme. We have this in the big untouchability work. If we succeed in tackling that root of all evil in Hinduism, the rest will be incredibly simple and easy. The work of reformation will proceed apace as soon as many of us realize that we must concentrate our energy on that single reform. You will see how I have dealt with your question about a model temple¹.

Yours sincerely,

22. LETTER TO DUNCAN GREENLEES
April 28, 1933

I have your letter.

I understand and appreciate all you say. I shall look forward to the report of your impressions. Let it be as critical and exhaustive as you can make it. So far as I am concerned there is no limit to your stay there. Indeed the longer you stay the better for the work that I would have from you whether under my direct guidance or in association with me.

¹ Vide “A Model Temple”, 29-4-1933.
I do not mind that you are not likely to go to Madanapalli. As you have reduced your wants to uttermost simplicity, there can be no dearth of work for you to your liking.

I am glad you visited the Harijan quarters with Bhagwanji. I have seen many. No description, therefore, staggers me. I know how Herculean the task is before me but then I have an excuse because I am one of the many tools in the hands of God. My concern is, therefore, to keep myself a fit instrument to be found ready to do His command at a moment’s call. Dr. Sharma’s idea always has been mine and that is why I took charge of Lakshmi so many years ago, almost inside of an year of my arrival here, and I have been teaching as many Harijans as I could lay my hands on. Several have been already fixed up in life but that too is a big job. It is so difficult to keep them even though they are given to you by their parents. I am not surprised at all these untoward results in several cases and, as you very properly say, it is all due to the sin of the caste Hindus.

Of course it does not do to go for the dirty boys. Neither they nor their parents know any better and those that have some notion of hygiene and cleanliness have no convenience for conforming to the laws of hygiene. I am glad you are there during Dr. Sharma’s visit. I would like you to know him and his message. If it is substantial it would be a great thing for serving public institutions. I am a fanatical believer in nature’s methods and I never missed an opportunity of having a training. Whatever I know has been picked up from books. I was never able to read from page to page but I made copious experiments on myself and my companions, and have very much benefited from those methods. I have been always anxious to secure someone who would share my idea and develop the method in the interest of the poor. Dr. Sharma is reported to be the man and so he is at the Ashram. I would therefore like you to study the method in so far as he would let you do so.

I do not have time just now to write a long letter. I got your postcard. N.’s son is five years old and is mischievous. Were he not so, he is capable of looking after himself. If, therefore, you hesitate to admit her because of him you need not hesitate. Personally I hope that both the mother and the son will be able to adapt themselves to the condition there very well. If N.’s sinful life in the past has a share in your hesitation, have no fear in taking her in. Vallabhbhai has interpreted your postcard to mean that you are not against admitting her but have merely expressed your fear. I have interpreted it to mean that you do not wish to take her in. However that may be, I must be cautious. If, therefore, I do not receive a clear reply to my yesterday’s wire¹, I will await the reply to this letter. Reply by wire. INCONSISTENCIES?

A correspondent who is a diligent student of my writings finds it difficult to reconcile my recent writings about inter-caste dining and inter-caste marriage and corresponding writings of some years ago.

He quotes from my article² on “Hinduisum” contributed to Young India of 6th October 1921. I give the quotation below with his omissions:

Though, therefore, varnashrama is not affected by inter-dining and intermarriage, Hinduism does most emphatically discourage inter-dining and ¹ Vide “Telegram to Narandas Gandhi”, 27-4-1933.

² Vide “Notes”, 6-10-1921.
intermarriage between divisions. Hinduism reached the highest limit of self-restraint. It is undoubtedly a religion of renunciation of the flesh, so that the spirit may be set free. . . . By restricting his choice of a bride to a particular group, he exercises rare self-restraint. . . . Prohibition against intermarriage and inter-dining is essential for a rapid evolution of the soul.

And then he quotes from my statement dated the 4th November last year, which was circulated to the Press. I give the quotation again with his omissions:

Restriction on inter-caste dining and inter-caste marriage is no part of Hindu religion. It is a social custom which crept into Hinduism when perhaps it was in its decline.... Today these two prohibitions are weakening Hindu society, and emphasis on them has turned the attention of mass mind from the fundamentals which are vital to life’s growth.... Dining and marriage restrictions stunt Hindu society.

As I read them with a detached mind, I find no contradiction between the two statements, especially if they are read in their full context. In the statement of 1921, I wrote on Hinduism and gave the briefest outline of it. On the 4th of November, I had to apply myself to the innumerable castes and caste restrictions. The mode of life in the Ashram in 1921 was absolutely the same as it is now. Therefore my practice has undergone no change. I still believe that restriction imposed by oneself upon inter-dining and intermarriage is an act of renunciation of the flesh. There is one word that perhaps I would change if I was writing the article of 1921 today. Instead of ‘prohibition’, I should repeat the expression used in the same article just a few lines before and say ‘self-imposed restriction against intermarriage and inter-dining is essential for a rapid evolution of the soul’.

In spite of my statement of 4th November last, I would say that inter-dining and inter-caste marriage are in no way essential for the promotion of the spirit of brotherhood or for the removal of untouchability. At the same time, a super-imposed restriction would undoubtedly stunt the growth of any society, and to link these restrictions to varnadharma or caste is undoubtedly prejudicial to the freedom of the spirit and would make varna a drag upon religion. But having said this, I would like to say to this diligent reader of my writings and to others who are interested in them that I am not at all concerned with appearing to be consistent. In my search after Truth I have discarded many ideas and learnt many new things. Old as I am in age, I have no feeling that I have ceased to grow inwardly or that my growth will stop at the dissolution of the flesh. What I am concerned with is my readiness to obey the call of Truth,’ my God, from moment to moment, and therefore, when anybody finds any inconsistency between any two writings of mine, if he has still faith in my sanity, he would do well to choose the later of the two on the same subject.

1 Vide “Statement on Untouchability-I”, 4-11-1932.

25. NOTES

CARRION-EATING

Sjt. Hiralal Shah has collected writings from different sources condemnatory of carrion-eating and showing how carrion-eating has repelled people.

His first text is from _Bhayprakash,_ Part II, verse 88:

स्वयं मृत्यु चावलोमयमतीयाकरे गुल

The flesh of an animal dead from natural causes is debilitating, heavy and liable to cause diarrhoea.

From Kautilaya he sends me many elaborate rules from which I take the following:

The flesh of animals which have been killed outside slaughter-houses . . . and the flesh of animals which have suddenly died shall not be sold.

From the _Ain-i-Akbari_ Sjt. Shah sends me several texts recounting ten divisions among Hindus. The last division is classed as that of _Chandalas,_ being ‘low caste, eating carrion’.

The other quotations are from James Forbes’s _Oriental Memoirs._ From these, I take the following:

From the religious order of Brahmins, I descend to the caste of _Chandalas_ or Pariabs. These people are considered so abject as to be employed in the vilest offices, and held in such detestation that no other tribe will touch them; and those Hindus who commit enormous crimes are excommunicated into this caste, which is considered to be a punishment worse than death.

Describing the Pulaiyas the author says:

Constant poverty and accumulated misery have entirely debased the human form, and given a squalid and savage appearance to these unhappy beings. Yet debased and oppressed as the Pulaiyas are, there exists throughout India a caste called Pariahs, still more abject and wretched. If a Pulaiya by any accident touches a Pariah, he must perform a variety of ceremonies and go through many ablutions, before he can be cleansed from the impurity . . . nor do they eat together; although the only difference in their epicurean banquet is that the Pulaiyas eat of all animal food, except beef, and sometimes of that which dies of itself, the Pariahs not only feast upon dead carcasses, but eat beef and carrion of every kind.

_Harijan_, 29-4-1933

26. A MODEL TEMPLE

It was impossible that side by side with the-movement for temple-entry by Harijans there should not be a demand for temple reform. The modern Hindu temple is a hot-bed of superstition, as are more or less other ‘Houses of God’. I published¹ the other day a letter from an American friend, gently pleading with me not to have anything to do with the temple-entry movement. A friend who is a devout follower of Islam has carried on a long correspondence with me, trying to do with me in his own way what the American friend did in his own. There is undoubtedly a great deal of substance in what they have said. But I have not been able to subscribe to their corollary that the remedy for the abuse lies in the destruction of temples.

But by far the largest number of persons believe in the reform, not destruction, of temples. I mentioned only the other day an ambitious scheme set on foot for a model temple in Rajkot.² Several correspondents have taken me to task for advocating temple-entry for Harijans without emphasizing the necessity of temple reform. There is no doubt that temple reform is necessary. But here, again, there is need for caution. Some of them think that it is possible to replace all the existing temples with new ones. I do not share that view. All temples will never be alike. They will always vary, as they have done in the past, with the varying human needs. What the reformer should be concerned with is a radical change more in the inward spirit than in the outward form If the first is changed the second will take care of itself: If the first remains unchanged, the second, no matter how radically changed, will be like a whited sepulchre. A mausoleum, however beautiful, is a tomb and not a mosque, and a bare plot of consecrated ground may be a real Temple of God.

² Vide also “A Model Temple”, 29-4-1933.

Therefore the first desideratum is the priest. My ideal priest must be a man of God. He must be a true servant of the people. He should have the qualifications of a guide, friend and philosopher to those among whom he is officiating. He must be a whole-timer with the least possible needs and personal ties.

He should be versed in the Shastras. His whole concern will be to look after the welfare of his people. I have not drawn a fanciful picture. It is almost true to life. It is based on the recollection of my childhood. The priest I am recalling was looked up to by the prince and the people. They flocked round him for advice and guidance in the time of their need.

If the sceptic says such a priest is hard to find nowadays, he would be partly right. But I would ask the reformer to wait for building the temple of his ideal till he finds his priest.

Meanwhile let him cultivate in himself the virtues he will have in the priest of his imagination. Let him expect these from the priests of existing temples. In other words, by his gentle and correct conduct, let him expect his immediate surroundings with the need of the times and let him have faith that his thought, surcharged with his own correct conduct, will act more powerfully than the mightiest dynamo. Let him not be impatient to see the result in a day. A thought may take years of conduct to evolve the requisite power. What are years or generations in the life of a great reform?

Now, perhaps, the reader will follow my view of a model temple. I can present him with no architect’s plan and specification. Time is not ripe for it. But that does not baffle me and it need not baffle the reformer. He can choose the site for his future temple. It must be as extensive as he can get it. It need not be in the heart of a village or a city. It should be easily accessible to the Harijans and the other poor and yet it must not be in insanitary surroundings. If possible, it should be higher than its surroundings. In any case, I would aim at making the plinth of the actual temple as high as possible. And on this site I should select my plot for daily worship. Round this will come into being a school, a dispensary, a library, secular and religious. The school may serve also as a meeting or debating hall. I should have a dharmsala or guest house connected with the temple. Each one of these will be a separate institution and yet subordinate to the temple and may be built simultaneously or one after another as circumstances and funds may permit. The buildings may or may not be substantial. If labour is voluntary, as it well may be, with mud and straw a beginning may be made at once. But the temple is not yet built. The foundation was laid when the site was procured, the plot for the temple was selected and the first prayer was offered. For the Bhagavata says, “Wherever people meet and utter His name from their hearts, there God dwells, there is His temple.” The building, the deity, the consecration, is the province of the priest. When he is found, he will set about his task, but the temple began its existence from the time of the first prayer. And if it was the prayer of true men and women, its continuous progress was assured.

So much for the temple of the future. The reader who cares to study the Rajkot scheme will find that the outward form of my model temple materially corresponds to that in the scheme. Indeed, there is nothing new in my idea or the Rajkot scheme. The village temples of yore had almost all the adjuncts suggested by me.

But we must also deal with the existing temples. They can become real Houses of God today, if the worshippers will insist on the priests conforming to the ideal presented by me.

Harijan, 29-4-1933

27. HUMAN MANUFACTURE [-I]

The section regarding Depressed Classes in the Bengal Census Report, Part I, is an illuminating document, from which at the moment I reproduce only paragraphs 2 and 3 below, and I hope to occupy the reader’s attention over this portion of the report for a week or two longer.

MEANING OF THE TERM ‘DEPRESSED CLASSES’

The expression ‘Depressed Classes’ is of comparatively recent coinage and is in many respects unfortunate. It does not translate an-y actual vernacular term in common use in Bengal, nor does it describe any class the members of which can be defined with accuracy. It is a term in itself indefinite. In European countries it is applied to the chronically indigent portion of the population and connotes an economic condition. It can be applied anthropologically in a psychological sense to describe that state of mind engendered in a primitive people when it finds itself in contact with a dominant society based upon principles entirely different from and disregarding the traditionally accepted sactions of tribal life. This psychological condition has been convincingly put forward as one at least of the elements leading to the depopulation of Melenesia and it has an interesting counterpart in the ‘discouragement’ from which Mr. George Bernard Shaw makes visitors to the island die off in contact with the civilization of the ancients in “Back to Methuselah”. In general use, however, the term in India, though not applying to exactly similar strata of population in different parts, is used to describe those members of the community who in common social estimation are considered to be inferior, degraded, outcaste, or not fit in any way for social and religious intercourse on reasonably equal terms with members of the clean or higher castes. It represents a problem which arises only within the fold of Hinduism, namely, the problem of those Hindu groups who by the accident of birth are denied and never can by any individual merit achieve social consideration or spiritual benefits which are the birth-right without consideration of personal merit equally of all persons born into the higher castes.

THE CRITERION OF THE DEPRESSED CLASSES

It is, however, by no means a simple matter to devise a satisfactory criterion by which to distinguish the Depressed Classes. The problem itself being essentially social and religious, the criteria, which have been at various times suggested, themselves depend upon social observance or social precedence. During the census of 1901 the castes in Bengal were distinguished into Seven groups upon an elaborate classification. The first group contained Brahmins only as the acknowledged superiors of all other classes in the caste hierarchy. In the second group were placed castes whose respectability was never in question and who are either twice-born or were held to be superior to all other Shudra castes. A third group consisted of the so-called navashakha, or nine branches, now indeed containing more than nine groups but all characterized by being held worthy to offer water the drinking of which would not pollute the higher classes. Below this third group were distinguished a fourth containing clean castes with degraded Brahmins; a fifth containing castes lower than group four whose water is not usually accepted, a sixth comprised low castes abstaining from beef, pork and fowls, and seventh embracing castes by whom forbidden food were eaten and who pursue the most degraded occupation as scavengers, etc. In 1911 the Census Commissioner for India directed provincial superintendents to enumerate castes and tribes returned as Hindus who do not conform to certain standards or are subject to certain disabilities, “leaving the reader to draw his own inferences”. They were asked to prepare a list of all but the minor castes which qua castes:

1. deny the supremacy of the Brahmins;
2. do not receive the mantra from a Brahmin or other recognized Hindu guru;
3. deny the authority of the Vedas;
4. do not worship the great Hindu gods;
5. are not served by good Brahmins as family priests;
6. have no Brahmin priests at all;
7. are denied access to the interior of Hindu temples;
8. cause pollution (a,) by touch, (b) within a certain distance;
9. bury their dead; or
10. eat beef and do not do reverence to cow.

The enquiry was intended to furnish material, if possible, from which an answer could be given to the difficult question: ‘Who is a Hindu?’ Up to 1916 in Bengal at least the expression ‘Depressed Classes’ was unknown. In 1916 however the Bengal Government was invited to prepare a list of the Depressed Classes and submitted a list including certain criminal tribes and aboriginals and amounting in all to 31 groups This list was used by the Commissioner for Education in writing his quinquennial report on the progress of education in India for the years 1912-17. The term thusintroduced remained and both the Calcutta University Commission (1917-19) and the Census Report for 1921 contained lists of the Depressed Classes. In neither of these last instances, however, was any clear criterion set forth to show on what grounds the groups were included. The Indian Statutory Commission, without giving any definite criterion, referred to them as the “lowest castes recognized as being within the Hindu religious and social system . . . . Their essential characteristics is that according to the tenets of orthodox Hinduism, they are, though within the Hindu system, untouchable—that is to say, that for all other Hindus they cause pollution by touch and defile food and water. They are denied access to the interior of an ordinary Hindu temple (though this is also true of some who would not be classed as ‘untouchable’). They are not only the lowest in the Hindu social and religious system, but with few individual exceptions are also at the bottom of the economic scale and are generally quite uneducated. In the villages they are normally segregated in a Separate quarter and not infrequently eat food which would not be touched by any section of the Hindu community.”

At a later date the Franchise Committee, driven to lay down simple criteria, adopted No. 7 and 8 of the distinctions made in the Census Report of 1911. For Bengal these distinctions have been elaborated on behalf of the Depressed Classes Association as follows:
(a) castes from whose hands the three high castes or even the navashakha (that is, the caste Hindus) would not accept water and whose presence either in the kitchen or in the room where water and cooked food are kept would pollute the same according to their estimation;

(b) castes who would not be allowed into any public temple and whose presence there would defile articles of worship;

(c) castes who would not be allowed to enter or to have their meals inside the dining room of an hotel or eating-house run by caste Hindus;

(d) castes at whose socio-religious functions Shrotriya Brahmins (that is, the priests) officiating in such functions in the house of the caste Hindus would not officiate; and

(e) castes who would not be served by the Shrotriya Napit (that is, the barber) whose services are necessary in various socio-religious functions of the Hindus.

28. MORE DONATIONS

Seth Ghanshyamdas Birla writes to me saying that he has received from Lala Kamalapat a donation of Rs. 3,000 and a donation of Rs. 2,000 from Seth Rameshwar Prasad Bagla, both of Cawnpore. These can be utilized for the David Scheme or general education work, the only condition being that the donations will be utilized for the Harijans of that Province.

A sum of Rs. 2,500 has been received from Seth Soniram Poddar of Rangoon to be used at my discretion for education work amongst Harijans. This amount also is available for the David Scheme or for general education work amongst the Harijans, no matter in what part of India.

There is not, therefore, any dearth, at least for the present, of scholarships for suitable Harijans, and Seth Ghanshyamdas is bringing into being a special educational board for the examination and selection of Harijan candidates for scholarship, more especially of those coming under the David Scheme.

From Europe £8 have been received from the same friend whose letter I published in the Harijan a month ago. The letter bringing the notes says:
I am enclosing with my loving Easter wishes £8 that I have saved to send you at Easter for the Harijans. I am not sending them directly to Delhi as it is not worth while, and I would rather you disposed of them where you thought best. I scarcely dare send you such a small sum, but you know I have saved it with my deepest prayers and love for the holy cause that I have made my own. You know this now. All my prayers and penances are to try to help you, and I can so well feel all the difficulties and disappointments you have to live through. Last Monday on receiving Harijan of 18th March, I had the feeling so deeply that I was overwhelmed with emotion that I could not explain. I have read the issue through and through and thank you for it. What you say of the Ramji Mandir of your childhood is very beautiful. I know so well that feeling myself. It carries one through life.

29. LETTER TO BEHRAMJI KHAMBHATTA

April 29, 1933

Bhai Khambhatta,

I got your letter. I hope you are better now. It will help you if you live only on milk. You may certainly drink fruit juices with it. If the milkman brings the animal to your house and milks her in your presence, you should drink such fresh unboiled milk without heating it. Keep me informed.

Why were you upset about that one rupee? It was a mistake on Chandrashankar’s part to have mentioned it, but you should not pay any attention to the matter. There is no reference to the sum of Rs. 500. Never mind if anybody who reads about that one rupee says that Khambhatta has now become a miser or beggar. On the contrary, wouldn’t it be a good thing?

30. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

April 29, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your postcard. I will ask Devdas about Manilal’s bill. Panditji and Lakshmibehn came and saw me. Narmada also was with them. I was pained to hear about Amina. I will write to her. Read that letter and give it to her if you approve of it. If I cannot write today, I will write later when I get time. Meanwhile, manage as you think best. They told me about Ramabehn also. I intend to write\(^1\) to her too. Show as much love as you can. But human love must have some limit also, for how can we know when love may become moha\(^2\)? One’s love, therefore, should never be at the cost of one’s duty, no matter even if such conduct seems cruel. If anybody who looks at the matter superficially were to believe that I am being cruel to . . . \(^3\), I would not blame him. At present . . . \(^4\) is bound to think me cruel. But what can I do? My regard for dharma will not let me adopt any other course. What is true of me is also true of you. You should, therefore, follow what seems to you to be your dharma even at the risk of being accused of cruelty or inviting my criticism.

I got yesterday your letter about N. It proved that Vallabhbhai’s interpretation was correct. I am, therefore, making preparations for sending her. I shall probably be able to send her on Monday. Assuming that she will arrive on that day, send a cart to the station. Probably Dr. Margarete Spiegel also will accompany her. Even if I don’t receive your consent about her, I will assume it. At the [Ahmedabad] station they will get into the metre gauge train which connects with the Gujarat Mail. You should remember that both the ladies are to be trained for Harijan work. You must strictly follow the rule that neither they nor any other European whom we may admit should be permitted to have any connection with the civil disobedience movement. I am specially writing to the Government about those two women. They and others who may join the Ashram should I strictly follow the Ashram rules and you should see that they do so. If they do not observe the rules or become a source of trouble.

to you, I don’t at all intend that you should still let them remain. If that happens, inform me immediately. The food requirement of both is simple. I very much doubt if they will be able to digest jowar and bajri. You will have to provide fruit and milk to both in fairly good quantities, otherwise they will not be able to keep up their strength. N. does not include milk and ghee in her diet at present. Both cat with relish thick wheat rota without ghee or butter, nine inches in diameter and baked twice till they are crisp and without ghee or butter. They eat these rotas and chew them without the help of any liquid. N. does not drink milk or eat ghee at present. Her food is such rota, papaw, oranges, and uncooked vegetables like cucumber, tomatoes, cabbage, carrots, etc. She will, however, drink milk there if necessary. Her son gets three pounds of milk daily. He also eats toasted rotli and fruits. If we coax him very much, he eats a little uncooked vegetable. He doesn’t care for sweets at all, but greatly enjoys drinking fresh unboiled milk. He eats every article one by one. I hope nobody will spoil this child by teaching him to drink tea or coffee or eat sweets. His energy is boundless. We have in the Ashram other children who are as self-willed as he is, but he does not cling to his mother all the time. He has produced on me the impression that he can live with anybody. It is very desirable that nobody there should, out of false love, tempt him to eat unwholesome things. For the rest, we should trust to his and our fate. I am sending N. there with great hopes. I have cherished her like a daughter for the last three or four months. I have preserved many of her letters. There is nothing in her life which she wishes to hide. I have advised her to bury the memory of all persons who had fallen under her spell. But she has assured me that she does not wish to hide from me a single guilty action or thought of hers, and thereby won my initial confidence. But I can give no guarantee about her future conduct. I am acting on the basis of complete trust in her. Give her suitable work from time to time within her capacity. She has great ability. She is extremely active and wants to do good. If she can reduce herself to a cypher, she will be able to do much. If she becomes proud of her ability or her noble intentions or good work, she will fall. For the present give her such manual work as she can do. Make arrangements to help her to pick up Hindi quickly. Her power of grasping is very good. She already knows a little Hindi.

Margarete is of a different type. She is 35 years old and, therefore, her character is practically formed. She is a woman of great learning and is quick in learning things by heart, but she is not very intelligent. She is obstinate, but her motives are pure. I think her life has been blameless. She has great love for the Ashram. But she has no sense of proportion when she speaks. Ever since she has been here, she has been talking about the Ashram in season and out of season. She has left the country and come to India because of the movement in Germany against her but she has no plan before her. I am sending N. there willingly and with great joy. I don’t feel such joy in sending Margarete, but we cannot turn her away. She has come merely with the intention of living in the Ashram. What can we say to her? She will of course do whatever work she is physically capable of. She has been a teacher for some years and so you can immediately give her the work of teaching English. She is eager to do teaching. Even as a teacher, however, N. is more capable. But since she is joining the Ashram to atone for her past life, I feel slightly doubtful whether you should immediately give her such work. If you do wish to give it, you may certainly do so.

No other instructions seem necessary.

I have become fairly frightened about Kusum¹. They are now talking about tuberculosis of the intestines. I can put no faith in these amateurs. I cannot guide you or Kusum very much from here. At present you are her guardian for every thing. Kashi cannot take any decision, and I am afraid Kusum is not fit now to decide for herself. Even as her relation, therefore, you are in the place of her father. Personally I think that, both from the point of view of our ideals in the Ashram and from a practical point of view, we should not think of taking Kusum somewhere else. We should do whatever is possible in the Ashram itself. Carry out without any hesitation whatever decision you come to, after discussing the matter with Kusum and Kashi. I can make one suggestion from here. Tell Talwalkar that he should now obtain the opinion of some other doctor. He should have a joint consultation with Haribhai² and Kanuga and prescribe treatment according to the opinion of all three of them. If he does not agree to do this, have a talk with Dr. Kanuga and Dr. Haribhai and, with Dr. Talwalkar’s permission, get their advice and follow the treatment which they suggest. If, after the experience that you have had about Dr. Sharma, you think favourably of him and if he agrees, put Kusum

in his hands. If he agrees, however, he should not leave the Ashram till Kusum begins to respond to his treatment. My first suggestion is such as will meet the approval of practical people. The second will not, but it is consistent with my attitude in such matters. You probably remember that when Manu was practically on death-bed, ignoring the advice of doctors I put her under the treatment of “Ice Doctor”¹. I have experimented with such impractical treatments on many others, so I don’t hesitate to make the foregoing suggestion in this case. However, since I am not on the spot, you should not attach any weight to my opinion. You should decide independently. I will accept any decision which you arrive at. I will have no objection at all if you decide to cling to Dr. Talwalkar’s treatment and trust Kusum’s life completely to him. I have no doubt at all about his goodness of heart, nor about his careful attention. Only, he has not been able to impress me by his methods of treatment and other doctors also do not follow these. However, we are dealing with the human body which is a thing as brittle as a glass bangle. Its fate is not in the hands of any doctor, but rests on the will of one Power alone, so that there is no harm in believing that ultimately medical treatment is for our satisfaction only and makes little difference to the result. Don’t we, moreover, sing every week?—

Lukman² on being asked, “How many days he had lived”, Wringing his hand sorrowfully answered, “A few”.

And the Muslim world believes that there has been no hakim in the world the equal of Lukman, but even he could not save himself. If that is so, what can Talwalkar or other doctors do?

This part of the letter is positively not for Kusum. It is only for you to think over. Even if Kashi and others read it, they will unnecessarily become nervous and get frightened to death. I have written such alarming things in the full confidence that not a hair on your body will turn.

The two European ladies will hardly have any letters to write. Dr. Spiegel will drop a postcard to her mother. N. is not likely to have any person to whom she might want to write. All the same, you should personally help them in all such matters.

BAPU

31. A SACRED ACTIVITY

I give below an interesting but touching account from a Harijan worker’s experiences which I have been giving from time to time in these columns.

I will not spoil the picture by writing more on it. It is possible that because of a long-standing bad habit some may feel disgust on reading this. Medical books are full of such descriptions. He who does not read them will not master the science of biology. Moreover, no one should be shocked because I have described the activity as a sacred one. That activity itself may appear dirty like that of removing filth. But just as removal of filth is for purposes of purification, this activity is meant for cleaning or purifying society. Innocent city dwellers do not realize that they won’t be able to live for a moment if these workers do not perform many activities which we despise.

32. A MODEL TEMPLE

When Smt. Vijayalakshmi Pandit set foot in Kathiawar for Harijan welfare work, a scheme to build a model temple in Rajkot was discussed. I have already made a reference to this. Shri Parashuram Gopal Masurekar, the well-known lawyer of the place, had taken a leading part in the deliberations. Under his signature a public appeal has been issued in connection with the scheme. The following point claims our attention.

---

1. Keshav Gandhi, son of Maganlal Gandhi
2. This is not translated here. The correspondent had described the process of skinning animals.
3. This is not translated here. The scheme proposed a temple devoid of any decorations or jewellery and one which was meant for the entire Hindu population, irrespective of caste or community. The priest would be a person who did not believe in untouchability. And as the aim of the temple was to be service, there should be a night school for adults, a library, a free dispensary, and a religious school attached to it.
It is mentioned in the statement that even some from among those who believe in untouchability have welcomed the scheme and have also agreed to give financial help. Shri Masurekar deserves congratulations on this scheme. I hope that he will translate it into reality. It should not be that the beginning would be made only when many people join the scheme. To my mind, a model temple means an ideal priest. Bricks and mortar do not make a model temple. If the priest is good, even a rough hut will shine forth and earnest devotees will find solace there. And when there is no such priest, even a marble temple inlaid with mosaic would be a desolate structure. There are today a number of such famous ruins in India. There are such ancient places in Mysore which at one time must have been great temples. The caves of Karla, Ajanta and Gharapuri were temples once. God has disappeared from there because of want of the priest and instead of devotees connoisseurs of art go there to see the works of art. Hence I hope: that the proposed temple at Rajkot will get a good priest.

But whether such a priest is available or not, the scheme for the temple can be taken up for execution from today. The first task is to obtain a vast plot of land in the open. I would regard it as advantageous if it is at a little distance from the village. After selecting a plot for the temple, other institutions mentioned in the scheme can be constructed there. To my mind, the foundation-stone of the temple will have been laid if the people working in this institution get together in the plot reserved for the temple and repeat the name of God, because there is a dictum in the Bhagavata that God dwells where five people get together and repeat the name of Vasudeva. And where He dwells, there the temple stands.

The Rajkot scheme for the temple is an excellent one whether it materializes or not, whether it materializes early or late. Everyone can help implement it to a certain extent. The existing temples can come alive if the devotees and the priests are in harmony. These days most of the temples are lifeless. Other institutions can be started around them. The foundation-stone can be laid of the new kinds of temples suggested by me for the villages. Ancient temples appear to have come into existence in this very way. Each temple embodies the conception of a devotee. They built the temples in accordance with their faiths. The history of some of the temples of Madras is available today. These temples have Agamas of their own in which we can find the plan of the temple, the shape of the idol, its size, the ritual of worship and rules of purification. And the faith of the Hindus recognizes these books or pamphlets as divine scriptures.

33. STATEMENT ON FAST ¹

[April 30, 1933]²

A tempest has been raging within me for some days. I have been struggling against it. On the eve of the ‘Harijan Day’ the voice became insistent, and said, ‘why don’t you do it?’ I resisted it. But the resistance was vain. And the resolution was made to go on an unconditional and irrevocable fast for twentyone days, commencing from Monday noon the 8th May and ending on Monday noon the 29th May.

As I look back upon the immediate past, many are the causes too sacred to mention that must have precipitated the fast. But they are all connected with the great Harijan cause. The fast is against nobody in particular and against everybody who wants to participate in the joy of it, without for the time-being having to fast himself or herself. But it is particularly against myself. It is a heart-prayer for the purification of self and associates, for greater vigilance and watchfulness. But nobody who appreciates the step about to be taken is to join me. Any such fast will be a torture of themselves and of me.

Let this fast, however, be a preparation for many such fasts to be taken by purer and more deserving persons than myself. During all these months since September last, I have been studying the correspondence and literature and holding prolonged discussions with men and women, learned and ignorant, Harijans and non-Harijans. The evil is far greater than even I had thought it to be. It will not be eradicated by money, external organization and even political power for Harijans, though all these three are necessary. But to be effective, they must follow or at least accompany inward wealth, inward organization and inward power, in other words, self-purification. This can only come by fasting and prayer. We may not approach the God of Truth in the arrogance of strength, but in the meekness of the weak and the helpless.

² From The Bombay Chronicle, 1-5-1933; also A.I.C.C. File No. 429
But the mere fast of the body is nothing without the will behind it. It must be a genuine confession of the inner fast, an irrepressible longing to express truth and nothing but truth. Therefore, those only are privileged to fast for the cause of truth who have worked for it and who have love in them even for opponents, who are free from animal passion and who have abjured earthly possessions and ambition. No one, therefore, may undertake, without previous preparation and discipline, the fast I have foreshadowed.

Let there be no misunderstanding about the impending fast. I have no desire to die. I want to live for the cause, though I hope I am equally prepared to die for it. But I need for me and my fellow-workers greater purity, greater application and dedication. I want more workers of unassailable purity. Shocking cases of impurity have come under my notice. I would like my fast to be an urgent appeal to such people to leave the cause alone.

I know that many of my sanatanist friends and others think that the movement is a deep political game. How I wish this fast would convince them that it is purely religious.

If God has more service to take from this body, He will hold it together despite deprivation of earthly food. He will send me spiritual food. But He works through earthly agents, and everyone who believes in the imperative necessity of removing untouchability will send me the food I need, by working to the best of his or her ability for the due and complete fulfilment of the pledge given to Harijans in the name of caste Hindus.

Let co-workers not get agitated over the coming fast. They should feel strengthened by it. They must not leave their post of duty; and those who have temporarily retired for much needed rest or for being cured of ailments are as much at the post as healthy workers serving in their respective quarters. No one should come to me unless it be for necessary consultation on matters connected with the movement.

It is, I hope, needless for me to pray to friends that they will not ask me to postpone, abandon or vary the approaching fast in any way whatsoever. I ask them to believe me that the fast has come to me literally as described above. I, therefore, ask friends in India and all the world over to pray for me and with me that I may safely pass through the ordeal and that, whether I live or die, the cause for which the fast is to be undertaken may prosper.
And may I ask my sanatanist friends to pray that, whatever be the result of the fast for me, the golden lid that hides Truth may be removed?

Harijan, 6-5-1933

34. DISCUSSION WITH VALLABHBHAI PATEL

April 30, 1933

For some time now, I have been vacillating between twenty-one days and forty days. After all, does one express, can one express, all one’s thoughts to others? Three days have passed since I lost my sleep. Could it be that I cannot sleep? But, for the last three days I have not been getting any sleep for hours at a stretch; I might get up at two in the morning and start work but not once would I doze while I dictated in the morning, nor even would I want to stretch my limbs, as if for the last three days I were preparing myself for the great deluge! It is difficult to say since when the excitement started. On many occasions, however, thought of a fast would repeatedly come to my mind and I would drive it away. In the night when I retired I had no idea that something was coming up today. But after eleven I woke up, I watched the stars, repeated Ramanama but the same thought would persistently come to my mind: ‘If you have grown so restless, why don’t you undertake the fast? Do it.’ The inner dialogue went on for quite some time. At half past twelve came the clear, unmistakable voice: ‘You must undertake the fast.’ That was all. Now having resolved to make it a twenty-one days’ fast, I took no time in deciding that as a prisoner I should undertake it after eight days’ [notice]. Without it the task of Harijan service is just impossible. If I don’t do this much the rot in Harijan work will reach the heart and destroy it altogether. I, therefore, got up and immediately began to write out the statement and I, had just finished the last sentence when you came up for the prayers.

39. LETTER TO RAOJIBhai PATEL

May 1, 1933

CHI. RAOJIBhai,

The fast which commences from Monday is intended as punishment for those also who believe that they are too weak to fulfil the vow they have taken—not to reproach them but to help them.

Lakshmibehn has complained against you that you have been talking ill about the Ashram. I am sure there must be some error in this.

40. LETTER TO LILAVATI ASAR

May 1, 1933

CHI. LILAVATI,

I got your letter. Be happy instead of being sad at the news of my fast. If you have Narandas’s permission for whatever you do in the Ashram, you need not fear any criticism. Do not listen to any criticism. If you hear any against your wish, immediately tell Narandas about it. That will give vent to your anger. Try to overcome during the fast whatever shortcomings you have. The fast is being undertaken to help everyone to overcome his or her shortcomings.

41. LETTER TO RAMABEHN JOSHI

May 1, 1933

CHI. RAMA,

I got your letter. If you think that Dr. Sharma’s treatment worsens the condition of the arm, you should give it up.

I understand about Dhiru.

From my talk with Panditji and Lakshmibehn, I see that they believe that you have a good deal of stiffness in you, that you are not sufficiently frank, that you have a fairly good measure of pride and that you enjoy harassing, and if possible, humiliating Narandas. I have stated all this in my own words. But this is the impression I formed from what they said. If there is any truth in this, you should get rid of that weakness. We may endure that disease of the bone from which you are suffering, but we ought not to tolerate such weaknesses in ourselves. For the bone disease, we require the services of a doctor other than ourselves; for an internal disease, however, we should be our own doctor. In other words, we have to depend upon our own resources. I certainly wish that my intended fast should produce this result, namely, that all the impurity in the Ashram may he washed clean.

42. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

May 1, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

My fast will be for all the inmates of the Ashram, including you. You should, therefore, get rid of all your diseases.
I assume that you have kept a copy of your questions¹ and so I give here only brief replies to them. I am hard pressed for time today.

1. If persuasion does not succeed, you may become silent and pray in your heart for that person, whether she is a girl or a grown-up woman. This will help you to overcome your impatience.

2. We should know what is meant by ‘necessity’ in this question. Suppose that I am reciting Sanskrit verses and leading a prayer, and just then I see a snake. It is necessary that I should catch it, and I may, therefore, stop reciting the verses and violate a rule. I may also do that if I feel an immediate call of nature at that time. If, however, I feel thirsty, I should control my desire for some time and go on reciting the verses. You felt something in the throat and yet continued. That was worse than foolishness.

3. We may disregard any social practice or custom which obstructs our quest for truth.

4. If you have absolute faith in me, you should believe that what you regard as the voice of your conscience may not be so. If, however, that voice is so direct as to be more powerful even than your faith in me, you should follow it whatever the cost.

5. It is not possible to reply to this question categorically.

6. I do not follow this question.

7. If a person is often found telling lies or shirking work, even a

Thinking that you may have had no time to keep a copy of your questions, I return them with this.

I am sending two women\(^1\) to the Ashram. I hesitate very much to do so, but I send them because I feel that I ought to. I do hope that they will not increase your work but will help you. Make some arrangement to help them to learn Hindi.

I should like Sushila\(^2\) to spend this vacation in the Ashram. That is likely to give rest to both of you. I hope you know the English saying that change of occupation is rest. There is a good deal of truth in it. Treat this only as brain-wave which I got while writing this letter. If Sushila has made some other plan, I certainly don’t want her to abandon it to please me.

44. LETTER TO AMINA QURESHI

*May 1, 1933*

DEAR DAUGHTER AMINA,

I hear from Panditji that you do not keep or show accounts, and spend too much. As you know I have given you full liberty. I shall be greatly pained if you misuse it.

The doctor writes that you have lost all that you had gained by the fast. Do not behave thus. Give up tobacco. Give up rice. If you control the craving for some time, you will feel you are all the better for having given up those things. Remember whose daughter you are and where you were brought up. You are not one of those modern girls. You have been with me since the Phoenix days. I have dandled you on my knees. Do not disappoint me.

45. INTERVIEW TO THE PRESS \(^2\)

*May 1, 1933*

Almost the first question asked by the Pressmen was, whether it was possible for him under any circumstances to abandon his fast. Gandhiji replied:

\(^1\) Literally, ‘of steady intellect’. For the full meaning of the phrase.

\(^2\) The source had reported: “Gandhiji received Pressmen inside the jail cell, where, for the past few days, he has been holding his office. The mango tree is not providing the requisite protection against the increasing heat.”
Humanly speaking, there is absolutely no possibility of my abandoning the fast.

This was followed by more questions on his statement. Asked, if he could throw light on the “shocking cases of impurity” referred to in his statement, Gandhiji said that it was not possible for him to do that; but he had no grievance against anybody in particular and, if he had any grievance at all, it was against himself. Gandhiji proceeded:

I went to bed that night without the slightest feeling that I would take such a step. No single event can be held responsible for this decision, but it undoubtedly is the result of the accumulation of a long series of events extending over a fairly long period. It is not that I was blind to them before. They were producing their silent and unconscious effect on my mind.

Replying to another question, the Mahatma said:

I do expect that my fast is merely a precursor of many such fasts, and if I survive this, I may feel called upon to undertake another fast.¹

All these twenty-one days I will be sipping Ramarasa². If it does not sustain me, how is the juice of mosambis going to help? One who wants to destroy the Ravana of untouchability must partake of Ramarasa every now and then. And if my devotion to Rama is sincere—and it certainly is—He will not let my body drop for I still wish that Rama will sustain this body dedicated to Him. You Harijans, however, must remember one thing. You should be amenable to the infallible remedy which I have adopted. Realize that for you too there is no other way. And let the ‘touchable’ Hindus say and do what they like; you on your part should cleanse your body and soul and become true Harijans. Your saviour as well as mine is the Lord above.³

It would be blasphemy to regard me as your saviour. And I said to you that the love of God is life-sustaining, but then, if you would allow me to say it, what does it matter if the body withers away? Do not dead men continue to do work?

¹ The following paragraph is extracted from Harijanbandhu, 7-5-1933, which had reported that Gandhiji was replying to some of the questions put by Harijans.

² Literally, ‘juice of God’s name or God’s love’. This was in response to a suggestion from a Harijan that during the fast Gandhiji should allow him self the juice of two mosambis daily.

³ This was in reference to a fear expressed in the Harijan’s statement that with Gandhiji’s death the Harijans would have no protector.
At this stage, it is necessary for the public to understand the very vital difference between the September fast and the impending one. The September fast was a conditional one, made for a particular purpose. But in this case, it is not directed to any concrete purpose at all.

Therefore, this fast can be undertaken at any moment and it is after the manner, common enough in Hinduism. Whenever a great reformation and revival is going on, people in order to ensure purity and acceleration of their object, undertake a fast. Such a fast is universally acknowledged to be a good thing in itself. It is its own justification and my fast claims no more merit. I might have undertaken it without the tussle I was engaged in, but perhaps, I had no courage.

I was weighed down with the tremendous responsibility and, therefore, though the prompting came to me more than once, I resisted it. A religious movement does not depend for its success on the intellectual or material resources of its sponsors, but it depends solely upon the spiritual resources, and fasting is the best known method of adding to these resources. Not every fast brings about the desired result.

I have given some of the conditions in my statement, and it is claimed in my statement, and it is claimed by those who have conducted religious movements that intellectual, material and other things follow spiritual capital but should never be independent of it.

Asked, if he hoped to survive the 21 days’ fast, Gandhiji reassuringly said:
Oh! I survived the twenty-one days’ fast1 that was undertaken ten years ago. Weaker men than myself have undertaken longer fasts and survived. Spiritual sustenance has great possibilities.

At this stage, Gandhiji was reminded of his condition during the September fast when six days’ fasting brought him almost to the verge of collapse, but he humorously replied:

The age of miracles is not yet over.

He felt more than optimistic about his ability to go through the ordeal. Asked whether he would remain in Poona in case Government released him, Gandhiji replied that it was very difficult for him to say that, because he did not contemplate any release.

To a suggestion that his fast, which coincided with the sitting of the Joint Select Committee, would be taken as an act dictated by political motives, Gandhiji replied that he had not embarked on the fast voluntarily. It had not been in his plan.

1 From September 18 to October 8, 1924.
He had not compassed it. He tried to resist it even that night, but he could not and for three days before taking the decision, he could not sleep properly. He did not know what was happening to him. Surely, it was not indigestion. But after he took the decision on Saturday night, he slept well.¹

49. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

May 1/2, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got a letter from you today also, along with Duncan’s. He should have taken your permission, but how could he know that it was necessary to do so? The best thing would be to have a complete list of the rules to be observed both by newcomers and the old inmates, so that a copy of the rules could be given to every newcomer as soon as he joins. If you draft the rules in Gujarati, I will translate them into English. Or Duncan himself may do that. He is certainly a capable man.

It was very bad indeed for so many persons to harass one person. Since you have already explained that to the people, I will not write anything concerning it. However, read my letter to Duncan and explain its substance to everybody.

I have gone through Titus’s report. I like his suggestions. I think it would be better if the accounts relating to his work were kept separately, though under your supervision.

¹ From S.N. 21113; the original, as delivered, bears the date “May 3, 1933”.
² Dated May 2 from Delhi which read: “Have just received news. I fully believe with God’s blessings you are sure to survive the ordeal successfully. I assure you, since the September fast there has been wonderful awakening all round which should have given you nothing but immense satisfaction. Yet, I feel nothing but undiluted good will come out of the present fast, although on personal grounds am somewhat nervous. Hope you will write me special information, if any. Am thinking of cancelling Calcutta programme and reaching Poona about eighth. Thakkar Bapa is here.”
Titus should be given one assistant to help him.

It would not be a bad idea to buy a mule or pony for carrying milk. So far as I can see, ultimately there will be a motor-van.

I also approve of his suggestion for buying two machines.

I had never approved of the business in Bidaj. I, therefore, fully approve of his suggestion.

Is cows’ urine being utilized now? There ought to be a hut for storing milk as suggested by him. Think over all these suggestions and implement as many of them as seem good to you. Jekibehn’s sons will not come to the Ashram. They are studying. I had a postcard today from Mahalakshmi. She says that she will arrange after she is released in two months’ time.

My hand has got tired with the effort of writing this much, and so I must be brief with the rest.

I had a long discussion with Panditji and Lakshmibehn. From among the suggestions discussed, the following should be carried if they are not already being followed. If the bread generally remains half-baked, the bakery should be closed. The persons who work in it should not keep changing. If it gets too hot near the furnace, there must be some defect in it. There should be no emission of heat at all. The use of potatoes and other tubers as vegetables should be stopped. They may be served as substitutes for rotli.

We must grow the required vegetables in the Ashram even if it is more expensive to do so than to buy them. Tomatoes and one bhaji should grow in the Ashram all the year round. Ultimately we shall not incur any loss by doing this. We must buy no vegetables from outside except for persons who are ill. In my view, unboiled milk and wheat is a complete diet. Nothing else is necessary. It is not necessary to have all the items in one’s food every day. Sometimes one may have only milk and sometimes only rotlas. And it is also essential for physical and spiritual health to eat only one thing during the whole day occasionally. I would not fix any particular days for such monodiet, but serve it according to convenience. If a large quantity of milk happens to be left over, I would keep the kitchen closed on that day. And if a large stock of potatoes has accumulated, I would not serve rotlas on that day.
When no vegetable can be served, I would have tamarind fruits plucked from the trees and serve chutney prepared from their pulp crushed with salt. Eating tamarind daily may be harmful, but eating it occasionally can do nothing but good. However, nobody ought to pluck even one tamarind fruit to gratify his or her palate.

I will write more about prayers after I get your opinion.

It would be more convenient if diners sit in the kitchen in rows according to the items to be served. There should be one row of people who want rice and another for those who are to be served the normal menu. You may ask a guest in advance what food he will have. Or he should be offered all the items at the time of the meal, and he may accept whatever he likes. I know that this would be a little too complicated.

The news that my fast of 21 days will commence from the 8th will have become old by the time you get this letter. Let nobody be upset by it. On the contrary, all should wake up.

I expect most from the Ashram. There is plenty of impurity in it. This impurity must be banished. This fast is addressed to all co-workers, and the Ashram is naturally included. If we had as much of the spirit of dedicated service in the Ashram as we need, I would be dancing with joy today and be sure that, when the time comes, all the inmates would go and plant themselves on the sands of the Sabarmati with unshakable determination of fast unto death. My impending fast is preliminary to similar fasts by other people.

Everybody should do the following:

The people should either concentrate completely on the prayer or not attend it at all. Those who bring only their bodies to the prayer and leave their minds behind violate truth. Instead of doing that, let them follow their own inclination. The best thing, of course, would be for such persons to leave the Ashram. Nobody should talk ill about others behind their backs. If impure thoughts disturb anybody, he should confess them to you at least if to nobody else. Or he may write a note and inform you. If he cannot control such thoughts and remains pure only outwardly, he should leave the Ashram. Those who do not like any of the Ashram rules must leave. If, moreover, we can fix a code of conduct during this period of self-purification, it should be accepted. An inmate of the Ashram who is ill should be satisfied with whatever treatment is possible in the Ashram itself. At the most he or she may be sent to one of the branches of the Ashram if absolutely necessary.
Nobody should shirk work or steal anything or hide anything. Everybody should be content to eat the food that is served, and should eat all food as medicine and not for the pleasure of the palate. It should be remembered that pulses, rice and tubers are not essential. Spices, sugar and jaggery also are unnecessary. Wheat or bajri or jowar and unboiled milk constitute complete food. It will be enough if vegetables and fruits are occasionally included.

Envy or malicious criticism of one another should be regarded as sin. Everybody should do some Harijan work. In short, I will expect the Ashram to get rid of all spiritual maladies during this fast. If it cannot do this, I have no right to expect anything from other people. Show this portion to all the inmates. I have decided to send N. and Margarete. But I will reconsider the matter if I get a letter from you tomorrow conveying your decision against such a step. Give the ladies the clothes, utensils and other things which they may require. And see also that satisfactory toilet arrangements are made for them. In regard to their food, it is not necessary to do anything more than prepare one or two things specially for them in addition to the normal menu. I have already explained other things. The child will easily mix with the other children. It will be enough if he does not learn any bad habit.

Since Jamna herself has given you a testimonial, I am sure you will not worry. Don’t let anybody run down here.

BAPU

[PS.]
Tell Duncan the history of both the ladies and take whatever help you require from him.

May 2, 1933

I wrote the foregoing yesterday, but could not dispatch the letter owing to heavy pressure of other work. N. will have reached the Ashram before you get this letter. I got your letter yesterday too. I have started writing this before the prayer. I got up at a quarter past one.

Your letter is heart-rending. There is no limit to my hard heartedness. You will have received the wire which I sent today. I have asked you to send Parashuram here immediately on receipt of it. You must have done that. I have called the children too. I have also asked you to give him the railway fare from Ahmedabad to Poona plus four rupees. We need not tolerate such persons in the Ashram, for it is beyond our capacity to reform them. If they are with me, I can get some work out of them too. But that would serve no useful purpose. If there are others like him, ask them all to leave. You may clean up everything. Henceforth, only those who willingly and scrupulously observe the rules may stay in the Ashram. My hope is that in the Ashram itself there will be persons who will have cultivated sufficient fitness and will undertake an indefinite fast when the time comes. I see that time drawing near. Such is the nature of my intended fast. It is the first step in self-purification. If the Ashram will not be the first to bring that self-purification, whom else can we expect to do so? This is a much more difficult task than fighting for salt. Only those who are eager to cultivate fitness for offering themselves as sacrifice may stay in the Ashram.

You will have to think about the old families in the Ashram who may not be ready to join in this. You can stop admitting newcomers. Those persons who joined the Ashram for the specific purpose of learning some work may be asked to leave if they are not without other means of support. Persons who have beers living in the Ashram because they have no other means of support may remain, namely, Narmada Rana. But please treat all these as passing thoughts which occur to me in my solitude here. Do only what you think proper and what appeals to you and is within your capacity. I have given you complete freedom. I don’t want you to be burdened with too heavy responsibility for the affairs of the Ashram during the 21 days of the fast. Nobody should expect you to humour him or her. If any of the old families living there do not wish to join in this work of self-purification, you may permit them to cook their own meals. An allowance should be fixed for them after careful calculation and they should live within that sum. Any saving they make will be theirs, and, if they overspend during one month, they should meet the balance from the allowance for the next month. If you cannot get a full-time worker for the departments, such as the dairy, which must be continued, engage paid workers and maintain them. Or you may reduce the work in these departments to the extent necessary. Personally, I don’t think that will be necessary. However, I cannot dictate the final decision in this matter. Call all the people together and think over these suggestions with them. There should be no coercion in regard to anything. From the very beginning it has been assumed that the Ashram may have to sacrifice itself one day in this manner. Probably some of the inmates will remember that I have often explained this possibility. I am not, therefore, putting forward an altogether new suggestion. Even those who agree to join should know that, though they may be ready to undertake an indefinite fast with irrevocable determination, they must go on with their work for the time being as if they expected to live for ever. As we always go on working even though we know that one day we shall receive the summons from Death, so should we do now, and with all the greater devotion now since we should be prepared to die of our own free will.

Duncan, being a guest, may be exempted from many things, but that certainly does not mean that he should be free to approach me directly. Tilakam is an unhappy man, and, moreover, he is a Harijan and a worthy man in other respects. I think highly of both these persons. If your experience is different, please let me know.

I feel confused in my mind regarding . . . 1. I don’t like his venture. It is certainly a violation of his pledge. You may give him the capital that he wants, but I suppose it will be on personal security. That doesn’t seem to me proper. We cannot assume that he will necessarily succeed in his enterprise. He doesn’t seem to have learnt any humility. If he has done so, he should accept a job anywhere. Ambalalbhai2 would certainly offer him one as fitter. If there is nobody in the Ashram now to utilize the equipment which we have, Ranchhodbhai or Ambalalbhai can remove it to his factory. They will at least keep it safe, if they do not buy it up. But I may be mistaken even in assuming this. I have written this only for your information. You are free to ignore the suggestion completely. It is possible that you have understood . . . better and that I am doing injustice because I am disillusioned with him. If, however, I am right in my view, it is possible that . . . will not immediately be able to earn enough to support the whole family. If so, the Ashram must meet the balance of his expenses. We certainly cannot leave him on the street. I am thinking only of our dharma in this matter. After all, doesn’t that family mean . . . 3 himself? Of course I will not abandon it because . . . is no more with us, but I would certainly make it submit to as much hardship as it can endure.

56. LETTER TO RAMJI

Between 1-4 at Night, May 2, 1933

I felt very much pained on reading a summary of the letters. It is difficult to believe their contents. Is this the result of my labour of all these years? I feel pained if all this, or even a part of it only, is true. It would mean that persons like Mathuradas\(^1\) and Narandas are utterly worthless; on the other hand, if these allegations are false, it is a pity that Ramji has not softened in spite of so much having been done for him. However, if your heart does not soften, the fault must be mine and not yours. Was I not born in a community which is among those that have suppressed the Harijans? Let my fast do what I could not do otherwise.

60. LETTER TO JAWAHARLAL NEHRU

MY DEAR JAWAHARLAL,

As I was struggling against the coming fast, you were before me as it were in flesh and blood. But it was no use. How I wish I could feel that you had understood the absolute necessity of it. The Harijan movement is too big for mere intellectual effort. There is nothing so bad in all the world. And yet I cannot leave religion and therefore Hinduism. My life would be a burden to me, if Hinduism failed me. I love Christianity, Islam and many other faiths through Hinduism. Take it away and nothing remains for me. But then I cannot tolerate it with untouchability—the high-and-low belief. Fortunately Hinduism contains a sovereign remedy for the evil. I have applied the remedy. I want you to feel, if you can, that it is well if I survive the fast and well also if the body dissolves in spite of the effort to live. What is it after all—more perishable than a brittle chimney piece. You can preserve the latter intact for ten thousand years, but you may fail to keep the body intact even for a minute. And surely death is not an end to all effort. Rightly faced, it may be but the beginning of a nobler effort. But I won’t convince you by argument, if you did not see the truth intuitively. I know that even if I do not carry your approval with me, I shall retain your precious love during all those days of ordeal.

I had your letter which I had thought I would answer at leisure. Well, God had willed otherwise. I had talks with Krishna. Of Sarup’s work in Kathiawar I think I wrote to you. Kamala has not even sent me her address. There has been no letter from her for many days now. When you see her please give her and Indu my love. Kamala must not worry over the fast. If possible send me a wire.¹

Love from us all.

also will come. But that will be after some time. This fast is of a different character from all the previous ones. Our forefathers used to fast without much ado, to remove the cause of external troubles or for self-purification. This fast is exactly of the same kind. 66. LETTER TO HIRALAL SHARMA

May 2, 1933

BHAI HIRALAL SHARMA,

Your Hindi letter made me extremely happy. It is astonishing that your first letter in Hindi is in such a clear hand. And your Hindi too is quite good; how is it so? I have read your letter and the prescriptions with care.¹

The Gandhi family is not unacquainted with nature cure. But this is only a polite statement. Their faith is not much, but that too cannot be said of all. What can they and other poor fellows do?
Whatever knowledge and love of nature cure they possess is only because of me. But my knowledge is so incomplete that I become helpless in emergency cases. I have never had the time to make a systematic study of the science. But I have acquired a smattering of it because of my interest in it. Owing to my deficiency I have ever been in search of an expert in nature cure. One such doctor was Hanumanta Rao, a devoted and a good man. He died a victim of his own cures.
His knowledge was insufficient but his faith was unique. Next came Gopala Rao. He has established a clinic and settled at Rajahmundry.
Pinning my faith on him I conducted a foolish experiment. I gave an account of it in the newspapers too.² The acquaintance with Gopala Rao has disheartened me. Gopala Rao is a man of conviction but his knowledge is very limited, and the pity of it is that he is not fully conscious of his limitations. Now I have found you. I do not want you to leave me. I want you to stay on in the Ashram and recognize with humility the extent of your knowledge. First win the confidence of the ¹ The addressee had under Gandhiji’s instruction sent a report ailing Ashram inmates. He had also expressed surprise over the sceptical attitude of the members of Gandhiji’s family towards nature cure.

² Gandhiji’s experiment of subsisting on raw and uncooked food war conducted during the summer of 1929. He frequently wrote about it in Young India.
Ashram inmates and then invite the public for your cures. If you are not urgently required to return, you can cure a few patients at any rate before going away. But you can certainly stay on if you like the Ashram and Narandas takes a liking to you. I am not concerned whether your understanding of nature cure is perfect or incomplete. What I want is Truth. There is no harm if we proceed only to the point within our reach, and remain content with that. There is no reason why your wife should not come and live at the Ashram if she is prepared to abide by its rules. I shall write a letter to her too and enclose it with this.

You did well in going to the Harijans with Bhagwanji. If possible, you should come to see me at the earliest possible opportunity before you leave the Ashram. We can then discuss what should be done about the health problems of the Harijans. You may come on any day except Sunday. We can meet in the afternoon.

I am awaiting your suggestions regarding the Ashram diet. I want to make the diet there complete in respect of health requirements. The idea of keeping Harijan children in the Ashram has always been there but not many such children can be found. You can advise those who conceal their ailments to bring it to light; and those who cannot subdue their passions may leave for good.

I am considering what to do about Kusum. As regards Ramabehn° you can prescribe the treatment you choose if you have no doubts as to the diagnosis and the cure of her trouble. The same applies to Jamnabehn°. It will be excellent if you can induce Amina° to give up rice and other starchy foods and tobacco. She uses it in the morning to clean her teeth. What you did about the report in Bombay newspapers of your arrival was all right and quite fitting.

73. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

May 3, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

I got your heart-rending letter. How shall I calm you? It is extremely difficult for me to let you go. I have built high hopes on you. But it would be selfish on my part and harm the ideals of the Ashram if I pressed anybody to stay on in it when it was not for his or her good to do so. The Ashram represents the sum of the good of all its inmates and the means of its achievement, hence your good and that of the Ashram cannot be mutually contradictory. If, however, you feel that this is not so in so far as I am concerned, I have no doubt at all that you should leave the Ashram. If your fast is still continuing, I want that you should give it up. I will accept whatever decision you arrive at. I will not make the final decision; it will have to be made by you.

As I have loaded Narandas with excessive responsibility, he has loaded you. He has not broken down. If you break down, I would be unhappy, for I, too, would be as much responsible for that result as anybody else. Narandas was helpless.

Even if you decide to stay on, you ought to reduce the burden on yourself. It is contrary to dharma to accept more work than one can do; there is pride, too, in doing so. There is greater harm in doing that than in eating more than one can digest. There is of course this difference between the two: 99 out of every 100 persons eat excessively, whereas 99_ per cent people do much less work than they can. Hence one does not always know whether one has taken upon oneself more work or less than one can do. All the same, the ultimate result will be as I have stated. If I eat excessively, I alone would suffer. If, on the contrary, I take upon myself more Harijan work than I can do, not only the four crore Harijans but probably the whole world would suffer.

May God give you peace of mind and show you the right path.

74. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

May 3, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your letter. I hope you will get without delay the big packet of letters which I dispatched yesterday.

Read the letter that I have written to Prema. In view of what I have written in it I will not say anything about the matter in this letter.

Just now I am thinking about the changes which I suggested in my letter yesterday. I have discussed them with Panditji. Even apart from the question whether the Ashram has the capacity or is fit to keep up a chain of fasts, my view expressed in yesterday’s letter remains unchanged. The burden on you must be lightened. If that is not done, we shall not be able to cultivate even the fitness that we hope to do. You should, therefore, stop admitting newcomers, ask those who cannot observe the rules to leave the Ashram if they are recent entrants or to cook in their own kitchens if they are old inmates. I don’t like separate kitchens at all. But I feel that we have no option but to tolerate the old families.

The view which I have expressed about Keshu also remains unchanged. If you feel that it is your duty, as his guardian-father, to help him from your personal money, I think that that money should not be treated as part of Ashram funds just now. I feel, too, that the money which you possess should be treated as reserved for one single purpose, namely, for the support of your parents, and should be earmarked as gift to the Ashram after their death. It should not become the property either of Jamna or Purushottam and others. If you have not made this resolution till now, you should do so at the commencement of the yajna of purification that is about to begin. You should discuss the matter with Jamna. You may consult Purushottam, too, if you think it necessary. But the chief thing is that you yourself should sincerely desire this. Your ability to give private help to any relation of yours will be harmful to the Ashram, to you and to the person whom you may help. I don’t see anybody else in the Ashram, besides you, who possesses all the other requisite qualities in the degree required. The fact that, though you have money of your own, you have not misused it and have remained unaffected by it shows your fine sense of justice and your impartiality. But even God will fall if He regards anything as His personal possession. The vows of non-possession and non-stealing seem trivial outwardly but they are as important as the other three vows. The entire plan of [Patanjali’s] Yogasutras seems wonderful to me. I do not understand its later portion. But it seems likely that every aphorism of his is based on long experience. If God had not ordained my duty in another field, I would have closely studied and memorized such holy books of Hinduism. But who can say what would have been better for me? Even such a thought betrays lack of faith in God. I must be perfectly contented with the ability that God has given me. But all this is beside the point. I am convinced that Keshu’s good does not lie in starting an independent factory just now with the help from the Ashram.

1 Vide “Letter to Narandas Gandhi”, 1/2-5-1933.

What can be done about Kusum? How can I call her over here?
If she is eager let her go to Almora. I have stated my own view, and I cling to it. Dr. Spiegel may come there. I am watching her. She is very sincere, but has strong likes and dislikes. We should, however, support her as long as she observes the rules. If she shapes well, she will do very well indeed. Both these ladies are certainly instrumental in persuading me to undertake the proposed fast. Among them N.’s share is probably greater. But all this is my fancy. Who can know beyond doubt whether a certain step is inspired by God or the Devil? I only give probable causes of what is past and over.

I expect Parashuram to arrive here today.

75. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS OF INDIA

May 3, 1933

I am looking forward to the fast in the happiest frame of mind and with the greatest of confidence in the necessity for it.

Asked what he would have his associates to do during the fast, Gandhiji said:

They should simply conduct the drive against untouchability and that in the gentlest manner possible so that the heart of the sanatanists may be won over.
Asked if he was making his own arrangements for medical and other help during the fast, he said that everything depended on the authorities, nor had he any idea what arrangements he would make if he was released.

some others daily messages.

You have understood the sacred necessity of the step. Ba has responded magnificently. Her courage has been a source of the greatest strength to me.

Your letter is before me. Though written before you had any knowledge of the step, I trace in it a sorrowing mood. You have to surmount it. If you have a living faith in a living God, you would feel His never-failing presence protecting you. Till that state is reached, even faith in an individual clothed in flesh and bone is not of any avail. It is relying on a broken reed. You should first think this out clearly and then get the heart to co-operate with the intellect.

When your time comes, you will certainly throw yourself heart and soul into the movement. Whilst I would call you a Christian you are sufficiently Hindu to render you eligible for full service of the Harijans. You need not worry about this.

I wish I had time to tell you something about N. and Margarete Spiegel. But I must economize my time and also energy. Naturally the Ashram will undergo thorough cleansing. I have sent proposals\textsuperscript{1} to Narandas.

Tell Ba not to worry about me at all. She and I and all of us are in His hands. It is well if we live and it is equally well if we die. We are born only to die and we die only to be born again. This is all old argument. Yet it needs to be driven home. Somehow or other we refuse to welcome death as we welcome birth. We refuse to believe even the evidence of our senses that we could not possibly have any attachment for the body without the soul and that we have no evidence whatsoever that the soul perishes with the body.

I can go on no longer. Visitors have come in.

I hope you received the book on astronomy.

Love.

I have your letter. It is surprising that the children are not recovering. I will definitely make some arrangement for you after Ramzan. Where would you yourself prefer to go? Would you prefer to go to the Sharada Mandir if it can be arranged? And will the children go back to Noor Banu in that case? Consider these things and write to me.

CHI. QURESHI,

You must keep me informed about your experiences with the doctors. I am always curious to know these things. In any case I should not be ignorant of the experiences of the Ashram inmates, happy or unhappy. And you should also know that God always grants a person the strength that he needs to bear the burden which it is his duty to bear. Both the children should have recovered by now.

82. A HARIJAN’S QUESTIONS

1. What should be done to unite the sub-castes which exist among Harijans?

2. Wherever, in big cities, sewerages is introduced, the livelihood of Harijans is jeopardized. What should they do in such a situation?

3. In some towns caste Hindus object to Harijans going riding on such occasions as weddings. You have written about what caste Hindus should do. Please be so kind as to say also what the Harijans should do.
The above questions have been sent by a Harijan correspondent. They are all three difficult questions to answer.

So long as caste Hindus remain divided in hundreds of sub-castes, as they are today, it seems unlikely that caste distinctions among Harijans can be done away with. Of course if there is a sudden awakening among the Harijans and they show a marked advance, that would be a different matter. I long to see such an awakening and when it comes they will be far in advance of the caste Hindus. But the question applies to the present context.

In the existing conditions all that can be said is that Harijans belonging to the castes that are considered superior should try to come closer to those belonging to lower castes. Mahars, for instance, should try to draw closer to Mangs, to inter-dine and intermarry with them. A Mahar thus mixing with Mangs should be fearless and should be ready to face any hardship that this course may entail.

The second question is a public question. In this transitional period a number of trades are bound to die out. A number of new trades are bound to be born. This has always been going on. This question of sewerage cannot apply to villages. Sewerage is peculiar to the city. It is in cities that Bhangis in any number are to be found. I believe that wherever sewerage is introduced some employment or other is found for the Bhangis. It becomes the responsibility of the municipality to find employment for the Bhangis thrown out of work. My advice also is that Bhangis should train themselves in some other arts, for instance, weaving. In Gujarat I notice that Bhangis, wherever they lost their traditional occupation, have taken up weaving. But there can be no uniform answer for all. Much depends on individual aptitudes.

The third question is a particularly difficult one. The underlying idea behind the question is that Harijans are wholly in the power of others and living in fear. If this is the case the only advice that may be given is that they should seek police help. Dr. Ambedkar told me that the police, coming as they do from caste Hindu communities, often do not help, which is likely to be true. Under the circumstances all that one could say is that where the police are hostile or apathetic, where no one from among the caste Hindus is ready to help, and where the Harijans themselves have not generated enough strength in themselves, the only thing possible is for the Harijans to have patience. The only consolation which can be offered is that for every individual and society a time comes when no alternative is left but to be patient. Otherwise man would become an atheist and forget God. Therefore, where there is no non-violent recourse possible the Harijans should pray to Hari.

May 5, 1933

DEAR COL. DOYLE,

I would like, if you can give permission today, to write daily to and hear from Mrs. Gandhi, Shrimati Mirabehn (Slade, Sabarmati), Shrimati Manibehn Patel, (Belgaum), Shrimati Vasumati-behn Pandit (Thana), Sjt. Pyarelal¹ (Nasik) and Sjt. Surendraji? (Visapur), as I used to during the September fast. I have restrained myself up to now. But I know how anxious friends must be as Monday approaches.

85. LETTER TO C. RAJAGOPALACHARI

May 5, 1933

MY DEAR C. R.,

You are dearer to me than life itself. I wounded you\(^2\) and Shankerlal deeply yesterday. It is no use my saying “Forgive me”. Your forgiveness I have before the asking. But I will do the very thing that I resisted like an ass. I will submit to the examination now and any time you like by any doctor, provided, of course, the Government permit it. I feel that the result of such examination should not be published for fear of political use being made of it. I must say, too, that the medical examination, if it comes, is not likely to affect the commencement of the fast.

More when we meet. This is just to relieve my soul of the impurity that crept in yesterday.

Love to you and Shankerlal.

CHI. JAMNA.

Your impatience for my letters pleases me very much. God willing, I will satisfy your desire fully after the fast. Stick to the doctor’s treatment and cure your disease. Let my fast redouble your efforts to cure it. Whether I live or die, you will have to continue to serve. I hope Purushottam writes to you.

87. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

[May 5, 1933]

CHI. NARANDAS,

I wanted to but could not write to you yesterday. I understand what you say regarding Chhaganlal’s criticism. Though you have replied as I desired you to do, I see that some of his remarks have hurt you. They were in the nature of allegations and were prompted by anger. But how can I advise you or anybody else? What right have I to do so? Yesterday, while talking to a friend like Rajaji whom I love so much, I became impatient and lost my temper with him and with Shankerlal. I see now that the matter was of little importance, and that it was I who was foolish. What they said or advised was prompted by their love for me. They had no other thought but my own good. If I lose my temper with them, how can my words of advice to you, when you get angry at Chhaganlal’s thoughtless allegations, have any effect on you? It was seen yesterday that the serpent of anger is alive in me and is aroused whenever it is provoked. That is why you have not been able to see the anger in your words which I pointed out. Your faith that it must be there since I say so does credit to your love for me, but it also proves that I do not deserve it. I will not lose heart. I will strive to deserve the love of my co-workers. The forthcoming yajna is a part of such striving. I see every moment that this yajna is absolutely necessary for my own purification. I cannot forget that the imperfection of the Ashram is a faithful reflection of my own imperfection. If I do not know how to take the Ashram forward, there is no meaning in my living on. To leave the Ashram or to close it down would be nothing but cowardice. I must learn the wisdom how to take the Ashram forward. I cherish the hope that I shall acquire that strength by the proposed yajna. If I succeed in this aim, I may hope to succeed in the other things. If I fail in this, I cannot hope to succeed in anything else. That will be the meaning of this yajna. I should like you to make your full contribution to it. You need not get ready just now for a fast, but should only cultivate the fitness to undertake one when the time comes. I think you are doing that.

Wherever you see your shortcoming, attack it and get rid of it. Do not worry about me. A daily report about what happens there will give me great peace of mind. Such reports will be my food during the days of the fast.

I think Duncan and Sharma have something in their minds which they wish to discuss. Have a talk with them.

Margarete Spiegel may leave for Ahmedabad on Monday. She is a good woman, but not very intelligent. She is very obstinate. She has very little khadi with her. Give her what she needs. She will have to think what dress to wear. At present she wears a sari. If she is not eager to start wearing khadi immediately, you also should not insist that she should do so. Personally I like N.’s dress. I myself had suggested it to her. She knows sewing very well. If she can take interest in it, she can do much useful work in that field.

Margarete does not like that dress. For the present, let her borrow a thick sari from one of the women there and try it. Such sari will not require a skirt. If there is an underwear with it like the one I use, it will be enough. Or she may wear, like Mirabehn, a skirt, blouse and a thick scarf as upper garment. Mirabehn is very economical indeed in using khadi. A skirt is certainly not a complete dress. Anybody who wears it should also use an undergarment. You will now be able to guide Margarete.

She had some money with her, which I have taken away. I have taken away one chain, too. I have handed over both to Harijan Shastri\(^1\). If she comes, she will travel by the same train by which N. travelled. If Ramji wants to leave the Ashram, let him go. If he remains, he must behave properly. Don’t press Kusum at all in regard to her hair. Getting it cut will be for her good only if she does that willingly.

I trust Shanti is well now.

I am sending a wire today regarding Sharma. Keep me informed about how N. behaves.

What do you propose to do about the teaching of Hindi? There ought to be some provision for it in the Ashram. N. will have to be taught Hindi.

88. LETTER TO HIRALAL SHARMA

May 5, 1933

BHAI SHARMA,

I have your letter. I am sending a wire today.

I would advise you to stay on at the Ashram during the fast and overcome lethargy. Activity is the only remedy for that. The Ashram can provide enough work.

Acquaint Narandas with all that you observe in the Ashram.

I heard of your fast; it was all right but discipline requires that the manager be consulted in such matters.

My faith in nature-cure goes back to forty years ago. What I meant was that my faith in your cure will be strengthened by its success in the Ashram. Do write the pamphlet for the Ashram.

90. MESSAGE TO ARYA SAMAJ CONFERENCE

[On or before May 6, 1933]

I sincerely hope that God will guide your conference to devise means for banishing untouchability from India.

The Hindu, 8-5-1933

1 As given in an unknown hand at the end of the letter in the source
2 The addressee had requested Gandhiji to call a meeting of Harijan leaders to consider Ambedkar’s proposals regarding the Poona Pact and had suggested that joint meetings and bhajans by caste Hindus and Harijans should be held in temples thrown open to Harijans.
3 Held in Delhi under the presidentship of Dr. B. S. Moonje. Among others, the conference passed a resolution expressing concern over Gandhiji’s proposed fast and appealed to every individual to eradicate untouchability.

91. HUMAN MANUFACTURE [-II]

I am sorry I shall not be able to analyse, as fully as I had intended to, the able monograph on ‘Depressed Classes, in the Bengal and Sikkim Census Report by Mr. A. E. Porter of the Indian Civil Service, from which I reproduced two sections last week. In Section 4 the author points out the defects of the criteria suggested on different occasions by different Census Commissioners and others. Says Mr. Porter:

> They reduce themselves naturally to religious or social disabilities and in not a single instance is there any criterion put forward which prima facie ought to attract the attention of the administration.

> For they “are entirely matters of social and religious consideration” and, therefore, “they would be entirely irrelevant to any consideration by Government of the problem of the Depressed Classes”. He then goes on to the consideration of some of the criteria. Temple entry occupies the first place. The whole of the Section is interesting. It ends with this significant conclusion:

> Disabilities regarding the right to worship or enter into temples are largely conventional or not immune from change, and in any case do not properly constitute a title to special consideration in the body politic, so long as they are confined purely to the social and religious life of the community.

I must skip over the Section regarding the service of Brahmans and barbers. Even there the author shows that the practice is erratic, in no sense universal and subject to constant change.

Then comes the Section regarding pollution by touch. Says the author:

> There is a similar conventionality and flexibility about the idea of uncleanliness and pollution.

> The extent to which members of the higher caste feel themselves polluted differs in respect of the same group from place to place. The same thing is applicable to food and drink taboos.

> It should be borne in mind that Mr. Porter has considered the question purely with a view to examining the vexatious question as to who should be included among the ‘Depressed Classes’. He, therefore, says:

1 Vide “Human Manufacture [-I]”, 29-4-1933.
As a social question, therefore, the problem of the Depressed Classes is primarily one for Hindu society to tackle for itself. As an administrative problem demanding the cognizance of Government, social and religious disabilities are unsatisfactory as a test of the classes to be included, whilst the extent to which the Depressed Classes are denied participation in the advantages and conveniences maintained by the administration is so small as to be negligible. For the administration, in fact, the problem of the Depressed Classes in Bengal practically does not exist, save in so far as special measures are necessary to improve their economic condition and standard of education. The prominence which it acquires is largely due to the questions raised in comparatively recent years as regards separate representation in the Legislatures for members of the Classes. For Bengal at least, therefore, the attempt to treat any social usage or any civic disability as a clear criterion by which to distinguish the Depressed Classes is bound to fail and some other distinction must be sought. It is necessary to retain the untouchables since the Census Commissioner has explained Depressed Classes as “castes contact with whom entails purification on the part of the high-caste Hindus”.

He added:

It is not intended that the term should have any reference to occupation as such but to those castes which by reason of their traditional position in Hindu society are denied access to temples, for instance, or have to use separate wells or are not allowed to sit in schools but have to remain outside or have to suffer similar social disabilities.

The question of preparing a list of the Depressed Classes for each Province was discussed at a meeting of the Superintendents of Census operations in January 1931. As a result of this discussion the Census Commissioner announced:

“For the purposes of the census of India I propose at present to retain the term ‘Depressed Classes’ to indicate untouchables, whether of the milder or of the more severe degree of untouchability.”

It was decided also that Muslims and Christians should be excluded and that generally speaking the hill and forest tribes who had not become Hindu but whose religion was returned as ‘tribal’ should also be excluded.

He then goes on to show why the expression ‘Depressed Classes’ should include not only the untouchables conforming to the various social and religious tests examined by him, but all those of whom

Rashtrapati Bhavan

VOL. 61: 27 APRIL, 1933-7 OCTOBER, 1933
in the terms of His Majesty’s Instrument of Instructions to the Governor of the Province it would still be true that from their lack of educational and material advantages they rely specially upon the protection of Government and cannot as yet fully rely for their welfare upon joint political action.

Section 17 contains a most informing comparison between the lists of Depressed Classes in 1921 and 1931. In the British districts only of Bengal, 1,801,712 persons who are included in the list of 1921 have been excluded from that of 1931 and the number belongs to eight castes, the largest being Rajbangshi. Similarly there are some groups who have been for the first time included in the list of 1931. In the group ‘A’ alone of the ‘Depressed Classes’, with which for the moment we are concerned, there are 48 castes in the Census Report of 1931 as against only 19 in 1921. The comparison covers other reports also, but I have confined myself to the Census reports only. A careful perusal of the whole of this report dealing with Depressed Classes is necessary for the diligent student. He will be amply repaid for his trouble.

But what I have given is, I hope, sufficient to show that the untouchables are a human manufacture and that, too, by census enumerators, who have nothing to do with religious untouchability, and in accordance with instructions, which were received from their superiors and which varied from time to time, so that an untouchable of yesterday ceases to be an untouchable of today and he who was not an untouchable yesterday through these census operations finds himself to be an untouchable of today. I commend this information to honest sanatanists and ask them whether they are satisfied with this state of things or whether they are satisfied with the varying definitions of untouchability or with the fact that the untouchability, in accordance with a particular definition, varies from place to place even regarding the same persons. Can all this be enjoined by the Shastras? It is possible to multiply this suggestive and awkward question, but I forbear.

The one thing that should force itself upon the attention of every thoughtful reader is that the State or the Law should have nothing to do with untouchability and that, therefore, the Abolition of Untouchability Bill is a peremptory necessity. A custom that is repugnant to the moral sense of mankind, that varies from place to place, from time to time, both in its incidence and in its application to individuals, cannot and ought not to have the sanction of the law of a secular State representing those who at the one end believe in untouchability, no matter how capricious, and, at the other, regard it as a negation of religion. Withdrawal of State recognition of such a custom in no way interferes with the personal belief of any single individual or his social practice. It will still be open to a person to regard his fellow as an untouchable at religious and social functions without any interference from law. That should satisfy the most orthodox of people, and the reformer would be crossing the limits of justice if he asks for more.

Another thing that clearly comes out of Mr. Porter’s monograph is that the disabilities for inclusion in the term ‘Depressed Classes’ should not include untouchability. They should be disabilities of a civic, political, economic and non-religious character, of which the State can and should take notice and for which it is not only possible but it is also the duty of the State to find a remedy. That would purge the Depressed Classes list of untouchability and yet enable the State to deal with its incidences that are common to people other than untouchables.

If the Census operations ignored untouchability, as they should, the wind will be taken out of the sanatanists’ sail. Happily for them and for mankind, nature has no indelible mark whereby an untouchable can be detected from the rest of his fellows. So far as I can see from my study of various Census Reports and of the general law of the country, there is absolutely no legal difficulty in achieving this end so ably put forth by the author in the monograph under discussion. It should be remembered too, that the definition of ‘Depressed Classes’ contemplated in the Yeravda Pact has not yet been arrived at.

Harijan, 6-5- 1933

92. HIS WILL BE DONE

General Smuts is reported to have made a pathetic appeal to me to desist from the impending fast. Kunwar Maharaj Singh is said to have backed it. I have not yet received the telegram. But there seems to be no doubt about the authenticity of the report.

1 For the telegram from Kunwar Maharaj Singh, India’s Agent General on South Africa, vide “A Confession and a Warning”, 6-5-1933.
Dr. Ansari binds me with a tie of love capable of standing the severest strain.\footnote{Vide "Telegram to Dr. M. A. Ansari", 4-5-1933.} When I seemed to be forsaken by the ‘Siamese Twins’\footnote{Shaukat Ali and Mahomed Ali}, through whom I came to know the great and good Hakim Saheb Ajmal Khan and then Dr. Ansari, the latter never wavered in his faith in my supreme regard for Mussalmans of India as if they were my blood-brothers, as in fact they are, born of the same Madar-i-Hind. He as “an old friend, fellow-worker and medical man” makes a pathetic appeal to me to vary my vow.

Chakravarti Rajagopalachari, the keeper of my conscience, sends me a long telegram attacking the very basis of the fast.

Add to these the fervent personal appeal, strengthened by a copious flow of tears, of Devdas, my youngest son and valued comrade.

If these typical appeals have left me unmoved, the reader should have no difficulty in perceiving that there must be a force which has overpowered me and prevents me from responding to these and such other appeals.

Underlying them is undoubtedly a distrust in my claim that this fast is prompted by God.\footnote{Vide “Statement on Fast”, 30-4-1933.} I do not suggest that they do not believe in my word. But they believe me to be under self-delusion—a prey to my own heated imagination made hotter by the suffocation produced by the cramping walls of a prison. I cannot deny the possibility of such a thing. But it can make no appeal to me whilst I believe to the contrary. I am a habitual prisoner. Prison walls have never been known to have warped my judgment or induced in me a habit of brooding. All my imprisonments have been periods of intense activity leaving me no time for brooding. I have undoubtedly brooded over the wrongs of Harijans. But such brooding has always resulted in definite action on my part. The action that I was contemplating on the day preceding that fateful night was certainly not any fast.

My claim to hear the voice of God is no new claim. Unfortunately there is no way that I know of proving the claim except through results. God will not be God if He allowed Himself to be an object of proof by His creatures. But He does give His willing slave the power to pass through the fiercest of ordeals. I have been a willing slave to this most exacting Master for more than half a century. His voice has been increasingly audible as years have rolled by. He has never forsaken me even in my darkest hour. He has saved me often against myself and left me not a vestige of independence. The greater the surrender to Him, the greater has been my joy.

I, therefore, feel confident that in the end these kindest of friends will recognize—the correctness of the action I am about to take. And this whether I die or live. God’s ways are inscrutable. And who knows that He may not want my death during the fast to be more fruitful of beneficial results than my life? Surely it is highly depressing to think that a man’s ability to serve dies with the dissolution of the body which for the moment he is inhabiting. Who doubts that the spirits of Ramakrishna and Dayananda, Vivekananda and Ramtirth are today working in our midst? It may be that they are more potent today than when they were in our midst in the flesh. It is not true that ‘the good that men do is oft buried with them’. We burn the evil that men do with their mortal remains. We treasure the memory of the good they do, and distance only magnifies it.

And why should exaggerated importance be given to the services of one single person, however good or able he may be? The cause of Harijans is God’s cause. He will throw up men and women as they may be required to do His will.

I, therefore, invite General Smuts and all other friends to believe with me that I am not acting under hallucination and beseech them to send up their prayer to the Almighty that He may give me the strength to pass safely through the ordeal. I feel sure that, if I am wanted on this earth yet for a while for any service whatsoever, He will spare me notwithstanding the fears of medical friends.

Since the above was in type, the cable from Sir Kunwar Maharaj Singh has been received. The Press version omits some words. Here is the text:

The following telegram has been sent to me by General Smuts, in his private capacity, for transmission to you:

“May I appeal to you most earnestly to delay your announced fast? Your work for removal of untouchability has already achieved a measure of success which exceeds highest expectations. With patience you may yet carry complete accomplishment of the greatest reform of our time. Moreover, India stands on the threshold of a new period which makes your wise guidance in future more essential than ever before. Endangering your life might lead to a dreadful calamity and an irreparable setback at the most critical moment. I appeal for old friendship’s sake and for the great causes you have championed so successfully.”

In forwarding this telegram I wish on my own behalf and, I feel sure, on behalf of the Indian community in South Africa, to endorse the sentiment expressed by General Smuts.

MAHARAJ SINGH
AGENT OF GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

_Harijan_, 6-5-1933

93. A CONFESSION AND A WARNING

Though I had read about the coming of this lady\(^1\) to India and her acceptance of Hinduism and yearning to go to the Ashram at Sabarmati, she had never corresponded with me till after the September fast. When the possibility of the second fast to start on the 2nd of January last was announced, she wrote to me a long letter telling me that she would join me in the fast. I wrote to her, strongly dissuading her from the course and inviting her to see me, if she was not convinced. I asked her in one of my letters to let me know something about her past. She wrote a long letter in reply. Meanwhile she had started Harijan work in Bangalore with some young men to help her. She wrote to me about it. This interested me more in her. And I wrote back in praise of her work. Thus our correspondence grew.

Suddenly a friend who had just returned from Mysore warned me that my letters were being exploited and that N. was a mere adventures of doubtful character. Thereupon I wrote to her an urgent letter telling her of the report and asking her to come at once to Poona. I felt that the Harijan work was in danger by her association, if the report was true. She came promptly in answer to my letter. Her behaviour was strange as she came in. I straightaway told her what I had heard about her character. She repudiated all the charges. I thought there was an end to the matter and began to enquire more about her work. But as the conversations grew, my suspicion was roused and I frankly told her about it. That led to most painful revelations one after another. Her life was one of lewdness, untruth and extravagance. The lewdness did not seem to repel her. She was brought up in a Bohemian family, where the very name Jesus was taboo. (N. is only 24, was married in Greece at the age of 17 and has a son who is with her.) She seemed now to realize the amazing contradictions of her life. I put it to her that she was doing an irreparable damage to the faith of her adoption, injuring the Harijan cause and corrupting the morals of the youths who had gathered round her. I believe that she saw the force of what I urged. She decided at once to break with the past, run the risk of being prosecuted by her creditors and to live among Harijans for their service and bring up her boy for the same work. She went back to Bangalore. She wrote a brief letter of confession for the Press, which the latter would not publish. She removed to Harijan quarters in Bangalore and, coming under the spell of a vicious man, fell again. She then went to a Harijan village near Chitaldrug. She was neglected by the person who took her there. She very nearly collapsed. During this period she was keeping up regular correspondence with me. She saw that it was impossible to serve Harijans or to hold herself together without proper guidance. I felt that it was my clear duty to work out the logical extent of the advice I had given and that if she was to live the life of service to the lowliest, she must go to the Ashram, where she had dreamt of going long ago. I could not possibly ask any friend or other institution to run the risk of taking a foreign young emotional girl with a black past hardly yet out of sight. With the consent of the manager of the Ashram, therefore, I have sent her there, though not without hesitation. Nor is it without hesitation that I am sharing her letter with the public. It is difficult to believe that all her terrible past is dead for ever. But sudden changes have happened in men’s lives before. Let us hope that N. will prove to be one more such case. What is impossible for man is possible for God.

Needless to say that she goes to the Ashram without the slightest intention of taking part directly or indirectly in the civil disobedience movement. One word to the young men who fell under N.’s spell. She has given me the naked details of her past life. Youth will be emotional all the world over. Hence the utter necessity of preconceived and deliberate brahmacharya during the study period, i.e., at least 25 years. Let the youth of the country know that this Harijan service is the most difficult of all humane services. I do not publish one-tenth of what comes under my notice of the moral degradation to which the criminal neglect of caste Hindus has reduced them. The work, therefore, demands the highest purity and the greatest simplicity on the part of the workers. Let the young men and women who are working for the cause take heed from the example of N.

_Harijan, 6-5-1933_

94. FOR A HEART AWAKENING

I am writing this on the morning of Saturday¹. I have heard counsel of a number of friends. Through attachment or love they want me not to undertake the _mahayajna_ that is in the offing. The inner voice says: 'It will be a sin to draw back. God, in whose name the resolve was taken will fulfil everything according to His wish.'

Outwardly what I see convinces me that I must fast, come what may. Pandit Santhanam has sent me a report of the work in the Punjab. It contains three points which Lala Mohanlal has made. These, in brief, are as follows:

1. In the Punjab the Arya Samaj, the Sanatana Dharmis, the Sikhs, the Mussalmans and the Christians all want to draw Harijans into their respective folds.

2. Harijans have produced leaders who are so covetous that, it is impossible to satisfy them.

3. There are rival organizations in the Punjab working for the same cause.

It may occasion some surprise among readers that my proposed fast is an answer to the above situation. The Harijan Sevak Sangh must understand that this work is purely religious and must be carried on in a religious spirit. Once this is granted the above three points are automatically answered. I do not consider as religious the work that people of other communities and sects are doing. If Harijan sevaks work with religious spirit they will see the fruit of service in service itself. They can weigh themselves only in the scales of justice. If therefore Harijan leaders or others use pressure they will not be affected by it. Work done in a religious spirit cannot but have an effect on the rival organizations. What is the definition of such wonderful religion? Religion is what purifies the soul, in which there is no hankering for fruits of action, which generates indomitable faith, and in which there is not an iota of selfishness. Only activities conforming to such religion can be said to be religious. In activities of this kind the service of Harijans takes on the character of purification of the caste Hindus, an expression of their repentance. If this is clearly understood there remains nothing further to ask. Let every individual and organization become pure through the service of Harijans; let no one speak ill of others or bear malice towards others. There can be no place here for considerations of political profit.

But this is easier said than done. It means that religion is to be grasped not by the intellect but by the heart. For an awakening of the heart the only effective means is tapasya. Tapasya is the extreme form of renunciation. Tapasya begins with fasting. Tapasya means to take on suffering. Only those who fast know the suffering of fasting. I hope to teach through tapasya, that is, fasting, what I cannot teach through arguments.

But whether I succeed or not I see no peace for myself except in fasting. I am convinced that that is what God wills me to do. If in the course of the tapasya I succumb I shall understand—and so must people understand—that my work is finished, and my responsibility is over. That will be no occasion for grief and sorrowing. And what can be more fortunate for me as well as for the cause of Harijan service if I give up my life in that cause? If the tapasya is consummated without any obstacle it will add to my self-confidence and give me further strength for service. In either case it will become clear that the work of Harijan Sevak Sangh is a religious one, that for caste Hindus it is in the nature of repentance and that those who are not pure have no place in this work.

Let no one think that there is any strength to be derived from merely abstaining from food. Thought and word should collaborate in fasting. only a fast undertaken in thought, word and deed can be an effective means of self-purification. That is why I have been explaining in a number of articles that everyone does not have the right to fast.

May 5/6, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I had a fairly long discussion with Parashuram. Before explaining the conclusion to which I have arrived as a result of it, I will narrate to you a shocking thing which he told me. I told him that I did not believe him at all, but asked him to give his story in writing if he wished to do so. He did that. What he says is that Dr. Sharma is more busy in criticizing the Ashram than with treating the patients, and that too in talking unclean things about it. Parashuram says that Dr. Sharma had come with certain fixed prejudices against the Ashram and that he had been talking with several people there and trying to induce them to tell him things by talking to them against other inmates or coaxing them in other ways. According to Dr. Sharma, slave mentality prevails in the Ashram and all of you are deceiving an 'old fool' like me by nodding 'yes' to everything I say. You are, he says, under Prema’s influence and are guided by her in all things. He calls Prema “Her Excellency” and always uses that phrase when talking about her in her absence. I didn’t have time to talk more about this with Parashuram, but I have given you the substance of what he said.

All this has had no effect on me whatsoever. But I have mentioned it because I thought it necessary that you should know. Dr. Sharma has not given me the slightest impression of being a man of this type. In the letters which he wrote to me from Delhi, I saw his humility and his sincerity, and I have always believed that he has come to the Ashram prompted by a spirit of service. I would be very much shocked if what Parashuram says is found to be true, though of course there is little room for being more shocked than I have already been. And from Monday in any case I shall be enjoying supreme peace.

About you and Prema, Parashuram has nothing to say except that there is temperamental incompatibility between him and you two. At any rate that is what he says just now. The word in his diary is not rakshasi¹ but rajasi² and you seem to have read it wrongly. Nor has he charged you with wickedness. He keeps saying that he has got fed up with Prema’s temper. However that may be, I have told him that he should exercise the utmost control on his pen and tongue and stop writing such a rotten diary, and that he can return to the Ashram if he is ready to throw himself on your goodwill and promise unreserved co-operation with you in future. I have also advised him to write one letter to you. I have not yet received any such letter.

² Imperious

May 6, 1933

Parashuram says that he does not wish to leave the Ashram with the stigma of failure. He seems to be coming round completely now. Moreover, the fast also is approaching and so he is eager to secure a testimonial from you and return to the Ashram. I am writing this early in the morning. Parashuram will see me in the course of the day. If I think it advisable to send him back, I will do so. Have a talk with him and take him in again if he satisfies you. You are, of course, not bound to do so at all. Take him in only if you yourself feel that his heart has become completely clean. If, moreover, what he says about Dr. Sharma is nothing but a fabrication by him or a complete misreading of the facts on his part, you may think whether it would be advisable to take in again a man of such a confused mind.

If, however, what he says about Dr. Sharma is found to be true, you will have to think a great deal. Whether or not you take Parashuram back, give him enough time and listen to all that he has to say. If he is a good man, we should not let him go. But I also know that, though good, if he is utterly confused in mind, we cannot keep him in the Ashram. You are, therefore, completely free not to take him back again. I am permitting him to come to you only because I don’t wish to reject his eager entreaties to do so. But I have made my condition clear to him. He can stay only if he satisfies you.

I continue to get letters from Dr. Sharma and see from them that several people have indeed talked to him and told him many things. He says that he has found some persons to be suffering from even venereal diseases. He should give the names of such persons to you. I also was going to ask for them, but meanwhile came this fast. Hence I leave that job to you. Read the letter which I am writing to him.

Panditji is returning there. Narmada does not intend to return at all. Lakshmibehn has taken a vow, when leaving the Ashram, that she will not return for one year. Hence she will not return before that period is over.

98. LETTER TO SURENDRAJI

May 6, 1933

DEAR SURENDRAJI,

Ramdas told me that you had tears in your eyes when he conveyed my message to you. I am sure that in your eyes there cannot be any tears but of joy. There was no way out of this fast and this was the auspicious occasion. It seems to me impossible to destroy

1 In reply to his letter dated May 5, 1933, which read: “Your fast has posed a question for all, ‘what is my dharma?’ I undertake to do anything you would ask me to, but please do give up the fast” (S.N. 21175).
a hydra-headed demon like the untouchability by any other means. Ravana had ten heads only but this demon has a thousand. It is not necessary to explain to you what these thousand heads are. It is impossible to bring about its permanent destruction by ordinary, time-honoured means. We must, therefore, perforce, resort to ancient, valuable weapons. This is as clear to me as a mathematical axiom. Is it possible to change the heart of sanatanists by collecting a crore of rupees? Only a true votary can bring about this reform and not hundreds of so-called ones. The Ashram through which I am hoping to overcome this evil must not stand divided on this question. Harijans are in mortal dread at present. Those who have given up fear have become shameless. If these latter run into a fury, it would be no surprise. To destroy all these evils we cannot too often and too determinedly draw on our spiritual possessions. If it is God’s pleasure that I alone can bring about this desired end, I shall only be too pleased for such a sacrifice. But I am not sure that I have so much of purity in me. If hundreds and thousands of persons like me can undertake as many fasts, then alone we can bury the sin that has accumulated through centuries.

I expect a lot from you and people like you. But I must make one thing clear that no one must follow me during my fast. Your duty is to remain peaceful and try to be as pure as possible in mind, deed and word. This letter has been written by Mahadev and he will continue to do so everyday. I shall sign it as long as it is possible for me to do so. I have obtained Government’s permission that I can write to you everyday and so also you can.

My blessings to all.

99. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

Special letter for Mirabehn May 6, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

Mahadev is writing this for me, as he will do everyday from now, and whenever possible take my signature. You can also write daily and Ba too. I am enclosing a letter for Ba.

You don’t need any argument from me. If any is needed you will read it\textsuperscript{1} all in today’s Harijan. It is clear to me as daylight that the fast had to come. I am only surprised that I did not take the decision earlier. I wrestled with myself all these days. The struggle grew acute during the last three days and a little after midnight the voice came clear to me that I must take the plunge. I see what agony you are going through. I knew Ba would be brave. But your joint telegram and your letters have already begun to provide me spiritual sustenance for the pilgrimage. If you want me to come out victorious in the struggle of the spirit with the flesh, you too have to share in the struggle. I know how agonizing the effort is for you but I know too you will come out triumphant and help me to be triumphant too. But what is our triumph? As you have rightly begun your letter and perhaps I wrote the heading of my article just when you wrote those words there—not our will but His will be done.

Let me have a line from you both everyday.

Love.

\textbf{CHI. NARANDAS,}

I got your letter.

The absence of any letter from N. worries me. She was to write to me daily. I very much hope she will acquit herself well. Keep an eye on her. Send me reports about her even during the fast. I want her also to send a slip to me occasionally. If you find that she is not behaving properly, let me know immediately. You may even ask her to leave the Ashram if you think it necessary to do so. You must have read the letter which I wrote to her yesterday. I hope you have supplied her ink, pen, paper and other things which she will need.

You ask me what I desire during the period of the fast. our outward activities may go on as usual, but I see the need for inner purification by all. All our activities directly or indirectly bear on the welfare of the Harijans. But see if you can think of a concrete field of work for their service.

But my chief desire is to see the reforms which I have suggested in the Ashram carried out. You should think over my suggestions about persons who do not observe the Ashram rules being asked to leave, etc., and take the necessary steps to implement them. If as a consequence of such action the physical activities of the Ashram have to be reduced to some extent, never mind. Discuss, calmly, the problems a little more still and make the Ashram safe from the point of view of purity of standards. Think over the suggestions¹ made by Rajbhoj and persuade the inmates of the Ashram to get ready to sacrifice themselves by fasting indefinitely.

I cannot think of anything more to say.

CHI. MANI,

Like last time, this time too, I am permitted to send you a letter every day during the fast and you too can write to me daily. I may be unable to write or dictate a letter daily but Mahadev will write and, if possible, get it signed by me. Every such letter will be for both you and Mridula². This letter also is being taken down by Mahadev.

Both of you are brave girls. I am sure you will not be unnerved. You need not worry at all on my account. I think that I am fresher and stronger this time than I was at the time of the previous fast. Raja strove hard with me. He is calm now and is leaving today. But he will return in a few days’ time. Vallabhbhai is bearing it all very calmly and has promised to Mahadev that he will co-operate with me—maybe by keeping silent—without entering into any argument. I like this attitude of his. For a few days he carried his silence too far. Even the fountain of his humour seemed to have dried up. But it has welled up

² Mridula Sarabhai
The fast was absolutely necessary. I have no doubt that this was the best time for it. I have thought about the matter from every point of view and am fully convinced of the correctness of my decision. The fast is not directed against anybody. I do not even know what event pained me and precipitated the fast. Many things had their felt or unfelt influence on me. The point is that if the workers doing Harijan work under my guidance are not perfectly sincere, the cause must be some impurity in me. Moreover, the monster of untouchability is more frightful than Ravana. The latter had only ten heads, but this one has hundreds of them. They cannot all be cast off by any number of organizations or any amount of money collected for the purpose. It is not enough to secure rights for Harijans. What is wanted is a change of heart among caste Hindus if they and Harijans are to embrace one another as blood-brothers. This great spiritual task can be accomplished only if we spend all the spiritual strength we possess. This is an ancient and well-trodden path. The wonder is that I did not think of it before.

Remain calm both of you and contribute your share when the time comes. A fast in sympathy with me is out of question.

Blessings to both from

102. LETTER TO GOMTIBEHN MASHRUWALA
[May 6, 1933]

I hope you have understood the significance of the proposed fast. What is Nathji’s view? He did not approve of my last fast. I don’t know if he approved of it afterwards. The proposed fast is of a different kind. If you know Kishorelal’s view, write to me about that too.

1 As given in the source. However there appears to be some doubt as to its correctness. According to Mahadevbhaini Diary, Vol. III, p. 255 the idea of the fast mentioned in the letter came to Gandhiji on April 30.

You should not get nervous. Try to purify yourself as much as you can. Do some work of service. Do not get upset at all. Take care of your health. If I die, you will have to complete this yajna. How you may do that, I myself don’t know very well. I have explained to Kaka. I have also written about this to the inmates of the Ashram. I have explained to Mahadev and Chhaganlal, too, as much as I understand. I don’t have time to write more.

Your fast will not do any good either to you or to anyone else, and it cannot but cause pain to me. Even fasting has its rules. If I have any influence with you, give up the idea of fasting and do as I have advised. Banish suspicion and anger from your mind and understand Mathuradas and others. One who fails to understand his well-wishers cannot be happy. If you have so much faith in me, why should you not have equal faith in Narandas, Mathuradas and others? I hope you have faith in Rajbhoj at any rate. If you have, you should follow his advice at least. It will definitely sustain me in my fast if your mind is at peace.

My very freedom seems bondage to me, whereas slavery to the God of Truth seems freedom to me. Though I didn’t at all wish to undertake a fast, I had to do so. But the lightness of heart which I felt after I had taken the decision is beyond words. You should, therefore, rejoice at the fast. I am sure, nothing will happen to my body. But what even if my expectation proves false? In that case, you should think that God had no more service to take through this body. Please, therefore, do not feel unhappy. The human appears to me, much later than it should have come. But as I cannot be the judge of God Himself, I have submitted to His peremptory injunctions. In my opinion, however, I should have undergone a fast like this at the time of the inauguration of the Harijan movement after the sealing of the Yeravda Pact. But that was not to be and it came now. It is undoubtedly a preparatory yajna (sacrifice) after the fact, it is also a purificatory yajna and it had to be so because it was overdue. You should understand that all this is argument after the fact. When I felt that I had received a peremptory call, I had no such reasoning in front of me. The call simply came and overpowered me. ‘Is it not rather an explosion of grief?’—you ask. The answer is quite simple and easy. Most emphatically it is not an explosion of grief. Penance it undoubtedly is, for in impurities as I call them, improprieties as you call them, but it is included in the purificatory part of it. This, too, was inevitable because of the absence of the inaugurative fast. ‘Have not the shocking cases of impurity you have referred to in your statement led to the fast?’ This is your last rider. I tell you it is absolutely incorrect and I can say this with the greatest assurance, because I can give you the dates on which the shocking incidents came to my notice and at that time I felt there was no warrant for me to fast on account of those individual cases. There were decisive reasons why as a prisoner I should not take up the fast for individual cases, as I have done before now. But in a great movement like the Harijan movement, it would be beyond the power of a single human being to cope with individual cases by fasting in each case. There is, therefore, no doubt in my mind that, whilst these cases must have subconsciously prepared the ground for the fast, I am unable to lay my finger on any one of those single incidents as having been wholly or principally responsible for this sacrifice. It is predominantly an inaugurative fast overdue, and subordinately, because it is overdue by way of purification of self and associates. I commence the fast at 12 noon Monday, if Monday sees me alive.¹

108. THE BEGINNING OF THE YAJNA

From my childhood I have been taught that good deeds — religious acts—must begin with the purification of the body and the soul. The fast of September last cannot be described as a yajna of this kind. The purpose of that fast was to bring about a change in the Government’s scheme. Other service to the Harijans necessarily flowed from it. There was no alternative for me but to undertake it. The purpose was fulfilled with the alteration in the scheme and the fast too was terminated. That fast had a condition attached to it and was, to that extent, inferior to the present one.

The work of Harijan service began later. I now feel that it was a poor beginning. There was no shuddhi-yajna behind it. It is possible that owing to lack of that yajna, the war against untouchability did not take on a wholly religious form.

I was not aware of this when the call to fast came. It is difficult to name any one thing which was the cause of the fast. This fast of mine is distinct from all my other well-known fasts. Its only object is self-purification. If I die during this fast, I would regard it as a welcome, though unforeseen, consequence. And I would like everyone else to regard it as such. If I give up my life thinking of Harijans and with the idea in my mind of doing pure service to them, I would regard it as a good beginning of the work of service. However, in this yajna, it is not my intention to render service by dying but by living. If God has willed otherwise, who can prevail against Him? Just as I have the courage to serve in life, so also have I in death. We should therefore look upon life and death as one and the same thing.

Those who tremble at this fast should give up their attachment to the body. Giving up the body does not mean giving up the work. If that were the case, what would be the good of living? The body perishes but the atman does not. It is the atman which acts or does not act. It lives for ever; it is immortal. Whether we are aware of it or not, whether we wish it or not, all effort is related to the soul—which it may be uplifting or degrading. At the moment, I have only one burning desire, viz., that we should all realize that this task of abolishing untouchability is a religious one and cannot be achieved except through religious means. The purification of all other Hindus lies in the service of Harijans. Hinduism will not be purified, notwithstanding the improvement in the economic and political condition of the Harijans, if other Hindus are not rendered pure. If the filth of untouchability is not swept away, it will devour Hinduism. In order to achieve this, it is necessary to bring about a change of heart among the countless Hindus.
It should be clear as daylight to everyone that this filth cannot be got rid of except through self-purification. The best way to make this clear is to take up the yajna of fasting in thought, word and deed. Mere bodily fasting is suffering in vain. It may be mere hypocrisy. Anyone who does not mentally crave for cereals or fruit, finds that his body readily gives up this craving. Anyone who does not actually partake of these, but who mentally thinks of nothing but these, may be said to be constantly eating despite the fact that his body is fasting. Many fasts are of this nature. From the standpoint of dharma, these are futile and there is every likelihood of their being harmful. Hence, it is absolutely essential that the mind should be fully prepared when undertaking a religious fast. My soul is witness that I am prepared in this manner. It is possible that many persons may perish during such yajnas. Nevertheless, without many such yajnas, the abolition of untouchability cannot be accomplished, the filth that has become embedded through centuries cannot be removed. It is only right that I should make a beginning in this yajna.

If my physical self does not survive the twenty-one days’ fast, the reader must conclude that it was useless for this or any other service. Faith is of the utmost importance here. Blind faith is of course to be found in plenty and, as a result, faith itself has become an object of criticism. But just as a person with sight is not useless merely because he is amidst many who are blind, but rather becomes the guide of the latter, similarly, the clear-sighted faith of one individual can overcome the blind faith of millions. I wish to acquire such faith. Other men and women should also make that effort. In order to do so one or more fasts involving thought, word and deed will be useful.

May 7, 1933

There are more verses than one in the Gita which imply that God always helps us to complete whatever work is undertaken in His name and at His prompting. He is the sole author of everything. We, therefore, are responsible for nothing.

If somebody assaults another with a stick, it is the person using the stick and not the stick that does so. Similarly, if we put our body in God’s hands and if He uses it to get some work done, it is God who does the work and not the body. Credit for success and discredit for failure will be His.

I got your two letters at the same time. I got the wire too. I am very glad that you are staying on there. You should always live like this without worrying. I am confident that I shall come through the fast safely.

It also seems advisable that you should consult some vaid or hakim for your complaint. Many persons get discharge from the ear for some time and then it stops of its own. It is nothing to be afraid of. It will be enough if you are careful about your food. If a cow is brought in your presence and milked after washing the udders, you should drink fresh, unboiled milk. Take care about food and eat nothing between meals. Avoid dal and spices, and always include some uncooked vegetable in your food. Tomatoes and salad are good. Dr. Deshmukh strongly advises the consumption of uncooked onions.

How does Janakibehn\textsuperscript{1} spend her time? Does she move about?
Does Om\textsuperscript{2} learn anything? What is Prabudas doing?

123. LETTER TO PREMABEHN KANTAK

May 7, 1933

CHI. PREMA,

You must have got my letters. I hope you have given up your fast and calmed down. But I expect a still better result of your fast. You know what it is.

Cultivate close contact with N. I believe that sincere love will reform her and keep her on the right path. There was no limit to her sins. Likewise, there is no limit to her good aspirations. But she has lost everything as a result of her immorality. She has lost control over her mind. I am responsible for having brought about this great and sudden change in her life, hence I do wish that she should be able to bear it.

124. LETTER TO JAMNABEHN GANDHI

May 7, 1933

CHI. JAMNA,

Your letters are worthy of a woman of understanding and please me very much. Now make a determined effort to improve your health. I will then give you plenty of work. I have no doubt that you can improve your health.

You have convinced Keshu thoroughly well. I never knew that he was so immature. I did discuss with him the question of marriage. I am surprised to hear that he says I didn’t. I had even placed before him Sardar’s opinion. But he himself refused.

You should continue to write to me even during the fast.

125. LETTER TO VINOBA BHAVE

May 7, 1933

Every moment I receive proof of the propriety of my fast. I have already hinted in my article\(^1\) about the necessity of another such fast. That idea is becoming stronger. I feel that an unbroken chain of such fasts should be maintained till untouchability is completely abolished. As soon as one man or woman ends his or her fast, another should start and thus a chain should be kept up. Write to me and let me know what you think about this plan. I see the absolute necessity of such a living flame so that a religious movement may be carried on in a religious spirit. Who else if not the inmates of the Ashram, should shoulder the responsibility of keeping such a flame alive? We must make a beginning in this matter. If I survive the fast, I will join you and others in discussing this plan. If I die, however, you, Kaka and others who are out of jail will have to think at that time. If you feel that you should see me, you may come.

May 7, 1933

Even if I never fast, I am bound to die one day. And why should we assume that I shall die during the fast? Have faith that whether I live or die, it will be for our good. Is it not better to die performing a yajna than to die of a disease? Have courage, lead a pure life and do what service you can.

131. LETTER TO D. V. PARACHURE
May 7, 1933

You cannot fast on my behalf. The person who has started a yajna should himself undertake self-purification. It was I who started the yajna for the abolition of untouchability and, therefore, it is my duty to make myself fit for it by a fast.

But a time will come when I will welcome your fast. For the present, examine yourself more closely and get a little more settled in the Ashram. Then you may certainly fast. I will help you in taking the decision if I survive this fast. If I don’t, then Kaka, Vinoba, etc., will be there to help you. Take the decision with their help. I have already written to Narandas about this. I shall be happy if the inmates of the Ashram carry on the fast in an unbroken chain, one at a time at least. Just now, however, you should only prepare your mind for this yajna.

The fast is certainly for you, but it is for myself too. Why should you die? Live and demonstrate your purity and strength of mind. I am confident that you will do so. My fast will help you in that effort. You also will have to fast when you have become fit for doing so. Our aim will not be realized by my fasting alone. You should, therefore, start working after you have improved.

135. LETTER TO P. N. RAJBHOJ

May 7, 1933

Bhai Rajbhoj,

Ramji suggested that you two should go round among the Harijans in the countryside. I do not like it. In my opinion you should stay at the Ashram, learn whatever is worth learning and immerse yourself completely in the Ashram life. Ramji is in a very unhealthy state, he has no confidence in anyone, and does not want to observe discipline. What good will his touring bring?

Talk him out of it and persuade him to do peacefully what he can in the Ashram. You may do whatever is possible in this matter.

If, in spite of all this, you are set on touring you may do so but on your own, not as representing the Ashram. Speech-making does not fall within Ashram activities at the moment.

136. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

May 7, 1933

Chi. Narandas,

I wrote one letter to you yesterday. Afterwards Ramji and Dr. Sharma came and saw me. Amtussalaam and Duncan are in Bombay.

Ramji insists that, if he is not permitted to fast, he may be permitted to tour villages and also wants that Rajbhoj should accompany him.

I have asked him to obtain your permission. If you approve, let them both go. But nobody should go in the name of the Ashram. On behalf of the Ashram only what is arranged by you should be done. However, I will respect your experience more than my reason. You may, therefore, do what you think best. Read the accompanying letters and pass them on to the persons concerned. You will have to send a wire, of course.

I knew that N. had fallen in Bangalore. She had written about that, but I grasped the full meaning of her remarks only the day previous to the day on which I sent her there. If she is really pregnant,
I will welcome that. That will test her and us too. If her heart has become pure, it is our duty to shelter her. Read my letter to her. Open all letters addressed to her and read them before giving them to her. The letters written by her may be passed and posted only if they are absolutely necessary. Reduce your other work and do some work regularly in a Harijan locality.

The meeting with Dr. Sharma was not a happy one. I did not like the way in which he talked. I found that there was much truth in what Parashuram had said. I see that he had come with a strong prejudice against the Ashram. I could not have a sufficiently long talk with him. I will have a little more discussion with him again tomorrow. He will not return there now. Bhagwanji has praised his work in his letters to me. The letters which Dr. Sharma wrote from there also seemed good. Have you not been able to judge him? Did he come here with your permission? It seems useless now to ask these questions. I will not worry about the Ashram during the fast. You will have to do that. Do what you think best. If you want help, you can call Kaka or Vinoba. You may introduce any changes that you like. If you don’t get much time to think, find some. I should like to hear about Kusum, Anandi and N. Give me other news, too. Mahadev will reply as he thinks fit. Do what you wish. You know what I desire.

Even if Parashuram comes there, ask him to leave if you don’t want him. Perhaps he may not come. All kinds of unexpected things keep happening here. Nobody, therefore, can foresee what will happen after two hours. That lady, Spiegel, has gone away to Madras. May God give you equanimity and the strength which you require. He who has equanimity will get the strength. That is the Lord’s assurance. You may expect one more letter still in my handwriting. And then, if it is God’s will, I will write to you after the 29th.

137. LETTER TO ANASUYABEHN SARABHAI

May 7, 1933

CHI. ANASUYABEHN,

I can understand your suffering. Keeping my company is disastrous. I myself am wholly in other hands, not knowing what will happen the next moment. I feel my freedom as slavery and slavery to the God of Truth as freedom. I did not have the slightest desire to undertake a fast, and yet I have had to do so. But now that I have undertaken one, the load that weighed on my mind is lifted in a way that defies description. You should therefore rejoice at the fast. Nothing untoward will happen to my body, but what even if my faith proves misplaced? In that case you may know that there was not further service to be taken from this body. Do not therefore feel troubled. Keep your mind fixed on the thought that the body is more fragile than a glass bangle and the atman which inhabits it is the only reality, and go on doing whatever service you can. Just now Shankerlal and you should rest. Come during the last days of the fast.

May [8,]³ 1933

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

This is Monday morning. It is not yet 3 a.m. Yours is the first letter I commence. This has come naturally and it pleases me. I treasure the telegram you sent me.⁴ I was wondering how the decision would react upon you. I was thankful to God that you had understood it. I did not know except vaguely why I was being made to take the fast. But as time passes, more and more proof is coming to me in justification. I stand or seem to stand calm in the midst of the events that would but for the approaching fast have rent me in twain. I am

142. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

May 8, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

It is now 3.10 a.m. and I have finished my first letter. That is to Andrews. Not only I but we are all thinking of you. People write to me or speak to me about you suggesting that I should abandon the fast for your sake. It is a great tribute to your love for me but also an unintended reflection. I want myself and everyone who knows you to feel that your love is so deeply true and knowing that it can stand the strain of physical separation no matter of what duration. I know that this will come, is coming. It cannot come through reason. It will come through the heart. Essential love depends wholly on the spiritual part, though it at first comes through the sense perception. I want you to feel with me that this fast is a gift greater than God has ever made to me. That I approach it in fear and trembling is a sign of my weak faith. But this time there is in me a joy which I have not known before. I want you to share that joy with me.

Do not therefore deprive yourself of any food. Eat your food thankfully and keep yourself fit for service. Time for you may come when you might have to take up a similar fast. Under certain circumstances it is the one weapon which God has given us for use in times of utter helplessness. We do not know its use or fancy that it begins and ends with mere deprivation of physical food. It is nothing of the kind. Absence of food is an indispensable but not the largest part of it. The largest part is the prayer—communion with God. It more than adequately replaces physical food.
Mahadev will drop you a line, as far as possible, daily.
May God give you strength.
Love.

146. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

May 8, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

If you have not been sending to Chhaganlal and others summaries or copies of my important letters, please send them. I see that Chhaganlal doesn’t know anything. Probably it must be the same with Vinoba. Make some arrangement for copies being made.

You will find enclosed a letter from Mary Barr. If she returns there, welcome her.

The other letter is from Nandlal Bose regarding Dhiru. It seems from it that Dhiru will not be able to go before July. In July he may certainly go. The letter refers to Rs. 15 as boarding charge. I couldn’t understand exactly what it means. However, nothing need be done just now. If I come through the fast and if it is necessary, I will write and get a clarification. Otherwise you may do so. I am sending the letter so that Dhiru may have patience. For the time being, let him do what he can in the Ashram. He should purify himself during these three weeks.
You will have to give more time to N. Try and understand what is in her heart. If any letters are received for her, open and read them. She is not likely to hide anything deliberately. But she has little control over her mind. I see that she has had a large share in persuading me to undertake this fast. I did not know this. If there is anything which can give her strength, it will be this fast, and, if I have made any mistake in sending her there, the fast is the only thing which can undo it. I think that it will save many young men. If she is pregnant, the cause is one Harijan priest named . . .\textsuperscript{1}. It is difficult to judge as to who tempted whom. According to me, if she is pregnant and if she can accept the prospect calmly, the experience will or can change her life and save her. Shower on her as much love as you can and rear the plant.

Margarete has left and gone away to Madras. She has held out a threat that she will go on a fast there. If she fasts, that will certainly do her health good. She will lose some of the excessive fat on her body.

Duncan’s belief is completely mistaken. I will explain the matter to him.

Please carry out my suggestions about the kitchen and the dairy if they have appealed to you.

Even if you don’t make changes in the prayer, you should divide it into three parts, namely, the recitation from the \textit{Gita}, the Sanskrit verses and \textit{bhajans}. Only those may attend the recitation from the \textit{Gita} who are ready to join in it. There is no moral obligation at all on the others to attend. However, those who wish to attend should give their names. The \textit{Gita} should be followed by the Sanskrit verses. In this also only those who wish to join and who can recite the verses may attend. Then should follow the \textit{bhajans} and \textit{Ramdhun}. Each of these three things, if done properly, will take ten minutes. Thus the only part of the prayers which all should attend is the last one. If all the persons give their names for the parts which they wish to attend, you will know who keep their resolutions. A lamp, a tall desk and a register should be placed near the gate and everybody who comes should put a cross or sign his name if that is preferred, in the appropriate column. Those who do not have sufficient faith in prayer to join even in the last item should not be eager to remain in the Ashram. Anybody who lacks faith in what is an inseparable part of the \textsuperscript{1} The name has been omitted.

Ashram will get no benefit from the Ashram and will be able to contribute nothing to it.

Nobody should stay merely from a wish to be useful to the Ashram. A son or daughter who consciously thinks ‘I may be useful to my mother’ will not serve her. only those who look upon the Ashram as their mother or their all in all, should stay in it. If everybody in the Ashram reflects sincerely in this manner and decides to stay, the coming three weeks will be well spent there. It is the Ashram which can make the best use of this period and benefit from it, and it ought to do so. I want everybody to maintain perfect truth. If you feel short of workers for carrying on the activities of the Ashram, you may engage paid men and women, look upon them as your own brothers and sisters, share their joys and sorrows and be one with them. Probably such a relationship will be more natural. Any activity which can be dispensed with may be stopped. However, the cultivation of fruits and vegetables, as also the dairy and the agricultural work connected with it, ought not to be stopped. All the processes relating to spinning are forms of yajna. You may stop admitting children. The entire Ashram is a school. I, therefore, cling to the view which I have expressed before. We should be able, and we are able, to give the necessary training required for living as a labourer. It should be enough to make sufficient provision for this. It is because we have not understood the full significance of this idea that we remain discontented and all the difficulties arise. If we but realize that our children are labourers and that it is our aim that they should grow up as such, I believe many of our problems would disappear. The training imparted for this purpose is bound to be different form the ordinary type of education. This is enough for the present. Even from this, accept only as much as you can and throw away the rest.

148. STATEMENT EXPLAINING OBJECT OF FAST

May 8, 1933

Every day brings me fresh justification for the ordeal that God the Truth has sent me. The discoveries I am making would have paralysed me, but for the fast. Whatever it may mean for the cause, it will certainly be my saving. Whether I survive the fast or not, is a matter of little moment. Without it I would, in all probability, have been useless for further service of Harijans, and for that matter, any other service.

Those friends who have sent me urgent wires dissuading me from the step will, I hope, appreciate the fact that for a person built as

1 Vide “Telegram to G. D. Birla”, 2-5-1933.
2 The statement was issued at 12 noon, soon after Gandhiji had commenced his fast.
I am, such fasts are indispensable. This I say apart from my claim, by which I stand, that it was God’s call.

The senders of wires will forgive me for not sending individual acknowledgments. The pressure upon my time has been so great that it has been physically impossible for me to cope with all wires that poured in upon me.

Now that the fast will begin within two hours of writing this, I invite all friends and well-wishers to pray for strength for enabling me to go through the ordeal without weakening. I confess that I have no strength except what God may give me. That He has never failed me hitherto gives me the confidence that He will not fail me now.

A telegram was received by me from a Harijan Association that my fast was unnecessary, as the Harijans do not stand in need of assistance from the caste Hindus. From its own standpoint, the Association is right. Only it should be clearly understood that the fast is taken not to oblige the Harijans, but for purification of self and associates.

Harijan service is a duty the caste Hindus owe to themselves. It is a part of the penance they must do for the wrongs they have done to their own kith and kin. I can well understand the indignantrepudiation by some of the Harijans. Let me hope that it is not yet too late for the vast majority to accept the penance. The numerous messages I have received from them leave no room for doubting such an acceptance.

Sanatanist Hindus scent further coercion in this fast. When they realize that it cannot be broken before its period, even if every temple was opened and untouchability wholly removed from the heart, they will perhaps admit that it cannot be regarded as in any way coercive. The fast is intended to remove bitterness, to purify hearts and to make it clear that the movement is wholly moral, to be prosecuted by wholly moral persons. May God bless the ordeal and fulfil its purpose.

_The Bombay Chronicle, 9-5-1933_
149. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS OF INDIA¹

May 8, 1933

It came upon me suddenly and therefore I was not prepared.

Having seen the Weekly Times yesterday, Sardar Vallabhbhai Patel and I discussed for a moment where I should stay, if I was suddenly discharged. My first thought was to go to Sabarmati and live near the Ashram, and if that was not feasible or advisable then to accept Lady Thackersey’s invitation. Of course the invitation of the Servants of India Society is there, as also from the Depressed Classes Mission, but when Col. Doyle gave me the information I felt that the best thing would be to go to Lady Thackersey’s, and here I am.

The Bombay Chronicle, 10-5-1933

150. STATEMENT SUSPENDING CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE MOVEMENT

May 8, 1933

I cannot regard this release with any degree of pleasure. As Sardar Vallabhbhai rightly remarked to me yesterday, how can I take advantage of this release in order to prosecute the civil disobedience campaign or to guide it? This release, therefore, puts upon me, as a seeker after Truth and a man of honour, a tremendous burden and strain. This fast has to continue. I had hoped, and I still hope, not to excite myself over anything and not to take part in discussions of any nature whatsoever. The whole purpose of the fast will be frustrated if I allowed my brain to be occupied by any extraneous matter, that is, any matter outside the Harijan work. At the same time, having been released, I should be bound to give a little of my energies to a study of the civil disobedience movement.

Of course, for the moment, I can only say that my views about civil disobedience have undergone no change whatsoever. I have nothing but praise for the bravery and self-sacrifice of the numerous civil resisters, but having said that, I cannot help saying that the secrecy that has attended the movement is fatal to its success. If, therefore, the movement must be continued, I would urge those who are guiding the movement in different parts of the country to discard all secrecy. I do not care if, thereby, it becomes difficult to secure a single civil resister.

There can be no doubt that fear has seized the common mass. The ordinances have cowed them down, and I am inclined to think that the secret methods are largely responsible for the demoralization. The movement of civil disobedience does not depend so much upon the quantity as on the quality of men and women taking part in it, and if I were leading the movement, I should sacrifice quantity and insist on quality. If this could be done, it would immediately raise the level of the movement. Mass instruction on any other terms is an impossibility.

I can say nothing as to the actual campaign. The reflections I have given, I had bottled up all these many months, and I can say that Sardar Vallabhbhai is one with me in what I have said. One word I would say. Whether I like it or not, during these three weeks, all civil resisters will be in a state of terrible suspense. It would be better if the President of the Congress, Bapuji Madhavrao Aney, were to officially declare suspension for one full month or even six weeks.

Now, I would make an appeal to the Government. If they want real peace in the land, and if they feel that there is no real peace, if they feel that Ordinance Rule is no rule, they should take advantage of this suspension, and unconditionally discharge all the civil resisters. If I survive the ordeal, it will give me time to survey the situation, and to tender advice both to the Congress leaders and if I may venture to do so, to the Government. I would like to take up the thread at the point where I was interrupted on my return from England.

If no understanding is arrived at between the Government and the Congress as a result of my effort, and civil disobedience is resumed, it will be open to the Government, if they so choose, to revive the Ordinance Rule.

If there is the will on the part of the Government, I have no doubt that a modus operandi can be found. Of this, so far as I am concerned, I am absolutely certain that civil disobedience cannot be withdrawn so long as so many civil resisters are imprisoned. No settlement can be arrived at so long as Sardar Vallabhbhai, Khan Saheb, Abdul Ghaffar Khan and Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru and others are buried alive. Indeed, to call off civil resistance is not within the power of any of the men who are out of prison. It is possible only for the Working Committee to do so. I refer to the Working Committee that was in existence at the time I was arrested.

I shall say no more on the civil disobedience movement. Perhaps, I have already said too much, but if I was to say anything, I could say so only whilst I have strength left in me. I would urge Pressmen not to worry me any more. I would urge also would-be visitors once more to restrain themselves. Let them regard me as being still in prison. I shall be unfit for holding political discussions or any other discussions.

I would like to be left in perfect peace, and I would like to tell the Government that I shall not abuse the release. If I come safely through the ordeal, and if I find the political atmosphere as murky as it is today, without taking a single step secretly or openly in furtherance of civil disobedience, I shall invite them to take me back to Yeravda to join the companions whom I almost seem to have deserted.

It was a great privilege for me to have been with Sardar Vallabhbhai. I was well aware of his matchless bravery and his burning love for the country, but I had never lived with him as I had the good fortune to do during the last sixteen months. The affection with which he covered me recalls to me that of my own dear mother. I neverknew him to possess motherly qualities. If the slightest thing happened to me, he would be out of his bed. He superintended every little detail in connection with my comforts. He and my other associates had conspired to let me do nothing, and I hope that the Government will believe me when I say that he always showed a remarkable comprehension of the difficulties of the Government, whenever we discussed any political problem. His solicitude for the farmers of Bardoli and Kaira I can never forget.¹

152. LETTER TO DUNCAN GREENLEES

May 9, 1933

I was sorry that I could not talk with you longer than I did.

This morning I read your report carefully. I do not mind it at all. I like the frankness about it. Some of your suggestions are also valuable, but can you grow in it? In spite of all the good that can be said about the Ashram it strikes me that if the evil described by you is as extensive as you suggest you can only freeze there. If Narandas is a mere business man or even predominantly so, he is like salt that has no savour. If he has not, the Ashram is undoubtedly dead. But my reading of him is wholly different from yours. He has the rare talent of combining business with spirituality. This, however, is one instance out of the many in which your reaction is so hostile that the sum total of the effect left on one’s mind is that it is an institution where one’s growth is stunted. But you know best your own feeling in spite of your report. If, therefore, you feel that you can remain in the Ashram and grow, by all means it is good. Discuss the whole of your report with Narandas and let him make what changes you can persuade him to make. My faith in him remains unabated. But if you remain there you must go through the discipline consistently with your health before you earn the right to demand a change. Today you can only recommend it as a result of first impression and your experience elsewhere. I wish I had time to correct many of your statements which are not true to fact, but that would be more strain on me. If you have

153. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

C/o Lady Vithaldas Thackersey, ‘Parnakuti’, Poona,
May 9, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I have been released a little unexpectedly, otherwise Mahadev would have written a letter and a long one. But now I myself must dictate one. I got your letter. Please go on writing to me daily. Anybody who has something special to write about may also write. I welcome the changes which you say have been introduced, but there is one danger. Read about it in my letter to the women. If all the people have accepted them willingly, there will be no difficulty at all and their health will soon improve. Everybody should eat as one takes medicine, and be fully satisfied with the type and the quantity of the food that he gets. Any item which one does not like should be declined. It is not likely that one will not like anything from among milk, wheat, fruit and uncooked vegetable. If that happens, the only remedy for such a person is a fast. I have not known any person who did not like fruits. Let everybody start drinking fresh, unboiled milk without any fear. The person who is in charge of cooking should take care that every item is well cooked. If anything is not cooked sufficiently well, it should be thrown away. You should make it a general rule to serve only the vegetables which grow in the Ashram itself. Totaramji¹ should know that he must supply tomatoes, salad, etc., all the year round. I will not mind if this means more expense just now. Similarly, fruit-trees also should be planted. While everybody should realize the necessity of learning self-control, care should also be taken to see that the fruit-trees are not raided.

I have sent you a wire regarding Parashuram. As he was very keen, I have permitted him to go there. If he does not abide by the conditions which you impose and gives you the least trouble, ask him immediately to leave. He need not come to me again. Give him the railway fare for Delhi or Kanpur or any other place where he may wish to go. Nobody should stay if he cannot feel happy in the Ashram. You should not have the responsibility at such a time of pleasing anybody so that he might stay. It is, of course, your duty to see that everybody receives love and courtesy. However, those who cannot be pleased should be permitted to leave. This rule applies to Dr. Sharma and Duncan also. I have not been satisfied with the former. He has not impressed me as being truthful or polite. I had written a note to him asking him to leave and go to Delhi. But he seems to have returned there. I have expressed my dissatisfaction in my note to him. Even if he remains there, he should not treat N., should not touch her or talk with her. If I get time, I will write to Sharma also and tell him this plainly. Read that letter\(^1\). I will mention it in my letter\(^2\) to N., too.

Duncan seems to be a really good man, but I have found that he is not very intelligent. I am afraid only of Sharma. I am returning today by registered post the report about cowprotection. Don’t let anybody give up milk or ghee. The truth is that those who can willingly accept the changes which I have suggested need not give up anything. It is not a great thing to give up this or that thing. What is necessary is to train one’s mind so that one learns to eat as one takes medicine, to eat only to keep the body alive. Moreover, when we give up every article of food which is unnecessary for health, there is no need to practise further self-denial. What I have been begging from the Ashram just now is a big thing. I want inner purity, control of the mind itself. Explain fully to everybody the sixth verse of Chapter III [of the \textit{Gita}].

Those who restrain the sense-organs but dwell in their minds on sense-pleasures are hypocrites. The seventh verse, on the other hand, says that those who keep their minds under control and let the limbs and organs of the body function without attachment, are hailed as karmayogis. These two verses explain the secret of how we should live. If, while fasting, I dwell in my mind on the pleasures of the palate and keep thinking when the 21 days will be over, my fast will be only the outward show of an ignorant man. It would not benefit the world and earn for me a sinful existence in my next life. What is true, in the wider context, about my fast, is also true, in a limited context, about the rules of self-control being introduced and followed in the Ashram. Anybody who stops eating rice and dal but dwells on their pleasure in his thoughts does not practise self-control by refraining from eating them. Such exclusion may be beneficial physically, that is, from the point of view of health. But the various forms of self-denial which are being practised in the Ashram just now are intended as a preparation for undertaking indefinite fasts. Those who cannot join in that need not take their meals in the common kitchen. If anybody who does not eat in the common kitchen but observes as much self-control as he can in his own home in the matter of food, I will regard him as bringing honour to the Ashram. For, his conduct will be truthful and not unnatural. There will be humble confession of his weakness in it. It should be remembered that the self-control which I have advised does not apply to anybody who is ill.

\(^1\) \textit{Vide} the following two items.
\(^2\) \textit{Ibid}

Explain this repeatedly to the women on my behalf. No woman should undertake anything beyond her strength. The women, and others too, should understand that what we are doing at present is to try to prepare the ground for a chain of indefinite fasts. If anybody practises self-control for my sake for a short time and gives it up afterwards when somebody else in the Ashram may be fasting, how bad would that seem! I am far away, but fasts following mine will be going on in the Ashram. Everybody, therefore, should practise only such self-control as he can keep up. Nobody should go further than that at all. I don’t expect more from anybody. Let us not attempt too much and fail. It would be better to rise step by step. I don’t insist any more now that the old families ought to take their meals in the common kitchen. My fast ought not to result in any kind of coercion on anybody. On my behalf, you should see that it does not. Tell Ramdas that gradually he will understand the complete propriety of this fast. Even if the fast is like a pistol, it is worth firing. I believe that dharma cannot be saved in any other way.

154. LETTER TO N.

May 9, 1933

MY DEAR N.,

I can’t put you out of my mind. I do not want to repeat what I have said in my previous letters.

Dr. Sharma is there. I have asked Narandas not to ask him to treat you at all. If it does become necessary to procure medical advice a doctor will be called in, but you will tell if his presence and sight excite the emotion you describe. If they do I will have to see what can be done. But I am writing to him about this emotion so that he can be on his guard. I hope you do not mind this. I am interpreting you literally. You have not a single thought in your mind which you want to keep not only from me but from the whole world including about whom you may harbour a thought. However distasteful it may be, I know that that is the only way for a truthful person.

Your letter written in ink has arrived. You should treat poor mother at least as well as strangers. But, of course, children sometimes write to their parents with their fingers, using their blood as ink.

God be with you.

Love to you and kisses to S.

can be, if at all possible, protected against herself. In her letter received day before yesterday she told me that when she met you, you excited in her the animal passion. This need not mean any condemnation of you at all. How can a man help himself if a woman on seeing him have her lustfulness excited? It is given only to the rarest human beings to possess such innate purity that they would never be the occasion for exciting the lust of even the most depraved women. I write this, therefore, not to blame you but to warn you against having anything whatsoever to do with N.

I hope you will take my letter that Devdas had posted to you in the right light. Your letter which you left to be given to me confirms the opinion I formed of you after our meeting 1. Let me add that somehow or other you created a bad impression on everybody you met here. But all that may be utterly unjust to you, so long as Narandas truthfully guides you and you him and the Ashram in general. If, on the other hand, he does not like you or you do not like him or the Ashram in general, you should shun it, even though you are treating some patients there. If you have developed a dislike for the Ashram, the whole purpose of your being there is frustrated. It would be too selfish for me to have you there for the sake of a few patients.

I therefore ask your permission to apply Government for two months leave that I may come to you. Very anxious. Wire reply. Mira sends love. She is finding peace courage in prayer.”

2 In the source, the sheet containing the draft of Gandhiji’s telegram bears also the following remark in Gujarati: “Do not now stoop to cracking coal with the mouth which you have always used for chewing pan. Have trust in God. Overcome your delusion that we are the body. Repeat Ramanama. Bapu.”

3 In Bapu’s Letters to Mira, Mirabehn explains that this was “written by Bapu himself on the letters reporting the progress of his fast”. This was added to a letter of even date from Mathuradas Trikumji from “‘Parnakuti’, Poona”, which read: “Bapuji enters today the third day of his fast. on the first day after his release towards night, he dictated his statement on the situation which meant a considerable expenditure of energy but it was inevitable. Yesterday he worked less and today I hope he will exert still less. The relieving feature is that he himself has made up his mind to conserve energy as much as possible. He sleeps well and remains in bed. Devdas, Brijkishan and myself and other friends do our best to lighten his ordeal as much as is possible for us. I am fully confident that he will successfully go through the ordeal.”

I see that there is more effort in dictating than in writing. As days proceed I may not be able to write or dictate. Then you will know that my thoughts are speaking to you.

But you must write a detailed letter daily giving your bodily and mental condition, your food and S.’s food.

I hope you have understood the moral necessity of avoiding abortion.

Have sun-bath daily on the terrace of your sleeping quarters. And there you can take sewing work for the Ashram. Also do takli spinning.

I wish you will forget Pythagoras, Bacchus and Mahabharata. Why should you brood over the past when you have to re-enact the Mahabharata at the Ashram? Do please fill your mind with the task before you i.e., to become an ideal member of the Ashram, no matter what the others are.

162. TO THE READER

All should know that, even though I am supposed to be a free man, the Harijan will continue to be edited just as if I was in prison. It will still be solely devoted to the Harijan cause and will scrupulously exclude all politics. It is a matter of regret to me that for three weeks I shall not be able to write anything for the Harijan. But, if God spares me, I hope to write for the Harijan with better qualifications. I hope, further, that in the mean while the Harijan cause will make rapid progress, that reformers and sanatanists will combine, wherever possible, to serve Harijans, that reformers will work the rest of the programme without wounding the susceptibilities of the sanatanists and that the Harijans themselves will, by vigorously prosecuting internal reforms to which I have drawn attention so often in these columns, make it easier for sanatanists and reformers to recognize that Harijans are truly ‘Harijans’ and that they are capable of responding to love precisely in the same manner and to the same degree as others.

165. NOTES

Untouchability is against reason. It is opposed to truth, non-violence and dharma and hence is adharma. The underlying assumption is that we are high while others are low. The Brahmin who does not have the attribute of the Shudra—that is, service, is no Brahmin. A true Brahmin is one who possesses the attributes of a Kshatriya, a Vaishya and a Shudra, and has in addition learning. Shudras are not of course wholly devoid of learning, but service is their chief characteristic. In varnashramadharma there is to place for

1 Under the date-line “Poona, May 11, 1933”, The Bombay Chronicle, 12-5-1933, had reported: “‘I would love to tie with my head on the lap of Doctor Ansari’, said Gandhi, who, though in weak condition, felt extremely happy when he was told by Mrs. Sarojini Naidu of Dr. Ansari’s willingness to come over to Poona and asked whether Dr. Ansari should be sent for. When he was informed of the above, Dr. Ansari replied from Delhi on phone: ‘I will never allow Bapu to die on my lap. I will never allow him to die at all. I will be with Bapu as soon as possible.’”

3 These were published under the title “Swarna-Sutra”, that is, golden sayings.
the distinctions of high and low. In the Vaishnava cult even Bhangis and Chandalas have attained moksha. How can a religion that sees the whole universe as a manifestation of Vishnu treat the Harijans as apart from Vishnu?

* * *

If anyone says that his belief in untouchability is prompted by love I just cannot agree with him. I can see nothing of love in this attitude. If we have love for the untouchables we will not make them eat our left-overs. If we have love for them we will worship them as we worship our mother and father. If we have love for them we will dig for them better wells, build for them schools and admit them into our temples. These are the signs of love. Love is made of innumerable suns. When one small sun cannot remain hidden, how can love? Does a mother ever have to go about saying that she loves her child? A child who cannot yet speak looks into the eyes of his mother. When their eyes meet we can tell from their looks that they are in communion with something divine.

3 Mirabehn explains: “In the letter reporting the progress of the fast which accompanied this, the following is written by Mathuradas: ‘The lines at the back Bapu penned at about 2 p.m. on Friday. He wrote them without using specs, and hence that incomplete sentence.’ ”
167. NOT BY BIRTH BUT BY MERIT

The reader may not know that among the many devotees of the Harijan cause are two lepers. One is a Kshatriya who has caught the infection through service among the poor with whom some years ago he cast in his lot, taking with him almost all his wealth. His leprosy has not deterred him from the self-chosen service. Another is a Brahmin pundit well versed in Sanskrit. He often sends me selections from the Shastras in support of the reformer’s position on untouchability. Below is the translation of his latest collection:

1. “one who has purified himself by pure deeds and who has restrained his senses deserves to be treated as a Brahmin even though he may be a Shudra”, said God Brahma himself.

2. Even though a Shudra, one who is noble of nature and deed should be regarded as the best among the twice-born.

3. Neither birth nor lineage, neither culture nor knowledge of the Vedas, can render one a twice-born. Good conduct is the only deciding cause.

4. It is good conduct alone which makes one a Brahmin. A person of good conduct, even though a Shudra, acquires Brahminhood.

5. He who lives for the performance of dharma (duty), whose dharma is consecrated to God and whose day and night are devoted to good deeds—he is declared by Gods to be a Brahmin.

6. He who is content with whatever food and clothes and bed are offered to him is declared by Gods to be a Brahmin.

—Mahabharata: “Shanti-Parva”

Commenting on this, the compiler truly exclaims: “Surely the Harijans of India today fulfil this test.”

7. For a Brahmin truth is Brahman; austerity is Brahman; control of the senses is Brahman; compassion for the whole creation is Brahman. . . .

—Parashara Smriti

8. A Brahmin is one possessed of self-restraint, austerity, self-control, charity, truth, purity, compassion, knowledge of the Vedas, learning, wisdom, faith. . . .

—Vasishtha
9. Only those Brahmins are capable of saving (mankind) who are completely self-controlled, whose ears are full of the music of Vedic chants, who have conquered their senses, who have abjured injury to all sentient beings and who shrink from possession.

---

1. This was added to a letter of even date from Mathuradas Trikumji to Mirabehn, which read: “Bapuji gets your letter regularly. He completes today six days of his fast during which time his condition on the whole has been satisfactory. Yesterday was held a consultation of doctors who have issued their bulletin which must have appeared in today’s Press. They are not pessimistic. A very useful suggestion came from Dr. Deshmukh; he recommended the Vichy water in lieu of ordinary water. Bapuji after ascertaining facts about it readily agreed to take it and it has wonderfully suited him. It is expected to keep acidity under check. From yesterday the full text of the _Gita_ is being recited to him. In the evening he has music. He remains cheerful.”

2. Kasturba Gandhi was released from Sabarmati Jail on May 13, 1933.

3. The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had reported that three Harijan sevaks of his village had invited Harijans to dinner on the Ramanavami Day and served them drinking water in their own _lotas_. As a result of this the orthodox sections of the village had ostracized them and the barber and the washerman had refused to serve them. He had sought Gandhiji’s advice about taking the matter to the court.
lotas in the market we do not stop to ask as to who might have used them. What peculiar quality does a lota come to possess as soon as it falls into our hands so that it becomes useless to us if a Harijan happens to use it? The villagers in question have given their answer. They have declared it a sin to lend the lotas to Harijans for drinking water and they are meting out rough treatment to the three young Harijan sevaks for having committed this sin. What should they do? What the villagers have condemned as a sin I consider a meritorious deed. They must therefore suffer in patience even if corporal punishment were to be meted out to them, to say nothing of denying them the services of the washerman and the barber. They may wash their own clothes and cut their own hair. If they cannot do the latter they may let their hair grow. But they must never give up.

One must not however under any condition be angry with the villagers. What after all can they do? They have been taught adharma in the name of dharma. They are, if anything, to be pitied. That the removal of untouchability is a religious act has been realized by no more than three young men there. The rest of the villagers continue to languish in the well of ignorance. Under the circumstances, it becomes the duty of the three young men by their firmness, purity, tapasya, sacrifice, patience and generosity to change the hearts of these villagers lost in darkness and at the same time to teach the Harijans the habits of cleanliness. They can under no circumstance take the matter to a court of law.

174. TALK WITH DEVDAS GANDHI

POONA,
May 27, 1933

If God desires to take me away on the twenty-first day of the fast, even after keeping me alive for all these twenty days, this will be my last sacrifice. But if God gives me a further lease of life and desires me to work more, a new epoch will begin in my life.

My future plan lies in God’s hands. I have driven away all thoughts from my mind except of Ramanama. What God wills will be just and reasonable. When Mr. Devdas thanked God for His mercy in sparing his father, the Mahatma remarked:

1 Gandhiji had added this to the letter dated May 21, 1933, from Mathuradas Trikumji to Mirabehn which read: “. . . It is not yet 7 a.m. Bapu is fast asleep in the porch facing the Yeravda Central Prison. And I am writing these lines from a corner from where I constantly have a look at him. He lies in his cot like a sweet child; beaming with brightness. None who looks merely at his face can believe that he has not touched food all these 13 days. All is going on smoothly. He is now taking Sinhagad water—a place famous in the history of Maharashtra. He himself stayed for a few days in that fortress in 1920. He likes it very much and the historic associations of the place have drawn him towards it and its water. Dr. Dinshaw Mehta who nurses him has a branch of his clinic there and it is he who is responsible for securing water from there. He with his fiancée is rendering splendid service to Bapu. Bapu enjoys peace of mind and is attaining more and more the spirit of detachment. Mahadevbhai has gone yesterday to the Ashram. Bapu has added himself these lines without specs and hence duplication of letters. The letter was about to be posted when he asked for it. N.B. I am writing you daily without fail, and Mahadev wrote to you yesterday. Your last letter is dated May 19, 1933.”
Yes, that is so. It is due to God’s mercy that I am living, but I don’t think that God’s mission is so circumscribed as to only save me. Even His taking me away must be regarded as an act of mercy.

176. MESSAGE BEFORE BREAKING 21-DAY FAST ²

May 29, 1933

Within a minute or two I am going to break the fast. In His name and with faith in Him was it taken, in His name it terminates. My faith is not less today, but more.

You will not expect me to make a speech on this occasion. It is an occasion for taking the name and singing the glory of God. But I may not forget the doctors and other friends who have poured their affection on me during these days of privilege and grace. I cannot help referring to their service because it is part of God’s mercy. I have nothing but thanks to give them. God alone can give them a fitting reward.

I am glad that Harijans are here with us today. I do not know exactly what work God expects from me now. But whatever it may be, I know that He will give me the strength for it.

178. LETTER TO D. B. KALELKKAR

[Before June 1933]³

CHI. KAKA,

I got your two letters at the same time. You have gained good weight. Milk is bound to increase it. The idea of making you fast for some days in between is good. There is a difference between the method described in the book which you have given me and the treatment that is being given to you there. This indicates that Dinshawji⁴ has taken some suggestion from other books or introduced changes on his own. For you, however, he is the final authority.

I am aware that massage of the back is highly recommended. I shall see what can be done.

Can Bal⁵ and others stay with you all the time? I got Bal’s letter. I will write to him later. If I get time, I may write even today.

I don’t feel happy that those who come to see me stay at Trivedi’s. In doing so, they do not consider his circumstances. Such persons must stop staying with Trivedi, nor should they visit you. And, besides, see how much they spend in coming. Last week there was a whole army of visitors. I think that was absolutely unnecessary. . . .⁶ Don’t think of coming down at present at all. It is desirable that you should derive the utmost benefit from the treatment there. It will be wise to do so. We shall certainly meet when you come down, that is, in

PARNAKUTI, POONA 6,

June 3, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

Mahadev must give you all the news and I shall just add a line or two at the end.

I ought to have written to you, but could not for heavy pressure of other work. Bapu is steadily progressing and gradually adding to his nourishment. He took milk for the first time yesterday, having taken 14 oz. during the day. In all he takes about six feeds during the day composed of fruit juices and honey and now milk. Yesterday over and above the milk, he took eight spoons of honey, four oranges, one grape fruit and a pound of mango juice. This is quite good and if he continues to add to this nourishment the doctors expect that he will regain his normal weight and strength in about two weeks’ time. But their instructions are very strict and Bapu has promised to observe them. This means that until the fourteenth of this month he should not do any writing, should not be worried about problems, should take part in no discussion, etc. Bapu’s weight taken on the morning of the 1st was 84 lb.

The future is in the lap of gods. He was just asking me this morning about the date of your release. I confessed I did not know it, but that I was told at the Ashram that you had still two and a half months to do. Please let me know if I am correct, and now do let Bapu have one of your usual full, long, detailed letters so that he may know everything about you. He was practically under a vow of silence but if his thoughts were with any of us, they were most with you.

Rajaji¹ left last evening and expects to be back by the 11th or 12th. Jinnalalji was here, but saw Bapu only for a second and refused to engage him in a conversation until he was quite well. No one from the Ashram came excepting little Babla¹ who wanted to have the most out of me, lest I should go back to my haunts very soon!

Mathuradas has occupied my gadi during these days and is likely to continue for some time. Devdas has been ill due to strain of work and exhaustion but is now convalescing. Among the ‘nurses’, good Brijkrishna² is still there, also Bal, and Harihar Sharma³ who will now be going. Ramdas might take his place. He is here. Ba is quite happy and giving all her time to Bapu nursing him and massaging him and preparing his feeds with all her devoted and loving care. I have left space enough for Bapu to write a line.

CHI. MIRA,

You must try to wean yourself from this longing for physical meeting. I hope the fever is off.

CHI. MIRA,

This recurrence of fever disturbs me. You ought to learn real self-control. It does not come by reading. 186. LETTER TO DUNCAN GREENLEES

June 6, 1933

MY DEAR DUNCAN,

It was only yesterday that I was able to see your letters to Mahadev. Of course, when your time comes, you will certainly take part in the sacrificial and purificatory fast. Whether it should be 21 days or less or even more, need not be determined now. You seem to have fixed up your mind on 21 days. But you should dismiss that from your mind. I would urge you also not to be in a hurry. The first thing that is needful in your case is to see whether, as a whole, the Ashram has a message for you and in considering this, you will please not separate the Ashram from its ideal. It is the easiest possible thing in the world to set forth on a piece of paper the highest ideal. But if there is no living representative of that ideal it is worthless. Therefore,

1 In the source, this was followed by Mahadev Desai’s note, which read: “Bapu is getting on very well indeed. The weight accurate to an ounce taken today was 88 lb. 26 tolas. That is very good. He looks very bright and quite ready to take up ‘problems’ and thrash them out. But the doctors will not allow him to do anything of the kind and have ordered him to take complete rest until the 14th. He can just sit up and stand up for a second on the weighing machine (of course, if supported). Otherwise everything is all right. He is worried that you have brought on the fever by constantly thinking of and worrying about him and sleeplessness and irregularity. Do get well soon for Bapu’s sake.”
I have always insisted that those who know me and my interpretation of life should do so through the Ashram, and if the latter makes no appeal to the examiner he should unhesitatingly reject me. I do not know whether I have made myself clear to you. So far as I am concerned, I want you to the extent of your ability to share the life I am living and the sacrifice I am endeavouring to perform.

Yours sincerely,

188. LETTER TO N.

June 6, 1933

MY DEAR N.,

I was able only yesterday to read your letters which were with Mahadev. Surely there must be some misunderstanding about white flour. There is no white flour used in the Ashram. All the flour that is used in the Ashram is specially ground and it is always wholemeal. Sometimes it is sifted after it is ground and sometimes it is not. You should, therefore, enquire and then let me know. What I told you about food applies merely not to you, but certainly to all. That all may not follow that dietary, is a different question. But in the common kitchen in the Ashram, generally that method is followed with more or less the same exactness. It is not possible to do away with rice and dal altogether. But every encouragement has been given to those who avoid rice and pulses. I do hope you are finding more and more peace at the Ashram and that both you and S. are keeping well.

190. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

June 6, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I see that not only will it be some time before I am able to move about, but also before I can work with my hands. I heard from Mahadev yesterday the report of developments there. I have also read the letters which he gave to me. There seems to have been some misunderstanding. What I meant was that the ultimate stage, whether in the quest of truth or in the path of ahimsa, must be a fast by every seeker, and that the changes about food, etc., which were introduced in the Ashram in connection with my fast should be understood as a preparation for this. It is necessary to understand this. Those who do not see the truth of this need not adopt those changes. I did not intend that everybody should join in the chain of fasts or leave the Ashram. I welcome your intention to come here as soon as I pick up a little strength. You can come on any day during the next week. I will not talk much, but I shall be strong enough to explain my ideas and answer your doubts. Nobody need feel troubled. My dharma is limited to explaining truth as I understand it. All of you may accept what you can from my suggestions. I don’t wish to create a new world. You may ask me any questions you like from there. When you decide to come, you may also bring with you any others whom you wish to.

194. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

PARNAKUTI, POONA 6,
June 7, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

I must not write. The last letter that I wrote to you caused much strain upon the hand. I am, therefore, dictating this letter, in reply to yours of the 5th instant.

You say that the brief sentence2 I wrote at the end of the letter written by Mahadev, gave you pangs. It is wonderful how we create misery for ourselves where there is not even the slightest cause. My sentence had reference to your fever, which you yourself had said was due to over-anxiety on your part. You had explicitly mentioned that you were ill able to bear the separation. It was in answer to this that I wrote that sentence. It had reference only to enforced separation.
There was no thought whatsoever that you should live out of sight even when it was possible for you to be with me, that is, if we were both not imprisoned. Of course, in that case, you would be most naturally with me, But to be out of prison is not my natural life. My natural life is that of a prisoner and therefore I suggest that you should learn to do without my physical presence. Is not this as clear as daylight?

I do not like this loss of weight by you. There is something radically wrong in your carrying this load of anxiety on your

1 Addressee's daughter
2 Vide “Letter to Mirabehn”, 3-6-1933.
shoulders. It is incompatible with a living faith in a living God. As days pass I feel this living presence in every fibre of my vein. Without that feeling I should be demented. There are so many things that are calculated to disturb my peace of mind. So many events happened that would, without the realization of that presence, shake me to the very foundation. But they pass me by leaving me practically untouched. I want you to share that reality with me. Then you would not be disturbed because you cannot be physically near me. Remember that no heroic effort is necessary in order to be able to bear such enforced separation, as you and I have to put up with. Millions of human beings do so without any effort. Do not make the mistake of thinking that they bear such separation because their nature is not sensitive to such things. If we would examine them we would find that they are just as sensitive as you and I are likely to be. Only they have a natural faith in God of which they have not even the knowledge. Ours is, beside theirs, a laboured faith. Hence we have to put forth a Herculean effort to bear separation. Anyway that is my analysis of your mentality. If it is not true you will make your own analysis and somehow or other cure yourself of the terrible anxiety. Carefully ponder over Krishna’s discourses in the second chapter of the Gita. Then go to the twelfth chapter, and see whether you cannot find real peace and calmness of mind. Do not try to give me a detailed reply to this argument of mine. I do not want you to go through that strain. I have advanced the argument simply to soothe you, if at all I can. I know that argument is vain when one’s whole being is in rebellion against itself. Perhaps the painful process through which you are passing is preliminary to the coming realization of the living presence of God. May it be so. Anyway do not again allow the thought to cross your mind that there is any question whatsoever of your having to live in separation from me when we both find ourselves out of prison.

Now about myself. I am flourishing. Rebuilding the body at the age of 64 must be a slow process, and I see that it will be slower than I had expected. Yet recovery is steady. I am taking easily 24 oz. of milk. I am trying to go to 2 lb. and may, under Dr. Dinshaw Mehta’s care, do even better. I am entirely satisfied with the way I am progressing. Besides milk I take oranges and juice of three to four pomegranate[s]. I am taking also a fair quantity of honey, perhaps 4 oz. Up to yesterday, I was taking vegetable soup. Dr. Mehta has stopped it from today in order to increase the quantity of milk. So you see that there is nothing to grumble about my food, and the way I am progressing.

You complain of sultry weather there. Here we have delicious cool weather. Of course, Poona is ideal in the rainy season.

Devdas will be married to Lakshmi on the 16th; that is the date when the religious ceremony will be gone through. But as this will be a marriage in breach of the present Hindu usage, there will be also a civil registration on the 21st. Jamnalalji is trying to fix up a match for Prabhudas also. If it comes off, he too would be married about the same date. Ramdas is here; not at all keeping well. His body largely depends upon his mental state and he has not yet found his peace of mind. Jamnalalji is going to mother him. Probably that will pull him through. He will be living in Wardha with his wife.

N. seems to be shaping well. Margarete Spiegel, who is named Amala, is as mad as a mad-hatter. But what was one to do? She simply came and one had to take her. She is a good woman. But it remains to be seen how she shapes. Both N. and Amala are to do Harijan work.

I think I have now given you enough for the week.

Love.

But I must not dictate a long letter, after having dictated one long letter to Mira who stood in need of one. I do not want you to come here merely for the purpose of meeting me. The temptation to say ‘come’ is there but I know that I must resist it. You have your work cut out for you and you must not be disturbed.

200. LETTER TO N.

June 9, 1933

MY DEAR N.,

You must not expect from me just now any reply to your letters. Strength is not coming to me as rapidly as I had expected. But my expectation had no justification. The regaining of strength is really as rapid as is possible for an old man of 64. When I built my castle of expectation I had forgotten that I was 64 and not 46.

What you say about the monthly business is quite true. But it is not likely to be true of you. To reach the state you have described, you need to attain perfect purity not merely in act but in thought also. Then undoubtedly the sex symptom goes, mere form remains. I do fervently hope that you will soon reach that state, but you have not yet done so. That you can do so, I have not a shadow of doubt. You have in you the making of such a woman. I know your aspirations and I know that you want to be true through and through. You are, so far as I can read your letters, making a Herculean effort. May you succeed soon. Meanwhile, I am not just now building any high hope upon the scarcity of the monthly symptom. I have not, therefore, lost all fear of conception. [If] it is there, I want you not to mind it but to regard it as a blessing of God. Whereas if there is no conception we would regard that too as equally a blessing and a narrow escape. Either way let it serve as a warning, final and unforgettable.
I am glad you like Abbas and Govindji as tutors. I know that they are all very fine workers. They have their hearts in their work. Of course, Lakshmidas you will look up to both as your first teacher and in the place of a parent. He is one of the staunchest of men in the Ashram. I want you to pick out all that you may find to be good in the Ashram and cling to it.

As to the name, you will see that I have adopted your suggestion. You may ask everybody in the Ashram to cut out Devi in any case. And let them address you as N. or N. behn just as they wish. But having done this forget all about the name, and its meaning and significance. After all nothing hangs by it. Everything is based upon what we think and what we do.

201. LETTER TO RAMABEHN JOSHI
June 9, 1933

CHI. RAMA,

I took no time in coming to a decision after hearing Mahadev’s report of his conversation with Dr. Patel\(^1\). You should now get yourself operated upon as quickly as possible. From what has been told me, I clearly understand that the operation is neither very painful nor risky in any way. It would be wise, therefore, to get the operation performed without delay. You need not have any fear. I have expressed this view after the most careful thought. Write to me.

202. LETTER TO JAMNABEHN GANDHI
June 9, 1933

CHI. JAMNA,

I got your letter. I did not read your previous letters. It is only since a few days that I have been having letters fully read out to me. One day I actually read them myself, but the doctors advised me against doing so and, therefore, they are now read out to me by somebody else.

If you send me the substance of your previous letters, I will dictate a reply.

Have faith that your health will definitely improve if you patiently cling to nature-cure treatment. I was over-hopeful when I wrote in my previous letter that I would soon be able to write letters without any difficulty, but I find that, leave alone writing, I am not even able to dictate as much as I should like to do. It will take some time before I can dictate or write without difficulty.

I am following the same regimen as Purushottam did, that is, complete rest and nothing but milk in food. If this agrees with me, I shall soon get stronger.

You need feel no hesitation at all in writing to me.

204. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

POONA,

June 9, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

In his letter of yesterday, Mahadev did suggest an operation for Ramabehn. I learnt about the discussion with Dr. Patel only yesterday. Now get the operation done as soon as possible. I have already written to you about the question of your coming here.

¹ Vide “Letter to Manu Gandhi”, 7-6-1933
Devdas’s marriage\(^1\) is fixed for the 16th. It would perhaps be better if you come on a date later than that. The general rule that nobody need come from there to attend a wedding may as well be observed on this occasion. And so we may deliberately not let the saying ‘accomplish two objects in one journey’ apply in this case. This does seem a little unnatural, but perhaps it is more desirable.

For myself, I have been dissuading everyone from coming. Supposing Prabhudas’s marriage takes place about the same time and in my presence, I would, if I could, stop even Chhaganlal and Kashi from coming to attend it. If we really believe that the marriage ceremony is a religious rite we cannot avoid having performed, there should be no need for anyone to come here. On such occasions, we should be quite content with the company of those in whose midst we happen to be at the time, and the presence of some others who can attend. It is from this point of view that it has been considered desirable to be content with \([the services of]\) Lakshman Shastri \([as priest]\) who is quite near Poona and without those of Panditji. Combined with all these considerations, there is of course the desire to save expense. Though enjoying royal facilities myself,\(^2\) I just cannot forget our poverty. Maybe these royal facilities are not unpleasing to me, but they are certainly not pleasing either. My conscience bears witness to the fact that seen from the point of view of truth, they are more unpleasing than pleasing.

Before fixing the date of your coming here, I have indulged in all this philosophizing. About my health and my experiment regarding milk, either Mathuradas or Mahadev must have written to you.

‘PARNAKUTI’, POONA 6,
June 14, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

Your letter has just arrived. I shall have to be very brief this week, because from 8 o’clock what is called the milk diet commences and lasts till half past three or four. During this period perfect bodily and mental rest is required. Yet if I must write this letter in time I must do so during this milk feed. What this feed is will be described later on

1 The telegram was in reply to the addressee’s dated June 13, 1933, which read:
“Thanks attack short lived. Am quite well. Only weak. Hope to meet you twenty-second. Praying you may soon regain full strength.”
2 Malaviya had sent a telegraphic reply which read: “Though I do not approve by Mahadev. Under it, though I cannot be said to be yet putting on weight, my energy is distinctly on the increase. There is therefore no cause whatsoever for worrying on my account. As far as I can see I may be said to be making steady progress.

I understand what you say about your own health, and about the mistake you made in reading my letter. I do hope that your weakness has left you and that there is no fever now left. I am assuming that you will not stint yourself for fruit. Whatever the body needs you should procure and get well and strong.

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

As soon as I was able I wanted to deal with two of your important letters. Your telegram and your letters have helped me greatly, but I must not deal with the past for I have still to be miserly in the expenditure of my energy. I am glad you are there able to look after your brother to a certain extent.

You were quite right in thinking that, if I thought that your presence was necessary here, I would at once write or cable as the occasion required. But I am more than convinced that your place is essentially there. I am not so sanguine as you are, as to your influence. The meaning I put upon the India Office listening to you is that they are much more courteous than they used to be. I want you

1 Mahadev Desai’s postscript to this letter read “There is just a minute to add a postscript. The milk treatment consists of feeds of 6 to 8 ounces every three quarters of an hour. The milk is unboiled. Goats are milked early morning after the udders are properly washed with permanganate of potash and the milkman’s hands washed with hot water. The milk is then kept in a nice refrigerator and keeps wonderfully cool and tastes very nice. From today Bapu has been allowed to add two dates to each feet. 6 lb. each day.”

there for a higher purpose and a higher influence. You being there are able to hold together all those who are friendly to the cause and what is more you must be silently and imperceptibly permeating the best English mind with the truth that is in you. All this will tell in the end.

Whilst God is great and omnipotent and works in mysterious ways and therefore all things are possible for Him, humanly speaking I see not the slightest immediate cause for hope of improvement in the present position which so far as I can see is as bad as it can possibly be. This Ordinance rule has struck the people dumb. The ignorant mass have become terror-struck. They do not know what is in store for them on the morrow. The well-to-do are trembling in their shoes simply through a vague fear of their being overtaken by some Governmental Act. They feel that their only safety lies in an abject surrender to the will of what to them is a power which seems even to override Providence itself—a power that will compel subjection to its will at any cost. And so there is a kind of dead calm which even in my bed, isolated though I am from contact with people through the orders of doctors, I can’t help sensing. It is the peace of the cemetery as Lord Irwin once or twice said in 1930 when he refused to make further use of the terrible powers which it was possible for the Government of India to use whenever they liked. Though therefore I see no hope in the near future, whilst you and I do not ignore it, we have in view the distances in working for and at truth. Time does not count, or if it does, it counts in our favour. For here there is all hope, no cause for despair, for there is a certainty of the final triumph of truth, so long as there is some living representative of it. Thanks be to God, so far as I can see there are certainly several, if not many, representatives of truth today in India who will count no cost too great for the vindication of truth.

Having got this immovable faith in me in the rightness of the cause, there is no danger on this side of any precipitate action. Every step that is necessary will be taken with the greatest deliberation. I shall personally leave no stone unturned to secure an honourable peace. So far as I can judge I shall fail, but that does not worry me. The harder General Smuts became the harder and the oftener I knocked at his door till it was banged in my face, but patience was rewarded and so it will be in this case. Abdul Ghaffar Khan cannot be sacrificed. Khorsed Naoroji over 30 years in age, a woman free of hysterics, full of faith and spirituality, went to the Frontier, lived with Abdul Ghaffar Khan, came in intimate touch with people. Devdas next went and both these told me that they were convinced that there was no guile about Abdul Ghaffar Khan, that he always said what he meant and meant what he said. They admit that he is hot-tempered, hasty in action, but has no belief in violence, is in secret league with neither Amanullah nor anybody else. His sole ambition is to see his people happy and free from terrorism. My own personal experience is that he is amenable to control and discipline. I do not remember his having ever refused to carry out his promises. He has come to me whenever I have wanted him. My own firm opinion is that he is much misrepresented in the official circles and that what they do not want is his influence among his people. This he undoubtedly has, because he is self-sacrificing, simple and brave. It is once more a repetition of the old policy of cutting off tall poppies. If what is insinuated about Abdul Ghaffar Khan is true, that must be proved by an impartial tribunal and neither the Congress nor I personally would have anything to say if the charges against him are true. But the tribunal must be an acceptable tribunal. I do not want a second edition of the Meerut Case. As you know full well I have no sympathy with Communism, most of the Meerut prisoners were daggers at me. They missed no occasion to vilify or insult me. But that is of no consequence. They have been punished for holding particular opinions, not for any act that they have done! And what a punishment! But that is merely symptomatic of the deep-seated disease. There is no intention whatsoever on the part of the Indian Civil Service to give up power and all it means, nor for that matter is there any intention on the part of Mr. Baldwin or Sir Samuel Hoare to do otherwise.

Now for your important argument about untouchability. But there is this initial flaw about it. My life is one indivisible whole. It is not built after the compartmental system—satyagraha, civil resistance, untouchability, Hindu-Muslim unity and several other things I could name are not different things to be taken and handled. They are indivisible parts of a whole which is truth. I can’t devote myself entirely to untouchability and say: ‘Neglect Hindu-Muslim unity or swaraj.’ All these things run into one another and are inter-dependent. You will find at one time in my life an emphasis on one thing, at another time on other. But that is just like a pianist, now emphasizing one note and now other. But they are all related to one another. Therefore you see how it is utterly impossible for me to say: ‘I have now nothing to do with civil disobedience or swaraj!’ Not only so, if I attempted any such thing, I could not do it. Full and final removal of untouchability I can show you to your satisfaction, is utterly impossible without swaraj. This letter will be too long and unnecessarily so, if I gave you chapter and verse to prove my statement.

214. SPEECH AT DEVDAS-LAKSHMI WEDDING

POONA,

June 16, 1933

You have just heard our familiar hymn of “The True Vaishnava”. I hope you both will ponder over it, and try to live as the true Vaishnava described by the poet-saint Narasinh Mehta.

Devdas, you know my expectations about you. May you fulfil them, and I assure you that if you do so all the objections raised against the match will melt away. Since I reached the age of discretion, I have tried to understand the meaning of dharma and live up to it as best as I could. I do not think that in celebrating this marriage anything has been done against the dictates of dharma. Had it been so, you should not have had my blessings and presence at the ceremony.

You are taking upon yourself a grave responsibility, which is proportionate to the great good fortune that has fallen to your lot. Who knew that your wedding would take place under the roof of the pure-souled Lady Thackersey? Who knew that a man of great learning and spotless character like Lakshman Shastri would be found to act as priest? Perhaps, at some future and convenient date, the ceremony would have taken place at the Ashram. But the fast has brought this about. Let the fruit of what was an essentially religious act be also religious. Let the memory of it inspire you to take every step with a full sense of dharma. You know dharma is Truth, and if you keep it as your pole star, it is sure to protect you. What a piece of good fortune for you that you should have so many friends and elders to bless you on the occasion! May you prove worthy of all these blessings! You have today robbed Rajagopalachari of a cherished gem. May you be worthy of it! May you treasure it! She is real Lakshmi. Guard her, protect her as you would Lakshmi, the goddess of the good and beautiful. May you both live long and tread the path of dharma! May you live for dharma and have the courage to lay down your lives, when the occasion comes, for dharma! Let your life from today be a further dedication to service of the country, and may you never give yourselves to idle pleasure. This is my blessing and my cherished hope and desire.

1 This appeared as reported by Mahadev Desai, who had stated: “Gandhiji addressed a few words to the bride and bridegroom. He took over five minutes to gather sufficient strength to speak. The part addressed to Mr. Devdas was in Gujarati, and that addressed to the bride was in Hindi. I summarize the substance below.”
Devdas, you have always looked upon Rajagopalachari as a respected elder. From today, he is as good as your father. Tender to him the same loyalty and obedient devotion that you have been tendering to me.

To you, Lakshmi, I need not say much. I believe that Devdas will prove himself a worthy husband to you. Ever since I have seen and known you, I have felt that you have justified your name. Let your marriage strengthen, if possible, the bond of affection that has ever been growing between Rajagopalachari and me. I need not emphasize the unique auspices under which the wedding is being celebrated. It is essentially a religious thing, and may it prove to you both a means for the better performance of your duty! I should have had nothing to do with the marriage, had I not known it to be in consonance with religion, and the fruit of the pure tapasya undergone by both of you in order to gain our sanction and blessings, which you have now amply deserved.\(^1\)

It has been a great effort on my part to say these few words. But I thought it was essential for me to bless you, and warn you of the great responsibility you are taking upon yourselves. May God protect you! Only He protects, for He is the father, mother, and friend, everything rolled into one. Let your life be a dedication to the service of the motherland, and of humanity. May you both ever be humble, and may you both walk in fear of God always!

217. MESSAGE TO ASHRAM INMATES

[Before June 18, 1933]

Mr. Narandas Gandhi, manager of the Satyagraha Ashram, who had gone to Poona to see Gandhiji, returned this morning. With the Mahatma he had discussion on the significance of his fast which, according to the Mahatma, was the last resort in pursuit of truth and non-violence.

Gandhiji is understood to have told Mr. Narandas that his last fast had convinced him that thousands of similar ordeals would be necessary, and the inmates of the Ashram should as on previous occasions, take the lead in observing fasts. They should, therefore, prepare themselves for the purpose by leading purer lives than heretofore.

218. LETTER TO VALLABHBHAI PATEL

While observing silence

‘PARNAKUTI’ POONA,
4 a.m., Sunday [June 18, 1933]

BHAI VALLABHBHAI,

Soon after I wrote that letter to you, I had to stop writing letters with my own hand. I saw that I had not regained enough strength for that. I feel like trying whether I have it now, and I think I can’t do better than try to write a letter to you to find that out.

2 The message was reported under the date-line: “Ahmedabad, June 18, 1933.”
3 Vide “Letter to Narandas Gandhi”, 19-6-1933.
Please do not get frightened by the doctors’ reports or by the delay in the recovery of strength. “God’s will prevails”, as the poet says. I had thought that I would be on my feet in three weeks’ time. But my expectation has been belied. However, there is no cause at all for worry. Except for the delay in regaining strength, there is nothing else. Really speaking, what else could I have expected at the age of sixty-four? Please rest assured that I am perfectly all right. I am bathing in Premlilabehn’s love. I have turned her home into a dharmashala. She herself made arrangements for the marriage of Devdas and Lakshmi, and with what love she did that! God’s kindness is boundless. Do we deserve it? May He make us worthy of it.

What has been done regarding your nose?

Tell Joshi that I have given instructions that the operation on Ramabehn should be performed. But Dr. Patel himself has asked her to wait till the rains come and the weather is cooler. It is he who has been insisting on the operation and he is positive that it involves no risk at all. He thinks the operation is absolutely necessary. Chhaganlal should not worry. The matter has not been out of my mind even for a moment.

Writing this much has not tired me. All the same, I don’t wish to uproot a tree which bears sweet fruit and will not, therefore, write any other letter today.

Prabhavati has arrived here today. I suppose somebody must have written to you about that.

221. LETTER TO DUNCAN GREENLEES

‘PARNAKUTI’, POONA,
June 19, 1933

All these days I have kept your letter of 8th instant under my mattress in the hope of either writing myself or at least dictating. But I found myself too weak to do it before today. There are yet 55 minutes for the silence to break. I am utilizing what I can of these minutes to reply to your letter. I like it very much. I understand all you say and it satisfies me also. No one can banish you from the Ashram but yourself. So long as it gives you satisfaction and you think that you can grow there, you will stay. If the purificatory fast is resumed² as it will be some time or other, your place will undoubtedly be in it without the taint of publication and tomtoming that unfortunately and inevitably accompanied mine. Everyone will judge for himself or herself whether he or she has the qualifications. In theory no one is truly qualified for every one of us has more or less sin in us. Hence I have called it primarily for self-purification. It is enough if one has the inner urge for service, greater dedication and greater purification and confidence in one’s ability to go through the ordeal. The ability comes from the intensity of the urge and (which is the same thing) the deep and ever deepening conviction of the necessity of the penance. A seeker after Truth has no strength he can call his own. The necessary strength (and no more) is given or rather sent to him for the moment and for the mission to which he is called.

If the chain is begun whilst I am alive, your turn as everybody else’s will be determined by me or in case of death someone whom I may have named. If I have failed to do so the participants will elect the leader from among themselves.

This is as far as I have thought the thing out.

This letter has turned out to be rather important. I am therefore having it multiplied on the typewriter without your name.

I hope you are keeping well both in mind and body.

Love.

222. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

June 19, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I made another attempt yesterday to write letters. I wrote one to Vallabhbhai, and today I started with Duncan. After that I am writing this to you. Duncan’s original letter also is enclosed. As I find that I have expressed my ideas rather clearly in the letter to Duncan, I got copies of it made. I have removed his name from them. If there is time, I will enclose one copy along with the original. If there is no time, a copy will be dispatched tomorrow. As regards changes in my diet, anybody who writes to you from here will mention them, and so I don’t write anything about them in this letter.

I now expect from you detailed news concerning Deolali. How has Jamna’s and Kusum’s condition been? Have you had any news about Maitri? If you have decided to consult a vaid for Kusum, let me know his name.
What has been done about Ramabehn? When will Dr. Patel think it is cool enough? How is Amina? She has not replied to my letter.

223. LETTER TO P. N. RAJBHOJ

June 19, 1933

Bhai Rajbhuj,

I have three letters from you, one of May 10, another of June 8, and yet another of May 16. Till now I was not told of all the letters that arrived; even now only a few are shown to me. As full energy has not been regained, my letter-writing is even more uncertain than reading the letters or having them read out. I have been able to write very few letters till today. I often thought of writing to you but it is only today that I have succeeded in doing so. What you have written about Shri Daphtari is correct. Only a Harijan has the right to ask the Harijans to take such a vow, other Hindus can only make a suggestion. The problem of drinking and leading an unclean life is common for the world at large, it does not concern the Harijans alone. I shall write to Bhai Daphtari and also in Harijan on this subject when I gain some strength. You can certainly leave the Ashram at the end of three months if you feel confident of having gained what you came for. I would advise you to consult Narandas regarding this, it is all right if he too feels the same. There is no cause at present for you or other Harijans to fast. The penance has to be done by other Hindus, not the Harijans. The occasion for them for atonement and fasting will certainly arise but it will take some time. I believe this answers the main part of your queries.

June 20, 1933

MY DEAR ARUN,

I was delighted to have your note after such a long time. Hardly any letter was read to me during my fast. I was glad that Father and Mother restrained themselves from running down to Poona during the fast and are still exercising restraint and sticking to their respective posts. If I were to travel as I used to before, I would love to take you with me during one of the travels, if you were physically fit to undertake the fatigue of the journey. You have said nothing about your health and your activities. You must tell me something about both in your reply to this letter.

Have you seen Abdul Halim lately?

226. LETTER TO N.

June 20, 1933

MY DEAR N.

I have kept under my mattress three of your letters among others. But it is only now that I am able to dictate my reply. I take the latest, just handed to me, first. Your letter to the Governor of Madras is being posted today. It might have been worded slightly differently but the change is not important enough to warrant the delay in sending the letter. You need neither worry nor be disgusted with yourself for being late at prayers three or four times in two days. There is such a thing as being disgusted with oneself and yet continuing the wrong. I have seen so many such cases. Therefore, what I suggest to you is to calmly analyse the reason for being late and to avoid it. You have given the reason in these cases yourself for not leaving your work in time for prayer. Therefore you should now be careful and leave the work in time to reach the prayer ground in peace. Constant watch over one’s minutes guards one from all such difficulties.

Your long letter of 13th instant is too imaginative and too poetic for me. You have plenty of poetry in you. Your imagination knows no bounds. I want you to transmute these into an inexhaustible power for real service. We have all to aspire after being childlike. We cannot become children because that is impossible. But we can all become like children. In spite of the knowledge gained, we can become simple, guileless, candid and natural like them. Here the word ‘natural’ has a definite meaning. All the virtues that we may prize should not be an artificial growth, possible only in a hothouse, but they must be as natural to us as perhaps mischief is natural to children. We love their mischief because it is so natural to them. The mischief of grown-up ones lies in their being naturally good, restrained, humble and proof against temptation.

I want to warn you against putting the construction you have put upon the scarcity of the monthly flow. My fear is that the decrease is not, in you, a healthy sign. You are not yet free from the sex emotion, and unless you are entirely from it in thought, word and deed, irregularity on scarcity in your monthly condition must be regarded as a sign of some internal derangement. I am afraid that ordinarily speaking, you will take a long time to reach that condition, unless you and I and the Ashram are so blessed that you suddenly reach the requisite condition of natural purity that would stop the monthly flow and be a sign of perfect health. When you reach that state you will have no boils, etc., and no other bodily or mental ailment. You will be the happy possessor of the qualities that we pray for every evening at the prayer time. I refer you to the last verses of the second chapter of the Gita.

Pray, do not disturb yourself over the milk treatment though I know that 10 lb. of milk is an unnatural diet. As a medicinal treatment it might have great potentialities. These are certainly claimed for it by many people. Dr. Mehta, who is treating me, swears by it. Anyway, for the time being it is suspended, and it may have to be given up altogether. You must trust me to act cautiously and with sufficient restraint. Though slow, my progress is steady. I am just now taking my ordinary quantity of three to four lb. milk a day and a liberal supply of fruit, consisting of oranges, pomegranate juice and grapes. This is meant for both you and Amala who also is disturbed over my diet.

I see that you swear by Kashmir, but let me tell you that it is not the climate that suits every constitution and in any case I cannot go to Kashmir in search of health. I must find my health where my work lies. That is what I did before also and that, too, was after a fast. I happened to be in the Ashram and in spite of importunities of friends I would not stir out of the Ashram. The same God who saw me through 21 days will see me through this convalescence, if such is His will, and the best thing that you, Amala and others can do to quicken the progress is by discharging your respective duties as fully as is possible for you to do.

In your last letter you had said nothing about your boils and nothing about my suggestion as to the ways and means of restoring S. to his normal weight. After all he is not only to reach his normal weight but he is to show an increase in his weight and height, in general development both physical and mental.

I think this answers all your questions.

228. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

June 20, 1933

MY DEAR SATISBABU,

I have been pining to write to you but have not been able to do so. You should now write to me fully about your activities, about the Bengali Harijan and all that you know you should tell me about, and how you are keeping your health. I am still obliged to be in bed. I have been permitted to walk a few steps daily in the big room which had been placed at my disposal by Lady Thackersey. I am taking nearly four lb. of milk and plenty of oranges, pomegranate juice and grapes. That is my staple food. Progress is slow but certainly steady.

I sent you a telegraphic reply\(^1\) to your question about the civil registration of Devdas-Lakshmi marriage. So far as we are concerned the religious bond and the religious ceremony was all-sufficing. So far as the outside world is concerned and the social and civil consequences are concerned, the religious tie in what are known as pratiloma marriages\(^2\), as this one, is of no consequences and is held to be invalid. In order to avoid these consequences the Civil Marriage Act was passed, I believe, at the instance of Sir Hari Singh Gour, whereby a Hindu is not obliged to declare that he is not a Hindu, but on the contrary he can, as he does, declare himself a Hindu and still claim registration of such marriage. Then it is recognized in law. I had, personally, not thought of this registration, but Rajaji considered it to be the duty of parents in such marriages to clothe their children with as much protection as was possible in the circumstance so as to avoid untoward consequences. I at once agreed with him. If you still discover any flaw in this you will please not hesitate to bring it to my notice.

229. LETTER TO JAIKRISHNA P. BHANSALI

June 20, 1933

CHI. BHANSALI,

I was delighted to see a letter from you after so many days, I mean so many months, but I was also pained to read it. I hold that the remedies you are adopting for attaining self-realization are not right. If anybody stitches up his lips in order to observe silence, his silence would not be the real thing. One can observe silence even by cutting off one’s tongue, but that also will not be real silence. He is truly silent, who, having the capacity to speak, utters no idle word. The type of tapas which you are practising is described by the author of the Gita as tamasi tapas, and I think that is correct. You eat uncooked flour, but that is against medical science. Shastras never enjoin anybody to do so. If you have decided to eat nothing but uncooked things, you can eat only fruits, etc. You may add milk or curds, that would be complete food. I think it would be better if you gave up this unnatural effort completely. Reflect over the bhajan given below:

Oh good man! Natural communion is best. Ever since by the Grace of God it was achieved, it has been growing. Wherever I wander it is a circuit round the Deity, whatever I do is an act of service, every lying down of mine is an act of prostration before God. Every utterance of mine is God’s name—I worship no other God—and all hearing is a remembrance of God. Eating and drinking are acts of worship and living in a house or in the wilderness are the same to me. I shut not my eyes, neither do I stuff my ears; to no torture do I subject myself. I open my eyes to find nothing but the beautiful manifestation of God everywhere to greet and delight me. My mind ever intent on Him, all corrupt thought has left me; so very much I am engrossed in contemplation of Him that there is no room in me for aught else. Kabir says—This is a state to be silently enjoyed but I have dared to sing about it. It is a state beyond misery and bliss, I am merged in it.¹

You should live in peace in the Ashram or anywhere else that you like and go on doing some work of service. You may then, in the course of time, attain self-realization if you are fortunate enough. Probably you know that I completed a 21-day fast three weeks ago. I had a special reason for undertaking the fast. I am still confined to bed, but am gaining strength day by day.

230. LETTER TO HEMPRABHA DAS GUPTA

June 20, 1933

CHI. HEMPRABHA,

I got your letter. Only since yesterday have I made some attempts of writing a few letters. Ten copies of the Ramayana have reached. I shall go through it after gaining more strength. I am somewhat worried on account of your health but what can I say to you? You have left everything to God. He alone will protect you. Khadi work at present is becoming somewhat difficult day by day. But I have found from experience that even a difficult task becomes easy if one works within one’s limits, and the devout never go beyond it.

The attempt to convert Sodepur into an Ashram can be made only by keeping the original aim of Khadi Pratishthan in mind. The following shloka is to be considered in this context:

“Better one’s own duty, bereft of merit, than another’s well performed.”²

231. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

‘PARNAKUTI’, POONA,
June 21, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

Your letter of 18th came into my hands this morning. I have given up the milk treatment as it is called. But I am taking, after my own fashion, four lb. of milk at intervals of three hours commencing from six o’clock and juicy fruits (oranges, grapes, and pomegranate juice). This is likely to suit me better for the time being. My weight has gone up to 93 lb. It is a good increase, and I am allowed to walk a few steps daily, three or four times. I had, for the first time after six weeks, a tub-bath. It was very refreshing. So you see that there is nothing to worry about so far as my health is concerned. In the milk treatment, so called, and in accordance with my height I should be able to take 12 lb. of milk per day without discomfort. It is a special method and in many cases it is very efficacious. In my case too, ultimately it was expected to succeed, but I did not want to engage myself in arguing over it, and therefore, for the moment I have dropped it. You will be surprised to know that Kakasaheb is undergoing that treatment and is now taking 10 lb. per day and has to come up to 12 lb. His weight has gone up to 120 lb. Brijkrishna, who has been suffering, as you know, for years from habitual constipation, is also undergoing that treatment. He is taking 12 lb. per day without any difficulty in quantities of 1 lb. per hour. It is a well-tried method. The central point of this method is that whilst you are taking the milk treatment you have got to lie in bed and take perfect rest. You can take plenty of exercise in the morning before commencing the milk feed.

Nothing is certain as to where Devdas is to stay in future or what he is to do. It is enough that both he and Lakshmi are very happy and so is Rajaji, who is both father and mother to his children. He loves them, and he would be satisfied to lose himself in them if he had no other call upon his time. Prabhudas’s turn comes next. It is likely that he will be married to a girl who is just now living in the Ashram. She belongs to United Provinces. But nothing is yet certain. Ramdas has gone to Sabarmati and with his wife he will be presently going to Wardha. Verrier continues to suffer from one thing or another. He is now ready for an operation for hernia from which he has been suffering for a long time. As a matter of fact the operation seems to me to be overdue. Radha is still lingering at Deolali where Rukhi has given birth to another son. She is having her treatment at Deolali. Keshu is staying there still uncertain as to what he is to do. Chhotalal is now free from his eczema. Balkrishna is just as weak as before. He too is in Wardha. Santibehn is here with Om for reasons of health. She is not keeping well. Jamnalalji has just left for Wardha in connection with an old business case. His ear trouble is just now under control, but only under control. It has made him very weak. He becomes easily fatigued both in body and mind. N. seems to be shaping well. Duncan, of course, is quite happy and evidently retaining his health. It is not so with N. She has rash and boils. I think I have given you a fairly full budget of family news. I dare say I have forgotten many names, and the little ailments from which the large family is suffering, but the sample I have given you tells its own tale.

The news about your own health is cheerful. I wish and hope that you will now continue to improve steadily without interruption. You will not over-tax yourself by insisting upon going through the daily programme. Take it easily and go through whatever you can without difficulty or strain. Then you will be quite all right.

What you say about boys and girls learning astronomy and the like is of course very true.

Did I tell you that Prabhavati is with me and is standing by my bedside whilst I am writing this?

Love.

June 22, 1933

MY DEAR AMALA,

I have your two stupid and silly letters.

I never knew that you were so unbalanced, suspicious and hypersensitive. What led you to think that I regarded you as a stranger? Or that you were less than a daughter to me? You, nowadays, sign yourself as a disciple. But do you not know that I claim nobody as my disciple? I have one disciple, too many, and that is myself. You suppose I would take additional burden and make my life a misery? I delight in owning sons and daughters, sisters and brothers. Therefore, you are either a daughter or nothing; certainly not a disciple, and what a disciple suspecting her own master at every step! Are you now surprised that I called you mad! And why do you worry about my food? Can you not have trust enough in me and feel that I would not take any risk with myself? In any case, now that I am taking milk and fruit, after my own style, perhaps you will cease to worry. Anyway I am flourishing, gaining weight and strength. Are you flourishing as well as I am?

I got your letters. Keshu and Radha came yesterday. Radha stayed with me, and Keshu with Brijkrishna. I had talked things over with Keshu last evening. Radha has gone away to Brijkrishna today, who is taking treatment in Dinshawji’s nursing home. Radha is thinking whether she also should try that treatment. It is certain that neither Keshu nor Radha will return to the Ashram. Jamnalalji met them in Deolali and then went to Wardha.

Jnana must have left for Wardha. Prabhudas should see her, then hear your, Kashi’s and Ramdas’s views and then decide.

Write to me in detail what your experience of Rajbhaj was. I suppose you read all the letters addressed to N. How is Ramji?

What do you think may have been the cause of Kusum’s fever?

I hope Jamna is better now. I have received a postcard from Purushottam. I will send him a wire after I have a talk with Dinshaw. Most probably there will be no difficulty.

CHI. AMALA,

There are two ways of doing reparation to your injured mother.

1 To J. P. Bhansali; vide “Letter to Jaikrishna P. Bhansali”, 20-6-1933.
The most natural (i.e. return to her) you reject. The other is to lose yourself in the service you have chosen. Then every grown-up woman is mother to you. You should regularly write to her and give an account of your work. That will console her.

Wear that costume which pleases you best and is easily washable. That means a . . .¹ like mine, a petticoat three inches above the ankles and a free blouse reaching the knees. Mira has chosen a labouring woman’s costume plus the . . .².

You need not copy her outward form. Do copy, if you can, her inner beauty of soul. But why think even of her. You have the Ashram ideal before you. Try to realize it to the utmost of your capacity and it will be well with you. And do not try to go beyond your depth.

Please do not worry about my health. God will take care of it, so long as He needs my service in this tabernacle.

Love.

236. LETTER TO DR. SYED MAHMUD

‘PARNAKUTI’, POONA,

June 26, 1933

DEAR DR. MAHMUD,

Domestic sorrow dogs your footsteps, no matter wherever you go. I see now that Begum Mahmud is probably suffering from typhoid and that you have taken her to Delhi. A big risk, but I suppose it was worth taking in order to put her under Dr. Ansari’s care. I hope that she is making steady progress.

Devdas showed me the presents that you had brought. Whilst I appreciated your and Jalbhai’s³ affection underlying those presents, I felt that silk things ought not to be accepted because consistently with the past profession and practice, Lakshmi could not, if she can help it, wear silken things. Having given that opinion, I left the decision to Lakshmi, Rajaji and Devdas. They all felt like me, as to the use of silken things, but they had some delicacy about returning such gifts to

¹ Illegible
² Ibid.
³ Grandson of Dadabhoy Naoroji friends who had presented them out of affection. I undertook to perform the task if they agreed that such gifts should be returned. When Mrs. Naidu heard all this discussion, she said that if perchance your gift was not accepted she should take charge of it. I, therefore, took the liberty of returning your sari to her. Jalbhai’s sari is being returned to him. Mathuradas is presently going to Bombay for a day or so when he will take it. But the bag and the other contents have been retained and I hope that you will be satisfied that they would be a constant reminder to Devdas and Lakshmi of your affection. The third friend, who sent silken saris, was Ghanshyamdas Birla. I spoke to him about them. He appreciated our difficulty and gladly took them back. The moral of this, I would like to point out. Next time you happen to make presents to friends you should make yourself acquainted with their capacity for taking and using them. Romain Rolland thought that he should give each of us a memento of our visit to his hermitage, and he seems to have passed an anxious night discussing with his sister what he should give me. He could not think of books, or any other useful articles. Therefore, he parted with a trifling but a most artistic box, meant possibly to be a snuff box. Even that is too valuable a treasure for me. It will, therefore, go to the Vidyapith Museum. Of course, I had no compunction about accepting that little box. I have mentioned this very beautiful incident as it is so relevant and as I know it would please you and at the same time emphasize what I want to say.

I do not know as to what your movement will be. If you are not able to come this way and that pretty soon, I would like you to give me your views on the political situation. What will you have me to do and what should be done by Congressmen in general? Where is Sherwani? If this reaches you in Delhi, I would like you to, at least, share this part of the letter with Dr. Ansari and if he is not likely to see me early next month, I would like him to give me his opinion.

Yours sincerely,

DEAR MOTIBABU,

You will pardon me for not replying to your letter earlier. The fact is that I am still confined to bed and have only limited energy for dictating letters. Much of my time is passed in attending to the bodily needs.

As you will see from the current issue of the Harijan\(^1\) a portion of your letter dealing with the opening of temples had already been reproduced\(^2\). Extraordinary care has been taken to publish only verifiable statements and yet errors will creep in. Thank God, there are watchmen like you who do not fail to draw attention to any error that might creep into the columns of the Harijan. It is difficult, in human affairs, to ensure cent per cent accuracy and it is equally difficult to keep out reports of relevant events for fear of inaccuracy creeping in. All, therefore, that we fallible human beings can do, is to be over-cautious about all our speech, action and thought and ever be ready to retrace our steps and confess our errors whenever we meet them.

As soon as I am in a fit state, I propose to write in the Harijan on the fast.\(^3\) I, therefore, say nothing about it here. I am glad the affairs with you are shaping well. The doctor about whom I wrote to you, just now happens to be here. As soon as I have had sufficient experience of him I will write to you. You ought to attend to your eye trouble without delay.

MY DEAR ASAF ALI,

I have your long letter for which I thank you. I do not at all mind your having sent it to the Press. You had a perfect right to send me that letter and I appreciate the frankness with which you have expressed your views.

I am, as yet, unable to say anything on the present situation because I am still bed-ridden and have not been able to make an analytical study of it. I want you, however, to understand my fundamental difficulty which constitutes also my limitation. Non-violence for me is not a mere experiment. It is part of my life and the whole of the creed of satyagraha, non-co-operation, civil disobedience, and the like are necessary deductions from the fundamental proposition that non-violence is the law of life for human beings. For me it is both a means and an end and I am more than ever convinced that in the complex situation that faces India, there is no other way of gaining real freedom. In applying my mind to the present situation I must, therefore, test everything in terms of non-violence.

There is no doubt that in your present condition it is difficult strictly to follow the rules. But with effort this can be managed. Therefore rather than feel unhappy you should try to make such effort as you can. I am regaining my strength day by day. I expect in two or three weeks, I shall be quite fit again.

I dissuaded Nimu² too. Those who cannot restrain themselves despite my persuasion come. I had dissuaded Aunt³ also. Rami ought not to come. Where can she spare the money from? Kunvarji is barely able to meet his expenses. You, of course, have an inexhaustible mine and know to waste it over the children. If, however, you would listen to my advice, you should overcome your desire to come to me and persuade Rami to do the same. I know your love. If you use it for doing my work, that will be more than coming to see me. What you write is perfectly correct. You two sisters are as near to me as Ramdas and Devdas are. You certainly have a right to come running to me at any time you like without waiting for my permission. It is because you have that right, I can ask you to exercise self-control. 250. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

June 29, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

It is now 5.30 a.m. Thursday. Your letter is before me.

It makes me glad to think that you are well again and daily gaining strength. We have to acquire the faculty for keeping well under all weathers—a difficult task I know. But it is not beyond human reach. The mind plays a great part in it. If we can completely detach ourselves from the externals in terms of the 6th chapter, we can attain that state. That it appears to be beyond our reach for the present need not baffle us. The author of the Gita invites us to the effort and says from his abundant experience that it never fails. It may take long but success is a certainty.

Yes, I did not take salt during the fast. It was a virtue of necessity. I simply could not take it. I never attempted it because there was repugnance towards it and there was no necessity for it as there was about soda which therefore I took willynilly.

My weight yesterday was 97_ and I walked altogether 44 minutes in three periods without feeling fatigued. It was therefore a good record. Nor is there difficulty about some conversation.

Radha and Keshu are with me just now. Radha is somewhat better. She goes back to Deolali today. Keshu will be with me for a few days to finish his conversations.

Poor Prabhudas! The contemplated tie is off. Therefore there has to be a further search.¹

Devdas and Lakshmi and Rajaji with his widowed daughter² and his son are still here and are likely to be for some time.

As for the Mahabharata reading, you should take down the names of all the persons with their short history and their connection with one another and have an alphabetical index to enable you at once to find the history of any name in your note book. The preparation of such a book will clear your mind and be of great use to others too, if it is accurately prepared.

You are quite right when you say that a Hindi translation reads better than English however well made. This is natural because Hindi is akin to Sanskrit.

253. LETTER TO MARGARETE SPIEGEL

‘PARNAKUTI’, POONA,
June 30, 1933

CHI. AMALA,

In spite of your grandmotherly advice I must persist in the course I have adopted about my diet. Most grandmothers, when they give advice, at least make themselves sure of their facts before they begin their unsolicited work but you are a curious grandmother. You begin your sermons not caring whether you base them on facts or affection, and I like your authoritative “we in Europe”. Unfortuately for you what is good for Europe may not always be good for India, and do you not see that “we of Europe” means only a few cranks like yourself? The real “we of Europe” believe in live oysters, lobsters, high game, crawling cheese, fiery champagne, and stout beer.

You have begun with carrot juice. I hope you will not end with Port Wine. Both are no doubt juices, but there is a little difference between the two. God forbid that you should ever become a nature cure Miss.
It is quite enough and it will be excellent when you can become a proper full-fledged Harijan servant and if you will be that, nature cure will take care of itself.

Do you know that you do not yet know your Hindi letters properly? I hope you did not teach your pupils in the manner you seem to be teaching yourself. You must not satisfy yourself with faulty letters. Do you know that your ‘k’ s are like ‘f ’s, your ‘r’ is like the numeral number ‘2’, and your ‘t’ is like ‘dh’? There is hardly a letter which I should say is perfectly drawn. In the beginning stages I was not inclined to be critical but really there is no change for the better from the time when you first began to write a few words in Hindi. You should condescend to have your letters corrected before you trace the few words you do in every letter. You will admit that this task is not as heavy as that of washing your needlessly heavy garments. The heaviness of your garments is your own creation, but somewhat pardonable. The faulty lettering, you should regard as utterly unpardonable.

I observe that your passport, according to the copy you say, expires on the 15th March 1935. If that is so, need anything be done now and if it requires to be extended now I take it that it is the German Consul who has to do it. If you do not know this I must enquire.

Love.

N.,

I have your letters by me. I deal with the last first.

You are going through a terrible but wonderful trial and I hope that God will give you the strength to stand it. If you will but realize that we are an utterly poor family, that we are far away from the ideal of poverty, you will find the burden easy to bear and the illness of S. an ordinary occurrence in the lives of poor people. You will have a doctor, not so the bona-fide poor. They do not even know what a doctor can be. They have the utterly incompetent village physician and they have to be satisfied with what services his often selfish nature would permit him to render. You will, therefore, be quite content with whatever relief can be afforded to S. in the Ashram itself. You will not compare yourself to some of the pampered Ashramites whom your keen faculty for observation could not have missed. But when you have a feeling of irritation over this knowledge and resentment that neither you nor S. can be pampered, recall the fact that one whom you have adopted as your father is the first among the pampered Ashramites and if you are prepared to suffer my being pampered, then you will find it easy to tolerate the pampering of others and then, perhaps, you will find why they are pampered, if they are pampered, and then you will make the further discovery that compared to yet others you yourself might also be ranked amongst the pampered for there are degrees in pampering. Anyway, I want you to be happy, calm, and contented in the face of S.’s illness and your own boils.

You and I sail in the same boat in the distrust of doctors, but that distrust has to have its recognized limitations and must be based upon enlightenment. You are wholly unjust to the doctors who are attending upon me. They have been most careful, conscientious and helpful. They have not stopped oranges as you imagine. What they have said is according to the latest natural healing methods. They know that I am not likely to accept any of their nostrums and therefore they are making an honest effort to suit my peculiarities. I can describe to you what they have prescribed, what exactly I am doing and perhaps you will feel that they have said or done nothing that should offend against the laws of natural healing. The use that I want to make of

As for your boils, you are quite right in giving up even milk for the time being. Take plenty of juicy fruit, hot water and lemon and salt or hot water, lemon and goor¹ or honey. If it is goor, the water should be strained. The best thing is to dissolve it in cold water and then put the strained goor-water on the stove.

It is as well that you have recalled some of the instances of your violent nature. I had detected it and therefore your letter has caused me no surprise, but you are not to get rid of that violence by making a brave effort. Nor must you wreak it on S. and don’t insist upon S. eating this thing or that thing. After all he has got to like the things he eats, and remember that we are all largely a mixture of our parents. You may not, therefore, resent S. being a second edition of yourself in many respects.

Tell me whether S. has made friends with anybody else in the Ashram, whether amongst grown-up people or children.

Now for the dogs. You are quite right we ought to be able to find a solution. The European countries have found it by killing the dogs beyond their wants. India would not tolerate that solution and yet has not found an ideal solution in terms of ahimsa. The society for the care of animals takes charge of stray dogs, etc. Unfortunately, these societies are not well-organized. However, the Ashram is in touch with one such society and very often there is a clearance. Ask Narandas how it is that dogs have not been cleared by the society. N.

MY DEAR GOPALA RAO,

I was glad to receive your letter, but I was pained over your persistence in the advice that you have repeated in spite of the very bitter experience of your experiment\(^1\) at the Ashram amongst 40 people under the best of auspices. Have you forgotten the complete failure of your experiment? Have you forgotten that Mirabai was at death’s door because of her valiant continuance of your experiment in spite of her being deathpale, and in spite of my having almost fallen prostrate with weakness? I had warned you against your failure and ignorant persistence in your prescribing uncooked starch. I also drew your attention to the fact that you had no scientific mind and that you were utterly indifferent to the well-being of those who had the misfortune to be under your care. Your vegetable substitute for milk is poison for babies, and I would plead with you to desist from a practice which you must know to have failed. That in some cases you might have achieved temporary success only shows how kind and forbearing Nature is. She suffers her children to break her laws for a long time and you are taking an undue advantage of Nature’s kindness. You will be, perhaps, sorry to learn that I am flourishing on goat’s milk and fruit and there is no prospect of my taking the substitute that you would have me to take. I would only plead with you to desist from further endangering the health of simple people who may, trusting you, come to you to have themselves cured. I have written strongly because I know the danger with which your ill-conceived dietary is fraught, and I shall be happy if you could tell me that you would no longer persist in your experiment which has proved to be wrong.

Yours sincerely,

260. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

June 30, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I hear that Mahalakshmi was released and came there three weeks ago. It was only by chance that I came to know this yesterday evening. It is possible that you mentioned the fact in one of your letters, but that the letter was not shown to me. I am now sending a wire today asking you to send her here. It seems that she is worried about her children.

I have already sent a wire\(^1\) regarding S. You are right in thinking that it was a mistake to force him to eat. I had written against that being done.\(^2\) The fact that he is losing weight requires serious thinking. He has been accustomed to butter and may, therefore, improve if he is given it. Have you been able to do anything regarding the suggestion I made in a letter and also orally concerning wheat flour? I don’t know what happened regarding Jnana. You must have read her last letter. Her father seems to have exercised pressure on her. Find out the cause of the opposition of Kashi, Jamna and others to the proposal of marriage with her. Jnana’s own opposition may be one thing, but the opposition of Kashi and others is another matter. I think it absolutely necessary to know the cause behind all this.

I am very eager to see Bhagwanji. I think it will be best to let him come. Mahalakshmi also may come with him.

Dr. Aggrawal is an eye-specialist. He has specialized in teaching people how to improve eye-sight and do without glasses. He is coming there to see the Ashram. If he wants to examine the children’s eyes, let him do so. Bhagwanji may accompany him when he visits the Harijan children. Request the doctor to explain to the people who wear glasses how they can dispense with them. If he wants a letter of recommendation to anybody outside the Ashram, please do not give any. I don’t know anything about his abilities. He seems to be a good mans but he did not succeed in his experiment on me. He will stay there for three or four days.

CHI. PREMA,

Our letters crossed each other. I wrote yesterday and so did you. The years of all of us are flying quickly one after another. Would it not be truer to say that we grow younger? Our destined life-span is shortened by each year that passes. Do we not grow correspondingly younger? The lesson which I want you to draw from this is that we should become more vigilant in our lives. The capital given to us is being slowly eaten away. We should learn to make the fullest use of what remains. I pray that you may do so.

MY DEAR AMALA,

You have done well in reminding me of my two promises. The letter to your mother I had in mind but I could not reach it when I had it in mind. Then it slipped my memory. I knew that I had to send you something. Herewith you will find that letter.

As to the yarn necklace I thought that Mahadev had given it to you. You will find it herewith. It is made out of my own yarn.

If you are wearing what Mira wears, surely it is a petticoat. Is it not the petticoat the Ashram women wear? You should remember that Mira’s sari is a mere scarf thrown round her body. It is perhaps not even three yards in length. It simply covers her naked back and head and abdomen.

If your Ashram ideal is not there, you are doomed to disappointment some day. Better watch yourself. Your letters betray lack of ballast and responsibility. Take care and be humble.

I have already written³ to you about your passport.

266. DISCUSSION WITH HARIJAN WORKERS, POONA

[July 2, 1933]¹

I am not against propaganda of the right kind on the right lines. Temperance propaganda among Harijans would certainly be welfare work, but it should be done with the minimum of expense. If Harijans of spotless character could be found to go to Harijan areas to carry on this propaganda, all the money would go into Harijans’ pockets, and propaganda, too, would be most effectively done. A question is asked whether I would prefer an inefficient Harijan teacher to an efficient savarna Hindu teacher of character. Here, as on all questions of the character, I would say I would endeavour to secure a Harijan teacher of character and then try to bring him up to the mark, so far as educational qualifications are concerned. I would no doubt think of

¹ Extracted from “Sparks from the Sacred Fire-IX” by Mahadev Desai who had reported “For the first time after the fast, Gandhiji met a fairly large gathering of workers and talked to them. The Servants of Untouchables Society had its General Board meeting in the Servants of India Society, but the members came in a body to ‘Parnakuti’ to ascertain Gandhiji’s views on certain questions. Was it to be propaganda v. welfare work, or propaganda cum welfare work, or no propaganda and only welfare work? Gandhiji had insisted on strictly limiting ‘overhead charges’ and administration expenditure. But many points were aised Interpreting this rule. For instance, would expenses on village propaganda, say, against the drink evil among Harijans, be considered to be money well spent? I shall try to summarize Gandhiji’s views on this question.”

² Vide the postscript to the following item.
the children’s own good rather than of accommodating a particular Harijan candidate, but all questions would have to be decided on merits. All that I would say is: ‘Don’t make a fetish of efficiency.’

But we can make one general rule as regards propaganda: Let propaganda charges be voted each time. The more I think the more convinced I feel that, if our work is to abide, we shall have to cut down mere propaganda expenses to a minimum. Where there is the possibility of recurring expenditure on propaganda, let our expenses be divided into three parts: 20 per cent administration charges; 20 per cent propaganda; 60 per cent welfare work.

You ask whether a Harijan Day should be observed as we have been doing. I would say: observe it, but if it is properly observed, no expense need be incurred. The Harijan Day should not mean carving a slice out of the little balance you may have. In the same way, I should not spend Rs. 75 to get a donation of Rs. 100, i.e., a net donation of Rs. 25. I do not say that propaganda is bad; propaganda wisely directed is necessary. But I would say that propaganda could be made selfsupporting. Do not touch your funds for, say, a reception or a procession; recover the charges from sympathetic local friends and don’t burden your accounts with them.

Let us always remember that severe critics are watching us. If we do everything in a religious spirit, without any reward, our work is bound to tell.

Harijan, 8-7-1933

267. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

July 2, 1933

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I hope you got my wire regarding Jnana. Chhaganlal’s letter is enclosed. I infer from it that Jnana has not arrived there. If you have been able to know how Jnana had agreed, please let me know.

I don’t see any necessity at all for you to put yourself to trouble for attending the meeting on the 12th. You may communicate your views, if you wish to. If I think it necessary, I will read it out. The better course would be to send it to Aneyji.

1 Vide “Telegram to Jamnalal Bajaj”, 28-6-1933.
You need not come for Kamala either. Everything possible will be done. I have been making inquiries. Kamalnayan pays frequent visits. I saw Janakidevi also. Kamala, too, came and saw me. She is still a child. She has grown up in an atmosphere of loving indulgence and, therefore, has not developed a proper sense of responsibility. That is not her fault. Our children naturally take after us. We may change as we grow older, but our children cannot adopt all the changes which take place in us. Harilal is a convincing example of this. He has crossed all limits, and that, too, openly. I craved inwardly for pleasures of the senses but gradually acquired outward self-control. If I had not succeeded in the end in controlling my mind, too, I would have been rightly counted a hypocrite. But how can we expect that the changes which took place in me would have any effect on Harilal? I am afraid I have strayed from the subject and inflicted a sermon on you.

Take care of your health in everything you do. If Prabhudas has come there, let me know what his condition of mind is. What does he intend to do now?

How is the health of Vinoba, Balkrishna and Chhotelal?

Radhika was here for some time. She is in Deolali now. Keshu is still here. He is calm. He has not been able to come to a decision yet. I think he will by and by. I have given him plenty of time for the purpose.

What have you decided to do about the sum of Rs. 5,000 which Sushila, Lakshminivas’s wife, has donated for Harijan work?

Devdas and Lakshmi live in Ranchhoddas’s bungalow. Rajaji lives with Ghanashyamdas. My health is steadily improving. I walk three times a day and for 45 minutes in all. The weight has reached 97 pounds. It will increase still further. There is no cause now for worrying about me.

Most probably, Narandas’s Purushottam will come here and receive training under Dinshawji in nature-cure methods.

When do you expect your work there to be finished? Giridhari will be re-arrested today. He was released yesterday. He was ordered to go to Hyderabad, but he has not obeyed the order.

I hope you are being careful about food, etc. Write to me in detail.

268. LETTER TO MANILAL AND SUSHILA GANDHI

July 3, 1933

CHI. MANILAL AND SUSHILA.

Both of you have been regular in writing to me. I did read all your letters, but I could not reply. Now that I have gained some strength, I try to write a few letters every day. My weight also is increasing. I eat fairly well. I am on milk and fruit just now. There is no cause for worrying about me. Only God knows where I shall be when you get this letter. Perhaps with Vallabhbhai. We must accept whatever is ordained for us. Can we alter anything even if we wish?

It will be enough if you go on doing your duty devotedly. I like that Sushila helps you. If both of you lead a life of self-control, Sushila will be able to do a lot. The arrangement you have made for Sita\(^1\) seems good. I see that Shanti cannot be trusted. He is extremely unsteady.

Jalbhai had come and seen me. I understand what you say regarding his daughter.

What you have done regarding Sorabji\(^2\) seems all right. If we adhere to principles, sometimes friends desert us. We need not worry about that. It is, of course, necessary to be sure in all cases that what we believe to be moral is not in fact immoral and that there is no consideration of self-interest in our motives. More immorality is practised in the world in the name of morality than is done openly. Immorality can flourish only under the cloak of morality. This is the reason why so often moral dilemmas arise. In order to learn to distinguish rightly between morality and immorality, the observance of yamaniyamas\(^3\) is essential.

Devdas and Lakshmi are here. They are quite happy. I am sure someone must have given you an account of the wedding. Both seem

\(^1\) Addressees' daughter

\(^2\) Son of Parsi Rustomji, a co-worker of Gandhiji in South Africa

\(^3\) Rules of moral discipline and religious observances to be fortunate. They have been receiving blessings from unexpected quarters. Ramdas is unfortunate. He cannot be either happy or at peace, and his health is deteriorating. Nimu also keeps poor health. And the same is the case with the children. She now seems to have developed some complaint of the vaginal tract and even an operation may be necessary. But Ramdas is a bhakta and of a trustful nature. He is always anxious to know what his duty is and tries his best to do it. I believe, therefore, that ultimately he will be happy. However, it is a fact that God does test his bhaktas severely. Ramdas knows that, and so, even if he remains unhappy all his life, he will not cease to be a bhakta. Both of you should write to him from time to time. Ramdas and Nimu have placed their lives in the hands of Jamnalalji. But they have not been able to go to Wardha as yet, for meanwhile Nimu’s ailments were detected. It will, therefore, be some time before they can go to Wardha. I hope you write to Jamnalalji occasionally. Janakidevi and the children are here. Only Madalasa\(^1\) is at Wardha with Vinoba. Ba is here, of course. Mahadev and Mathuradas also are here. Manu has come and will stay for some time. Harilal remains drowned in casks of liquor, or say rather that his belly is always full of them. Thanks to their weight, how can he shoulder any other burden? I am not complaining against him. I believe that his conduct must be the bitter fruit of my own sins and endure it in silence.

I understand what you say regarding West. Finally, do what seems best to you. If you form an unfavourable impression about him, I cannot remove it. I read West’s letters to Devibehn when I was in England. It seemed to me after reading them that he had not changed. Tulsidas has taught us that we should see the good in men and remember that only. We also may have our weaknesses. If people boycott us because of them we pull a long face. We forget that people keep good relations with us despite our weaknesses. I hope this will be enough by way of advice.

Blessings from

I assume that Jnana has not left for Wardha. I have sent a wire to Purushottam, but have received no reply from him so far. Brijkrishna is receiving treatment in Dr. Mehta’s nursing home. He is improving. He consumes ten to twelve pounds of milk daily. Krishnan Nair also is here at present. I will suggest to him that he should pay a visit to the Ashram.

We should not mind some of the women having started separate kitchens. I think that is for the good of us all. Rice is not the only reason for their decision, though it is certainly one of them. They cannot do without rice, and will want other things also from time to time. Let not the other inmates grudge them their freedom. We should not criticize what others do. We can cling to our chosen path only if we feel that we follow it for our own good. Nobody should do anything simply because others do it. Acting in that manner does one no good at all. I think that, except for milk and ghee, the food served in the Ashram should resemble as far as possible the food served in jails. Our test is still to come. I don’t know when it will come, but I have no doubt at all that it is coming and must come. Those who have trained their bodies and minds for it will come out of it victorious, and those who have not done so will fall on the way. This is what has always happened. Nobody should criticize, or has a right to criticize, the women who have started separate kitchens. There is no ground at all for such criticism. Who can do more than what he or she is capable of? Moreover, nothing is more reprehensible than criticizing other people’s food-habits. Nobody can exercise enough self-control in one’s own habits, but no person has the right to pass judgment on the measure of such self-control exercised by others. He has no means for passing such judgment, either. I don’t set great store by my ability to refrain from chillies and spices. If, however, Harilal could give up drink, I would admire his self-control. For some, giving up spices might be as difficult as giving up liquor would be for Harilal. Revashankerbhai found it a hard task to give up smoking. It is mostly such matters that call for the exercise of non-violence. Explain all this to everybody when you find it convenient.

My dissatisfaction regarding Kusum persists. Will a vaidya never get a chance of treating her? However, as long as she herself is satisfied I need not worry about her.

I suppose Dhiru and Balbhadra have had their lungs examined. Personally, I have no faith in such methods at all. Even after an x-ray is taken, only an expert can read it correctly. You or I can judge nothing. I look upon these things as the luxuries of the rich. They are certainly not within the means of the poor. However, as long as people give us money and we have faith in these methods, we may avail ourselves of them.

I think I have now replied to all your questions.

You will be able to judge about the state of my health from this letter itself.

Purushottam has arrived. I have had a letter from Jamnalal and it seems from it that Jnana had reached there before he wrote it. I am enclosing that letter for you to read.

[PS.]

NARANDAS,

After I had finished the letter above, I received a letter from Kanhaiyalal and one from Maganlal, both of which are enclosed. I don’t know anything about the matter in question. Do you? Have you received any letters from Jivaram 1 ? How is his health? I have replied to Kanhaiyalal and Maganlal that I can advise only after I hear from Jivaram. It is probable that both have left Bhadrak by now. I got the letters only today. They are dated June 20, and the gentlemen had hoped to get my reply before the end of the month.

I have written to Wai regarding Parachure Shastri’s son. I will let you know when I get a reply.

I had a letter from Harakhaji. Perhaps you have read it. He wants to fix up somewhere else. Can you suggest anything?

Letters for: Amala, her mother, Gajra’s mother, Valji, Ramji, Kusum, Harakhaji, Lilavati, and the letters of Kanhaiyalal and Maganlal.

271. LETTER TO MARGARETE SPIEGEL

‘PARNAKUTI’, POONA,

July 4, 1933

CHI. AMALA,

I have your letter. There is no occasion to stop writing to me. But I would like you always, whether I am busy or otherwise, to write sense and not nonsense, as you almost invariably do. But when you

1 Jivaram Kothari from Kutch who, after giving away one lakh of rupees—all his wealth—to Gandhiji, went to Orissa to work for the poor write sensibly and have to say much, I do not mind how long your letters are. But a senseless letter is too long even when it contains only one sentence or one word. Do you know how much senseless stuff you have written in your letter under reply? That is why I called you a baby, 35 years old.¹

Your question about your future is too curious. You have hardly yet commenced your training, in my opinion. After all it is the trainers who have to give the certificate that you have been sufficiently trained. You would not give it yourself. When you are sufficiently trained you will find your work cut out for you, and of course you are being trained for Harijan service. What shape that service will take, it is difficult to say now, but before you can do that you have got to be well-versed in Hindi, well-versed in all the processes through which cotton goes before being turned into cloth. I have mentioned only two things, but there are many other things which you should know in order to be able to render Harijan service efficiently.

I hope you received my letter² of yesterday together with the chain and my letter to your mother.

Love.

272. LETTER TO N.

July 4, 1933

I hope S. has not typhoid. There is no reason for him to have that. But it does seem to me that the food you gave him should not have been given, and I am not quite sure that Lakshmidas wanted him to have all the food you have described. It is always best to treat every fever as incipient typhoid. In other words the main treatment for all fevers is the same, namely, nothing but fruit juices and boiled water, and, after the fever is gone, diluted milk, that is, milk to which water is added before it is boiled. If you are quite composed and clear in your mind, I do not want any change for S. He will come through all right in the Ashram if he gets proper nursing and a typhoid patient needs nothing more than most careful nursing and fruit juices, principally orange juice and, under certain circumstances, diluted milk. Do not be obstinate about medical assistance. The doctors who come to the Ashram are very fine men. They know the Ashram dislike for too much medicine. If you can possibly do, it would be much better for you to detach yourself from personal affection and treat S. as an Ashram child whom you have been set to nurse. But I know that this is a condition which cannot be forced and if it does not come to you, you will not hesitate to say so plainly. Not everyone in the Ashram has that detachment. Perhaps no one has, but much is expected of you. What is more, you have set before yourself nothing short of the highest ideal, and I want you to realize it. Maybe the illness of S. is one of the many ordeals you have to pass through. May God be your guide, strength and shield.

273. DISCUSSION WITH A FRIEND

July 4, 1933

If there is truth in the epigram that in the midst of life we are in death, is not the converse true also that in the midst of death we are in life? That at any rate was my feeling during a friend’s interview with Gandhiji the other day.

He had waited some days to tell me that he wanted a few minutes with Gandhiji before he returned to his place. But when the time was given to him, his courage failed him. For a couple of minutes he was speechless.

[GANDHIJI: Come along, out with it. Mahadev has told me that you wanted to tell me something about the vow or vows you had taken some years ago. I now forget that you took any vow, but come along, speak out.

This was just enough to help him utter a broken sentence: “Five years ago, I wrote down a few words, and—

G. And you have failed to keep your word.

“No, on the contrary”, I put in.

G. (Coaxingly) Then, it is tears of joy?

But he was silent and the tears rolled down his cheeks. Gandhiji said:

But perhaps what Mahadev says is not quite right. Then do what

1 Extracted from “Sparks from the Sacred Fire-IX” by Mahadev Desai
I did. I could not open my lips before my father when I made my first confession to him. So I wrote it down. You can write what you want to say.

But the friend was still speechless and signed to me to allow him to go. After a few more tears he pulled himself together.

[FRIEND:] Bapu, a little over five years ago, I wrote down what I solemnly wanted to promise to do, and you corrected one word.

[G.] Yes, but I have forgotten it altogether.

After reminding Gandhiji about the matter, the young man said:

Well, Bapu, it has been a terrible struggle, but by the grace of God I have fulfilled the letter of the vow and to a very great extent the spirit of it too.

[G.] That is good. I understand the tears. One is overwhelmed with thankfulness when God helps one to fulfil a vow.

[F.] But now is the question.

[G.] Why? The mother, I suppose, is impatient, as every mother is.

[F.] Oh yes. That vow signed and sealed by you is in her safe custody, and she often has reminded [me] of the termination of the period. But the father and the mother don’t worry me. It is myself. Once I make up my mind, there will be no difficulty. But, Bapu, is the struggle worth while?

[G.] Ah sure enough. Is not struggle the law in the natural world? If it is, much more so is it the law in the spiritual world. There is a spiritual law in the natural world and a natural law in the spiritual world. Life is a perpetual striving. There is always a tempest raging in us, and struggle against temptation is a perpetual duty. The Gita says this at not less than three places. I dare say there are many more places, but I remember only three. One needs must have the will and then, you know the English proverb, there’s the way. And there are those Biblical sayings, “Ask and it shall be given”, “Seek and you shall find”, “Knock and it shall be open”.

[F.] Bapu, bless me.

[G.] Well, you write down what you want and if it is all right, I shall sign it.

He took out his diary and wrote down on the leaf bearing date 4th of July: “Remember the spirit of all that you have said. My blessings are that you might triumph through the struggle.” And this he handed me for getting the priceless imprimatur ‘Bapu’.

And Bapu read the words once, twice and then said:

Shall I just add a word?
He added in his own hand the word ‘inevitable’ before ‘struggle’ and signed ‘Bapu,’ his hand shaking. He added:

How I wish the hand was a little more firm. But that’s all right. The word ‘inevitable’ is quite necessary there. Read the end of the 6th chapter of the Bhagavad Gita in this connection.

He bowed in gratitude and slipped quietly away. His tears were infectious. I mingled mine with his, as I realized the truth of what Gandhiji had said only two days ago:

Somehow my faith is ascending every day, in spite of the darkness that surrounds me.

274. LETTER TO N.

July 5, 1933

N.,

I have your long letter. It does not appeal to me. You are again dominated by emotion. The golden lid hides the truth. If you will dispossess yourself of S., you must possess all the children of the world. Your world just now is the Ashram. If all the children had come from the hills, as poor people’s do very often, they flourish in the best manner they can on the plains. It is altogether wrong to think that by suitable changes even little children cannot accommodate themselves to the varying climatic conditions. I do not deny the possibility of S. responding to the hills. But your tapasya lies in remaining where you are and risking his life. That is the price that faith has to pay. It is no faith that demands complete insurance against risk. S. will be all right if you will cease to worry about him and will simply do the nursing.

If my argument or opinion does not appeal to you, you will not hesitate to tell me so. I do not want you to feel helpless or under any sort of compulsion. I want you to feel freer than you ever were. The only thing that binds you to me and the Ashram is love and acceptance of the common ideal. I guide you so long as you have confidence in my judgment. I have played sufficiently with the lives of the dearest ones on more occasions than one. But if you are to do likewise, you should do so [only] if you feel the truth of it. You must act out of strength, never out of helplessness. Therefore, you will not hesitate to tell me truly what you feel. I am hoping however that S. has no fever and that he is out of all immediate danger. For his rash he needs a wet-sheet pack.

Love.

279. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

July 6, 1933

CHI. Mira,

I have your letter.

My progress is steady. I am now over 98 lb., food continuing as before. I am able to walk three times daily taking altogether one hour 20 minutes—not bad! This gives me no fatigue. I hope you will beat me in competing for good health. No doubt the heat there is against you. But you must have the rains now. And in any case, if you will take the wet-sheet pack when the heat is oppressive, you will at once be cool. You know how the pack is taken. Take your bed-sheet. Dip it in cold water. Wring it well so that no water is left. Spread it on a blanket. Lie naked on the sheet, wrap yourself in the pack. The blanket will cover you from neck to foot. Remain in it for five minutes or longer if you feel comfortable. There should be no chill felt. If there is, you should get out of it at once. This is most refreshing and cooling. You can take this pack frequently if necessary. Try and test it for yourself.

As for the notes suggested by me,¹ it is not so difficult as yet seem to imagine. When it becomes a habit, it becomes quite simple and deeply interesting. Do not forget to take down references as you proceed so that through your index and notes you can find out in a moment where a particular name occurs. These notes may prove of great general use, if they are brief and yet to the point.

Your description of the monkeys is entertaining. Have they not yet snatched your food from you? Of course you know that when they are enraged, they can inflict great injury on you.

Purushottam is here and is learning nature-cure methods under Mehta who has been nursing me with exquisite devotion. Mahadev is down with fever. He will be all right in a day or two.

Gangabehn Jhaveri and Nanibehn Jhaveri are here for the sake of the former’s health. Gangabehn elder is at the Ashram. She reached there only two days ago.

Lakshmi seems to be supremely happy with Devdas. Keshu is still here and will be for some time. He will then go to Wardha and work in Jamnalalji’s gin. Prabhavati insists on sending special love.

Love from us all.

280. LETTER TO VINOBA BHAVE

July 7, 1933

CHI. VINOBA,

I have put a heavy responsibility on you, but you have the strength to shoulder the burden of any responsibility which may be thrust on you, or, in the words of the Gita, can pass on such responsibility to God. It hope all the persons whom I have sent to the Ashram have settled down there properly. Just now, however, I wish to write to you about four European men and women. All the four are to be trained for Harijan work and as long as they maintain connection with us, should keep away from politics completely. Cultivate close relations with all of them and appoint somebody who knows English to look after their needs. Marybehn and Duncan are straightforward persons and are not likely to create any difficulties for you. But that cannot be said about N. and Amalabehn (i.e., Dr. Spiegel). If N. maintains good health, she is likely to be very useful. I am not sure about Amalabehn. She is rather obstinate and her capacity is limited. Her intentions are very good but she is very slow in acting on them. She goes on making all kinds of plans. All four will require milk in their diet. I think oil will not agree with them. Ask them and ascertain their requirements. Tell them and others, too, that just now I cannot write to them. Whether or not I shall be able to write after some time,
God alone knows. Write or dictate a thoughtful letter to . . .¹. I hope you keep good health. I also hope that Manu is not ill. Balkrishna’s and Chhotelal’s health does not seem to be satisfactory. I hope Ramdas has settled down there, and that the climate there agrees with Nimu and the children. Vidya Hingorani, who has come there, has delicate health and is rather of a sensitive nature, but she is a woman of very pure character. She has cultivated bhakti of a very high order. I am sure Lakshmibehn is looking after her properly, and so I don’t write more about her. I hope Vatsala has got over her fear, and that Madalasa is progressing. I also hope your contacts with the Harijans are becoming closer day by day. I have not forgotten the idea of chain-fasts. It is still in my mind. I constantly feel that our atonement will not be complete without such a step. I don’t mean to say that it will be complete even with it, but I do believe that, if the right type of men and women join in the fasts, the movement for the removal of untouchability will make rapid progress.

283. ALL ABOUT THE FAST

It is, perhaps, meet that the very first writing for the Press I should attempt after the fast should be for the Harijan, and that in connection with the fast. God willing, I hope now to contribute my weekly quota to the Harijan as before the fast. Let no one, however, run away with the idea that I have regained my pre-fast capacity for work. I have still to be very careful how I work. Correspondents will, therefore, have mercy on me. They should know that for a while yet I shall be unable to cope with all their letters. Whatever they may have for my special attention will have still to wait for some time, probably yet another month. Who knows what will happen a month hence? We are short-lived and do not know even what will happen the next moment. Then what can one say about the ambitions of a Harijan worker like myself? To those who buy and read Harijanbandhu in a spirit of service, my advice is that they should not wait for my writings and opinions. The way for rendering service to Harijans is quite clear. The field is vast. Harijanbandhu endeavours to give an idea of the week’s activities. It also attempts to indicate what needs to be done, what can be done and how it is to be done. From that all could find one or the other way of service. Then where is the need of my writing or opinion? If I am tempted to write about it, it is only for my own satisfaction. I have to write only when I have something to say or explain to the readers. I hope readers won’t be disheartened and will maintain their relations with Harijanbandhu irrespective of whether I have something to write or not and whether I have the strength and the leisure.

\footnote{This item has been collated with the Gujarati version published in Harijanbandhu, 9-7-1933.}
Now for the fast.

The first question that has puzzled many is about the Voice of God. What was it? What did I hear? Was there any person I saw? If not, how was the Voice conveyed to me? These are pertinent questions.

For me the voice of God, of Conscience, of Truth or the Inner Voice or ‘the still small Voice’ mean one and the same thing. I saw no form. I have never tried, for I have always believed God to be without form. One who realizes God is freed from sin for ever. He has no desire to be fulfilled. Not even in his thoughts will he suffer from faults, imperfections or impurities. Whatever he does will be perfect because he does nothing himself but the God within him does everything. He is completely merged in Him. Such realization comes to one among tens of millions. That it can come I have no doubt at all. I yearn to have such realization but I have not got it yet and I know that I am yet very far from it. The inspiration I had was quite a different thing. Moreover, many get such inspiration quite often or at some time. There is certainly need for a particular type of sadhana¹ to obtain such inspiration. If some efforts and some sadhana are necessary even to acquire the ability to have the commonest thing, what wonder if efforts and sadhana are needed to get divine inspiration? The inspiration I got was this: The night I got the inspiration, I had a terrible inner struggle. My mind was restless. I could see no way. The burden of my responsibility was crushing me. But what I did hear was like a Voice from afar and yet quite near. It was as unmistakable as some human voice definitely speaking to me, and irresistible. I was not dreaming at the time I heard the Voice. The hearing of the Voice was preceded by a terrific struggle within me. Suddenly the Voice came upon me. I listened, made certain that it was the Voice, and the struggle ceased. I was calm. The determination was made accordingly, the date and the hour of the fast were fixed. Joy came over me. This was between 11 and 12 midnight. I felt refreshed and began to write the note² about it which the reader must have seen.

Could I give any further evidence that it was truly the Voice that I heard and that it was not an echo of my own heated imagination? I have no further evidence to convince the sceptic. He is free to say that it was all self-delusion or hallucination. It may well have been so. I can offer no proof to the contrary. But I can say this—that not the unanimous verdict of the whole world against me could shake me from the belief that what I heard was the true voice of God.

But some think that God Himself is a creation of our own imagination. If that view holds good, then nothing is real, everything is of our own imagination. Even so, whilst my imagination dominates me, I can only act under its spell. Realest things are only relatively so. For me the Voice was more real than my own existence. It has never failed me, and for that matter, anyone else.

And everyone who wills can hear the Voice. It is within everyone. But like everything else, it requires previous and definite preparation.

The second question that has puzzled many is whether a fast in which an army of doctors watch and guide the fasting person, as they undoubtedly and with extraordinary care and attention watched and guided me, when he is coddled in various other ways as I was, could be described as a fast in answer to the call of the Inner Voice. Put thus, the objection seems valid. It would undoubtedly have been more in keeping with the high claim made for the fast, if it had been unattended with all the extraordinary, external aids that it was my good fortune or misfortune to receive.

But I do not repent of having gratefully accepted the generous help that kind friends extended to me. I was battling against death. I accepted all the help that came to me as godsend, when it did not in any way affect my vow.

As I think over the past, I am not sorry for having taken the fast. Though I suffered bodily pain and discomfort, there was indescribable peace within. I have enjoyed peace during all my fasts but never so much as in this. Perhaps, the reason was that there was nothing to look forward to. In the previous fasts there was some tangible expectation. In this there was nothing tangible to expect. There was undoubtedly faith that it must lead to purification of self and others and that workers would know that true Harijan service was impossible without inward purity. This, however, is a result that could not be measured or known in a tangible manner. I had, therefore, withdrawn within myself.

The nature of the fast deserves some more consideration. Was it mere mortification of the flesh? I firmly believe that a fast taken for mortification of the flesh does some good from the medical point of view; apart from that it produces no particular effect. I know my fast was not at all meant for the mortification of the flesh. Nor was I ready for it. The time of the fast was beyond my imagination. From the letters then written to friends it is clear that I did not foresee any immediate fast. For me, this fast was a supplication or prayer to God coming from the depth of my heart. The fast was an uninterrupted twenty-one days, prayer whose effect I can feel even now. I know now more fully than ever that there is no prayer without fasting, be the latter ever so little. And this fasting relates not merely to the palate, but all the senses and organs. Complete absorption in prayer must mean complete exclusion of physical activities till prayer possesses the whole of our being and we rise superior to, and are completely detached from, all physical functions. That state can only be reached after continual and voluntary crucifixion of the flesh. Thus all fasting, if it is a spiritual act, is an intense prayer or a preparation for it. It is a yearning of the soul to merge in the divine essence. My last fast was intended to be such a preparation. How far I have succeeded, how far I am in tune with the Infinite, I do not know. But I do know that the fast has made the passion for such a state intenser than ever.

Looking back upon the fast, I fed it to have been as necessary as I felt it was when I entered upon it. It has resulted in some revelations of impurities among workers of which I had no knowledge whatsoever, and but for the fast I would never have gained that knowledge. All the letters that have come under my notice go to show that it has led to greater purification among the workers. The fast was meant not for the purification of known workers only who had been found wanting, but for all the workers, known and unknown, in the Harijan cause. Nothing probably could have brought home to the workers so well as this fast the fact that the movement is purely religious in the highest sense of the term, to be handled in a religious spirit by workers of character above reproach.

The work of removal of untouchability is not merely a social or economic reform whose extent can be measured by so much social amenities or economic relief provided in so much time. Its goal is to touch the hearts of the millions of Hindus who honestly believe in the present-day untouchability as a God-made institution, as old as the human race itself. This, it will be admitted, is a task infinitely higher than mere social and economic reform. Its accomplishment undoubtedly includes all these and much more. For it means nothing short of a complete revolution in the Hindu thought and the disappearance of the horrible and terrible doctrine of inborn inequality and highand-lowness, which has poisoned Hinduism and is slowly undermining its very existence. Such a change can only be brought about by an appeal to the highest in man. And I am more than ever convinced that that appeal can be made effective only by self-purification, i.e., by fasting conceived as the deepest prayer coming from a lacerated heart.

I believe that the invisible effect of such fasting is far greater and far more extensive than the visible effect. The conviction has, therefore, gone deeper in me that my fast is but the beginning of a chain of true voluntary fasts by men and women who have qualified themselves by previous preparation for them and who believe in prayer as the most effective method of reaching the heart of things.
How that chain can be established I do not know as yet. But I am striving after it. If it can be established, I know that it will touch, as nothing else will, the hearts of Hindus, both the opponents of reform and the Harijans. For the Harijans have also to play their part in the movement no less than the reformers and the opponents. And I am glad to be able to inform the reader that the Harijans have not been untouched by the fast. A number of letters received from abroad suggest that even there many hearts have awakened. If an imperfect fast by a man like me could create such awakening, who could then estimate how great and far-reaching the result would be if innocent men and women unassumingly, without any hope of medical or other aid and without one or the other concession, sacrifice their lives in an unbroken chain of fasts?

If the Bengali Harijan does not pay itself you will not hesitate to withdraw it. It should be issued only if it is wanted by the public. 287. LETTER TO ALASTAIR MACRAE

‘PARNAKUTI’, POONA 6,

July 9, 1933

DEAR MR. MACRAE,

I thank you for sending me the first page of your father’s letter containing his reference to my fast.

My position in regard to the principal religions of the world has been explained fairly often in the pages of Young India and elsewhere. I believe in the truth of them all and I have studied them to the best of my ability, not as a critic but as a seeker after Truth and therefore have received much assistance from their study. So far as I know it, a change in the fundamental position that I hold today is not likely. Whilst I regard Jesus to be one of the greatest religious teachers, I do not believe in His exclusive divinity. You will be surprised to know that my belief in fasting, as a form of intense prayer, began before I knew anything of the teachings of Jesus. But when I came to read the Bible, the Koran and the other scriptures, my position was further fortified by the knowledge that they advocated fasting as a help to heartfelt prayer and communion with God.

I return the page from your father’s letter.

Yours sincerely,

Enclosure

288. LETTER TO CHHAGANLAL GANDHI

July 9, 1933

CHI. CHHAGANLAL,

I suggested that Prabhudas and Gyan should meet only after I came to know that you approved of their union. I fear that some injustice has been done to Gyan. We may not get for Prabhudas an ideal girl, but if we find a girl who is of good character and healthy, we should accept her. We should examine Gyan from this point of view. If she were to ask us to find a husband for her, what would we tell her? I do not know Gyan personally at all but I think it is my duty now to have an acquaintance with her if possible. I have fully talked the matter over with Prabhudas. He will explain things further. Impatience will be of no avail. We should do what is right, with due regard for dharma.

289. LETTER TO MARGARETE SPIEGEL

July 10, 1933

CHI. AMALA,

Do not be in a hurry to know all your limitations. I want your letters giving me your natural state. When I get the time I shall analyse some of them. Meanwhile know that all my criticism is charged with love. And I am hoping that you have sense of humour.

Love.

290. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

July 10, 1933

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got your letter. Purushottam has resumed work, but his mind is still not at peace.

Keshu is still here. He is calm. I feel that our duty towards Jnana requires us to do something more for her.
Tell Panditji\(^1\) that I understand what he says regarding Gajanan and Dhiru. Ramdas and Nimu are here. Kano\(^2\) has taken ill and so they have had to stay on. Mahadev is completely free. Babla has an attack of fever, but today it is very slight. There is no cause for worry at all.

291. SPEECH AT LEADERS’ CONFERENCE, POONA-1

July 12, 1933

Gandhiji, speaking next,\(^3\) is reported to have narrated to the conference as to why he undertook the fast. After the fast he had received several suggestions regarding the position of the movement in the country. Several Congressmen had urged him to call off the movement and in order to ascertain their views, this Workers’ Conference had been called. He said that it had been suggested that Messrs Shastri and Birla should also be invited to the conference but he was of opinion, that if Messrs Shastri and Birla were invited, others of similar views should not be left uninvited. The Conference being of the Congressmen, Gandhiji advised that no invitation should be sent to non-Congressmen.\(^4\)

That he was very keen about establishing peace in the country, and that he would certainly try his best to secure it, Mr. Gandhi is reported to have remarked in the course of his speech.

Mr. Gandhi stated that the necessity for calling the conference had arisen not because circumstances had altered or that the Government had offered terms, but because of the peculiar circumstances created by his fast and his consequent release. He felt ashamed that one man should have been responsible for this, but he could not help it.

Asking the delegates to express their views freely and frankly, Mr. Gandhi stated that he would like to have their views whether they wanted suspension of the civil disobedience movement indefinitely or for a definite period with conditions, as he had gathered that some were of opinion that it should be an unconditional calling off, while others thought it should be a kind of truce and some conditions should be laid down for acceptance by the Government. After hearing their views, Mr. Gandhi said he would give his own considered opinion the next day and advise the Congress as to what action it should take.¹

292. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

July 13, 1933

CHI. MIRA,

Your letter has come. You can imagine the pressure I am working under. I have taken silence to write this and one or two other important letters and to write for the Harijan. I have but a few minutes left to keep an appointment for 7 a.m. God is good to me and He gives me just enough strength to pull through the work before me.

The weight fluctuates. Under the pressure of work it has dropped from over 101 to under 99. So it would continue to fluctuate for some time. I am keeping quite fit.

I want you to beat me in competition for health of mind and body without being anxious about it. What is the use of your adopting me as father and mother and not adding to the heritage you may have received from a double parent? I really believe that such should be the case where there is reciprocity. And where it is a case of adoption, you do not adopt a parent for his vices or limitations but the virtues you impute to him. Therefore you not only try to imbibe the imaginary or real virtues but add to them. I would like you to prove the law. And I have faith that you will.

Do you know the notable instance of Gorakhnath having outdone his Guru Machhendranath?

Love.

Prabhavati is standing by me whilst I am writing this and of course sends you her love.

294. SPEECH AT LEADERS’ CONFERENCE, POONA-II

July 14, 1933

Gandhiji began his speech after referring to the events since September last. He is stated to have said:

I am accused of having committed three sins. They are (1) my fast with regard to the change in the communal award, (2) my

3. The addressee’s telegram dated July 17, in reply to this read: “In reply to your telegram asking for an interview His Excellency has directed me to say that if the circumstances were different he would gladly have seen you. But it would seem that you are opposed to withdrawing civil disobedience except on conditions and that the interview you seek with His Excellency is for the purpose of initiating negotiations with Government regarding these conditions. It also appears to have been decided that unless Congress reaches a settlement with Government as a result of such discussions civil disobedience will be resumed on first August. It is hardly necessary to remind you that the position of Government is that the civil disobedience movement is wholly unconstitutional that there can be no compromise with it and that Government cannot enter into any negotiations for its withdrawal. On April twenty-ninth nineteen hundred and thirty two the Secretary of State stated in the House of Commons that there would be no question of making a bargain with Congress as a condition of its co-operation. The same position has been consistently maintained by Government in numerous subsequent statements. If the Congress desires to resume its position as a constitutonal party and to put an end to a movement which has brought grave injury and suffering to the country the way is open to it as it always has been. It is within the power of the Congress to restore peace by withdrawing on its own initiative the civil disobedience movement. As however the Congress is not willing to take that action an interview with His Excellency would be to no purpose.” acceptance of conditional freedom to carry on propaganda regarding untouchability, and (3) suspension of civil disobedience movement.

As regards change in the communal award I had stated at the Round Table Conference that I would perish in fighting against separate electorates for untouchables.

Consistent with that statement he had to get the communal award changed, and hence had to carry on correspondence with Government. Fast and further propaganda from inside the jail were the natural consequences.

Answering the third charge, Gandhiji is reported to have stated that as soon as jail gates were banged behind him he thought he would not be able to sustain during the fast ale hearing of reports of arrests, lathi charges, etc., and hence requested Mr. Aney to suspend the movement.

Speaking about civil disobedience movement Gandhiji is stated to have spoken in the following strain:

I have carefully heard the speeches of everyone, the more so of those speaking for withdrawal; I have heard their arguments, but I am still unconvinced. I would use the very same arguments in favour of continuation of the movement. I was sorry to hear several speakers say that workers were tired and wanted rest. I would have appreciated if they had said they themselves were tired. The workers were not tired. The country was not tired. The country was prepared to continue.

I am sorry at the lack of confidence of certain leaders. I am definite that withdrawal of the movement without an honourable settlement would be a false and fatal [step], attended by deadly consequences. We should be betraying the confidence of the nation reposed in us. The Government wants complete surrender. I would rather be reduced to dust than surrender. How can we call off the movement when Government had not granted the national demand? It is a mistake to say that the movement began in 1930. The real movement began in 1920, and the fight is being continued, though there was a lull of a few years.

It cannot be withdrawn now. A true satyagrahi will go on fighting till the end, till he got what he had aimed at. I have heard several speakers referring to lack of numbers. Those who say this do not know the A.B.C. of satyagraha. I do not mind numbers. I can quote historical facts where a handful have fought against heavy odds, and won.

The speaker felt sorry at the attitude taken by people who stood for withdrawal. He said the country was not tired but a few leaders were. He gave an example of Kathiawar bullocks. When one of the two bullocks sat down the other also was forced to sit down, but if the one that was standing was strong enough, the other that was sitting would be made to stand up. Gandhiji is stated to have said that due to repression it was not possible to carry on mass civil disobedience, and hence he had prepared a scheme for individual satyagraha, where every worker was his own leader.

Referring to the constructive programme suggested by several speakers, Gandhiji is said to have stated that it was a delusion. It was impossible to carry on any constructive programme in the country if the movement was withdrawn.

Referring to another speaker’s suggestion that one crore of Congress members should be enrolled, Gandhiji said that it was an impossible programme. Not even six members could be enrolled in Bardoli if the movement were to be withdrawn.

Concluding, Gandhiji said that he was hankering for peace and he would explore all avenues to arrive at an honourable settlement, before resuming civil disobedience. Certain friends had objected to his writing to the Viceroy. He said a true satyagrahi should not be ashamed to make overtures. He must try his best to arrive at an honourable settlement. Overture was not being made due to weakness, but with a feeling of full strength. He appealed to the Conference that if they thought necessary, he should be authorized to seek unconditional interview from the Viceroy and try to arrive at an honourable settlement.

Gandhiji who opposed unconditional withdrawal of the movement said that the demand of Government for unconditional withdrawal before negotiations was a trap into which he asked members not to fall. After his speech he called upon different members to express their views on his statement. He wanted speakers to be frank, and not support him due to personal loyalty to himself.¹
