“A fiction,” writes Dr. Toulouse,” which often hinders the happiness of married people, is that the instinct of love is a tyrant and must be satisfied at any price . . . Now the very characteristic quality of man, and the apparent end of his evolution” is an ever growing independence of his appetites. The child learns to master his coarser needs, and the adult to overcome his passions. This scheme of all good upbringing is not chimerical, nor something outside practical life for the end of our nature is precisely to be subject, in great degree, to the personal tendencies which constitute our will. What one shelters behind as ‘temperament’ is usually nothing but weakness. The man who is really strong knows how to use his powers at the right time.”

Young India, 12-8-1926
211. TRIUMPH OF CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

Pundit Malaviyaji’s triumph is a national victory. Disrupted and demoralized though we are at the present moment, Punditji has shown that there is still courage left in us to defy the might of the mightiest empire. To have issued notice light-heartedly against one of the oldest and most respected and best-known of India’s public servants was an insolent exhibition of power. Let us assume for the moment that the Government had sufficient grounds for fearing Pundit Malaviyaji’s presence in Calcutta at a time when they were trying to bring about peace. It was still wrong to have dealt summarily with a man of Punditji’s position in the Indian world. It would not have derogated from the Acting Governor’s dignity if he had written a private note to punditji or if he had invited him for a conference and placed before him the evidence in his possession and told him to absent himself in the interests of peace which Panditji claimed to desire as much as the Governor himself. In every one of his public speeches Punditji has put emphasis upon the desirability of peace. But the Government is too disdainful of public opinion even to think of any such courteous action. It expected Punditji and Dr. Moonje to take the order with due and humble submission. The Government evidently expected that non-co-operation was dead, that civil disobedience died even before non-co-operation and was decently buried at Bardoli, and that the Congress resolutions on civil disobedience were all idle threats. The Bengal Government has now discovered its mistake. Punditji’s letter is a lesson in self-restraint combined with firmness. His following up the letter with action, his refusal to see the Magistrate and his triumphant entry into Calcutta, his advice to the people not to lose their heads, not to demonstrate, and his quiet continuance of his programme as if nothing had happened, furnish an object lesson in perfect civil disobedience. It is to be hoped that the Government will understand that civil disobedience has come to stay and when occasion demands it, there will be more than one person in the country to adopt it.

Both Hindus and Mussalmans will commit a serious blunder if we consider that the serving of notice on Punditji and Dr. Moonje was an anti-Hindu and pro-Mahommedan act. With the Government all is grist that comes to its mill. If today it is a distinguished Hindu who has been served with a notice, it will be tomorrow an equally distinguished Mussalman to receive the same attention if the Government desires it for its own end. Nobody is deceived by the declaration that the Government sincerely wants peace between the communities. I venture to suggest that a real desire for peace between Hindus and Mussalmans is wholly inconsistent with the desire to retain British rule in India by force of arms. When British officials begin the work of peace between these two branches of the Indian family, they will have begun to live in India on sufferance. After all, the discovery that India is governed by the ‘divide and rule’ policy was made, in the first instance, not by an Indian but, if I am not mistaken, by an Englishman. It was either the late Allen Octavius Hume or George Yule who taught us to believe that the Empire was based upon a policy of divide and rule. Nor need we be surprised at or resent it. Imperial Rome did no otherwise. British did no otherwise with the Boers. By a system of favouritism it sought to divide the Boer ranks. The Government of India is based upon distrust. Distrust involves favouritism and favouritism must breed division. There are frank Englishmen enough who have owned this fact. No serious student of Indian history can help rejecting the recent declarations about peace on the part of the Viceroy or the Governors. I am prepared to believe that His Excellency the Viceroy is sincere in his declaration. It is not necessary for one to impute dishonesty to the high officials, if one is to ascribe the policy of ‘divide and rule’ to the Government. The division policy need not be always conscious and deliberate. Mussalmans against Hindus, non-Brahmins against Brahmins, Sikhs against both, Gurkhas against all the three, this game of permutation and combination has gone on ever since the advent of British rule, and will continue so long as the Government considers its interests so be antagonistic to those of the people or its existence to be against the desire of the people. Hence it is that swaraj is a vital necessity for national growth. Hence it is that Mrs. Besant has stated not without much force that Hindu-Muslim unity is almost an impossibility without swaraj. And unfortunately we are having it demonstrated to us daily that swaraj is an equal impossibility without Hindu-Muslim unity. I am however optimistic enough to believe that the unity will come in spite of ourselves because, I implicitly believe in Lokamanya’s motto” Swaraj is my birthright and I shall have it.” Where man’s effort may fail, God’s will succeed, and His Government is not based upon ‘divide and rule’ policy.

Young India, 12-8-1926
212. PIONEER IN NATIONAL EDUCATION

Professor Bijapurkar whose death was announced last week was one of the pioneers of national education. He may be said to have given his whole life to national education. He suffered much for it. He was the soul of the institution at Talegaon. He laboured to give the students text books in Marathi. He abhorred cant, humbug and untruth. He was, like all Maharashtras workers, an embodiment of simplicity. He was adored by his pupils whom he loved as a father loves his children. I tender my condolences to the members of the deceased’s family and to those devoted followers whom he has left behind him.

Young India, 12-8-1926

213. HAS NON-VIOLENCE LIMITS?

The following is an extract from a detailed letter\(^1\) from a correspondent who gives his full name and address:

You may know what is happening to Congress workers in Madras. During the last two days, the Justice Party men have excelled themselves in their abominations. Mr. . . . accompanied by Mr. . . . was conversing votes for Mr. . . . the Congress candidate. A group of Justice men who kept following Mr. . . . and others when they came near the Justice candidate’s house suddenly surrounded the Congress workers and spat upon . . . and . . .’s faces. . . . The object of addressing you these few words is to ask you to enunciate your theory of non-violence with reference to what a Congressman should do under circumstances of such grave indignity and insult. . . . The provocation is increasing every day, and it may not be possible for Congress workers to restrain the youthful followers from taking the law into their own hands. Therefore may I ask you to state if private defence is compatible with non-violence and with what qualifications it should be exercised? . . . One reason why I request you to publish your opinion as early as you possibly can is that we are told that the Justice Party is experimenting with hooligan tactics to see if it succeeds, so that they might systematize it into a regular art of political warfare against the Congress in the coming Council and Assembly elections in November.

I have purposely erased names of men and places; for, their discovery is not required for my purpose. Time for expedient non-violence passed away long ago. Those who cannot be non-violent at heart are under no obligation to be non-violent under the circumstances mentioned by the correspondent. Though non-violence is the creed of the Congress, nobody now refers to the creed for being or remaining non-violent. Every Congressman who is non-violent is so because he cannot be otherwise. My advice therefore emphatically is that no one need refer to me or any other Congressmen for advice in the matter of non-violence. Everyone must act on his own responsibility, and interpret the Congress creed to the best of his ability and belief. I have often noticed that weak people have taken shelter under the Congress creed or under my advice, when they have simply by reason of their cowardice been unable to defend their own honour or that of those who were entrusted to their care. I recall the incident that happened near Bettiah when non-co-operation was at its height. Some villagers were looted. They had fled leaving their wives, children and belongings to the mercy of the looters. When I rebuked them for their cowardice in thus neglecting their charge, they shamelessly pleaded non-violence. I publicly denounced their conduct and said that my non-violence fully accommodated violence offered by those who did not feel non-violence and who had in their keeping the honour of their womenfolk and little children. Non-violence is not a cover for cowardice, but it is the supreme virtue of the brave. Exercise of non-violence requires far greater bravery than that of swordsmanship. Cowardice is wholly inconsistent with non-violence. Translation from swordsmanship to non-violence is possible and at times even an easy stage. Non-violence, therefore, presupposes ability to strike. It is a conscious deliberate restraint put upon one’s desire for vengeance. But vengeance is any day superior to passive, effeminate and helpless submission. Forgiveness is higher still. Vengeance too is weakness. The desire for vengeance comes out of fear of harm, imaginary or real. A dog barks and bites when he fears. A man who fears no one on earth would consider it too troublesome even to summon up anger against one who is vainly trying to injure him. The sun does not wreak vengeance upon little children who throw dust at him. They only harm themselves in the act.

\(^1\) Only excerpts from the passage quoted are reproduced here.

I do not know whether the statements made by the correspondent about the misdeeds of the Justice Party men are true. Perhaps, there is another side to the story. But, assuming the truth of the statements, I can only congratulate those who were spat upon, or assaulted or had night-soil thrown upon them. No injury has happened to them if they had the courage to suffer the insult without even mental retaliation. But, it was wholly wrong on their part to suffer it, if they felt irritated, but refrained out of expedience from retaliating. A sense of self-respect disdains all expedience. But I wonder what kind of punishment could be meted out by distinguished Congressmen who, as the correspondent states, were too numerous for the few hooligans of the Justice Party. Were they to return night-soil with night-soil, spitting with spitting, and abuse with abuse? Or, would the self-respect of this numerous party be better consulted by ignoring the few hooligans? When non-co-operation was the fashion, I know what was done to hooligans who tried to disturb meetings. They were held down by volunteers who caused them no hurt, but, if they continued to howl, their howling was ignored. I know that even in those days, in several cases the law of non-violence was broken and any man who dared to disturb the meetings or put in a word of opposition was howled down by the violent majority or, some times, even roughly handled to the discredit of the majority and the movement which they so thoughtlessly betrayed and misrepresented. I suggest also to this Congressman and to those whom he may represent that, if the object is to win over the Justice Party or any other party to the Congress, then, they should be treated gently even though they may act harshly. If it is to suppress all opponents, then, double retaliation or Dyerism is the chosen remedy. Whether that can bring us any nearer swaraj is, of course, another question.

But all my advice is useless where conviction is wanting. Let every Congressman, therefore, weigh all the pros and cons, then make his definite choice and act accordingly, irrespective of consequences. He will then have acted truly even though it may be mistakenly. A thousand mistakes unconsciously made are better than the most scrupulously correct conduct without conviction behind to back it. It is like a whitened sepulchre. Above all, we must be true to ourselves if we will be true to the country and lead it to its chosen goal. Let there be no cant about non-violence. It is not like a garment to be put on and off at will. Its seat is in the heart and it must be an inseparable part of our very being.

Young India, 12-8-1926
214. LETTER TO R. A. ADAMS

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 12, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter of the 6th August. I have now enquired. It is not possible to certify that the students of the National College cannot afford to buy. But I sent a messenger yesterday to find out how many students would care to buy copies at reduced charges. I got 40 applications. If you will kindly tell me what it would cost the students to get the copies, I would be able to tell you whether they will have them at the price or not. I am inclined to think that it would be better for them to possess the whole of the Bible and not merely the New Testament. I think you have in stock a cheap edition of the whole Bible. Of course, it is the English text that they would want.

Yours sincerely,

R. A. ADAMS, ESQ.
SECRETARY
BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY
170, HORNBY ROAD, BOMBAY

From a microfilm: S.N. 10980

215. LETTER TO A. T. GIDWANI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 12, 1926

MY DEAR GIDWANI,

Bharat, the spinning teacher, went to you yesterday. I hope he has reached you safely.¹ Bharat is the name he has assumed for the qualities of Bharat of Tulsidas’s Ramayana which qualities he wants to cultivate for himself. I hope you will find him quite competent and industrious. He has been complaining about some defect in his eyesight. He was examined by a doctor before he was sent to you and the doctor said that there was nothing wrong with his eyes but, in case he complains about anything in his eyes, you would know what to do. Bharat will give you a takli. A spindle was sent some time ago. Let your people make a third attempt and make the thing we want.

¹ R. A. Adams had referred in this to having received a request from a student of the National College for a free copy of the New Testament, and enclosed his reply (S.N. 10977) to him. He had added that if a list of other students desiring to have complimentary copies were sent to him, he would be glad to send them too (S.N. 10976).

² Vide “Letter to K T. Gidwani”, 6-8-1926.

You do not want me to deal with the difficulty about the prayer that Roy has raised.

No teacher is available at the present moment such as is required by the people of Stanger. I return that letter lest you might want it.

Yours sincerely,

From a microfilm: S.N. 11272

216. LETTER TO MRS. A. SEN AND MISS P. BOSE

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 12, 1926

DEAR SISTERS,

I am thankful for your letter. Beyond knowing the general trend of the tragic events in Pabna and elsewhere; I know nothing. I do not read newspaper reports because I distrust them. I would, therefore, feel grateful to you if you could send me authentic information that may be in your possession.

The question you want me to answer in the pages of Young India is rather delicate. I am not sure that I shall serve the cause you and I have at heart by a public discussion of a delicate question. The information I have gathered from trustworthy friends goes to show

---

1 This was dated August 4, 1926. It furnished the correspondents’ address as suggested by Gandhiji; vide” Notes”, 29-7-1926, sub-title,” To ‘Some Bengali Ladies””.

2 The correspondents had referred to outrages against Hindu women by Muslim rowdies in Bengal villages and recalled a remark, which they said, was once made by Ramananda Chatterji, editor of Modern Review, in his Bengal journal, Prabasi, that he wondered why Gandhiji said nothing about the persecuted women of Bengal, though he had stayed and travelled through Bengal for a long time (S. N. 12378)

3 The question was” What should women do when such events were going to take place and whether they should not take to physical exercise from the very childhood and be taught to defend themselves against such villains.”
that wherever violence has occurred, it was due to the cowardice of men rather than the inability of the women to protect their honour by physical resistance. I question the advisability of the formation of an association such as you suggest, not because it is sinful for a woman to use the dagger or the pistol when she knows not any other method, but because in the vast majority of cases such self-defence proves worse than useless and because it will take generations before our women take to the dagger or the pistol in any appreciable number. Perhaps, the quicker method is for women to shame men into performing their primary duty of protecting their womenfolk at all costs. But, before any step can be taken, you must have incontrovertible facts before you. Is the disease general? How many cases of real violence have happened, say, during the past six months? Was it impossible in every case for men to protect the victims? What is the precise method adopted by the miscreants to secure their victims? I hope you would not take a single step without knowing the full facts, and without reasonable hope of securing acceptance of the methods that you may suggest for meeting the evil.

Yours sincerely,

MRS A. SEN
MISS P. BOSE
C/O RAJ KUMAR SEN
DINANATH SEN’S LANE
GANDARIA
P. O. FARIDABAD
DACCA

From a photostat S. N. 12378

217. LETTER TO NAJUKLAL N. CHOKSI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Thursday, Sravana Shuklapaksha 4, August 12, 1926

Bhai Najuklal,

You must have now returned to Bombay. Velanbehn is yearning to see Moti. If possible, please send her for a few days. If, however, that is not possible, please do not at all hesitate to say so.

I hope you are in good health.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12134
218. LETTER TO MOTIBEHN CHOKSI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Thursday, Sravana Shukla 4, August [12,]¹ 1926

CHI. MOTI,

Velanbehn is yearning to see you. If, therefore you can come, that is, if you can easily get permission to do so, you should come. It will still be a few days before Lakshmidas comes here I hope you are all right now. How can I now expect a letter from you?

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12135

219. LETTER TO FULCHAND K. SHAH

SABARMATI,
August 12, 1926

BHAISHRI FULCHAND,

I send with this a letter from Maneklal. If you think that Ramdas should go, as suggested in it, please write to him and tell him so. I have written to him and asked him to follow your instructions. You may now do what you think best.

BAPU

FULCHAND KASTURCHAND SHAH
WADHWAN

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12247

220. LETTER TO GOKULBHAI D. BHATT

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Thursday, Sravana Sud 4, August 12, 1926

BHAISHRI GOKULBHAI,

I have your letter. I read two or three times that paragraph referred to by you. I do not understand why the friend declines to pay you any contribution. Which remark of mine has he interpreted to mean that your school should be closed? Is it true of your school that ¹The source has 13, but Sravana Shukla 4 fell on Thursday, August 12.

parents and teachers are inspired by the national spirit but the pupils are indifferent? I don’t think it is. Does it happen anywhere that parents and teachers want their children and pupils always to wear khadi but the latter refuse to do so? Do not the pupils in your school wear khadi? If I have understood you correctly, a large majority of them do. How, then, can the paragraph in question apply to you? If the pupils do not in fact wear khadi, then it may be said that your school does not belong to the type I have supposed. In that case, too, it should be continued, according to that paragraph. Is this not quite clear? You can make any use you like of this letter. Do you still think that it is necessary for me to write on this subject? If you think it is, kindly explain to me why.

BAPU

SHRI GOKULBHAI DOLATRAM BHATT

BOMBAY

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12248

221. LETTER TO DEVDAS GANDHI

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

Thursday, Sravana Sud 4, August 12, 1926

CHI. DEVDAS,

I have your letter. I acted upon your telegram as soon as I could. You must have got the spinning-wheel by now. I forgot to give instructions about slivers, and they may not have been packed. There can be no comparison between Mrs. Besant and the Maharani. I have done no injustice to the latter. Mrs. Besant is a public figure and, if she bought a spinning-wheel, she would do so because she understood its value. On the other hand the Maharani, even if she took up spinning, would do so as an amusement. Impartiality does not rule out discrimination. I have explained only one reason. You yourself have given a second reason in your letter, in your description of the Maharaja. I know much about him. His life is none too pure, and he has an extremely unsteady mind. He is not at all dependable. He hopes to get something done through me, and I am not in a position to satisfy his hope. I smell this hope even in his readiness to start spin. I have, therefore, cautioned you and left it to you to decide what is best for you to do, so that you may not do the slightest injustice to the Maharaja.

1 The queen of the then princely State of Nabha in the Punjab

I understand your reason for wishing to stay on there. Stay on by all means, and come here only when you are quite strong again. You may go to Simla any time you wish to, but, whether you are in Simla or Mussoorie, you should always carry on public work. Only in this way will you succeed in promoting the sale of khadi. And see that you attend to everything yourself. I have suggested to Chhaganlal that he should reserve for you the khadi which in your letter you have asked him to send to you. In view of what I have written to you in this letter, to which place do you now want the khadi to be despatched?

Pyarelal has written to Mahadev what he wrote to you. Arrangements will now be made to send the money from here. Harilal is still here. Balibehn comes occasionally.

BAPU

CHI. DEVDAS GANDHI
THE OAKS
MUSSOORIE

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12243

222. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA
Sravana Shukla 4 [August 12, 1926]

BHAISHRI GHANSHYAMDAS,

I have your letter. Well do I know that no one except Malaviyaji and Shraddhanandji can bring about Hindu-Muslim unity. I wish to be no more than an advisor and help, if I can, to settle small points of dispute. My work is a Bhangi’s, to clean and try to keep clean things. When the time for a settlement comes, the approval of Malaviyaji and others will certainly be essential.

Yours,

MOHANDAS GANDHI

From the Hindi original: C.W. 6131 Courtesy: G. D. Birla

1 Chhaganlal Gandhi
2 Harilal’s sister-in-law
3 Reference in the letter to Gandhiji’s desire to play the role of just an adviser in regard to the Hindu-Muslim tension suggests that the letter was written in 1926.
223. LETTER TO ANANT MEHTA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 13, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter and the crossed Postal Order payable at Ahmedabad for 20 shillings for the inauguration of a fund for starting satyagraha in accordance with the suggestions made by you. I may deal with your letter in some shape or form in the pages of Young India. But let me tell you here that your letter is written in ignorance of the situation as it exists here at the present moment. Your Postal Order as it was made payable in Ahmedabad, I have been obliged to cash, but, as I am unable to start satyagraha at the present moment and as I am unable to start the fund suggested by you, will you kindly tell me what you would have me do with the proceeds of the Postal Order?

Yours sincerely,

ANANT MEHTA, ESQ.
BRITISH INDIAN UNION
10, GROSVENOR GARDENS
LONDON S.W.

From a photostat: S.N. 10799

224. LETTER TO JANAKDHARI PRASAD

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 13, 1926

DEAR JANAKDHARI BABU,

I have your letter. I have somewhat studied the question now being expounded by Dr. Besant.¹ I have not been able to enthuse about it. Everyone has to earn his own salvation. I did come in touch with the gentleman at Pabna.\(^1\) He created little impression on me and, after Deshbandhu’s death, so far as I am aware, he has not carried out the promise made to Deshbandhu.

¹ Writing on August 1, Janakdhar Prasad had referred, inter alia, to a statement by Dr. Annie Besant regarding the reappearance of Jesus Christ, and asked Gandhiji to study the question and give his personal views (S.N. II215).

In a place like yours where you are living as one family,\(^2\) it is impossible to separate the Mussalman teacher from the Hindus and ask him to dine apart from us.

I hope you are keeping excellent health.

Yours sincerely,

S. J. T. JANAKDHARI PRASAD
GANDHI VIDYALAYA
P.O. HAJIPUR
DT. MIZAFFARPUR

From a photostat: S.N. 11223

225. LETTER TO PROFULLA CHANDRA SEN

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 13, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter which I like very much. Whilst I can entirely approve of your method of work, I can equally well endorse the methods adopted by the Khadi Pratishthan and the Abhoy Ashram. Each has its place. Khadi Pratishthan work is surely not exploitation. Exploitation of whom by whom? Not of the women who are able, because of the Pratishthan having created a market, to sell their yarn in ever-increasing quantity and not by Khadi Pratishthan, for, it makes no profits for shareholders or directors. On the contrary, several of its members are giving of their very best to the Khadi Pratishthan and, this work as surely makes for swaraj as yours, if only because vast production and sale of khadi makes boycott of foreign cloth possible within a measurable distance of time. It is wrong to suggest that the Khadi Pratishthan workers do not come in touch with the spinners. It would be right if you said that they do not come in as close touch as you do. But, that merely means that you are working for depth, Khadi

\(^1\) C. R. Das had referred Gandhiji to a ‘guru’ at Pabna.
\(^2\) The reference was to teachers of different communities working in the Vidyalaya at Hajipur.
Pratishthan is working for extent. Both the activities are necessary and complimentary one of the other.

Abhoy Ashram stands midway between the two and thus all these three efforts if they could be joined, co-ordinated and regularized, the work will be much better. All therefore I advise you to do is not to abandon your admirable programme, but on the strength of that programme to secure the assistance and approval of the Bengal Agent of the All-India Spinners’ Association. You need not be merged in either of these institutions, if you do not wish.

Yours sincerely,

BABU PROFULLA CHANDRA SEN
DUADONDA KHADI KENDRA
P.O. MOYAL BANDIPUR
DT. HOOGHY

From a microfilm: S.N. 11224

226. LETTER TO BHUPENDRA NARAYAN SEN

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 13, 1926

MY DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I return the two original letters from Rev. Kitchen and enclose herewith a copy of my reply\(^1\) to Profulla’s letter.

With reference to the Rs. 500, I ask you to see Satis Babu, explain the position to him and get him to endorse your application which you should make to the All-India Spinners’ Association. There would then be no difficulty in getting the application granted.\(^2\)

Yours sincerely,

SIT. BHUPENDRA NARAYAN SEN
23, MANDARAM SEN STREET
HATKOLA P.O.
CALCUTTA

From a microfilm: S.N. 11225

\(^1\) Vide the preceding item.
\(^2\) Sen replied on August 17 forwarding his application and requesting that the money be sent to him directly (S.N. 11227).
DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I regret the delay in replying. Because of neglect in my office the matter has been overlooked. I have now sent the following cablegram:

“Nothing yet possible regarding autobiography.”

As you have well said there is no question of giving the rights before the Autobiography is finished. Mr. Natesan is not publishing it in book form. But I am having the first part published at the Navaji-van Press. I am considering several applications received from Europe and America with regard to copyright in the Western countries.

Yours sincerely,

A. RAMAN PILLAI, ESQ.
POSTFACH 102
GOETTINGEN

From a photostat: G.N. 11473; also S.N. 32260

DEAR FRIEND.

You will see the use I have made of your pamphlet of statistics regarding widows. A correspondent has asked me to enquire whether your statistics are confined only to widows among classes in which re-marriage is prohibited. It is a good point to be cleared.

Yours sincerely,

SIR GANGA RAM, KT., C. I. E., M. V. O.
ARMADALE COTTAGE
SIMLA E.

From a photostat: S.N. 10982

1 Dated April 12, 1926, in which the addressee had sought the copyright for a German edition of the Autobiography

2 Vide” Enforced Widowhood”, 5-8-1926
229. LETTER TO TARAMATI MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

SABARMATI, ASHRAM,
Shravan Sud 7, 1982, August 15, 1926

CHI. TARAMATI,

Though at last after many days I have your letter there is nothing in it. You have not even said what Rohit is doing and how he is getting on. Do you go out for walks there? You must walk a lot and do physical exercise and build up your health. You must also read a little.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

230. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
Shravan Sud 7, 1982 [August 15, 1926]

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have your letter. I hope you are now completely rid of your pain. Do you have an alternative in mind when you have to vacate the bungalow? Devdas is still at Mussoorie. He wants to stay there a little longer.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

231. LETTER TO DR. MURARILAL

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 17, 1926

DEAR DR. MURARILAL,

I am still without an acknowledgement of my letter regarding the money owing by the Exhibition Committee to the Rashtriya Stree Sabha in Bombay. I have now another complaint from Mr. Kotak that 1Gandhiji mistakenly thought that was the name of the addressee’s son, Dilip.

VOL. 36 : 8 JULY, 1926 - 10 NOVEMBER, 1926

205
mony are owing to him and he says he does not even get acknowledgement of registered letters. What is this neglect due to? Is there no one winding up the affairs of the Congress and attend[ing] to the absolutely necessary correspondence? Do please steal in a few moments to attend to these little details.

Yours sincerely,

DR. MURARILAL
CAWNPORE

From a copy: S.N. 11226

232. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 17, 1926

DEAR SATIS BABU,

I have your letter.¹ I do not think Mr. Mavalankar says it is better not to have this security, if the shares can be transferred. In any event nothing more is necessary to be done beyond transferring the shares if that is possible. If for any reason you think that it is not possible, your other suggestion may be adopted.

Do what you like with Sodepur and Hemaprabhadevi’s money. I have only the inflexible condition, that the giving on the part of Hemaprabhadevi must be an irresistible thing.

There is something wrong as long as you feel worried. She cannot be cheerful and happy if you are not. I would, therefore, plead with you to go slowly. Do not force matters. Let there be complete assimilation before taking in a fresh dose.

Yes, indeed, I have read Tolstoy’s” How Much Land a Man Needs” many times over. Years ago I translated it in Indian Opinion and it was published in pamphlet form. If Tolstoy had known much of cremation, he would even have allowed much less space and, if the body were to receive scientific treatment of reduction, it would be resolved into the five elements and then no space at all would be required. And that is precisely what our mental state should be. In practice we will always fall short of the theory. But any little possession we may keep would then be irksome. We would recognize it as our limitation and not as our right. And, therefore, if suddenly we are deprived of it, we should feel as if so much burden was taken off our shoulders and so finally we should feel even when the body of ours is taken away. Beyond all your sacrifices, therefore, I want perfect equanimity and cheerfulness. The greater the detachment with which you organize khadi work the more prosperous it will be.

¹ This was evidently in reply to Gandhiji’s letter of August 6.

Are you coming for the 27th? If you want to be released from the Utkal responsibility, I shall certainly release you. I am anxious to ease your burden as much as is possible.

Herewith a letter from Calcutta with a copy of my reply.¹ You will please let me know what is it all about.

Yours,

SIT. SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA
CALCUTTA

From a microfilm: S.N. 11228

233. LETTER TO R. A. ADAMS

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 18, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter of the 13th instant.² Will you kindly send the copies as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Reduced</th>
<th>Price Rs. 1-8-0 each</th>
<th>3 copies</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>,,</td>
<td>Price Re. 1-0-0 each</td>
<td>23 ,,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>,,</td>
<td>Price Re. 0-8-0 each</td>
<td>3 ,,</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

In all 33 copies are required instead of 40. The four copies you have already sent on approval will, therefore, make 33.

I enclose herewith cheque for Rs. 32-12-0 upon . . . .³ I have assumed that you have quoted prices inclusive of postage. But if I am

¹ The reference is probably to "Letter to Bhupendra Narayan Sen", 13-8-1926
² Adams had sent some specimens of different editions of the Bible and a price list and offered to send free copies to students too poor to buy them (S.N. 10981).
³ The blank space in the source is evidently for the name of the bank.
mistaken, you will let me know the postage to be sent.

I suggest your sending seven more one-rupee copies on credit to be returned if they are not wanted.

Yours sincerely,

From a microfilm: S.N. 10983

234. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Wednesday, Sravana Sud 10, August 18, 1926

CHI. MATHURADAS.

I have your letter. I gather from the papers that many Hindus suffered losses in the serious riots between Hindus and Muslims which occurred in Pabna. Mrs. Naidu 1 wants to have the money which is lying with you and to use it to help these people. My own view is that the fund is for the purpose of providing relief to victims of floods and other calamities. Pabna’s case being of a different character, a separate collection should be made for it. However, the fund can certainly be used for any other purpose after consulting the donors.

I hope the heavy rains are not affecting your health. This year the rains are very good in every part.

SHRI MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI
HOMI VILLA
PANCHGANI

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 11250

235. LETTER TO ABBAS A. BANPARI

THE ASHRAM,
August 18, 1926

BHAISHRI ABBAS ABDULLABHAI,

The term “ghee” is used to denote the article made from the milk of only cows and buffaloes. The oil obtained from other sources cannot be described as ghee. This was all that I meant. The material from those other sources is known as tel, and I would see no harm in people using it in the full knowledge that its properties are different from those of ghee. In any case, its use cannot be opposed on religious grounds. Personally, I do not regard contact with a woman in menses as forbidden, nor regard it as objectionable to eat food cooked by her, but the attitude of those who do regard these things as wrong can be justified on hygienic grounds. It is difficult to say how far the religious point of view can help us in this matter, for the various religions hold different beliefs about it.

1 Sarojini Naidu

_Vandemataram from_
_MOHANDAS_

SHRI ABBAS ABDULLABHAI BANPARI
SHAHADA, KHANDESH

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19944

236. LETTER TO BHAGIRATH KANODIA

_The Ashram,
Sabarmati,
Wednesday, Sravana Shukla 10, August 18, 1926_

BHAI BHAGIRATHJI,

I enclose a receipt for the amount of Rs. 5,000 which you sent at the request of Jamnalalji. I thank you for the sum.

SHRI BHAGIRATHJI KANODIA
C/o BIRLA BROTHERS, LTD.
137, CANNING STREET
CALCUTTA

From a microfilm of the Hindi: S.N. 12249

237. LETTER TO NARAYANDAS BAJORIA

_The Ashram,
Sabarmati,
Wednesday, Sravana Shukla 10, August 18, 1926_

BHAISHRI NARAYANDASJI,

I thank you for the draft for Rs. 5,000 which you sent at the request of Jamnalalji. The money will be spent in meeting the expenses on a building for the Ashram.

SHRI NARAYANDASIJI BAJORIA
117, HARRISON ROAD
CALCUTTA
From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12251

238. ‘TOWARDS MORAL BANKRUPTCY’ - VIII

It is now time to conclude this series of articles. It is not necessary to pursue M. Bureau in his examination of the doctrine of Malthus who startled his generation by his theory of over population and his advocacy of birth-control if the human species was not to be extinct. Malthus, however, advocated continence, whereas Neo-Malthusianism advocates not restraint but the use of chemical and mechanical means to avoid the consequences of animal indulgence. M. Bureau heartily accepts the doctrine of birth-control by moral means, i.e., self-restraint, and, as we have seen, rejects and vigorously condemns the use of chemical or mechanical means. The author then examines the condition of working classes and the proportion of birth among them and finally closes the book by examining the means of checking the practice of grossest immoralities under the name of individual freedom and even humanity. He suggests organized attempt to guide and regulate the public opinion and advocates State interference, but finally relies upon quickening of the religious life. Moral bankruptcy cannot be met or arrested by ordinary methods, most certainly not when immorality is claimed as a virtue and morality condemned as a weakness, superstition or even immorality. For many advocates of contraceptives do indeed condemn continence as unnecessary and even harmful. In this state of things religious aid is the only effective check upon licensed vice. Religion here may not be taken in its narrow, parochial sense. True religion is the greatest disturbing factor in life, whether individual or collective. A religious awakening constitutes a revolution, a transformation, a regeneration. And nothing but some such dynamic force can positively prevent the moral catastrophe towards which, in M. Bureau’s estimation, France seems to be moving.

But we must here leave the author and his book; French conditions are not Indian conditions. Ours is a somewhat different problem. Contraceptives are not universal in India. Their use has hardly touched the educated classes. The use of contraceptives in India is, in my opinion, unwarranted by any single condition that can be named. Do middle class parents suffer from too many children? Individual instances will not suffice to make out a case for excessive birth rate among the middle classes. The cases in India where I have observed the advocacy of these methods are those of widows and young wives. Thus in the one case it is illegitimate birth that is to be avoided, not the secret intercourse. In the other, it is again pregnancy that is to be feared, and not the rape, of a girl of tender age. Then there remains the class of diseased weak effeminate young men who would indulge in excesses with their own wives or others’ wives and would avoid the consequences of acts which they know to be sinful. The cases of men or women in full vigour of life desiring intercourse and yet wishing to avoid the burden of children are, I make bold to say, rare in this ocean of Indian humanity. Let them not parade their cases to justify and advocate a practice that in India, if it became general, is bound to ruin the youth of the country. A highly artificial education has robbed the nation’s youth of physical and mental vigour. We are offspring in many cases of child-marriages. Our disregard of the laws of health and sanitation has undermined our bodies. Our wrong and deficient dietary composed of corroding spices has produced a collapse of the digestive apparatus. We need, not lessons in the use of contraceptives and helps to our being able to satisfy our animal appetite, but continuous lessons to restrain that appetite, in many cases even to the extent of absolute continence. We need to be taught by precept and example that continence is perfectly possible and imperatively necessary if we are not to remain mentally and physically weak. We need to be told from the housetop that if we will not be a nation of manikins, we must conserve and add to the limited vital energy we are daily dissipating. Our young widows need to be told not to sin secretly but come out boldly and openly to demand marriage which is their right as much as that of young widowers. We need to cultivate public opinion that shall make child-marriages impossible. The vacillation, and the disinclination to do hard and sustained work, the physical inability to perform strenuous labours, collapses of enterprises brilliantly begun, the want of originality, one notices so often, are due largely to excessive indulgence. I hope young men do not deceive themselves into the belief that, when there is no procreation, the mere indulgence does not matter, does not weaken. Indeed the sexual act, with the unnatural safeguard against procreation, is likely to be far more exhausting than such act performed with a full sense of the responsibility attached to it.

The mind is its own place, and in itself
Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven.

If we begin to believe that indulgence in animal passion is necessary, harmless and sinless, we shall want to give reins to it and shall be powerless to resist it. Whereas, if we educate ourselves to believe that such indulgence is harmful, sinful, unnecessary and can be controlled, we shall discover that self-restraint is perfectly possible. Let us beware of the strong wine of libertinism that the intoxicated West sends us under the guise of new truth and so-called human freedom. Let us, on the contrary, listen to the sober voice from the West, that through the rich experience of its wise men at times percolates to us, i.e., if we have outgrown the ancient wisdom of our forefathers.

Charlie Andrews has sent me an informing article on ‘Generation and Regeneration’ written by William Loftus Hare and printed in The Open Court (March 1926). It is a closely-reasoned scientific essay. He shows that all bodies perform two functions: ‘namely, internal reproduction for the building up of the body and external reproduction for the continuance of the species.’ These processes he names regeneration and generation, respectively.

The regenerative process—internal reproduction—is fundamental for the individual and, therefore, necessary and primary; ‘the generative process is due to a superfluity of cells and is therefore secondary.... The law of life, then, at this level is to feed the germ cells, firstly, for regeneration, and, secondly, for generation. In case of deficiency, regeneration must take the first place and generation be suspended. Thus, we may learn the origin of the suspension of reproduction and follow it to its later phases of human continence and asceticism generally. Inner re-production can never be suspended except at the cost of death, the normal origin of which is thus also discerned.

After describing the biological process of regeneration the writer states:

Among civilized human beings sexual intercourse is practised vastly more than is necessary for the production of the next generation and is carried on at the expense of internal reproduction, bringing disease, death and more in its train.
No one who knows anything of Hindu philosophy can have difficulty in following this paragraph from Mr. Hare’s essay:

The process of regeneration is not and cannot be mechanistic in character, but like the primitive fission, is vitalistic. That is to say, it exhibits intelligence and will. To suppose that life separates differentiates and segregates by a process that is purely mechanistic is inconceivable. True, these fundamental processes are so far removed from our present consciousness as to seem to be uncontrolled by the human or animal will. But a moment’s reflection will show that just as the will of the fully developed human being directs his external movements and actions in accordance with the guidance of the intellect—this, indeed, being its function so the earlier processes of the gradual organization of the body must, within the limits provided by environment be allowed to be directed by a kind of will guided by a kind of intelligence. This is now known to psychologists as “the unconscious.” It is a part of ourself, disconnected from our normal daily thinking, but intensely awake and regard in regard to its own functions—so much so that it never for a moment subsides into sleep as the consciousness does.

Who can measure the almost irreparable harm done to the unconscious and more permanent part of our being by the sexual act indulged for its own sake?

The nemesis of reproduction is death. The sexual act is essentially katabolic (or a movement towards death) in the male and in parturition of the offspring it is katabolic for the female.

Hence the writer contends:

Virility, vitality and immunity from disease are the normal lot of nearly or quite continent persons. Withdrawal of germ cells from their upward regenerative course for generative or merely indulgent purposes deprives the organs of their replenishing stock of life, to their cost slowly and ultimately. It is these physical facts which constitute the basis of a personal sexual ethic, counselling moderation, if not restraint—at any rate, explaining the origin of restraint.

The author, as can be easily imagined, is opposed to birth-control by chemical and mechanical means. He says:

It removes all prudential motives for self-restraint and makes it possible for sexual indulgence in marriage to be limited only by the diminution of desire or the advance of old age. Apart from this, however, it inevitably has an influence outside the marriage relation. It opens the door for irregular, promiscuous and unfruitful unions, which from the point of view of modern industry, sociology and politics, are full of danger. I cannot go into these here. It is sufficient to say that by contraception, inordinate sexual indulgence both in and out of marriage is facilitated and, if I am right in my foregoing physiological arguments, evil must come to both individuals and the race. Let the Indian youth treasure in their hearts the quotation with which M. Bureau’s book ends:

The future is for the nations who are chaste.

Young India, 19-8-1926

239. CORRECTION

Professor Malkani draws my attention to two ‘sad misprints’ in his last article last week. In the third paragraph of the second column ‘quickly’ should have been ‘quietly’ and ‘clever’ should have been ‘clear’.

Young India, 19-8-1926

240. SUPPRESSED HUMANITY

The untouchable is not the only portion of suppressed humanity! The young widow in Hindu society is no less so. A correspondent from Bengal writes:

There is no restriction among Muslims about widow remarriage, but there is provision for a man to marry up to four wives and as a matter of fact many Muslims have more than one wife. So none of the Muslim male population remains unmarried. Is it not therefore true that where there is no restriction against widow remarriage the number of females is much in excess of males? In other words is it not true that in the communities in which widow remarriage is allowed, polygamy should also be allowed?

If widow remarriage is made common among Hindus, will not young widows induce young men to marry them and make it difficult, rather impossible, to find out bridegrooms for unmarried girls?

Will not unmarried girls then commit all the sins which are committed or are presumed to be committed by widows, if there be no provision to keep more than one wife by a Hindu?

I refrain from reminding you of the love (prem), the saintly grahastha.

---

1 The reference is to N. R. Malkani’s article” The Agricultural Condition of Bardoli Taluka”, published in Young India, 12-8-1926.

2 Household
life, the pativrata dharma\(^1\) and such other things which should be taken into consideration in recommending widow remarriage.

In his zeal to prevent widows from remarrying, the correspondent has ignored many things. Mussalmans have, indeed, the right to take more than one wife but the vast majority of them have only one wife. The correspondent does not seem to know that, unfortunately, there is no prohibition against Polygamy in Hinduism. Hindus in highest circles have been known to marry more than one wife. Many princes marry an unlimited number. The correspondent further forgets the fact that it is only among the so-called higher classes that widow remarriage is prohibited. Among the vast majority belonging to the fourth division, widows freely remarry, but no untoward consequences have taken place. Though free to take more wives than one, they are as a rule satisfied with one companion at a time.

The suggestion that young widows will take up all young men and leave none for unmarried girls betrays a woeful want of sense of proportion. The excessive anxiety for the chastity of young girls betrays an unhealthy mind. The limited number of widows remarrying can never leave a large number of young girls unmarried. And in any event, if ever such a problem arose it would be found to be due to the early marriages that take place today. The remedy in anticipation is to prevent early marriages.

Of the love, the sanctity of grahastha life, etc., where there is a widow of tender age, the less said the better.

But the correspondent has missed the whole of my point. I have never advocated widow remarriage on a wholesale scale. The statistics collected by Sir Ganga Ram and summarized in these pages deal with widows up to 15 years only. These poor, wretched beings know-nothing of Pativrata dharma. They are strangers to love. The truer statement would be to say that these girls were never married at all. If marriage is, as it ought to be, a sacrament, an entrance into a new life, the girls to be married should be fully developed, should have some hand in the choice of companions for life and should know the consequences of their acts. It is a crime against God and man to call the union of the children a married state and then to decree widowhood for a girl whose so-called husband is dead.

I do believe that a real Hindu widow is a treasure. She is one of the gifts of Hinduism to humanity. Ramabai Ranade was such a gift. But the existence of girl widows is a blot upon Hinduism for which the existence of a Ramabai is no atonement.

\(^1\) Loyalty to one’s husband

Young India, 19-8-1926

241. NOTES

THE WHEEL IN MUNICIPAL SCHOOLS

There are 108 girls and 41 boys spinning in the schools under the Lucknow Municipal Board. There are 93 wheels in the girls’ schools and 15 in the boys’ schools. The former spin 27 tolas and the latter 4 tolas per month. Each wheel costs the municipality Rs. 2 per month. The Superintendent of Education considers the progress ‘quite satisfactory beginning to start with, though not very encouraging’. It can be considered satisfactory only in the sense that it may be better than nothing. But in my opinion the output of yarn is ridiculously small and the expense per charkha is monstrously large. Indeed there should be hardly any, apart from the initial outlay. Nothing is stated as to the quality of yarn. I must repeat what I have said before. The takli is the thing for schools and it should be only introduced when the existing staff has learnt carding and spinning. Spinning in schools can never become a success unless the teachers realize its national importance, take pleasure in it, and by their own zeal make it interesting for the pupils.

BIHAR KHADI EXHIBITION

The khadi exhibitions in Bihar continue to prosper and attract increasing attention. The month of July began with an exhibition at Bettiah. It was opened by Mr. Prior, the manager of the Raj. The assistant manager Mr. Wylde and the S.D.O. were present at the opening ceremony. Mr. Prior did not think that “any Englishman ever considered khaddar as a poor thing,” but he said, “it should be carried on as a home industry”. The sales effected were Rs. 1,304-12-3. The second exhibition was held at Motihari. The Rev. J. Z. Hodge performed the opening ceremony. He had three reasons for supporting the khaddar movement: First, “Support home industry”; second khaddar had sentiment and love behind it; third, khaddar gave food to the poor. The sales in Motihari amounted to Rs. 1,162-8-9. The third exhibition was held at Laheria serai, Darbhanga. Babu Rajendra Prasad performed the opening ceremony. The sales amounted to Rs. 1,445-15-6. The fourth and the last exhibition of the month was at Debghar. Sheth Jamnalal Bajaj opened the exhibition. The sales came to Rs. 1,359-3-6.

Young India, 19-8-1926

242. TO READERS OF” NAVAJIVAN”

Today Hindi Navajivan enters its sixth year. Although it is running at a loss, it is being continued by the love of friends. I have read what Jamnalalji has written. If Hindi Navajivan serves a purpose, it must go on; but it must then be self-supporting. I appeal to the readers to make sure that the paper does not have to depend on the charity of friends.

There used to be errors of language in Hindi Navajivan. I think they have now been done away with. Two Hindi lovers from North India do the translation for Hindi Navajivan. The risk of errors has, therefore, considerably lessened. The readers on their part will no doubt fulfil their duty during this year.

[From Hindi]

Hindi Navajivan, 19-8-1926

243. LETTER TO PUNJABHAI

The Ashram,

Thursday, August 19, 1926

BHAISHRI PUNJABHAI

I have gone through the translation of Manache Shloka fairly carefully. I felt that it contained quite a few errors. It was beyond my capacity to examine it very closely. Besides, my knowledge of Marathi is not much. I would, therefore, advise you to get it thoroughly revised by a scholar who knows both Marathi and Gujarati.

SIT. PUNJABHAI

ASHRAM

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12253

---

1 A didactic long verse by the seventeenth-century Maharashtra saint Ramdas
244. LETTER TO RUSTOMJEE WACHHA GANDHI

[THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,]

Thursday, Sravana Sud 11, August 19, 1926

BHAISHRI RUSTOMJEE WACHHA GANDHI

I received both your letters. Your request was one which I simply could not refuse, and so I send with this something, much too short though it is, which I have been able to write out.

SHRI R. WACHHA GANDHI
“SANJ VARTMAN” OFFICE
PERAJ BUILDING, FORT, BOMBAY

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12252

245. TELEGRAM TO DR. SATYAPAL

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 20, 1926

SATYAPAL
CONGRESS
MESSAGE LET ALL FOLLOW KRISHNA IN DOING DUTY.

GANDHI

From a microfilm: S.N. 12256

246. TELEGRAM TO MOTILAL NEHRU

August 20, 1926

PANDIT NEHRU
ALLAHABAD
DID NOT EVEN KNOW GHANSHYAMDAS CANDIDATURE GORAKHPUR. THERE MUST BE SOME MISTAKE.¹

GANDHI

From a photostat: S.N. 11327

¹ This was in reply to Motilal Nehru’s telegram of August 19, 1926 which read: Ghanshyamdas Birla’s workers representing that you approve his candidature Assembly Benares Gorakhpur division from which Sriprakasa already nominated and approved by Working Committee as Congress candidate. Please authorize contradiction. Vide also” Letter to G. D. Birla,” 20-8-1926.
247. LETTER TO MUTHUSAMY MUDALY

August 20, 1926

With reference to your letter of the 17th July, I have now made the fullest enquiry and I have come to the conclusion that Mr. Kotak is not to blame. ¹

From a microfilm: S.N. 11203

248. LETTER TO ESTHER MENON

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 20, 1926

MY DEAR CHILD,

I have your letter. I did not misunderstand your remark about typewriters. On the contrary, I liked it.

The literal meaning of an ‘ashram’ is an abode, but the associations about the ashram are these: It should be simple. It should not be merely a teaching institution. It should contain predominantly those who are pledged to perpetual continence. It should have associations of sannyasa, meaning detachment from the world. It should, therefore, be a voluntarily poor organization. There should, therefore, be rigid simplicity about it. Its object must invariably be formation of character with a view to self-realization. The idea of master and servant is wholly repugnant to such an institution. All men and women in an ashram are expected to do bodily labour and all enjoy an equal status. The idea of superiority has no place in it. The head of an ashram is in the place of a parent and he is expected to regard the rest as his own children. I wonder if I have now given you fairly the characteristics of an ashram.

It grieves me whenever I find that a medical man is weak or ailing. It is a perpetual reminder to us that medicine is such an incomplete, such an unreliable, and such an empirical science. If we think about it with sufficient detachment, we would at once realize its inherent weakness by understanding that there is no such thing as an absolute cure. The most potent drugs admit of innumerable exceptions. The most successful operation leaves literally and in the spirit a scar behind. It would certainly be a good thing, if you could hasten your departure for Denmark. Change of climate will be the best cure.

¹ The context is not ascertainable.

What you say about fasting is quite true. It has no absolute value and it certainly does not produce the slightest spiritual effect if the motive behind it is not really spiritual. Fasting with a mixed motive ends with purely material results. But fasting for the sake of unfoldment of the spirit is a discipline I hold to be absolutely necessary at some stage or other in the evolution of an individual. I always considered Protestantism to be deficient in this particular. Every other religion of any importance appreciates the spiritual value of fasting. Crucifixion of the flesh is a meaningless term unless one goes voluntarily through pangs of hunger. For one thing, identification with the starving poor is a meaningless term without the experience behind. But I quite agree that even an eighty days’ fast may fail to rid a person of pride, selfishness, ambitions and the like. Fasting is merely a prop. But as a prop to a tottering structure is of inestimable value, so is the prop of fasting of inestimable value for a struggling soul.

With love,

Yours,
BAPU

From a photostat of the original in N.A.I.; also My Dear Child, PP. 84-5

249. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Friday, Sravana Shukla 12, August 20, 1926

BHAI GHANSHYAMDASJI,

I enclose a telegram from Motilalji. The reply I which I have sent to him is on the back of the same sheet. I have also sent you a wire as under:

Motilalji wires I approve your candidature Assembly Gorakhpur. Have replied know nothing about your candidature. There must be some mistake. Do you know anything about alleged representation.

What can all this mean? I am awaiting your reply.

Yours,
MOHANDAS

1 Vide “Telegram to Motilal Nehru” 20-8-1926.
[PS.]

I hope you are keeping good health.

From the Hindi original: C.W. 6133. Courtesy: G. D. Birla

250. LETTER TO REHANA TYABJI

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

August 21, 1926

DEAR SISTER,

It was a delight to receive your letter, it would seem, after ages. Do you want me to write to Sir Henry Lawrence directly or to prepare a note for you which you can send? Whilst your answer is quite good, he must have all the satisfaction that one can give him in the way of statistics. After all the trouble one may take, it is just possible what may appear to us to be solid and tangible may not appear so to him. But that does not matter as the inspirer of The Song Celestial would say. We must act with detachment and leave the results to God.

I observe that, as behoves a good girl, your postscript is as long as your letter and, perhaps, more important. Please tell the sceptical sister that the revival of the spinning-wheel has actually rescued from destruction many arts and crafts. Does she think that there was no art in India before we received silk thread from China and Paris which we began doing only a hundred years ago or less? When spinning and waving were at their height, we were in possession of the highest art and all the art on fabric one sees now is a copy of the Indian original. Personally, I do not mind the use of Chinese silk for embroidery. But those who are afraid of art destruction may use as much as they like of Chinese thread so long as the background is hand-spun khaddar. No amount of travelling and appeals to newspapers, etc., can possibly rescue Indian art from destruction if we cannot rescue ourselves as a nation from destruction. Revival of Indian art will only come when we develop love enough for our country to enable us to cling to one another and sink our differences and to sacrifice our all for the sake of the country. The best way, therefore, to preserve and revive the Indian art is for us to become sufficiently Indian ourselves. But all this

---

1 The source has this in Arabic script.
2 Edwin Arnold’s English version of the Bhagavad Gita
I don’t need to say to you. You are saturated with the national spirit. May God give you long life and health for exhibiting that spirit as occasion demands. Those who love to do certain things end by doing those things, and if you are longing to meet Miss Shade whom we call Mirabai and still more to sing to me some of your new bhajans then you will end by coming here at the earliest opportunity.

With love to you all,

Yours,

BAPU

MISS REHANA TYABJI
CAMP, BARODA

From a photostat: S.N. 9600

251. MY NOTES

NATIONAL SCHOOLS

There seems to be some misunderstanding regarding the article in which I wrote about National Schools in the Navajivan of August 8. The Principal of the Rashtriya Vinay Mandir in Bombay has written to me as follows:

You have given it as your opinion in that article that national schools should be closed now, and so one of the donors of the Vinay Mandir says that he need give us nothing now.

The passage which has been thus misunderstood read as follows:

Where the parents are fired by national ideals and prove their adhesion by giving adequate donations for the support of national schools, and, where the teachers being themselves believers in the national ideal are ceaselessly striving to enforce it, I can understand a relaxation of the discipline if the scholars are lukewarm about the ideal. In such a case, it may be necessary to continue the school. For we may hope some day to influence the scholars. But at the time of writing these lines, I can think of no such school.¹

The last sentence of this paragraph has been misunderstood. It has been taken to mean that I do not regard any of the national schools fit enough to be continued. There is another sentence in that paragraph, the first one, which states what type of school should be closed down:

¹ This paragraph is taken from Young India, 2-9-1926.
Where either the parents or the teachers are opposed to the national ideal, the school should certainly be closed.¹

In the case of the Vinay Mandir in Bombay, as in the case of many other such schools, we know that the parents and teachers are in agreement with the ideals of national education. They want national schools to be run in accordance with the ideal of national education as defined by the Congress. Schools which are so run need not be closed down. The sentences which followed were intended to point out that in such cases it would not be wrong, even if the pupils obstinately refused to wear khadi and fulfil other conditions, to keep the schools going and so give the pupils an opportunity to change. I stated at the conclusion of the paragraph,” I can think of no such school.” What I meant was that, if there were any national schools where both the parents and the teachers were in agreement with its ideals and active in promoting them and yet the pupils obstinately disregarded the rules about khadi, etc., I should certainly like to know their names. As regards the Rashtriya Vinay Mandir in Bombay, my impression is that there even the pupils are filled with the national spirit and wear khadi and spin. There can be no question of closing down such a school. I hope that generous-hearted men will continue to help such schools.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 22-8-1926

252. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Sravana Shukla 14, 1982 [August 22, 1926]

CHI. MATHURADAS.

I have already written to you about the German lady here. This warm weather does not suit her, and so I wish to send her for a month to some cool place. I have written to Devdas² and Stokes³ to know if they can help. If you have room in your bungalow, I think of sending her there. She will not be a burden to anyone. She is a very simple ¹ ibid.

² Devdas Gandhi was then at Mussoorie.
³ He was running a school at Kotgarh near Simla.
lady, with a fine sense of humour and quite good-natured. If you can accommodate her, please send a wire. I intend to let her start from here on Thursday.

Sjt. Mathuradas Trikumji
Homi Villa
Panchganil
From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12255

253. LETTER TO LAKSHMIDAS P. ASAR

The Asram, Sabarmati,

Tuesday, Sravana Vad 1 [August 24, 1926]

Chl. Lakshmidas.

I have your letter. I will go through the article about Mahudha and then publish it. It surprises me why you have still not recovered your health completely. I wish to see you fresh-looking and with some flesh on your body. If it is only towards the end of the English month that you can come, I should like you to come six days earlier; for Moti is here at present, and she ought to leave this place very soon and go to her husband. That is the drift of Najuklal’s letter. Velanbehn, of course, wishes that she should stay on and spend even the month of Bhadarva here, or at any rate till you arrive. But I feel that Moti’s duty is to leave for Broach or Baroda at the earliest opportunity. Besides, if you are here, it will help both Velanbehn and me in the treatment which I am trying just now on her.

Gangabehn’s problem is practically solved. We have got possession of the house in Vijapur, and the necessary things have also been purchased. A little more remains to be done though, thanks to my having trusted things to others.

I wish to discuss with you a little further your letter to Maganlal about cotton. I could not follow it completely. About other matters, when we meet.

Sjt. Lakshmidas Purushottam
Jayajirao Cotton Mills
Gwalior

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12258

1 The addressee’s article about Mhuadha referred to in the letter was published in November 1926. In 1926 Sravana Vad 1 fell on August 24.
254. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have your letter. You must have received my letter of yesterday about Miss Haussding. Pattani Saheb’s bungalow can certainly be rented. And if no other place is available, I should not hesitate to ask him for the bungalow.

Blessings from
BAPU

SIT. MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI
HOMI VILLA
PANCHGANI

255. LETTER TO AVANTIKABAI GOKHALE

DEAR SISTER,

Read the accompanying letter and return it, along with the reply.
I hope both you and Shri Gokhale are keeping well.

I suppose you know that Devdas is at present in Simla.

SMT. AVANTIKABAI GOKHALE
ATMARAM MANSION
GIRGAUM
BOMBAY

1 From the postmark
2 Gandhiji had asked the addressee if he could accommodate Helene Haussding in his bungalow; vide “Letter to Mathuradas Trikumji”, 22-8-1926.
256. LETTER TO NANABHAI BHATT

BHAISHRI NANABHAI,

I got your letter and telegram. I hope Chi. Vidyut is all right now. I shall keep quiet till Vithalrai is here.

Ramnarayan¹ told me yesterday that Ballubhai² and Diwan³ had decided to seek recognition⁴ by the Government. I asked him thereupon to start immediately in the Vidyapith itself a class for such of the pupils in the seventh standard who may wish to join it. We shall of course have to obtain afterwards the committee’s permission for that. I have asked Ramnarayan not to incur any expenditure meanwhile. It has been decided that the pupils who may join the class should be accommodated in the Mahavidyalaya building. If you can, come over for a while and examine the position.

Herewith a cutting which someone sent to me with a request that I should forward it to you. I do not believe that you have said or believed anything of the kind hinted at in it.

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12259

257. NOTES

A WISE STEP

The manager of the khadi store conducted in the office of the Pranidaya Dhyanpracharak Sangh, Davengere, Mysore, reports that the municipal council of that place has removed the octroi duty imposed on imports of khadi. This is an example to be copied by every municipality. It is the least that municipalities can do for the revival of the ancient industry. Let me repeat for the thousandth time that khadi means cloth woven on a handloom out of hand-spun yarn.

GUJARAT FIGURES

The following figures bring the production and sale of khadi in Gujarat to the end of June:

¹ Ramnarayan V. Pathak, an educationist, scholar and critic of Gujarat
² Ballubhai P. Thakore
³ Jivanlal Diwan
⁴ For their Proprietary High School at Ahmedabad
227

258. TELLTALE FIGURES

The following summary of the membership of the All-India Spinners’ Association of the ‘A’ class cannot fail to attract the attention of the readers, especially of the members themselves.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>PROVINCE</th>
<th>ENROLLED MEMBERS</th>
<th>FULL MEMBERS</th>
<th>SUBSCRIBERS</th>
<th>PERCENTAGE</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1. Ajmer</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>7</td>
<td>41</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. Andhra</td>
<td>455</td>
<td>109</td>
<td>24</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3. Assam</td>
<td>155</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4. Bihar</td>
<td>227</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>27</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5. Bengal</td>
<td>549</td>
<td>178</td>
<td>33</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6. Berar</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>78</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7. Burma</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>83</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8. C.P. Hindi</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>26</td>
<td>55</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9. C.P. Marathi</td>
<td>67</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>70</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>10. Bombay</td>
<td>80</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>55</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>11. Delhi</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>29</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>12. Gujarat</td>
<td>467</td>
<td>282</td>
<td>60</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>13. Karnataka</td>
<td>176</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>35</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>14. Kerala</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>34</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>15. Maharashtra</td>
<td>237</td>
<td>89</td>
<td>38</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16. Punjab</td>
<td>68</td>
<td>23</td>
<td>34</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17. Sind</td>
<td>44</td>
<td>20</td>
<td>45</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18. Tamil Nadu</td>
<td>501</td>
<td>160</td>
<td>32</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19. U.P.</td>
<td>150</td>
<td>61</td>
<td>41</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20. Utkal</td>
<td>33</td>
<td>15</td>
<td>45</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>3,379</td>
<td>1,231</td>
<td>36</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
As against 3,379 persons who enrolled themselves as members only 1,231, i.e., 36 per cent have paid their quota of yarn to date. Assam with only 1 p.c. full subscribers comes by far the last on the list. Andhra is the next offender with 24 p.c. Burma tops the list with 83 p.c., but it is no wonder since it had only 6 members to start with.

These figures show that people do not like regularity, they do not like to work steadily for the country. The spirit of sustained sacrifice is lacking. No one need imagine that with monetary subscriptions the conditions will be much better. Where is the public worker who has had no painful experience of arrears? I remember the complaints of old Congress Secretaries when the A.I.C.C. subscription used to be a lump sum. Negligence is ingrained among many workers. Public work has not yet risen from the status of a pastime or patronage to that of a primary duty. And yet for one who desires a healthy social and public life, public service is as much a duty as is service done to oneself or to one’s family. May not the ancient five sacrifices be renamed sacrifice for self, family, village, nation and humanity? That life only is worth living in which there is a harmonious correlation, no antagonism, among the several sacrifices. The spinning subscription is a national sacrifice of the lightest measure, not in conflict with the requirements of humanity, and certainly not in conflict with those of the village, family or the individual.

For me, therefore, the lesson that this study in figures teaches is not one of despair, nor of revising the nature of the subscription or the method of paying it. The more I study the spinning movement, the more convinced I become of the soundness of requiring and giving steady daily labour of half an hour at least at the spinning-wheel and of keeping up the present rate of subscription. Even if the 1,231 members keep up the regular supply, without fuss, without interruption, the discipline will revolutionize their lives and the subscribers will be found to be fit instruments for national service when the supreme test comes, as it must some day.

The largest number of steady workers is derived today from this body of regular spinners. The statistics I am collecting and publishing, as regularly as I can get them, must open the eyes of all unbiased thinkers to the usefulness of the only immediate remedy for the growing distress of the poor millions and to the only real link between the cultured few and the starving many. Babu Rajendra Prasad has well said in his eloquent defence of khaddar:
But people may say why should we pay this higher price? What after all is the good of reviving this dead industry? Only those can put this question who have not sufficiently realized the grinding poverty of the masses of the people of this country. All a priori economics is mute in the appalling presence of this chill penury which freezes the genial current of the soul. I will give only one figure which is a rough figure but which is none the less reliable. In 1922, we distributed no less than Rs. 26,000 by way of wages to weavers and spinners. In 1925 we paid no less than Rs. 46,000 out of which Rs. 28,000 was paid to spinners alone—spinners who could not have earned anything if they did not spin. These figures relate only to the organization under the direct control of the Congress in this province. They do not include the figures of the Gandhi Kutir whose work until recently was even more extensive than that of the Congress Khaddar Bhandar. I ask in all solemnity what other organization is there in this province which can afford to distribute over a lakh to people who would otherwise earn nothing and to whom it gives what it gives not by way of charity but as wages honestly earned? Khaddar is really a life-giving industry and to revive it is to furnish food to countless starving persons. It blesses those who give and those who receive it, as it is not mere charity, and creates in the recipient a sense of self-respect while at the same time making the distributor humble.

And what is true of Bihar is true of every province.

The A.I.S.A. is operating with over Rs. 18,00,000 throughout the whole of India. The bulk of the returns goes directly into the pockets of those who would otherwise be workless.

Let the sceptics peruse the figures. If they have better use for the money, better employment for the workless paupers, let them say so. If not, it is up to them to lend a helping hand to this great and growing movement which is as much moral and economic as it is political. Its moral and economic effect is immediate and tangible, its political effect is distant and derivable from the first two, not independent of them.

Let those who are in arrears beware! At the end of the year, they will find their names struck off, if they do not wake up and spin and send the yarn they have hitherto neglected to Spin and send. Debts of honour have priority over those enforceable in a court of law. The spinning subscription is a national debt of honour.

Young India, 26-8-1926
259. CURSE OF CHILD MARRIAGE

Mrs. Margaret E. Cousins has sent me notes of a tragic case that appears to have just occurred in Madras and has arisen out of a child marriage, the girl being 13 years and the ‘husband’ 26. Hardly had the pair lived together for 13 days when the girl died of burning. The jury have found that she committed suicide owing to the unbearable and inhuman solicitations of the so-called husband. The dying deposition of the girl would go to show that the ‘husband’ had set fire to her clothes. Passion knows no prudence, no pity.

But how the girl died is beside the point. The indisputable facts are:

1) that the girl was married when she was only 13;
2) that she had no sexual desire inasmuch as she resisted the advances of the ‘husband’;
3) that the ‘husband’ did make cruel advances;
4) and that she is now no more.

It is irreligion, not religion, to give religious sanction to a brutal custom. The smritis bristle with contradictions. The only reasonable deduction to be drawn from the contradictions is that the texts that may be contrary to known and accepted morality, more especially, to the moral precepts enjoined in the smritis themselves, must be rejected as interpolations. Inspiring verses on self-restraint could not be written at the same time and by the same pen that wrote the verses encouraging the brute in man. Only a man innocent of self-restraint and steeped in vice could call it a sin not to marry a girl before she reached the age of monthly periods. It should be held sinful to marry a girl for several years after the periods begin. There cannot be even the thought of marriage before the periods begin. A girl is no more fit to bear children on beginning the periods than a lad is to procreate as soon as he grows the first hair on his upper lip.

The custom of child marriage is a moral as well as a physical evil. For it undermines our morals and induces physical degeneration. By countenancing such customs we recede from God as well as swaraj. A man who has no thought of the tender age of a girl has none of God. And undergrown men have no capacity for fighting battles of freedom or, having gained it, of retaining it. Fight for swaraj means not mere political awakening but an all-round awakening—social, educational, moral, economic and political.
Legislation is being promoted to raise the age of consent. It may be good for bringing a minority to book. But it is not legislation that will cure a popular evil, it is enlightened public opinion that can do it. I am not opposed to legislation in such matters but I do lay greater stress on cultivation of public opinion. The Madras case would have been impossible if there had been a living public opinion against child marriages. The young man in question is not an illiterate labourer but an intelligent educated typist. It would have been impossible for him to marry or touch the girl if public opinion had been against the marriage or the consummation of the marriage of girls of tender age. Ordinarily, a girl under 18 years should never be given in marriage.

Young India, 26-8-1926

260. NOTES

PANDIT MALAVIYAJI AND THE BENGAL GOVERNMENT

The Government of Bengal may well congratulate itself upon the courage it has shown in retracing its steps and dropping the proceedings against Pandit Malaviyaji and Dr. Moonje for their civil disobedience. But one could wish that there was grace about the withdrawal of these proceedings. The Standing Counsel for the Government of Bengal made a statement which, I think, was highly offensive. There is no regret shown on behalf of the Government, no apology offered to the distinguished patriots, but, on the contrary, a veiled suggestion that there was possibly some connection between Panditji’s presence in Calcutta and the riots that took place although the Standing Counsel is obliged to admit that there was nothing offensive or provocative in Panditji’s speech on the strength of which the prohibition order was taken out. Surely, it was up to the officials who took the proceedings to see the full text of the speech before applying for an order under Section 144, especially when the order was to be against persons so well-known in public life as Pandit Malaviyaji and Dr. Moonje. If it was a private party that had acted so hastily as the Government of Bengal seem to have done in this case, that party would have rendered itself liable to an action for damages. If public opinion was well organized and strong, it could bring to book a Government that acted so rashly and recklessly as the Bengal Government have done. In the face of that proceedings is it any wonder that complaint is often heard that proceedings are often thoughtlessly, hastily, and sometimes even vindictively, taken against innocent persons in virtue of arbitrary powers taken by the Government under laws in the framing of which they have had the most part?

1 Vide “Triumph of Civil Disobedience” 12-8-1926.

‘SQUEEZING OUT’

A letter from South Africa states:

The policy of squeezing out or” civilizing labour” in all Government Departments is proceeding apace and in the Railway Department at Pietermaritzburg and Ladysmith hundreds of Indians have been given notice, in some cases of thirteen days only, to transfer to Durban or get out of the service. This is being done with people who have given 25 to 30 years to the service at one and the same place. To these poor illiterate people who have given the best part of their lives to the services, a transfer is a change to a new world and I am made to understand that in a Large number of cases they are leaving the service and getting repatriated to India.

The alternative of transfer to Durban is really no alternative to leaving the service. And those who do go to Durban must ultimately come under the ban when the ‘civilizing’ process reaches Durban. What hurts one however is not the notices but the indecent hurry with which the policy of extirpation of the Asiatic is being pursued in spite of the fact that very soon a conference is to sit to consider the question of the status of Asiatics in South Africa. But let us wait, prepare the atmosphere for the coming South African deputation and hope for the best.

THE COLOUR BAR BILL

The following letter from the Department of Mines and Industries, South Africa, to the local Indian Congress is the finish to the Colour Bar Bill:

With reference to your telegram dated the 14th instant addressed to His Excellency the Governor-General regarding the Mines and Works Act Amendment Bill, I am directed to inform you that it is the intention of the Government in due course to consider the issue of regulations to restore at all events the status quo as it existed before the Courts declared certain regulations ultra vires. This is necessary in the interests of health and safety.

There is no present intention of extending the regulations beyond the position as it existed prior to the Court’s judgment. Should any such extension be contemplated in the future every reasonable opportunity will be given to all parties in the Union interested in the matter to make representations.

In the circumstances no good purpose would appear to be served by granting the interview proposed.

It means no relief to the community except that no drastic measures are to be immediately taken. It contains no guarantee that no such steps will be taken in future. On the contrary, the community has been gently prepared for its enforcement. As I have remarked before, a bad law is bad, whether it is immediately enforced or hung like the sword of Damocles over the heads of those affected by it.

ITS AWFUL CONSEQUENCES

A correspondent sends me a long article on child marriage and enforced widowhood in Bengal. He says:

You are surely aware that the condition of Hindu society in other provinces is no better, if not worse, than that prevailing in Bengal. Early marriage and girl widowhood exist in a specially virulent form amongst the depressed classes of Hindu society. In Bengal it is very frequent amongst Dam, Chamar, Namusudra, Kaibarta (fishermen) classes. These people on the other hand form the bulk of Hindu population in Bengal. I wish I had time and opportunity to study and prepare similar figures for other provinces.

The article bristles with figures which are in the main included in the summary which I reproduced a fortnight ago from Sir Gangaram’s statistics. The following conclusions drawn by the writer are interesting and instructive:

i. It is sapping the vitality of thousands of our promising boys and girls on whom the future of our society entirely rests.

ii. It is bringing into existence every year thousands of weaklings both boys and girls—who are born of immature parenthood.

iii. It is a very fruitful source of appalling child mortality and stillbirths that now prevail in our society.

iv. It is bringing into existence thousands of girl widows every year who in their turn are a source of corruption and dangerous infection to the society.

v. It is a very important cause of the gradual and steady decline of Hindu society in point of (1) number, (2) physical strength and courage and (3) morality.

Young India, 26-8-1926

1 Vide” Enforced Widowhood”, 5-8-1926.
Lala Shamal of Hissar writes:

Some time ago I read an article by you in Young India headed “The Cobwebs of Ignorance”. In this article you said inter alia that the spinning wheel was necessary for the economic salvation of India and that therefore it was necessary that every Indian worked it either by way of sacrifice or otherwise. You also said there that it was the gateway of spiritual salvation for yourself. But why for yourself only? Let us examine this proposition in the light of two great civilizations of the earth, viz., that of the East (Aryan) and that of the West (Grecian). Excepting perhaps Kabir and Nanak, the two great rishis of India in the middle ages, who have gone much higher and have symbolized the charkha with the great force of the universe (cosmic energy, life or Prama) every rishi in India either in the middle ages or in ancient times has pointed out that the charkha was the gateway to woman’s salvation.

The Upanishads say that the Lord of Creation desiring the creation produced at first a pair—life and food—and with these two forces He created the sun and the moon as life and food respectively and so on till the whole creation was made. Man and woman were produced as life and food, respectively. These two forces united together made the whole (world). The following Vedic Mantra is recited just before homa and saptapadi: ॐ आर्य अर्जुनमयाय या अत्यतमरात्रिः देवी स्वरूपं अभी ते तत्त्वम्।

“O bride! look here, I have brought these clothes for you. These are sacred clothes made by devis (women) of my country by carding the cotton and by spinning and weaving with their own hands. Wear these with faith and get yourself entitled to perform the yajna with me. I pray that the same devis may continue to supply you with such clothes and may continue to wear them for lifelong years.

Thus according to the ancient Aryan philosophy one who has not understood the charkha cannot understand his self or the universe and cannot realize Brahman just as one who has not understood vyashti (individual) can never realize samashti (whole). Now let us see what the Western (Greek) civilization, of which Christianity and Islam are but later developments, says in this matter. Everyone knows the lines:” When Adam delved and Eve span who was then the gentleman?” According to this the duty of the husband was to till the ground and that of the wife was to spin and weave.

---

1 Dated 27-5-26; Vide “Cobwebs of Ignorance”, 16-5-1926.
Wife comes from a root meaning to weave just as the name Uma, the consort of Shiva, means in Sanskrit one who weaves. Thus the Western philosophy regarding charkha seems also to take us to the same idea as the Aryan philosophy. Now nationality is the outcome of two forces united together, viz, politics and religion. One is nothing without the other. While the former is the establishment of a spirit of equality outside, the latter is the realization of the spirit of oneness within. Economic salvation as a branch of politics can do no good unless it is joined with the other force of religion.

I wish I could say with my correspondent that the charkha is the gateway to the salvation of all. But he must recognize my limitations. I have to write as well for sceptics as for believers. The authorities and arguments addressed by Lala Shamlal will not, I fear, appeal to the sceptic. The latter will say and from his standpoint correctly, that the texts in support of the religious value of the charkha are produced from an outworn civilization. He will argue that if a rishi were to write the Vedas today, he will draw his spiritual illustrations from the steam engine or, better still, the electric motor, the wireless and the like and the rishi of the future will think nothing of wireless and even the aeroplanes. His spiritual vocabulary will with the etheric doubles and thought waves cutting through space in fractions of time denoted by specially invented words representing perhaps a thousandth part of a second. The spiritual value of the charkha can only appeal to those who believe with me that this civilization denoted by all insane rush after destroying the limitations of space imposed upon man by nature are coming to an end, even as possibly mightier civilizations based upon attempts to find happiness in multiplicity of material pursuits and comforts have perished. If Lala Shamlal takes the spiritual message of the charkha to the villages, he will not need my authority. For, I have derived mine from them.

Young India, 26-8-1926

262. LETTER TO ALI HASAN

The Ashram,
Sabarmati,
August 26, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. Of course, I remember you well and your hospitality. I must, however, confess that I do not at all like your manifesto. You have made communalism as the pivot of your appeal and you are looking to the Hindu voters to vote for you not because of your superior ability and other qualifications but solely on the ground of your being a Mussalman. I feel that you have struck the wrong note. If you had, on the contrary, recited your better qualifications, if you claim them, and added the hope that your being a Mussalman will not be regarded as a disqualification by the Hindu voters, from my point of view, your manifesto would have been unexceptionable. As it is on the merits, I am obliged to give you a hostile opinion. But in any case, even if your manifesto had been unexceptionable, being an avowed non-co-operator, I cannot have given you anything whatsoever by way of endorsement for publication.

Yours sincerely,

ALI HASSAN, ESQ.
BARRISTER-AT-LAW
BANK ROAD
PATNA

From a microfilm: S. N. 11083

263. LETTER TO R. A. ADAMS

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 26, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I waited all these days for actually receiving the parcel of the Bible copies¹ before acknowledging your letter which I received duly last week. The parcel has not yet come forward and the students will have probably to be without their copy even next Saturday. I now see that you have sent the parcel by goods [train] and the goods parcels sometimes take even as much as a month. When the parcel comes, I shall take care of the extra seven copies.

Yours sincerely,

R. A. ADAMS, ESQ.,
SECRETARY
BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY
(BOMBAY AUXILIARY)
166-170, HORNBY ROAD
BOMBAY

From a microfilm: S.N. 10987

¹ Vide” Letter to R. A. Adams”, 18-8-1926
264. LETTER TO TULSI MAHER

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Friday, Sravana Krishna 4, August 27, 1926

BHAISHRI MARICHI,

I got your letter. You may have been satisfied with your stay in the Ashram, but I was not. I cannot bear the thought that anyone staying here as a guest should fall ill. If I had known [about your illness] earlier, I would have taken all measures which would have satisfied me at any rate. I believe that we should be able to adjust ourselves to any climate. I had assumed that you would be able to do so. Now I will see what I can do when you are here again.

What you write about the spinning-wheel is quite correct. The reasons for the movement deserve to be closely examined.

SHRI MARICHI
SYT. H. P. MORRIS
61, COWASJI PATEL ROAD
FORT
BOMBAY

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12260
266. LETTER TO NANABHAI BHATT

THE ASHRAM,

Friday, Sravana Vad 4, August 27, 1926

BHAISHRI NANABHAI,

I have gone through the text-books. I think I read Madhpudo1 with sufficient care. I had hoped that I would find myself interested and absorbed while reading these books, but I was not. I felt like criticizing all the time. When I came to the lesson on Ali, I became serious. I felt that it might be a fine piece of writing, but as it is it would certainly not please Muslims. I think that many of the lessons require to be reconsidered and revised. If you wish, we will discuss this further when we meet. My view may possibly be wrong. There may be some other point of view from which the very same book may be interesting. I can today read with interest the Upanishads which formerly used to send me to sleep. The principal writers are all of them experienced men. I feel unhappy why, even then, I do not appreciate the lessons. All the same, I must say, must not I, what I feel?

BAPU

SHRI DAKSHINAMOORTI BHAVAN

BHAVNAGAR

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19945; also 12261

267. LETTER TO JAGJIVANDAS NARANDAS MEHTA

ASHRAM, SABARMATI,

Shravan Vad 4, Friday [August 27, 1926]2

BHAISHRI JAGJIVANDAS,

I have your letter. I am enclosing herewith three drafts for the sums of Rs. 400/-, Rs. 300/-, and Rs. 300/-, totalling Rs. 1000/-. It seems to me that Trivenibehn has got to put up with the loss of

1 Manuscript magazine of the national school at Sabarmati Ashram
2 The year has been inferred from the contents. In 1926 Shravan Vad 4 corresponded to August 27.
interest. The following books can be useful to some extent in the matter of the municipality. . . .

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 10606

268. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

Friday [August 27, 1926] 2

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have your telegram and letter. There is no question of my being hurt because you have said no. My duty was to ask you and your duty was to say no under the conditions obtaining there.

Pattani Saheb came yesterday. I have requested him to make his bungalow available. If no other bungalow is available we shall take his. I shall see whether or not he will take rent. I told him that if no other bungalow was available we intended to have his bungalow as there was no other alternative. I asked him frankly whether or not he would take rent. He said he would like to take rent as otherwise the place could not be maintained.

Blessings from

BAPU

SJT. MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI
HOMI VILLA
PANCHGANI

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

269. LETTER TO G. SITARAM SASTRY

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 28, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your long letter. It makes painful reading. If the workers do not respond to you (as according to your letter evidently they do

1 The letter is incomplete; vide” Letter to jagjivandas Narandas Mehta”, 12-6-1926.
2 From the postmark
not), is it any use in continuing the agency? What is the use of shutting our eyes to facts? And, if the workers will not respond to you or Deshbhakta Venkatappayya, does it also not follow that they will respond to nobody? It seems to me that in the circumstances it will be as well to close the agency. But, that does not mean stopping all organized khadi work in Andhra Desh. But it does mean recognizing the truth of the situation and bowing to it. You will then gather together those few workers, if there are any, who will be absolutely loyal to you and you will develop khadi with their aid. Independent organizations will still continue and they may do what they like. By being thus truthful and recognizing our limitations, we shall be able some day to overcome them and expand as we ought to.

This is my own personal opinion given without reference to the Council. First of all, I would like to know your own views before taking any action through the All-India Spinners’ Association.

Yours sincerely,

SITARAM SASTRY,

ALL-INDIA SPINNERS’ ASSOCIATION

(ANDHRA BRANCH)

GUNTUR

From a microfilm: S.N. 11232

270. LETTER TO AVADHNANDAN

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

August 28, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I think you are taking an unduly pessimistic view about Hindi Prachar work. Those who are actually doing the teaching work should continue to perform their duty in full confidence that duty heartily and self-sacrificingly performed must bear ample fruit in due course.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

From a microfilm: S.N. 11297
271. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 29, 1926

DEAR SATIS BABU,

Here is another letter of the type I sent you before.

Mr. Bharucha has told me all about you. He wanted me to send you some money. I wish I could do so. But it is not possible.

Mr. Birla has offered to loan Rs. 70,000 for one year certainly without interest and without security to the Association. But, I feel that unless we have a reserve in the Association coffers or at least that amount, we must not make use of the loan. We considered the matter yesterday in the Council and others also agreed. Have you any opinion about this?

I hope both you and Hemaprabha Devi are doing quite all right.

Yours,

SJT. SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA
KHADI PRATISHTHAN
170, BOW BAZAAR STREET
CALCUTTA

From a microfilm: S. N. 11234

272. LETTER TO REHANA TYABJI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
August 29, 1926

MY DEAR REHANA,

I have now secured both your letter and postcard. Both the letter and the postcard I got only yesterday. You have addressed the postcard at Ahmedabad. So it came redirected from Ahmedabad a day late. The letter remained on the office board for some time as unclaimed because of the Urdu writing on the envelope which nobody understood. You wrote my name in English but the receiver thought that the Urdu name belonged to someone else in the Ashram. It was only on a searching enquiry that the letter was traced on the office board outside. Of course, the moral of it is that every one of us should know both Devnagari and Persian scripts. Till then, these mistakes and delays will continue.

I shall now deal with Sir Henry Lawrence directly and send him the information he requires.¹

The battle over China silk has now to be postponed to another day when all of you come again to the Ashram. You should understand that I did not have enough of your bhajans when you were here. You have, therefore, to come, if for nothing else, for giving me more bhajans. You must become better and stronger. Mirabai has told me all about your conversation with her. You shall certainly come and stay as long as you can and as often as you like. If you will only make yourself at home here and express all your needs every endeavour will be made to supply them.

Yours sincerely,

BAPU

MISS REHANA TYABJI
CAMP, BARODA

From a photostat: S.N. 9601

273. LETTER TO MRS. STANLEY JONES

THE ASHRAM, SABARAMATI,
August 29, 1926

DEAR FRIEND²,

I have your letter. I shall try to write out the pamphlet you want³. But you will forgive me if I take time over it.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

From a photostat : C. W. 11341. Courtesy : Mrs. Eunice Jones Mathew

¹ Vide” Letter to Rehana Tyabji”, 21-8-1926

² Wife of Rev. E. Stanley Jones, American missionary, author of The Christ of the Indian Road, etc.

³ Vide also” Letter to Rev. Stanley Jones”, 22-5-1927.
274. LETTER TO SHAMBHUSHANKER

THE ASHRAM,
Monday, August 30, 1926

BHAI SHAMBHUSHANKER,

I have your letter.

Your diet should contain some greens. You should grow them in your own backyard. Pickles are not at all necessary, but may be somewhat useful in summer as a method of preserving greens. If they are to be harmless, they should contain no mustard or chillies or oil. Vinegar can be used as a preservative in pickles.

I have not altered the views expressed in my book¹; but, not being able to think of a substitute for milk in our country, I have been forced to include it. I have also observed that the oils available here do not suit delicate stomachs, and, therefore, I generally advise people to avoid them. Salt is not essential. In fact, from the point of view of brahmacharya giving up salt is beneficial. As a medicine, it has many uses. When I fast I always mix some salt in the water which I drink.

Whey made from mildly fermented curds is quite all right as a substitute for milk. There is no harm in removing all the butter from the whey. On the contrary, it helps.

About the quantity or food no absolute standard can be laid down. Everyone should fix his own standard on the basis of his experience. Wheat, mill, one green and a lemon—nothing else is required. The sugar present in wheat and milk is enough for our purpose.

I think this covers all your questions. Till you have recovered complete strength and get normal motions, live only on milk and grapes or whey and grapes. After the fast is ended it is necessary in every case to have an enema to ensure bowel movement. If you do not start getting normal motions in two or three days, you should take a little castor oil.

Blessings from
BAPU

KHADI KARYALAYA
GARIYADHAR
KATHIAWAR

275. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

Monday [August 30, 1926]

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have your letter. We knew what Dr. Jivraj would recommend. I have already written to you that I have talked to Pattani Saheb about the bungalow to be given to you. I think we shall get the bungalow.

Blessings from

BAPU

[PS.]

I wrote Rohit not in joke but by mistake. Somehow I had a notion that because of Taramati you had named the child Rohit. Let him have both the names.

SIT. MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

HOMI VILLA

PANCHGANI

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

276. LETTER TO SURESH CHANDRA BANERJI

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

September 1, 1926

DEAR SURESH BABU,

I have your letter. Mr. Birla has now altered his mind and he has written to me saying that he is prepared to advance money without interest for one year on the undertaking of the Association to return the loan on the due date. This has placed me in a difficulty because that means that the Association should take such securities as are enforceable and absolutely adequate. My own intention, therefore, is

1 From the postmark
2 Acknowledging on August 28 Gandhiji’s letter of August 21, Banerji had written that he did not meet Birla in Calcutta but hoped that the latter would agree to advance the loan free of interest, or else they would have to mortgage their stock to the Comilla Union Bank (S. N. 11233).
not to make use of Mr. Birla’s offer. If at the end of the year, you must borrow from the bank to refund his loan, is it worth while going to the trouble of finding securities for one year, if the same ceremony is to be performed at the end of one year? After all, you will save only Rs. 1,800/- in one year. And my advice, therefore, is not to trouble about this loan and do what you like with the bank. But, if you insist upon making use of Mr. Birla’s money, please let me know whose guarantees are to be, and what their status is.

Yours sincerely,

SURESH CHANDRA BANERJI
KHADDAR DEPT.
ABHOY ASHRAM
COMILLA

From a microfilm: S.N. 11235

277. LETTER TO S. E. STOKES

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 1, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I quite appreciate the difficulty in your taking Miss Haussding. She has now gone to Mussoorie. She will be there for some time with Devdas.

Of course, I am longing to be with you and pass even if it is only for a few days. When that time will come I do not know. I am watching with considerable interest your experiment amongst the hill folks.

With love to you all.

Yours sincerely,

S. E. STOKES, ESQ.
KOTGARH
SIMLA HILLS

From a photostat: S.N. 19679
278. LETTER TO B. S. T. SWAMI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 1, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. It is hardly necessary for one to come to Sabarmati to lead a pure and simple life. Everyone can do that in his own home, thus, you can certainly refuse to marry, you need not eat any but the simplest food, you can cultivate the habit of retiring to bed early and getting up early in the morning and beginning the day with thanksgiving to the Almighty. You are already treating the untouchables as your very own. You can join a Hindi class there conducted by the Hindi Prachar office in Triplicane and you can certainly learn how to spin and adopt khaddar for your dress. No great effort is required to practise truth and charity in thought, word and deed.

Yours sincerely,

B. S. T. SWAMI
3/7 CAR STREET
TRIPLICANE
MADRAS

From a microfilm: S.N. 19680

279. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

September 1, 1926

BHAISHRI GHANSHYAMDASJI,

I have your letter. I have also read the reply sent by your secretary. You need do nothing more. Have you improved in health? Jamnalalji is here at present.

Yours,

MOHANDAS

SIT. GHANSHYAMDASJI BIRLA
PILANI
RAJPUTANA

From the Hindi original: C.W. 6134. Courtesy: G. D. Birla
280. TELEGRAM TO HARIHAR SHARMA

[On or after September 1, 1926]

Sammelan ready. Come here about Tuesday. Are you free.

From a microfilm S.N. 11298

281. NOTES

A GREAT INDUSTRIALIST

The death of Mr. Ratan Tata removes from our midst a great industrialist. Jamshedpur is the greatest Indian enterprise of the greatest Indian firm. The late Mr. Ratan Tata was a noted member of the great house of the Tatas. I had the honour of coming in close contact with him when he invited me to visit Jamshedpur in connection with some trouble with his employees. It was an agreeable surprise to me to find him full of sympathy for his employees and ready to concede everything that could be legitimately urged on their behalf. He created in my mind the impression of being a just and generous employer. His solicitude for the prosperity of the industry seemed to me to be independent of the added wealth it might bring to the distinguished house. I tender my condolences to the members of the deceased’s family.

WHY OBLIGED?

A correspondent justifying the weakness of his yarn says:” We are obliged to buy waste cotton in the market at almost the same price as good cotton.” Why obliged? Surely, if good cotton is not available at a particular place, it should be procured from places where it is available. Bengal, Bihar and Orissa get their good cotton from Wardha. Manchester gets its supplies from India, Uganda, Egypt and America. Why cannot the correspondent get his from a neighbouring district or province? There is no excuse for members of the All-India Spinners’ Association to spin bad yarn. An English proverb has it that things that are worth doing are worth doing well. Love of khadi must not be exhausted with the mere spinning. It is but a stepping-stone to the mastery of the art and of its economics.

RECRUITING EVIL

A correspondent from Sirsi (Canara) writes:

1 This was in reply to the telegram dated September 1, reading:” Reaching about Tuesday wire Harihar Sharma your convenience.”
An agent of the Assam Tea Planters intends to start a depot to canvass coolies for the plantation. He does not want Mussalman coolies for they are not obedient. He wants only Hindus who are docile. He offers Rs. 15 for every coolie registered. Is it not possible to stop the evil? There are so many misrepresentations.

The evil is no doubt great. Assam is not a depopulated place. There is something wrong if labourers have to be taken all the way from Canara to Assam. It is impossible for the simple Canarese villagers to know the conditions in the Assam plantations. Freedom of contract is lost as soon as a tout intervenes whose business it is to get labour somehow or other. Let all the Canarese go to Assam if they wish and if they are not to displace the Assamese. But in the present case, if the facts be as stated by the correspondent, there can be no question of wish on the part of the Canarese and no outsider can go to Assam without displacing an Assamese. Tea plantations of Assam must be worked, if they are at all worked, by indigenous labour so long as there are poor people in Assam who are without employment.

My correspondent asks me to suggest remedies to avert the evil of recruiting. Public opinion is the most effective remedy. Let the correspondent collect sufficient workers who will make it their business during their spare hours to visit the neighbouring villages and warn the villagers against falling into traps laid for them. Someone among these workers should try to study conditions of labour in Assam either by a personal visit or from literature published on the subject.

“THE ORDER OF HINDU-MUSLIM UNITY”

Begum Mohamed Zahiuddin Meccai recently delivered an address before the Women’s Sarda Association at Bangalore. A correspondent has favoured me with a copy of her interesting speech from which I take the following:¹

The sentiments are admirable but there seems to be no atmosphere for the formation of the Order suggested by the worthy lady.

Young India, 2-9-1926

¹ The extract, not reproduced here, reported the speaker’s remarks that service in the cause of Hindu-Muslim unity was the most sacred form of social service, that God of the Hindus and the Muslims was one, that it was ‘foolish, if not mad’ for Hindus and Muslims to fight and called for the setting up of the ‘Sacred Order of Hindu-Muslim Unity’, the members of which would work to save people of the rival communities during trouble.
282. NATIONAL SCHOOLS

A Sholapur correspondent informs me that a translation has appeared in the press of an article I wrote in Navajivan (8th August last). It is said to attribute to me the opinion that I know of no school which fulfils the requirements of the definition of national educational institutions given by the Congress at Belgaum. He adds that the translation is likely to damage even bona-fide national schools if it goes unchallenged. I am sorry I have not seen the translation. But I know that I have never given the opinion attributed to me. On the contrary, I do know some national schools that do fulfil the requirements.

I give below a translation of the paragraph referred to by the correspondent:

Therefore where either the parents or the teachers are opposed to the national ideal, the school should certainly be closed. Where the parents are fired by national ideals and prove their adhesion by giving adequate donations for the support of national schools, and, where the teachers being themselves believers in the national ideal are ceaselessly striving to enforce it, I can understand a relaxation of the discipline if the scholars are lukewarm about the ideal. In such a case, it may be necessary to continue the school. For we may hope some day to influence the scholars. But at the time of writing these lines, I can think of no such school.

In my opinion, the last sentence is clear and unequivocal. ‘Such school’ manifestly refers to schools that may have believing parents and teachers and lukewarm pupils. Even at the moment of writing this note, I can recall no such school. But if there is a national school where, in spite of teachers’ efforts and parents’ concrete concurrence, in the shape of donations, the scholars do not carry out the ideal, my advice would be, as it is according to the paragraph quoted, not to close such a school, but to continue it for further effort. The same idea is amplified in the succeeding paragraph which therefore will bear translation. It is:

My own experience is that where the national ideal is found dormant, the fault lies at the door of teachers. The instance quoted is that of a school where the teachers are enthusiastic, the pupils indifferent and the parents hostile, Where parents object to their children learning hand-spinning and

---

1 Vide "National Schools", 8-8-1926.
weaving khadi, and threaten to withdraw their children if ‘untouchable’ children are admitted, it is inconsistent with his self-respect for a teacher to hold on to the institution and persist in conducting it in the teeth of opposition from parents. It would be a waste of national time. If we conduct national institutions in spite of the opposition of parents interested in them, we should be guilty of the same fault we impute to the missionaries. We have no right to give instruction to children against the wish of their parents and thus create family dissensions. Those who are over 16 years and who understand their interest, who are capable of suffering hardship, are not in need of protection. They are self-reliant. For such, wherever necessary, we should open and undoubtedly conduct educational institutions. But, where and how many are such students throughout India? Where are the schools in which there are students who can be likened to godly, fearless, long-suffering and yet wise and respectful Prahlad? When we have numerous scholars of that description, we shall see new life everywhere and no one will want to know where is swaraj. And, in order to bring into being such scholars, we need to conduct purest national schools even though there may be only very few scholars in them. Where parents become patrons, scholars lord it over the teachers, and where the threat is held out directly or indirectly that if Congress assistance is not rendered the school will go under Government protection, there is no national school and the sooner such a school is closed the better. We understand now what non-co-operation is. We are in a position to appraise its value. We know its dangers. And, therefore, the way of non-co-operating schools is clear. Let us not deceive ourselves. Let us remain unmoved by ups and downs and let us who have faith continue our work and all will be well.

Young India, 2-9-1926

283. WIDOW REMARRIAGE

A correspondent pertinently asks whether Sir Ganga Ram’s statistics regarding Hindu widows refer to all Hindu widows or only to those whom custom prohibits from marrying. On referring the

1 The Gujarati original in Navajivan, 8-8-1926, however, has “wearing”.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
inquiry to Sir Ganga Ram, I learn that his” statistics are not confined to classes in which widow remarriage is prohibited, they contain Hindu widows of all classes”. Sir Ganga Ram adds:

Moreover, it was no good to give figures of such classes only. We all know that Mussalmans and Christians can remarry, yet there are widows amongst them who will remarry sooner or later. It is the ban on Hindu widows which I wish to remove. I don’t want to force every widow to remarry.

This is no doubt good. But the ban in Hinduism is confined only to the classes which come within the prohibited zone. Outside the zone Hindu widows marry almost as freely as Mussalman and Christian widows, though to be fair to the latter, it must be mentioned that all Mussalman and Christian widows do not remarry ‘sooner or later’. There are many who do not from choice. There is no doubt, however, that a tendency exists even outside the prohibited zone to slavishly copy the so-called higher classes and to keep young widows unmarried. But so long as we have not fuller statistics, it is not possible accurately to gauge the magnitude of the evil wrought by the custom of prohibiting widows from remarrying. It is to be hoped that Sir Ganga Ram’s and other associations that have specialized in this matter will collect and publish the required statistics. It should be possible to know the number of Hindu widows, say under twenty years, among the prohibited classes.

Let not my correspondent whose question was prompted probably by a desire to justify the ban and those who think with him disregard the evil of young widows being prohibited from marrying. If there be even one child widow, the wrong demands redress.

Young India, 2-9-1926

284. CRIME OF READING BIBLE

Several correspondents have written to me taking me to task for reading the New Testament to the students of the Gujarat National College. One of them asks:

Will you please say why you are reading the Bible to the students of the Gujarat National College? Is there nothing useful in our literature? Is the Gita less to you than the Bible? You are never tired of saying that you are a staunch Sanatani Hindu. Have you not now been found out as a Christian in secret? You may say a man does not become a Christian by reading the Bible. But is not reading the Bible to the boys a way of converting them to Christianity? Can the boys remain uninfluenced by the Bible reading? Are they not likely to become Christians by reading the Bible? What is there specially in the Bible that is not to be found in our sacred books? I do hope you will give an adequate reply and give preference to the Vedas over the Bible.

I am afraid I cannot comply with the last request of my correspondent. I must give preference to that which the boys lawfully want over what I or others may desire. When they invited me to give them an hour per week, I gave them the choice between reading the Gita, Tulsidas’s Ramayana, and answering questions. By a majority of votes, they decided to have the New Testament and questions and answers. In my opinion, the boys were entitled to make that choice. They have every right to read the Bible or to have it read to them. I offered to read the Gita or the Ramayana as I am reading both at the Ashram to the inmates and as therefore the reading of either at the National College would have involved the least strain and the least preparation. But the boys of the College probably thought they could read the other books through others but they would have from me my interpretation of the New Testament as they knew that I had made a fair study of it.

I hold that it is the duty of every cultured man or woman to read sympathetically the scriptures of the world. If we are to respect others religions as we would have them to respect our own, a friendly study of the world’s religions is a sacred duty. We need not dread, upon our grown-up children, the influence of scriptures other than our own. We liberalize their outlook upon life by encouraging them to study freely all that is clean. Fear there would be when someone reads his own scriptures to young people with the intention secretly or openly of converting them. He must then be biased in favour of his own scriptures. For myself, I regard my study of and reverence for the Bible, the Koran, and the other scriptures to be wholly consistent with my claim to be a staunch sanatani Hindu. He is no sanatani Hindu who is narrow, bigotted, and considers evil to be good if it has the sanction of antiquity and is to be found supported in any Sanskrit book. I claim to be a staunch sanatani Hindu because, though I reject all that offends my moral sense, I find the Hindu scriptures to satisfy the needs of the soul. My respectful study of other religions has not abated my reverence for or my faith in the Hindu scriptures. They have indeed left their deep mark upon my understanding of the Hindu scriptures. They have broadened my view of life. They have enabled me to understand more clearly many an obscure passage in the Hindu scriptures.

The charge of being a Christian in secret is not new. It is both a libel and a compliment—a libel because there are men who can believe me to be capable of being secretly anything, i.e., for fear of being that openly. There is nothing in the world that would keep me from professing Christianity or any other faith the moment I felt the truth of and the need for it. Where there is fear there is no religion. The charge is a compliment in that it is a reluctant acknowledgment of my capacity for appreciating the beauties of Christianity. Let me own this. If I could call myself, say, a Christian, or a Mussalman, with my own interpretation of the Bible or the Koran, I should not hesitate to call myself either. For then Hindu, Christian and Mussalman would be synonymous terms. I do believe that in the other world there are neither Hindus, nor Christians, nor Mussalmans. There all are judged not according to their labels or professions but according to their actions irrespective of their professions. During our earthly existence there will always be these labels. I therefore prefer to retain the label of my forefathers so long as it does not cramp my growth and does not debar me from assimilating all that is good anywhere else.

The hypersensitiveness that my correspondents have betrayed is but an indication of the intensity of the wave of intoleration that is swooping through this unhappy land. Let those who can, remain unmoved by it.

Young India, 2-9-1926

285. A HEROIC SACRIFICE

A Travancore correspondent sends me the following story of noble self-sacrifice that has come under his observation:

I tender my congratulations to Kannad Krishna Aiyer for his noble sacrifice. He reminds one of the heroes of the days of the Mahabharata who thought nothing of putting their lives in peril for the love of humanity.

Young India, 2-9-1926

286. CONSERVATION OF VITAL ENERGY

Readers of Young India will excuse me for discussing in public delicate problems I would fain discuss only in private. But the literature I have felt compelled to glance through and the copious correspondence my review of M. Bureau’s book has given rise to demand a public discussion of a question which is of paramount interest to society. A Malabar correspondent writes:

1 Not reproduced here. The correspondent had narrated how a person, who had been influenced by non-co-operation, gave his flesh in a surgical operation to save a man who had been badly injured by a fall from an elephant who had run amuck.

In your review of Monsieur Bureau’s book it is stated that there is no case on record of celibacy or long abstention producing any evil effects on us. In my own case, however, three weeks seem to be the utmost limit of beneficial abstention. At the end of that period I usually feel a heaviness of body, a restlessness both of body and mind, leading to bad temper. Relief is obtained either by normal coitus or nature herself coming to the rescue by an involuntary discharge. Far from feeling weak or nervous, I become the next morning calm and light and am able to proceed to my work with added gusto.

A friend of mine, however, developed distinctly injurious symptoms by abstention. He is about 32 years of age, a strict vegetarian and a very religious person. He is absolutely free from any vicious habits of body or mind. Yet he was having till two years ago, when he married, copious discharges at night followed by weakness of body and depression of spirits. Lately he developed excruciating pain in the abdominal region. On the advice of an Ayurvedic doctor he married and is now cured.

I am intellectually convinced of the superiority of celibacy on which all our ancient Shastras agree. But the experiences I have quoted above make it clear that we are not able to absorb in our system the highly vital secretion of the testes which consequently becomes a toxic product. I humbly request you, therefore, to publish, for the benefit of people like me who have no doubt as to the importance of chastity and abstention, in Young India, any device, such as the asanas of Hatha Yoga, which will enable us to assimilate and absorb the vital product in our system.

The instances quoted by the correspondent are typical. In several such cases I have observed hasty generalizations from insufficient data. Ability to retain and assimilate the vital fluid is a matter of long training. It must be so, as it gives a strength to body and mind such as no other process does with equal effect. Drugs and mechanical contrivances may keep the body in a tolerable condition but they sap the mind and make it too weak to resist the play of a multitude of passions which like so many deadly foes surround every human being.

Too often do we expect results in spite of practices which are calculated to retard, if not to defeat, them. The common mode of life is shaped to minister to our passions. Our food, our literature, amusements, our business hours are all regulated so as to excite and feed our animal passions. The vast majority of us want to marry, to have children and generally to enjoy ourselves, be it ever so moderately. It will be so more or less to the end of time.

But there are, as there always have been, exceptions to the general rule. Men have wanted to live a life wholly dedicated to the service of humanity which is the same thing as saying ‘to God’. They will not divide their time between the rearing of a special family and the tending of the general human family. Necessarily, such men and women cannot afford to live the general life which is designed to promote the special, individual interest. Those who will be celibates for the sake of God need to renounce the laxities of life and find their enjoyment in its austere rigours. They may be ‘in the world’ but not ‘of it’. Their food, their business, their hours of business, their recreations, their literature, their outlook upon life must, therefore, be different from the general.

It is now time to inquire whether the correspondent and his friend desired to live the life of complete abstention and whether they modelled it accordingly. If not, it is not difficult to understand the relief that the relaxation brought in the first case and the weakness that supervened in the second case. Marriage no doubt was the remedy in that second case, as in the vast majority of cases marriage is the most natural and desirable state when one finds oneself even against one’s will living the married life in one’s daily thought. The potency of thought unsuppressed but unembodied is far greater than that of thought embodied, that is, translated into action. And, when the action is brought under due control, it reacts upon and regulates the thought itself. Thought thus translated into action becomes a prisoner and is brought under subjection. Thus considered, marriage too is a mode of restraint.

I must not undertake in the course of a newspaper article to give detailed instructions for the guidance of those who desire to live a life of ordered restraint. I must refer them to my Guide to Health written years ago with that end in view. It does need revision in certain parts in the light of fresh experiences, but there is nothing in the book which I would withdraw. General directions, however, may be safely reiterated here:

1 This was based on a series of articles published in 1913 under the title”General Knowledge about Health”.
1. Eat moderately always leaving the dining-room with a feeling of pleasant hunger.

2. Highly spiced and fatty vegetarian foods must be avoided. Separate fat is wholly unnecessary when an adequate supply of milk is available. Little food suffices when there is little vital waste.

3. Both the body and the mind must be constantly occupied in clean pursuits.

4. Early to bed and early to rise is a necessity.

5. Above all a life of restraint presupposes an intense living desire for reunion with God. When there is heart perception of this central fact, there will be continuously increasing reliance upon God to keep His instrument pure and in order. The Gita says:”Passions return again and again in spite of fasting but even the desire ceases when the Divine is seen.” This is literally true.

The correspondent refers to asana and pranayama. I believe that they have an important place in the practice of restraint. But my own experiences in this direction, I am sorry to say, are not worth recording. There is, to my knowledge, little literature on the subject that is based on present experience. But it is a field worthy of exploration. I would, however, warn the inexperienced reader from trying it or accepting the directions of the next Hatha Yogi he may meet with. Let him be sure that an abstemious and godly life is wholly sufficient to achieve the much to be desired restraint.

Young India, 2-9-1926

287. LETTER TO PRABHUDAS BHIKHABHAI

September 2, 1926

BHAISHRI PRABHUDAS,

I have your letter. You may rest assured that I do not belittle pranayama. But what can be achieved through pranayama can also be achieved through other means and, therefore, I do not look upon it as indispensable. While pranayama is extremely difficult to master, other means can be easily cultivated by all men, and I think it is more beneficial to employ them particularly in this age. Pranayama may help in observing celibacy, but I am afraid that by itself it does not

---

1 Bhagavad Gita, II, 59
2 Breath-control, a technique in yoga dry up our pleasure in objects of sense. This is the main point. You yourself have been practising pranayama. When you have achieved good success in it, come and discuss the matter with me again. I should certainly like to know persons who have succeeded in the practice of pranayama. Kakasaheb Kalelkar, who is an inmate of the Ashram but who lives elsewhere at present because of his illness, has had good practice in pranayama. After he has recovered his health, please do correspond with him or see him when you are here. He will be back here, most probably by the time of Diwali. I do not give his address, since it is essential that his correspondence should be severely restricted at present. Then there is Vinoba who lives in Wardha. His address is: Satyagraha Ashram, Wardha. You may certainly write to him. You will probably hear what his experience has been.

RAI PRABHUDAS BHIKHABHAI
AT & P.O. KATHANA LOT
Via NADIAD

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12262

288. LETTER TO SWAMI RAGHAVANANDA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 3, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter.¹ I suppose by conquest of sleep you mean its regulation and not complete giving up of sleep. For myself, I take and need at least six hours’ sleep during 24 hours. It is true that I take my sleep very lightly. But, if I do not take this minimum quantity, both body and mind suffer. Complete eradication of sex desire I hold to be a possibility and an advantage. Complete cessation of sleep I do not ¹Swami Raghavananda in his letter of July 24 (S.N. 10782) had stated that he was familiar with Gandhiji’s ideas on ‘self-conquest’ and ‘conquest of the sense of taste and sex desire’, but that he wanted to know Gandhiji’s views on ‘conquest of sleep’, having heard that he was a ‘spare sleeper’ and one who could, on waking at will, attend to worship or to writing.

regard as possible or desirable. Control over sleep is attained by light diet and freedom from exhausting physical exertion.

Yours sincerely,

SWAMI RAGHAVANANDA
VEDANTA SOCIETY
24 WEST, 71ST STREET
NEW YORK CITY
(U. S. A)

From a photostat: S.N. 10807

289. LETTER TO NORMAN LEYS

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 3, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your latest letter¹. You may certainly share all my letters with any friend you like subject to the proviso that they do not find their way to the Press. Not that I mind it, but it can do no good whatsoever and may possibly do harm to the cause both you and I are trying to serve.

I do not share your fear that the Mussalmans will fight any just solution. It will, however, very largely depend upon Hindu prudence, Hindu moderation and absolute fairplay. Why do you say that Islam and democracy are incompatible? On the contrary, were not the early Califs among the most democratic sovereigns the world has ever seen?
But a clash of arms will not move me. Any real movement for freedom is like new birth and all its attendant travail. If we have to go through a purgatory, we must face it for the priceless boon. As a matter of fact, that clash is now taking place on a miniature scale and it may be found to be sufficient for teaching wisdom to both the parties. Already innocent blood has been spilt by the gallon.

By preference in education, I mean every backward section should be specially encouraged by special grants of scholarships. It would be the inevitable duty of the state, if it is to represent all classes, to begin with the weakest. To spend freely upon the real education of the backward classes will be ultimately to provide the safest cure for discontent. I know that the present discontent on the part of either side comes from consciousness of weakness. Hindus feel their weakness in physical strength and endurance. Mussalmans feel their weakness in education and earthly possessions. So, I look upon the present feud between the two as a healthy sign in a way. It is really unconsciously a battle for freedom. It was possible for them to have avoided this if they could have assimilated the programme of 1920. But the energy and the national consciousness that were called into being in 1920 could not possibly remain dormant and, as they could not find their way in a healthy channel, they have taken the unhealthy course of internecine bloody feud. I have not a shadow of doubt that, at the end of it, we shall feel stronger and purer because there are people who do not want this feud, who believe in non-violence as the final rock and who have not lost their heads during the turmoil.

¹ Vide Appendix”Letter from Norman Leys”, 9-8-1926.

The fear expressed by you in your final paragraph is certainly not groundless. But is it any wonder our administrative limb has atrophied? Many mount the clerical posts—they are nothing more—through flattery and the like. It would be therefore no wonder to me if, in the beginning stages of the experiment, we choose wrong men to represent us. In that case, history would be merely repeating itself. But even that should not frighten a reformer. You cannot wrap yourself in cotton wool and fight freedom’s battle. Nor need the spectre of the I.C.S. men refusing to work frighten one. But, in spite of my strong indictment of the I.C.S. men, I have sufficient faith in their good nature as men having the upper hand when the demoralizing artificial prestige and protection these estimable men enjoy have been removed.¹

Always at your service,

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

DR. NORMAN LEYS
BRAILSFORD
NEAR DERBY

From a photostat: S.N. 12171

¹ Dr. Norman Leys replied to the letter on September 20; vide "Letter from Norman Leys", 20-9-1926.
290. LETTER TO DEVDAS GANDHI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Saturday, Sravana Vad 13, September 4, 1926

CHI. DEVDAS.

I have your letter. The description of “sparrow” is very good. I would let him know nothing about the things you mention. You have, however, put me on my guard and so there need be no fear. He has the weakness which you mention, but it will soon pass. His virtues are enduring. He is full of compassion and good-natured beyond measure. Intolerance is a form of pride. But these weaknesses seem trivial beside his virtues. Since he is under your charge, I do not worry. I am sure you have seen his letter to me. It is beautiful.

I remember to have written one letter to the Maharaja of Nabha. But now I will reply to his letter, and will send you a copy of the reply. The parcel containing spindles, etc., was dispatched to you on August 9. It was registered. It is strange that you have not received it. I have asked them to make inquiries at this end. Please inquire there, too.

I am not losing weight at such a rate. It stands at about 99. I believe I am in very good health. There must be many rulers worse than the Maharaja of Nabha. I believe that there are some. To be sure his oppression was not a little. I believe, however, that the Government did not depose him for his faults though. I also believe that it would not have been able to do so if he had been free from them. I have nothing else against him; only, I cannot support and help him in his agitation.

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12263

291. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

Saturday [September 4, 1926]

CHI. MATHURADAS.

I have your letter. I am inquiring about Pattani Saheb’s bungalow. I am hoping to get it if it has not been given to [the Thakore

\[1\] From the postmark
Saheb of] Limbdi. I think it will be all right if we have it up to the end of February. At the approach of the season it can be vacated.

Blessings from
BAPU

SIT. MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI
HOMI VILLA
PANCHGANI

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

292. LETTER TO MOTILAL ROY

September 5, 1926

DEAR MOTI BABU,

I have your letter and report.
It is surprising how troubles after troubles overcome you.
I am asking the manager to book the Sangha for a complimentary copy of Young India.
I do hope that your yarn will improve in quality. You know that we have now introduced the practice of testing the strength and the count of yarn.

Yours sincerely,
M. K. GANDHI

From a photostat: G.N. 11029

293. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Sunday, Sravana Krishna 14, September 5, 1926

Bhai Ghanshyamdasji,
I got your letter and the cutting, so I do not think about the matter at all. The present political atmosphere stinks in my nostrils.

Yours,
MOHANDAS

From the Hindi original: C.W. 6135. Courtesy: G. D. Birla
294. LETTER TO D. B. KALELKAR

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Sunday, Sravana Vad 14, September 5, 1926

BHAISHRI KAKA,

I got your letter in which you discuss the question of the sacred thread. I do not want people who wear it to discard it, nor am I particular that they should continue to wear it. In this age, it does not have even as much value as a simple piece of thread. Moreover, my present state of mind is such that, till Sudras and Antyajas are permitted to wear it, I cannot but feel aversion to it. But, then, why should we thoughtlessly and without reason burden the Sudras and the Antyajas with the responsibility of wearing it? I do not see any good coming out of a public discussion of this subject at present. But we will think more about it when you are here.

I cannot say that your health has become really fine now. Personally, I don’t see much difference between Sonegarh and Ahmedabad. About this, too, we will think together when you are here. Very much more than medicine, I believe that climate and finding out by experiment the right kind of diet help.

All of us were about to be drowned in the river today. We had a rehearsal too. But now only the comedy of it remains. How this happened is a long story, but someone or other is bound to write to you and tell it.

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12264

295. LETTER TO BALWANTRAI PAREKH

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Sunday, Sravana Vad 14, September 5, 1926

BHAISHRI BALWANTRAI,

I have your letter. I send herewith a hundi\(^1\) for Rs. 300 for the work in Panch Talavada. Kindly send a receipt. And send an account every month to Fulchand, with a copy of the same to me.

SJT. BALWANTRAI GOKALDAS PAREKH
BHAYNAGAR

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12265

\(^1\) Indigenous bill of exchange

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
296. LETTER TO S. R. DESHPANDE

September 6, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

My heart goes out to you. In a case like yours God alone can help. Whether we believe in Him or not does not much matter as ignorance of law does not save us from its sanctions. God is the supremest law.

I suggest to you that the purpose of our being is to know ourselves. The way to know oneself lies through service of all that lives. And we cannot serve humanity without sacrificing ourselves. Self sacrifice is therefore the highest law for us.

Yours sincerely,
M. K. GANDHI

SIT. S R. DESHPANDE
DONGRE MANSIONS
CHIKHALWADI
BOMBAY- 7

From a copy: S.N. 19947

297. LETTER TO V. A. SUNDARAM

September 7, 1926

MY DEAR SUNDARAM,

I am having your weekly gifts regularly. Many thanks.

Yours
BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 3176

298. LETTER TO JUGAL KISHORE BIRLA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Tuesday, Sravana Amavasya [September 7, 1926]¹

BHAISHRI JUGAL KISHOREJI,

I have your letter. You must have read what I wrote about the Bible in Young India.² I think it should satisfy you. I have also glanced through what has appeared in Vishwamitra. I wish only to add

¹ Gandhiji’s article “Crime of Reading Bible” appeared in Young India, 2-9-1926
² ibid.

VOL. 36 : 8 JULY, 1926 - 10 NOVEMBER, 1926 263 that, if the children must learn about the Bible, it is better that they learn it through me. Learning it through me, they can learn but one thing, the quintessence of all religions, namely, Ramanama. If others made improper use of my writings or activities, that can do no harm either to me or to my principles. How can truth be misused? Any attempt to do so will have only the opposite effect. That is why truth is given the highest place in the Upanishads and other scriptures and has been described as God. If you are still not satisfied, please write to me again.

From a photostat of the Hindi: S.N. 12269

299. LETTER TO RAJENDRA PRASAD

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI

Tuesday, Sravana Amavasya, September 7, 1926

BHAIRAJENDRABABU,

It is only today I could read the enclosed letter. I have also written to the student and asked him to see you.

BABU RAJENDRA PRASAD
CONGRESS OFFICE
MURADPORE
PATNA

From a photostat of the Hindi: S.N. 12272

300. LETTER TO LALJI NARANJI

SABARMATI,
Sravana Vad 0', 1982 [September 7, 1926]

SHRIYUT BHAISHRI LALJI NARANJI².

I have your letter. If there was any possibility of some useful purpose being served by my going there, I would not in the least hesitate to accept your invitation, for I would look upon the arrival of a delegation from South Africa as an unusual event and would not

¹ Amavasya, the new moon day
² Then President of the Indian Merchants’ Chamber, Bombay ³ Parliamentary delegation of eight members sent by the Union Government of South Africa at the invitation of the Government of India. The delegation arrived in India on September 18, 1926 and returned to South Africa on October 13, 1926.
regard my going to Bombay as a violation of my vow. I doubt, however, the propriety of my attending your function. The gentlemen who are arriving are shrewd men and of an independent temper. There can be no serious discussion of the South Africa problem at a reception. The reception may possibly have some tangible effect on them, but from that point of view my presence at the function, I think, can serve no purpose at all. It is likely that they wish to see me. I will certainly find out whether they do. I know their leader well, and therefore everything which should be done by me will be done. I don’t think my going there will serve any particular purpose. I have come to this conclusion after an objective consideration of the matter. If, however, you or Sir Purushottamdas’ have some special reason to consider my presence essential, I will certainly come.

My talk with Sir Henry Lawrence did not relate to the deputation; it was about the commission on agriculture.

Vandemataram from
Mohandas

Bhaftshi Lalji Naranji
Ewart House
Tamarind Lane
Fort, Bombay

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12267

301. LETTER TO REVASHANKER JHAVERI

The Ashram,
Sabarmati,
Sravana Vadi 0, 1982 [September 7, 1926]

Respected Revashankerbhai,

I have your letter. Sheth Lalji Naranji also wrote to me directly, and I have replied to him saying that my going to Bombay is likely to serve no useful purpose. If it is necessary for me to see them, the meeting will have to be specially fixed, and I will certainly take steps

1 The garden party by the addressee on September 19, 1926 at Bikaner House in Bombay
2 F. W. Beyers, then Minister of Mines and Industries
3 Sir Purushottamdas Thakurdas
4 Then Governor of Bombay
5 Vide the preceding item.
to have one arranged. If they wish to see me, I will arrange a meeting at any convenient place. I have, however, left the responsibility for the final decision to Lalji Sheth and Purushottamdas. If they think that I must go, I will go. It is advisable that no decision should be taken in a hurry.

Chi. Jamnadas had been feeling uneasy for the past many months, but I used to reassure him and persuade him to carry on. In the end, when I took no notice of his letters, he took prompt steps to carry out his decision. I sent for him, and he has been here. He gave three reasons for leaving:

1. Self-assumed unworthiness as teacher;
2. Throat trouble, which makes it difficult for him to speak;
3. Lack of faith in spinning as yajna, though he unreservedly believes in khadi.

The last two reasons appear sufficient to me for letting him go. If he experiences difficulty in speaking, he certainly cannot teach; and if he does not appreciate the value of spinning in the spirit of service, he can have no influence on the pupils. I have now written to Nanabhai and asked him so visit Rajkot and inspect the school there—he is the head of this Dakshinamurti and Vice-Chancellor of the Vidyapith. You need not resign from the Committee in a hurry. I will write more about this after discussing the matter with Nanabhai.

The more I see of Ratilal the more I notice his straightforward nature and his simplicity. I have observed that it is Champa who is extravagant. Just now they have both gone to Manilal Kothari’s. Champa wishes to stay on there till the Paryushana holidays. Ratilal has not yet decided what he will do.

I am writing to Doctor about Jeki. I will write to you again after I have his reply.

Ratilal has returned today.

Respectful greetings from

MOHANDAS

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 1280

1 An educational institution at Bhavnagar, in Saurashtra
2 Ratilal Mehta
3 Wife of Ratilal Mehta
4 Holy days observed by the followers of Jainism
5 Pranjivandas Mehta
6 Daughter of Pranjivandas Mehta
302. LETTER TO N. H. BELGAUMWALA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Tuesday, Sravana Amas, September 7, 1926

BHAISHRI NAOROJI BELGAUMWALA,

I have your letter. I read the letter in the Chronicle. I don’t believe at all that my coming out will do any good. I think I am doing real service by my silence. Sometimes an intelligent vaid simply lets a patient alone. I look upon myself as such a vaid. I know my patient, and so have left him alone. I will certainly like your offering the Chronicle to the highest bidder. But no one will buy it. The best thing is that you yourself should issue debentures and take it over.

SIT. N. H. BELGAUMWALA
237, FRERE ROAD
FORT, BOMBAY

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12268

303. LETTER TO KALURAM BAJORIA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Tuesday, Sravana Amas, September 7, 1926

BHAISHRI KALURAM,

I have your letter. If you are firm in your decision not to marry again, if that is what your conscience tells you, you should categorically make it public. I have no doubt at all about this. The condition of the country certainly makes me unhappy, but sometimes even silence is a form of action. I am sure that my silence is.

SIT. KALURAM BAJORIA
C/O JIVRAJ RAMKRISHANDAS
NO. 26/1, ARMEANIAN STREET
CALCUTTA

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12270
304. LETTER TO NANABHAI BHATT

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Tuesday, Sravana Amas, September 7, 1926

BHAISHRI NANABHAI

I send with this copy of a letter from Punjabhai. We have entrusted the arrangement about “Bhagvati Sutra” to the Puratattva Mandali, and we should—should we not?—accept the arrangement it makes. Something will certainly have to be done about this. Please do whatever is necessary.

SHRI NARSHINHPRASAD BHATT
DAKSHINAMURTI
BHAVNAGAR

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12271

305. MESSAGE TO BHAVANIDAYAL

Tuesday [September 7, 1926]

The aim in running the Pravasi Bhavan is to start a library for immigrants. I hope that it will have books which meet their needs. Nowadays people keep all kinds of books, good and bad, in libraries. I trust that this library will have no bad books.

MOHANDAS GANDHI

From the Hindi original: C.W. 8654. Courtesy: Vishnudayal

306. LETTER TO BENARSIDAS CHATURVEDI

ASHRAM, SABARMATI,

Shravana Amavasya, Tuesday, September 7, 1926

BHAII BENARSIDASJI,

I have your letter. As of now there is nothing left for you to do.

Yours,
MOHANDAS

1 The addressee replied to the message on September 9. The preceding Tuesday was September 7.
[PS.]

Yes, there is Vaze\textsuperscript{1}. At the moment he too has no work. I shall plead for him. It will do if the two of you come. If you want to ask Devdas, do so, but I think, knowing his limitations, he will not come.

From the Hindi original : Benarsidas Chaturvedi Papers. Courtesy : National Archives of India

307. LETTER TO JAISUKHLAL KRISHNALAL MEHTA

[On or after September 7, 1926]\textsuperscript{2}

BHAISHRI JAISUKHLAL\textsuperscript{3}.

I have your letter. Now at last I have some peace. I have made no attempt at all to understand the currency problem.\textsuperscript{4} I live from moment to moment, submit to the pressure of the moment and become engrossed in whatever it forces on me. For the time being I have escaped from the pressure of the currency problem.

I have written to Lalji Sheth about the deputation from South Africa and am awaiting his reply.

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12240

308. ACTION IN INACTION\textsuperscript{5}

[September 8, 1926]

Nothing would have pleased me better than to have responded to the public appeal\textsuperscript{6} made by Dr. Syed Mahmood and other friends if it was at all possible or in my opinion advisable to

\textsuperscript{1} S. G. Vaze

\textsuperscript{2} The letter to Sheth Lalji Naranji, referred to in this letter, was written on September 7, 1926.

\textsuperscript{3} Secretary of the Indian Merchants’ Chamber, Bombay. He had an interview with Gandhiji on August 17, 1926 in connection with the report of the Royal Commission on Indian Currency.

\textsuperscript{4} The report of the Commission was published in August 1926; an agitation was organized against its recommendation to fix the value of the rupee at 1s. 6d.

\textsuperscript{5} Asked in an interview by the Associated Press at Ahmedabad on September 8, what was his reply to the open letter of Dr. Mahmud and others inviting him to resume public life and call a representative conference, Gandhiji referred to this article as his answer. The gist of it, according to the Associated Press report, was “that he was unable to respond to the appeal in the manner suggested by the signatories”.

\textsuperscript{6} Vide “(An Appeal)” 6-9-1926.
do so. The signatories are mistaken in thinking that I have gone into retirement. I have imposed upon myself a year’s abstention from all avoidable public engagements. The year is fast drawing to a close. The reasons for abstention were fully stated at the time. My health and the requirements of the Ashram necessitated rest from toilsome travelling and taxing public engagements. If I have not interfered in the Council matters, it is because I have, perhaps, no aptitude for them—certainly, I have no faith in the Councils giving us swaraj. I have ceased to meddle in Hindu-Muslim quarrels because my meddling at this juncture, I am convinced, can only do harm. Then there remain untouchability, national educational institutions and the spinning-wheel. To these I am giving all the attention I am capable of giving.

Therefore, I venture to suggest to the friends that what to them appears to be my inaction is really concentrated action.

I do not in the least share their pessimism. The Hindu-Muslim quarrels are in a way, unknown to us, a fight for swaraj. Each party is conscious of its impending coming. Each wants to be found ready and fit for swaraj when it comes. Hindus think that they are physically weaker than the Mussalmans. The latter consider themselves to be weak in educational and earthly equipment. They are now doing what all weak bodies have done hitherto. This fighting therefore, however unfortunate it may be, is a sign of growth. It is like the Wars of the Roses. Out of it will rise a mighty nation. A better than the bloody way was opened out to us in 1920, but we could not assimilate it. But even a bloody way is better than utter helplessness and unmanliness.

Even the ugly duel between Motilalji and Lalaji is part of the same struggle. Let the enemies of India’s freedom gloat over their differences. These patriots will be working under the same flag long before the gloating is over. They are both lovers of their country. Lalaji sees no escape from communalism. Panditji cannot brook even the thought of it. Who shall say that only one is right? Both attitudes are a response to the prevailing atmosphere. Lalaji who was born to public life with swaraj on his lips is no hater of it now. He proposes to mount to it through communalism which he considers to be an inevitable stage in our evolution. Panditji thinks that communalism blocks the way and he therefore proposes to ignore it even as auto-suggestionists ignore disease seeing that health, not ‘illth’, is the law of life. The nation can ill afford to do without Sir Abdur Rahim as without Hakim Saheb Ajmal Khan. Sir Abdur Rahim, who wrote the weighty minute with Gokhale on the Islington Commission, is no enemy of his country. Who shall blame him if he thinks that the country cannot progress without the Mussalmans competing with the Hindus on equal terms? He may be wrong in his methods. But he is none-the-less a lover of freedom. Whilst, therefore, I can make room in my mind for all these various schools of thought, for me there is only one way. I have no faith in communalism even as a stage, or perhaps, better still, I have no fitness for work on that stage. I must, therefore, hold myself in reserve till the storm is over and the work of rebuilding has commenced.

I can but watch from a safe distance the struggle that goes on in the Councils. I honour those who have faith in them for prosecuting the programme with zeal.

It is educated India which is split up into parties. I confess my incompetence to bring these parties together. Their method is not my method. I am trying to work from bottom upward. To an onlooker, it is exasperatingly slow work. They are working from top downward—a process more difficult and complicated than the former. The millions for whom the signatories have claimed to write are uninterested in the party complications which are above their heads.

For them there is only the spinning-wheel. To paraphrase a celebrated proverb the wheels of God spin slowly but most effectively. I am engaged in attending to these tiny wheels of God. Let the signatories and the others who care note that they are ceaselessly moving. Their efficiency is daily and visibly growing. And when the storm is blown over, the parties are united, Hindus, Mussalmans, Brahmins, non-Brahmins, the suppressors and the suppressed have joined hands, they will find that the country has been prepared by silent hands for effecting not a punitive and violent boycott, but a health-giving, non-violent, constructive boycott of foreign cloth. The nation must exhibit some universal strength and power, be they ever so little. That is this boycott of foreign cloth.

The signatories regard themselves as my followers. I invite them to follow the lead of the charkha. I have not ceased to lead that little, simple wheel which daily hums to me the distress of the masses. For better or for worse, I have staked my all on the charkha, for it represents to me Daridranarayana, God of and in the poor and in the downtrodden.

Young India, 9-9-1926
309. LETTER TO KRISHNAKANT MALAVIYA

Bhadra Shukla 1, 1982 [September 8, 1926]

I got your telegram. Here is my article.

There was an innocent girl. After listening to speeches by several speakers, she went to her mother and said: “Look, mother, what nonsense these mad folk are talking! I only wish to listen to the sweet music of my charkha. I don’t want this madness.” Listening to the speeches of our orators and reading what our newspapermen write, my plight is like this girl’s.

Yours,

M OHANDAS G ANDHI

BHAI KRISHNAKANT MALAVIYA,
ABHYUDAYA PRESS, ALLAHABAD

From a microfilm of the Hindi: S.N. 19949

310. LETTER TO MITHUBEHN PETIT

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Wednesday, Bhadra Sud 1 [September 8, 1926]¹

DEAR SISTER,

I have your letter. The parcel will follow. You have sent quite a good quantity of grape-juice. Devdas has gone to Mussoorie and is there now. He must have got the parcel which you sent, for he says in his letter that he has received another parcel from you. I have been able to sell 72 pieces out of the stock with me. I have kept the articles to show them to people and have made no special effort to sell them. As you seem to be hard up for cash, I send a draft for Rs. 300; the sum is against the whole stock and does not represent the exact amount of the proceeds from the articles sold. If the costlier material lying with me cannot be sold, I will return it to you and ask you to send me material for the same amount which can be sold. I will not ask you to return its price. I will include the frocks in the list of the stock when they are received. You must have of course included their ¹ Reference in the letter to Devdas being in Mussoorie indicates that the letter was written in 1926.

price in your account. I am afraid the theft of Rs. 325 will be a further strain on your slender resources. It is vain to hope that the thief will be captured.

SHRI MITHUBEHN PETIT
PARK HOUSE
COLABA
BOMBAY

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 10607

311. LETTER TO THAKOREDAS SUKHADIA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Wednesday, Bhadra Sud 1, September 8, 1926

BHAISHRI THAKOREDAS,

I got your letter. I have no right at all to say that what you say is wrong. But, as your well-wisher, I should like to caution you. Two kinds of powers are working in every one of us—one visible and the other invisible. The latter is far stronger. It may be a holy power, but it can also be an evil power. Govardhanbhai¹ has graphically represented in Sarasvaticandra the working of these powers. The visible power working in Kumud² kept her attached to Pramaddhan³ and the invisible power drew her to Sarasvaticandra⁴. All reverence to that person, the invisible power in whom is a holy power and controls the visible power. Who can see anything to blame in either of you if the two powers work in such harmony in you both? The only proper wish for a human being to cherish for the succeeding life is that one should merge into God. If that wish is fulfilled, one will be united with one’s father, mother, brother, sister and all other dear ones.

P. THAKOREDAS SUKHADIA
KINARI BAZAR
SURAT

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12273

¹ 1855-1907; an eminent Gujarati writer whose epic novel, Sarasvaticandra, published in four parts between 1887 and 1901 tells the story of the birth of modern Gujarat
² Heroine of the novel
³ Her husband
⁴ To whom Kumud was first engaged. He left his parents’ home and, when he remained untraced for a few months, Kumud was married to Pramaddhan.
312. LETTER TO PYARELAL NAYYAR

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Wednesday, Bhadra Sud 1 [September 8, 1926]

CHI. PYARELAL,

I got your long letter. I understand your dilemma. It had all along been my desire to see that there was no excess of anything. Even excess of hesitation may sometimes appear as a sign of incivility. Now that you have adopted a particular manner, I don’t see any need for you to change it. If you try, that may even give a shock to Mathuradas. You should, therefore, go on as at present. Write to me when you run short of money. I hope you got the khadi. I suppose that the article is ready now. See that you improve your health. Keep writing to me.

PYARELALJI
HOMI VILLA
PANCHGANI

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12274

313. LETTER TO CHHOTALAL TEJPAL

Bhadra Sud 1, 1982, September 8, 1926

BHAISHRI CHHOTALAL TEJPAL,

I do not see any connection between the evil of untouchability and the question whether dead bodies should be carried on shoulders or in a cart. I do not wish to make a will to oblige people, after my death, to have my body carried in a cart, for I see a sort of egotism in the idea. Moreover, if they cremate my body on the Ashram premises, I would rather that they carried it on a few bamboo poles on shoulders or with hands. I don’t feel that it is a matter of dharma to insist on dead bodies being carried in carts. I fully accept, however, the necessity and propriety of carrying them in that manner in certain circumstances.

Vandemataram from
MOHANDAS

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19948

1 The addressee stayed at Panchgani in 1926.
2 Mathuradas Trikumji with whom the addressee stayed at Panchgani
314. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

ASHRAM, SABARMATI,

Bhadrapad Sud 1, Wednesday [September 8, 1926]

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have your letter. I have written to Lady Pattani to give us the bungalow till February. In the season, they may not even rent it out but they would like to have possession of it to accommodate various people. That is my feeling. By February your health will have sufficiently improved so that if you cannot remain in Panchgani, you can put up with the strain of going to some other hill resort. You can go to Sinhgadh at that time. And if we think of distant places, you can also go to Almora, Mussoorie, Kasauli, etc.

Blessings from

BAPU

MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI, ESQ.

HOMI VILLA

PANCHGANI

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

315. PLIGHT OF SCHOOL CHILDREN

One who knows what she is writing about says:

Until our boys learn to conserve their vital forces India will never have the men she should have. For nearly 17 years I have had charge of boys' schools in India. It is appalling to see the number of boys—Hindu, Mahommedan and Christian—who begin school life full of energy and enthusiasm and hope and end in physical wrecks. In literally hundreds of cases, I have traced this directly to self-abuse, sodomy or early marriage. I have today the names of 42 boys guilty of sodomy and not a boy is over 13 years of age. Masters and house fathers will deny that the conditions exist but if the right tactics are used the trouble will be discovered and nearly always the boys will confess. A large per cent of the boys confess to having been taught by men—often their own relatives.

This is no fanciful picture. It is truth suppressed by many schoolmasters who know. I have known it before. It was first brought to my notice by a Delhi schoolmaster now nearly eight years ago. But I have kept silent, merely discussing with individuals the remedies. The mischief is not confined to India. But it comes upon India with deadlier effect because of the curse of child marriage. A public discussion of this very difficult and delicate subject has become necessary, because one sees in respectable newspapers the sexual passion discussed with a freedom that would not have been possible a few years back.

1 From the postmark

The fashion of regarding the sexual act as natural, necessary, moral and conducive to mental and physical health has accentuated the evil. The advocacy by the cultured men of the free use of contraceptives has created an atmosphere favouring the growth of the sexual microbe. The tender and receptive minds of youngsters draw the hasty deductions favouring and justifying their unlawful and destructive desires and the parents and the teachers exhibit a sad, almost criminal, indifference and tolerance in respect of the deadly vice. Short of complete purification of the social environment, nothing, in my opinion, will stop the evil. The unconscious and subtle effect of an atmosphere charged with sexuality cannot but react upon the minds of the school-going youth of the country. The surroundings of the city life, the literature, the drama, the cinema, the household appointments, various social ceremonies do but to point one thing the promotion of the sexual passion. It is impossible for little children already conscious of the beast within to resist the pressure exerted by these influences. Palliatives will not answer. The reformation must begin with the elders if they would discharge their trust by the younger generation.

Young India, 9-9-1926

316. ‘TOWARDS MORAL BANKRUPTCY’

I have received many letters, both in English and vernacular, asking me to publish this series of articles in pamphlet form in all the three languages—English, Hindi and Gujarati. I am aware that a dozen letters may only represent the individual writers and there may be no real demand for the pamphlets. These are not propitious times for venturing on new publications. But a friend has come to the rescue and guaranteed all loss. The pamphlets will, therefore, be shortly... published. If the correspondents who offered to contribute towards the cost of publication still retain the desire to contribute, they will please forward their donations. If those who want copies will register their names at the Young India office beforehand, it will help the manager to fix the number of copies to be printed.

Young India, 9-9-1926

317. NOTES

CONGRESS PRESIDENTSHIP

Sjt. Shrinivas Iyengar’s election as President of the forthcoming Congress was a foregone conclusion. The Congress Committees were bound to elect an avowed Swarajist. If Sjt. Shrinivas Iyengar is a fighter, he is also an idealist. He is impatient and his impatient zeal often takes him into waters too deep for ordinary men. He plunges without giving a second thought. He comes upon the responsible office at a time of unexampled difficulty. But Sjt. Iyengar has faith in himself and his cause. Gods have been known to help those who believe in themselves. Let us hope that they will not prove false in this case. Sjt. Iyengar will need all the help that Congressmen can give him. We have learnt the art of giving passive loyalty. But time has come when we must learn to give active loyalty. Difficult as his task is, it would be quite easy if Congressmen will carry out policies and resolutions to which they themselves become party. This is the least that is expected of members of any organization that is to make any progress. I tender Sjt. Iyengar my congratulations for the high honour that has been conferred upon him, and I tender my sympathy for the extraordinary difficulties that face him and pray that God will give him the strength and wisdom to overcome them.

WORTHY OF EXAMPLE

Sjt. Haribhau Phatak sending to the Secretary, All-India Spinners’ Association, yarn contributions says:

I am sending today Shrimati Annapurnabai Gore’s yarn 25,000 yds. In Maharashtra many women undertake observances during the monsoon season. Annapurnabai has vowed to spin and present 1,00,000 yards of yarn during the season. The accompanying is the first month’s contribution. My friend Shridharpant Shastri is her husband and both are members of the A.I.S.A. They have already sent their full quota. They are a busy family. They have children and they are poor. With all that they have bad eyes. This effort therefore on their part is well worth noting.

And so the effort undoubtedly is. It is not possible without love of one’s kind; and it is love of the poor, love of God, love of ‘the country’ that is behind the charkha movement.

THE DOUBLE DISTILLED POISON

The curse of untouchability has permeated even the ‘untouchables’. And so we have grades of untouchability amongst them, the higher grade refusing contact with the lower. A Thiyya friend writes from Calicut:

We Thiyyas, a supposed low-caste people, but in education and social status much improved, and almost equal to any other community in Malabar, have a temple here in Calicut. A meeting was arranged to consider the question of giving entry to our Panchama brothers on the birthday of our great Guru, Sri Sri Narayana Guru. This was opposed by a large majority and there was much hooliganism to give trouble to the supporters. We voted for the entry of the Panchama brethren, but we were in a minority. We have therefore boycotted the temple and we go and worship at another temple where no such distinction is observed. We are determined to fight this battle to a finish.

I tender my congratulations to the small band of reformers. It was a right thing for them to refuse to use a privilege that was denied to the Panchamas. Those who claim justice must come with clean hands. The Thiyyas may not set up against others a barrier which they would break down when erected against themselves. That was the lesson Vykom taught. It must on no account be forgotten. Let the reformers then pursue their battle, in the true satyagraha spirit, without anger and with quiet determination, and they will soon turn the minority into a majority. Time and tide are with them.

A TISSUE OF MISREPRESENTATIONS

If most newspapers in the world were to cease publication, the world will not lose anything. Probably, it will heave a sigh of relief. The newspapers generally give not facts but fiction. This reflection arises from my having read a so-called interview with me published in the Messenger of America. It is the official organ of the American Philosophical Society. Why even a philosophical society’s organ should give currency to fiction in the name of fact is more than I can understand.

I should not have noticed this ‘interview’ but for the distortion it contains about my views of Theosophy.

I must, therefore pass by the fiction that “I was spinning on an old-fashioned loom,” or that “there were mango trees outside my room,” or the worse fiction that “it is through sympathy and understanding of America and the other great nations that we Indians gain the moral force to make our sacrifices.”

I must hasten to the Theosophical fictions. Among other things I am reported to have said is that “I am not in sympathy with the Theosophical Movement”, that “I am still a Theosophist but I am not in sympathy with the movement.” This is just the opposite of what I could have said. For I am not and have never been a member of any Theosophical Society, but I am and have ever been in sympathy with its message of universal brotherhood and consequent toleration. I owe much to Theosophical friends of whom I have many. Whatever critics may say against Madame Blavatsky or Col. Olcott or Dr. Besant, their contribution to humanity will always rank high. What has been a bar to my joining the society, as the interview somewhat correctly puts, is its secret side—its occultism. It has never appealed to me. I long to belong to the masses. Any secrecy hinders the real spirit of democracy. But I recognize that there are two sides at least to every question. And there may be much to be said in favour of occultism in religion. Hinduism is certainly not free from it. But I am not called upon to subscribe to it.

I repeat the request I have often made to interviewers that, if they must interview me or report anything about me, they will do me a favour and serve truth if they will submit to me for correction and verification all they wish to report as having been said by me.

Young India, 9-9-1926

318. DEFENDING CHILD MARRIAGE

A reader of Young India writes:

I am very much pained to read the following sentence in your article, “Curse of Child Marriage”, published in the Young India of the 26th August 1926: “Only a man innocent of self-restraint and steeped in vice could call it a sin not to marry a girl before she reached the age of monthly periods.”

I fail to understand why you could not take a charitable view of those whose opinion differs from you. One can certainly say that the Hindu law-giver was entirely wrong in prescribing child marriage. But I think it improper to say that those who insist on child marriage are "steeped in vice". It seems to go beyond the limits of politeness in controversy. In fact this is the first time that I heard such an argument against child marriage. Neither the Hindu social reformers nor the Christian missionaries ever said so, so far as I am aware. Imagine therefore the shock which I received when I found this argument in the writing of Mahatma Gandhi whom I believed to be perfection itself, so far at least as charity towards opponents is concerned.

You have condemned not one or two but probably every one of the Hindu law-givers. For, so far as I know, every smritikara enjoins early marriage of girls. It is impossible to hold as you have suggested that the passages enjoining early marriage are interpolations. The practice of early marriage is not confined to any province or class of society, but is practically a universal custom in India. It is also a very old practice dating from the time of the Ramayana.

I shall try to give briefly what I consider might have been the reasons why the Hindu law-givers insisted upon early marriage of girls. They considered it very desirable that every girl should have a husband as a rule. This is necessary no less for the peace of mind and happiness of the girls themselves than for the welfare of society in general. If every girl has to be provided with a husband, the choice of husband should be made by the parents of the girl and not by the girls themselves. If the choice is left to the girls themselves, it will result in many girls not being married at all, not because they do not like marriage, but because it is very difficult for all girls to find out suitable husbands. It is also dangerous, for it might lead to flirtation and might cause looseness of morals. Youths who appear to be good might ruin the virtue of simple girls. Again, if the choice is to be made by parents, the girls must be married young. When they are grown up, they may fall in love and may not like to marry the bridegroom selected by the parents. When a girl is married young, she becomes one with her husband and his family. The union is more natural and more perfect. It is sometimes difficult for grown-up girls with fixed ideas and habits to adapt themselves in a new home.

The chief objection to early marriage is that it weakens the health of the girl and her children. But this objection is not very convincing for the following reasons. The age of marriage is now rising among the Hindus, but the race is becoming weaker. Fifty or a hundred years ago the men and women were generally stronger, healthier and more long-lived than now. But early marriage was then more in vogue. The physique of educated girls who are married late is not generally better than the girls who receive less education and are married early. From these facts it appears probable that early marriage does not cause as much physical deterioration as some people believe.
You have good knowledge of both European society and Indian society. You will be able to say whether on the whole Indian wives are more devoted to their husbands than European wives; whether among the poor people the Indian husbands treat their wives more kindly than European husbands; whether there are fewer cases of unhappy marriages among Indians than among Europeans; whether sexual morality is higher in Indian society than in European society. If in these respects Indian marriages are more successful than European marriages, then early marriage which is an essential feature of Indian marriages should not be condemned.

I cannot believe that the Hindu law-givers were actuated by any consideration except the true welfare of society in general (including both men and women) in laying down the injunction of early marriage of girls. I believe that early marriage of girls is one of the features of Hindu society which have maintained its purity and prevented its disruption in spite of very hostile environments. You may not believe all this. But may we not expect that you should discard your idea that all the great Hindu law-givers who have insisted on early marriage of girls were innocent of self-restraint and were “steeped in vice”?

The Madras case reported by you seems to be very peculiar. The jury held that the girl committed suicide. But the girl said that her husband set fire to her clothes. In these conflicting circumstances, it is very difficult to hold that the facts which you consider to be indisputable are really so. There have been millions of cases of girl-wives below 13. Not one case of suicide due to cruel advances of the husband has been heard before. Probably there were peculiar features in the Madras case and early marriage was not the principal cause of the death.

Well does the poet say: “It costs very little to fashion a suitable philosophy in order to mitigate the rudeness of facts that secretly hurt one’s conscience.” This reader of Young India has gone a step further. He has not only fashioned a suitable philosophy but ignored facts and erected his argument on unsupported statements.

The charge of want of charity I must pass by, if only because I have not accused the law-givers, but I have ventured to impute vice to those who could insist on marriage at an age too tender for bearing the burden of motherhood. Want of charity comes into being only when you accuse a live person not an imaginary being, and that too without cause—of impure motives. But is there any warrant for the writer saying that the original authors of the several smritis who preached self-restraint wrote the verses enjoining marriage of little girls? Is it not more charitable to assume that the rishis could not be guilty of impurity or gross ignorance of cardinal facts concerning the growth of the human body?

But even if the texts ordering child, as opposed to early (for early marriage means marriage well before 25), marriage be found to be authoritative, we must reject them in the light of positive experience and scientific knowledge. I question the accuracy of the statement that child marriage is universal in Hindu society. I should be sorry to find that ‘millions of girls’ are married, i.e., live as wives whilst they are yet children. The Hindus would have died as a race long ago, if ‘millions of girls’ had their marriages consummated at, say, the age of eleven.

Nor does it follow that, if the parents are to continue to make the choice of husbands for their daughters, the marriage must be contracted and consummated early. It is still less true to maintain that if girls have to make their choice, there must be courtship and flirtation. After all, courtship is not universal in Europe and thousands of Hindu girls are married after fifteen and yet have their husbands selected by their parents. Mussalman parents invariably select husbands for their grown-up daughters. Whether the choice is to be made by girls or their parents is a separate question and is regulated by custom.

The correspondent has tendered no proof to support the statement that children of grown-up wives are weaker than those of child wives. In spite of my experience of both Indian and European society, I must refuse to enter into a comparison of their morals. Granting, however, for the sake of argument that morals of European society are lower than those of Hindu society, will it naturally follow that the lowness is due to the marriages taking place after full maturity?

Lastly, the Madras case does not help the correspondent, but his use of it betrays his hasty judgment based upon a total disregard of facts. If he will refer to the article again he will discover that I have drawn my conclusion from proved facts. My conclusion is unaffected by the cause of death. It was proved (1) that the girl was of tender age; (2) that she had no sexual desire; (3) that the ‘husband’ made cruel advances; (4) that she is no more. It was bad enough if the girl committed suicide, it was worse if the husband murdered her because she could not yield to his inhuman lust. The girl was fit only to learn and play, not to play the wife and carry on her tiny shoulders the weight of household cares or the yoke of a lord and master.
My correspondent is a man occupying a high position in society. The nation expects better things from those of her sons and daughters who have received a liberal education and who are expected to think and act in her behalf. We have many abuses in our midst—moral, social, economic and political. They require patient study, diligent research, delicate handling, accuracy of statement and clear thinking on them, and sober, impartial judgment. We may then differ, if necessary, as poles asunder. But we shall surely harm the country, our respective religions and the national cause, if we do not toil to discover the truth and adhere to it, cost what it may.

Young India, 9-9-1926

319. DIGNITY OF LABOUR

We meet every day young men, graduates of our universities, hawking their degrees. They ask for the recommendation of a man who has no education but commands wealth, and in nine cases out of ten, the rich man’s recommendation carries greater weight with the officials than the university degree. What does this prove? It proves that money is valued more than intellectual culture. Brain is at a high discount. Why is this so? Because brain has failed to earn money. This failure is due to want of occupation in which intellectual equipment is in demand. Brain which is the most valuable and most powerful force in human society is a waste product for want of a market.

The peasant’s assets are his hands. The zamindar’s assets are his lands. Culture of land is agriculture. Culture of hand is industry. I am aware that agriculture has been called an industry, but differentiation on the basis of their essentials should not place agriculture in the category of industries. A branch of manual labour which affords facilities for a progressive culture of the hand securing higher wages at successive stages should be properly called industry. This is not the case with the hand working on land. The man who drives a plough, sows seeds or weeds the fields will not earn higher wages by the culture of the hand. There is no scope for attainment of a more remunerative skill in the agriculturist’s occupation. Now take the case of a carpenter; he begins by making packing-cases. By culture he may learn to make a tantalus. Mark the progress in the manual skill resulting in a corresponding rise in the daily wages of the man. Let me assure you that the man who made the tantalus with two snakes with their expanded hoods guarding the bottles was first taken into my service for making packing cases. His initial wages were 6 annas a day and in two years’ time he was earning one rupee a day and the market value of his handiwork left at least 4 annas a day to his employer. This gives a rise in wages from Rs. 133 to 365 in two years. . . . Over 98 per cent of the population work on land. Land does not grow in area. Hands grow in number with the growth of the population. A holding which sustained a family of five members 30 years back now has to support 12 to 15 members. In some cases this extra pressure is relieved by emigration but in most cases a low standard of vitality is accepted as inevitable.

The foregoing is an extract from Sjt. M. S. Das’s speech delivered to the Bihar Young Men’s Institute in 1924. I have kept that speech by me so as to be able to deal with the essential part of it on a suitable occasion. There is nothing new in what the speaker has said. But the value of his remarks is derived from the fact that, though a lawyer of distinction, he has not only not despised labour with the hands, but actually learnt handicrafts at a late period in life, not merely as a hobby, but for the sake of teaching young men dignity of labour, and showing that without their turning their attention to the industries of the country the outlook for India is poor. Sjt. Das has himself been instrumental in establishing a tannery at Cuttack which has been a centre of training for many a young man who was before a mere unskilled labourer. But the greatest industry which requires the intelligence of millions of hands is no doubt hand-spinning. What is needed is to give the vast agricultural population of this country an added and an intelligent occupation which will train both their brains and hands. It is the finest and cheapest education that can be devised for them. Cheapest because it is immediately remunerative. And if we want universal education in India, the primary education consists not in a knowledge of the three R’s but in a knowledge of hand-spinning and all it implies. And when through it the hand and the eye are properly trained, the boy or the girl is ready to receive instruction in the three R’s. This I know would appear to some to be utterly absurd and to others to be totally unworkable. But those who so think do not know the condition of the millions. Nor do they know what it means to educate the millions of children of Indian peasantry. And this much-needed education cannot be given unless educated India which is responsible for the political awakening in the country will appreciate the dignity of labour and unless every young man would consider it his imperative duty to learn the art of hand-spinning and then re-introduce it in the village.

Young India, 9-9-1926
320. OUT OF THE FRYING-PAN

The report on the condition of returned emigrants stranded in Calcutta submitted to the Council of the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association makes painful reading. It appears that there are over 2,000 returned emigrants in Calcutta living in squalid surroundings. They are from Fiji, Trinidad, Surinam and British Guiana. “The desire to visit their motherland and the rumour that India had obtained self-government were the two chief reasons which led them to leave their birth-place.” But they find that their own people in their villages will not have them and so they want to go back to the place where they have come from.” ‘Anywhere out of India’ is their cry”. Meantime they are eking out a miserable existence in Calcutta. ”They all looked famished. Their lot is the lowest ebb of human misery.” The Act that the majority of these men are Colonial-born aggravates their misery. The reader will not appreciate the full meaning of being ‘Colonial-born’. These men are neither Indian nor Colonial. They have no Indian culture in the foreign lands they go to, save what they pick up from their uncultured half-dis-Indianized parents. They are not Colonial in that they are debarred access to the Colonial, i.e., Western, culture. They are therefore out of the frying-pan into fire. There at least they had some money and a kind of a home. Here they are social lepers, not even knowing the language of the people.

Therefore, the report suggests that it is the clear duty of the Government to send them back to the most suitable Colony that would receive them. The tropical Colonies must be glad to have them in preference to raw recruits who have to be initiated. The duty is clearly the Government’s. For they alone can carry on negotiations with the various Colonies. This duty should have been discharged long ago. The Imperial Citizenship Association has made the following appeal to the Government:

With reference to returned Indian emigrants from Fiji, British Guiana, Trinidad and other Colonies now stranded in Calcutta, the Council of the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association, through a representative specially sent from here for the purpose, has made investigations on the spot, and in the light of those investigations, I have the honour to submit the following recommendations for the immediate consideration of the Government of India:

1. The Government of Fiji should be requested to extend the duration of the moratorium for free passages to freed indentured labourers from 1930 to 1935.
2. The returned Indian emigrants from British Guiana of whom there are several hundreds now in Calcutta and elsewhere and who are anxious to go back should be included in the Government of India’s scheme of emigration of 500 families to British Guiana.

3. The Government of India should, without further delay, establish Emigrants’ Depots in Bombay, Calcutta and Madras. These Depots should be organized on the basis of the Indian Emigrants, Friendly Society which was established in Calcutta in 1921 and was dissolved in 1923. This Society looked after the interests of emigrants in every way and was managed by a local committee of both officials and non-officials and was very largely financed by the Government of India.

In view of the fact that another boat with several hundreds of emigrants is expected in Calcutta next month, my Council hopes that the Government of India will realize the gravity of the situation and act in a manner which will not only relieve the distress now prevalent but also effectively prevent further congestion and suffering.

For the time being, it will be enough if the stranded men get the relief asked for.

But the innocent-looking appeal raises broad and fundamental questions which must not be discussed in this brief notice of the special circumstances brought to light by the report. They must not be allowed to confuse the one clear issue which awaits immediate treatment. The broad questions however are:

1. The whole of the emigration policy.
2. The special case of British Guiana and Fiji.
3. The scope of the friendly societies referred to in the appeal.
4. The duty of the nation by the outgoing and returning emigrants.

The consideration of these questions requires a more favourable occasion and a more thorough treatment than can be given them at the present moment.

Young India, 9-9-1926
321. LETTER TO REGISTRAR, BOMBAY UNIVERSITY

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 9, 1926

DEAR SIR,

I have your letter No. 8539 of 1926 dated 6th September 1926 intimating that the Syndicate has appointed me as one of the judges for the examination of the Ashburner Prize essay for the year 1926. Apart from anything else, I regret to inform you that I have not a single moment to spare between now and October for examining the essay in question with the care and attention I would like to give it. I would, therefore, ask you kindly to remove my name from the list of judges.

Yours faithfully,

THE REGISTRAR
BOMBAY UNIVERSITY
BOMBAY

From a microfilm: S.N. 10991-a

322. LETTER TO A. T. GIDWANI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 9, 1926

MY DEAR GIDWANI,

I have your letter. Mr. Basu shall be suitably received on his arrival. He has given me no intimation as yet.

I have forgotten all about Jugal Kishore. My apologies to him. I think it is quite possible to take him in if he does not restrict me to anything in particular. That is to say, does he believe in khadi? And will he be prepared to work in the Khadi Department? What would be his requirements? Is he married?

Yours sincerely,

ACHARYA A. T. GIDWANI
PREM MAHA VIDYALAYA
BRINDABAN

From a microfilm: S.N. 11274
323. LETTER TO JOSEPH BAPTISTA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 9, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter of 6th September.¹ I do not think there is sufficient sincerity in the atmosphere to warrant a day for public prayer in connection with Hindu-Muslim tension. The prayer must proceed from the heart. There must be a sincere desire for reconciliation. I think the more becoming thing is for each one of us to pray in his own closet.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

JOSEPH BAPTISTA, ESQ.
MATHAPPACADY
BOMBAY

From a photostat: S.N. 12380

324. LETTER TO S. D. DEV

THE ASHRAM
SABARMATI,
September 9, 1926

MY DEAR DEV,

I have your letter of the 5th instant. About Ahmednagar, my message was wanted and I have sent it.

For Pandharpur, don’t you know my vow not to accept any public engagements before the 20th December? The exception is confined only to absolutely unexpected events. You should, therefore, secure Jamnalalji or Rajagopalachari or Gangadharrao Deshpande or you can also get Pandit Motilalji and several others one could think of. Any appeal next year made to me will not go in vain. This year, as you see, it is absolutely impossible.

¹ Baptista had written that for promoting “peace and goodwill on a national scale” among the different communities in India, one day—say, the first Sunday in November—should be set aside as a day of prayer, etc.

Yours sincerely,

SJT. S. D. DEV
KHADI EXHIBITION
AHMEDNAGAR

From a photostat: S.N. 19681

325. LETTER TO DEV RAJ

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 9, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. It is not possible to give you specific advice without actually seeing you. But generally, the following instructions may be followed:

Live and sleep in the open air. Take the simplest food without condiments always leaving a margin at the end of each meal. Do not eat after sunset. Avoid salt. Take plenty of fresh fruit and to every portion of milk add a little water. Do not boil the milk thick. Take gentle breathing exercises. Have some bodily work every day and if possible . . . in solitude if you can bear solitude. And cultivate the companionship of good chaste people and read clean literature.

Yours sincerely,

DEV RAJ, ESQ.
WAGON MOVEMENT EXPERIMENT
D. S. OFFICE
KARACHI

From a microfilm: S.N. 19682

326. LETTER TO BECHAR BHANJI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Thursday, Bhadra Sud 2, September 9, 1926

BHAISHRI BECHAR BHANJI,

I have your letter. I see nothing wrong in the eight things in which you say you believe. If they are living convictions in your heart, you will certainly save yourself from all mental weaknesses and cravings. If one’s belief is sincere and held with faith, one should strive hard, practise tapascharya and mortify the body to see that it sinks ever deeper into the heart; success is assured then.

1 Some words are missing in the source.

Vandemataram from

MOHANDAS

BECHAR BHANJI TEACHER

Via KUNDALA

AT AMBA

KATHIAWAR

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 5573; also S.N. 12275

327. LETTER TO BHIKHAIJI PALAMKOT

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

Thursday, Bhadra Sud 2, September 9, 1926

DEAR SISTER,

You are older than I am, but your handwriting and your aspirations would certainly do credit to a young woman. I can, therefore, understand the description of yourself which you give. What you say of your ancestors is certainly remarkable, and does honour to them, to you and to the country. I would have felt happier still if you had been able to serve the cause of Indian music, though of course one should feel happy if anyone teaches even a Western art which helps his or her spiritual development. This is so in your case. I wish you success in your venture, such as will be worthy of the reputation which you enjoy. That is the least you deserve. When I happen to be in Bombay, do favour me with a visit.

SHRIMATI BHIKHAIJI PALAMKOT

61, CAMBALA HILL

MALABAR HILL

BOMBAY-6

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12276
328. LETTER TO G. N. KANITKAR

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 10, 1926

MY DEAR KANITKAR,

I have your letter and the registered parcel. Please do not register parcels any more. I have so arranged that the magazines are handed to me as soon as they arrive. We must save every pice we can.

I note what you say about advertisements. What you have done is quite satisfactory.

Do not ask me to write anything about the Brahmin and non-Brahmin question just now. No harm will be done by my refraining, for the time being.

Yours sincerely,
M. K. GANDHI

SJT. G. N. KANITKAR
341, SADASHIV PETH
POONA CITY

From the original: C.W. 959. Courtesy: Gajanan Kanitkar

329. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 10, 1926

DEAR SATIS BABU,

I have your letter. I do not know what to say now or how to comfort you. I can only pray for your peace. Do not on any account damage your health by putting an undue strain upon your body or nerves. Why should Anil be getting fever every day? Why should you not be quite all right? It was a matter of grief to me that Hemaprabha Devi could not find the Ashram atmosphere congenial to her spirit. If only she could have stayed here with the children, it would have been much better and you would have been freer. I know that she can look after you as no one else can. But all husbands have to get over that helplessness. Hindu wives are in this respect in a much better and stronger position because they will not have themselves to be looked after by anybody.

Yours,

BAPU

ST. SATIS CH. DAS GUPTA
KHADI PRATISHTHAN
CALCUTTA

From a photostat: G.N. 1561

330. LETTER TO MAHARAJA OF NABHA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 10, 1926

DEAR MAHARAJA SAHEB,

I have a copy of your letter¹ written to me on the 20th September last year together with your letter to my son. I quite recollect having received your letter. My impression is that I told Maulana Mahomed Ali that it would be impossible for the Congress to take any effective steps in your case. And having done so, it is likely that I wrote nothing to you. But, if I did not, it was not due to want of attention or courtesy. Hardly a letter comes to me which remains unacknowledged.

Distance lends enchantment to the scene. But let me assure you that a President of the Congress is not ‘uncrowned’ king of India. He wields no power. He has no strength such as you imagine. I know I had none. If I had thought that it was possible for me to render any help whatsoever to you, I should have done so without the slightest hesitation. But I had none then, I have none now.

I may inform you that I read the papers regarding your case and discussed it with several Sikh friends long before you wrote to me, and I told them that it was not possible even for the Sikhs to help you, and that any attempt made by them would but injure your cause and their own movement. I am still of opinion that the mixing up of your case with the Gurdwara movement was a serious blunder. And this opinion, I gave even whilst I was in my sick-bed at Sassoon Hospital when a deputation from Sikh friends came and waited upon me.¹

¹ In this the Maharaja complained that Gandhiji had not taken the trouble of even acknowledging his petition (S.N. 10989).

Yours, sincerely,

HIS HIGHNESS THE MAHARAJA SAHEB OF NABHA “SNOWDON” MUSSOORIE W.

From a photostat: S.N. 10994

331. LETTER TO S. S. MUTGI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 10, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I have not studied the question of influence of planets and stars upon mankind and therefore I am unable to answer your first question.

When a person is under the influence of his or her passions, she or he must seek solitude, observe perfect silence and refrain from all activities till the passions are subsided and in order to avoid activity, complete fasting is advisable while the tremor of the passion continues.

The only scientific method of studying religious books is to study a little at a time and proceed after due assimilation, never accepting . . . as God’s word anything that is repugnant to one’s moral sense.

It is not possible to lay down any hard and fast rules about hours of study. For some a few minutes suffice. For others a few hours are enough. Each one must find out for himself how much he can read and digest. Merely stuffing of the brain with facts or arguments or assertions is perfectly useless.

Yours sincerely,

S. S. MUTGI
NEW BAZAR
BIJAPUR

From a photostat: S.N. 19684

¹ The letter bears a note on top by a secretary reading: “As some corrections were made after your letter was posted, I send you herewith a corrected copy”.

VOL. 36 : 8 JULY, 1926 - 10 NOVEMBER, 1926 293
332. LETTER TO R. SURYANARAYAN ROW

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 10, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter with papers regarding your scheme for Depressed Classes. It is a matter of exceeding regret to me that I cannot help you in it for the simple reason that you are partly Government-aided. I can understand and appreciate your work. I must not be mixed up in it. The friends who give me pecuniary help do so on the strength of my being totally independent of Government organizations. Mine is therefore a restricted activity and restricted class of donors. I cannot vary well approach with regard to the scheme, however laudable it may be in itself, if it is under Government patronage.

I did get the pamphlets you sent to me some time ago. I have not yet overtaken them.

Yours sincerely,

SIT. R. SURYANARAYAN ROW SERVANTS OF INDIA SOCIETY
CALICUT

From a microfilm: S.N. 19686

333. LETTER TO SHAUKAT ALI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 10, 1926

I have your letter. I have neither been able to follow nor to understand all the ramifications of the Hedjaz trouble. But on the strength of my belief that for godfearing people joy comes out of troubles, I have assumed that in the end all will be well.

I note what you say about your appeal on behalf of the khaddar movement. But I am not going to be satisfied until your promise is redeemed.

You will give me due notice before you come so that I may be ready with curds and other necessaries for the Derwish.

Yours sincerely,

MAULANA SHAUKAT ALI
CENTRAL KHILAFAT COMMITTEE
BOMBAY

From a photostat: S.N. 19687

334. LETTER TO V. N. APTE

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 10, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter for which I thank you. I understand your suggestions. The motive behind the publication of the statistics is merely to give a rough idea of the khadi work that is being done. Some of the information which you suggest is really unavailable. For instance, it is not possible to know with any degree of accuracy the output [of] carders per hour, much less of yarn spun by professional spinners. The average earned by them is obtained from books in our possession. The output per hour can only be obtained from the spinners who in the vast majority of cases have no time-sense and who spin during all the odd minutes that they spare. The statistics obtained therefore are about as much as it was possible to get. But as time goes by, greater and greater accuracy and fuller detail will be obtained.

Yours sincerely,

SIT. V. N. APTE
KHADI KARYALAYA
MALPUR DONDAICHE

From a microfilm: S.N. 19688

335. LETTER TO D. B. KALELKAR

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Friday, Bhadra Sud 3, September 10, 1926

BHAISHRI KAKA,

Your letter to Swami about your health did not alarm me, but your letter to me did. I will certainly have a talk with Swami; but, as they say, too many midwives attending on a woman in labour make the delivery more difficult, and so I am of the view that when one friend is guiding a person with great love and intelligently, others may express an opinion if they feel inclined to and leave the matter there. I believe that for many reasons the right of advising you in regard to your health belongs chiefly to Swami. He is, moreover, an intelligent person and, therefore, I don’t feel anxious either. There may be differences of opinion in certain matters and I make a suggestion in passing, but don’t press my view. There is hardly any science as imperfect as the science of medicine, and, in a matter in which we are guided mostly by inferences, to press one’s view on a man who is following a certain line, and thereby create doubt in his mind, will be like spoiling the mendicant’s chances for both things, as the saying goes. I am not particularly enamoured of Mussoorie. We are poor people and I, therefore, do believe that we should draw the line somewhere. As to where and when to draw it, there can be of course no fixed rule which can be applied to everyone. All of us here will discuss with Swami what should be done in your case, and finally abide by his decision. There is biting cold in the air here these days.
The sky is all the time overcast with clouds and the river is full to the banks.

Tanasukha’s letter had no effect on me. The ideas expressed in it are immature. But then, children ought to have the freedom to think even such thoughts. Some of these errors are such as they themselves see and correct in the course of time.

KAKASAHEB KAELKAR
SWAVALAMBN PATHSHALA
CHINCHWAD
(DIST. POONA)

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12277

336. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
Bhadrapad Sud 3, Friday [September 10, 1926]²

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have your letters. 32 years is nothing. You still have a long life before you. Your health will certainly improve. What Dr. Mehta says is absolutely right. Do take sun-bath there when there is sunshine. Direct exposure to sunrays is as important as pure air. This is being proved with each passing day. And now if doctors take as much care about diet as they do about air, there can be great progress. May you be blessed with a long life.

_Blessings from_

_BAPU_

_SIT. MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI_

_HOMI VILLA_

_PANCHGANI_

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

337. _A TALK_

[After October 10, 1926]¹

On reading Narahari’s report, the cultivators of Bardoli might feel with me as an accused person is said to have felt listening to his lawyer’s speech, Tears flowed from his eyes as he listened. On the magistrate asking him why he was crying, the accused replied that in truth he did not know that he was as innocent as the lawyer had made him out to be. I wonder if the cultivators who have read Narahari’s report ask themselves how they are still alive though they are as poor as they are described in it. We should not rest content with this report. People cannot manage to live even in the manner you have described them as living. If what you say is indeed true, there should be decrease in the number of villages and the fact of such decrease should be proved. A given state of affairs is bound to have certain consequences. We should collect evidence to show how many persons in Bardoli live on money earned outside, how many persons have left the place and gone elsewhere and how many fields have passed into the hands of big landlords. We do not follow up the reports which we hear and ascertain their truth. I have much to say about this report. We cannot start a struggle on its basis. It is a good one as a collection of statistics. It may even do as a lawyer’s rejoinder, but I do not think it can serve as a basis for comparison.

¹From the reference to Narahari’s report on Bardoli peasants; the eighth and last instalment of the report was published in _Navajivan_ on 10-10-1926.
We should go deep into this problem. I think that for advising people to court imprisonment, to let their lands be confiscated and invite poverty upon themselves, we should have some other kind of material than what you have collected. If we start a struggle to force the Government to revise the method which they have followed so far, it will be a long one. I do not believe that these cultivators are ready to take up such an arduous struggle.

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 11450

338. LETTER TO PARAMANAND SAMUELS LALL

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 11, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter and the book called Ever Increasing Faith for both of which I thank you. I receive so many gifts from so many good friends both known and unknown to me, that it becomes impossible to do justice to them. I have not a minute to spare to read the literature which is being sent to me. Heaven only knows when I can read the book you have sent me. And my difficulty is that I have not the desire which I used to have for reading. The desire is to think, to pray and to act according to the light that God gives me. The experiences of others, valuable though they are, cannot avail me at the present moment for, as I fancy, God has cut out my work and has left me no choice but to do the work.

Yours sincerely,

PARAMANAND SAMUELS LALL, ESQ.
7, PANJMAHAL ROAD
LAHORE

From a microfilm: S.N. 19689

339. LETTER TO LALA LAJPAT RAI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 11, 1926

DEAR LALAJI,

I see you have remembered me in your wanderings for you have sent me the little pocket edition of the Gita and the four other jewels. I thank you for the thought that has prompted the gift as also the choice. Whatever journeys you may undertake on the political highway, I hope that you will keep a green corner for the poor man and his khadi, remember his perpetual knocks at the door. I expect you to keep it open for him always.

I hope you have benefited in health by the change.

Yours sincerely,

LALA LAJPAT RAI
From a photostat: S.N. 19690

340. LETTER TO BANARASIDAS CHATURVEDI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Saturday, Bhadra Sud 4 [September 11, 1926]

Bhai Banarasidasji,
Here is my message.
I am much pained to hear that Indians in Fiji are sunk deep in the drink-evil. May God save them from it!

Yours,
Mohandas

Shri Banarasidas Chaturvedi
Ferozabad (U.P.)
From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 2565

341. LETTER TO NANABHAI BHATT

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Saturday, Bhadra Sud 4, September 11, 1926

Bhai Nanabhai,
I got your letter and the three invitations. I have read the latter, and return them with this. I am sure there can be nothing to criticize in the reply which you have sent and so I will not waste your time and mine by so much as commenting on them. You have acted correctly in regard to Narahari. I have still to receive from you acknowledg-

1From the postmark

VOL. 36 : 8 JULY, 1926 - 10 NOVEMBER, 1926 299
ment of the letter with which a copy of Punjabhai’s letter was sent to you. I am sure you got that letter. If you had your whole toe amputated, you certainly ran a great risk. I had merely understood you to mean that you had gone in for a minor incision on it. I hope you are all right now and can walk and move about.

SHRI NANABHAI
DAKSHINAMURTI
BHAVNAGAR

From a photo of the Gujarati: S.N. 12278

342. SATYAGRAHA—TRUE AND FALSE

[September 12, 1926]

There are many forms of satyagraha, of which fasting may or may not be one, according to the circumstances of the case. A friend has put the following poser:

A man want to recover money another owes him. He cannot do so by going to law as he is a non-co-operator, and the debtor in the intoxication of the power of his wealth pays him no heed, and refuses even to accept arbitration. If in these circumstances, the creditor sits dharna at the debtor’s door, would it not be satyagraha? The fasting creditor seeks to injure no one by his fasting. Ever since the golden age of Rama, we have been following this method. But I am told you regard this as intimidation. If you do, will you kindly explain?

I know the correspondent. He has written from the purest motive. But I have no doubt that he is mistaken in his interpretation of satyagraha. Satyagraha can never be resorted to for personal gain. If fasting with a view to recovering money is to be encouraged, there would be no end of scoundrels blackmailing people by resorting to these means. I know that many such people are to be met with in the country. It is not right to argue that those who rightly resort to fasting need not be condemned because it is abused in a few cases. Any and everyone may not draw his own distinction between fasting—satyagraha—true and false. What one regards as true satyagraha may very likely be otherwise. Satyagraha, therefore, cannot be resorted to for personal gain, but only for the good of others. A satyagrahi should always be ready to undergo suffering and pecuniary loss. That there would not be wanting dishonest people to reap an undue advantage from the boycott of law-courts practised by good people was a contingency not unexpected at the inception of non-co-operation. It was then thought that the beauty of non-co-operation lay just in taking those risks.

---

1 The original, in Gujarati, appeared in Navajivan, 12-9-1926. The English translation is by Mahadev Desai.

But satyagraha in the form of fasting cannot be undertaken as against an opponent. Fasting can be resorted to only against one’s nearest and dearest, and that solely for his or her good.

In a country like India, where the spirit of charity or pity is not lacking, it would be nothing short of an outrage to resort to fasting for recovering money. I know people who have given away money, quite against their will, but out of a false sense of pity. The satyagrahi has, therefore, to proceed warily in a land like ours. It is likely that some men may succeed in recovering money due to them by resorting to fasting; but instead of calling it a triumph of satyagraha, I would call it a triumph of duragraha or violence. The triumph of satyagraha consists in meeting death in the insistence on truth. A satyagrahi is always unattached to the attainment of the object of satyagraha; one seeking to recover money cannot be so unattached. I am therefore clear that fasting for the sake of personal gain is nothing short of intimidation and the result of ignorance.

Young India, 30-9-1926

343. A DILEMMA

A correspondent writes:¹

It is likely that the statement,”it would be preferable to use English cloth rather than use cloth made in Indian mills”, was quoted² from Hind Swaraj. In the logical context in which the remark occurs,
I would say today the same thing which I did in 1908.³ It is a statement

¹ The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had requested Gandhiji to explain the reason which had led to the change in his attitude towards textile mills in India. In Hind Swaraj, Gandhiji had stated that it might be in the interest of the country to continue to import cloth from Manchester for some time longer rather than set up mills in the country itself, but in 1921 he had adopted the attitude that India should herself produce all the cloth required to meet her needs, even supporting Indian mills, if necessary.
² By Balukaka Kanetkar, at a meeting in Poona
³ Hind Swaraj was written in 1909.
of principle, and it may not be possible to act upon it in certain circumstances. I, therefore, drew the readers’ attention to this point in the Hindi edition of Hind Swaraj.\(^1\) What I have stated there is also correct in our present circumstances. If we had not allowed ourselves to be caught in the snare of mills, if the question had merely been whether we should set up new mills and use what we suppose would be swadeshi cloth or to continue to import and use foreign cloth, I would prefer the latter course, because I do not believe that the mill industry is an activity which deserves to be spread in other parts of the world. We could produce cloth even if we had no mill industry, produce enough to meet our needs. We have seen from experience that we do not have to spend much time in this work. I do not, therefore, believe that the mill industry serves any social purpose or benefits the people in any way. But the problem is quite different, the position being exactly the opposite. We have quite a large number of mills in the country. It is not possible today to persuade their owners to wind them up. Boycott of foreign cloth is not only desirable but essential; it is our duty to bring it about; we have the right to do so. In doing that duty, we should make use of a means which is readily available to us. Not to do so would augur lack of intelligence in us.

Dharma is not an absolute thing which does not change even when circumstances have changed. If people living on the Equator follow what is dharma for people near the North Pole, they would probably be guilty of adharma.\(^2\) There is only one absolute dharma, and that is contained in God, otherwise known as truth. The dharma of beings, who are governed by their circumstances and whose strength is limited, changes from hour to hour. The ground on which their dharma rests is unchanging, and that is truth or, if one prefers, non-violence; but, as one stands firm on this ground, there will necessarily be many changes in what dharma requires in actual practice. We should understand the problem of mills in this light. Otherwise, we have no reason to welcome the spread of an industry which induces cultivators to leave their fields to go to cities and live there, with their families, in narrow, dark cells without any regard for morality. Even looking at it from the point of view of the rich, we see

---

\(^1\)From the preface to the Hindi edition published in 1921, the correspondent had quoted: “My views in regard to mills have undergone this much change. In view of the present predicament of India, we should produce in our own country all the cloth that we need even by supporting, if necessary, mills in India rather than buy cloth made in Manchester.”

\(^2\)Opposite of dharma
no very elevating scenes which are due to the mill-industry. It is not an ennobling ideal merely to earn money and distribute it among a small number of share holders. But, as the body seems to us a filthy thing when we think of it in the abstract and still we tolerate it because we cannot dispense with it, so also we should tolerate mills since in our present circumstances we cannot get rid of them, and if they serve our purpose, avail ourselves of their benefit to bring about boycott of foreign cloth. If they do not serve even this purpose, if we discover that on the contrary they hinder our efforts to bring about such boycott, then their destruction may be considered desirable, nay necessary.

[From Gujarati]
Navajivan, 12-9-1926

344. LETTER TO WILLIAM DOULL

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 12, 1926

DEAR MR. DOULL,

I have delayed acknowledging your letter1 of 5th June as I was hoping to see Mr. Umar Johari. I have now seen him. I have paid Rs. 6,500/- the other day and the following cable2 was sent to you:

I hope that you will send me the securities duly executed. There should be an acceptance by the trustees that this debt will be a first charge on the assets to be handed to Sorabji. You will also please send me cession of the insurance policy duly registered at the insurance office.

Yours sincerely,

WILLIAM DOULL, ESQ.
MURRAY COURT
375, SMITH STREET
DURBAN
NATAL.

From a photostat: S.N. 10808

1 In his letter, Doull of Livingston and Doull, Durban Solicitors, had written to Gandhiji of the grave financial difficulties in which Sorabji found himself and that it would stave off his insolvency if he was advanced some moneys from the Rustomjee Jivanji Ghorkhodu Trust on the security of Sorabji’s life insurance policies (S.N. 10763).

2 This is not available.
345. LETTER TO REV. DEWDNEY W. DREW

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 12, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

Your long and welcome letter has revived old pleasant memories and old pleasant associations. It was good of you to have visited my son and encouraged him. I am glad that his work has commended itself to you.

You do not expect me to interest you in my activities here nor would I take any such liberty. My editing of Young India is really my weekly letter to friends who will care to follow the activities that engross me at the present moment.

The South African affair is somewhat of a shock to me. I was not prepared for such a manifest breach of the undertakings of the Union Government in 1914.

Now that you have opened correspondence do please keep it up and write to me whenever you feel like thinking of an old friend.

Yours sincerely,

REV. DEWDNEY W. DREW
PHOENIX
NATAL

From a photostat: S.N. 10809

346. LETTER TO MALCOLM MUGGERIDGE

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 12, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter. I have not read the book referred to by you. My own personal experience and those of many others is Writing on July 28, after a silence of over 12 years, Drew described inter alia his visit to the Press at Phoenix where Indian Opinion was being printed and his meeting Manilal Gandhi whose devoted labours for his father’s weekly he commended (S.N. 10788).

at variance with the quotation sent by you. But I think there is difference between the author’s standpoint and that of my friends and my own. When abstinence is practised “under the false idea that the instinct is but a low pleasure” it may produce “irritability and the weakening of love”. But when abstinence is practised for the purpose of self-realization, for the purpose of husbanding vitality and for the seeking, basing [sic] love not on physical pleasure but upon soul contact, it soothes one’s nerves and purifies and therefore strengthens the bond between the two. Most of the ills that you describe spring, in my opinion, from a wrong view of love and a wrong view of sexual relation. Under my own plan husband and wife need not live separately, that is, under separate roofs, but they certainly ought not to share the same room and lock themselves in. Long course of habit blinds us to the ugliness of men and women passing nights after nights in privacy, without any moral purpose whatsoever. In doing so we become less even than animals. I can see nothing wrong in husband and wife seeking privacy only for sexual act which they will perform in due humility and purely for the sake of procreation. There will, I know, still be animal pleasure left in the act. I would call that lawful animal pleasure. And if we could only set our thought right and strive, in spite of the present practice to the contrary, to shape our own in accordance with the thought, I doubt not that restraint will not only be easy, but the most natural thing in the world. I may have the handsomest girl as my sister and if the custom of kissing my sister is in vogue and in accordance with it I kiss my sister, surely no lustful thought will spring up in my breast. Why should it be different as between husband and wife? That it is different I know to my cost but the difference lies in our mental attitude. We kiss our wives with the intention of satisfying the lustful pleasure. We kiss our sisters or daughters out of lustless affection.

If the mine-owners win, they will win not because there are too many miners, but because the miners do not know how to control themselves. If every miner committed race suicide, ceased to procreate, I do not know that he will better his condition. He will have no ambition left in him. He will not want increase of wages. It is difficult to forecast the future of a body of men who, not knowing the higher life, do not want to restrain themselves and would avoid the responsibilities of citizenship.

You will please remember that check upon procreation is common ground between us. But the methods for checking are so diametrically opposite that the results also are equally different.¹

Yours sincerely,

M. MUGGERIDGE, ESQ.
AT”FARLEY” OOTACAMUND

From a photostat: S.N. 19691

347. LETTER TO RISHABHDAS

SABARMATI ASHRAM,
Bhadra Sud 7, 1982, September 14, 1926

CHI. RISHABHDAS,

I have your letter. You will be doing the proper thing if you follow Bhai Dastane’s advice. Your father must be running the business for your sake. It is your dharma to renounce your interest in it. If you sever your connection with it, I feel strongly that you should accept no help from your father. You should obtain from the khadi institution what you need for the maintenance of yourself and your wife. If friends voluntarily offer you any help, you may accept it. They will be paying that sum only to the khadi institution. I hope your wife is keeping good health. Do whatever you decide, without doubts and misgiving.

C/O CONGRESS KHADI BANDAR
JALGAON

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12280

348. LETTER TO PURUSHOTTAM PATWARDHAN

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Tuesday, Bhadra Sud 7, September 14, 1926

BHAISHRI APPA,

I have your letter. After leaving this place, Bhai Abdullah went to you. He must be an old friend by now. I cannot of course object to your resuming the diet of uncooked articles; under one condition, though, your health must not suffer. I, too, have had sufficient experience of the harmlessness of uncooked food. But experiments should be carried out in a scientific manner and on a big enough scale. There can be no doubt, of course, that such food should be eaten in small quantity only. Those whose stomach may have become as weak as mine, what should they do? I can think of nothing as a substitute for milk.

¹ For Gandhiji’s article dealing with the points raised by the addressee, vide”Influence of Attitudes”, 16-9-1926.

306  THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI

The Spinners’ Association can certainly take proper precautions in its own stores to ensure that they do not sell fake khadi. But what can it do about other stores?

The broad limit for eradication of untouchability has already been defined, which is, that the four varnas should act towards the untouchables as the first three varnas act towards the fourth. Anyone who wishes to go beyond this, to eat in the company of untouchables, for instance, may do so of his own free will and at his own risk. We may not refrain from eating in their company fearing that others might follow our example and be guilty of sin, for those who eat in their company commit no sin at all. We, at any rate, eat with them because we think it meritorious to do so. If we cease believing in the idea of pollution through touch, the restrictions in regard to eating will not be, ought not to be, considered an essential part of the caste-system.

If Bhangis are forbidden to ride in tram-cars in Bombay, I think that is an injustice.

Even the present caste-system is based on contempt. All trace of contempt will disappear from Hinduism, if it gets rid of the spirit of untouchability. The notions of high and low are fruit and symptom of the disease of untouchability. Even the history which we learn tells us that the ideas which at present have struck deep roots among us were not a part of the varna system of old days.

You may go on asking questions till you are satisfied.

Blessings from

BAPU

SHRI PURUSHOTTAM PATWARDHAN
(BHAISHRI APPA)
SHRI TILAK RASHTRIYA SHALA
RATNAGIRI

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12281
349. TELEGRAM TO A. A. PAUL
[September 15, 1926]

A. A. PAUL
INTERNATIONAL FELLOWSHIP CONFERENCE
CHITTOOR
REGRET INABILITY REACH YOUR LETTER EARLIER. WISH CONFERENCE SUCCESS INTERNATIONAL FELLOWSHIP IS WHAT WE ALL DESIRE. WITHOUT IT WE CANNOT LIVE AS MEN AND WOMEN.

GANDHI

From a photostat: S.N. 11376

350. MESSAGE ABOUT SOUTH AFRICAN DEPUTATION

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 15, 1926

I join the chorus of welcome that will be extended to the South African Deputation that is coming on behalf of the Union Government.¹ Let us show to them all the goodwill that we are capable of showing. But let us not also build castles in the air. The deputation is but a part of the Conference that is to be held in December. They are coming with no authority for action. They are coming merely to gain impressions. The solution of the difficult problem that faces the statesman of South Africa and India depends upon a multiplicity of circumstances. The coming of the deputation is one such circumstance which we must use in the best manner possible. Let us put the deputation in the position of seeing all the sides of the picture. In other words, they should be enabled to see the truth, the real truth, and nothing but the truth. The case for the Indian settlers in South Africa rests upon purest justice. An impartial study of the question therefore on the part of the South African statesmen that are coming can only do the cause good.

M. K. GANDHI

From a photostat: S.N. 19692; also The Bombay Chronicle, 18-9-1926

¹ The date is noted on Paul’s letter of September 6.
² Paul had written to Gandhiji requesting him to attend the International Fellowship conference at Chittoor during October 8-10 (S.N. 11376).
³ The deputation arrived in India on September 19, 1926.
351. LETTER TO V. A. SUNDARAM

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 15, 1926

MY DEAR SUNDARAM,

I have your weekly gift again to acknowledge. Your offer to send me simple Tamil sentences week by week is most tempting. But I must resist the temptation as I have really no time left for anything more than I have on hand.

With love to you all.

Yours,

BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 3194

352. LETTER TO BHAVANIDAYAL

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Wednesday, Bhadra Shukla 8 [September 15, 1926]¹

Bhai Bhavanidayalji,

I have your letter. My reply is as follows:

(1) No, Sir.²
(2) The offer was for a plot of land at a distance of 13 miles from Johannesburg and not on long lease. I had dissuaded the Indian residents from accepting it. The reason is obvious.
(3) I did not receive a farthing from the Municipality. But, it had to pay expenses in cases which it lost. Almost all that I received from Indian settlers was handed over for public work.
(4) Both the Associations were functioning till the last and were independent of each other.

¹ The letter was in reply to the addressee’s letter of September 9, 1926, regarding South Africa, vide Appendix”Extracts from Bhavan Dayal’s Letter”, 9-9-1926.
² This is in reply to a question whether Gandhiji had given his consent to a move on the part of Indians to surrender the Indian locations in Johannesburg to the Municipality.
(5) It is contrary to dharma to bow to anyone under force, but it is one’s dharma to bow to everyone in the world of one’s own free will; the same principle applies to the question of finger-prints. In India as also in some other countries, fingerprints are required even from persons other than prisoners. Please remember that Mahadevji danced in a naked state.

(6) Our people had objected to giving photographs too, and rightly. In my view, it is far better to give finger-prints than photographs and the method is more scientific.

(7) Your interpretation of “vested rights” is correct.

(8) I have not ignored your book but I have not finished reading it. I am told that it is full of errors. Not thinking it proper to discuss them, I have kept quiet. My recollection is that you, too, had admitted some errors and written to me to express your regret.

Yours,

Mohanandas Gandhi

From a photostat of the Hindi: S.N. 10990

353. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

The Ashram,
Sabarmati,

Wednesday, Bhadra Sud 8 [September 15, 1926]

Chi. Mathuradas,

I did get your letter. I have received Lady Pattani’s reply, which please find enclosed. You may now take possession of the bungalow whenever you wish.

Mathuradas Trikumji
Homi Villa
Panchgani

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12279

1 Lord Siva
2 The addressee stayed at Panchgani in 1926.
CHARKHA IN SHAHABAD SCHOOLS

The Secretary of the Charkha Committee of the Shahabad District Board writes:¹

At the demonstration the Secretary read a report from which I take the following:²

Whilst the Shahabad District Board is to be congratulated on the introduction of the charkha in the District Board schools, much remains to be done before the experiment can be termed a success. Is all the yarn spun tested for its strength and evenness? Do the boys and girls know how to repair their own charkhas? The output is not enough for the number spinning. There is danger of our being satisfied with a make-believe. That would be worse than no charkha.

INDIAN TEXT-BOOKS

What it means to prepare real text-books for India’s children may be somewhat realized from the following quotation from a letter from Mr. Gregg who is at present teaching hill children on Mr. Stokes’s farm in Kotgarh near Simla. He says:

My time has been much occupied in preparing a re-arrangement of the text-books in both mathematics and physics for my pupils, such as will conform to their experience. All English text-books, and even the Indian ones, are apparently written for city-bred children and presuppose familiarity with machinery and manufactured apparatus of all kinds. These children here have never seen automobiles, steam engines, electric lights, pumps, water-pipes, or even bullock-carts. So the assumptions, pictures, technical terms and arrangement of the text-books of physics, and even of much of mathematics can have no reality and therefore no interest or educational value for them. Gradually, therefore, I am putting together what will be in effect a text-book on science and mathematics for Indian village children. Since most of the children of India are in the villages, I hope it will be useful.

But Mr. Gregg’s letter opens up a much wider question. What is ¹ Not reproduced here. This was about a spinning demonstration by the students of primary schools of Shahabad district held on August 27.

² Not reproduced here. This gave an account of the progress of spinning work in the various schools.
true of urbanized, exploiting and wealthy countries like England and America cannot be true of an India predominantly rural, pauperized and exploited. For India a multiplicity of text-books means deprivation of the vast majority of village children of the means of instruction. Text-books, therefore, in India must mean, principally and for the lower standards, text-books for teachers, not pupils. Indeed, I am not sure that it is not better for the children to have much of the preliminary instruction imparted to them vocally. To impose on children of tender age a knowledge of the alphabet and the ability to read before they can gain general knowledge is to deprive them, whilst they are fresh, of the power of assimilating instruction by word of mouth. Should, for instance, a lad of seven wait for learning the \textit{Ramayana} till he can read it? The results that we arrive at when we think of the few lacs living in the cities of India are wholly different from those we obtain when we think in terms of the millions of rural India and this, whether we think of matters educational, social, economic or apolitical Mr. Gregg’s effort, therefore, is fraught with important consequences.

\textit{Young India}, 16-9-1926

\textbf{355. STUDENTS’ DUTY}

A Lahore correspondent writes a pathetic letter in scholarly Hindi. I give a free rendering of the main parts of the letter:

Hindu-Muslim feuds and the feverish activity over the Council elections have thrown the non co-operating students off their balance. They have sacrificed much for the country. Its service is their watchword. They are today without a helmsman. They cannot enthuse over Councils. They do not want to take part in the Hindu-Muslim feud. They are therefore drifting towards a life of aimlessness and worse. Must they be allowed thus to drift? Pray remember that ultimately you are responsible for this result. For, though nominally they obeyed the Congress call, in reality it was you they obeyed. Is it not up to you now to guide them?

Man can make a trough, can he lead unwilling horses to it? I sympathize with these splendid young men, but I am unable to blame myself for their drifting. If they obeyed my call, what is there to prevent them [from] doing so now? I am speaking with no uncertain voice to all who will listen, to take up the gospel of the charkha. But the fact is that in 1920 they listened not to me (and that very properly) but to the Congress. What is perhaps more accurate, they listened to the inner voice. The Congress call was an echo of their own longings. They were ready for the negative part. The call of the charkha which is the positive part of the Congress programme, for let it be remembered that it is still the Congress call, seems to make no appeal to them. If so, there is still another much-needed work which is also part of the positive programme of the Congress—the service of the untouchables. Here, too, there is more than enough work for all the students who are pining to do national service. Let them understand that all those who raise the moral tone of the community as a whole, all those who find occupation for the idle millions, are real builders of swaraj. They will make easy even the purely political work. This positive work will evoke the best in the students. It is both post-graduate and pre-graduate work. It is the only real graduating.

But it may be that neither the charkha work nor the untouchability work is exciting enough for them. Then let them know that I am useless as a physician. I have but a limited stock of prescriptions. I believe in unity of disease and, therefore, also of cure. But must a physician be blamed for his limitations, especially when he declares them from the house-tops?

The students for whom the correspondent writes must be resourceful enough to find their own course in life. Self-reliance is swaraj.

Young India, 16-9-1926

356. INFLUENCE OF ATTITUDES

I have been very interested in your articles in Young India on the subject of birth control. I expect you have read J. A. Hadfield’s book Psychology and Morals. I want to draw your attention to this passage from it:

“We, therefore, speak of sexual pleasure when the expression of this instinct is alien to our moral sense; and we speak of sexual joy when the expression of this instinct is in conformity with the sentiment of love. . . . The too profuse breeders punish not only the poor children they breed, but also humanity in general.”

1 Only extracts are reproduced here from Malcolm Muggeridge’s letter; vide also “Letter to Malcolm Muggeridge”, 12-9-1926.
So writes a correspondent. The letter to me is a study in mental attitudes and their influence. Mind takes a rope to be a snake and the man with that mentality turns pale and runs away or takes up a stick to belabour the fancied snake. Another mistakes a sister for wife and has animal passion rising in his breast. The passion subsides, the moment he discovers his mistake. And so in the case quoted by the correspondent. No doubt, whilst “abstinence is practised under the false idea that the instinct is but a low pleasure”, it is likely “to produce irritability and the weakening of love”. But if abstinence is practised with the desire to strengthen the bond of love, to purify it and to conserve the vital energy for a better purpose, instead of promoting irritability, it will promote equanimity, and instead of loosening the bond of affection, strengthen it. Love based upon indulgence of animal passion is at best a selfish affair and likely to snap under the slightest strain. And why should the sexual act be a sacrament in the human species, if it is not that among the lower animals? Why should we not look at it as what it is in reality, i.e., a simple act of procreation to which we are helplessly drawn for the perpetuation of the species? Only a man having been gifted with a free will to a limited extent exercises the human prerogative of self-denial for the sake of the well-being of the species, for the sake of the nobler purpose, to which he is born, than his brother-animals. It is the force of habit which makes us think the sexual act to be necessary and desirable for the promotion of love, apart from procreation, in spite of innumerable experiences to the contrary that it does not deepen love, that it is in no way necessary for its retention or enrichment. Indeed, instances can be quoted in which that bond has grown stronger with abstinence. No doubt abstinence must be a voluntary act undertaken for mutual moral advancement.

Human society is a ceaseless growth, an unfoldment in terms of spirituality. If so, it must be based on ever-increasing restraint upon the demands of the flesh. Thus, marriage must be considered to be a sacrament imposing discipline upon the partners restricting them to the physical union only among themselves and for the purpose only of procreation when both the partners desire and are prepared for it. Then, in either case supposed by the correspondent, there would be no question of sexual act outside the desire for procreation.

There is an end to all argument if we start, as my correspondent has started, with the premise that sexual act is a necessity outside of the purpose of procreation. The premise is vitiated in the presence of authentic instances that can be cited of complete abstinence having been practised by some of the highest among mankind in all climes. It is no argument against the possibility or desirability of abstinence to say that it is difficult for the vast majority of mankind. What was not possible for the vast majority a hundred years ago has been found possible today. And what is a hundred years in the cycle of time open to us for making infinite progress? If scientists are right, it was but yesterday that we found ourselves endowed with the human body. Who knows, who dare prescribe, its limitations? Indeed, every day we are discovering the infiniteness of its city for good as well as evil.

If the possibility and desirability of abstinence be admitted, we must find out and devise the means of attaining it. And as I have said in a previous article, life must be remodelled, if we are to live under restraint and discipline. We may not, as the vulgar saying goes, have the cake and eat it. If we would impose restraint upon the organs of procreation, we must impose it upon all the others. If the eye and the ear and the nose and the tongue, the hands and the feet are let loose, it is impossible to keep the primary organ under check. Most cases of irritability, hysteria, and even insanity which are wrongly ascribed to attempts at continence will in truth be found traceable to the incontinence of the other senses. No sin, no breach of Nature's laws, goes unpunished.

I must not quarrel about words. If self-control be an interference with Nature precisely in the same sense as contraceptives, be it so. I would still maintain that the one interference is lawful and desirable because it promotes the well-being of the individuals as well as society, whereas the other degrades both and, therefore, unlawful. Self-control is the surest and the only method of regulating the birth-rate. Birth control by contraceptives is race suicide.

Lastly, if the mine-owners are in the wrong and still win, they will do so not because the miners over breed, but because the miners have not learnt the lesson of restraint all along the line. If miners had no children, they would have no incentive for any betterment and they will have no provable cause for a rise in wages. Need they drink, gamble, smoke? Will it be any answer to say that mine-owners do all these things and yet have the upper hand? If the miners do not claim to be better than capitalists, what right have they to ask for the world’s sympathy? Is it to multiply capitalists and strengthen capitalism? We are called upon to pay homage to democracy under the promise of a better world when it reigns supreme. Let us not reproduce on a vast scale the evils we choose to ascribe to capitalists and capitalism.

\[1\] Vide "Conservation of Vital Energy", 2-9-1926

I am painfully conscious of the fact that self-control is not easily attainable. But its slowness need not ruffle us. Haste is waste. Impatience will not end the evil of excessive birth-rate among the proletariat. Workers among the proletariat have a tremendous task before them. Let them not rule out of their lives the lessons of restraint that the greatest teachers among mankind have handed to us out of the rich stores of their experiences. The fundamental truths they have given us were tested by them in a better laboratory than any equipped under the most up-to-date conditions. The necessity of self-control is the common teaching of them all.

Young India, 16-9-1926

357. ANTI-CONSCRIPTION

The following innocent manifesto has been issued in Europe by a special ad hoc committee whose address is 11, Abbey Road, Enfield, Middlesex, England. Its Hon. Secretary is Mr. H. Runham Brown:

During the War people in all the countries determined to throw off for ever the yoke of militarism, and, when peace came, the League of Nations was welcomed as the offspring of this hope. It is our duty to see that the terrible suffering of the War does not recur.

We call for some definite step towards complete disarmament, and the demilitarizing of the mind of civilized nations. The most effective measure towards this would be the universal abolition of conscription. We therefore ask the League of Nations to propose the abolition of compulsory military service in all countries as a first step towards true disarmament.

It is our belief that conscript armies, with their large corps of professional officers, are a grave menace to peace. Conscription involves the degradation of human personality, and the destruction of liberty. Barrack life, military drill, blind obedience to commands, however unjust and foolish they may be, and deliberate training for slaughter undermine respect for the individual, for democracy and human life.

1 This carried the signatures, among others, of Gandhiji and other prominent Indian leaders.

It is debasing human dignity to force men to give up their lives, or to inflict death against their will, or without conviction as to the justice of their action. The State which thinks itself entitled to force its citizens to go to war will never pay proper regard to the value and happiness of their lives in peace. Moreover, by conscription the militarist spirit of aggressiveness is implanted in the whole male population at the most impressionable age. By training for war men come to consider war as unavoidable and even desirable.

By the universal abolition of conscription, war will be made less easy. The Government of a country which maintains conscription has little difficulty in declaring war, for it can silence the whole population by a mobilization order. When Governments have to depend for support upon the voluntary consent of their peoples, they must necessarily exercise caution in their foreign policies.

In the first draft of the Covenant of the League of Nations, President Wilson¹ proposed to make conscription illegal in all affiliated countries. It is our duty to restore the original spirit which created the League, a spirit shared by many of those who fought in the war, and professed by many of the statesmen of the countries concerned. By the universal abolition of conscription we can take a decisive step towards peace and liberty. We therefore call upon all men and women of goodwill to help create in all countries a public opinion which will induce Governments and the League of Nations to take this definite step to rid the world of the spirit of militarism, and to open the way to a new era of freedom within nations and of fraternity between them.

The manifesto is signed by well-known men and women from England, Finland, France, Germany, India, Sweden, Holland, Czecho-slovakia, Belgium, Spain, Switzerland, Denmark, Austria, Japan and Norway. The first step towards the abolition of the military spirit is no doubt abolition of conscription. But the reformers will have to put up an immense struggle to secure State action in the desired direction. Each is afraid and distrustful² of his neighbour.

Young India, 16-9-1926

358. KHADI SERVICE

The Council of the All-India Spinners’ Association that was held recently, discussing the desirability of announcing a definite ¹Woodrow Wilson (1856-1924), 28th President of the U.S.A.

²The source has trustful; vide, however, “A Correction”, 7-10-1926.
Khadi Service, appointed a small committee to draft the constitution and circulate it for opinion among khadi workers. The best and cheapest method of circulating the constitution is through the medium of the Press. The draft constitution is published below. I hope that all those who are interested in khadi will send their considered opinion as early as possible. I invite specially the opinion of teachers and students in national educational institutions. There is in this Khadi Service almost limitless scope. Those who are satisfied with mere livelihood derived from service of the millions will find this Khadi Service to be attractive and all satisfying. The opinion of teachers and students will be most valuable in enabling the Council to fix an acceptable constitution. The following is the translation of the draft constitution.

KHAIDI SERVICE

There shall be under the All-India Spinners’ Association a service called the ‘Khadi Service’.

No one shall in future be accepted as a member of that service who does not hold a certificate from the Technical Department of the Association at present situated at the Satyagraha Ashram, Sabarmati.

QUALIFICATIONS OF CANDIDATES

No one who has not completed his 16th year, who has not a competent knowledge of the vernacular of his province, and of arithmetic, and who does not produce a certificate of good conduct and health, shall be admitted for instruction in the Technical Department.

INSTRUCTION

The course of instruction shall be not less than two years and shall include:

(a) all the processes that cotton has to go through up to weaving, that is, gathering, ginning, carding, spinning and weaving;

(b) a knowledge of Hindi or Hindustani, where candidates come from a province where Hindi or Hindustani is not the vernacular;

(c) a knowledge of book-keeping—indigenous and Western.

When the candidate has obtained a certificate of competency to the foregoing he will be sent to a khadi karyalaya in any of the provinces to gain practical experience for one season which extends to nearly 8 months. Any candidate who has obtained a satisfactory certificate from the head of the depot to which he has been sent for practical experience shall be enrolled as a member of the Khadi Service, provided, however, that no one shall be so enrolled who has either broken down in character or health during the course of instruction.

Any person so enrolled will be liable to serve in any depot wherever he is required by the Association. The salary shall be per month Rs. ... subject to such increase as may be fixed from time to time by the Khadi Service Board to be appointed by the Association.

Every candidate who wishes to avail himself of the Khadi Service shall be required on joining to sign the contract of service to be framed by the said board.

MISCELLANEOUS

Persons who do not wish to join the Khadi Service may also be admitted for instruction in the Technical Department. Preference, however, will always be given to those who wish to enter the Khadi Service.

There will be a short course of 3 months for those who merely want to learn hand-spinning and all the antecedent processes, that is, ginning, carding and sliver-making.

Every applicant for instruction whose application has been accepted will be required to deposit return fare for the place from which he or she comes, plus Rs. 3 to be utilized for his or her return in the event of his or her being dismissed from any cause whatsoever.

SCHOLARSHIP

A monthly scholarship of Rs. 12 for board, and free lodging, shall be given to those candidates for instruction who are thought to the entire satisfaction of the Director of the Technical Department to be too poor to pay for their board. No monetary payment will be made where the Department is able to conduct a common boarding-house for candidates.

RESERVATION

The Council reserves the right to alter or amend the constitution from time to time and frame by-laws, fix the terms of service, rules of discipline and deal with other matters not covered by the constitution. Nothing in this constitution shall affect the rights of those who are already in the employment of the A.I.S.A.

Young India, 16-9-1926
359. LETTER TO SHAUKAT ALI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 16, 1926

DEAR BIG BROTHER,

I have your letter. I am glad you have liked my reply to the appeal.

Start if you like by all means on the 17th but I shall have to leave for Bombay on the same day you arrive here. I have to do so in connection with the South African Deputation. I leave Bombay the same night, take silence also in the train. You shall have plenty of curds, bran bread and green vegetables when you come. I would like you to come next week. But if you are coming according to your programme, please send a wire to Anasuyabehn and she will inform me. The special bread will be prepared only after you are here. It won’t take much time as I shall keep the ingredients ready.

Yours sincerely,

MAULANA SHAUKAT ALI
BOMBAY

From a photostat: S. N. 19693

360. LETTER TO DR. PRANJIVAN MEHTA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Bhadra Sud 9, September 16, 1926

BHAISHRI PRANJIVAN,

I wrote a letter to you about Jeki¹. I send with this her own letter. You now seem to be well enough to have started working. You have been so careful about your health that I need not tell you not to overwork. Please send money regularly to Jeki. Also let me know whether I should send her expenses for the journey here, and whether I should let her come here. If possible, kindly reply by wire.

Vandemataram from

MOHANDAS

DR. P. J. MEHTA
14, Mogul St.
RANGOON

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12282

¹ Addressee’s daughter who was then at the Sabarmati Ashram
361. LETTER TO ESTHER MENON

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 17, 1926

MY DEAR CHILD.

The Roman Catholic fast which you refer to in your letter is really no fasting at all, but there is or there was a real fast also amongst them. However, whether they have or they had or not is of no consequence to us. Neither fasting nor anything else that is imposed from without can be of any value. You need not have apologized for raising the question about Christ. In spite of most devout attention to every word ascribed to Jesus in the New Testament and in spite of my having read in a humble spirit all about Jesus, I have really not seen any fundamental distinction between him and the other great teachers. That you see a vast difference between Jesus and the other teachers I can understand, explain and appreciate. That is the teaching you have imbibed from childhood and you would read everything else with that unconscious conviction. Nobody taught me in my childhood to differentiate. I have therefore grown without bias one way or the other. I can pay equal homage to Jesus, Muhammed, Krishna, Buddha, Zoroaster and others that may be named. But this is not a matter for argument. It is a matter for each one’s deep and sacred conviction. I have no desire whatsoever to dislodge you from the exclusive homage you pay to Jesus. But I would like you to understand and appreciate the other inclusive position.

What Menon has told you about the pecuniary difficulty is quite correct. But so is your remark1. You will come here if God makes the way clear for you.

Yours,
BAPU

MRS. ESTHER MENON
PORTO NOVO

From a photostat of the original in N.A.I.; also My Dear Child, pp. 85-6

1 Of August 23, 1926
362. LETTER TO FRANCISCA STANDENATH

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 17, 1926

MY DEAR FRIEND,

I have your latest letter and the previous one also. I had intended to acknowledge the previous letter but pressure of work has prevented me from doing so. I have, however, been keeping myself in touch with you through Swami Anand, and latterly through Mirabai. You have given me no cause whatsoever for displeasure and let me assure you that it is difficult for me to be easily displeased.

I detected in your letters overmuch suspicion. Have you made yourself certain that your letters are intercepted or opened? And if they are, why not be totally indifferent? Instead of having Young India by registered post, will it not be better to have double copies, the second copy to follow next week, so as to ensure delivery either one week or the other? I suppose there is nothing to prevent the postal department from intercepting registered letters. If I were you, I would even offer to show them all the periodicals and letters I should receive if only they will deliver them promptly to me.

From a photostat: S.N. 10813

363. LETTER TO HELENE HAUSSDING

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 17, 1926

MY DEAR SPARROW,

I have your letter. I will send something to the German friend as per your advice. The boils were merely a figment of the imagination, and the imagination being braced up by the fresh breeze of Mussoorie, the boils have disappeared. I see you are quite in your element there. I hope you have persuaded yourself to stay there

1 Or March 22, 1926
2 Standenath had expressed doubt and concern about the due delivery of her mail to her.
3 Evidently, a fond nickname

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
beyond September. I assure you, neither Kripalani nor the students will take it amiss and I shall apologize for your absence and, if you like, take the burden of your sin if it is transferable. But I would like that distant chirp from Mussoorie rather than your boilful, constipated chirp from close quarters. I believe in the Latin proverb mens sana in corpore sano.

Devdas tells me you have an adopted son in Lucknow. I would strongly advise you not to go to your son till the cold weather or rather cool weather has set in. I would, therefore, like you to stay in Mussoorie as long as possible or ask the son of your adoptions to found a home in a cooler place and take you there.

Yours sincerely,

From a photostat: S. N. 19694

364. LETTER TO P. A. WADIA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 17, 1926

DEAR FRIEND

I have your letter giving me a copy of your speech delivered at the Dadabhoy1 Jayanti. I have read your speech. Whilst it is good, I do not see anything original about it and you have introduced a thought about Dadabhoy which, perhaps, he himself, if he was alive, would repudiate. Dadabhoy’s appeal was first and foremost to the self in us, secondarily to the outsiders.

I am returning your speech as requested by you.

Yours sincerely,

Encl. 1.
P. A. WADIA, ESQ.
HORMAZD VILLA
MALABAR HILL
BOMBAY

From a photostat: SAN. 19696

1 Dadabhai Naoroji
DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. Here are my answers:

1. I have simply cited the instance of George Muller as I have heard. I believe in the possibility of a heart prayer being answered in the manner George Muller’s is supposed to have been. It does not mean that George Muller did not work for his daily bread. He prayed for the support of a philanthropic institution which he conducted. His life otherwise was a most strenuous life. But it is said of him that he never stretched forth his hand for begging except to God.

2. I have not studied the miracles from the miraculous standpoint. I neither believe nor disbelieve them. I hold that they ought not to affect our conduct one way or the other.

3. I think it is highly probable that the period of our life is fixed, that is to say, the number of breaths we are to take, but that it is possible for us to regulate the duration of breaths and thus apparently prolong life. This is a question of which I have not made any study and I do not allow it to worry me. I have, therefore, given you not my own experience or positive belief but that belief of some people which has commended itself to me.

4. They have no doubt a cooling effect. But they are also in a way stimulants. But you should know that at the present moment I am not myself discarding at least goat’s milk. But my belief in the advisability, wherever health permits, of avoiding milk and its products—curds, etc.,—for the sake of making brahmacharya easier to practise remains unchanged.

5. It is a fact that I forgo the last meal if I have not been able to take it before sunset. It is a good, rule for a brahmachari to follow.

6. I do take walking exercise regularly. I keep myself fit for work by regular habits and by a proper selection of food and observing moderation in the quantity I take and by exercising restraint upon the other senses.

7. Monday is a day of silence for me. I do edit Young India at least partly on Mondays but, since the operation, I have not been fasting on Mondays. I do recommend a weekly fast to young men who lead busy lives and who are not particular about the quality and the quantity of the food they take. A weekly fast wisely managed is a help rather than a hindrance to the performance of all work, especially when it is mental.

8. A teacher best serves his pupils by living an absolutely exemplary life in every particular and by completely identifying himself with his pupils.

Yours sincerely,

SIT. SHEWAKRAM KARAMCHAND
TEACHER
M.A.V. SCHOOL
OLD SUKKUR

From a photostat: S.N. 19697

366. LETTER TO B. N. MAZUMDAR

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 17, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter for which I thank you. Let us not confuse the issue by raising the question of divorce. The only question to be considered is whether a widow should have the same right and free choice as the widower, and, secondly, whether a girl of tender years, even 15, who has been practically forcibly raped and after the rape becomes, according to the present mistaken belief, a widow, should have the right to marry, or if you like, to remarry a properly qualified person or not.

I would like you not to be shocked at the use of the word rape in this connection. I want you to be shocked at what is today happening in our society. Today the chastity which we impute to widows has been discovered to be amiss. Secret vice that is corrupting society and which now and then sees light of day should be a sufficient warning to us against taking the name of purity, religion, morality in connection with widowhood. What we need to be protected against is not the absolutely necessary remarriage of young widows but the inhuman lust of men in Hindu society. Have you studied the case of men who have more than one wife? Or of old men almost on the brink of the grave marrying girls of 11 and 12 years? Such cases happened only the other day in Western India and in southern India and I have knowledge of such cases all over India.

Yours sincerely,

SIT. B. N. MAZUMDAR
ASST. ENGINEER, P.W.D., BENGAL
3, CHARNOCK PLACE
CALCUTTA

From a photostat: S.N. 19698

367. LETTER TO PATRICK DUNCAN

SABARMATI,
September 17, 1926

DEAR MR. DUNCAN 1,

I tender my welcome to you and your colleagues. I hope to attend the at-home of Sunday. If you wish to see me before the at-home, please telephone at Laburnum Road. I do not know the telephone number of my host. Mrs. Naidoo will give it to you. I expect to reach Bombay Sunday morning and leave it Sunday night. 2

Yours sincerely,
M. K. GANDHI

From a copy : Duncan Papers. Courtesy : University Library. Cape town

368. LETTER TO GOPABANDHU DAS

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 18, 1926

DEAR GOPABANDHU BABU,

I have your letter. 3 It is a tragic picture you have given of Orissa. My advice to you is not to travel about thinking of giving relief here,

1 Leader of the South African Deputation that arrived in India on September 19, 1926; vide "That Round Table Conference", 22-7-1926 and "Message to African Deputation", 15-9-1926.
2 ibid.
3 Gopabandhu Das had written on September 10, 1926, giving details of the Orissa floods, repeating his request for an expert Khadi organizer and complaining of his own illness (S.N. 10992).
there and everywhere. Let us recognize our limitations in all humility. We are not gods but mere frail insignificant human beings. We have no Government to help us. Even our own organization, the Congress, is shattered to pieces. We have no control over an army of workers. We are scattered individuals. If we recognize this limitation we shall not worry and shall find enough work to do. Thus reduced to its simplest term, the problem is easy of solution. You should simply select an area which you can cope with and settle down there and develop it steadily in every way. No more is required of you or any single soul on earth than this. You will have given all you have in the best manner possible.

I wish I could send you someone. Unfortunately, I have no one who can go there and organize. That is my limitation. You should yourself become an expert and if you have any worker, he should become an expert. What is Govinda Babu doing? And is there no expert yet trained in Khadi Department?

Orissa haunts me like a nightmare. Such a splendid country and yet poverty-stricken; its workers good and yet so helpless. Do not wear away your constitution uselessly going about, but preserve it by observing the simple rules of health. Please keep me informed of what is going on.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

PANDIT GOPABANDHU DAS
BURMAN DAK BUNGALOW
CUTTACK

From a photostat: S.N. 10997

369. LETTER TO PYARELAL

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 18, 1926

MY DEAR PYARELAL,

I have your letter. I shall certainly go through the notes you have sent me in reply to the questions raised by Sir Henry Lawrence.

The account you gave me of your encounter with the City Magistrate is excruciatingly funny. It is a fine example of arrogance, ignorance and red tape combined in one person.
I wish Mathuradas will now do without a cook. Your description of the Pathashala of Wai does not surprise me. Without burning sympathy for the poor people it is impossible to appreciate the necessity of spinning.

I am going for one day tonight to Bombay returning Monday morning. I have to go in connection with the South African Deputation. Mahadev alone is coming with me. You will give me a full description of the new abode when you have gone there.

Yours,

From a photostat: S.N. 19699

370. LETTER TO R. K. KARANTHA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 18, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I do not feel inclined to publish it in Young India unless I can verify the information you have given from the experience of several other people. I am in touch with men who have gone in for these postures but they are not able to certify to the certainty of the result that in your own case has been fortunately attained. I am forwarding your letter to the Swami himself for his criticism.

Yours sincerely,

SIT. R. K KARANTHA
GLADHURST
SANTA CRUZ
BOMBAY

From a microfilm: S.N. 19701

371. LETTER TO SWAMI KUVALAYANANDA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 18, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I enclose herewith a letter for your perusal and remarks. If you have any positive results which you can precisely vouch for in the 1Swami Kuvalayananda; vide the succeeding item.

direction suggested by the correspondent and if you will let me have them, I shall value them and put some young men to practise the postures. You may suggest if they can be undertaken without personal touch.

Yours sincerely,

SWAMI KUVALAYANANDA
KAIVALYA DHAMA
KUNJAVANA
LONAVALA POST
[BOMBAY]

From a photostat: S.N. 19700

372. LETTER TO S. NARAYANA IYER

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 18, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. The only thing I can suggest for your friend is that he should have no excitement. He should live all the 24 hours in the open air. He should be constantly keeping his body and mind engaged in pure work and pure thought. He should take such gentle exercise as would not unduly tire him. He should omit pulse, eat rice sparingly, avoid all condiments, and he should take a hip-bath in cold water daily on an empty stomach. And he must pray incessantly to God for a pure heart. He must retire early to bed and get up very early.

Yours sincerely,

SIT. S. NARAYANA IYER
2/15 NAMASIVAYA MUDALI STREET
TRIPLICANE, MADRAS

From a photostat: S.N. 19702

1 Vide the preceding item.
373. A LETTER

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

September 18, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. You can learn carding and spinning without any difficulty in Bombay if you apply to Mrs. Avantikabai Gokhale, Bhatwadi, Girgaum or to Mr. Vithaldas Jerajani, Khadi Bhandar, Princess Street, Bombay or to Mr. Kotak, Khadi Bhandar, Kalbadevi, Bombay. And when you have acquired the art, you can learn weaving by going to one of the khadi centres such as Bardoli, Ahmedabad, etc. But if you become an expert in carding and spinning, it is unnecessary for you to become a weaver, because the race of weavers is not yet dead and all the yarn you spin can be easily woven.

Yours sincerely

From a microfilm: S. N. 19703

374. LETTER TO NARAHARI PARikh

Saturday, September 18, 1926

BHAISHRI NARAHARI,

You have not asked for a reply to your letter, but I wished to write a long one. In my view the step which you have taken is correct. I understand Nanabhai’s point of view, but to me wearing khadi and spinning are as essential a part of education as learning Gujarati. This is not being a missionary. I shall be patient in regard to your decision. Sometimes problems solve themselves.

Blessings from

BAPU

SHRI N. D. PARikh

LOKAMANYA R. V. MANDIR

SURAT

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19550

1 The addressee is not known.

330 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
375. MY NOTES

PERENNIAL QUESTIONS

A reader of Navajivan charged with spiritual aspiration insists on his questions being answered through Navajivan. I feel some hesitation and am also doubtful whether Navajivan is the appropriate place for answering these questions, which moreover are not new. They have troubled people since time immemorial. Nevertheless, I cannot bring myself to reject the correspondent’s request. I, therefore, venture to reproduce here his questions and my answers to them.

Should one meditate on God?

One has to do this so that one may know God through the intellect and feel His presence in the heart.

If meditation is essential, how should it be done?

All-transcending and without form, God cannot be apprehended even through meditation. Meditating on the impersonal is hard for embodied beings. So one should meditate on a manifestation of God in personal form. In this age and in this country, that form is Daridranarayana. The only way of meditating on Him is to serve the poor. There may be different ways of serving the poor, but in India the root cause of poverty is idleness and unemployment. In order that people may shake off their laziness, we should spin ourselves and persuade them also to spin and thereby provide them innocent employment. With every breath we take, we should utter this name, Daridranarayana, and should see him in our imagination pleased and smiling with satisfaction with every revolution of the spinning-wheel.

What are the attributes of God?

The answer to this question is included in what is stated above, and it does not, therefore, require a separate answer. But let me repeat it and say that He alone knows His attributes, or, rather, that those who have been able to know them have not succeeded in expressing them in words. He is beyond the reach of language; the language in which He can be adequately described has not yet been discovered. So it is that we worship Him as Matsya¹, Varah², Narsimha³, or in human form⁴, as suits the temperament of each of us. In doing this, all of us

¹ Incarnation of Vishnu as Fish
² Incarnation of Vishnu as Boar
³ Incarnation of Vishnu as Man-lion
⁴ Incarnation of Vishnu as Rama and Krishna simultaneously follow and do not follow truth. We follow it from our point of view, but do not follow it from the point of view of others who disagree with us. In the eyes of God, we both follow and do not follow truth.

SPINNING-WHEEL AND SELF-PURIFICATION

A worker writes from Vedchhi:

One is rewarded according to one’s faith. A Farahad breaking stones for a living got a Shirin. The spinning-wheel will have the power which we put into it. If the sacred mantra and similar verbal symbols have immense power in them, it is because we have absolute faith in their power and do tapascharya in order that our faith may bear fruit. In the same way, if we try to spread the use of the spinning-wheel with the faith that we shall thereby serve the poor and purify both society and ourselves, and if we do tapascharya, even lay down our lives, in order that our faith may be rewarded, it certainly will be rewarded.

Something like this has happened in Vedchhi. Propaganda against the drink-evil can succeed only if carried on in this spirit. A drink addict will not respond if we simply ask him to give up drinking. It is a language which he does not understand. If, however, we live as his neighbour and, by our example, persuade him to employ himself in useful work, he would give up drinking. The drink-addicts in Vedchhi seem to have responded to such an appeal. We would succeed in all other places if we worked with similar patience and faith.

But I should like to say one thing to all workers so that they may be vigilant. The change which we see now will prove illusory and disappear in a few days if the work is not kept up. To ensure that the transformation in the lives of the people becomes permanent, the workers in the respective villages should remain alert and go on with their work without stopping or relaxing their effort.

---

1 The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had described the transformation in the lives of Chodharas in the Bardoli taluka in Gujarat since the spinning-wheel had been introduced among them.
AN OLD SPINNING SONG

A resident of Bardoli taluka writes:¹

The song has a spiritual meaning which is easy enough to understand.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 19-9-1926

376. INTERVIEW TO "THE NATAL ADVERTISER":

[BOMBAY, September 19, 1926]

. . . He maintains that improvement of the masses is becoming progressively more acute every year, and his remedy is to encourage the peasant, who is unemployed for a great portion of the year while the weather is unpropitious, to take to spinning as a means of increasing his income, and of preventing the exploitation of India by the overseas manufacturer.

Foreign manufacturers take £40,000,000 from India annually for cotton cloth, and this can be saved if my charkha (spinning-wheel) movement receives adequate support.

He admitted that the foreign cloth, or the mill cloth of India, was a better and cheaper textile than the homespun; but when asked whether his movement as a remonstrance against the overwhelming forces of labour saving machinery and mass production was not as futile as the action of those who destroyed labour-saving machinery in England to keep up the number of hand-workers, he demurred, adding that Indian philosophy was such that his movement was bound to succeed. (A millowner’s subsequent rejoinder to this contention was: "But how can it succeed when hand-spinning can only earn one-third of what can be earned daily by mill-hands at incomparably easier work?") In reply to questions, Gandhiji said the movement was "deeply religious", though without ritual—but propagated by some literature and the holding of meetings. He claimed that the mere introduction of ¹ The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had reproduced in the letter a song which an old woman had recited to him and which she herself had learnt from her mother who used to sing it while spinning.

² On September 18 Gandhiji left Ahmedabad to greet the members of the South African Delegation in Bombay. This meeting took place on September 19 in Sarojini Naidu’s rooms at the Taj Mahal Hotel. The extract is from a report by the correspondent of The Natal Advertiser datelined: Poona, September 21, reproduced by The Hindu.

VOL. 36 : 8 JULY, 1926 - 10 NOVEMBER, 1926 333
hand-spinning had its regenerative influence upon the community, and said its political significance would be realized, because of the universal confidence that would be won by the ultimate success of the movement. . . .

_The Hindu, 3-12-1926_

377. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

_[September 19, 1926]^{1}_

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

_The Bombay Samachar_ mistook me for you and published the information that I was ill. So they thought I was not coming. How nice it would have been if you had gone with a message from me! But it turned out to be only a rumour. I had a long chat with all the members of the deputation, at Mrs. Naidu’s room. We talked most of the time about khaddar. They wanted to know why I was so heavily clad. The answer was a sermon on khaddar in which they were deeply interested. Did not see Jahangir anywhere. Met Sir M. Habibulla and had a long chat.

Yes, I may come tomorrow and spin to amuse you. You must not leave till you are strong enough to go.

With love,

_Yours,_

Mohan

From a photostat: G.N. 2636

378. TELEGRAM TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

_Sabarmati,_

_September 20, 1926_

JAMNALAL BAJAJ

SHREE

BOMBAY

THANK GOD. ANXIOUSLY AWAITING PARTICULARS.

_BAPU_

_Panchven Putrako Bapuke Ashirvad, p. 58_

^{1}_Gandhiji met the South-African Deputation in Bombay on September 19, and left for Ahmedabad the next day as indicated in the letter.
379. LETTER TO RAMI PAREKH

Monday [September 20, 1926]¹

CHI. RAMI,

I received your first letter only today. Always write like this. Look after Kusum. Keep me posted with news of her. All are well here. Kunvarji² came yesterday. I had been to Bombay for a day.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 9700

380. LETTER TO JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
September 21, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter¹ together with the original terms from the Macmillan Company. There is only one exception that I feel should be made to clause 1. Cession of the rights to the English-speaking world should not include India. My desire is to let the English-knowing public in India have the cheapest possible edition and I think too that the Indian edition should be published in India. The circulation of the Indian edition can be easily restricted to India.

I suppose the Macmillan Company know that I propose publishing parts in book form now as each part is completed from time to time. This would remain unaffected by the proposed contract. It is open to them if they wish to publish the book in parts, in which case circulation of parts outside India can be stopped.

Yours sincerely,

REV. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
12 PARK AVENUE
NEW YORK CITY

From a copy: S.N. 32229

¹From the S.N. register
²Kunvarji Parekh, addressee's husband
³Dated August 18, 1926, which was in reply to Gandhiji’s letter dated July 9, 1926.

381. LETTER TO A. W. BAKER

THE ASHRAM,
Sabarmati,
September 21, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I appreciate the fact that you are continuously thinking of me. I did not know that you had taken up residence at North Shepstone. I hope Mrs. Baker is profiting by her stay at the beautiful seaside. I do hold with you that truth is one, but we only see it through the glass darkly, and only in part and each according to his light. The result is naturally a multitude of viewpoints. But if all proceed like the beams of the sun from one central fact, all is well. But I don't want to argue. Though we may differ, I know that we are all sailing in the same direction.

Yours sincerely,

A. W. BAKER, ESQ.
NORTH SHEPSTONE
NATAL.

From a photostat: SAN. 10815

382. LETTER TO HARDAYAL NAG

THE ASHRAM,
Sabarmati,
September 21, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I must say I do not like your khaddar programme. You do not advance the cause of khadi by importing Chandpur spun yarn and getting it woven there. What you want to spread is spinning among your boys. They may become weavers by all means but then they must weave what they themselves spin. If you will only get your boys to spin, the whole of your stock of cotton can be consumed on the spot. And surely there must be some volunteers

1 In his letter of August 24, Baker had asked Gandhiji: “May not Gautama the Buddha and Confucius have been also reflectors of that one Supreme Truth in preparation for the great unveiling in Jesus the Christ the Light of the World? . . .” (S.N. 10802).

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
in Chandpur who are also spinning. In many parts [of] Bengal and other parts of India, spinning is being done although there is no local cotton grown.

Yours sincerely,

BABU HARDAYAL NAG
CHANDPUR
BENGAL

From a microfilm: S.N. 19704

383. LETTER TO DR. SATYAPAL

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 21, 1926

DEAR DR. SATYAPAL

I have your letter. I wish I could persuade you not to embark upon this newspaper enterprise. It can do no earthly good. We have too many papers and I am satisfied that you will not advance the national cause by adding one more to the army of newspapers that have already grown into a nuisance. If you have got honest workers by your side, why engage them in writing what everybody knows? Why not take whatever constructive work they are capable of doing? Each worker is worth more than a newspaper. You will only make [for] turbidity of the atmosphere by launching out upon your enterprise. But if I cannot persuade [you] to desist at least do pleaselet me have my own way. Recently I have been declining to write for newspapers altogether. But there the main reason is health consideration. I am altogether overworked. If I can help it I would even stop writing for Young India and Navajivan for the time being but that I dare not do. However, I do not want to put you off with any other reason but the main one.

Yours sincerely,

From a photostat. S.N. 19705
384. LETTER TO MUNNALAL G. SHAH

SABARMATI,
Bhadra Sud 15 [September 21, 1926]

BHAISHRI MUNNALAL,

I have your letter. Lists of publications by the Navajivan Prakashan Mandir are often published in Navajivan. I have not asserted that cow-sacrifice is mentioned in the Vedas, I do not know whether it is so mentioned. Mantras from the Vedas are recited daily in the Ashram. You need not believe everything that may be said about me. Whenever you feel a doubt, you may write to me and ascertain the facts.

MOHANDAS GANDHI

SIT. MOTILAL NATHUSHA
RAJAPARA
GOTIMOHALLA
BURHANPUR

From a photostat of the Gujarati: C.W. 6989. Courtesy: Munnalal G. Shah

385. LETTER TO RAMESHWAR DAS PODDAR

Bhadra Sud 15 [September 21, 1926]

MY DEAR RAMESHWAR DASJI,

I have your letter. There are about 2,500 subscribers of Hindi Navajivan. For it to become self-supporting 500 more will be required. I do not know exactly how many of them may be from Maharashtra. It would not help to increase the subscription to Rs. 2. You must not worry. Repeat Ramanama every day.

Yours,
MOHANDAS

From the Hindi original: G.N. 166

386. HAND-SPINNING IN MYSORE

The Director of Industries in Mysore, Mr. Z. Meccai, has prepared an interesting note on hand-spinning in Mysore. I publish 1It appears this was sent care of Motilal Nathusha.

2From the postmark
3*ibid.*
the following condensation of the notes:¹

I congratulate the Mysore authorities upon the encouragement they are giving to the revival of the only universal cottage industry of India. I commend to their attention the experience of the All-India Spinners’ Association. It has found by experiment and observation that it is advisable to introduce hand-ginning simultaneously with hand-spinning. This is easiest in the districts where cotton is grown. Where it is not grown but where it is possible to grow, encouragement should be given to grow it locally. Machine-ginned and machine-pressed cotton loses its vitality and is more difficult to treat with the hand-bow than hand-ginned cotton. In several parts of India, the spinners take seed-cotton. Spinners should also be encouraged to do their own carding. The performance by the spinner of the two processes doubles his wage. With a view to increasing the strength of hand-spun yarn, the State should undertake periodically to test the hand-spun yarn and publish results. Indeed, the whole subject needs to be treated in a scientific manner. And who can be more fitted to do so than a State like Mysore?

Young India, 23-9-1926

387. NON-RESISTANCE TRUE AND FALSE

America is the home of inter-racial conflict on a vast scale. There are earnest men and women in that land of enterprises who are seeking to solve the difficult problem along the lines of non-resistance. One such American² friend sends me a paper called the Inquiry which contains an interesting discussion on the doctrine of non-resistance. It consists of instances that might possibly be grouped under non-resistance. I select three samples:

A Chinese student related his experiences at the State University from which he was about to graduate. His reception there had been anything but friendly for the most part, although a few men had gone out of their way to befriend him one of them even inviting the Chinese to his home for a week-end. On the other hand, a fellow-student who occupied a room next to his made himself particularly obnoxious, throwing shoes against his door and ¹ This is not reproduced here. It furnished a detailed report of the measures taken by the Mysore Industries Department to promote hand-spinning.

² This was a mistake. The sender was not an American but an Indian; vide “A Correction”, 7-10-1926.
indulging in other pranks. The Chinese overheard this student express horror on finding that an American had taken him home to introduce him to his mother and sister, and immediately he made up his mind that he would teach this student to respect him, not for his own sake, but for the sake of his dear motherland.

So he went out of his way to be friendly to his neighbour. Every day he gave him a smiling good morning though at first he received no response. He ignored every insult, but tried to make himself pleasant and useful. When he knew his neighbour to be hard up he casually invited him to go to a movie with him. Gradually they talked together more often and found that they had several interests in common. After a while this student invited him to his home.

“We have become warm friends,” concluded the Chinese, “I have since spent many holidays and week-ends at his home; and on leaving the university
I shall know that one of my fellow-students at least will regretfully miss me.”

The secretary of a railroad Young Men’s Christian Association brought one evening into the building twelve Danes, working on the railroad, who had no place to sleep. The English-speaking men, under the sway of racial antipathy, began to object and protested against the foreigners being brought in. Among these newcomers however was a skilled musician, who, while the Americans were presenting their objections to the secretary, began to play upon the accordion. He discoursed sweet music, which soon had its effect. The ire on the faces of the native-born soon began to vanish; the censure died on their lips; their hearts were softened; and that night they sat up late listening to the foreigner playing—Peter Roberts, The New Immigration. The Macmillan Co., 1922, p. 300.

There is a colony of Japanese in X, California. Several years ago some real estate agents sought to sell a considerable amount of land to other Japanese, and the white people were aroused at the thought of a great influx of these people. Meetings were held and a big sign was put on the main boulevard which read: “No Japanese wanted here.”

The old resident Japanese of X, who had lived on good terms with the white people being members of their Farmers’ Association, went to the white people and, after consultation finally agreed with them that a further increase in the Japanese population would not be a Good thing. The sign was changed to read: “No more Japanese wanted here.”

The person who tells this story contends that this action advanced the solidarity of the community and improved relations between the whites and the Japanese in that place, as witness the following:

“The Japanese of X, learning that the American church was in financial difficulties offered to give a definite amount yearly for its support, in addition to carrying on their own Japanese church work.”

Now the first easily comes under true non-resistance. The second is more an instance of presence of mind than non-resistance. The third, from the facts as stated, is an instance, if not of cowardice, as contended by some of the debators, certainly of selfishness. The resident Japanese population in order to retain their earthly possessions agreed to the prohibition of further Japanese immigration. It may have been sound policy. It may have been the only policy advisable. But it was not non-resistance.

Non-resistance is restraint voluntarily undertaken for the good of society. It is, therefore, an intensely active, purifying, inward force. It is often antagonistic to the material good of the non-resister. It may even mean his utter material ruin. It is rooted in internal strength, never weakness. It must be consciously exercised. It, therefore, presupposes ability to offer physical resistance. In the last instance, therefore, the Japanese would have non-resisted, if they had left all their possessions rather than surrendered the rights of prospective immigrants. They might also have suffered death [by] lynching without even mental retaliation and thus melted the hearts of their persecutors. It was no victory of truth that, without any inconvenience to themselves, they were able to retain their property. In terms of non-resistance, their contribution to the American church in its difficulty was a bribe, by no means a token of goodwill or a free gift.

The acquisition of the spirit of non-resistance is a matter of long training in self-denial and appreciation of the hidden forces within ourselves. It changes one’s outlook upon life. It puts different values upon things and upsets previous calculations. And when once it is set in motion, its effect, if it is intensive enough, can overtake the whole universe. It is the greatest force because it is the highest expression of the soul. All need not possess the same measure of conscious non-resistance for its full operation. It is enough for one person only to possess it, even as one general is enough to regulate and dispose of the energy of millions of soldiers who enlist under his banner though they know not the why and wherefore of his dispositions. The monkeys of one Rama were enough to confound the innumerable host armed from head to foot of the ten-headed Ravana.

Young India, 23-9-1926

VOL. 36 : 8 JULY, 1926 - 10 NOVEMBER, 1926 341
388. NO FAITH IN PRAYER

Here is a letter written by a student to the Principal of a national institution asking to be excused from attending its prayer meetings:

I beg to state that I have no belief in prayer, as I do not believe in anything known as God to whom I should pray. I never feel any necessity of supposing a god for myself. What do I lose if I do not care for Him and calmly and sincerely work my own schemes?

So far as congregational prayer is concerned, it is of no use. Can such a huge mass of men enter, into any mental concentration upon a thing, however trifling it may be? Are the little and ignorant children, expected to fix their fickle attention on the subtlest ideas of our great scriptures, God and soul and equality of all men and many other high sounding phrases? This great performance is required to be done at a particular time at the command of a particular man. Can love for the so called Lord take its root in the hearts of boys by any such mechanical function? Nothing can be more repugnant to reason than to expect the same behaviour from men of every temperament. Therefore, prayer should not be a compulsion. Let those pray who have a taste for it and those avoid who dislike it. Anything done without conviction is an immoral and degrading action.

Let us first examine the worth of the last idea. Is it an immoral and degrading act to submit to discipline before one begins to have conviction about its necessity? Is it immoral and degrading to study subjects according to the school syllabus if one has no conviction about its utility? May a boy be excused from studying his vernacular if he has persuaded himself that it is useless? Is it not truer to say that a school boy has no conviction about the things he has to learn or the discipline he has to go through? His choice is exhausted if he had it, when he elected to belong to an institution. His joining one means that he will willingly submit to its rules and regulations. It is open to hint to leave it, but he may not choose what or how he will learn.

It is for teachers to make attractive and intelligible what to the pupils may at first appear repulsive or uninteresting.

It is easy enough to say, ‘I do not believe in God.’ For God permits all things to be said of Him with impunity. He looks at our acts. And any breach of His law carried with it, not its vindictive, but its purifying, compelling, punishment. God’s existence cannot be, does not need to be, proved. God is. If He is not felt, so much the worse for us. The absence of feeling is a disease which we shall some
But a boy may not argue. He must, out of a sense of discipline, attend prayer meetings if the institution to which he belongs requires such attendance. He may respectfully put his doubts before his teachers. He need not believe what does not appeal to him. But if he has respect for his teachers, he will do without believing what he is asked to do, not out of fear, not out of churlishness, but with the knowledge that it is right for him so to do and with the hope that what is dark to him today will some day be made clear to him.

Prayer is not an asking. It is a longing of the soul. It is a daily admission of one’s weakness. The tallest among us has a perpetual reminder of his nothingness before death, disease, old age, accidents, etc. We are living in the midst of death. What is the value of “working for our own schemes” when they might be reduced to naught in the twinkling of an eye, or when we may be equally swiftly and unawares be taken away from them? But we may feel strong as a rock, if we could truthfully say: “We work for God and His schemes.” Then all is as clear as daylight. Then nothing perishes. All perishing is then only what seems. Death and destruction have then, but only then, no reality about them. For death or destruction is then but a change. An artist destroys his picture for creating a better one. A watch-maker throws away a bad spring to put in a new and useful one.

A congregational prayer is a mighty thing. What we do not often do alone, we do together. Boys do not need conviction. If they merely attend in obedience to the call to prayer without inward resistance, they feel the exaltation. But many do not. They are even mischievous. All the same the unconscious effect cannot be resisted. Are there not boys who at the commencement of their career were scoffers but who subsequently became mighty believers in the efficacy of congregational prayer? It is a common experience for men who have no robust faith to seek the comfort of congregational prayer. All who flock to churches, temples, or mosques are not scoffers or humbugs. They are honest men and women. For them congregational prayer is like a daily bath, a necessity, of their existence. These places of worship are not a mere idle superstition to be swept away at the first opportunity. They have survived all attacks up to now and are likely to persist to the end of time.

Young India, 23-9-1926
389. RELIGION OF VOLUNTEERS

After showing that in this land of many religions, a volunteer is hard put to it to find a common denominator of conduct, a correspondent thus eloquently described the religion of a volunteer:

Stripped of the eloquence, this religion of Truth again resolves itself into its component parts—Hinduism, Islam, Christianity, etc. For Truth will appear to most sincere and conscientious Hindus, Mussalmans and Christians as Hinduism, Islam and Christianity, respectively, as they believe them.

The golden rule of conduct, therefore, is mutual toleration seeing that we will never all think alike and that we shall always see Truth in fragment and from different angles of vision. Conscience is not the same thing for all. Whilst, therefore, it is a good guide for individual conduct, imposition of that conduct upon all will be an insufferable interference with everybody else's freedom of conscience. It is a much-abused term. Have all people a conscience? Has a cannibal a conscience? Must he be allowed to act according to the dictates of his conscience which tells him that it is his duty to kill and eat his fellows? Now the etymological meaning of conscience is 'true knowledge'. The dictionary meaning is 'faculty distinguishing between right and wrong and influencing conduct accordingly'. Possession of such a faculty is possible only for a trained person, that is, one who has undergone discipline and learnt to listen to the inner voice. But even amongst the most conscientious persons, there will be room enough for honest differences of opinion. The only possible rule of conduct in any civilized society is therefore mutual toleration. It can be inculcated among and practised by all irrespective of their status and training.

Young India, 23-9-1926

390. KHADI HAWKING IN NORTH MAHARASHTRA

Mr. V. V. Dastane reports that between 31st August and 7th September, assisted in each place by local helpers, Mr. Bharucha hawked khadi worth Rs. 3,597 in Chalisgaon, Pachora, Bhusaval,

1 The letter is not reproduced here. The correspondent had emphasized that Truth, as the essence of all religions, should be the religion of the volunteer, and be above all denominational religions.
Akola and Jalgaon. He states that all Khandesh stock was exhausted and that had they included khadi from outside they would have sold much more.

Young India, 23-9-1926

391. RETURNED EMIGRANTS

I appreciate the anxiety of Pandit Benarsidas¹ to save the unfortunate people from another disappointment by those who were domiciled in Fiji being sent to British Guiana. Though the difference between the two countries is great, the experiment is worth trying if the Fiji men desire to go on British Guiana and if that Government will take them notwithstanding the knowledge that they belong to Fiji. So far as the Colonial-borns are concerned, I feel sure that though they may have a knowledge of what is known as kitchen Hindustani, they will not be happy except in the Colonies. The vital issues referred to by Pandit Benarsidas must be dealt with later.²

Young India, 23-9-1926

392. THE CURSE OF ‘I’ AND ‘MINE’

The following condensed report of Sjt. Satis Chandra Mukerjee’s speech delivered at a peace meeting the other day at Darbhanga will be read with interest and profit:³

If we could erase the “I’s” and the “Mine’s” from religion, politics, economics, etc., we shall soon be free and bring heaven upon earth.

Young India, 23-9-1926

¹ For Benarsidas Chaturvedi’s letter to Editor, Young India, vide “Letter from Benarsidas Chaturvedi”, 23-9-1926.
² Benarsidas Chaturvedi wrote again and Gandhiji had fresh comments to offer; vide “Returned Emigrants”, 4-11-1926.
³ This is not reproduced here. The writer’s thesis was that the feeling of “I” and “mine” was responsible for much of the communal intolerance and violence in the country, and that, indeed, a true understanding of all religions was possible only through regard for the universal virtues, Truth, Non-violence, etc.
393. NOTES

TO B. AGRA

I fix arbitrary limit nor do I restrict myself to hard and fast conditions. The widows should have the same freedom that men have. If widowhood is to remain pure, men will have to attain greater purity. After all widows can remarry only when there are men ready to marry them. It may, however, be laid down as a general rule that where a widow cannot restrain herself, she should have the freedom to remarry without incurring any odium. Is it not better that she marries openly than that she should sin secretly? In the case of child-widows there can be no question of opinion. They should be remarried by the parents. If the wives and widows in the fourth division are no better than beasts, which I totally deny and I claim to know something of them, the fault lies at the door of the so-called higher classes. You seem to forget the law that if one limb suffers, the whole body suffers. If one Sudra does evil, it harms the whole society, even as it harms himself and his special class or caste.

ONLY A FEW YEARS AGO

From Sjt. C. Balajee Rao’s note-book I cull the following extracts which he has copied from Gilbert Slater’s Some South Indian Villages, 1918 (University of Madras, Economic Studies). The extracts are valuable as showing what harm the disappearance of hand-spinning has brought to the villagers. There is no reason why the mischief should not be undone, if only we get sufficient workers to strive for the revival of the industry:\footnote{1}

Young India, 23-9-1926

394. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

[Before September 23, 1926]\footnote{2}

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

I have your note. There is no hurry about sending a wire. If you send me the car say at 2.30 p.m., I shall have finished the day’s work \footnote{1} Not reproduced here. These described the decline of subsidiary cottage industries following the disappearance of hand-spinning in several villages.

\footnote{2} The letter appears to have been written some time before September 23, the date of the succeeding item.
as much as possible and would reach there about 3.30, be with you for about an hour and come back in time to spin or may spin there while talking. Mridula\(^1\) may keep her wheel ready for me. You must on no account think of stirring out or leaving Ahmedabad in a hurry. Take your rest either there or here—but you must not stir till you are completely cured. More when we meet.

With love,

Yours,

Mohan

---

395. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

Thursday [September 23, 1926]\(^2\)

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

How naughty? But it is quite right to have complete rest. You must not think of going tomorrow nor the day after unless you are quite ready. I would come to you if you want me in body. If not, the body remains here and the spirit watches by your bedside.

With love,

Yours,

Mohan

---

396. LETTER TO EMIL RONIGER

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 23, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I had not seen Mirabehn’s letter to you. Evidently my words carried a meaning to her which I had not mended. I did not want her to write in my name and on my behalf. But interpreting my remarks in the manner she did, she was of course quite right in writing to you in my name. She has read to me her letter to you. I had not got from that letter that she said anything that might lead you to think that I was displeased. As a matter of fact, I am not inclined to quarrel with your preface even now and after your explanation and after your having recognized your own attitude.

\(^1\) Presumably, Mridula Sarabhai, daughter of Ambalal Sarabhai the Ahmedabad millowner

\(^2\) Andrews sailed for South Africa on September 29. The letter appears to have been written on the preceding Thursday, which was September 23.

In my opinion a publisher has every right in publishing certainly writings and dissent[ing] partly or wholly from the views expressed by the author or to tone them down. You know much better than I do what the European reader will approve of or can assimilate. You have, therefore, a perfect right to tone down my remarks.

I myself recognize the defects from a scientific point of view of the Guide to Health. In its translated form, I have never read it through. The information given in it about physiological facts is undoubtedly borrowed. The only value of the book consists in subordinating health or the body to that of the spirit within. When I wrote the chapters, I wrote them purely for the Gujarati readers of the Indian Opinion. I give you my assurance, therefore, that there was no question of my being displeased at all.

One thing certainly I did not like. Mis-translations and omissions of portions in the original. That I hold is unpardonable. A publisher should publish the whole of an author’s writings unless he has the author’s permission to delete passages and unless the publisher has informed the author of deletions. You will please, therefore, dismiss from your mind the slightest suspicion that I was either displeased or angry about anything you have done in connection with the publication of my writings.

Yours sincerely,

EMIL RONIGER, ESQ.
SCHWEIZ

From a photostat: S.N. 10819

397. LETTER TO KONDA VENKATAPPAYYA

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 23, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter.¹ I shan’t hastily advise the council to do away with the Andhra agency. But I have felt that both you and Seetharama

¹ Writing on September 18, Venkatappayya had deplored the possibility of having to close down of khadi agency at Guntur, as suggested by Gandhiji to Sitarama Sastri and given the assurance that by personal efforts and supervision they would ensure better conditions (S.N. 11238).
Shastri are too soft-hearted. My own opinion is that softness and ahimsa go ill together. You have to be sometimes hard in order to be really and truly kind. But in Andhra, I have been watching with the greatest pain the indiscipline practised under the name of liberty and unprincipled men getting the upper hand and doing what they like with impunity. Not that these things have not happened elsewhere. But in Andhra, perhaps, the evil has been moreaccentuated. Khadi can succeed today if we can get disciplined men with boundless faith in it and with no other irons in the fire. If you think that you and Seetharama Shastri have that absolute faith in khadi and if you think that you can be hard enough when occasion requires hardness, by all means continue the agency. But let there be no further experimenting in dilatoriness and compromising and pleading with people. The agency may be conducted on a business-like footing. And if you think that it is worth while coming here to discuss the whole situation, by all means do come and bring Seetharama Shastri and anybody else you like.

I hope your health is all right and that you have got over your domestic worries.

Yours sincerely,

KONDA VENKATAPPAYYA GARU
GUNTUR

From a microfilm: S.N. 11239

398. LETTER TO Z. M. PARET

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 23, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I actually wrote something for you and then destroyed it feeling that I was not doing justice to you. That is to say, instead of striving with you, I was yielding to your wish so as to avoid trouble. What I want to tell you is that you need not lead an organ to carry on temperance work. If you have sincere helpers, their time and your time will be a comparative waste. I have worked among drunkards both in South Africa and here. Do you know that you never reach them through writing? They are past reading anything, they are past being influenced by anything they read. It is the personal touch that wins them from drink if anything does at all.
Recently, I have taken to advising every friend who wants to publish a newspaper not to do so¹. I have resisted also the demand for writing for them. I want to do likewise with you, even if I cannot dissuade you from embarking on your enterprise. You might be too much committed to retrace your steps or you might hold diametrically opposite views as to the method of carrying on temperance work. I am unable to condemn such thought and action based thereon, only I would then like to have my way and if possible have it appreciated.²

Yours sincerely,

D. Z. M. PARET
EDITOR,
“POWRA PRABHA”
KOTTAYAM
S. INDIA

From a microfilm: S.N. 19706

399. LETTER TO NANALAL KAVI

THE ASHRAM
September 24, 1926

BHAIISHRI NANALAL KAVI,

I have your letter. Thanks. I did not write to you to invite you to act as a panch, but only requested your help as a friend. But I see that I have not been able to explain my point of view. I will, therefore, trouble you no further.

Vandemataram from

MOHANDAS

SHRINIVAS, SIR JAGMOHANDAS’S BUNGALOW
NAPEAN SEA ROAD
BOMBAY

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19951

¹ Vide”Letter to Dr. Satyapal”, 21-9-1926.
² Vide”Letter to Z. M. Paret”, 7-10-1926.
400. LETTER TO LAKSHMIDAS R. TAIRSEE

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

Friday, Bhadra Vad 3 [September 24, 1926]¹

BHAISHRI LAKSHMIDAS,

I have to reply to two letters from you, one about the boycott of British goods and the other concerning the deputation from South Africa. On reading the pamphlet about boycott, [I feel that] you have written it with a courage worthy of you. But I have not been impressed by your argument. I may not, on principle, agree with the idea of boycotting British goods, but I would certainly understand it if it was feasible and of benefit from a practical point of view. You have not been able to prove either its feasibility or its practical utility. On the contrary, after reading your pamphlet I feel that the boycott of British goods will be of no benefit even from the practical point of view. I am sure you will not want me to go into reasons. From you I would expect suggestions which are practicable. You are intelligent and would not, I believe, strike a blow which would fail in its aim. This blow which you have struck, I am afraid, has certainly failed in its aim.

We or the people wanted representatives from South Africa to visit this country. The Indian residents in South Africa also wanted that we should extend a welcome even to an enemy if we have invited him to our tent. The Conference² has been arranged because of the agitation here, and these gentlemen are here in connection with it. It is our clear duty to extend a welcome to them. By doing so, we strengthen our position so that we should be able to tell them what we feel about their laws. We cannot refuse to have anything to do with them by arguing that they have been invited here only by the Government and that we have nothing to do in the matter. We can certainly advance such an argument against anything done in defiance of public opinion. I was, therefore, surprised to read your letter. I had ¹ Reference in the letter to the delegation from South Africa indicates that the letter was written in 1926.

² The Round Table Conference on the Indian question in South Africa held at Cape from December 17, 1926 to January 13, 1927 thought that you, at any rate, would not fail to understand our clear duty of extending a welcome to the representatives.

SHRI LAKSHMIDAS TAIRSEE
BAZAAR GATE STREET
FORT
BOMBAY

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12283

401. LETTER TO JAMNADAS GANDHI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

Friday, Bhadra Vad 3, September 24, 1926

CHI. JAMNADAS,

The accompanying letter is from Shamaldas. Read out the main part of it to aunt. Preserve the letter or return it to me. I believe that there is nothing more for you to do just now.

SHRI JAMNADAS GANDHI
RAJKOT

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12284

402. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
Bhadrapad Vad 3, Friday [September 24, 1926]¹

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have your letter. The new place should certainly suit you better. Is there some extra accommodation? I have already written to Lady Pattani that we shall keep the bungalow up to February. By the end of February you will have become fit enough to go to Almora, etc., and so the change may even he agreeable to you. But we can

¹From the postmark

352 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
think about all that in February. Find out from the agent the rent of Pattani Saheb’s bungalow.

Blessings from

BAPU

SIT. MATHURADAS TRIKUMI
PANCHGANI CASTLE
PANCHGANI

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

403. TELEGRAM TO RAGHWADAS

[On or after September 24, 1926]¹

I HAVE SANCTIONED NOTHING FOR ANY ELECTION NOR HAVE AUTHORITY.

GANDHI

From a photostat: S.N. 11330

404. LETTER TO MOTI CHOKSI

THE ASHRAM,

*Saturday, Bhadra Vad 4 [September 25, 1926]*²

CHI. MOTI,

I got your five and a half lines. They are not uniformly straight, and if they were re-written properly they would become five. The letters which compose the lines are of all shapes and sizes, some big, some small, some thin and some thick. Even so, it is a letter from you, and that is a favour, no doubt. Let me know what opinion the doctor gave after examining your blood. It is good that you have started reading again. If we fix a time for everything and adhere to it, we improve both in physical and in mental health.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12135

¹ This was in reply to Raghwadas’s telegram received on September 24, 1926 which read:“According Raghupati Sahay’s lecture Gorakhpur public wants to know whether you sanctioned twentyfive thousand rupees for election” (S.N. 11330).

² From the postmark
405. LETTER TO MOHANLAL

THE ASHRAM,
Saturday, September 25\textsuperscript{1}, 1926

BHAI MOHANLAL,

Herewith a letter from Rameshwardasji. His address is “Dhulia”. If the books ordered by him have not been sent, please send him all the Gujarati books published by us and whatever Hindi books are ready. Send the bill to him. He will remit the amount. It is not necessary to dispatch the books by V.P. Write to me if you do not receive the money in time.

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 12286

406. LETTER TO RAMESHWARDAK PODDAR

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Saturday, Bhadra Krishna 4 [September 25, 1926]\textsuperscript{2}

BHAI RAMESHWARJI,

I have your letter. I shall select the books. It is only through patience and contentment that man can be cured of his restlessness.

Yours,

MOHANDAS

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 186

407. DIFFICULTIES OF A SPINNER

A voluntary spinner writes as follows:\textsuperscript{3}

This is a reasonable request. It is not necessary for the Spinners’ Association to start a new journal for the purpose; but the difficulties of the kind mentioned by the spinner could be solved through \textsuperscript{1} The source has 26 which, however, was not a Saturday.

\textsuperscript{2} From the postmark

\textsuperscript{3} The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had suggested that the All-India Spinners’ Association should maintain contacts with spinners and help them to solve their problems.
Navajivan and Young India. Whoever experiences any difficulties in spinning or wishes to ask any questions concerning it may certainly write; his questions will be answered in Navajivan. The trouble is that the spinners do nothing to get their problems solved and do not write to me either because of their laziness or indifference or, sometimes, for fear lest they should add to my burden. A sacrificial spinner cannot afford to be either lazy or careless. To be concerned for me is to do injustice both to me and to this movement. I can easily request others to solve problems which I cannot solve myself. Anyone, therefore, who has problems may write without the slightest hesitation, only remembering one condition, namely, that the letters should be written in ink and the correspondent should explain his problem briefly and in legible handwriting, and without argument. It will be easier for me if the envelope bears the words”About Spinning”.

Now the letter given above has raised one problem which can be solved here. Blowing water-spray is intended to moisten every thread on the hank. This process is essential for increasing the strength of the yarn. It has been found to do so to the extent of 20 per cent. No one, therefore, should remove the yarn from the real without first blowing water-spray on it. The easiest and the best method of serving the aim behind blowing is to keep the reel immersed in water for three to five minutes and move the hand over it to, moisten it. This will moisten every part of the thread to the right degree. The reel will last longer if it is made wholly of wood, instead of having strings round it. The cotton strings used for this purpose will get soiled and then wear out if the reel is immersed in water frequently. If the yarn is not removed from the reel soon after immersing the latter into water but left on it for twelve hours, every coil on the reel would suck in moisture. Our purpose would be served better if the yarn is carefully spread out on the reel before the latter is immersed into water. Moving the hand on the yarn after immersing the reel in water will moisten the yarn more quickly.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 26-9-1926
408. RESPONSIBILITY OF PARENTS

A teacher writes:¹

Everyone will admit that there is much truth in what the writer says. The point does not need to be laboured that after one’s children are grown-up, if one continues to have children from the same wife or if she is dead, from a second wife, it produces a bad effect on the minds of the older children. But if it is not possible for him to practise self-control, a father should lodge his older children in a separate establishment, or should himself live in a separate room, so that they will not have any opportunity of seeing or hearing anything. This will at least ensure a certain degree of decency. Though childhood should be lived in innocence, parents fond of pleasure corrupt the minds of their children. The practice of vanaprasthashrama is good for developing a sense of morality in children and for making them freedom-loving and self-reliant.

The suggestion which the writer has made to teachers is certainly sound. But where there are forty to fifty children in a class and the relationship of the teacher with the pupils is confined to class-work lessons, how will it be possible for the teacher, even if he so wishes, to establish any spiritual relationship with so many children? Again, when six or seven teachers teach six or seven different subjects, which of them can assume the responsibility to give them moral instruction?

Lastly, how many teachers can we come across who will guide the children along the path of morality or win their confidence? This indeed raises the whole question of education, but it cannot be discussed here.

Society moves forward like a flock of sheep without thought or circumspection and some even consider that to be progress. But despite this awful state of affairs, our individual path is clear. Those who know own it to themselves to create and spread an atmosphere of morality in their own field of work. To begin with, they must first bring about improvement in themselves. When we consider the faults of others, we appear to be very virtuous. But if we direct our attention to drawbacks, we shall find that we are crafty and lascivious. It is far more profitable to sit in judgment on ourselves than on others and while doing so, we find out ways for others. This is one meaning among others of the adage, "If you are good, the world is good."

¹ The letter is not translated here. The correspondent had deplored parents of grown-up boys and girls continuing to have children and had suggested that teachers should make friends with pupils individually and inculcate in them respect for morality.

Tulsidas has likened the saint to the philosopher’s stone. The simile is not wrong. We must all try to be saints. To be that is not a gift from the skies for an extraordinary man, but is the bounden duty of every man and that indeed is the essence of life.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 26-9-1926

409. TELEGRAM TO NEGAPATAM LABOUR UNION

[Before September 27, 1926]

SATYAGRAHA UNLAWFUL IN THE CASE MENTIONED.¹

The Hindu, 28-9-1926

410. LETTER TO ROHINI POOVIAH

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
September 29, 1926

I have your letter. I shall certainly read your report on the Bhil Seva Mandal.

Have you finally decided to throw in your lot with the Ashram? It would be a rash step, especially when it is evident that you should be earning something at least for the time. If you do join the Ashram, it will still have to be on probation in the first instance. And even as a probationer, you have to take certain vows that is, truth, non-violence, poverty, i.e., non-possesison, brahmacharyam, etc. They become final at the end of the probation. There is much to be said for Big Brother’s caution not from the point of view of marriage but from the point of view of the life to be led here. If the idea of simplicity, poverty, truth, and non-violence has taken possession of you, nobody on earth can prevent you from joining the Ashram. But you must not come with a view merely to give the Ashram life a trial. You need not prepare a khaddar mosquito curtain. It will be certainly better if you secure one. Try at the Khadi Bhandar in Princess Street. But any curtain will do.

¹This was in reply to a communication from the President of the Local Railway Labourers’ Union seeking Gandhiji’s opinion on the proposed satyagraha by the railway labourers at Negapatan.

Yours sincerely,

MISS ROHINI POOVIAH
C/o MRS. S. N. HAJI
OPPOSITE MARINE LINES STATION
QUEEN’S ROAD
BOMBAY

From a microfilm: S.N. 19707

411. NOTES
TAPPERS’ ASSOCIATION

A correspondent sends me the following report of the formation of a Tappers’ Association in Cochin:

Travancore and Cochin are palm groves. Tapping is a big industry in these States. But tapping, instead of being used for health-giving purposes, is abused for promoting the destruction of health and morals. For, the toddy tapped is fermented and sold as drink. This reminds one of the use that is made of vineyards in Europe and South Africa. There is no fruit save oranges to match grapes in its health-giving properties. A person who would live on fresh grapes and a little fatless bread need never get ill. But the grape culture supports a manufacture that destroys annually more people than gunpowder. What fruitarians are nevertheless trying to do, with no present prospect, but with faith in the truth of their mission, the Tappers, Association may do in Cochin if it works without being dismayed by disappointments. It is a splendid idea to turn toddy into jaggery. If it succeeds, it will solve the problem of occupying tappers when temperance becomes the rule of life in the land of palms. It is painful to find that in a Brahmin-ruled State, which has the reputation of being called enlightened, instead of facilities being given there

1 At a meeting of tappers held at Kunnamkulam, an association was formed with membership restricted to those who tapped for sweet toddy for manufacturing jaggery. Some 102 tappers took the vow that they would not tap for fermented toddy. The object of the Association was to work for the moral and social improvement of the tappers in Cochin State.
should be vexatious rules imposed upon those who would tap for manufacturing jaggery.

Pivot of Education

At a time when emphasis in education is put more upon literary knowledge than upon character building, the following from the article of Principal Jacks in the Sunday School Chronicle will be read with profit:

In Far-off Tuticorin

Sjt. K. Nalla Sivan Pillai writes:

My best wishes will not avail the Swadesa Balyam Sangam if the members do not do their duty by it. The inaccuracy of the language of the latter is disturbing. Why should there be an”about” in giving information about a small society? Instead of saying”most of them spin”, the correspondent could have given the exact number of spinners, the time given by each daily to spinning and the count and the quantity spun. Why”there are about 20 charkhas” and why not exactly how many? Why”some paid spinners”? Why not quite how many? Why no mention of the wage given? Are they spinners in need? What is the meaning of”about 60 towels”? 60 is a round number. A business-like organization should give business-like information. And those who wish to do khaddar work, i.e., serve the poorest and the neediest, must be business-like. An association of exactly 20 members or even 13 would be a good and lucky association and will be a valuable nucleus for khaddar propaganda on a large scale, if all the 20 or 13 are honest, self-sacrificing, earnest and industrious plodding workers. Khaddar work cannot be done by fits and starts. It cannot be done by impulsive men who would slave for a few days, maybe a few months, and then collapse altogether. Determination and grit are absolute essentials of success in this great national movement.

1 The extract, not reproduced here, dwelt on failure, in the march of science, to solve the problem of its correct application, and emphasized the need for”all the enterprise of education and all the activities of religion” to reach”their focus—the point of responsibility”.

2 Here followed a factual report of the activities of the Swadesa Balyam Sangam of Tuticorin, not reproduced here.
ALL-INDIA SPINNERS’ ASSOCIATION

The A. I. S. A. finishes the first year of its existence at the end of the month. Those who are in arrears for the passing year should make up their quota, if they wish to be considered continuing members of the A.I.S.A. Those who wish to renew their subscription for the next year should hasten to send in their quota. Too much stress cannot be placed upon the necessity of sending well-twisted, even and sprayed yarn. The testers have tested the yarn sent in an indulgent way. But indulgence cannot be continued for ever. It would be had for the spinners and bad for the nation. Spinners therefore need not be surprised if they find that bad yarn is henceforth rejected, as bad coin, or for that matter everything bad, is or must be rejected. Let the members remember that for receiving the privileges of the constitution to be revised at the end of five years of existence of the association, it will be necessary to show five years’ continuing membership.

“TAKLI” IN SCHOOLS

Babu Prafulla Ch. Sen has sent to the All-India Spinners’ Association an accurate and detailed report of the results of one month’s takli spinning in the Duadando National School (Bengal) which he has just taken over. The names, the times, and the yards spun, and the average speed for everybody are given in the table sent by him. Twenty-six boys spun during the month of August 14,368 yards, in weight 56 tolas, of from six to 30 counts. Nearly 50 per cent of the yarn was fit for warp. The highest average speed attained was 90 yards per hour. The highest time spun by a boy was 18 hours during the month. The highest quantity was 1,621 yards. Only four boys spun 1,000 yards or over and thus qualified themselves in one month to become members of the juvenile branch of the Association, i.e., if they were also wearing khaddar. If the teachers and the boys persist, there is no reason why at the end of the year every boy should not spin enough for his own clothing. I take it that the boys will in due course be taught to card their own cotton, if they are not already doing so.

Prafulla Babu supplements the table with the following interesting letter:

Young India, 30-9-1926

Not reproduced here. It described the happy results of a change-over from inefficient spinning-wheels to the taklis which the pupils took up with avidity.
That restless great soul, Charlie Andrews, is never so happy as when he is wandering in search of God, i.e., humane service. Illness does not baffle him. If it is labour in distress, Charlie Andrews rushes to the rescue. If it is the flood-stricken that need his assistance, he goes, fever or no fever. Indians overseas find in him an ever-ready helper and an unfailing guide. He was not well. He had a bite from a poisonous insect when he was at Stokes’s farm. But he would not take full rest as Shantiniketan needed him. He came to Sabarmati before proceeding to South Africa. He was not well. He got worse. But he will not cancel his passage. He was better, having rested under the hospitable roof of Sjt. Ambalal Sarabhai. And now, though he is not strong enough, he is on his way to South Africa. Before leaving, he left a writing which the reader will find in another column.

For him this work of love is a search for God. It is God’s call to which he has responded.

He knows that he may get nothing. But his is “not to reason why”; his is “but to do and die”. It is enough for him that the Indians of South Africa want him and that they have a just cause. He does not stop to weigh whether the cause is big or small. For him nothing is too small that is just and truthful. No individual is too lowly, if he needs his service. The Brahmin and the Bhangi, the prince and the peasant, the capitalist and the labourers claim his equal attention, if they stand for truth and justice.

He is sensitive. He feels the criticism gently conveyed to him by well-meaning friends that he should have been in India whilst the Union Deputation was here and the India settlers would not need him so long before the time of the Round Table Conference. He has allowed himself just to answer the criticism in his “In Search of God”¹. He was not wanted by the Deputation. Its hands are full. As a matter of fact, the Deputation does want not to be coached. It does not want to collect evidence officially. It has come to gather impressions without being told. It is enough if the members have come with an open mind. We have no reason to think otherwise. They must be left undisturbed save by their own consciences. And conscience acts best when unprompted. It is put upon its mettle.

¹ The correct title of the article by Andrews is “The Search for God”. He wrote of his impending journey to South Africa: “There have been many voices of discouragement of late, stating—what seems almost evident on the surface—that journeys to South Africa are useless, while the colour bar remains so firmly established; while the daily treatment of Indians in the streets, in the railway trains and in constant social ways, marks them out as an inferior and subject race. All this I know full well from a bitter and intimate experience. Nevertheless, in face of an Asiatic Bill, which has only been suspended, not withdrawn, I have confidence and hope. For God is there, keeping His high Festival in human hearts, quickening love in them among the Dutch and English, even as He is doing here among ourselves; and surely He will meet me there as the companion . . . .”

Mr. Andrews is wanted in South Africa and that now. Because the settlers immediately need a helper. Reuter has told us they were in consternation when they heard of his illness. He is their chief, if not their only hope. They must prepare their case. They need all the time that is now left for that preparation. They need him for this.

He must prepare the atmosphere that is required for the Conference. He is the only living link between the whites and the Indians. The Conference can do nothing, if South African public opinion is intensely hostile to Indians. South African public opinion is not like ours. It has force behind it. It has votes that count. It can dictate policies. It can defy Downing Street. Mr. Andrews can to some extent cultivate and mould that opinion. His very presence disarms criticism and silences opposition. His place at the present moment is undoubtedly in South Africa.

And the deliberations of the Conference will affect not only the future of settlers in South Africa but they will indirectly influence the Asiatic policy of the other Dominions and Colonies. But the settlers must not deceive themselves. Mr. Andrews’s powerful intervention is indispensable for their cause. But the ultimate success must depend upon themselves. There is no help in the world. like self-help. They must be firm but moderate in their demands; they must speak with one voice; they must act like one man; they must not swerve an inch from truth; they must discharge their part of the contract, i.e., they must conform strictly to all sanitary and building regulations; and lastly they must be prepared in a body to suffer for their cause. There is no salvation without suffering.

Young India, 30-9-1926

413. NATIONAL EDUCATION

I commend to the attention of all who are interested in national education the convocation address of Acharya A. T. Gidwani delivered before the students of Kashi Vidyapith and from which I reproduce elsewhere\(^1\) the main extracts. He is by no means despondent about national education or national educational institutions. And in order to cure students of their despondency, he advises them like himself to visit pilgrim-like the different national educational institutions and centres where national graduates are working. I share Acharya Gidwani’s optimism. But I do not blind myself, as I know the Acharya does not blind himself, to the grave limitations of the national institutions. They do not show the virility of new institutions. The teachers of these institutions have to show greater faith in national education and the institutions they are conducting. They have to perform acts of greater surrender than hitherto. I am convinced that these institutions, in so far as they are languishing, are so doing for the want of faith, the want of dedication on the part of the teachers. They must dare to be original. An attempt may be made to evolve by a conference a common system and a common policy. But probably the better way lies in each institution evolving along its own original lines. This country of ours is vast and variegated enough to warrant a variety of experiments. There are certain things which are obviously common to all national institutions. They do not need re-telling. The idea of pilgrimage on the part of the teachers to the various institutions is undoubtedly sound. But even that idea presupposes a certain degree of buoyant faith.

There is too much of make-believe, self-deception and submission to convention. The field of education which holds the seeds of the future of the children of the soil requires absolute sincerity, fearlessness in the pursuit of truth and boldest experiments, provided always that they are sound and based upon deep thought matured and sanctified by a life of consecration. Not every tyro in education may make such experiments. If the field is vast enough for sound experimenting, it is too dangerous for hasty and ill-conceived prospecting such as people in feverish search of gold delight in.

_Young India, 30-9-1926_

414. THE UNIVERSAL COTTAGE INDUSTRY

Babu Bijay Bihari Mukharjee of the Bengal Civil Service has published a booklet on the cottage industry of Bengal. It was awarded the Beereshwar Mitter Gold Medal of the Calcutta University. Whilst the conclusions of Babu Bijay Bihari are infirm, the facts he has set forth are well worth consideration by everyone who wishes well to this country. They derive greater importance from the fact that what is true of Bengal is true almost of all India.

\(^1\) _Young India, 30-9-1926, pp. 343-4_

In Bengal, according to the census of 1921, out of every 1,000 persons only 68 live in towns. Outside Calcutta and the metropolitan districts of Howrah, the 24 Parganas and Hooghly, there are three towns containing over 30,000 people. . . . It will not therefore be unreasonable to hold that of 46,695,536 of the population of the British territory in Bengal, scarcely more than about 13 lakhs of people are urban and the rest live mainly in the villages.

Therefore the writer naturally contends:

To develop the village and to secure for its inhabitants that sufficiency of comforts which is essential even in a country where only a little suffices, to organize it as a living entity in the body politic of the constitution is the crucial problem before the country. The utterance of Sir Horace Plunkett that "we must have home before home rule" is true of Bengal as much as of Ireland to which he addressed it. One need not ignore the effect of the form of government and the need for a change in it to be convinced of the paramount and supreme necessity of attempts to rehabilitate the 'home' in the villages. In that scheme of rehabilitation the cottage industry is not merely helpful, but absolutely essential.

The author has no difficulty in showing that India was, at one time, not very remote, happy and prosperous. He thus quotes Elphinstone:

All the descriptions of the parts of India visited by the Greeks give the idea of a country teeming with population and enjoying the highest degree of prosperity.

He has less difficulty in showing that the prosperity was mainly due to the one single industry of spinning and weaving. But today hand-spinning needs resurrection and weaving, though still an important cottage industry, does not need the same attention.

Today, there is no prosperity to note. Three-fourths of the people are dependent solely upon cultivation. In Dacca and Faridpur 92% and in Midnapur 74% of the cultivable land is now under cultivation. The average under cultivation per head of the agricultural population is respectively .72, .73 and .84 acres for the three districts. Thus there is little margin left for additional cultivation. And no peasantry that is solely dependent on agriculture can possibly live on less than one acre of land. The real average is far below the average given, because in the calculation are included are huge tracts owned by rich zamindars.

It is no wonder, therefore, that one of the highest officials of the Government had to declare that in this country half the people did not know what it was to have two meals a day.

The seriousness of the situation was expressed by the Famine Commission so long ago as 1877-78 thus: A main cause of the disastrous consequences of Indian famines and one of the greatest difficulties in the way of providing relief in an effectual shape is to be found in the fact that the great mass of the people directly depend on agriculture and that there is no other industry from which any considerable part of the population derives support. The failure of the usual rains deprives the labouring class as a whole, not only of the ordinary supplies of food obtainable at prices within their reach but also of the sole employment by which they can earn the means of procuring it. The complete remedy, say the Commissioners, for this condition of things will be found only in the development of industries other than agriculture and independent of the fluctuations of the seasons.

The writer shows too that the bulk of the peasantry is occupied only during four months of the year.

The clerks, the officials, the lawyers, the doctors, the politicians, the teachers and all who believe themselves educated in English do not come up even to one per cent of the population.

I have remarked that the writer is weak in his conclusions. The weakness in my opinion is derived from the fact that he has collected all possible cottage industries. As a recital it is good enough. But it does not solve the problem which needs a speedy solution. For the vast bulk of the population, as also the worker in the villages, a museum of industries is simply bewildering. They should have one universal industry. And by a process of exclusion, one arrives at the irresistible conclusion that the only universal industry for the millions is spinning and no other. That does not mean that other industries do not matter or are useless. Indeed, from the individual standpoint, any other industry would be more remunerative than spinning. Watch-making will be no doubt most remunerative and fascinating industry. But how many can engage in it? Is it of any use to the millions of villagers? But if the villagers can reconstruct their home, begin to live again as their fore-fathers did, if they begin to make good use of their idle hours, all else, all the other industries will revive as a matter of course. It is no use putting before famishing men a multiplicity of raw foods and expecting them to make their choice. They would not know what to do with them. They will probably rush after the most tempting and perish in the attempt. I remember once in my life being nearly lynched whilst I was distributing rations to famished people. I had to enclose and guard myself and the provisions before I could distribute what I had been given for distribution. We make little headway because we have an unclassified catalogue of industries for the people to choose, when we should know that there is only one industry it is possible to put before all. They may not all take it up. Let those who can and wish to, by all means, take up any other. But national resources must be concentrated upon the one industry of hand-spinning which all can take up now and besides which the vast majority can take up no other. And when the nation’s attention is thus rivetted on its revival, we will not have to be in search of a market for khaddar. The energy and money that have today to be devoted to popularizing khaddar will tomorrow be devoted to its greater manufacture and to its improvement. It is the national inertia that blinds us to the possibility of khaddar and thus paralyses our capacity for a grand national effort. It is not enough to say that hand-spinning is one of the industries to be revived. It is necessary to insist that it is the central industry that must engage our attention if we are to re-establish the village home.

Young India, 30-9-1926

415. LETTER TO GOPABANDHU DAS

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 1, 1926

DEAR GOPABANDHU BABU,

Mr. Andrews asks me to write to you on his behalf as he was unable to do so before he went away. He discussed the Orissa question together and he entertains the same view that I have expressed to you.¹

¹ Vide”Letter to Gopabandhu Das”, 18-9-1926.
I do hope that you received that letter of mine, and that you have caught its spirit.

Are you any better now?

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

PANDIT GOPABANDHU DAS

“SAMAJ” Office

PURI, B.M. Ry.

From the original: C.W. 7739. Courtesy: Radhanath Rath

416. A LETTER

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

October 1, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I suppose it was for the sake of drawing us closer that Charlie Andrews commissioned me before leaving for South Africa to give you a line about him. He was none too well when he left. I was anxious to keep him with me for a little longer so that he might become stronger but he would not miss the steamer on which he had booked his passage. His heart was with the distressed people in South Africa. I therefore did not strive with him.

I hope that you are keeping well and strong.

Yours sincerely,

From a photostat: S.N. 19708

417. LETTER TO H. S. L. POLAK

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

October 1, 1926

MY DEAR HENRY,

This is both for you and Millie because Charlie has asked me after his own fashion to write to both of you about him. I suppose he wants me to certify to you that his love for India is as green as ever and not a whit less than his love for England, and his love for humanity is equally great and deep. He was none too well when he sailed, but he would not listen to anybody. He could easily have given himself a fortnight’s rest and taken next boat, but his heart was in South Africa. I therefore did not strive with him.

1 Addressee not known

I am making full use of your collection of the Gita texts. It is being copied almost regularly day after day and as soon as it is finished, the precious volume will be sent to you duly registered and insured.

You have asked me for additional texts. If I come across any, I will send you the names.

I hope this will find you both, the boys, Sally, Maud and Mater in the possession of full health. Devdas as you know had [an] operation for appendicitis some months ago. He is enjoying himself at Mussoorie. Ramdas is looking after khadi work in Amreli.

Your sincerely,

H. S. L. POLAK, ESQ.
42, 47, 48, DANNES INN HOUSE
265 STRAND
LONDON W.C. 2.

From a photostat: S.N. 19709

---

418. LETTER TO MISS ANDREWS

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
_October 1, 1926_

MY DEAR FRIENDS,

Though I cannot recall your features, I have a vivid recollection of having met you in Birmingham in 1914. Your brother Charlie has been more and more endearing himself to the people here. In fact, he has become as much Indian as he is English. And he is now on his way to fulfil his self-imposed mission in South Africa. I had a few happy days with him before he sailed for South Africa. Do please give me a line in acknowledgment when you have leisure and tell me how you are faring.

Yours sincerely,

THE MISS ANDREWS
ARDLEIGH
BRAY’S LANE, COVENTRY ENGLAND

From a photostat: S.N. 19710
419. LETTER TO BAPUBHAI

THE ASHRAM

Bhadra Vad 10, October 1, 1926

BHAI SHRI BAPUBHAI,

I got your letter. I recognize no date as my birth anniversary. I know Rentia-baras¹. On that day, everyone should spin, and take a vow that he would spin regularly in future, and wear pure khadi if he has not been doing that

Vandemataram from
Mohan Das

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19952

420. CABLE TO A. I. KAJEE

[October 2, 1926]²

KAJEE
CONGRESS
DURBAN
INADVISABLE.

From a photostat: S.N. 12024

421. LETTER TO LALTA PERSHAD SHAD

October 2, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter and the books. The English book I shall return as soon as I have finished it. But it may take some time before I can go through it. My difficulty, however, is more fundamental than you imagine. But fundamental though it is, it is not so serious as perhaps you imagine. I am in search of a guru because I am humble and because that search is a scientific necessity for every godfearing man. The search is its own reward and its own satisfaction. Some do get the guru they want. But it is not a matter of such moment if they cannot get the guru during the current incarnation. It is enough if the search is absolutely sincere and equally persistent. It is also an article of faith with me that, if my search is sincere and persistent, my guru will come to me instead of my having to go to him if and when I deserve him. I am therefore quite content to remain as I am and there is enough warrant in the Shastras for such contentment. You will, therefore, not consider it a matter of indifference on my part if I cannot take up your suggestion enthusiastically and proceed to Agra. At the same time, if ever I do go to Agra in the course of my travels, I would certainly like to see the institution described by you. I would like too to have more information about it. I know the prototype in Pabna of the Agra institution. I had a long chat about it with Deshbandhu. He was undoubtedly enthusiastic about it. He had great faith in the Thakur and it was out of regard for him that I made it a point when I visited Pabna to see the Sat Sangh Mutt and to make the acquaintance of the Thakur and his mother and the inmates of the Mutt. But I must tell you that I was not much impressed either with the Thakur or with all I saw in the institution. And what I have since heard about the institution is not very creditable to it. The information given to me may be totally incorrect. But I am telling you somewhat of what I know and what I have heard about it.

¹ The twelfth day in the dark half of Bhadra, Gandhiji’s birth-date according to the Vikram calendar followed in Gujarat, came to be popularly known by this name. It means,”the twelfth day, dedicated to the spinning-wheel.”

² The cable is quoted in a letter to Gandhiji from A. I. Kajee, Honorary General Secretary, South African Indian Congress, Durban, dated October 10. The letter referred to Gandhiji having received the Union Government deputation in India, and to the proposed visit of Andrews on October 20, and sent Gandhiji copies of Justice Carter’s judgment in Mrs. Sophia Bhayla v. The Licensing Officer for East Court (S. N. 12024). Vide "Precarious Condition in South Africa”, 4-11-1926.

Yours sincerely,

Sjt. Lalta Pershad Shad
Kayasth Mohalla
Aimer

From a photostat: S.N. 19711

422. LETTER TO R. B. GREGG

The Ashram,
Sabarmati,
October 2, 1926

My dear Govind,

I duly received the box containing the golden delicious apples. Please thank Stokes for the parcel of apples. They were certainly delicious to eat. They were not golden to look at. My teeth couldn’t work through the apples without stewing them. I ate two. The rest were distributed among patients and persons whom you and Stokes would consider deserving.

I know [I] owe you a reply to your previous letter. I want to send you a fairly long and full reply. That is why I am taking time. Andrews is off. He was none too well for the voyage, but he is not one to be easily dissuaded. I therefore did not strive with him.

Yours sincerely,

R. B. GREGG, ESQ.
C/O S. E. STOKES, ESQ.
KOTGARH
SIMLA HILLS

From a photostat: S. N. 19712

423. LETTER TO WAI GORAKSHA MANDAL

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI
October 2, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. Please let me know the number of members requiring cotton, the quantity required and the count they spin. Are they skilled spinners? Can they pass the ordinary tests about strength and evenness? Are they too poor to buy cotton? Do they know carding? If not, who makes slivers for them? On receiving your replies to these, I shall be able to decide.

Yours sincerely,

WAI GORAKSHA MANDAL

From a microfilm: S. N. 19713

424. LETTER TO MOTIBEHN CHOKSI

Bhadra Vad 11 [October 2, 1926]¹

CHI. MOTI,

I got your letter. Doing service there is your main duty and it should make you completely happy. Take care of your health.

You should improve your handwriting. Today was Mani’s

¹From the postmark
birthday. She came to me on her own and took three vows in my presence, not to tell an untruth, not to do mischief and to get up at four in the morning. I will watch how long the child can keep her vows.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12137

425. MADHADA ASHRAM

I made some reference in Navajivan, about a year ago, to the state of affairs in the Madhada Ashram, having received complaints in regard to it. I then started correspondence with Shri Shivji on the subject. He agreed to show me the accounts of the Ashram. I sent a personal representative to look into them, and he did so. But Bhai Shivji did not show him some of the account books on the ground that they related to private property.

I received grave charges regarding the moral character of Shri Shivji. I communicated them to him. And he gave me permission to institute an inquiry into the matter. Those who had made the charges were, all of them, responsible persons. Shri came and met me in the Ashram in connection with this matter. His confessions in regard to the charges gave me a painful shock. I advised him to resign from the Conference and to give up control of the institutions under his charge. He resigned, but did not leave the institutions. I acquainted the Executive Committee of the Conference with the conversation I had with Shri Shivji, and told them what according to me the duty of a public worker required him to do in this situation. I requested the members not to divulge what I had told them.

I informed Shri Shivji that I would have to issue a public statement of some kind. He requested me not to do so and expressed a desire to see me. We met. Shri Shivji felt that I had done him great injustice. I tried to pacify him but to no effect. He says that he had made his confessions in sheer anger. He believes that I was excited during my conversation with him, and says that, because I was excited, he too got excited and was betrayed into making statements which were not true. In view of this, I told him that I was willing to place this matter before a panch. It is possible that I have been led away by prejudice and have unintentionally done him injustice. If the panch believe, after hearing my account that I was prejudiced and if they can convince me that I was so, then I will admit my error and publicly apologize. If I do not agree with the finding of the panch and if they ask me to maintain silence in public on this subject, I will do so.

Shri Shivji is not agreeable to this. He sent me a draft of the terms of reference for the proposed panch, which I refused to sign. According to my previous decision, therefore, I must publish the facts. I have given sufficient time to Shri Shivji and tried to understand his arguments, so that I may not do him injustice in any way. His friends have written somewhat strong letters to me. They have testified to Shri Shivji’s innocence. I have read all the letters carefully but I am sorry to state that they have had a contrary effect on me. I do not at all feel that I was excited or angry during my conversation with Shri Shivji. I am not quick to get angry. Nor is it my impression that Shri Shivji had made his confessions to me in sheer excitement. I believe that the affairs of the Madhada Ashram and the private properties are so mixed up that it was, and is, Shri Shivji’s duty to show all the accounts. His serious admissions create doubts about his moral character too. No public worker can afford to have moral weaknesses implied in his admissions.

Anyone who runs an institution for widows or young men or women should maintain a particularly high standard of conduct. He cannot have a private life; it is my firm view that the public has a right to know everything about his life. Shri Shivji is a public worker and has been running an institution for young men and women and for widows. The activities of the Madhada Ashram were many-sided, and that is why I have, as a matter of duty and with great pain, given publicity to the most important aspect of the conclusions of the inquiry I had instituted.

Bhai Shivji and his friends will be pained by this. I can give them only one consolation, and that is to assure them that I have felt, and still feel, much more deeply pained by the impression which has been produced on my mind by the affair than they would feel by my writing this. I do not wish to see anyone in this world morally degraded. I feel ashamed to see even one person fall. I am of the view that when an individual falls the whole society falls. If I could have avoided writing this, I would certainly have kept silent. I prefer silence in such matters. But does anyone always get what would make him happy?

I regard myself as a true friend of Shri Shivji. This article does not mean that I have washed my hands of this affair. I have given him sufficient time. I am ready to give still more time if required. If any of Shri Shivji’s friends can show me that I am in error, I will be grateful to him and will be happy to admit my mistake.

If Shri Shivji or any of his friends wishes to write something by way of reply to this, I will publish the whole reply provided it is reasonably short. I should like to tell Shri Shivji’s friends that even if a hundred thousand persons believe a person to be innocent but one individual can prove his guilt, then the evidence of those hundred thousand does not avail. I find it necessary to say this in order that people may not write to me the kind of letters which I have been lately receiving for publication

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 3-10-1926

426. KHADI AT CONCESSION PRICE

Shri Punjabhai Hirachand, treasurer of the Provincial [Congress] Committee, states that between October 3 and 18 khadi will be sold at considerably reduced prices in the pure khadi store in Pada Pole on Richey Road. In some of the varieties the reduction will be as much as 50 per cent. It will not be less than 6 per cent in any variety. The price of the coarse variety from Kathiawar will be 4 annas a yard instead of 8 annas. Khadi for shirts will cost 4 annas 6 pies a yard instead of 6 annas and shawls and scarves will cost Rs. 1-12-0 each instead of Rs. 2-4-0. Caps, satchels, straps for bed-steads, etc., will be sold at 12_% reduction. These are only a few items from the list he has sent.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 3-10-1926
427. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

SABARMATI,
Bhadrapad Vad 12, Sunday [October 3, 1926]

CHI. MATHURADAS,

How did you get the pain again? I hope there is no moisture in the air there? When does the rain stop? You are unnecessarily worried about places like Almora. There is no need to worry at all. But we shall think about that only after December. In the meantime, let us see the result of Dr. Talwalkar’s experiment on Kaka.

Blessings from
BAPU

SJT. MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI
HOMI VILLA
PANCHGANI

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

428. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

Sunday, Bhadra Krishnapaksha 12 [October 3, 1926]

BHAI GHANSHYAMDASJI,

I have your letter.

When there is a difference of opinion between revered Malaviyaji and me, I cannot express a positive view because I hold him in great reverence. Personally I am quite sure in my mind that at any rate your sphere of work is not in the Council. If, however, you have confidence in yourself and if Malaviyaji wishes that you should enter it, you may certainly do so. One should not readily give up the work one has already taken in hand. My view now is that you should dissu-

1 From the postmark
2 Reference to addressee’s candidature for Council election indicates that the letter was written in 1926.
ade your friends from offering you advice and, if you get a majority, enter the Council. It does not seem advisable to withdraw after going this far. In the end you will yourself leave the Council. Yes, if Pandit Malaviyaji releases you out of regard for your health, it will be a great blessing for you. Even from the point of view of your health, I think it inadvisable for you to enter the Assembly or the Council.

I do not agree with the comparison you have made.

Jminalalji is here.

Yours,
MohanDas

From the Hindi original: C.W. 6136. Courtesy: G. D. Birla

429. LETTER TO MOOLCHAND AGRAWAL

SABARMATI,
October 3, 1926

Bhai Moolchandji,

I have your letter. The opinion of teachers has been invited in order to make it easy for pupils in national schools to join Khadi Service. For the time being, training will be given by the Satyagraha Ashram itself. Experience shows that all processes up to weaving and keeping of accounts cannot be taught in one year. We have refrained from mentioning the amount of salary so as to enable every friend to state his own independent opinion.

After joining Khadi Service, one is required to work for eight hours daily. While under training, the pupil has to work according to the Ashram rules. Poor pupils are paid enough to cover their expenses, including that on clothes.

Yours,
MohanDas Gandhi

Shri Moolchandji
Teacher, A. V. School
Manpur, C. I.

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 830
430. LETTER TO BENARASIDAS CHATURVEDI

SABARMATI,
Bhadra Krishnapaksha 12 [October 3, 1926]

BHAI BENARASIDASJI,

I have your second article. Kindly let me know when I admitted that it was an error on my part to have stated that 500 workers should be permitted to emigrate to British Guiana as an experimental measure. I do not remember having said that. If you can, please send the article in which I have said so. I will publish your article along with that one.

Yours,

MOHANDAS

SHRI BENARASIDAS CHATURVEDI
FEROZABAD
E. I. R.

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 2566

431. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
Bhadrapad Vad 13, 1982 [October 4, 1926]

CHI. MATHURADAS,

Rs. 2,400 as rent is too high for you. I cannot ask directly about the payment of rent. I shall be able to speak about it only when Pattani Saheb comes. When I wrote to Pattani Saheb it was with the idea that we would have to pay something by way of rent. Lady Pattani did get the letter in which I had mentioned February as our time limit. But apparently she did not inform the agent accordingly. We shall proceed on the assumption that we shall want the place only up to February. What you have written to the agent is correct.

Blessings from

BAPU

BHAI MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI
PANCHGANI CASTLE
PANCHGANI

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

1From the postmark
432. LETTER TO KALYANJI V. MEHTA

Bhadra Vad 14, 1982 [October 5, 1926]¹

BHAISHRI KALYANJI,
A letter was written to you, at my instance, concerning Bhai Manibhai. I shall be happy to have your immediate reply. Manibhai, too, is worrying himself about the matter.

BAPU

BHAISHRI KALYANJI VITHALBHAI MEHTA
SWARAJ ASHRAM
BARDOLI
Via SURAT

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2679

433. LETTER TO PURUSHOTTAM PATWARDHAN²

Bhadra Vad 14, 1982 [October 5, 1926]

Bhai APPA,
I have your letter. I like your idea about a calendar. Here are a few thoughts.

It is our moral duty to wear hand-woven khadi made from hand-spun yarn, for by doing so we provide employment and give food to crores of our brothers and sisters who are starving for want of work.

Spinning is a moral duty for all of us, for unless we take it up the poor of the country will have no faith in it andin us. Yadyadacharati³, etc. If we spin, our time will be well employed, the quality of yarn will improve and, finally, yarn will become cheaper.

Our wearing khadi will help to bring about boycott of foreign cloth, as a result of which we shall acquire self-confidence, our strength will increase and the country will be saved not less than sixty crores of rupees.

¹ The postmark bears the date 6-10-1926, Sabarmati, but Bhadra Vad 14 fell on October
² Popularly known as Appasaheb Patwardhan
³ A reference to the Bhagavad Gita, III, 21
You will be able to formulate other arguments besides these. Abdulla should return with his health completely restored.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19953

434. LETTER TO BALDEV SHARMA

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

October 6, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have seen your letter addressed to the Superintendent of the Ashram. Do you know that in the Ashram the main work is labouring with one’s hands and feet? Are you satisfied with incessant labour at the spinning-wheel or the loom and doing sanitation work such as cleaning roads, sanitary buckets, etc.? Are you able to live as a brahmachari, and take the vow of poverty? Are you keeping good health? If your answers to these questions are satisfactory, I must say that just at the present moment, the Ashram is overcrowded, but as soon as there is a vacant room available, you can certainly be admitted as a probationer.

Your sincerely,

SJT. BALDEV SHARMA

“AMRITDHARA”

LAHORE

From a microfilm: S. N. 19714

435. VEGETARIANISM

A correspondent is born in a meat-eating family. He has successfully resisted the pressure from his parents to return to the flesh-pot. But, he says, in a book I have before me:

I read the opinion of Swami Vivekananda on the subject and feel a good deal shaken in my belief. The Swami holds that for Indians in their present state flesh-diet is a necessity and he advises his friends to eat flesh freely. He even goes so far as to say “If you incur any sin thereby throw it upon me; I will bear it.” I am now in a fix whether to eat flesh or not.
This blind worship of authority is a sign of weakness of mind. If the correspondent has such a deep-seated conviction that flesh-eating is not right, why should he be moved by the opinion to the contrary of the whole world? One needs to be slow to form convictions, but once formed they must be defended against the heaviest odds.

As for the opinion of the great Swami, I have not seen the actual writing but I fear the correspondent has correctly quoted him. My opinion is well known. I do not regard flesh-food as necessary for us at any stage and under any clime in which it is possible for human beings ordinarily to live. I hold flesh-food to be unsuited to our species. We err in copying the lower animal world if we are superior to it. Experience teaches that animal food is unsuited to those who would curb their passions.

But it is wrong to over-estimate the importance of food in the formation of character or in subjugating the flesh. Diet is a powerful factor not to be neglected. But to sum up all religion in terms of diet, as is often done in India, is as wrong as it is to disregard all restraint in regard to diet and to give full reins to one's appetite. Vegetarianism is one of the priceless gifts of Hinduism. It may not be lightly given up. It is necessary therefore to correct the error that vegetarianism has made us weak in mind or body or passive or inert in action. The greatest Hindu reformers have been the active in their generation and they have invariably been vegetarians. Who could show greater activity than, say, Sankara or Dayanand in their times?

But my correspondent must not accept me as his authority. The choice of one's diet is not a thing to be based on faith. It is a matter for everyone to reason out for himself. There has grown up especially in the West an amount of literature on vegetarianism which any seeker after truth may study with profit. Many eminent medical men have contributed to this literature. Here, in India, we have not needed any encouragement for vegetarianism. For it has been hitherto accepted as the most desirable and the most respectable thing. Those, however, who like the correspondent feel shaken, may study the growing movement towards vegetarianism in the West.

_Translated_ Young India, 7-10-1926

380 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
436. LETTER TO AMY JACQUES GARVEY

THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
May 12, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I had the 2nd volume of"The Philosophy and Opinions of Marcus Garvey" or"Africa for Africans" for which I thank you.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

AMY JACQUES GARVEY
P. O. BOX NO. 22, STATION E
NEW YORK CITY, U. S. A.

From a copy : Gandhi Museum (Vol. 136) : Courtesy : Gandhi Memorial Museum, New York

437. THE SAME OLD ARGUMENT

After reciting the evils from which we are suffering and after dealing with the improvements he would make in agriculture, a correspondent writes:\footnote{1}

This is the old argument restated. The correspondent forgets that to make India like England and America is to find some other races and places of the earth for exploitation. So far it appears that the Western nations have divided all the known races outside Europe for exploitation and that there are no new worlds to discover. Among the exploited, India is the greatest victim. Japan is taking the share of the spoils no doubt. But if India and China refuse to be exploited what will happen to the exploiters? And if the Western nations plus Japan are likely to come to grief in the event of India and China refusing to be exploited, what can be the fate of India trying to ape the West? Indeed, the West had had a surfeit of industrialism and exploitation. If they who are suffering from the disease are unable to find a remedy \footnote{1} Marcus Garvey was the Chairman of the Fourth International Convention of the Negro Peoples of the World.

\footnote{2} Not reproduced here. The correspondent had argued that modern civilization including steamships, railways, machinery and large-scale production should be accepted.
to correct the evils, how shall we, mere novices, be able to avoid them? The fact is that this industrial civilization is a disease because it is all evil. Let us not be deceived by catchwords and phrases. I have no quarrel with steamships or telegraphs. They may stay, if they can, without the support of industrialism and all it connotes. They are not an end. We must not suffer exploitation for the sake of steamships and telegraphs. They are in no way indispensable for the permanent welfare of the human race. Now that we know the use of steam and electricity, we should be able to use them on due occasion and after we have learnt to avoid industrialism. Our concern is, therefore, to destroy industrialism at any cost.

The correspondent has suggested the remedy without knowing it himself. For he admits that India has lived till now when other nations have perished because”she has adapted herself to changing conditions”. Adaptability is not imitation. It means power of resistance and assimilation. India has withstood the onslaughts of other civilizations because she has stood firm on her own ground. Not that she has not made changes. But the changes she has made have promoted her growth. To change to industrialism is to court disaster. The present distress is undoubtedly insufferable. Pauperism must go. But industrialism is no remedy. The evil does not lie in the use of bullock carts. It lies in our selfishness and want of consideration for our neighbours. If we have no love for our neighbours, no change however revolutionary can do us any good. And if we love our neighbours, the paupers of India, for their sakes, we shall use what they make for us; for their sakes we, who should know, shall not engage in an immoral traffic with the West in the shape of buying the foreign fineries and taking them to the villages.

If we would but think seriously and persistently, we shall discover that before we make any other changes, the one great change to make is to discard foreign cloth and reinstate the ancient cottage industry of hand-spinning. We must thus restore our ancient and health-giving industry if we would resist industrialism.

I do not fight shy of capital. I fight capitalism. The West teaches one to avoid concentration of capital, to avoid a racial war in another and deadlier form. Capital and labour need not be antagonistic to each other. I cannot picture to myself a time when no man shall be richer than another. But I do picture to myself a time when the rich will spurn to enrich themselves at the expense of the poor and the poor will cease to envy the rich. Even in a most perfect world, we shall fail to avoid inequalities, but we can and must avoid strife and bitterness. There are numerous examples extant of the rich and the poor living in perfect friendliness. We have but to multiply such instances.

India’s destiny lies not along the bloody way of the West, of which she shows signs of tiredness, but along the bloodless way of peace that comes from a simple and godly life. India is in danger of losing her soul. She cannot lose it and live. She must not, therefore, lazily and helplessly say, “I cannot escape the onrush from the West.” She must be strong enough to resist it for her own sake and that of the world.

Young India, 7-10-1926

438. SORROWS OF GIRL-WIVES

“A Hindu lady from Bengal” writes:

Whether the picture drawn here is true to life or overdrawn, the substance is surely true. I do not need to search for evidence in support. I know a medical man enjoying a large practice having married and taken to himself, an elderly widower, a girl who was young enough to be his daughter. They were living together as “husband and wife”. Another, a sixty-year-old educationist a widower, married a girl of nine years. Though everybody knew of the scandal and recognized it as such, he remained inspector outwardly, respected both by the Government and the public. It is possible for me to recall more such instances from my memory and that of friends.

The fair correspondent is correct in saying that “there is no power of resistance left” in the women of India “to fight against any evil whatever”. No doubt man is primarily responsible for this state of things. But may women always throw the blame on women and salve their consciences? Do the enlightened among them not owe it to their sex, as also to men whose mothers they are, to take up the burden of reform? What is all the education worth that they are receiving if, on marriage, they are to become mere dolls for their husbands and prematurely engaged in the task of rearing would-be manikins? They may fight, if they like, for votes for women. It costs neither time nor trouble. It provides them with innocent recreation. But where are the brave women who work among the girl-wives and girl-widows, and who would take no rest and leave none for men, till girl marriages become an impossibility, and till every girl feels in herself strength enough to refuse to be married except when she is of full age and to the person about whom she is given the final choice?

1 Not reproduced here. The correspondent had thanked Gandhiji for “speaking on behalf of the poor girl-wives of our Hindu Society” and cited cases of 10-year-old girl-wives being either killed or cruelly maltreated by brutal and pleasure-craving husbands.

Young India, 7-10-1926

439. WANTS SATISFACTION

Here is eloquence which I have not abridged except for the removal of a fling or two at the "magnates of wealth" with their "cesspools in the bed of economic stream": 1

I read your article "Students' Duty" of the 16th September. You refuse to guide the unwilling. . . . The thought of the coming millennium makes it a pleasure to spin.

Meanwhile, your forces fret under famine rations and laziness imposed upon them.

Spinning for creating the charkha atmosphere does not occupy all the time . . . I am sure men will not have to rot for want of work and bread in your scheme of swaraj. Working as we do on your terms, we have a right to ask for satisfaction. I expect it in the columns of Young India early, as weariness of life grows every minute.

The correspondent seems to possess a fine sense of humour and, therefore, does not need much satisfaction from me. But for the enlightenment of those No-changers, who may be in the same position as he is, but who do not possess the same sense of humour, I may state that, having taken the post of schoolmaster in a Taluq Board school, I should stick to it and spread the gospel of khaddar and only leave the post when I get a job more after the heart of a No-changer; and then too if it can be left without putting the employers to inconvenience. A conscientious worker will never leave his employer in the lurch or use an existing job as a mere stalking-horse. The correspondent could, however, have finished his course of weaving. A good pattern weaver any day earns one rupee per day. If he had become an accomplished shoe-maker, he could also have made as much. One who has caught the spirit of the spinning movement need never feel idle. Has the correspondent mastered the science of spinning? Does he know ginning and carding? He can then earn from eight annas to a rupee per day from ginning and carding. But, presently there will be the Khadi Service. One who is poor but willing can sustain oneself even whilst qualifying for the Service. There is illimitable scope for those honest men and women who do not mind toiling with their bodies and would be satisfied with a simple sustenance wage and have no ambition for riches or fame.

1 Only extracts are reproduced here.

Young India, 7-10-1926

440. A CORRECTION

In my article on “Non-resistance” in the issue of 23rd September, I said the paper from which I have quoted was received from an American friend.¹ This was a mistake. The sender who is an Indian and is living in India now draws my attention to the fact that it was he who had received it in the first instance from his American friend and that therefore the sender to me was not an American friend. I apologize for the error which was unintentional. I had put the paper among the Young India matter file for attention and had forgotten that it was sent by an Indian friend.

A MISPRINT

The same correspondent draws attention to a misprint in the issue of 16th September in the last line of the article headed “Anti-Conscription”. The original reads: “Each is afraid and trustful of his neighbour.” It should be “distrustful”.

Young India, 7-10-1926

441. LETTER TO Z. M. PARET

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 7, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I understand your viewpoint. But somehow or other, I cannot adopt it. I may be wrong but the conviction is growing upon me that this idea of making substantial reforms through the press agency has been altogether overdone. Everything that you mention in your letter can be done far more efficiently by quiet, organized and persistent work. I would, therefore, ask you not to press me to give you anything. I wouldn’t have my heart in it. Let me add that I continue to edit Young India and Navajivan only because it is work that I have already taken in hand or rather, that was almost forced upon me. But if somebody were today to ask me to embark on any such new venture, I would flatly decline. I ask you to appreciate my difficulty.

¹ Vide “Non-resistance True and False”, 23-9-1926.

Your sincerely,

From a photostat: S.N. 19715

442. LETTER TO DR. MURARILAL

THE ASHRAM,

October 7, 1926

DEAR DR. MURARILAL,

I have your letter. All my sympathies are with you in your great loss. I had no idea that your brother had died. But it is a toll which every public worker is often called upon to pay.

With reference to the election bitterness, you attribute to me powers which I do not possess. Could I have felt that I could usefully intervene, believe me, I would have waited for no call; I would have forced myself on the attention of Panditji and Lalaji. But I know my powerlessness and, therefore, I grin and bear.

Yours sincerely,

DR. MURARILAL

CAWNPORE

From a microfilm: S.N. 19716

443. LETTER TO R. GANGADHARAN

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

October 7, 1926

DEAR FRIEND.

I have your letter. I would like you to look at the problem in another way. The constitution of the sexes is the . . .

\[1\]This is blank in the source.
that nature has put in our way. If we succumb to it, we remain rooted to the earth. If we surmount it, we rise higher. The tongue is given to us to taste and to speak. But the more we restrain it the better we are, and so with most things in nature. It would be wrong, therefore, to say that it is a fetish of nature’s law to restrain our carnal aptitude.

Yours sincerely,

SJT. R. GANGADHARAN
THOPPIKANILAKAM
VAIKOM

From a photostat: S.N. 19717

444. LETTER TO BHAVANIDAYAL

Asvina Sud 1 [October 7, 1926]¹

BHAISHRI BHAVANIDAYAL,

I have your letter. I think I wrote to you giving my opinion. Even so, I give it here again.

After going through the whole of the book, I realized that I was wrong in having described it as containing slanders. I ask your forgiveness for having done you injustice. I do not recollect now after reading which book of yours I formed this opinion.

And now I reply to your letter. As history, the book leaves much to be desired. All the facts are not stated correctly. I have not read it from the point of view of historical accuracy, nor have I the time to read it from that point of view and make corrections. The fact is that very few of us have the skill of writing anything from the standpoint of history.

Even the account of the satyagraha struggle [in South Africa] which I have written should be treated not as a book of history. I have only given in it my experiences and reminiscences. I, therefore, consider it difficult as also irrelevant to take notice of your book in my autobiography.

Yours,

MOHANDAS GANDHI

From the Hindi original: C.W. 8655. Courtesy: Vishnu Dayal

¹ The serial publication of An Autobiography referred to in the letter was commenced in Young India on December 10, 1925. The following Asvina Sud 1 fell on this date.
445. CIRCULAR LETTER

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 8, 1926

I had expected you to let me have your opinion upon the draft rules for Khadi Service published in Young India. I am anxious to publish them in their final shape as early as possible and set the scheme a-going. The only delay is your considered opinion. You will find the rules in Young India dated 16th September 1926. Wherever blanks have been kept, as for instance about the salary, they have been purposely kept so that everybody may give his own independent opinion.

Yours sincerely,
S. C. R.

Rajendra Babu
Gangadharrao Deshpande
Konda Venkatappayya Garu
Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya
S. Niranjan Patnaik
Satis Babu
V. V. Dastane

From a microfilm: S.N. 12072

446. LETTER TO AMBIKAPRASAD

Asvina Sud 2 [October 8, 1926]

Bhai Ambikaprasadji,

I have your letter. I am not qualified now to say anything by way of guidance on the problem of Hindu-Muslim unity. It seems to me that I am serving the cause by my very silence. Please, therefore, excuse me.

Yours,
Mohandas Gandhi

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 7483

1 Vide "Khadi Service", 16-9-1926.
2 It was in 1926 that Gandhiji had decided to keep silence over communal and political issues, referred to in the letter.
447. TELEGRAM TO C. RAJAGOPALACHARI

SABARMATI, October 9, 1926

RAJAGOPALACHARI
TIRUCHENGODU (SOUTH INDIA)

YOU CAN SAY YOU CANNOT CONDUCT ELECTION CAMPAIGN WITHOUT CONVICTION BACK IT ESPECIALLY WHEN DOMESTIC QUARRELS BITTERNESS DAILY INCREASING OVER ELECTIONS.

GANDHI

From a photostat: S.N. 12072a

448. IS THIS HUMANITY? I

[October 10, 1926]

The Ahmedabad Humanitarian League has addressed me a letter from which I take the relevant portions:

The talk of the whole city of Ahmedabad is the destruction of 60 dogs on his mill premises at the instance of Seth. . . Many a humanitarian heart is considerably agitated over the incident. When Hinduism forbids the taking of the life of any living being, when it declares it to be a sin, do you think it right to kill rabid dogs for the reason that they would bite human beings and by biting other dogs make them also rabid? Are not the man who actually destroys the dogs as also the man at whose instance he does so both sinners?

A deputation of three gentlemen from our Society waited on the Seth on the 28th ultimo. He confessed in the course of the interview that he had to take the course in question to save human life. He also said: "I myself had no sleep on the night I took that decision. I met Mahatmaji the next morning and ascertained his view in the matter. He said, ‘What else could be done?’” Is that a fact? And if so, what does it mean?

We hope you will express your views in the matter and set the whole controversy at rest and prevent humanitarianism from being endangered by the shocks given to it by distinguished men like the Seth. The Ahmedabad Municipality, we have heard, is soon going to have before it a resolution for the castration of stray dogs. Is it proper? Does religion

---

1 This is the first of a series of eight Gujarati articles published in Navajivan. These were later translated by Mahadev Desai into English and published in Young India.

2 The articles are placed under the date of publication in Navajivan.
sanction the castration of an animal? We should be thankful if you would give your opinion in this matter also.

Ahmedabad knows the name of the mill-owner, but as Navajivan is being read outside Ahmedabad also, I have omitted to mention his name in accordance with my practice to avoid personalities whilst discussing a principle. The question raised by the Humanitarian Society is an intricate one. I had been thinking of discussing the question ever since and even before the incident, but on second thought dropped the idea. But the letter of the Society now compels me, makes it my duty, to enter into a public discussion of the question.

I must say that my relations with the mill-owner, have been sweet, and, if I may say so, friendly. He came to me and expressed his distress in having had to order destruction of the dogs, and asked my opinion about it. He also said: “When the Government, the Municipality and the Mahajan all alike failed to guide me, I was driven to this course.” I gave him the reply that the Society’s letter attributes to me.

I have since thought over the matter and feel that my reply was quite proper.

Imperfect, erring mortals as we are, there is no course open to us but the destruction of rabid dogs. At times we may be faced with the unavoidable duty of killing a man who is found in the act of killing people.

If we persist in keeping stray dogs undisturbed, we shall soon be faced with the duty of either castrating them or killing them. A third alternative is that of having a special pinjrapole for dogs. But it is out of the question. When we cannot cope with all the stray cattle in the city, the very proposal of having a pinjrapole for dogs seems to me to be chimerical.

There can be no two opinions on the fact that Hinduism regards killing a living being as sinful. I think all religions are agreed on the principle. There is generally no difficulty in determining a principle. The difficult comes in when one proceeds to put it into practice. A principle is the expression of a perfection, and as imperfect beings like us cannot practise perfection, we devise every moment limits of its compromise in practice; So Hinduism has laid down that killing for sacrifice is no ahimsa (violence). This is only a half-truth. Violence will be violence for all time, and all violence is sinful. But what is inevitable is not regarded as a sin, so much so that the science of daily practice has not only declared the inevitable violence involved in killing for sacrifice as permissible, but even regarded it as meritorious.

But unavoidable violence cannot be defined. For it changes with time, place and person. What is regarded as excusable at one time may be inexcusable at another. The violence involved in burning fuel or coal in the depth of winter to keep the body warm may be unavoidable and, therefore, a duty for weak-bodied man, but fire unnecessarily lit in midsummer is clearly violence.

We recognize the duty of killing microbes by the use of disinfectants. It is violence and yet a duty. But why go even as far as that? The air in a dark, closed room is full of little microbes, and the introduction of light and air into it by opening it is destruction indeed. But it is ever a duty to use that finest of disinfectants—pure air.

These instances can be multiplied. The principle that applies in the instances cited applies in the matter of killing rabid dogs. To destroy a rabid dog is to commit the minimum amount of violence. A recluse, who is living in a forest and is compassion incarnate, may not destroy a rabid dog. For in his compassion he has the virtue of making it whole. But a city-dweller who is responsible for the protection of lives under his care and who does not possess the virtues of the recluse, but is capable of destroying a rabid dog, is faced with a conflict of duties. If he kills the dog, he commits a sin. If he does not kill it, he commits a graver sin. So he prefers to commit the lesser one and save himself from the graver.

I believe myself to be saturated with ahimsa—non-violence. Ahimsa and Truth are as my two lungs. I cannot live without them. But I see every moment, with more and more clearness, the immense power of ahimsa and the littleness of man. Even the forest-dweller cannot be entirely free from violence, in spite of his limitless compassion. With every breath he commits a certain amount of violence. The body itself is a house of slaughter, and therefore moksha and Eternal Bliss consist in perfect deliverance from the body and, therefore, all pleasure, save the joy of moksha, is evanescent, imperfect.

That being the case, we have to drink, in daily life, many a bitter draught of violence.

It is therefore a thousand pities that the question of stray dogs, etc., assumes such a monstrous proportion in this sacred land of ahimsa. It is my firm conviction that we are propagating himsa in the name of ahimsa owing to our deep ignorance of the great principle. It may be a sin to destroy rabid dogs and such others as are liable to catch rabies. But we are responsible, the mahajan is responsible, for this state of things. The mahajan may not allow the dogs to stray. It is a sin, it should be a sin, to feed stray dogs, and we should save numerous dogs if we had legislation making every stray dog liable to be shot. Even if those who feed stray dogs consented to pay a penalty for their misdirected compassion we should be free from the curse of stray dogs.

Humanity is a noble attribute of the soul. It is not exhausted with saving a few fish or a few dogs. Such saving may even be sinful. If I have a swarm of ants in my house, the man who proceeds to feed them will be guilty of a sin. For God has provided their grain for the ants, but the man who feeds them might destroy me and my family. The mahajan may feel itself safe and believe that it has saved their lives by dumping dogs near my field, but it will have committed the greater sin of putting my life in danger. Humaneness is impossible without thought, discrimination, charity, fearlessness, humility and clear vision. It is no easy thing to walk on the sharp sword-edge of ahimsa in this world which is so full of himsa. Wealth does not help: anger is the enemy of ahimsa; and pride is a monster that swallows it up. In this strait and narrow observance of this religion of ahimsa one has often to know so-called himsa as the truest form of ahimsa.

Things in this world are not what they seem and do not seem as they really are. Or if they are seen as they are, they so appear only to a few who have perfected themselves after ages of penance. But none has yet been able to describe the reality, and no one, can.

Young India, 21-10-1926

449. LETTER TO V. A. SUNDARAM

October 10, 1926

MY DEAR SUNDARAM,

I continue to receive your weekly gift. Let Savitri write once in a way.

Yours,

BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 3181
450. LETTER TO KRISHNADAS

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 10, 1926

MY DEAR KRISHNADAS,

It was from Guruji that I learnt something about you. How is it that you have not kept me in touch with you for some time now? Let me know all about your health.

Here at the present moment about 30 people are bed-ridden with malaria. Shanker, Kakasaheb’s son, has a mild attack of typhoid and Kishorelal is down with his old friend asthma. Devdas is still at Mussoorie.

Yours sincerely,

From a microfilm: S.N. 19721

451. LETTER TO B. G. HORNIMAN

Sunday, October 10, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

You will not misunderstand me for telling you that I must not send you any message for your forthcoming paper.1 The increasing bitterness has made me sad. Multiplication of newspapers multiplies bitterness. Of late, therefore, I have ceased to send messages to newspapers, especially new ones. I refused only two weeks ago to send a message of simple good wishes to Dr. Satyapal on his enterprise.2 I did likewise for a nationalist weekly in U.P.3 If I could I would dissuade you from your enterprise at this juncture and feel that I had done a true friend’s duty.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

SHRI B. G. HORNIMAN

From a photostat: S.N. 11010

1 Horniman had sought a message from Gandhiji for the inaugural October 16 issue of The Indian National Herald whose policy, he wrote,”will be strongly nationalist and in support of the Indian National Congress” (S.N. 11003).
2 Vide”Letter to Dr. Satyapal”, 21-9-1926.
3 Vide”Letter to Z. M. Paret”, 23-9-1926.
452. A LETTER

SABARMATI,
October 10, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I shall be happy to meet the Maulana and give him a note of introduction.

I prize your congratulations on my achievement or rather that of the film company.

Herewith a letter from Sjt. Ramachandran\(^1\) which speaks for itself. Of course he wants no remuneration. If you entertain his proposal, you will find board and lodging for him in the premises. But if you do not need his services or for any other reason it is not convenient for you to have him, you will not hesitate to say no! Ramchandran is a . . . \(^2\) good man.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

From the original : C.W. 10875. Courtesy : Dr. Zakir Husain Library, Jamia Millia Islamia

453. LETTER TO HARIBHAU UpADHYAYA

SABARMATI,
Ashwin Shukla 4, 1982 [October 10, 1926]

BHAI HARIBHAU,

I have your letter. I am glad to know that Martanda\(^3\) is improving. If you can find out why he was not recovering here, please let me know. What treatment is he taking? May you succeed in observing the vows. The work on the occasion of the Charkhadwadashi was well done. Keep me informed of the results of your dietetic experiments.

Blessings from

BAPU

SJT. HARIBHAU UpADHYAYA
RAJASTHAN CHARKHA SANGH
AJMER

From the Hindi original : Haribhau Upadhyaya Papers. Courtesy : Nehru Memorial Museum and Library

\(^1\) Who was teaching spinning at Jamia Millia, Delhi.
\(^2\) Illegible
\(^3\) Addressee’s brother
454. WILL

[October 10, 1926]

This is my last testament, and by this I revoke all wills executed by me heretofore. I do not possess any property of my own. If, after my death, any article is found to be of my ownership, I bequeath the same to the Trustees of the Satyagraha Ashram, namely, Shri R. J. Jhaveri¹, B. Jamnjalji², M. H. Desai³, I. A. K. Bawazeer⁴ and C. K. Gandhi⁵, or the Trustees of the said Satyagraha Ashram at the time of my demise and thereafter to the Trustees thereof from time to time as my heirs. I also bequeath to the aforesaid Trustees all my rights in whatever books and whatever articles I have written or I may write hereafter, and also appoint them to administer my affairs after my death if and when necessary. The income derived from the said books and articles or from the copyrights thereof and the property found to be of my ownership is to be used for carrying out the objects of the Satyagraha Ashram according to their discretion. If any of the afore-mentioned Trustees resigns or dies during my lifetime or after my death, the surviving Trustees may carry on the duties under this Will and can appoint a new Trustee to fill up the vacancy if they so desire. I reserve my right to add to or alter this Will.

This Will has been executed by me in a sound state of mind and of my free will at Sabarmati Satyagraha Ashram, Asho Sud 4, Samvat 1982.

Witnesses: MOHANDAS KARAMCHAND GANDHI
DESAI VALJI GOVINDJI
CHHOTALAL JAIN

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12220

¹ Revashanker J. Jhaveri
² Jamnalal Bajaj
³ Mahadev Desai
⁴ Imam Saheb Abdul Kader Bawazeer
⁵ Chhaganlal Khushalchand Gandhi
455. LETTER TO CHANDRASHANKAR

THE ASHRAM,
Asvina Sud 4, 1982, October 11, 1926

BHAISHRI CHANDRASHANKAR,

I have your postcard. I desire neither activity nor withdrawal from activity. I hunger after swaraj, and the hunger is becoming more intense as time passes.

If I were an emperor, I would have done one thing more. It is this: I would have declared illness a crime and punished those who were guilty of it. Among such persons, I would have singled you out to be the first to be punished.

Vandemataram from
MOHANDAS

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19954

456. LETTER TO RAMI PAREKH

Monday [October 11, 1926]

CHI. RAMI,

I have your letter. Make it a habit to write in ink. So far all is well here. Do you study anything? Do you spin?

There are many people in the Ashram nowadays. Many have come from outside for the Charkha Jayanti.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 9701

457. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI

ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
Tuesday, October 12, 1926

CHI. RAMDAS,

I have your letter after a long time. You have taken difficult vows. May God be your help. Certainly it is my earnest wish that you should dedicate yourself wholly to khadi. But plunge into the work only when you think it right. There is no doubt that khadi is our Kamadhenu. If I can make myself totally passionless in this life, you and the others will not look for any livelihood save khadi. I hope you are well.

1From the S.N. register

Blessings from

BAPU

[From Gujarati]

Motana Man, p. 32

458. RACE ARROGANCE

A German correspondent who is interested in obliterating race distinctions sends me an article showing the wrong done by white Europe to the Abyssinians and the Riffs and the injustice that is being daily perpetrated against the Negro in the United States of America in the name of and for the sake of maintaining white superiority. From the article, I cull the following three instances:

There were Christian clergymen the other day voyaging to the “Holy Land”. A clergyman from the Southern States announced himself. His white fellow clergymen would not let him travel with them. The passage was refunded and compensation was paid and thus they got rid of the “coloured man”.

In South Carolina (U.S.A.) a white man stole a motor car. He got four weeks. The same Court of Justice condemned a Negro to three years’ penal servitude for stealing a bicycle. A Delaware (U.S.A.) “coloured” man was sentenced to death for committing rape on a white girl. At Alabama (U.S.A.) two whites were fined $250 each for committing rape on coloured girls.

If the white man is cursed with the pride of race, we are cursed with the pride of birth. Our treatment of the so-called untouchables is no better than that of coloured people by the white man. I have cited the examples to show that the material achievements of the West have made no material difference in their morality—the final test of any civilization.

Young India, 14-10-1926
459. A CATECHISM

I gladly publish this catechism\(^1\). But I must not enter into a long reply even though I should fail to satisfy the able catechist.

1. What I have pleaded for is that parents who commit the sin of “marrying” their daughters of tender age should expiate for the sin by remarrying these daughters, should they become widowed while they are yet in their teens.\(^2\) If the girls become widowed at a ripe age, it is their concern whether they would remarry or remain widowed. If I were called upon to state what the rule should be, I should say the same rule should apply to women as to men. If a fifty-year-old widower may remarry with impunity, it should be open to the widow of that age to do likewise. That in my opinion both will be sinning by remarriage is quite another matter. I should any day subscribe to a reform in the Hindu law making sinful the remarriage of a widow or a widower who voluntarily married after maturity.

2. All I have advocated is abolition of the fifth varna.\(^3\) The untouchables should, therefore, merge in the fourth division. The reorganization of the four divisions, the abolition of artificial inequalities and of subdivisions is a separate branch of reform. Interdining means dining off the same plate. If I eat a biscuit cooked by Vishnu, Solomon, Ismail and Company, I do not interdine.

3. I call myself a sanatani Hindu\(^4\), because I believe in the Vedas, the Upanishads, the Puranas and the writings left by the holy reformers. This belief does not require me to accept as authentic everything that passes as Shastras. I reject everything that contradicts the fundamental principles of morality. I am not required to accept the ipse dixit or the interpretations of pundits. Above all I call myself

---

\(^1\) Not reproduced here. This was a long letter by an “Assistant Executive Engineer” raising four basic issues.

\(^2\) The correspondent, referring to Gandhiji’s article “Suppressed Humanity”, 19-8-1926, had asked what his prescription would be for widows of 15 years of age or above.

\(^3\) The correspondent had sought to know why caste reform should not involve inter-dining.

\(^4\) The correspondent had asked, citing what Gandhiji had written in “Curse of Child Marriage”, 26-8-1926, why he termed himself a “Hindu” and at the same time denied the authority of the Shastras. The correspondent had charged Gandhiji, in the light of his articles “Defending Child Marriage”, 9-9-1926 and “The Hydra-headed Monster”, 29-7-1926, with intolerance of which Gandhiji had considered Swami Dayanand and the Arya Samajists guilty.
a sanatani Hindu, so long as Hindu society in general accepts me as such. In a concrete manner he is a Hindu who believes in God, immortality of the soul, transmigration, the law of Karma and moksha, and who tries to practise truth and ahimsa in daily life, and therefore practises cow-protection in its widest sense and understands and tries to act according to the law of varnashrama.

I must not be drawn into controversy about Swami Dayanand.\(^1\)

Young India, 14-10-1926

460. TYRANNY OF WORDS

A correspondent thus writes on my article "No Faith in Prayer" published in Young India dated September 23rd:

In your article bearing the above caption you hardly do justice to the "boy" or to your own position as a great thinker. It is true that the expressions used by the writer in his letter are not all happy but of his clarity of thought there is no doubt. It is also very evident that he is not a boy as the word is understood. I should be much surprised to find him under twenty. Even if he is young he seems to show sufficient intellectual development not to be treated in the manner of "A boy may not argue". The writer of the letter is a rationalist while you are a believer, two age-old types, with age-old conflict. The attitude of the one is, 'Let me be convinced and I shall believe', that of the other is, 'Believe and conviction shall come'. The first appeals to reason, the second appeals to authority. You seem to think that agnosticism is but a passing phase among all young people and that faith comes to them sooner or later. There is the well-known case of Swami Vivekananda to support your view. You therefore proceed to prescribe a compulsory dose of prayer to the "boy" for his own good. Your reasons are twofold. Firstly, prayer for its own sake, as a recognition of one's own littleness, and mightiness and goodness of the supposed higher being; Secondly, for its utility, for the solace it bring to those who want to be solaced. I shall dispose of the second argument first. Here it is recommended as a sort of staff to the weak. Such are the trials of life, and such is their power to shatter the reason of men that a great many people may need prayer and faith sometimes. They have a right to it and they are welcome to it. But there have been and there are always some true rationalists—few no doubt—who have never felt the necessity of either. There is also the class of people who while they are not aggressive doubters are indifferent to religion.

\(^1\) ibid.

As all people do not ultimately require the help of prayer and as those who feel its necessity are free to take to it and do take to it, when required, compulsion in prayer from the point of utility cannot be upheld. Compulsory physical exercise and education may be necessary for physical and mental development of a person, not so the belief in God and prayer for the moral side. Some of the world’s greatest agnostics have been the most moral men. To these I suppose you would recommend prayer for its own sake, as an expression of humility, in fact your first argument. Too much has been made of this humility. So vast is knowledge that even the greatest scientists have felt humble sometimes, but their general trait has been that of masterful inquiry, their faith in their own powers has been as great as their conquests of nature. Had it not been so we should still be scratching earth with bare fingers for roots, nay, we should have been wiped the surface of the earth.

During the Ice Age when human beings were dying of cold and when fire was first discovered, your prototype in that age must have taunted the discoverer with ‘What is the use of your schemes, of what avail are they against the power and wrath of God?’ The humble have been promised the Kingdom of God hereafter. We do not know whether they will get it, but there on this earth their portion is serfdom. To revert to the main point, your assertion about “accept the belief and the faith shall come” is too true, terribly true. Much of the religious fanaticism of this world can be traced directly to the kind of teaching. Provided you catch them young enough, and keep at them repeatedly and long enough, you can make a good majority of human beings believe in anything. That is how your orthodox Hindu or fanatical Mahommedan is manufactured. There are of course always a small few in either community who will outgrow these beliefs that have been forced upon them. Do you know that if the Hindus and the Mahommedans stopped studying their scriptures until they reached maturity, they would not be such fanatical believers in their dogmas and would cease to quarrel for their sake? Secular education is the remedy for the Hindu-Muslim riots, but you will not be able to appreciate the solution, for you are not made that way.

Great as our debt is to you for setting an unprecedented example in courage, action and sacrifice in this country, where people have been always much afraid, when the final judgment is passed on your work it will be said that your influence gave a great setback to intellectual progress in this country.

I do not know the meaning of boy” as the word is ordinarily understood”, if a 20-year-old lad is not a boy. Indeed I would call all school-going persons boys and girls, irrespective of their ages. But whether the doubting student may be called a boy or a man, my argument must stand. A student is like a soldier (and a soldier may be 40 years old) who may not argue about matters of discipline when he has put himself and chooses to remain under it. A soldier may not remain a unit in his regiment and have the option of doing or not doing things he is asked to do. Similarly a student, no matter how wise or old he is, surrenders when he joins a school or a college the right of rejecting its discipline. Here there is no underrating or despising the intelligence of the student. It is an aid to his intelligence for him to come voluntarily under discipline. But my correspondent willingly bears the heavy yoke of the tyranny of words. He scents "compulsion" in every act that displeases the doer. But there is compulsion and compulsion. We call self-imposed compulsion self-restraint. We hug it and grow under it. But compulsion to be shunned even at the cost of life is restraint superimposed upon us against our wills and often with the object of humiliating us and robbing us of our dignity as men and boys if you will. Social restraints generally are healthy and we reject them to our own undoing. Submission to crawling orders is unmanly and cowardly. Worse still is submission to the multitude of passions that crowd round us every moment of our lives ready to hold us their slaves.

But the correspondent has yet another word that holds him in its chains. It is the mighty word "rationalism". Well, I had a full dose of it. Experience has humbled me enough to let me realize the specific limitations of reason. Just as matter misplaced becomes dirt, reason misused becomes lunacy. If we would but render unto Caesar that which is Caesar's, all would be well.

Rationalists are admirable beings, rationalism is a hideous monster when it claims for itself omnipotence. Attribution of omnipotence to reason is as bad a piece of idolatry as is worship of stock and stone believing it to be God.

Who has reasoned out the use of prayer? Its use is felt after practice. Such is the world's testimony. Cardinal Newman never surrendered his reason, but he yielded a better place to prayer when he humbly sang "one step enough for me". Sankara was a prince among reasoners. There is hardly anything in the world's literature to surpass Sankara's rationalism. But he yielded the first place to prayer and faith.

The correspondent has made a hasty generalization from the fleeting and disturbing events that are happening before us. But everything on this earth lends itself to abuse. It seems to be a law governing everything pertaining to man. No doubt religion has to answer for some of the most terrible crimes in history. But that is the fault not of religion but of the ungovernable brute in man. He has not yet shed the effects of his brute ancestry.

I do not know a single rationalist who has never done anything in simple faith and has based every one of his acts on reason. But we all know millions of human beings living their more or less orderly lives because of their childlike faith in the Maker of us all. That very faith is a prayer. The "boy" on whose letter I based my article belongs to that vast mass of humanity and the article was written to steady him and his fellow-searchers, not to disturb the happiness of rationalists like the correspondent.

But he quarrels even with the bent that is given to the youth of the world by their elders and teachers. But that it seems is an inseparable handicap (if it be one) of impressionable age. Purely secular education is also an attempt to mould the young mind after a fashion. The correspondent is good enough to grant that the body and the mind may be trained and directed. Of the soul which makes the body and the mind possible, he has no care, or perhaps he is in doubt as to its existence. But his disbelief cannot avail him. He cannot escape the consequence of his reasoning. For, why may not a believer argue on the correspondent’s own ground and say he must influence the soul of boys and girls even as the others influence the body and the intelligence? The evils of religious instruction will vanish with the evolution of the true religious spirit. To give up religious instruction is like letting a field lie fallow and grow weeds for want of the tiller’s knowledge of the proper use of the field.

The correspondent’s excursion into the great discoveries of the ancients is really irrelevant to the subject under discussion. No one questions, I do not, the utility or the brilliance of those discoveries. They were generally a proper field for the use and exercise of reason. But they, the ancients, did not delete from their lives the predominant function of faith and prayer. Works without faith and prayer are like an artificial flower that has no fragrance. I plead not for the suppression of reason, but for a due recognition of that in us which sanctifies reason itself.

Young India, 14-10-1926
461. "TAKLI" IN SCHOOLS

I offer no apology for reproducing practically in full the following business-like report of takli spinning in the national school at Dondaicha (West Khandesh):¹

There should be no delay about introducing carding in the school.² No boy or girl can be regarded a full spinner unless he or she can card and make slivers. There is no reason why the schoolmasters should not card for their pupils till the latter have learnt it themselves. National school teachers may not regard themselves as mere paid employees. They are trustees for the moral and mental and physical welfare of the pupils as well as for national finances.

Young India, 14-10-1926

462. KHADI EXHIBITIONS

Bihar seems to be specializing in khadi exhibitions. Here is the latest report about an exhibition at Jamshedpur being the fourteenth of the season:³

Ahmednagar in Maharashtra has also had a successful exhibition. This was held between 11th and 19th September. The report before me states that it was attended by Seth Jamnalal Bajaj and Messrs B. G. Horniman, Khadilkar, Jamnadas Mehta, V. V. Dastane, C. V. Vaidya, Shankerraoy Lavate, Vamanrao Joshi, and Dr. Sathe among others. The attendance was nearly ten thousand and included all classes. The cash sales amounted to over Rs. 4,000.

Young India, 14-10-1926

463. IMPROVISED METHOD OF TESTING

The head master of Dondaicha school inquires whether there is an improvised method of testing the strength and the count of yarn.

¹ The report, not given here, furnished details of production of yarn by the pupils and the accounts of the takli class.
² The report had said: "Carding will be taken in hand after one month, when agricultural pursuits of boys are over."
³ The report, not reproduced here, was of the exhibition organized by the Bihar Provincial Khadi Department between September 15 and 23. It gave a gist of the speech by F. C. Temple, who had presided over the inaugural function. It was attended, among others, by Rajendra Prasad.
Here is a recipe:

Take from the yarn at random 4 yards and make a reel two feet in circumference. This will be one foot in length and hang it stretched to a peg so as not to get untwisted. Hang at the other end regulated weights. You are ready to measure the test when the strand snaps by the weight.

Weigh the broken strand in a fine scale. Now one tola is 100 ratis. If the reel weighs approximately 18 ratis the yarn is count 1. If the reel weighs less the fraction of 18 ratis will be the count of yarn. Thus if the 4 yards weigh 3 ratis, since 3 ratis is 1/6th of 18, the count is 6. In the absence of fine scales and very small weights, the strands may be more yards, where a waste of yarn is not of much consequence. (Broken yarn may be used for making wicks, etc.) The convenient length is 21 yards and its multiples, 42, 84. The following table should be memorized:

- 7000 grains = 1 lb. = 38 8/9 tolas
- 180 grains = 1 tola
- 840 yards yarn = 1 lease.

Therefore:

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{Weight of hank of 840 yards} &= \text{Count.} \\ \text{(in grains)} \end{align*}
\]

Or

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{Weight of hank in } & \text{tolas} = \text{Count.} \\
& 38 \ 8/9 \text{ tolas}
\end{align*}
\]

Or

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{Yards} \times 10 \quad \text{Tolas} \times 216 &= \text{Count.} \\
\text{To arrive at the test remember:} \\ \text{315 tolas X length} &= 100 \text{ test.} \end{align*}
\]

One round = 2 lengths.

To find the unevenness of a given quantity of yarn made up into strands:

Find the counts of six strands selected anyhow from your hank.

Total the counts and divide by six. You have the average count.
Take the difference between the highest and the lowest counts.

Then

\[
\text{The difference} \times 100 = \text{unevenness p.c.}
\]

the average

Deduct the unevenness percentage from 100 and you have the percentage of evenness.

Thus if six strands show respectively 16, 18, 15, 20, 22, and 17 counts, the total is 108; \( \frac{108}{6} = 18 \).

Now the lowest count is 15 and the highest is 22. The difference is 7.

Therefore \( \frac{7 \times 100}{18} = 39 \) nearly unevenness.

Therefore 100-39 = 61 evenness.

Young India, 14-10-1926

---

464. LETTER TO KSHITISH CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

THE ASHRAM,

SABARMATI,

October 14, 1926

DEAR KSHITISH BABU,

I have your letter about Gauhati Exhibition. Immediately on receipt of your letter, I sent a telegram\(^1\) to the Committee whether they reconsider their decision to include mill cloth and powerloom cloth in their exhibits. This is the telegraphic reply received by me:

Not exhibiting mill cloth powerloom cloth. Items carelessly included in prospectus. Making necessary correction—Secretary, Congress Exhibition.

I suppose nothing now needs to be done.

I hope you are doing well. Satis Babu has not written to me now for some time. I hope both he and Hemaprabhadevi are also doing well.

Yours sincerely,

SIT. KSHTISH CH. DAS GUPTA

39, CHARKDANGA, ROAD
CALCUTTA

From a microfilm: S.N. 11240a

---

\(^1\) This is not available.
465. LETTER TO NORMAN LEYS

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 14, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter¹ and the statement made before the Court by Mr. Tarini P. Sinha. I have a copy of your book called Kenya. But I shall value an autograph[ed] copy if you have one to spare.

Yours sincerely,

DR. NORMAN LEYS
BRAILSFORD
NEAR DERBY

From a photostat: S.N. 12173

466. LETTER TO ZUBEDA BANO

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 14, 1925

MY DEAR YOUNG FRIEND,

I like your letter. You must gradually improve your handwriting. But, for a ten-year-old girl what you have sent is not at all bad especially as you have been studying English only for the last 4 months. I cannot recommend any English book to you which you can read and understand well at the present moment. My advice to you would be to learn all about India from the vernacular, which I suppose is Hindustani. Do you read the Devanagari script? If you can, I can recommend some books to you.

Having taken it up, I hope you will never give up the charkha and khaddar.

Yours sincerely,

MISS ZUBEDA BANO
C/O SECRETARY
ANJUMAN ISLAM
INDORE

From a microfilm: S.N. 19718

¹ This was dated September 20 (S.N. 12172); vide Appendix”Letter from Norman Leys”, 20-9-1926.
467. LETTER TO DR. PARASHURAM

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

October 14, 1926

DEAR DR. PARASHURAM,

I have your letter. The only advice that I can give you is: ‘Go back to your place, return to your practice and there do what service you can. And make no fuss about it.’

Yours sincerely,

From a microfilm: S.N. 19719

468. LETTER TO MOTILAL ROY

THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI,

October 14, 1926

DEAR MOTI BABU,

I have your letter together with a report of production and sale of khadi for the month of August.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

BABU MOTILAL ROY
PRABARTAK SANGH
CHANDERNAGORE

From a photostat: G.N. 11030

469. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

[THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

October 15, 1926]

DEAR MIRA,

I am silent for overtaking arrears. I did not think of glycerine being an animal product though now that you mention it, I see I knew the thing. But although it is an animal product, you should continue to use it to paint the tonsils. Applying is not the same thing as eating.
You probably use soap that contains animal fat, but you will not eat it. More, however, later. I hope you will not disturb yourself over the matter.

BAPU

MIRA BEHN

From the original: C.W. 5187. Courtesy: Mirabehn

470. LETTER TO ATHALYE

THE ASHRAM,
October 15, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

With reference to your letter, I have now got a detailed reply from Jamnalalji from which I gather that you wrote to him letters of confession and apology for having caused him much worry and trouble. So far as I can see, Jamnalalji has gone out of his way to placate you. And the arbitration, which was of your choice, decided against you. Jamnalalji further tells me he has had no correspondence or other communication with Dr. Mehta with reference to you. Nothing, therefore, remains to be done by me.

Yours sincerely,

SIT. ATHALYE
SADASHIV PETH
POONA CITY

From a microfilm: S.N. 19720

471. LETTER TO SATISH CHANDRA MUKHERJEE

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 15, 1926

DEAR SATISH BABU,

I have your letter with useful enclosures thoughtfully sent by you. I did not know that Krishnadas was away from you. I never gave

1 The identity of the addressee is not known.
2 The enclosures to Mukherjee’s letter of October 12, 1926, consisted of the copy of a letter dated September 15, 1926 from Dr. Karl Thieme of Leipzig, addressed to Krishnadas, a typescript copy of “A Quaker View of Non-co-operation” by A. Barrett-Brown, Principal, Ruskin College, and the press cutting of a letter from Miss Lilian Edger to The Statesman, 3-10-1926, “which,” Mukherjee wrote, “has appealed to me and may just interest you” (S.N. 11004).
myself any anxiety on his score seeing that he is by your side or somewhere under your direct guidance.

Of course, the Hindu-Muslim problem is becoming more and more complicated. But what is one to do where one is helpless? I am an optimist because I believe in the efficacy of prayerful thought. When time for action has come, God will give the light and guidance. I therefore watch, wait and pray holding myself in momentary readiness to respond.

The cutting that Miss Lilian Edger has sent you is interesting as also the extracts from "No More War". I hope to make use of both in Young India. Lord Oxford’s article, I have not yet read. You have said nothing, in your own fashion, about your health. Do please let me have a line to tell me that you are keeping stronger than before. There is no prospect now of Romain Rolland coming to India at all; certainly, not during the ensuing winter. He is daily aging and has a very delicate constitution.

Yours sincerely,

From a photostat: S.N. 11006

472. TELEGRAM TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

SABARMATI,
October 16, 1926

SHREE
BOMBAY
KAMALA HAS NO TYPHOID SIMPLE MALARIA. GETTING BETTER. NO ANXIETY.

BAPU

_Panchven Putrako Bapuke Ashirvad, p. 58_

---

1 Mukherjee had written: "The Hindu-Muslim riots are a great strain on me and my nerves. . . ."

2 This was in reply to Mukherjee’s question: "Do you expect M. Romain Rolland somewhere next winter?"
473. IS THIS HUMANITY?-II

[October 17, 1926]

When I wrote the article on this subject I knew that I was adding one more to my already heavy burden of troubles. But it could not be helped.

Angry letters are now pouring in. At an hour when after a hard day’s work I was about to retire to bed, three friends invaded me, infringed the religion of ahimsa in the name of humanity, and engaged me in a discussion on it. They had come in the name of humanity. How could I refuse to see them?

So I met them. One of them, I saw, betrayed anger, bitterness and arrogance. He did not seem to me to have come with a view to getting his doubts solved. He had come rather to correct me. Everyone has a right to do so, but whoever undertakes such a mission must know my position. This friend had taken no trouble to understand my position. But he was not to blame for it. This impatience which is but a symptom of violence is to be found everywhere. The violence in this case was painful to me as it was betrayed by an advocate of non-violence.

He claimed to be a Jain. I have made a fair study of Jainism. This visitor’s ahimsa was a distortion of the reality as I have known it in Jainism. But the Jains have no monopoly of ahimsa. It is not the exclusive peculiarity of any religion. Every religion is based on ahimsa, its application is different in different religions.

I do not think that the Jains of today practise ahimsa in any better way than others. I can say this because of my acquaintance with Jains, which is so old that many take me to be a Jain. Mahavir was an incarnation of compassion, of ahimsa. How I wish his votaries were votaries also of his ahimsa!

Protection of little creatures is indeed an essential part of ahimsa, but it does not exhaust itself with it. Ahimsa begins with it. Besides protection may not always mean mere refraining from killing. Torture or participation, direct or indirect, in the unnecessary multiplication of those that must die is himsa.

The multiplication of dogs is unnecessary. A roving dog without an owner is a danger to society and a swarm of them is a menace to its very existence.
If we want to keep dogs in towns or villages in a decent manner, no dog should be suffered to wander. There should be no stray dogs even as we have no stray cattle. Humanitarian societies should find a religious solution of such questions.

But can we take individual charge of these roving dogs? And if we cannot, can we have a pinjarapole for them? If both these things are impossible, there seems to me to be no alternative except to kill them.

Connivance or putting up with the status quo is no ahimsa, there is no thought or discrimination in it. Dogs will be killed whenever they are a menace to society. I regard this as unavoidable in the life of a householder. To wait until they get rabid is not to be merciful to them. We can imagine what the dogs would wish if a meeting could be called of them, from what we would wish under the same circumstances. We will not choose to live anyhow. That many of us do so is no credit to us. A meeting of wise men will never resolve that men may treat one another as they treat rabid or stray dogs. What shall we expect of them if there were to be some beings loasing it over us as we do over dogs? Would we not rather prefer to be killed than to be treated as dogs? We offend against dogs as a class by suffering them to stray and live on crumbs or savings from our plates that we throw at them and we injure our neighbours also by doing so.

I admit that there is the duty of suffering dogs to live even at the cost of one’s life. But that religion is not for the householder who desires to live, who procreates, who would protect society. The householder can but practise the middle path of taking care of a few dogs.

Our domestics of today are the wild animals of yesterday. The buffalo is a domestic only in India. It is a sin to domesticate wild animals inasmuch as man does so for his selfish purposes. That he has domesticated the cow and the buffalo is not out of mercy for them, it is for his own use. He, therefore, does not allow a cow or a buffalo to stray. The same duty is incumbent regarding dogs. I am, therefore, strongly of opinion that, if we would practise the religion of humanity, we should have a law making it obligatory on those who would have dogs to keep them under guard, and not allow them to stray, and making all the stray dogs liable to be destroyed after a certain date.

If the mahajan has really any mercy for the dogs, it should take possession of all the stray dogs and distribute them to those who want to keep them. It seems to me to be impossible to protect dogs as we can protect the cows.

But there is a regular science of dog-keeping which the people in the West have formulated and perfected. We should learn it from them and devise measures for the solution of our own problem. The work cannot be done without patience, wisdom and perseverance.

So much about dogs. But with ahimsa in its comprehensive aspect I propose to deal on another occasion.

Young India, 28-10-1926

474. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

Asvina Sud 11, 1982 [October 17, 1926]

CHI. JAMNALAL,

Giridhari tells me that your health has still not improved. This is not good. It must improve, even if that means your going away somewhere. You should go to a place where you can live in solitude. The air should be wholesome, and you should have the right kind of companion with you. Your illness is both physical and mental. You ought not to carry an excessive burden of work.

You need not worry about Kamala. Her fever is like that of the others. She is in fact ready to go to Wardha or Bombay or any other place. But I don’t feel like letting her go till she is quite all right, nor is it necessary that she should go. I see her from time to time. It is her mother-in-law about whom I feel worried, because she gets nervous, though, of course, she will certainly recover.

I hope you take regular walks. You must go out both in the morning and in the evening.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2873

475. LETTER TO DEVCHAND PAREKH

Asvina Sud 11, 1982 [October 17, 1926]

BHAISHRI DEVCHANDBHAI,

What did you do about the matter discussed in the letter concerning sub-castes?
Now as trustee of the Madhada Ashram, you should take control of it openly.

Vandemataram from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 5702

476. LETTER TO BENARSIDAS CHATURVEDI

Asvina Sud 11, 1982 [October 17, 1926]

Bhai Benarsidas,

Several days have passed since I got your letter, but owing to pressure of work, I have not been able to reply to it. When did I write and say that I had committed an error in advising that 500 persons could be sent to British Guiana? Let me know where that article is. I have held back your letter from publication until after I have seen it.

Yours,

Mohandas Gandhi

From a photostat of the Hindi: G. N. 2571

477. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS OF INDIA

Ahmedabad,
October 17, 1926

Interviewed by a representative of the Associated Press on the personnel of the Indian delegation to the Round Table Conference to be held at Cape Town in December, Mahatma Gandhi said:

I think the choice is carefully made. I like the idea of Sir Mahomed Habibullah’s leading the deputation. Mr. Corbett has intimate experience of the intricate question which the Delegation is to handle. Sir Darcy Lindsay, as a representative of European commerce, should have great weight in South Africa. This Deputation would have been altogether incomplete without Mr. Srinivasa Sastri. He knows Colonial questions. He knows South African statesmen, and who can question his learning and industry? Sir Phiroze Sethna’s inclusion is not difficult to understand. Sir George Paddison by his able work on the last deputation had made himself indispensable. Mr. Bajpai as 1The interview was also published in some other daily newspapers.

Secretary was a foregone conclusion.

There are no doubt names missing, but that is not a matter of much consequence. It is enough to realize that those who are included in the delegation are all good and sound men representative of varied interests. I am anxious that this delegation, imperfect and incomplete though it may appear to some of us, should receive the moral approbation of the public. Things seem to have gone on smoothly up to now, and I am not without hope that the forthcoming Conference will give at least breathing time to the Indian settlers of South Africa as also to the Government of India if it does its duty to improve the status of the settlers. Every year of respite gained is so much gained on behalf of justice which is entirely on our side.

_The Bombay Chronicle, 18-10-1926_

478. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

_Asvina Sud 12, 1982 [October 18, 1926]_

CHI. JAMNALAL,

You must have got my letter written yesterday. If you can find time, go and visit Pratap Pandit’s tannery, and ask him when he will send his man.

Kamala was thoroughly examined by Dr. Rajabali. There is no cause for anxiety. It has been decided to put her under his treatment.

_Blessings from_

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2874

479. LETTER TO DR. VARDHARAJLU

_October 20, 1926_

DEAR DR. VARDHARAJLU,

This introduces to you Mr. and Mrs. Naidu of South Africa. They have just arrived from Natal and intend to visit the holy places.

_Yours sincerely,_

M. K. GANDHI

From a photostat: C. N. 7193
A fair friend who has some faith in my wisdom and sincerity asks some knotty questions which I would fain avoid for fear of raising an indignant controversy on the part of some husbands jealous of their rights. But jealous husbands would spare me, for they know that I happen to be one myself having led a fairly happy married life for the past forty years in spite of occasional jars.

The first question is apposite and timely (The original is in Marathi. I have given a free rendering.):

Can a man or woman attain self-realization by mere recitation of Ramanama and without taking part in national service? I ask this question because some of my sisters say that they do not need to do anything beyond attending to family requirements and occasionally showing kindness to the poor.

This question has puzzled not only women but many men and has taxed me to the utmost. I know that there is a school of philosophy which teaches complete inaction and futility of all effort. I have not been able to appreciate that teaching unless, in order to secure verbal agreement, I were to put my own interpretation on it. In my humble opinion, effort is necessary for one’s own growth. It has to be irrespective of results. Ramanama or some equivalent is necessary not for the sake of repetition but for the sake of purification, as an aid to effort, for direct guidance from above. It is, therefore, never a substitute for effort. It is meant for intensifying and guiding it in proper channel. If all effort is vain, why family cares or an occasional help to the poor? In this very effort is contained the germ of national service. And national service, to me, means service of humanity, even as disinterested service of the family means the same thing. Disinterested service of the family necessarily leads one to national service. Ramanama gives one detachment and ballast and never throws one off one’s balance at critical moments. Self-realization I hold to be impossible without service of and identification with the poorest.

The second question is:

In Hinduism devotion of wife to her husband and her complete merger in him is the highest aim, never mind whether the husband is a fiend or an embodiment of love. If this be the correct conduct for a wife, may she in the teeth of opposition by her husband undertake national service? Or must she only go as far as the husband will permit her to go?

My ideal of a wife is Sita and of a husband Rama. But Sita was no slave of Rama. Or each was slave of the other. Rama is ever considerate to Sita. Where there is true love, the question asked does not occur. Where there is no true love, the bond has never existed. But the Hindu household of today is a conundrum. Husbands and wives when they are married know nothing of one another. Religious sanction fortified by custom and the even flow of the lives of the married people keep the peace in the vast majority of Hindu households. But when either wife or husband holds views out of the ordinary, there is danger of jars. In the case of the husband he has no scruples. He does not consider himself under any obligation to consult his partner’s wishes. He regards his wife as his property. And the poor wife who believes in the husband’s claim often suppresses herself. I think there is a way out. Mirabai has shown the way. The wife has a perfect right to take her own course and meekly brave the consequences when she knows herself to be in the right and when her resistance is for a nobler purpose.

The third question is:

If a husband is, say, a meat-eater and the wife considers meat-eating an evil, may she follow her own bent? May she even try by all loving ways to wean her husband from meat-eating or the like? Or is she bound to cook meat for her husband or worse still, is she bound to eat it, if the husband requires her? If you say that the wife may take her own course, how can a joint household be run when the one compels and the other rebels?

This question is partly answered in the answer to the second. A wife is not bound to be an accomplice in her husband’s crimes. And when she holds anything to be wrong, she must dare to do the right. But, seeing that the wife’s function is to manage the household and thus to cook, as the husband’s is to earn for the family, she is bound to cook meat for the family if both have been meat-eaters before. If, on the other hand, in a vegetarian family, the husband becomes a meat-eater and seeks to compel the wife to cook for him, the wife is in no way bound to cook what offends her sense of right. The peace of a household is a most desirable thing. But it cannot be an end in itself. For me, the married state is as much a state of discipline as any other. Life is duty, a probation. Married life is intended to promote mutual good both here and hereafter. It is meant also to serve humanity.
When one partner breaks the law of discipline, the right accrues to the other of breaking the bond. The breach here is moral and not physical. It precludes divorce. The wife or the husband separates but to serve the end for which they had united. Hinduism regards each as absolute equal of the other. No doubt a different practice has grown up, no one knows since when. But so have many other evils crept into it. This, however, I do know that Hinduism leaves the individual absolutely free to do what he or she likes for the sake of self-realization for which and which alone he or she is born.

Young India, 21-10-1926

481. KNOTTY PROBLEMS OF NON-VIOLENCE

The destruction of certain dogs by a millowner, when some of them were suffering from hydrophobia and when there was danger of the employees being bitten any moment has angered members of the very influential Jain community of Ahmedabad. Having many friends among them and being regarded by many as an authority in matters of ahimsa (non-violence), I have been helplessly and reluctantly drawn into the controversy. As the matter has gone beyond the mere Gujarati-speaking public of Ahmedabad, I am presenting the readers of Young India with a translation of the series of articles I am devoting to the subject covering as far as possible the whole wide field of ahimsa. I have no doubt that many readers of Young India who are interested in the theory and evolution of non-violence will welcome the translation of the series.

Young India, 21-10-1926

482. STAND FOR NON-VIOLENCE

A friend sends me the following cutting from the New York Nation:

Some time ago (either in the latter part of 1924 or early in 1925) a band of twenty-five American missionaries in China addressed the following appeal to the American Minister at Peking:

“The undersigned American missionaries are in China as messengers of the gospel of brotherhood and peace. Our task is to lead men and women into a new life in Christ, which promotes brotherhood and takes away all occasions of war. We, therefore, express our earnest desire that no form of military pressure, especially no foreign military force, be exerted to protect us or our property; and that in the event of our capture by lawless persons or our death at their hands, no money be paid for our release, no punitive expedition be sent out, and no indemnities be exacted. We take this stand believing that the way to establish righteousness and peace is through bringing the spirit of personal good-will to bear on all persons under all circumstances, even through suffering wrong without retaliation."

\[1\] For the first article of the series, vide ”Is This Humanity? - I”, 10-10-1926.

The American Legation, however, replied that this petition was inconsistent with the necessity that exists for safeguarding Americans in China, and that therefore, no exception could or would be made in the procedure in case of emergencies with regard to the signers of the petition.

This is one of those instances in which two apparently contradictory positions are right at the same time. For the brave missionaries there was no other attitude possible, though, nowadays, very few adopt it. Was it not about China that a missionary deputation some thirty years ago waited on the late Lord Salisbury and asked the protection of the British gunboats for carrying their message to the unwilling Chinese? Then the late noble Marquess had to tell the missionaries that, if they sought the protection of the British arms, they must submit to international obligations and curb their missionary ardour. He reminded them that the Christians of old, if they penetrated the remotest regions of the earth, expected no protection save from God and put their lives in constant danger. In the case quoted by the New York Nation, the missionaries according to the report have reverted to the ancient practice.

The American Government, however, so long as it retains its present character, can only give the answer they are reported to have given. That the answer betrays the evil of the modern system is another matter. The American prestige depends not upon its moral strength but upon force. But why should the whole armed force of America be mobilized for the so-called vindication of its honour or name? What harm can accrue to the honour of America if twenty-five missionaries choose to go to China uninvited for the sake of delivering their message and get killed in the act? Probably, it would be the best thing for their mission. The American Government by its interference could only interrupt the full working of the law of suffering. But self-restraint of America would mean a complete change of outlook. Today, defence of citizenship is a defence of national commerce, i.e., exploitation. That exploitation presupposes the use of force for imposing commerce upon an unwilling people. Nations have in a sense, therefore, almost become gangs of robbers, whereas they should be a peaceful combination of men and women united for the common good of mankind. In the latter case, their strength will lie not in their skill in the use of gunpowder, but in the possession of superior moral fibre. The action of the twenty-five missionaries is a dim shadow of reconstructed society or even reconstructed nations. I do not know whether they carried out their principle into practice in every department of life. I need hardly point out that in spite of the threat of the American Government to protect them against themselves, they could neutralize, indeed even frustrate, any effort at retaliation. But that means complete self-effacement. And if one is to combat the fetish of force, it will only be by means totally different from those in vogue among the pure worshippers of brute force.

It must not be forgotten that, after all, there is a philosophy behind the modern worship of brute force with a history to back it. The microscopic non-militant minority has, indeed, nothing to fear from it, if only it has immovable faith behind it. But faith in the possibility of holding together society without brute force seems somehow to be lacking. Yet, if one person can pit himself against the whole world, why cannot two or more do likewise together? I know the answer that has been given. Time alone can show the possibilities of the revolution that is silently creeping upon us. Speculation is waste of effort where action is already afoot. Those who have faith will join the initial effort in which demonstrable results cannot be shown.

Young India, 21-10-1926

483. ECONOMICS OF KHADDAR

At the instance of a friend, I had brief notes prepared on khaddar economics. The notes ran out into many sheets and involved a fair amount of labour. But they were too comprehensive for the purpose intended. They were, therefore, recast and condensed and almost rewritten. Thus two helpers have laboured at these notes. They present in a connected and readable form the economics of khaddar

---

1 These were published in Young India, 21-10-1926 and 28-10-1926 under the title "Charkha as the Only Cottage Industry".
and appeal to a wider public than the notes if only presented to a friend would reach. They are, therefore, being published in three instalments in these columns. The first appears this week. The readers of Young India may not find anything new in them but they will find the scattered arguments compressed in a series of connected chapters and within a small compass.

KHADI STATISTICS

I hope the khadi workers have been carefully following the digest of Khadi statistics I have been publishing from time to time. They are a valuable record and give us an indication of the progress and possibilities of Khadi that nothing else can. I do hope that those who have not yet sent them will kindly furnish the information at the earliest opportunity.

Young India, 21-10-1926

484. NOTES

THE INDIAN DELEGATION

I have already expressed my opinion about Sir Mahomed Habibulla’s deputation. It is a carefully made choice. I am glad to find that it has been blessed by the public. The question of the status of Indians overseas is perhaps the one question on which all parties are united. Hindus, Mussalmans, Christians, Parsis, etc., speak with one voice. European opinion coincides with the Indian. The Government backs public opinion. All this unity is needed if the cause of justice is to be vindicated. This remarkable unanimity of opinion cannot but react upon South African opinion.

But this unity need not be confined to the question of the status of Indians abroad. Is it too much to wish to extend it to other equally natural and pure causes? Or is unity possible only on questions remote in space from the actors? True unity comes of itself. No attempt had to be made for achieving unity of opinion on the South African question. All instinctively thought alike. Unity on other matters will also come instinctively when its time has come. I am optimistic enough to think that it is coming sooner than many of us expect or imagine.

But let us return to the deputation. The settlers in South Africa have in Mr. C. F. Andrews a link between the deputation and themselves as also between the Union Government and themselves. Let them make the most of the opportunity that has presented itself to them. They must unite all their forces. The best workers among them should collect all the material and place it at Mr. Andrews’s disposal.
they should understand the limits of the deputation and they must be as firm in their presentation of their claim as one expects them to bemoderate. Moderation, firmness and unity combined with absolute adherence to truth should make victory easily possible.

CONGRESS EXHIBITION

Exhibitions used formerly to be a feature of the National Congress. They had then ceased to be. The fashion was revived in Ahmedabad and has been since continued with progressive improvement. The central feature of these exhibitions has been khaddar with all the hand-processes through which cotton passes before it comes out as khaddar. The feature of these exhibitions has been the inclusion of only those things which have been manufactured in India from start to finish. They have, therefore, excluded so-called swadeshi watches or harmoniums whose every part was imported from outside. They have also excluded all mill-spun yarn and mill-woven cloth. These exhibitions are meant for the encouragement of those things which are neglected and which deserve encouragement. No one will hold an exhibition for showing faggots of wood which everyone knows and uses. But there would be an exhibition of wood that possessed extraordinary virtue which needed to be brought to the notice of the people. Faggots of ordinary wood would be excluded not out of any jealousy of them but because attention would be divided between extraordinary wood needing advertisement and protection and the wood that had no such need. I was, therefore, surprised when a correspondent drew my attention to the Assam Exhibition Committee having included in the exhibits cotton fabrics woven on power-looms and out of mill-spun yarn. The description of the items does not exclude even foreign cloth or yarn. I telegraphed to the Committee. The reader will be glad to know that the Committee promptly replied¹ to the effect that the inclusion of mill-spun etc., was due to a mistake and that it was being immediately corrected.² I congratulate the Committee upon its admission and readiness to correct the error. I may state that the description of other goods too is so loose and wide as to include almost every conceivable thing. If these Congress exhibitions are to be an education to the ¹ Vide”Letter to Kshitish Chandra Das Gupta”, 14-10-1926.

² ibid.
people, an encouragement to struggling home industries and a demonstration of the possibilities of khadar, the limits that the previous exhibitions have observed should be rigidly adhered to.

Young India, 21-10-1926

485. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

October 21, 1926

DEAR SATIS BABU,

I have your letter after ages as it were. I did suspect that you were not getting on as well as I had expected. But whether I can help or not, you should share your sorrows with me. If I know the best, I must know also the worst. Do please, therefore, let me know what are the unexpected difficulties.

I have read the cutting from the Englishman. We know that khaddar has not become popular. When it does we shall not be long in getting what we want.

I note your remarks on the Khadi Service.

Varadachari did ask me to ask you to write the chapter on cotton. I told him not to worry you. I knew that your hands must be full.

With love to you all,

Yours,

BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 1562

486. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

Asvina Sud 15, 1982 [October 21, 1926]

BHAI GHANSHYAMDASJI,

I have your letter. This is not the time to start an Ashram such as you have described. The atmosphere is very foul. Workers have neither intelligence nor character.

Yours,

MOHANDAS GANDHI

SHRIJUT GHANSHYAMDAS BIRLA
C/o HINDU SABHA
GORAKHPUR

From the Hindi original: C.W. 6137. Courtesy: G. D. Birla

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
487. LETTER TO CHIMANLAL G. VORA

Asvina Sud 15, 1982 [October 21, 1926]

Bhai Chimanlalji,

I have your letter. Shad-darshan-samuchchayagranth is a discussion of Buddhism, Vedant, etc. The original work is in Sanskrit. Its Gujarati translation has been published. It may be available with some bookseller selling Gujarati books. It is a difficult work, and is purely an intellectual exercise.

Yours,

Mohandas Gandhi

Shriyut Chimanlal Gulabchand Vora
Shrimali Mohalla
Ratlam

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 6301

488. LETTER TO LAKSHMAN DUTT BHATT

Ashwin Shukla 15, 1982 [October 21, 1926]

Bhai Lakshman Duttji,

I have your letter. I am obliged to you for your invitation, but I am unable this year to take part in any public function. Therefore please excuse me.

Yours,

Mohandas Gandhi

Smt. Lakshman Dutt Bhatt
Kashipur
Nainital Dist.

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 10844

489. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

Sabarmati,
Asvina Krishnapaksha 2, 1982 [October 23, 1926]

Bhai Brijkrishna,

I have your letter. Dharma is a subtle subject. No person can teach another what his dharma is. Just today I was explaining one shloka to women. It says that what learned and good men, who are free from likes and dislikes, regard as dharma and what appeals to our heart to be so is dharma. I am neither a learned man nor am I free from likes and dislikes. I am striving to be good. I feel that, if you have the spiritual strength, you should leave your home and earn what you can through honest means and, if you can spare anything from it, then give it to your brother. Therein lies the service of your family. Be alone and consult the Lord of your heart and do as He bids you.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 2369

490. LETTER TO TULSI MAHER

Asvina Krishnapaksha 2, 1982 [October 23, 1926]

CHI. TULSI MAHER,

I have your letters. I am happy every time to read that you keep good health. Quite a few people are ill here these days. How is the weather there? In all, how many charkhas are plying?

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 6527

491. TELEGRAM TO SERVANTS OF INDIA SOCIETY

[SAWARIMATI,

On or after October 23, 1926]

SERVINDIA

POONA CITY

IS ANY TRUTH RUMOUR SHASTRI UNABLE GO

AFRICA THROUGH ILLNESS.

GANDHI

From a photostat: S.N. 12025

1 This telegram was in reply to C. F. Andrews’s cable from Durban dated October 20, 1926, received at Sabarmati on October 23, 1926, which read: Natal Witness publishes Sastri unable come owing sudden illness. Have you information? Community very anxious.
Whilst I admit the possibility of having made a mistake in giving the opinion that the destruction by Mr. Ambalal’s order of sixty dogs was unavoidable, I do not regret having expressed that opinion. The result so far is all to the good. We shall perhaps now understand more clearly our duty to such animals. Much wrong has been done partly out of ignorance, partly from hypocrisy and partly for fear of public opinion. All that should now cease.

But if the good is to be maintained, a clear understanding is necessary between the readers and myself. I have received quite a pile of letters on the subject, some friendly, some sharp and some bitter. They do not seem to have understood my attitude on the destruction of dogs by Mr. Ambalal. I have often had the misfortune to be misunderstood. In South Africa my life was in peril over an action which was quite consistent with my avowed principles but which, as was proved later, was rashly regarded as contrary to them. The so-called”Himalayan blunder” of Bardoli is a recent memory. The Bombay Government very kindly imprisoned me at Yeravda and saved me the trouble of much writing by way of explaining and clearing my position. The Bardoli decision, I still hold, was not wrong. It was, on the contrary, an act of purest ahimsa and of invaluable service to the country. I feel just as clear about my opinion regarding the present question. I hold that the opinion is perfectly in accord with my conception of ahimsa.

The critics, whether friendly or hostile, should bear with me. Some of the hostile critics have transgressed the limits of decorum. They have made no attempt to understand my position. It seems they cannot for a moment tolerate my opinion. Now they must be one of two things. They are either my teachers or they regard me as one. In the latter case, they should be courteous and patient and should have faith in me and ponder over what I write. In the former case, they should be indulgent to me and try to reason with me as lovingly and patiently as they can. I teach the children under my care not by being angry with them, but I teach them, if at all, by loving them, by allowing for their ignorance, and by playing with them. I expect the same love, the same consideration and the same sportsmanlike spirit from my angry teachers. I have given my opinion with regard to the dogs with the best of motives and as a matter of duty. If I am mistaken, let the critics who would teach me reason with me patiently and logically. Angry and irrelevant argument will not convince me.

---

1 The reference is to the assaults made on Gandhiji in 1908 by his Indian followers under the belief that he had compromised with the Smuts Government; vide “Letter to Friends”, 10-2-1908.

A gentleman called on me the other evening at a late hour. He knew that my time was completely occupied. He engaged me in a discussion, used hard and bitter language and poured vials of wrath on me. I answered his questions in good humour and politely. He has published the interview in a leaflet which he is selling. It is before me. It has crossed the limits of truth, obviously of decorum. He had neither obtained my permission to publish the interview nor showed it to me before publication. Does he seek to teach me in this manner? He who trifles with truth cuts at the root of ahimsa. He who is angry is guilty of himsa. How can such a man teach me ahimsa?

Even so the hostile critics are doing me a service. They teach me to examine myself. They afford me an opportunity to see if I am free from the reaction of anger. And when I go to the root of their anger, I find nothing but love. They have attributed to me ahimsa as they understand it. Now they find me acting in a contrary manner and are angry with me. They once regarded me as a mahatma, they were glad that my influence on the people was according to their liking. Now I am an alpatma (a little soul) in their opinion; my influence on the people they now regard as unwholesome and they are pained by the discovery; and as they cannot control themselves, they turn the feeling of pain into one of anger.

I do not mind this outburst of anger, as I appreciate the motive behind it. I must try to reason with them patiently, and if they would help me in my attempt, I request them to calm their anger. I am a votary of truth and seeker after it. If I am convinced that I am mistaken I shall admit my mistake (as I always love to do), and shall promptly mend it. It is the word of the scriptures that the mistakes of a votary of truth never harm anybody. That is the glorious secret of truth.

Just a word to friendly critics: I have preserved your letters. I usually reply to my correspondents individually. But the number of letters I have received this time and have been still getting is so large and they are so inordinately long that I cannot possibly reply to them individually. I cannot, I fear, make time even to acknowledge them. Some of the correspondents ask me to publish their letters in Navajivan. I hope they will not press the request. I shall try to answer all the arguments that are relevant as well as I can, and hope that that will satisfy them.

I bespeak the indulgence of the reader for this necessary preface. I shall now take up some of the letters before me.

A friend says:

You ask us not to feed stray dogs. But we do not invite them. They simply come. How can they be turned back? It will be time enough when there is a plethora of them. But is there any doubt that feeding dogs cultivates the impulse of compassion and turning them away hardens our hearts? We are all sinners. Why should we not practise what little kindness we can?

It is from this false feeling of compassion that we encourage himsa in the name of ahimsa. But as ignorance is no excuse before man-made law, even so is it no excuse before the divine Law.

But let us analyse the argument. We cast a morsel at the beggar come to our door, and feel that we have earned some merit, but we really thereby add to the numbers of beggars, aggravate the evil of beggary, encourage idleness and consequently promote irreligion. This does not mean that we should starve the really deserving beggars. It is the duty of society to support the blind and the infirm, but everyone may not take the task upon himself. The head of the society, i.e., the mahajan or the State where it is well organized, should undertake the task, and the philanthropically inclined should subscribe funds to such an institution. If the mahajan is pure-minded and wise, it will carefully investigate the condition of beggars and protect the deserving ones. When this does not happen, i.e., when relief is indiscriminate, scoundrels disguised as beggars get the benefit of it and the poverty of the land increases.

If it is thus a sin on the part of an individual to undertake feeding beggars, it is no less a sin for him to feed stray dogs. It is a false sense of compassion. It is an insult to the starving dog to throw a crumb at him. Roving dogs do not indicate the civilization or compassion of the society, they betray on the contrary, the ignorance and lethargy of its members. The lower animals are our brethren. I include among them the lion and the tiger. We do not know how to live with these carnivorous beasts and poisonous reptiles because of our ignorance. When man knows himself better, he will learn to befriend even these. Today he does not even know how to befriend a man of a different religion or from a foreign country.

The dog is a faithful companion. There are numerous instances of the faithfulness of dogs and horses. But that means that we should keep them and treat them with respect as we do our companions and not allow them to roam about. By aggravating the evil of stray dogs we shall not be acquitting ourselves of our duty to them. But if we regard the existence of stray dogs as a shame to us and, therefore, refuse to feed them, we shall be doing the dogs as a class a real service and make them happy.

What, then, can a humane man do for stray dogs? He should set apart a portion of his income and send it on to a society for the protection of those animals if there be one. If such a society is impossible—and I know it is very difficult even if it is not impossible—he should try to own one or more dogs. If he cannot do so, he should give up worrying about the question of dogs and direct his humanity towards the service of other animals.

“But you are asking us to destroy them?” is the question angrily or lovingly asked by others. Now, I have not suggested the extirpation of dogs as an absolute duty. I have suggested the killing of some dogs as a “duty in distress” and under certain circumstances. When the State does not care for stray dogs, nor does the mahajan, and when one is not prepared to take care of them oneself, then, and if one regards them as a danger to society, one should kill them and relieve them from a lingering death. This is a bitter dose, I agree. But it is my innermost conviction that true love and compassion consist in taking it.

The dogs in India are today in as bad a plight as the decrepit animals and men in the land. It is my firm conviction that this sorry plight is due to our misconception of ahimsa, is due to our want of ahimsa. Practice of ahimsa cannot have as its result impotence, impoverishment and famine. If this is a sacred land we should not see impoverishment stalking it. From this state of things some rash and impatient souls have drawn the conclusion that ahimsa is irreligion. But I know that it is not ahimsa that is wrong, it is its votaries that are wrong.

Ahimsa is the religion of a Kshatriya. Mahavira was a Kshatriya, Buddha was a Kshatriya, Rama and Krishna were Kshatriyas and all of them were votaries of ahimsa. We want to propagate ahimsa in their name. But today ahimsa has become the monopoly of timid Vaisyas\(^1\) and that is why it has been besmirched. Ahimsa is the extreme limit of forgiveness. But forgiveness is the quality of the brave. Ahimsa is impossible without fearlessness.

Cows we cannot protect, dogs we kick about and belabour with sticks, their ribs are seen sticking out, and yet we are not ashamed of ourselves and raise a hue and cry when a stray dog is killed. Which of the two is better—that five thousand dogs should wander about in semi-starvation living on dirt and excreta and drag on a miserable existence, or that fifty should die and keep the rest in a decent condition? It is admittedly sinful always to be spurning and kicking the dogs. But it is possible that the man who kills the dogs that he cannot bear to see tortured thus may be doing a meritorious act. Merely taking life is not always himsa, one may even say that there is sometimes more himsa in not taking life. We must examine this position in another article.

Young India, 4-11-1926

493. LETTER TO ROBERT SHEMEILD

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 24, 1926

DEAR MR. SHEMEILD,

Your letter\(^2\) was an agreeable surprise. You remind me of happy communions of 30 years ago. I have a vivid recollection of your face and Mrs. Shemeld's.

I do not need to tell you anything about my life here as it has become an open book. I have looked at your War Manifesto\(^3\). Quite like you. Please remember me to Mrs. Shemeld.

Yours sincerely,

ROBERT SHEMEILD, ESQ.
308, THE AHERTON
2112 F STREET, N. W.
WASHINGTON, D. C.

From a photostat S. N. 10832

\(^1\)The source here has"Vaishnavas": vide "A Correction", 11-11-1926.

\(^2\)Writing this on September 14, the correspondent had said:"Your frequent visits in our humble missionary home at Pretoria were a pleasure still green in our memory although thirty years have passed since we last met you" (S. N. 10810)

\(^3\)Shemeld had enclosed a petition which he"had printed at Pretoria in 1900 in an endeavour to prevent further bloodshed but which was not favoured by many except missionaries." The reference was to the Boer War.
494. LETTER TO FELIX VALYI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 24, 1926

DEAR FRIEND

I have your letter. Much as I would like to write for your monthly review, I am so overworked just now that I have resolved not to write for any magazine for some time to come. If I ever get moments of leisure and I am duly reminded, I would write something later for you. But it may be all hoping against hope.

Yours sincerely,

FELIX VALYI, ESQ.
HOTEL RICHMOND
GENEVA (SWITZERLAND)

From a photostat: S.N. 10833

495. LETTER TO ELSE GIESE

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 24, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I was delighted to receive your letter through my friend Mr. Deshpande of Baroda. I feel thankful to God that my writings give solace to friends all over the world.

Yours sincerely,

MADAM ELSE GIESE
BERLIN SW 11,
PRINZ ULBRECHT—STRASSE 5

From a Photostat: S.N. 19722

1 In her letter of August 25, 1926, the correspondent wrote of her having read with great interest the collection of Gandhiji’s articles from Young India, and her wanting to write an article on the part khaddar played in the national movement (S.N. 10804).
496. LETTER TO WADHOOMAL MANGHIRMAL

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 24, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I am sorry for your misfortune. I can only advise you to bear it bravely and think no more of the one who used to be your wife at one time. What does a woman do when her husband lives with other women? She simply submits and is still content to live with her so-called husband. You do not need to do that. You should devote your energy to bringing up the children she has left behind.

Yours sincerely,

WADHOOMAL MANGHIRMAL, ESQ.
AERATED WATER SHOPKEEPER
SEHWAN (BIHAR)

From a microfilm: S.N. 19723

497. LETTER TO NAJUKLAL CHOKSI

Monday, October 24, 1926

BHAISHRI NAJUKLAL,

I have your letter. I am sending on the letters meant for Velanbehn and Moti. Please do take the injection. We can draw no conclusion from the fact the one person died after taking it. Having put yourself under a doctor’s treatment, it is but right that you should put your trust in him. If he is confident, we should have no fear at all. Moti simply forgot to tell me about the matter. She told me that you had refused to take the injection, but said nothing about your having asked for my advice.

I find it a difficult task to cure her of her carelessness and lethargy. I cannot spare enough time for that. Of course, I had a talk with her the very first day. I may be able to do something only if I keep her with me. But she also may not be ready for that. I am sorry I cannot give her as much time as I should like to.

It is her old complaint from which Velanbehn has been suffering. She is living on fruits and milk on my advice. This may have brought on a little weakness, but there is certainly some relief in... her complaint. There is no cause for anxiety at all. Your necessity comes first, and so, if you require her, do let me know by all means.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12138

498. LETTER TO MOHANLAL MANGALDAS SHAH

THE ASHRAM,
October 24, 1926

BHAISHRI MOHANLAL MANGALDAS SHAH,

Self-realization means that we should know all selves to be ourselves. You should consult the Dweller within to know how you may live your life to the best end.

If you wish to see God, you should forget yourself, even if that means the end of your life the very next day.

If you dedicate every action to Rama, you will spontaneously have his name on your lips every moment.

The vow of silence helps in the search for truth. To keep it, one should refrain from speaking or from communicating anything by writing, or do it only for immediate practical purposes.

Vandemataram from
MOHANDAS

MOUN BHUVAN
AT ALINA
TALUKA NADIAD

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19955

499. LETTER TO BHAGWANJI PURUSHOTTAM

October 24, 1926

BHAISHRI BHAGWANJI,

I had your letters. I will write in Navajivan about untouchability when I get time. As I could not act as our respectable and worthy leaders of society would in regard to the dog, I gave my opinion that a dog could be killed in certain circumstances and subject to certain restrictions. I have neither the inclination nor the time to study the Western science about dogs. The subject of non-violence is not as simple as you seem to think it is. If we may not kill dogs, what sin have plants committed? Ponder over the meaning of this question, and treat dogs as you might treat plants. But more in Navajivan.

Blessings from
BAPU

BHAISHRI BHAGWANJI PURUSHOTTAM
CHARKHA, Via BABRA
KATHIWAR

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19956.

500. SPEECH AT LABOUR UNION, AHMEDABAD

[October 24, 1926]

In this meeting only the representatives have been called in view of my resolve not to go out during the year unless there is some specific reason. I have not called all the workers to this meeting, so that the subjects which we cannot discuss in a large meeting can be discussed in this small meeting. I have thirty five years of experience of directing the affairs of public societies. And it is our general habit to spend as much as we get and not to accumulate, though you can spend as much as you like. Even if you collect Rs. 1 crore, in my opinion, your institution will deteriorate like other institutions. On the contrary whatever you spend for your workers you would get it back with compound interest. You demand bonus from the mills, but the millowners say that they have not enough money to declare bonus. Let me tell you that unless you give up drinking and other vices, your demands will not have the least effect on your superiors. The remedy to remove your grievances is in your hands. If you wish to bring swaraj in the mills, you will have to put an end to all your vices. You should work with full enthusiasm in the mills as if you were the owners of the mill. And you should so organize your Union that not a single worker remains out of it. Your Union is well known in India; you must not, therefore, become unduly proud of it. This Union is regarded as the best in India because it is so well organized. But you must not rest until you have removed the defects that have come to your knowledge. There is no end to progress.

1 Gandhiji who was presiding over the annual meeting held at The Ashram spoke after Gulzarilal Nanda, secretary of the Union, had presented the report for 1925.

[From Gujarati]

Gujarati, 31-10-1926

501. MESSAGE TO "FORWARD"

I wish Forward many happy returns. The longer young men like Subhash Bose are denied the right of a fair trial and yet kept under lock and key, the quicker is our pace towards our goal. Fight for freedom is no mock affair. It is so real and so terrible that it will require the best of thousands of us. Let us not grudge the price.

M. K. GANDHI

Forward, 25-10-1926

502. LETTER TO MR. AND MRS. POLAK

SABARMATI,
October 26, 1926

MY DEAR HENRY AND MILLIE,

Though your first cable had prepared me for the worst, the reality gave me a great shock. Ba was with me for some talk when the second cable was received. She could perceive the shock I felt. I hope you duly received both my cables¹. I am anxious to know that you got them because I wanted you to feel that I was a sharer of your sorrows.

You know that he did write to me the one and only love letter in reply to mine. I could trace in that letter the same imperious will I knew so well when he was my bed-fellow. My faith in the immortality of the soul is more stable than ever. I know, therefore, that it is all well with him. "Death is but a sleep and a forgetting." This is no poetic phrase with me and you. It is for Waldo² a stepping stone to a higher life. May you, therefore, have the strength to bear the loss and find comfort in the thought that we must all go where Waldo has gone.

All join me in sending you love.

Yours,

BHAI

From a photostat: S.N. 10834

¹ These are not available.
² Polak’s eldest son
503. LETTER C. F. ANDREWS

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 26, 1926

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

I have replied your cable. Shastri is certainly coming.¹

I hope you are keeping quite well and fit. I can’t too often repeat to you: ‘Be careful for nothing.’¹ The deputation is, I think, quite nice and should produce a good impression.

All your commandments were fulfilled. I had a nice reply from the Metropolitan.

Poor Henry! I have just got a cable to say that he has lost Waldo. Millie will be deeply cut up. But she is a brave woman and will soon recover from the shock.

Yours,

Mohan

[PS.]

Will you please look up Mrs. P. K. Naidu when you go to Johannesburg and find out, too, how she is being supported? Ramachandran has gone to the National Muslim University at Delhi to teach spinning and Shanti is about to leave for Singapore in search of a living as he wishes to support the girl whom he expects some day to marry. Devdas is still at Mussoorie, Krishnadas still in Bengal and Pyarelal still with Mathuradas. We are having a fair share of malaria. But the patients are on the road to recovery.

M

REV. C. F. ANDREWS
DURBAN

From a photostat: S.N. 12025a

¹ Vide “Telegram to Servants of India Society”, on or after 23-10-1926.
504. LETTER TO DEVCHAND PAREKH

Asvina Vad 6, 1982 [October 26, 1926]

Bhai Devchandbhai,

It is necessary to think and decide whether cotton should be stocked next year.

Ch. Jaisukhlal2 writes to say that, if we wish to hold a khadi exhibition at the time of the Conference3 we should start preparing for it from now on. I too think so.

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 5704

505. LETTER TO UDIT MISHRA

The Ashram,

Asvina Krishnapaksha 6, 1982 [October 26, 1926]

Bhai Udit Mishraji,

I have your letter.

I am of the view that we should save our boys from the present-day schools. If we get a good teacher, it is better to place the boys in his charge. It would be best, of course, to have a good school.

Our actions in past lives are no doubt the chief cause of our being involved in the concerns of our present life. When I used to travel third-class, there were many occasions when I cleaned compartment dirtied by passengers. Some felt ashamed and stopped dirtying it, and some just did not care to take any notice.

When I first went to Rajendrababu’s place, he was in Puri. He did not even know that I had gone to his place, nor did I know him personally. His servant treated me as he would a poor man. I was dressed like one, and the servant was not at fault at all. Rajendrababu met me a few days afterwards in Muzaffarpur.

1 The postmark bears the date 27-10-1926.
2 Jaisukhlal Gandhi, Gandhiji’s nephew
3 The Kathiawar Political Conference

436 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
Kindly write nothing about these matters, nothing at any rate of names and places.

Yours,

MOHANDAS GANDHI

Sjt. Udit Mishra
Birla Park
Ballygunj
Calcutta

From a microfilm of the Hindi: S.N. 19958

506. LETTER TO ESTHER MENON

[Sabarmati,
October 27, 1926]

MY DEAR CHILD.

My blessings on the addition to the family. Hope you and the baby are steadily progressing. Any of the names suggested by you is good. The shorter the better.

Yours,

BAPU

From a photostat of the original in N.A.I.; also My Dear Child, p. 79

507. LETTER TO LALAN PANDIT

The Ashram,
October 27, 1926

BHAISHRI LALAN.

I got your letters. The previous two will be answered in Nava-jivan as occasion arises. But the one I got today is addressed specially to me. I have endured praises of me all these years; should I not, then, endure some censure? I am not out to propagate a new religion. But I certainly wish to revive an old one. It rests with God, however, to fulfil my wish.

Vandemataram from

MOHANDAS

C/O Sheth Chhotalal Mulkchand
Hathibai’s Wadi, Annexe
Ahmedabad

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 19957

1From the postmark
TO JOURNALIST FRIENDS

Applications for articles for journals and magazines in and out of India are daily pouring in upon me. Things have come to such a pass that I must either leave Young India and Navajivan editing or respectfully refuse to write for other papers. Since I must not, so long as there are enough subscribers and I have energy, give up Young India or Navajivan, I have been forced to stop writing for other papers. The fact is I have not the ability to write at will on any and every subject. My field is very limited and even on the subjects I am familiar with, I cannot always be original. I have no false notions about the efficacy of my writings. On the contrary I know that often the unwritten word is more forcible and truer than the written or the spoken word. Let the sum of our acts speak. The continuous multiplication of ephemeral literature is growing into a terrible nuisance which I must not assist to increase, even if I cannot do anything to stop or regulate it.

A WARNING

Of late many young men have been coming to the Satyagraha Ashram, without warning, and without permission, either to stay for a short time or to be admitted as candidates for membership. Much as the management would like to find room for all who choose to come, whether as visitors or candidate members, it is physically impossible even to make the attempt. The Ashram is at present taxed to its utmost capacity and the management has been obliged to put off even friends who had sought previous permission and intended to find their own expenses. It is improper for young men to come without notice and permission. During the past fortnight, four such young men have come. And what was more grievous still was that they did not even bring enough to pay their way back. The last was an M.A., who said he came with the view of joining the Ashram, but on the way, altered his decision and thought he would stay for a few days and study the Ashram life. He had brought with him no credentials and had not enough money on his person to buy a return ticket. I had to harden my heart and tell him that he could not stay at the Ashram without having obtained previous permission. It is incomprehensible to me that well-educated young men should not know the ordinary courtesies of life and the laws of hospitality. I know that there is an evil reputation about the Ashram. Visitors who have come without notice have sometimes told me that they thought that the Ashram was the one place in India where people could go without permission and find a warm welcome. It is therefore as well for young men to realize that the Ashrams cannot live up to any such expectation and that it is but an ordinary human institution striving to reach its ideals and ever failing to do so. The members would be satisfied if it could be said of them that they had tried their best to realize the ideals they had subscribed to.

ABOUT FASTING

‘A Precisionist’ writes:

A devoted ant careful filer as I am of your paper, I have to draw your attention to the following dictum in its issue of 30-9-26: "Fasting can be resorted to only against one’s nearest and dearest, and that for his or her good."

From your previous writings, however, it would appear that there is one important exception to this. Fasting or hunger-striking in prison against humiliating treatment, as in case food is offered in an insulting manner, is also true satyagraha. I wish you had not lost sight of this while writing to an enquirer on the ethics of ‘Satyagraha—True and False’.

If the instance quoted by ‘A Precisionist’ is an exception, I could quote many others. A man may fast for penance, purification and for considerations of physical health. More such instances can perhaps be given. But in the first case, I have pointed out the limits of satyagrahic fasting, i.e., when you seek to influence people by fasting. The so-called exception is a dissimilar case. There the protest was against the felt humiliation. In ‘Satyagraha—True and False’, emphasis was put on the evil of fasting against a person to make him pay what the fast-ing person considered was his due and the opponent considered not to be due.

HINDU AND HINDUISM

A correspondent who is a patient and diligent reader of Young India writes:

Replying to the catechism of ‘An Assistant Executive Engineer’ in your issue of 14-10-26 you say: “In a concrete manner he is a Hindu who believes in God, immortality of the soul, etc.”

On reading this I am tempted to confront you with your own writing of 1 Vide “Satyagraha—True and False”, 12-9-1926. An English translation of this by Mahadev Desai appeared in Young India, 30-9-1926.

nearly two years ago. In Young India of April 24, 1924, p. 136, you wrote: "If I were asked to define the Hindu creed I should simply say: ‘Search after Truth through non-violent means. A man may not believe in God and still call himself a Hindu. Hinduism is a relentless pursuit after Truth.’"

The italics in both quotations are mine.

I am surprised that the correspondent does not see the distinction between the two statements. One refers to a Hindu in a concrete manner. Denial of the existence of God is not a characteristic of Hinduism. Millions of Hindus do believe in God. Therefore one may say ‘there are Hindus who believe in God, etc.’ But ‘a man may not believe in God and still call himself a Hindu’. In the second case I have attempted an exhaustive definition. In the first case, I have given a fairly general illustration. I, therefore, see no conflict between the two positions.

CUSTOMS EXACTIONS

A passenger who has recently returned from South Africa asked me if it was not possible to undo the evil of extortions that regularly take place in the Customs Department. Although his luggage contained nothing taxable, he said he had to give a bribe in order to get the clearance in time. I asked him if he would give enough time and trouble to the matter and face an inquiry. He said he could not do so. This attitude is normal and explains the existence of the extortions which are not only to be found in the customs but also on railways. Whilst it is true that the public must be prepared to suffer temporary inconveniences, if they want redress, it is up to the authorities to prevent so far as it is humanly possible extortions which poor people have to suffer. It will not be a bad thing for some public-spirited young men to submit themselves to these extortions and then report them to the proper quarters. A few such cases will lessen the evil. The only way to the eradication of the evil is no doubt an incorruptible public. So long as there are people who would evade customs dues, so long will there be customs officials who will want their price.

Young India, 28-10-1926

1 Vide "What is Hinduism?", 24-4-1924.
509. A BOON TO CULTIVATORS

Some months ago Sjt. Ramachandran of Madras, an agricultural graduate, wrote to me to recommend his well-lift for use in the Ashram. He claimed for it great saving of labour to the animals used in the ordinary contrivances and also saving in cost. The invention attracted me and I wrote to the inventor telling him that if he came himself and successfully installed the lift, the lift would be bought. He promptly responded and his invention has been at work at the Ashram for over a month. Everyone who knows anything of agriculture at the Ashram is thoroughly satisfied with the working of the lift. To make assurance doubly sure, I had it examined by an engineer, who too considered the invention to be quite sound and extremely ingenious. This is what the inventor has to say for his invention:

I am convinced that rapid extension of well-irrigation for our dry lands which form 80 per cent of the arable lands in India is the real solution for the agricultural problem of India. The income from dry land does not exceed Rs. 30 an acre, while the same land when irrigated from a well produced crops worth Rs. 200 to 1000 per acre, providing ample work for a number of families all the year round. The chief difficulty in the way is that costly pairs of bullocks are necessary, they often suffer from yoke-galls, badly deteriorate in health and that their efficiency is very low. With a view to solve this difficulty, nearly 14 years ago I began my experiments and trials, and placed before the market this humble contrivance, now working on the Ashram well. The new contrivance is only the ordinary kos known also as charas, mot or kavalai with reduced friction in the ramp or the inclined plane by the use of a trolley on a railed incline for generating power by the mere weight of an animal. Just as a bicycle helps a man to go 12 miles an hour while he can walk only 3 miles an hour, this trolley helps the animal to do 4 times as much work as the same animal would do in the ordinary way. This great reduction in friction has enabled only one animal instead of two to lift each time almost the same quantity of water as in the ordinary way, without any waste of energy in pulling. This single animal being relieved from pulling lifts double the number of buckets per hour. So the quantity of water lifted in the R. Lift should not be judged by the mere shape and size of the bucket nor by the effort and number of animals used, but by the actual capacity of the bucket multiplied by the number of buckets lifted per hour.

It has been tested and recorded all over India by experts that a good pair of bulls worth Rs. 300 to 400 lift only 1,600 gallons per hour from a depth of 20 feet. I have been demonstrating in the Ashram as I have been doing elsewhere how a male buffalo (purchased by the Ashram for Rs. 31) has been lifting 2,000 gallons per hour (60 buckets of 32 gallons each per hour).
from a depth of 34 feet, whereas two costly bullocks in our time-honoured lift can draw a little over 1,000 gallons per hour (30 buckets of 35 gallons each per hour). I have demonstrated and convinced more than 20 officers of the Madras Agricultural and Industrial Departments in vain at an enormous cost to me during the last 11 years. Dr. Clouston during my demonstration of this lift at Nagpur admitted and highly appreciated the simplicity of the mechanism, high efficiency and the humane mode of applying animal power.

The cost of the whole appliance is Rs. 275 for a depth of 50 feet, but Sjt. Ramachandran says that if the lift became popular, the price could be further reduced. For the depth of 30 ft. it costs only Rs. 230. With a suitable organization the lift could be made available to any cultivator in India for Rs. 150. I have also suggested that if the patent rights are given up or if the parts that can be locally had are so made or purchased, there might be still further reduction. Add to the present cost of the R. Lift the cost of a male buffalo, say Rs. 30. The whole lift would cost no more than Rs. 305. The cost of a pair of bullocks would range from Rs. 300 to 400. The greatest saving is however effected in the monthly expenditure. The upkeep of a pair of bullocks would be Rs. 50 to 60, whereas that of a male buffalo would be Rs. 20 to 25. The greatest use of the invention lies in the immense saving of labour to animals, and a still greater lies in the work that can be taken from the male buffalo who for want of use is in the vast majority of cases cruelly left to perish where he is not actually butchered.

The wonder, therefore, is that this invention has not attracted the attention of the Government. Sjt. Ramachandran has many bitter complaints to make about the indifference of the authorities whom he approached. But I have preferred not to make any but a passing reference to his complaints. Let those who wish visit the Ashram and see the lift at work at the Ashram every morning. As much water is not required at the present moment, the lift is not kept at work the whole day. But it will be working between 8 and 10 a.m. always, and will be in charge of the inventor himself who will gladly explain all about it.

A friend writing to me about the Agricultural Exhibition in Poona says:

I see here piles of machinery and tools most of which we can never use. I miss the thing which is a boon to man and animal in India. I mean the Ramachandran Lift.
I do not know enough of agriculture, as the friend does, to warrant his enthusiasm, but I know enough to be able to say that this lift requires examination by everyone who is at all interested in the agricultural problems of India.

Young India, 28-10-1926

510. CONDOLENCES

I join my respectful condolences to those already conveyed to the staff and family of the late editor of The Hindu—S. Rangaswami Iyengar. This death, closely following Mr. S. Kasturiranga Iyengar’s, is a heavy blow to Indian journalism.

The reader will be grieved to learn that Mr. H. S. L. Polak has just lost his eldest son, Waldo. Early in the week a cable was received from Mr. Polak telling me of Waldo’s serious illness. It was followed only two days later by another, announcing the sudden death.

The parents’ grief, I know, will be shared by many who have known Mr. and Mrs. Polak as friends of India.

Young India, 28-10-1926

511. LETTER TO EDITOR, ”ROMAIN ROLLAND BIRTHDAY-BOOK”

[Before October 29, 1926]

My difficulty was my unfitness to find myself among those men of letters whose contributions you have invited. This is no mock modesty, but my innermost feeling. I am unfit also because, I confess, I knew practically nothing about our good friend before he imposed upon himself the task of becoming my self-chosen advertiser. And you will be perhaps amazed to know that now too, my acquaintance with him is confined to a very cursory glance at that booklet regarding myself. The work before me leaves me no time to read the things I would like to. I have, therefore, even now, not been able to read any of his great works.¹

Romain Rolland, p. 160

¹ Reproduced from Romain Rolland Birthday-Book published by Rotopel-Verlag, Zurich, 1926
512. LETTER TO EMIL RONIGER

[Before October 29, 1926]

I have purposely refrained from acknowledging your letter all these long weeks, not because there was any unwillingness on my part to contribute my humble quota to the tribute that will be paid by many persons all the world over to the humanitarian work of Romain Rolland. My difficulty was my unfitness to find myself among those men of letters whose contributions you have invited. This is no mock modesty, but my inmost feeling. I am unfit also because, I confess, I knew practically nothing about our great and good friend before he imposed upon himself the task of becoming my self-chosen advertiser. And you will be perhaps amazed to know that now, too, my acquaintance with him is confined to a very cursory glance at that booklet regarding myself. The work before me leaves me no time to read the things I would like to. I have, therefore, even now, not been able to read any of his great works. All, therefore, I know about Romain Rolland is what I have learned from those who have come into personal contact with him. Perhaps it is better that I know him through the living touch of mutual friends. They have enabled me to understand and appreciate the deep humanity of all his acts in every sphere of life. The world is the richer for his life and work. May he be long spared to continue the noble mission of spreading peace among mankind.

M. K. GANDHI

Romain Rolland and Gandhi: Correspondence, pp. 77-8

1 Vide "Letter to Editor," "Romain Rolland Birthday-Book", 29-10-1926.
2 It was conveyed to Gandhiji by Rabindranath Tagore that Romain Rolland did not like the expression "self-chosen advertiser" used by him. For Gandhiji’s explanation, vide "Letter to Romain Rolland", 29-10-1926.
3 Mahatma Gandhi
DEAR FRIEND,

Mira has given me a good translation of your beautiful letter. I think I understand and appreciate its spirit fully. I would have gladly gone to Helsingfors had I not felt that the invitation was prompted and not spontaneous. There were other reasons. I waited for the call from within, it did not come. I give you my assurance that I shall not resist it when it comes.

I fear my estimate of your book was not quite correctly reproduced. I knew that you wrote from the deepest conviction.

One thing more I would like to have off my mind. In the album presented to you, I am one of the contributors. The Poet has sent me the message that my description of you as my self-chosen advertiser has given you offence. I can only give you my assurance that the expression was used as a mark of my affection for you and my unworthiness to deserve your attention. It may be difficult for the man in the street to believe, but cannot be for you, when I say that I simply do not understand the fuss that is made about my qualities. And I have no false modesty about me.

I do expect to meet you in the flesh some day and that in the best of health.

With all good wishes,

Yours sincerely,

From a photostat: S.N. 12175

---

1 The letter addressed to Mirabehn was dated September 26, 1996; vide "Romain Rolland’s Letter to Mirabehn", 26-9-1926 (S.N 12174).

2 Gandhiji met Romain Rolland in Switzerland in 1931 on his way back home from the Second Round Table Conference in London.
514. LETTER TO V. S. SRINIVASA SASTRI

[SABARMATI,]
October 29, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

It was a great relief to me when Vaze replied that you fully intended to go to S.A. Andrews sent a cable telling me that there was a rumour of your illness and consequent cancellation of your membership and that the rumour had greatly upset our people. Your letter now sets all doubt at rest. I sent a reassuring cable to Andrews immediately on Vaze’s wire.

I quite agree with you that not much is to be expected from the conference. But I am not without hope that our people will have some breathing time.

The opinion I have expressed upon the killing of stray dogs has indeed estranged many from me. But that has ever been my lot. I know that the latest storm will pass like its predecessors.

I do hope you are keeping excellent health and that you will be able to retain it during the trying times ahead of you in S. A. Andrews and I set much store by your being in the deputation. Somehow or other your inclusion has given me a feeling of safety.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

RT. HON’BLE V. S. SASTRI

From a photostat: S.N. 12028

515. LETTER TO K. VISVA EASAN

October 29, 1926

DEAR FRIEND

I have read the cutting sent by you. I do think that the cruelty to the cat was abominable and in a State regulated by a system of punishments, the punishment would be justified.

SJT. K. VISVA EASAN
TRICHINOPOLY
S. INDIA

From the office copy: S.N. 19959

1 As a member of the Indian deputation to South Africa
516. LETTER TO V. M. TARKUNDE

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 30, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

1. When I pray, I do not ask for anything but I simply think of some of the verses or hymns which I fancy for the moment.

2. The relation between God and myself is not only at prayer but, at all times, that of master and slave in perpetual bondage.

3. Prayer is to me the intense longing of the heart to merge myself in the Master. If a man does not pray, evidently he has no longing; there is no feeling of helplessness and when there is no helplessness, there is no need for help.

4. The class eat the corn produced by the mass from purely selfish motives. But when the class begin to use khaddar, they will do so deliberately for the sake of serving the mass and establishing the bond between themselves and the mass.

5. Lawyers, etc., are invited and expected to spin by way of sacrifice and encouragement. As the leaders do, so will the followers. I spin because through my spinning, I expect to be able to, so far as a single individual is able to, move the mass to spin for their own sake and get rid of their idleness.

Yours sincerely,

SIT. V. M. TARKUNDE
151, KASABA PETH
POONA CITY

From a photostat: S.N. 19724

517. LETTER TO K. VEERABHADRACHARYALU

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
October 30, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. Everybody is expected to get up in the Ashram at 4 in the morning and attend prayer which begins at 4-15. Everybody is supposed to work in connection with the Ashram from 7 a.m. to 4-30 p.m. with an interval of an hour and a half. There is another prayer meeting at 7 p.m.

The principal vows are: brahmacharya, truth, non-violence, khaddar, removal of untouchability.

The food given is vegetarian and simple. Majority cook for themselves. The main changes in diet which have been found to be necessary are return to milk and substitution of oils with ghee and in the place of fruit, green vegetables in moderation should be taken. Vegetables may be eaten without salt.

In order to avoid constipation you should omit rice, take as little ghee as possible, take hip baths, plenty of exercise and you may take also abdominal earth bandages at night on empty stomach and you should drink hot water with or without salt and lemon first thing in the morning.

Yours sincerely

SIT. K. VEERABHADRACHARYALU
ADHYAKSHA
SRI BHARATI VIDYASHRAMA
GORIGIPUDI, PEDAPULIVARRU P.O.
GUNTUR DT.

From a microfilm: S.N. 19725

518. LETTER TO MOTIBEHN CHOKSI

Asvina Vad 9, 1982, October 30, 1926

CHI. MOTI

I have your letter. My mind feels [now] at ease. On reading the postcard, I felt that I should now talk to Lakshmidas, and I have done so. May God give you the strength to stick to your resolution. Do not give up the practice of writing to me from time to time. There was much illness here, but things are improving now.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 12139
519. IS THIS HUMANITY?-IV

[October 31, 1926]

Taking life may be a duty. Let us consider this position.

We do destroy as much life as we think is necessary for sustaining the body. Thus for food we take life, vegetable and other, and for health we destroy mosquitoes and the like by the use of disinfectants, etc., and we do not think that we are guilty of irreligion in doing so.

This is as regards one’s own self. But for the sake of others, i.e., for the benefit of the species, we kill carnivorous beasts. When lions and tigers pester their villages, the villagers regard it a duty to kill them or have them killed.

Even man-slaughter may be necessary in certain cases. Suppose a man runs amuck and goes furiously about sword in hand, and killing anyone that comes his way, and no one dares to capture him alive. Anyone who dispatches this lunatic will earn the gratitude of the community and be regarded a benevolent man.

From the point of view of ahimsa it is the plain duty of everyone to kill such a man. There is, indeed, one exception if it can be so called. The yogi who can subdue the fury of this dangerous man may not kill him. But we are not here dealing with beings who have almost reached perfection; we are considering the duty of the society, of the ordinary erring human beings.

There may be a difference of opinion as regards the appositeness of my illustrations. But if they are inadequate, others can be easily imagined. What they are meant to show is that refraining from taking life can in no circumstances be an absolute duty.

The fact is that ahimsa does not simply mean non-killing. Himsa means causing pain to or killing any life out of anger or from a selfish purpose, or with the intention of injuring it. Refraining from so doing is ahimsa.

The physician who prescribes bitter medicine causes you pain but does no himsa. If he fails to prescribe bitter medicine when it is necessary to do so, he fails in his duty of ahimsa. The surgeon who, from fear of causing pain to his patient, hesitates to amputate a rotten limb is guilty of himsa. He who refrains from killing a murderer who is about to kill his ward (when he cannot prevent him otherwise) earns no merit, but commits a sin, he practises no ahimsa but himsa out of a fatuous sense of ahimsa.

Let us now examine the root of ahimsa. It is uttermost selflessness. Selflessness means complete freedom from a regard for one’s body. When some sage observed man killing numberless creatures, big and small, out of a regard for his own body, he was shocked at his ignorance. He pitied him for thus forgetting the deathless soul, encased within the perishable body, and for thinking of the ephemeral physical pleasure in preference to the eternal bliss of the spirit. He therefrom deduced the duty of complete self-effacement. He saw that if man desired to realize himself, i.e., truth, he could do so only by being completely detached from the body, i.e., by making all other beings feel safe from him. That is the way of ahimsa.

A realization of this truth shows that the sin of himsa consists not in merely taking life, but in taking life for the sake of one’s perishable body. All destruction therefore involved in the process of eating, drinking, etc., is selfish and, therefore, himsa. But man regards it to be unavoidable and puts up with it. But the destruction of bodies of tortured creatures being for their own peace cannot be regarded as himsa, or the unavoidable destruction caused for the purpose of protecting one’s wards cannot be regarded as himsa.

This line of reasoning is liable to be most mischievously used but that is not because the reasoning is faulty, but because of the inherent frailty of man to catch at whatever pretexts he can get to deceive himself to satisfy his selfishness or egoism. But that danger may not excuse one from defining the true nature of ahimsa. Thus, we arrive at the following result from the foregoing:

1. It is impossible to sustain one’s body without the destruction of other bodies to some extent.
2. All have to destroy some life
   (a) for sustaining their own bodies;
   (b) for protecting those under their care; or
   (c) sometimes for the sake of those whose life is taken.
3. (a) and (b) in (2) mean himsa to a greater or less extent. (c) means no himsa, and is therefore ahimsa. Himsa in (a) and (b) is unavoidable.
4. A progressive ahimsaist will, therefore, commit the himsa contained in (a) and (b) as little as possible, only when it is unavoidable, and after full and mature deliberation and having exhausted all remedies to avoid it.

The destruction of dogs that I have suggested came under (4) and can, therefore, be resorted to only when it is unavoidable, when there is no other remedy and after mature deliberation. But I have not the slightest doubt that refraining from that destruction when it is unavoidable is worse than destruction. And, therefore, although there can be no absolute duty to kill dogs, etc., it becomes a necessary duty for certain people at certain times and under certain circumstances.

I shall now try to take up one by one some of the questions that have been asked me. Some correspondents demand personal replies, and in case I fail to do so threaten to publish their views. It is impossible for me to reach every individual correspondent by a personal reply. Those that are necessary I shall deal with here. I have no right, nor desire, to stop people from carrying on the controversy in other papers. I may remind the correspondents, however, that threats and impatience have no place in a sober and religious discussion.

A correspondent asks:

How did you hit upon the religion of destroying dogs at the old age of 57? If it had occurred to you earlier than this, why were you silent so long?

Man proclaims a truth only when he sees it and when it is necessary, no matter even if it be in his old age. I have long recognized the duty of killing such animals within the limits laid down above, and have acted up to it on occasions. In India the villagers have long recognized the duty of destroying intruding dogs. They keep dogs who scare away intruders and kill them if they do not escape with their lives. These watch-dogs are purposely maintained with a view to protecting the village from other dogs, etc., as also from thieves and robbers whom they attack fearlessly. The dogs have become a nuisance only in cities, and the best remedy is to have a law against stray dogs. That will involve the least destruction of dogs and ensure the protection of citizens.

Another correspondent asks:

Do you expect to convince people by logical argument in a matter like that of ahimsa?

The rebuke contained in this is not without some substance. But I wanted to convince no one. Being a student and practiser of ahimsa, I have had to give expression to my views when the occasion demanded it. I have an opinion based on experience that logic and reasoning have some place, no doubt very small, in a religious discussion.

Young India, 4-11-1926
520. LETTER TO MOTIBEHN M. ASAR

Sunday, [July-October, 1926]¹

CHI. MOTIBEHN,

I was very glad to receive your letter. Start the study of Gujarati. The handwriting is good of course.

You must get rid of slow fever. It is necessary to have hi-bath for that purpose. It will be good if you remain on milk and fruits for a while. Raw vegetables can be regarded as fruits You must chew them well or make them into pulp. You have got to cure constipation. Take enema if you do not pass stool. In the morning, you should drink hot water as soon as you have cleaned your teeth. Many people have benefited from it. Keep writing to me.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a copy of the Gujarati: G. N. 3762

521. LETTER TO C. RAJAGOPALACHARI

SABARMATI,
November 1, 1926

MY DEAR C.R.,

I have your note. I understand how your boys are shaping. When boys grow old, they must be allowed to go their way. If I were you and Narasinhvarao could not help running into the trap, I should let him have his way, only, I would not support him in the trap.

These elections are an awful business. You are well out of them.

I am not religiously against quinine. I have been using it freely in the Ashram. I should be chary of using it for myself.

Heaven only knows whether I am going to Gauhati or not. But I suppose I will have to go. I have no heart in going there. My work lies in the Ashram and I see my use here. However, a month hence is too long a time for one to speculate about.

Are you keeping all right? Can you walk 50 miles at a stretch? Can you wrestle with Mahadev or even me? A fair test!

¹ From the contents it is presumed that the letter was written during the latter half of the year 1926 when the addressee was not keeping good health; vide “Letter to Motibehn Choksi”, 8-7-1926, “Letter to Motibehn Choksi”, 17-7-1926 and “Letter to Najuklal Choksi”, 24-10-1926.
Sickness is now clearing. Am off to Bombay today for a day to see Sir Ganga Ram and others and preach the wheel.

BAPU

From a photostat: S.N. 19727

522. LETTER TO KAKALBHAI KOTHARI

Asvina Vad 11, 1982 [November 1, 1926]

BHAISHRI KAKALBHAI¹,

I have your letter. It cannot be published in Navajivan. I have not yet read Shivaji’s letter published in the newspapers. He has sent me a copy for publication. Shall decide what to do after perusing it. It is only from you that I have come to know of what he did in the Kutch Parishad. I have read nothing about this Parishad. I see no objection to Saurashtra doing what it thinks fit in this connection. For the sake of Truth even, not a single step should be taken in excitement or haste. If out of fear we refrain from doing something, that will be contrary to truth. I could not guess who the other person might be. Whenever you feel like letting me know, please do.

Vandemataram from

MOHANDAS

[PS.]

Ramdas has written to me about the charges against the Amreli Karyalaya. If you have received some report about them, you should make inquiries and publish them.

MOHANDAS

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19960

¹ A Congress worker and journalist of Saurashtra
523. LETTER TO INDRAJI

KHADI PRATISTHAN,
15 COLLEGE SQUARE, CALCUTTA,
[After November 2, 1926]

MY DEAR INDRAJI,

Maqbul Hussain has been complaining from Bharatpur that a lot of persecution against the Mussalmans has been going on in that state and that many Mussalmans have been forced to leave it. Gandhiji wrote to the Minister but he has had no reply. You know the Minister, says Bapu. Would you kindly ask him as to what he has to say?

Yours sincerely,

MAHADEV DESAI

[PS.]

How is Swamiji now? At Bombay we heard he was very ill.

From a photostat: G. N. 7208; also C. W. 4868

524. TELEGRAM TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

GRANT ROAD,
November 2, 1926

MATHURADAS
PANCHGANI CASTLE
PANCHGANI

CAN YOU RELEASE PYARELAL WHO MUST GO ATTEND HIS SISTER SUFFERING FROM TYPHOID. ARRANGING SEND SUBSTITUTE. REPLY SABARMATI.

BAPU

From the original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

1 From the contents. Swami Shraddhanand, addressee’s father, was shot dead on December 23, 1926. The postscript would suggest that the letter was written on behalf of Gandhiji after his visit to Bombay on November 2, vide “Shraddhanandji - The Martyr”, 30-12-1926.
525. LETTER TO DAHYABHAI M. PATEL

Asvina Vad 13, 1982 [November 3, 1926]

BHAISHRI DAHYABHAI,

I have your letter. Do come and see me. I should have replied earlier but I could not manage to reply yesterday while on the train. Please forgive me.

Vandemataram from

MOHANDAS

BHAISHRI DAHYABHAI M. PATEL
TALUKA SAMITI
DHOLKA

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 2697. Courtesy: Dahyabhai M. Patel

526. RETURNED EMIGRANTS

To
The Editor, Young India

SIR,

I must confess that I was rather mistaken in being too sure about the knowledge of Hindustani possessed by the Colonial-born Indians. . . .

As regards the Fiji Indians being sent to British Guiana, I remain convinced that the experiment will lead to another disappointment to the Fiji people. . . .

I remind you that in 1920 you made the mistake of recommending an experimental shipment of 500 labourers to British Guiana and confessed it when it was pointed out to you by Mr. Polak and others. I am afraid that you are repeating your mistake. . . . I am sure that the Fiji returned emigrants, accustomed as they are to one of the finest tropical climates, will find their life miserable in that malaria-ridden mudland of British Guiana. . . . I am entirely opposed to the idea of Fiji Indians being sent to British Guiana. My main argument against the experiment recommended by you rests on higher grounds of humaneness. . . . I beseech you to reconsider the whole

1 Vide”Returned Emigrants”, 23-9-1926.
2 The reference probably is to”British Guiana and Fiji Deputations”, before 4-2-1920, and”Letter to Dr. Joseph Nunan”, 5-2-1920.
thing again and thus prevent another disappointment and disaster in the life of those who were domiciled in Fiji.\footnote{Only extracts are reproduced here.}

Yours, etc.,

BANARASIDAS CHATURVEDI

The foregoing letter was received some time ago. But I was anxious to verify for myself the "confession" imputed to me. Pandit Banarasidas Chaturvedi has kindly sent me a cutting containing an interview which I gave some years ago regarding an experimental shipment. I have seen the "confession". In my opinion, it has no relevance to the present opinion. My opinion is concerned only with those who are now living in a disgraceful state in Calcutta, who cannot and will not go to the villages, and for whom any other state will be probably better than the present. They may, in my opinion, go to British Guiana, if they choose. They cannot lose much. Their going is not even to be used as a preliminary to the shipment of others. The remedy I have suggested is an emergency measure dealing with only a few hundreds at the outset. It should be remembered that my recommendation is for sending Fiji Indians to British Guiana only if any other remedy fails, and even then it is subject to the final consent of the people themselves. I am therefore sorry that I cannot reconsider the opinion I have given. A permanent remedy no doubt lies in considering and dealing adequately with the whole question of emigration.

Young India, 4-11-1926

527. NOTES

SUBSCRIBERS TO A.I.S.A.

The subscriptions for the new year of the All-India Spinners Association are coming in but not as fast as they might be. It is hoped that the subscribers this year will make it a point to improve the quality of their yarn in strength, evenness and fineness. They should aim at a standard count so as to make it possible to weave their yarn into one good piece. Indeed this sacrificial yarn should be far superior to the yarn spun for hire.

But a correspondent says:

You write about improving the quality of yarn, you refer to testing machines. Then is it not necessary to advise the spinning member of the defects in his spinning, so that he may try to improve it?

Attempts are being made to have all yarn tested at the A.I.S.A. office but only a limited number of packets can be tested per day.

\footnote{Only extracts are reproduced here.}
Whenever the yarn is tested, the result is sent to the spinner. But I suggest to those who are anxious to make quick progress to improvise their own testing contrivance, which they can do without any difficulty or expense. The improvised contrivance has already been described in these pages.\textsuperscript{1} It is well for the members to remember that the A.I.S.A. represents the poor man’s movement and, therefore, cannot afford to spend much at the central office. Decentralization and distribution have to keep pace with centralization and concentration.

FROM ENGLAND

A lady from Bristol sends the following:

Herewith £1 towards the spinning-wheels, would it were £100. I expect you do not realize how much help you get from spirits in England who realize the awful weight that lies upon you and try to help you, sending forth their spirits to you.

The virtue of letters like this lies not in the value of the monetary contribution but an appreciation of the fundamental fact underlying the spinning-wheel, viz., that it is an attempt to replace the spirit of killing competition that threatens to turn man into beast by the spirit of co-ordinated effort that lifts the whole humanity with the lifting of one’s own self. This movement can only succeed if the purest forces in the world combine to work towards the consummation. But the momentum must first come from within India’s borders. And if I had no faith in God, in India and the cause,”the awful weight” would certainly kill me. As it is, I turn the weight over to God’s broad shoulders.

Young India, 4-11-1926

528. PRECARIOUS CONDITION IN SOUTH AFRICA

The latest mail from South Africa has brought me a batch of papers which show the precarious condition of the Indian settlers in that sub-continent. Trade licenses are an eternal problem. The administrative reins are being daily tightened. Hitherto, in Natal, it has been a fairly recognized rule not to touch old licenses under the wide discretionary powers given to licensing officers except for cases of grave insanitation or breach of conditions imposed by the officers. But that sound rule is gradually being disregarded and even renewals are being arbitrarily refused. The case sent to me is pathetic and refers to an old lady Mrs. Sophia Bhayla. The Secretary of the S. A. Congress in introducing the case says:

\textsuperscript{1} Vide “Improvised Method of Testing”, 14-10-1926.

This poor lady with five children has been ruined through the caprice of the licensing officer and to avoid being put in jail by her creditors, it is highly likely that she will have to seek the protection of the law of insolvency.

The judges of the appellate courts showed their sympathy for the poor woman but declared themselves powerless, being bound under the statute not to interfere with the discretion vested by the legislature in the licensing officers, except when they can be proved to have been bribed or incapable of exercising the powers vested in them. Here is what the principal judgment says:

The licensing officer refused her license after she had held it for many years and it would appear that the refusal is based on the ground that this lady had not paid the dues which it is said she should have paid to the Town Council of Estcourt. At first sight it would appear that that was somewhat harsh for the licensing officer, who happens to be town clerk and town treasurer and holds other offices as well, because of the knowledge that he had as town treasurer and town clerk, he should say as licensing officer: “Well, you had trouble with my employers, the Town Council, and you have not paid your rates or the dues which are payable and, therefore, I will not grant you a renewal of this license.” That does appear to one’s mind to be inequitable. If this lady had committed an offence against the bye-laws, there was a ready remedy for that by prosecuting her or by proceeding against her according to the law if she had broken any contract.

Thus, the judges though willing were unable to redress a manifest wrong. When a law is bad, a judge is helpless unless he resigns. Such heroic action is not to be expected in these days.

But the Government is not powerless. Town Councils, composed as they are of rival traders, are not to be expected to do justice. They will generally use the powers given to them for crushing their rivals, but the central administration can certainly render aid in such glaring cases. The Round Table Conference will be a mockery, if even cases of manifest hardship remain unredressed. The Class Areas Bill may be shelved for ever but if the spirit animating it survives, the position of the settlers will in no wise be better than if the Bill had been passed. An empty victory will be worse than a proper defeat. For in the noise of it, the cry of the anguish of the sufferers may be hushed and they may be denied even the solace of sympathy.

Young India, 4-11-1926
529. A PLEA FOR PURITY

It is no longer possible for me to suppress the voluminous correspondence that is pouring in upon me in connection with the elections and, incidentally, with canvassing for Congress membership. A candidate for legislature membership writes:¹

When I embarked upon this business I had no notion of what I was to be in for. My agents play false. They attribute to me virtues which I do not recognize in myself. My opponents condemn me to vice I have never been guilty of. . . . I want a clean and a fair fight. . . . Can you show a way out or will you simply say that Council-going is wrong and I must retire?

Another correspondent writes:²

Can you not as of yore prevent the frauds that are being perpetrated in the name of the Congress, and, shall I say, even in your name? . . . How can you remain silent now when these frauds can be proved to exist? I can give you proofs if you want them.

Here in my Province, parties who are interested in packing the Congress—I can use no other word—are degrading the Congress name and with it the name of khaddar till both stink in one’s nostrils. Men are practically picked up in the streets, their subscriptions are paid for them and pieces of khaddar are wrapped round them in order to fulfil the letter of the law of the Congress. Surely you can raise your voice against this debasing practice. . . . Will these men or their representatives enable us to get swaraj? Retirement or no retirement, we expect you at least to use your pen against these practices.

A third correspondent writes:³

Do you know that, in my province, shameful practices are being resorted to in order to register members? A man of loose character has got hold of women of ill-fame—I personally know at least one—and is using them or her for the work of canvassing members. She goes from door to door, appeals to the baser passions of mankind and gets members. Is this legal? Is this moral? What is the Congress worth when members are registered by these means? . . . Are you prepared to justify the canvassing of Congress members by such women? And, if not, will you not say so publicly?

¹ Only extracts are reproduced here.
² ibid.
³ ibid.
A fourth correspondent sends me cuttings which show that candidates and their supporters appeal to sub-communal passions. He says:

Hindu and Muslim divisions we have, but now we have an appeal to provincial and caste jealousies and passions, that is to say, voters are asked to vote for men belonging to their own province or to their own castes and trades, and not for their intrinsic worth. . . .

A fifth correspondent sends me cuttings containing speeches which I cannot reproduce, which almost beat Billings-gate.

A sixth tells me that money is being freely used which can only be described as bribery. Men who were never worth much are today getting handsome salaries merely because they can speak and because they are supposed to wield some influence in their own districts. They have no opinions of their own. Some of them are brazen-faced enough to own that they are only acting as agents and that they would champion any policy, as a lawyer champions for money any cause that he gets, irrespective of morals.

I have been told that all these things are inevitable when a nation is rising from stupor. No doubt there is some truth in this. When people were thoroughly apathetic and only a few men were interested in running elections and running associations, impurities remained underground. Now that a large body of people are taking part in these public matters, the impurities which were hidden are coming to the surface. Unfortunately if all my correspondents are right, there is not anything better left under the surface, in other words, impurities are not superficial, but they are in the whole body itself. I should hope that things are not so bad and that the body is sound and that the statements made above are true only in isolated cases.

I do not know. I confess that I am not following the newspapers. Nor am I otherwise in touch with what is going on and it was for that reason that I have hitherto refrained from noticing the voluminous correspondence before me. But some of the correspondents are known to me. All of them have given me their names and addresses and some of them have offered to supply me with further particulars.

\[1\] ibid.
Some of them have sent me newspaper cuttings in corroboration. I felt in the circumstances that I should be wrong if I did not even give a gist of this correspondence. I have digested it for what it is worth and present it for the serious consideration of workers all over India who are taking part in the elections, no matter to what party they belong. I draw the particular attention of all Congress workers to the painful allegations made. The latter must remember that the Congress creed is still unamended. The creed requires them to work for the attainment of swaraj by peaceful and legitimate means. Theresolutions require the absolute use of pure khaddar on all Congress occasions. Let the Congress workers then not believe their creed or their resolutions. And if I have no creed for non Congressmen to draw attention to, I wish they would realize that without purity of public life, swaraj is an impossibility.

Young India, 4-11-1926

530. LITERALISM

A correspondent writes thus passionately:

I am afraid there is a little fly in the ointment of your splendid defence (in Young India of September 23) of the practice of Divine prayer, especially congregational prayer. At the end of the article, referring to churches, temples and mosques you say, “These places of worship are not a mere idle superstition to be swept away at the first opportunity. They have survived all attacks up to now and are likely to persist to the end of time.”

On reading this I asked myself: Attacks by whom? Surely those attacks were not made by atheists or scoffers or humbugs, to anything like the extent to which the opposing sects of God-believers are known to have attacks the places of worship of one another. In fact, most, if not all, of the attacks you speak of were perpetrated by ‘godly’ zealots, in the name and for the glory of each one’s own God. It would be insulting your knowledge of world history to cite instances.

Secondly, I asked myself: Is it true—is it strictly correct to say, that these places of worship have survived all attacks? Again the answer is: Surely not. Witness the site at Kashi (or Benares) where had stood the temple of Vishvanath for long centuries, since even before Lord Buddha’s time—but where now stands dominating the ‘Holy City’ a mosque built out of the ruins of the desecrated old temple by orders of no less a man than the ‘Living Saint’ (Zinda Pir), the ‘Ascetic King’ (Sultan Auliya), the ‘Puritan Emperor’—Aurangzeb. Again, it is not the ‘unbelieving’ British, but the terrible believer, Ibn Saud, and his Wahabi hosts, that are responsible for the recent demolition and desecration of many places of worship in the Hedjaz (Muslims’ ‘Holy Land’), over which Mussalman Indians are just now so loudly lamenting, and which the Nizam of Hyderabad—alone of all Muslim rulers in the world—has vainly tried to restore with his money.

---

Do these facts mean nothing to you Mahatmaji?

These facts do mean a great deal to me. They show undoubtedly man’s barbarity. But they chasten me. They warn me against becoming intolerant. And they make me tolerant even towards the intolerant. They show man’s utter insignificance and thus drive him to pray, if he will not be led to it. For, does not history record instances of humbled pride bending the knee before the Almighty, washing His feet with tears of blood and asking to be reduced to dust under His heels? Verily ‘the letter killeth, the spirit giveth life.’

The writer who is one of the most regular and painstaking readers of Young India should know by this time that places of worship to me are not merely brick and mortar. They are but a shadow of the reality. Against every church and every mosque and every temple destroyed, hundreds have risen in their places. It is wholly irrelevant to the argument about the necessity of prayer that the so-called believers have belied their belief and that many places renowned for their sacred character have been razed to the ground. I hold it to be enough, and it is enough for my argument, if I can prove that there have been men in the world, and there are men today in existence, for whom prayer is positively the bread of life. I recommend to the correspondent the practice of going unobserved to mosques, temples and churches, without any preconceived ideas, and he will discover as I have discovered that there is something in them which appeals to the heart and which transforms those who go there, not for show, not out of shame or fear, but out of simple devotion. It defies analysis. Nevertheless the fact stands that pure minded people going to the present places of pilgrimage which have become hot-beds of error, superstition, and even immorality, return from them purer for the act of worship. Hence the significant assurance in the Bhagavad Gita: “I make return according to the spirit in which men worship Me.”

What the correspondent has written undoubtedly shows our present limitations, which we must try as early as possible to get rid of. It is a plea for purification of religions, broadening of the outlook. That much-needed reform is surely coming. There is a better world-consciousness, and may I say that even the reform we all hanker after needs intense prayer in order to achieve deeper purification of self? For, without deeper purification of mankind in general, mutual tolerance and mutual goodwill are not possible.

Young India, 4-11-1926

531. UNTOUCHABLES’ RIGHT OF WORSHIP

A friend from Neemach Cantt. asks:

1. Do the untouchables, also called atishudras by people of higher castes,—do they too have the right to offer worship before the image of Vishnu and to take it out in a procession through the streets?

2. Do the Vaishnavas go to hell if they have darshan of an image of Vishnu which has been worshiped by atishudras?

That people still feel the need to ask such questions is a matter of sorrow. I firmly believe that our Antyaja brothers have as much right to place the image of Vishnu in a chariot and take it out in a procession as any other people. And so, too, a Vaishnava far from committing a sin earns merit by darshan of an image which has been worshiped by atishudras. A Vaishnava who knowingly avoids worshipping such an image brings the Vaishnava dharma into contempt.

[From Hindi]

Hindi Navajivan, 4-11-1926

532. LETTER TO NATHUBHAI NEMICHAND PAREKH

Sabarmati,

[November 4, 1926]

Bhai Nathubhai,

I have been receiving your loving letters. If I do not reply, do not feel that I am indifferent to your letters. I have been patiently discussing the topic in Navajivan. I welcome opposition from simple-hearted men like you. Certainly it is not my aim that the dogs should be killed at once. My article seemingly expresses a new idea and therefore readers take time to understand it, but ultimately people like you will surely follow it or I will come to see my mistake.

1 From the post mark

Blessings from

BAPU

SHRI NATHUBHAI NEMICHAND PAREKH
CALICUT, MALABAR

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 6248

533. LETTER TO V. L. PHADKE

Ashwin Vad 14 [November 4, 1926]

BHAISHRI MAMA,

I have your letter. I can have nothing to say as long as you stick on there.

I shall start writing on what must be done to remove untouchability. Your view does not tally with our idea of asking for contributions from Antyaja friends. Others may well serve in that way. Friends expect different from me.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 3815

534. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

Thursday [November 4, 1926]

CHI. JAMNALAL,

Your letter. I received Baijnathji’s hundi and have sent him the receipt. Soniramji is here; he is not in good health. Kamala changed her mind at the last minute and has decided to go with me to Wardha and I am happy about it. My health is now good. I had been to 1 As noted on the letter

2 From the postmark
Bombay for a day.¹ I had talks with Sir Ganga Ram, Kamath, Ganguli and Sir Chunilal.² Let’s see the result.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 2875

535. PREFACE TO” SHRIMAD RAJCHANDRA”
November 5, 1926

INTRODUCTION

When Shri Revashanker Jagjivan, whom I regard as an elder brother, asked me for a foreword to this³ edition of Shrimad Rajchandra’s⁴ letters and writings, I could not refuse his request. As I tried to think what I could say in such a foreword, I felt that it would serve two purposes if I gave the few chapters of my reminiscences of Rajchandra which I wrote in the Yeravda jail¹: one, that as my attempt, though incomplete, was undertaken purely in a spirit of religious devotion, it might help other mumukshus⁶ like me, and two, that those who did not know Shrimad Rajchandra in life might know a little about him and so find it easier to understand some of his writings.

The chapters which follow leave the story incomplete. I do not think that I can complete it, for, even if I get time, I do not feel inclined to go much further than the point where I left off. I, therefore, wish to complete the last chapter, which had remained unfinished, and include in it a few things.

In these chapters I have not touched upon one aspect of the subject which I think I should place before the readers. Some people assert that Shrimad was the twenty-fifth Tirthankar⁷. Some others believe that he has attained moksha. Both these beliefs, I think, are improper. Either those who hold them do not know Shrimad or their definitions of Tirthankar or liberated soul are different from the commonly accepted ones. We may not lower the standard of truth even

---

¹ On November 2
² Members of the Royal Agricultural Commission with whom Gandhiji discussed the benefits of the spinning-wheel and khadi
³ Second edition. It cannot be ascertained when the first edition was published.
⁴ Rajchandra Ravjibhai Mehta
⁵ Gandhiji was in this jail from March 1922 to February 1924.
⁶ Seekers after moksha, deliverance from phenomenal existence as the supreme end of life
⁷ A soul that has risen to perfection and teaches the way to others. Jains believe in 24 such Tirthankars, of whom Mahavira, a contemporary of the Buddha, was the last.
for the sake of those whom we love dearly. Moksha is a condition of supreme value. It is the highest state of the atman\(^1\). It is so rare a condition that to attain it much more effort and patience are necessary than, say, for emptying the sea drop by drop with a blade of grass. A perfect description of that state is impossible. A Tirthankar will naturally command, without seeking them, the powers which belong to the state immediately preceding moksha. One who has attained freedom while still living in this body will suffer from no physical disease. In a body untroubled by desire there can be no disease. There can be no disease where there is no attachment. Where there is desire there is attachment and while there is attachment moksha is impossible. Shrimad had not attained the total freedom from attachment which should characterize a mukta purusha\(^2\) or the vibhuti which belongs to a Tirthankar. He had such freedom and such powers in a much larger measure than the ordinary man or woman, and so in common speech we may describe him as one who was free from attachment or who possessed superhuman powers. I am sure, however, that Shrimad had not attained to the perfect freedom from attachment which we attribute to a mukta purusha or acquired the vibhuti which we believe that a Tirthankar would manifest. I do not say this with the intention of pointing out any shortcoming in a great character worthy of our highest reverence; I say it in order to do justice both to him and to the cause of truth. We are all worldly creatures, whereas Shrimad was not. We shall have to wander from existence to existence, whereas Shrimad may have only one life more to live. We are perhaps running away from moksha, while Shrimad was flying towards it with the speed of wind.

This was no small achievement. Even so, I must say that he had not attained the supreme state so beautifully described by him. He himself said that he had come upon the Sahara in his journey and that he had failed to cross the desert. Shrimad Rajchandra, however, was a rare being. His writings are the quintessence of his experiences. Anyone who reads them, reflects over them and follows them in his life will find the path to moksha easier; his yearning for sense-pleasures will become progressively weaker, he will become disinterested in the affairs of this world, will cease to be attached to the life of the body and devote himself to the welfare of the atman.

---

1. The self
2. A liberated person
The reader will see from this that Shrimad’s writings are meant only for those who are qualified to study them. All readers will not find them interesting. Those who are inclined to be critical will get material for criticism. But those who have faith will find these writings of absorbing interest. I have always felt that Shrimad’s writings breathe the spirit of truth. He did not write a single word in order to show off his knowledge. His aim in his writings was to share his inward bliss with his readers. I am sure that anyone who wishes to free himself from inner conflicts and is eager to know his duty in life will gain much from Shrimad’s writings, whether such a reader is a Hindu or belongs to another faith.

And, hoping that the few reminiscences of Shrimad’s life which I have written down will help the reader who is qualified to read his writings, I give them here as part of this Foreword.

SOME REMINISCENCES OF RAYCHANDDBHAI

CHAPTER 1: INTRODUCTORY

Today is the birth anniversary of the late Shrimad Rajchandra, whose reminiscences I have started writing, that is, it is the Kartiki Purnima, Samvat 1979. I am not attempting to write a biography of Shrimad; such an attempt is beyond my capacity. I do not have with me the material needed for a biography. If I wanted to write one, I would spend some time in his birth-place, the port of Vavania, examine the house in which he lived, see the places which were the scenes of his childhood play and wanderings, meet his childhood friends, visit the school which he attended, interview his friends, disciples and relatives and gather from them all information which was likely to be useful; only after I had done all this would I start writing the biography. But I have not visited these places or become acquainted with such persons.

And now I have begun to doubt even my capacity for writing these reminiscences. I remember to have remarked more than once that, if I had the time, I would write such reminiscences. One of his disciples, for whom I feel the highest respect, heard me say this, and I have undertaken this attempt mainly to satisfy him. I would be happy,

---

1 The full-moon day of Kartika; the day corresponded to November 4, 1922.
2 In Saurashtra
in any case, to write these reminiscences of Shrimad Rajchandra, whom I used to call Raychandbhai or the Poet, out of my love and respect, and explain their significance to mumukshus. As it is, however, my attempt is merely intended to satisfy a friend. To be able to do justice to these reminiscences of his life, I should be well acquainted with the Jain way, which I must admit I am not. I will, therefore, write them from an extremely restricted point of view. I will content myself with a record of my memories of him and of the events in his life which had left an impression on me, and with a discussion of what I learned from those occasions. The benefit which I thus derived, or some benefit similar to that, will perhaps be derived by the reader who is a mumukshu from a perusal of these reminiscences.

I have used the word mumukshu advisedly. This attempt at writing my reminiscences is not intended for all classes of readers.

Three persons have influenced me deeply, Tolstoy, Ruskin and Raychandbhai: Tolstoy through one of his books and through a little correspondence with him, Ruskin through one book of his, Unto This Last—which in Gujarati I have called Sarvodaya,—and Raychandbhai through intimate personal contact. When I began to feel doubts about Hinduism as a religion, it was Raychandbhai who helped me to resolve them. In the year 1893, I came into close contact with some Christian gentlemen in South Africa. Their lives were pure, and they were devoted to their religion. Their main work in life was to persuade followers of other faiths to embrace Christianity. Though I had come into contact with them in connection with practical affairs, they began to feel solicitude for my spiritual welfare. I realized that I had one duty: that until I had studied the teachings of Hinduism and found that they did not satisfy my soul, I should not renounce the faith in which I was born. I, therefore, started reading Hindu and other scriptures. I read books on Christianity and Islam. I carried on correspondence with some friends I had made in London. I placed my doubts before them. I entered into correspondence with every person in India in whom I had some trust, Raychandbhai being the chief among them.1 I had already been introduced to him and a close bond had grown between us. I had respect for him, and so I decided to get from him everything he could give. The result was that I gained peace of mind. I felt reassured that Hinduism could give me what I needed. The reader will have some idea of how much my respect for Raychandbhai must have increased because of his being responsible for this result.

1 Vide “Gandhiji’s Questions to Rajchandra and his Replies”, before 12-12-1926.

Nevertheless, I have not accepted him as my guru. I am still in search of one, and so far my feeling in regard to everyone whom I might think of as a guru has been “No, not this”. One must have the requisite qualification to come upon a perfect guru, and I cannot claim to have it.

CHAPTER 2

I was introduced to Raychandbhai in July 1891, on the very day on which, returning from England, I landed in Bombay. At this time of the year the sea is stormy. The ship, therefore, had arrived late and it was already night. I stayed with Dr. Pranjivan Mehta, Barrister, now the well-known jeweller of Rangoon. Raychandbhai was his elder brother’s son-in-law. The doctor himself introduced me to him. On the same day I was also introduced to Jhaveri Revashanker Jagjivandas, another elder brother of his. The doctor introduced Raychandbhai as “a poet”, and added, “though a poet, he is in our business. He is a man of spiritual knowledge and a shatavadhani”.

Someone suggested that I should utter a number of words in his presence, saying that no matter to what language they belonged he would repeat them in the same order in which I had uttered them. I could not believe this. I was a young man, had just returned from England, and was a little vain, too, of my knowledge of languages; in those days I was under the powerful spell of English. Having been to England made a man feel that he was heaven-born. I poured out all my store of knowledge, and first wrote out words from different languages—for how possibly could I afterwards remember them in their due order? I then read out the words. Raychandbhai repeated them slowly one after another and in the same order. I was pleased and astonished, and formed a high opinion about his memory. This was an excellent experience to break a little the binding spell of English on me.

The Poet did not know English at all. At the time I am speaking of, he was not more than twenty-five. His study in the Gujarati school was not much either. And even then he possessed such a powerful

---

1 One who can pay attention to a hundred things simultaneously memory and such knowledge, and was respected by everyone round him! I was all admiration. The power of memory is not sold in schools. Knowledge, too, can be acquired without going to school if one wants it—is keen on it—and one need not go to England or elsewhere to command respect, for virtue is always respected. I learned these truths on the very day I landed in Bombay.

The acquaintance with the poet which began on this occasion grew over the years. Other persons possess a powerful memory, and one need not be dazzled by it. Knowledge of the Shastras, too, is found in plenty in many. But such persons, if they have no real culture, can give us nothing of value. A combination of powerful memory and knowledge of the Shastras will have real worth and will benefit the world only if they exist along with genuine culture of the heart.

CHAPTER 3: VAIRAGYA

When shall I know that state supreme,
When will the knots, outer and inner, snap?
When shall I, breaking the bonds that bind us fast,
Tread the path trodden by the wise and the great?

Withdrawing the mind from all interests,
Using this body solely for self-control,
He desires nothing to serve any ulterior end of his own,
Seeing nothing in the body to bring on a trace of the darkness of ignorance.

These are the first two verses of Raychandbhai’s inspired utterance at the age of eighteen.

During the two years I remained in close contact with him, I felt in him every moment the spirit of vairagya which shines through these verses. One rare feature of his writings is that he always set down what he had felt in his own experience. There is in them no trace of unreality. I have never read any line by him which was written to produce an effect on others. He had always by his side a book on some religious subject and a note-book with blank pages. The latter he used for noting down any thoughts which occurred to him. Sometimes, it would be prose and sometimes poetry. The poem about

1 State of disinterstedness towards wordly things the”supreme state” must have been written in that manner.

Whatever he was doing at the moment, whether eating or resting or lying in bed, he was invariably disinterested towards things of the world. I never saw him being tempted by objects of pleasure or luxury in this world.

I watched his daily life respectfully, and at close quarters. He accepted whatever he was served at meals. His dress was simple, a dhoti and shirt, an angarakhu1 and a turban of mixed silk and cotton yarn. I do not remember that these garments used to be strikingly clean or carefully ironed. It was the same to him whether he squatted on the ground or had a chair to sit on. In the shop, he generally squatted on a gadi2.

He used to walk slowly, and the passer-by could see that he was absorbed in thought even while walking. There was a strange power in his eyes; they were extremely bright, and free from any sign of impatience or anxiety. They bespoke single-minded attention. The face was round, the lips thin, the nose neither pointed nor flat and the body of light build and medium size. The skin was dark. He looked an embodiment of peace. There was such sweetness in his voice that one simply wanted to go on listening to him. The face was smiling and cheerful; it shone with the light of inner joy. He had such ready command of language that I do not remember his ever pausing for a word to express his thoughts. I rarely saw him changing a word while writing a letter. And yet the reader would never feel that any thought was imperfectly expressed, or the construction of a sentence was defective or the choice of a word faulty.

These qualities can exist only in a man of self-control. A man cannot become free from attachments by making a show of being so. That state is a state of grace for the atman. Anyone who strives for it will discover that it may be won only after a ceaseless effort through many lives. One will discover, if one struggles to get rid of attachments, how difficult it is to succeed in the attempt. The Poet made me feel that this state of freedom from attachment was spontaneous to him.

The first step towards moksha is freedom from attachment. Can we ever listen with pleasure to anyone talking about moksha so long as

1 A tight-fitting coat of relatively thin cloth, fastened with laces
2 Cushion
our mind is attached to a single object in this world? If at any time we seem to do so, it is only the ear which is pleased, in the same way, that is, as we may be pleased merely by the musical tune of a song without following its meaning. It will be a long time before such indulgence of the ear results in our adopting a way of life which could lead towards moksha. Without genuine vairagya in the mind, one cannot be possessed with a yearning for moksha. The poet was possessed by such yearning.

CHAPTER 4: BUSINESS LIFE

He is a true Vanik 1 who never speaks an untruth,
He is a true Vanik who never gives short measure,
He is a true Vanik who honours his father’s word,
He is a true Vanik who returns the principal with interest.

Good sense is the Vanik’s measure, and the king’s measure his credit.
Should the Vanija 2 neglect business, suffering like a forest fire spreads far and wide.

SHAMAL BHATT

It is generally believed that the spheres of practical affairs or business and spiritual pursuits or dharma are distinct from and incompatible with each other, that it is madness to introduce dharma into business, for we should succeed in neither if we made any such attempt. If this belief is not false, there is no hope for us at all. There is not a single concern or sphere of practical affairs from where dharma can be kept out.

Raychandbhai showed through his life that, if a man is devoted to dharma, this devotion should be evident in every action of his. It is not true at all that dharma is something to be observed on the Ekadashi 3 day or during the Paryushan 4, on the Id 5 day or on a Sunday, in temples, churches or mosques, but not in the shop or the King’s court; on the contrary, Raychandbhai used to say and hold, and demonstrated through his own conduct, that such a belief amounted to ignorance of the nature of dharma.

1 A community traditionally engaged in trade and commerce
2 Same as Vanik
3 Eleventh day of the each half of the lunar month
4 A week devoted by Jains to fasting and self-purification
5 A day observed as sacred by Muslims
The business in which he was engaged was that of diamonds and pearls. He carried it on in partnership with Revashanker Jagjivan Jhaveri. He also ran a cloth shop side by side. I formed the impression that he was completely upright in his dealings. I was accidentally present sometimes when he negotiated a deal. His terms were always clear and firm. I never saw any ‘cleverness’ about them. If the other party tried it, he immediately saw through it, and would not tolerate it. On such occasions, he would even knit his brows in anger, and one could see a flash of redness in his eyes.

Raychandbhai disproved the prevalent idea that a man who is wise in the sphere of dharma will not be wise in the affairs of practical life. He displayed the utmost vigilance and intelligence in his business. He could judge the worth of diamonds and pearls with the utmost accuracy. Though he did not know English, he was quick in following the general substance of the letters and telegrams received from his agents in Paris and took no time to see through their tricks. His guesses generally turned out to be correct.

Though he displayed such vigilance and intelligence in his business, he was never impatient or felt worried about his affairs. Even when he was attending the shop, some book on a religious subject would always be lying by his side and, as soon as he had finished dealing with a customer, he would open it, or would open the notebook in which he used to note down the thoughts which occurred to him. Every day he had men like me, in search of knowledge, coming to him. He would not hesitate to discuss religious matters with them. The Poet did not follow the general, and beautiful, rule of doing business and discussing dharma each at its proper time, of attending to one thing at a time. Being a shatavadhani, he could afford to violate it. Others who might seek to emulate him would fare as a man trying to ride two horses at the same time. Even for a man who is wholly devoted to dharma and is completely free from attachments, it would be best always to concentrate on what he is engaged in at the moment; in fact that would be the right thing for him to do. That would be a sign of his being a man of yoga. Dharma requires one to act in that manner. If any work, be it business or something else, is a worthy activity, it ought to be done with single-minded attention. For a mumukshu, inward meditation on the self should be as spontaneous and continuous as breathing. He should not cease from it even for a moment. But even while meditating on the self, he should be totally absorbed in the work he was doing.
I do not mean to say that the Poet did not live in this way. I have said above that he used to display the utmost vigilance in his business. I did, however, form the impression that the Poet exacted more work from his body than he should have done. Could it possibly mean imperfection in his yoga? It is a principle of dharma that one should even lay down one’s life in discharging one’s duty. But to undertake work beyond one’s capacity and look upon it as one’s duty is a form of attachment. I have always felt that the Poet did have this highly subtle attachment in him.

It often happens that man accepts work beyond his capacity through spiritual motives and then finds it difficult to cope with it. We look upon this as virtue and admire it. But looked at from a spiritual point of view, that is, from the point of view of dharma, there is every possibility that the motive behind such work springs from a subtle form of ignorance.

If we are no more than instruments in this world, if it is true that we are given this body on hire and that our highest duty is to attain moksha through it as quickly as we may, then we must certainly give up everything which may serve as an obstacle in our path—that is the only true spiritual attitude.

Raychandbhai himself had explained to me, in a different form and in his own wonderful manner, the argument I have advanced above. How, then, did he come to take upon himself certain tasks which worried him and brought on severe illness on him?

If I am right in believing that even Raychandbhai was temporarily overcome with spiritual ignorance in the form of a desire to do good, the truth of the line “All creatures follow their nature, what then will constraint avail?” is very well illustrated in his case, and this is all that it means. There are some who use these words of Krishna to justify self-indulgence; they altogether pervert their meaning. Raychandbhai’s prakriti took him into deep waters despite himself. To undertake work in this manner may be an error, but it may be considered so only in the case of one who is nearing perfection. We, ordinary men and women, can do justice to a good cause only if we become mad after it. We shall close this argument here.

1 Bhagavad Gita, III, 33
It is also sometimes believed that religious-minded men are so simple that everyone can deceive them, that they understand nothing about worldly affairs. If this belief is true, then the two avatars, Krishnachandra and Ramachandra, should be looked upon not as incarnations but as mere ordinary men of the world. The Poet used to say that it should be impossible to deceive a person of perfect spiritual knowledge. A person may be religious-minded, that is, may be moral in his life, but may have no spiritual knowledge. What is required for moksha, however, is a happy combination of moral life and spiritual knowledge which is the result of one’s own experience. In the presence of one who has acquired such knowledge, hypocrisy and fraud cannot keep their mask for long. Untruth cannot flourish in the presence of truth. In the presence of non-violence, violence ceases. Where the light of honesty shines, the darkness of deception vanishes. The moment a man of spiritual knowledge devoted to dharma sees a deceitful man, his heart melts with compassion. How can one who has seen the self in him fail to understand another person? I cannot say that the Poet always demonstrated this truth in his life. People did occasionally cheat him in the name of religion. Such instances do not prove any flaw in the principles, but suggest how very difficult it is to acquire spiritual knowledge of absolute purity.

Despite these limitations, I have not observed in anyone else such a beautiful combination of practical ability and devotion to dharma as I did in the Poet.

CHAPTER 5: DHARMA

Before we examine Raychandbhai’s life of dharma, it is necessary to discuss the nature of dharma as explained by him.

Dharma does not mean any particular creed or dogma. Nor does it mean reading or learning by rote books known as Shastras or even believing all that they say.

Dharma is a quality of the soul and is present, visibly or invisibly, in every human being. Through it we know our duty in human life and our true relation with other souls. It is evident that we cannot do so till we have known the self in us. Hence dharma is the means by which we can know ourselves.

We may accept this means from wherever we get it, whether from India or Europe or Arabia. Anyone who has studied the scriptures of different faiths will say that the general nature of this means as expounded in them is the same. No Shastra in any religion says that we may speak untruth or follow it in practice, nor that we may commit violence. Stating the quintessence of all Shastras, Shankaracharya said: "Brahma satyam jagatmithya." The Koran-e-Sharif says the same thing in different words when it asserts that God is one and alone, and that nothing beside Him exists. The Bible says: "I and my Father are one." All these are different statements of the same truth. But imperfect human beings, expounding this one truth through their various understandings, have erected veritable prison-houses from which our minds have to escape. We, imperfect human beings, try to go forward with the help of others less imperfect than we, and imagine that beyond a certain stage there is no further way to go. In truth it is not so at all. After a certain stage is reached, the Shastras give no help; experience alone helps then. Hence sang Raychandbhai:

That he who has attained perfection of knowledge sees in his vision,
But cannot describe in words;
I have fixed my eyes on that supreme state as my goal,
But at present it is an aspiration beyond my power to realize.

Ultimately, therefore, it is the atman which wins moksha for itself.

Raychandbhai has expounded this essential truth in numerous ways in his writings. He had made a deep study of a number of books on dharma. He could follow Sanskrit and Magadhi languages without any difficulty. He had studied Vedanta, as also the Bhagavata and the Gita. As for books on Jain religion, he used to read every such book that he came across. His capacity for reading and absorbing was inexhaustible. He found one reading enough for grasping the substance of a book.

He had also read in translation the Koran and the Zend-Avesta.

He used to tell me that he was inclined towards Jain philosophy. He believed that the Jinagamas contained the perfection of spiritual knowledge. It is necessary that I should state this view of his. I look upon myself as altogether unqualified to express an opinion on it.

1 The Brahma alone is real, the world of appearance is false.
2 Probably, through a slip of memory, Gandhiji has here brought together the first two lines of stanza 20 and the first two of stanza 21.
3 Sacred books of the Jains
Raychandbhai did not, however, lack respect for other faiths. He even felt admiration for Vedanta. A vedantin would naturally take the Poet to be a vedantin. In all his discussions with me, he never told me that if I wished to attain moksha I should follow a particular dharma and no other. He advised me only to pay attention to my actions. When we discussed what books I should read, he took into consideration my personal inclination and the early family influences on me and advised me to continue the Gita which I was then reading. Other books which he suggested were Panchikaran, Maniratnamala, the chapter on Vairagya in Yogavasistha, Kavyadohan Part I, and Mokshamala composed by himself.

Raychandbhai used to say that the different faiths were like so many walled enclosures in which men and women were confined. He whose one aim in life is to attain moksha need not give exclusive devotion to a particular faith.

> Live as you will,
>
> Attain to Hari anyhow.

This was Raychandbhai’s principle too, as it was Akha’s. He was always bored by religious controversy and rarely engaged himself in it. He would study and understand the excellence of each faith and explain it to the followers of that faith. Through my correspondence with him from South Africa, too, this is the lesson which I learned from him.

My own belief is that every religion is perfect from the point of view of its followers and imperfect from that of the followers of other faiths. Examined from an independent point of view, every religion is both perfect and imperfect. Beyond a certain stage, every Shastra becomes a fetter hindering further progress; but, then, that is the stage reached by one who has transcended the gunas. If we follow Raychandbhai’s point of view, no one need give up his faith and embrace another. Everyone may, following his own faith, win his freedom, that is, moksha, for to win moksha means to be perfectly free from attachments and aversions.

---

MOHANDAS KARAMCHAND GANDHI

[From Gujarati]

Shrimad Rajchandra

---

1 Follower of Vedanta
2 A Gujarati poet of the 17th century
536. LETTER TO MOTILAL ROY

THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
November 5, 1926

DEAR MOTIBABU,

I have your usual balance-sheet for which I thank you. Our accountant here tells me that if in your next balance-sheet you will send the amount of capital investment in the khadi work and the management expenses, he will be able to appreciate the figures better.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

BABU MOTILAL ROY
PRABARTAK SANGHA
CHANDERNAGORE
(BENGAL)

From a photostat: G.N. 11031

537. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

Diwali [November 5, 1926]¹

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have not written to you for a long time. Today it is Diwali, and I am thinking of all of you. These days, because of heavy pressure of work, I observe silence for two or three hours for writing letters. There is no difficulty about writing as the hand moves quite well.

As far as you are concerned for the present my only wish is that you should get well.

I have your telegram concerning Pyarelal. I think that for a few days you will have to manage as at present. I do not know whether you can, but if it is more than a minor inconvenience write to me frankly. I sent you a telegram. I also sent one to Devdas. I have received his telegram in reply. He is willing to come. He will be coming here on the 8th and then he will go back there. He has asked my permission to go to Assam. In that case it will be a problem to decide whom I should assign to be with you. But God will show the way. I shall not leave it to you to choose a third person. I will send anyone I can spare.

¹ The addressee received the letter on November 7, 1926. Diwali was on November 5.

Pyare Ali must have met you. He is a man with a pure heart. At least to me his wife appeared to be a saintly lady.

Remind Taramati again that she has to write to me now and then. I have already written to you that I had mentioned the name Rohit by mistake. But both the names can perhaps remain? That young man is having the rare benefit of the climate there. Does Taramati go for walks? Anybody who does not go for walks in Panchgani should be considered a criminal.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

538. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI

Ashwin Vad 30, Diwali [November 5, 1926]

CHI. RAMDAS,

I have your letter. A Happy New Year to you all and may all your wishes be fulfilled. I am not aware of Diwali or any other festival. All the days are either festivals or days of gloom. If our soul is blissful, then it is festival. If the soul in pursuit of passion is sad, it is a day of gloom in spite of it being a festival. Ba is now fully recovered.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19961

539. LETTER TO HARIBHAU UPADHYAYA

SABARMATI,

Diwali, November 5, 1926

DEAR HARIBHAU,

I am returning the Tamil Veda today. I have glanced through it. It seems to me that a large part of it is of no relevance today. But it would certainly be good if a translation of such a great Tamil work was available. It would be good if somebody could write an introduction to it pointing out the merits and demerits of the work. I do not have the ability to write such an introduction. I do not have the necessary knowledge of Tamil. I cannot even say if the translation is accurate or not. I hope Martand’s health has improved.

1Vide the preceding item.

Blessings from
BAPU

From the Gujarati original: Haribhau Upadhyaya Papers. Courtesy: Nehru Memorial Museum and Library

540. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

Diwali [November 5, 1926]¹

BHAI GHANSHYAMDASJI,

I was very much pleased to have your long letter. I had heard slanderous remarks made about you. I did not believe them, but your letter has completely satisfied me. They said that you took work by giving Rs. 500² instead of a hundred. From what you have written, I have nothing to say.

As for Geneva, I must advise you to be patient. I see no great benefit in your going there. If the experience of the West is necessary, go on your own. You will have many occasions to go. But my inner self says it is not today. In the end you should do what your conscience dictates.

Yours,

MOHANDAS GANDHI

From a copy of the Hindi: C.W. 6137. Courtesy: G. D. Birla

¹ The reference to addressee’s proposed trip to Geneva suggests that the letter was written in 1926. Diwali fell on November 5 in that year.
² Perhaps a slip for Rs. 50
541. MESSAGE TO"FORWARD"

As heirs to the great legacy left by him¹, he must deserve it by our action.

Forward, 6-11-1926

542. IS THIS HUMANITY?—V²

[November 7, 1926]³

A friend writes a long letter mentioning his difficulties and pointing out what Jainism has to say to him, a shrawak, in the matter. One of his questions is:

You say that if we can neither take individual charge of roving dogs nor have a pinjrapole for them, the only alternative is to kill them. Does that mean that every roving dog should be killed, although it may not be rabid? Don’t you agree that we leave unmolested all harmful beasts, birds and reptiles, so long as they do not actually harm us? Why should the dogs be an exception? Where is the humanity of shooting innocent dogs whenever they are found roving? How can one wishing well to all living beings do this?

The writer has misunderstood my meaning. I would not suggest even the destruction of rabid dogs for the sake of it, much less that of innocent, roving dogs. Nor have I said that these latter should be killed wherever they are found. I have only suggested legislation to that effect, so that as soon as the law is made, humane people might wake up in the matter and devise measures for the better management of stray dogs. Some of these might be owned, some might be put in quarantine. The remedy, when it is taken, will be once for all. Stray dogs do not drop down from heaven. They are a sign of the idleness, indifference and ignorance of society. When they grow into a nuisance, it is due to our ignorance and want of compassion. A stray dog is bound to take to his heels if you do not feed him. The measure that I have suggested is actuated no less by a consideration of the welfare of the dogs than by that of society. It is the duty of a

¹ C. R. Das
² Originally written in Gujarati, the articles were translated into English by Mahadev Desai.
³ The articles are placed according to the dates of their publication in Nav-ajivan.
humanitarian to allow no living being aimlessly to roam about. In performance of that duty it may be his duty once in a way to kill some dogs.

Here is another question:

I agree that the dogs are sure to be killed by man whenever they become a menace to society. But you say, ‘To wait until they get rabid is not to be merciful to them.’ This means that every dog is potentially rabid and that therefore it should be killed as a matter of precaution. I met a friend from the Ashram who assured me that you did not mean this, and that you had suggested it only as a last resort when dogs had become a menace. This is not clear from your articles. Will you make it clear?

My previous articles and my answer to the first question leave nothing to be cleared. I must explain what I mean when you say that you cannot wait on until the dog gets rabid. Every stray dog is harmful. The harm is [not] confined to cities alone and it must stop. We do not wait until the serpent bites us. The rabies of the dog is concealed in its capacity to bite. A friend has sent me figures of cases of hydrophobia treated in the Civil hospital, Ahmedabad:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Period</th>
<th>Cases from the city</th>
<th>Cases from the district</th>
<th>Total</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Jan. to Dec '25</td>
<td>194</td>
<td>923</td>
<td>1,117</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jan. to Sept.'26</td>
<td>295</td>
<td>695</td>
<td>990</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

These figures must alarm everyone who is interested in the welfare of the community, especially if he is a humanitarian. I admit that all the cases may not have been of hydrophobia. But it is difficult to say whether a dog is or is not rabid, and many run in fear to the hospital, because most dogs are found to be rabid afterwards. There is only one remedy to relieve them of this fear and it is not to allow dogs to roam about.

I was in England 40 years ago when effective measures were taken to stamp out rabies. There were, of course, no stray dogs there. But even for the dogs which had regular owners, an order was passed that dogs found without collars with the name and address of the owner thereon and without muzzles would be killed. The measure was taken purely in the public interest. Practically the next day all the dogs in London were found to be with collars and muzzles. It was, therefore, necessary to kill only a very few. If anyone thinks that the people in the West are innocent of humanity, he is sadly mistaken.
The ideal of humanity in the West is perhaps lower, but their practice of it is very much more thorough than ours. We rest content with a lofty ideal and are slow or lazy in its practice. We are wrapped in deep darkness, as is evident from our paupers, cattle and other animals. They are eloquent of our irreligion rather than of religion.

Here is a third question:

You have different definitions of religion for the individual and for society. But why should not religion in both cases be the same? The ideal ought to be the same for both. That it may be impossible to carry it out is a different matter. For, even in case of the individual, only the occasion can show how far he has been able to carry out his ideal in practice. You yourself have said that your ideal is to save even a cruel animal at the risk of your life, but you could not say what you would actually do when faced by such an animal. There is no reason why society should not similarly have a lofty ideal and leave the individuals free to practise it according to their capacity.

My definition of religion for the individual and for society is the same. The ideal must always be the same, but the practice I have conceived to be different in the case of the individual and the society. Truly speaking, practice differs in case of every individual. I do not know of two men having the same extent of the practice of ahimsa, though their definition of ahimsa is the same. The extent of practice in case of society is the average of the different capacities of its members. Thus, for instance, where a section of the society is milkarian and the other fruitarian, the practice for the society extends to the use of milk and fruit.

The writer next sets out two Jain doctrines as follows:

Jainism is based on the doctrine of syadvada—manysidedness of reality. As is aptly said: ‘No absolute rule is correct; only the relative rule is the correct rule.’ Which means that an act which may be described as himsa under certain circumstances may be ahimsa under other circumstances. Man should always use his discrimination in determining his conduct. There are two classes of Jains. Sadhus (the monks) and shrawaks (the laity). Their code of conduct is thus defined: The sadhu is always non-violent. He may not eat to save himself, may not cook for himself, may not walk even a step for his own purpose—all his activity is for the welfare of the community and it should be as harmless as possible. He has to avoid the 42 infringements laid down in the Shastras. The sadhu is described as nirgrantha—free from bonds. So far as I know there is no sadhu today who can satisfy the definition of a sadhu given above.
The shrawak may not kill or injure any living being, except when it is essential for himself. He is a worldly man and he cannot take his humanity farther than this. So if 20 per cent compassion is expected of the Sadhu, 1.25 per cent is expected of the shrawak. If the latter goes beyond the measure expected of him he approaches the state of a sadhu, but as a shrawak nothing more is expected of him.

I knew the substance of this distinction. I am quite conscious that the Jain doctrine is not contrary to the opinion I have expressed in these articles. If the Jains accept the interpretation given above, the opinion expressed by me can be deduced from it. But whether they accept it or not, I humbly submit that my opinion is capable of being, and has been, independently justified.

Young India, 11-11-1926

543. ABOUT MADHADA ASHRAM

Bhai Shivji had sent to the newspapers a statement in reply to my article regarding Madhada Ashram and himself. This statement he has now sent to me for publication; but as it has already appeared in the daily newspapers, I see no need to publish it here. However, as a certain portion of it referring to his relations with me is of interest to the public, I give below my reply to it.

I was sad to read Bhai Shivji’s statement. He has adopted the proverbial method of the thief attacking the warder.

There are no differences of opinion between Bhai Shivji and myself. But I have formed a certain opinion regarding his character and his management of affairs on the basis of Shivji’s own confessions. This opinion I conveyed to the executive committee of the Kathiawar Political Conference, and I proposed, as I felt bound, to publish it in the Navajivan. But before I did so, I wrote to Bhai Shivji, so as to avoid any injustice being done to him. The question before me was whether I should or should not publish my opinion about Bhai Shivji. This cannot be described as a difference of opinion.

It was certainly I who suggested the idea of the Panch. That was for Bhai Shivji’s satisfaction and not for mine. There are no allegations against me. Being a public worker I had the duty of making an inquiry into the charges against a colleague. I started the inquiry and, as it was being made, I kept Bhai Shivji informed about it. Finally, I had a meeting with him, and in view of the confessions which he then made there remained nothing more for me to do. Bhai Shivji was found guilty on his own admission. When the case was placed before the committee of the Conference on the same day, and when it became imperative for me to publish it in the Navajivan, Bhai Shivji changed his attitude.

\(^{1}\) Vide “Madhada Ashram”, 3-10-1926.

If Bhai Shivji or any of his friends wish to know from me the details of the confessions made by Shivji, together with the details of the inquiry that I had made, then I am willing to write to them these details. Bhai Shivji and his friends are at liberty to publish my correspondence with them or with others on this matter. I do not wish to bore the readers by publishing it myself.

I must, however, say that Bhai Shivji’s behaviour in every respect, after my inquiry about him, has confirmed my opinion against him. First, I was the judge and others were the complainants. They had given money to Bhai Shivji. When my viewpoint became unacceptable to Bhai Shivji, even I was declared to be a complainant. Now Bhai Shivji, in his statement, seems to consider me at fault. But he and all those who are interested in the social workers obeying more or less the rules and regulations of morality, and who desire faultless management of public funds should know that the proposal to appoint the Panch was for the benefit of Bhai Shivji. He is still guilty in my opinion. His lapses are grave and he has confessed most of them. The panchnama1, which I could never have signed, was drawn up as far as I know, by Bhai Shivji himself. By issuing this statement Bhai Shivji has added salt to the wound and made his guilt worse.

[From Gujarati]
Navajivan, 7-11-1926

544. LETTER TO BANARASIDAS CHATURVEDI

Kartika Sud 3, 1983 [November 8, 1926]

BHAI BANARASIDASJI,

I have your letter. I like the idea of your going to S.A. but the purpose of it does not seem very justifiable to me. If you want to earn your livelihood by going there and writing for the newspapers, the

1 A written statement announcing the appointment of arbitrators

VOL. 36 : 8 JULY, 1926 - 10 NOVEMBER, 1926 485
purpose will not be served by your going to South Africa. It will be better if you write a book or take up a job in order to earn money.

Yours,

MOHANDAS GANDHI

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 2574

545. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

Kartika Sud 3, 1983 [November 8, 1926]

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I have your letter. I had completely forgotten the election affair. I see no difficulty in your doing what you think proper. I have written to everyone concerned that I can never participate in it. I would not approve of it if you have to visit many places. It would harm your health.

Ba is completely well, so there is no need to worry. Let us see what happens when I come. There must be many candidates. I intend to bring Lakshmidas with me so that he may have a change.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2876

546. TELEGRAM TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

SABARMATI,

November 10, 1926

MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI
PANCHGANI CASTLE
PANCHGANI
DEVDAS REACHING THERE THURSDAY AFTERNOON.

BAPU

From the original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar
547. LETTER TO SYED ZAHIRUL HAQ

SABARMATI,
November 10, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I thank you for your letter.\(^1\) It may flatter my pride, but I hope I have none. I am conscious of my unfitness and limitations. If there was the slightest chance of successful intervention, my seclusion would not deter me. But I see none. I therefore remain still and pray.

The spinning-wheel is not dearer to me than precious lives. I take to it as a child to its mother’s breasts, because I believe it to possess the capacity of saving millions of lives from penury and degradation. I commend it to you.

Yours sincerely,

The Hindu, 19-11-1926

548. LETTER TO C. RAJAGOPALACHARI

November 10, 1926

MY DEAR C. R.,

Your letter. The dogs are giving enough food for Navajivan. They have also increased the sale of postage stamps. And it is all to the good.\(^2\)

Chhotalal leaves for your place on 16th. So he thinks. He won’t be happy till he gets there. He is a beautiful, restless soul. Work, work, work.

I think you should come to Wardha. It is a long journey but, if you can at all spare yourself, do come. Not to go to Gauhati is a sound decision.

\(^1\) Syed Zahirul Haq of Barh, Patna, had, in an open letter dated October 25, 1926, drawn Gandhiji’s attention to the communal riots in Howrah on the occasion of Durga Puja and appealed to him to “leave your Ashram and rescue the people as a saviour of the nation from the deep ditch they are going to fall into”. The ‘open letter’ as well as Gandhiji’s reply was published in The Hindu under the caption: “Hindu-Muslim Disharmony: Mahatmaji’s Reply to Call for Intervention”. The correspondence was also published in The Searchlight, 26-11-1926.

\(^2\) The reference obviously is to the series of articles published under the title “Is This Humanity?”.
I think with you about the agricultural commission. I hope to write something next week.

Devdas was here for a day. He has gone to Panchgani to replace Pyarelal who has gone to Punjab to nurse a cousin of his.

Yours,

BAPU

From a photostat: S.N. 19728

549. LETTER TO S. G. VAZE

November 10, 1926

MY DEAR VAZE,

I have your letter. Benarsidas anticipated you and sent me a copy of your letter to him. The reason he has given me for his wishing to join [you] does not appeal to me. He has unnecessarily impoverished himself and now thinks that he will have a better career as a journalist if he goes to South Africa. I totally dissent from the view. Apart from his reason, however, his going to South Africa with you appeals to me. And if you and he think that he should go, I suggest Shastriar writing to Mrs. Naidu or J. B. Petit for the fare. I think you will get it for the asking.

You hardly need any recommendation from me when you have Andrews there. My son too is there. But here is one letter, though you do not need even that. You must have heard about him from G. It was at his villa that we stayed in Johannesburg.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

[PS.]

I am glad S. is coming. I hope to see you with him.

From a photostat: G.N. 2766

---

2 V. S. Srinivasa Sastri
3 Manilal Gandhi
4 V. S. Srinivasa Sastri came to see Gandhiji on November 21.
550. LETTER TO V. L. PHADKE

Kartika Sud 5, 1983, November 10, 1926

BHAI MAMA,

I have not been silent of purpose. I have written about that portion of your letter which called for a note. I shall start the series of articles and I shall send you the portion about Godhra before publishing it. I think there should be no objection to purchasing the Ramachandran water-lift. Some difficulties have, however, arisen in securing it. I have helped you as much as I could.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 3816

---

¹ A large-size bucket contrivance devised by Shri Ramachandran of Agriculture College, Madras, for drawing water from wells with the help of only one animal
DEAR MR. GANDHI,

I am most grateful for your letter.

My great difficulty, in which I am most anxious for your advice, is this. I am a member of the committee set up by the Independent Labour Party to determine what policy that party should pursue in regard to India. The I.L.P is a constituent part of the Labour Party and contains the great majority of its most active members. It is definitely anti-Imperialist, by contrast with a group in the Labour Party which would have the party make no distinct break with past traditions. Hitherto most of the things that the I.L.P. has urged the Labour Party to adopt, it has adopted. But the time is near when there will be a struggle between I.L.P. ideas and Imperialist ideas in the L.P. When that struggle comes a great deal will depend on whether we can prove our policy to be practicable. If for example our opponents can say “what is the use of arousing the enmity of British people in India for the sake of a policy which Indians themselves don’t want and wouldn’t act upon?”—then the people who say “let things go on as they are until Indians learn more sense” will prevail in the Labour Party. And that would mean an end to any hope of fraternal relations for many years, since Labour Governments in this country would have no reason to behave towards India differently from Conservative Governments.

For these reasons it does seem to me important that this committee should reach the right conclusions. I ask you to tell me what these conclusions should be. What should the next Labour Government do about India?

The obvious answer is that they should do as Indians themselves wish, and of course the ignorant among us are content with that answer. Those who like me know a little more, know that in no country are those who love their country in agreement about even the chief political measures and steps to be taken. And it is painfully evident that the disagreements in India are deeper and wider than usual. Does that fact make the problem—our problem in this country, I mean not yours in your country—insoluble? In answer I think we ought both to admit that in the cases of past nationalist movements success was attained only when some organized body of men had won the support of the great majority of those who were ready to make sacrifices for their country’s liberty. In Italy for example, national liberty was won only when the policy of Cavour and Garibaldi prevailed in the minds of the Italians over the policy of Mazzini. (I believe Mazzini was right and Cavour wrong but that is irrelevent.)
Foreigners were able to help the Italians to independence only because there were conspicuous people to deal with who were known to have the support, not of all Italians but of so large a proportion of them that they could speak for Italy. Nothing of that sort is apparently imaginable in India for many years. What then can the friends of India do? So far as I can see there are only two possible answers. They can arbitrarily choose some group of men in India with definite views and a programme so fully and carefully worked out that its practicability is tolerably certain, adopt that policy and hope that its adoption by Socialist opinion in Britain will result in its gradually gaining ground in India until it can be acted on. Or, they could simply frame a policy of their own, drafting a constitution which in their opinion would work and would also perhaps win support from men in India who find nothing to admire in one another’s proposals. Which of these solutions do you prefer? Or is there another, a third, outside my range of vision? The second alternative appears presumptuous, but it must be remembered that we in this country have an unprecedented experience, not only of the operation of democratic institutions but of the framing of constitutions for other countries.

There is one isolated point you raise on which I should be specially grateful for further information. You suggest that the British authorities may partly be responsible for the communal strife. I can understand that an administrative act like the partition of Bengal might aggravate it. But I cannot understand how any agent of government could possibly influence the people who actually engage in strife. The important question to ask is what a Labour Government could do to put an end to those actions of its agents in India, whatever they may be, which increase hatred between Hindu and Muslim. It obviously could not replace most of these agents by men sympathetic with Indian liberty. What less drastic steps could it take?

If you are going to be so generous with your time and energy as to answer this letter, please do not trouble to follow my arguments in detail. I have shown you whether my mind has been drawn by the facts, only because I could explain our perplexity in no other way. In your answer I beg you to think of one thing only, how you would act if your name were not Gandhi but Leys, and God had given you some responsibility for coming to decisions which conceivably may become the decisions upon which some day a British Government may act. What arguments would you use with those whose remedy is to leave alone? And just what, as precisely as possible, would you advocate if in my place? I hope the comparison between us, that suggests that in my place you might conceivably think as I do, will not vex you. If mankind is a single family, none of the differences between its members should prevent them from helping one another.

Yours sincerely,

NORMAN LEYS

From a photostat: S.N. 12168
DEAR MR. GANDHI,

Your letter gives me real hope that with your help Socialists in this country may discover what it is their duty to do in regard to India. But do not imagine that I am “called upon to lead or guide the I.L.P.” I am merely one out of about a dozen members of that party who because they have had some special experience have been asked by their fellow members to explore and discover what the duty of the whole party is. Will you allow the other members of the committee to read your letters, on condition that they must not get into print?

Your explanation of the difference between the various Indian parties and their programmes is most important. It has cleared away one mystery from my mind. Even more important is your prescription for the solution of the problem a Labour Government would have to meet in India. You would have such a government choose some one person to first of all confer with the leaders of Indian opinion and then decide on a constitution and programme which his party would impose on India. Public opinion would disapprove of a single person being given such a task. But I see no reason against its being given to a committee of three or four persons. There are of course immense difficulties in the way of your solution (which is identical with the second alternative in my last letter) but the great thing about it is that it is a real solution. The difficulties are of two sorts. One sort is inherent in British politics. Committees with us are representative. They are samples of a variety of types of mind. But a committee to draw up a constitution for India would have to be composed of men with the same mind. Important differences among its members would wreck its work. A greater difficulty would be to get the Labour Government to entrust the task to men who would disregard everything but the needs of India. The last Labour Government stultified itself by fear. It was afraid, not only of its enemies but of its own programme. I know Lord Oliver to be a true friend to India. But I feel sure he would admit now that if he had risked his all in framing even in bare outlines, a really democratic constitution, and urging it on his cabinet, he would have done the right thing. But even you cannot realize the storm it would create if the next Labour Government gave the Indian problem to be solved by men who sought a solution that would conform to two conditions and these two only, viz., that their constitution would work and that it would satisfy the bulk of Indian opinion. Unless the I.L.P. leavens the whole Labour Party very rapidly the next Labour Government will leave India to some “safe” man, and, if it expects him, either alone or with one or two others, to make a constitution, will expect one that would buy off with compromises the less rabid imperialists.

The other sort of difficulty comes from your end. You practically admit that Muslims would resist by fighting if a democratic government were set up in India. I believe that Islam and democracy are as incompatible as oil and water. Do you expect that the rest of Indians would defend their political liberty against them? Or are British troops to be called in? In either case you must admit Muslim resistance would involve a kind of war, and that would mean that the blood of many innocents would be shed.

You put forward one suggestion that you think would help to diminish Muslim antagonism, “preference in education”. Could you elaborate that idea? We have a plan in this country whereby in secondary, i.e., more advanced, schools which get grants of public money, a large number of the scholars must be poor and must be given free education. Is that the sort of thing you mean? Would you have the constitution include clauses that would compel the Provincial Governments to give a proportion of such “free places” to Muslim children, according to the number of Muslims in the population? Finally, there is insistent in my mind the dreadful question, to which I know there can be no answer, whether the inexperience of Indians will lead them to choose to represent them bad men, men who will deceive the people with flattery and others who will fill their own pockets. We even in the Labour Party have many of the former class, no doubt some of the latter class. If I were a member of a committee with the task of giving India self-government—the idea is ridiculous of course—I should feel in my bones that the whole scheme might break down. But I should also feel that the one chance of success lay in boldness, in throwing on the whole people of India more duties and more responsibility than they ask, in calling on them in effect to behave like free men. Such a scheme most I.C.S. men would I suppose refuse to work. Then would come the testing time. I feel sure-that Indians do exist to fill with efficiency the legislative, administrative and executive posts that will be vacant. But will the Indian people choose these men and not others, or rather choose enough of them to enable the machinery of government to work well enough to prevent new tyrannies arising, whether a new Akbar or a new Curzon is no matter?

_Most gratefully yours,
NORMAN LEYS_

[PS.]

It is quite impossible for me to visit India. A number of much more important people in the party have of course done as you suggest and have done all they could to discover what Indians would wish a Labour Government to do in India.

From a photos tat: S.N. 12170
DEAR MR. GANDHI,

I cannot find anything to differ from in your letter, although of course differences in histories and environments always leave their marks. I am most grateful for the time and thought you have given to my questions and shall not hesitate in future to consult you when perplexed about Indian affairs.

I have recently got to know one of your disciples, Tarini P. Sinha. He has recently been on a speaking tour among the miners who live about thirty miles from our house. Ten days ago he was arrested for something he had said. I went to him as soon as I heard of the arrest. His case has been postponed for a fortnight and he will come to our house from London on the way to the court. I have little doubt he will be discharged acquitted\(^1\). The only sentence that the police seem to have objected to was a criticism of patriotism and I have no doubt at all that he made it quite clear that what he condemned was not love of one’s own country but the hatred of or even the slighting of other countries. In fact the real reason for his arrest seems to have been the language used by a very young Englishman who had been accompanying Mr. Sinha, and was in the habit of using vulgar terms of abuse and even encouraging the miners to injure those of their number who had accepted the terms of the mine-owners. If Mr. Sinha had been an Englishman he would have declined to continue to speak from the same platform as this man unless he gave better advice. But I think this man is sorry now.

One feature of your movement that we on this side of the world also share is the idea of restricting personal expenditure to an equal part of the national income. I have been trying to do it for years, and failing most of the time. Besides personal difficulties there are those which arise from the fact that family expenses are the chief trouble—and women are always more conservative than men. Also I don’t think the idea a good one for the young, who ought to have more than an equal share. But some day I hope there will be a fraternity in this country of people who, while living outwardly in every way like those who have taken no vow, pledge themselves not to spend their money on themselves.

I think I remember Mr. Andrews saying he had sent you last year one of the copies of my book I had sent him for distribution. It is called Kenya. But if you have no copy please let me know, if you would be so good as to let me give you one. You will let me sign myself as we Socialists do.

Yours fraternally,

NORMAN LEYS

From a photo tat: S.N. 12172

\(^1\) The source has both the words.
APPENDIX IV

(AN APPEAL)

MAHATMAJI,

You will, perhaps, be surprised and even annoyed at this somewhat unusual mode of approach to one who has never denied accessibility to the humblest of his followers. Our only excuse for this method of addressing you is to be found in the present deplorable condition of our national politics, the distressing divisions and cross-divisions of parties and principles, the clash of personalities and the clang of prejudice. You are, of course, not unaware of this nor can any other Indian heart bleed as freely as yours must be bleeding at the distressful spectacle presented by the country. But what, perhaps, we venture to think, is unknown to you and what we seek with all respect to bring to your notice, by this communication addressed through the medium of the Press, is the unspoken anxiety and eagerness of millions of your countrymen who have been long waiting for a lead from you, the one Indian who is a national figure and is trusted by all the warring communities and feared as well as respected by the Government. These your countrymen are unable to voice their sentiments and make their appeal to you because they respect the self-denying ordinance you have imposed on yourself. Sir, if it be not presumptuous in your eyes that we thus constitute ourselves their spokesmen and plead with you to resume the reins that you have voluntarily surrendered, will you permit us to make this appeal, in the name of the unspeaking masses of India, in the name of those who, while you were still at the helm, followed your orders and instructions without cavil or question, in the name of those sacred principles of liberty, equality and fraternity which are being trampled under foot simply because the one man who could hold up his head and withstand the onslaught of reactionarism in these days of distress and despair is not there at his post?

Sir, our reasons for this appeal cannot be unknown to you. We have been your followers ever since you started the campaign of non-violent non-co-operation and we have not ceased to believe in the central basis of your war against the present system of government. The country, probably, was not prepared to submit to the rigorous self-discipline, the relentless self-denial that the pursuit of your great ideal necessarily involved; and so in sheer despair at the unreadiness of your countrymen and despite the unspeakable anguish to yourself, you elected rather to countermand the campaign commencing at Bardoli than to proceed further at the cost of repeated and innumerable Chauri Chauras. With your incarceration, Sir, commenced the decay of the strident sentiment of national solidarity and of the determined resolve to win national freedom. Your release and the subsequent developments of the political situation are much too well known to need recall. But the nation has watched with breathless suspense the triumph after triumph of the forces of reaction, the surrender after surrender which you seemed to be making rather than permit the country to be cast into the unfathomable pit of irremediable wrongs. There are many, however, who have never understood the sublime self-sacrifice dictating your actions ever since your unconditional release from jail and we express the sentiments of such doubters and waverers and the inarticulate but not insignificant millions as well as of ourselves when we say that the moment has come when you may, out of your infinite love for the motherland, make the greater sacrifice than all others you have made hitherto, of foregoing the vow you have imposed on yourself.

The more imperative reasons why the unquestioned leader of the Indian people should emerge at this critical juncture from his self-imposed seclusion are also not lacking. Besides the great, incalculable harm done to the soul of a country by foreign domination of the kind we are undergoing, India has today innumerable reasons to apprehend that, without a determined stand for their rights by her people, the interests of this country will be immolated on the altar of the greed of alien exploiters. You will, we hope, pardon our pointing out the lesson of the recent happenings in the Legislative Assembly. Because the Swarajists were absent, as a measure of their conjoint protest against the unruffled irresponsiveness of the bureaucracy, the Government dared to hasten with a Bill of prime importance to the material interests of the country, but the Swarajists, recognizing the immense importance of the Currency legislation, checkmated them by returning to the Assembly on the fateful day. There are, however, countless directions in which the bureaucracy can and will do material harm to the interests of this country, in the absence of any check or control from the representatives of the people. And if the latter are threatened with wholesale disintegration, as it seems too painfully evident by the recent attempts at Party-mongering by every self-styled leader and spokesman, there is a danger that, in the next Assembly and Councils, the anti-Nationalist majority will be overwhelming. The tragedy of the situation, however, is that such a majority will, as a matter of fact, reflect only a very small minority of the people of India. For we are convinced that the country is, even now, nationalist to the core. It only needs a leader who thinks their thoughts, hopes their hopes, feels their wrongs and fights their battle, without a thought for self. Sir, such a leader is rare; but India is fortunate in having at least one such citizen, to wit, yourself. Sir, we beg you in the name of your country, and for the reason not only of the wrongs it has already suffered but of those other countless wrongs it will be made to suffer, to forgo your vow of retirement, to abandon your resolve of self-effacement, to listen to the call of your country and resume the helm that none can hold like you. We are not making this prayer in the blind faith and the unreasoning feeling that somehow good will come of all the ills that oppress the world. We know the chaos into which the country has fallen, but we think if you, Sir, will respond to this call, both men and material will be found in abundance once more to wage the war of our country's liberation.

We have no desire to be invidious or personal. We have no intention to criticize, to praise or censure individuals for this or that act in your absence or during your retirement. We think the country has had enough of recriminations, and is ready to let bygones be bygones. But to achieve that, also, we need a real leader by right of his divine gifts of leadership that no amount of newspaper advertisement or platform assertion will infuse in any man, if he be lacking in the same by nature. And, if you respond to this call, if you seek the modus operandi and a word by way of suggestion,—mere suggestion—is not unwelcome to you, may we mention that as the first act of your resumed authority, you should yourself call a fully representative conference,—representative not of individuals but of all the principles or interests that tear this country into hostile camps? In such a conference there will be room enough for Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya as well as Sir Abdur Rahim, Mr. Jayakar as well as Mr. Patel. Agitation has, we know, been set afoot of late to call a special session of our National Congress. We submit, most respectfully, that such session is as inexpedient as it would be unfruitful. For the Congress is necessarily bound by its constitution and rules of procedure that will not permit that unrestricted interchange of sentiments and views which seems to us to be the only way for clearing up the mass of misunderstanding and prejudice lying at the root of inter-communal quarrels. We are not unmindful of the fact that you, too, if you undertake to call a really representative conference of the kind we have ventured to suggest, will not be altogether exempt from a liability to censure. But your motives are above suspicion; your action is bound to be national in the highest sense of the term; and, at the very worst, it is a chance of personal misunderstanding or misrepresentation, which, we feel, a man of your grandeur can afford to run, and must run, in view of the great interests at stake. We have placed before you the country’s unexpressed wish, and we leave it now to you to act as it seems best to you, without, we trust, doubting, that we remain, as ever, your most respectful and dutiful followers.

(DR.) SYED MAHMUD          CHANDULAL DESAI
(DURBAR) GOPALDAS A. DESAI            SRINIVAS V. KAULALGI
(DR.) SAIFUDDIN KITCHLEW             SYED ABDULLAH BRELEVI
BURJORJI FRAMJI BHARUCHA             JAIUKHALAL K. MEHTA
LAKSHMIDAS ROWJI TAIREE              R. K. SIDHVA
NAVROJI H. BELGAMWALA                SORAB P. KAPADIA

The Bombay Chronicle, 6-9-1926

APPENDIX V

EXTRACTS FROM BHAVANI DAYAL’S LETTER

September 9, 1926

MY DEAR MAHATMAJI,

I am writing a book called Fourteen Years in South Africa which will contain a summary of my experiences there. I therefore take the liberty of addressing to you the following questions:

1. When the Indian Location near Johannesburg was transferred to the

1 M. R. Jayakar
2 Vithalbhai Patel

VOL. 36 : 8 JULY, 1926 - 10 NOVEMBER, 1926 497
municipality, had you on behalf of the Indians consented to the transfer?

2. After the Location had been taken away, is it true that the municipality offered an alternative site to the Indians and that you advised the community not to accept it? If so, could you give your reasons?

3. Is it true that in connection with the Location you received £1,600/- from the municipality? And did you also receive anything from the Indians?

4. Was not the British Indian Association organized in place of the Transvaal Indian Association then existing in Johannesburg?

5. If giving finger-prints under compulsion was improper how was it proper to give them voluntarily? I feel somewhat baffled. Is there provision anywhere else in the world to take finger-prints except from prisoners?

6. If the Government wanted to stop unauthorized immigrants, couldn’t this have been done with the help of photographs, which is the means used for identification all the world over?

7. About vested rights you once said: “By vested rights I understand the right of an Indian and his successors to live and trade in the township in which he was living and trading no matter how often he shifts his residence or business from place to place in the same township.” Does this not imply that a trader or his successor who has the right to trade in a certain township retains that right even if he frequently goes on changing premises? Does not this also mean that save those actually engaged in trade or their successors “no other or no new” Indians would have any trading rights? So far as I understand by “protection of vested rights” you had meant “protection of the existing rights”. Would you clarify?

8. I have just finished reading your Satyagraha in South Africa. In the preface of the book while there is a mention of Rajendra Babu’s Satyagraha in Champaran there is not a word about [my] History of the South African Satyagraha. If my work was incomprehensive or unauthentic a line from you could have stopped its sale. And if the events described in it are authentic, then why has it been ignored? . . .

From a photostat of the Hindi: S.N. 10990

APPENDIX VI

LETTER FROM BENARSIDAS CHATURVEDI

FEROZABAD, AGRA,

SIR,

There are certain statements in your article “Out of the Frying-pan” published in the Young Indiá of 9th Sept. which require explanation at your hands. You have quoted a passage from the report of Mr. S. A. Waiz to the I.I.C. Association which asserts that there were two ‘chief reasons’ which led the Colonial Indians to leave their land of birth: (1) The desire to visit the motherland and (2) The rumour that India had obtained self-government. Now as one who has been in close touch with many of these returned emigrants for the last six years and who has visited their quarters not less than twenty times during this period, I can say that the second reason is pure fiction. When I was entrusted with the work of looking after these emigrants by Mr. Andrews and yourself, one or two persons brought forward the same reason before me and I made a thorough enquiry into it and found it absolutely without any foundation. Evidently Mr. Waiz has been misled by some of the clever people in Matiaburz.

Referring to the difficulties of these returned emigrants in India you say, “Here they are social lepers, not even knowing the language of the people.” First of all I must say that most of them do know the language of the people. Surely they can express their ideas though not in grammatically correct Hindustani, I have myself talked with hundreds of these people in Matiaburz in Hindi and during my several visits to Matiaburz I did not come across a single Indian whom your phrase “not even knowing the language of the people” could apply. I can definitely say that most of them have fair knowledge of speaking Hindustani. Of course they do not know literary Hindi or Urdu.

Then there is one thing more that must not be forgotten, i.e., more than eighty per cent of the returned emigrants get absorbed in the villages of India and it is only less than twenty per cent who find their way to Matiaburz, and these people in Matiaburz have been offered opportunities for settlement many a time but they have all along refused to consider them. There can be no doubt that a good many of those who are at present stranded in Matiaburz suffered at the hands of their caste people, the zamindars and the police and the pandits, but as I have said they form only a small percentage of the total number of the returned emigrants. Thus your statement requires qualification.

You approve the policy of sending these returned emigrants to the “most suitable colony that would receive them”. At present only British Guiana is ready to receive them and the Government of India is willing to send some of them to that Colony. Indeed there is a steamer waiting at Calcutta for some days past. It sails on 20th. Do you approve of the idea of Fiji Indians being sent to British Guiana? I ask this question because I am afraid that the Indian Government may take advantage of this statement of yours and despatch these Fiji Indians to British Guiana. At present the number of British Guiana returned emigrants in Matiaburz does not exceed 300, while the number of Fiji-returned is more than 600. I made an enquiry in Matiaburz 10 months ago and published my conclusions in the Chand of Allahabad. Extracts from this article of mine were read by a member of the Fiji Legislative Council in a meeting of the Council and he moved a resolution that 500 of these Fiji people should be taken to Fiji. The resolution was passed and was taken as a unanimous expression of opinion of the elected members of the Council. Now the Governor of Fiji has written to the Secretary of State for the Colonies on this subject. So there is just a possibility of Fiji-returned emigrants being sent back to Fiji.

You have mentioned four fundamental questions raised by this problem of stranded emigrants in Matiaburz: (I) emigration policy, (2) special case of British Guiana and Fiji, (3) scope of the friendly societies and (4) the duty of the nation. You say that immediate relief should be given to the stranded emigrants in Calcutta. Now so far as the question of British Guiana returned emigrants being sent to that Colony is concerned, I entirely agree with you but I will not advise the Fiji Indians to be sent to British Guiana which has a climate very much worse than that of Fiji, which possesses an ideal climate. Indeed the four fundamental questions raised by you are inter-related and they require immediate attention. It is clear from the letter of the Government of India that they intend to recruit 500 families for British Guiana. Besides this thousands of Indians return from the Colonies every year and there is no doubt that the Matiaburz problem is not a temporary one, it will be recurring again and again for a long time to come. We must also remember that many of the Colonial Governments have been playing one mischief, i.e., they are sending their papers to India. After having given the best portion of their lives to the Colonies these unfortunate people return to their motherland complete moral and physical wrecks and these will never make good Colonists. We know a large number of these people were sent to Mauritius more than two years ago and most of them returned to India at the cost of the Mauritius Government! In our anxiety to give these people immediate relief we must not neglect this aspect of the question, i.e., how many of them will make good Colonists. Our duty does not finish simply in despatching these people in haste to any Colony.

The whole question requires a thorough discussion among those who are interested in it and who can do something for these people. When we have done so and arrived at some conclusions then will come the time to require the Government to do its duty. The discussion suggested by me will have to be preceded by a thorough enquiry about the condition of returned emigrants in the districts from which they go to Matiaburz.

Yours etc.,

BENARSIDAS CHATURVEDI

Young India 23-9-1926

APPENDIX VII

GANDHIJI’S QUESTIONS TO RAJCHANDRA AND HIS REPLIES

1. Q. What is the Soul? Does it perform actions? Do past actions impede its progress or not?

A. (1) As there are physical objects like a pot, piece of cloth, etc., so there is an entity called the atman whose essence is knowledge. The former are impermanent. They cannot exist through all time in the same form. The atman is an imperishable entity which exists eternally in the same form. Anything which is not the product of a combination of other elements is imperishable. We cannot think of the atman as being such a product, for, no matter in how many thousand different ways we combine material substances, such combinations cannot possibly produce life and consciousness. Every one of us can know from experience that by combining several elements we cannot produce in the compound a property which is not present in any of those elements. We do not find knowledge to be the essence of physical substances. If we change the forms of such substances and combine them, or if they change and combine by chance, the products will be of the same kind as they are; that is, they will be of a material nature and will not have knowledge as their essence. It is not possible, then, that the atman, which the seers describe as having knowledge as its essential character, can be produced by any combination of the elements (earth, water, air, space) of which physical substances like a pot, a piece of cloth, etc., are composed. The atman has knowledge as its essential character, whereas material substances are characterized by its absence. These are the eternal natures of the two.

1 The translation of the questions is reproduced from The letter accompanying Rajchandra’s replies is dated Bombay, Saturday, Aso Vad 6, 1950 [October 20, 1894].

This and a thousand other reasons prove the atman to be imperishable. Further reflection on the subject enables us to realize that the atman from its nature is imperishable. There is, therefore, no error or logical difficulty in believing that the atman, the existence of which is the cause of our experiencing happiness and suffering which also withdraws itself from either, and which is conscious of something which thinks and impels, is characterized by awareness as its essential nature and that, in virtue of this nature, it is an imperishable entity which exists eternally; on the contrary, belief in the atman has this merit of accepting truth.

(2) When the atman has attained a state of knowledge, the state resulting from a true understanding of its essence, it is the karta of that state, the state of illumination (determination of what it truly is) and of the resulting state of pure awareness, which is its true nature. In a state of ignorance, it is the karta of the emotions of anger, love of honour, attachment, greed, etc., and when enjoying the fruits of these emotions, becomes, as the occasion may require, the karta of physical objects like a pot, a piece of cloth etc., that is, he is not the creator of the original substance of those objects, but is only the karta of the action of imposing some form on it. This latter state is described in Jainism as karma, and in Vedanta as illusion or in other similar terms. If we reflect carefully on the matter, we shall clearly see that the atman cannot be the karta of physical objects or emotions like anger, that it is karta only of the state of self-realization.

(3) The karmas performed while in the state of ignorance are like seed in the beginning and grow into a tree in course of time; in other words, the atman has to suffer the consequences of those karmas. Just as contact with fire produces the experience of heat, the natural end of which is pain, so the atman, being the karta of emotions of anger, etc., has to suffer, as consequence, pain in the form of birth, old age and death. You should carefully reflect over this idea and ask me any question which may arise in your mind about it, for an understanding of the state from which the soul must withdraw itself and the effort to withdraw will bring deliverance to it.

---

1 Author, doer

2. Q. What is God? Is He the creator of the universe?

A. (1) You, I and others are souls suffering the bondage of karma. The soul's existence in its natural state, that is, in freedom from karma and purely as the atman that it is, is the state of being Ishvar. That which has the aishwarya of knowledge, etc., may be described as Ishvar. This Ishvarhood is the natural state of the atman, which is not revealed when it is engaged in karmas. When the atman however, realizes that being engaged in karma is not its real nature and fixes its attention on itself, then alone do omniscience, power etc., manifest themselves in it and we can see nothing among all the objects in the universe with greater power than the atman's. It is, therefore, my positive belief that Ishvar is another name for atman and does not signify a different Being of greater power.

(2) Ishvar is not the creator of the universe, that is, atoms, space, etc., can be conceived only as imperishable entities and not as created from some other substance. If it is stated that they came into being from Ishvar, that, too, does not seem likely; for, if we believe that Ishvar is a spirit, how can atoms, space, etc., come into being from Him? For it is impossible that matter can come into existence from that which is spirit. If Ishvar is regarded as material, He will then lose His Ishvarhood; also, a spiritual entity like the soul cannot come into being from such an Ishvar. If we regard Him as being both matter and spirit, that only means that we are pleased to call the world, which is both matter and spirit, by another name, Ishvar. Instead of doing that, it is better to call the world the world: If we hold that atoms, space, etc., are imperishable entities and that Ishvar only awards the fruits of karma, this too, cannot be proved. Convincing reasons have been given in support of this view in Shatdarshan Samuchchaya.

3. Q. What is moksha?

A. While the atmanis in the state of ignorance, characterized by anger, etc., it is under the bondage of the body, and complete cessation of such a state, deliverance from it, is described by seers as moksha. A little reflection shows this to be logical and convincing.

4. Q. Is it possible for a person to know for certain, while he is still living, whether or not he will attain moksha.

A. If our arms are tied with a rope wound several times round them and if the twists of the rope are loosened one after another, we feel the loosening of each twist

1 Ruler, God
2 Power
3 A philosophical treatise; Rajchandra had earlier sent a copy of it to Gandhiji.
and in the end become conscious of the rope having been removed. In like manner as the innumerable bonds, the products of ignorance, which bind the atman loosen one by one, the latter becomes conscious of progressing towards moksha, and when the bonds are about to fall off, the atman shines forth with the light of its essence and knows beyond doubt that it is about to be delivered from the bonds of ignorance. While still dwelling in this body, it comes out of the state of ignorance, etc., and becomes conscious of its pure essence and of its absolute otherness and freedom from all relations. In other words, it is possible to experience the state of moksha even while living.

5. q. It is said that after his death, a man may, according to his actions, be reborn as an animal, a tree or even a stone. Is this a fact?

A. After the soul has left the body, it attains a state according to the merit it has earned through its actions; hence, it may be born even as a lower creature, or may have even to assume a body of earth and, devoid of the other four senses suffer the fruits of its karma [through the sense of touch alone]. This does not mean, however, that it becomes pure stone or earth. The soul assumes a body of stone, but, even then, it exists as soul, though its existence is not manifest to us. Since in that condition the other four senses are unmanifest, the soul may be described as having an earth-body. In the course of time, the soul leaves such a body after it has enjoyed the fruits of its karmas and then the stone material exists merely as atoms and, because the soul has left it, does not possess the instinct of food, etc. In other words, the idea is not that stone itself, which is pure matter, becomes a soul. It is in order to enjoy the fruits of those karmas which, because of their hard nature, compels the soul to take on a body possessing only one sense, the sense of touch the other senses remaining unmanifest, that it is born in an earth-body; it does not, however, become pure earth or stone. The body is like a garment to the soul, and is not its essence.

[6. & 7.] The answer to Q. 6 is contained in the reply given above as also the answer to Q. 7 which is that earth or stone as such cannot be the kartas of any karma. It is the soul which has entered them and lives in them that is the karta of karmas, and even so, the relation between the two is like milk and water. Just as, even when they are mixed, milk is milk and water is water, so also the soul through the binding effect of its karmas which confines it to the possession of one sense only, seems to have become stone or mere matter, but, in its essential nature, it is a soul and even in that state it possesses the instincts of hunger, fear etc., though they remain unmanifest.

8. q. What is Arya Dharma? Do all Indian religions originate from the Vedas?

A. (1) In defining Arya Dharma, everyone has his own religion in view.
Commonly a Jain describes Jainism, a Buddhist describes Buddhism and a Vedantin describes Vedanta as Arya Dharma. But seers describe only that Arya—noble—path as Arya Dharma which enables the soul to realize its true nature, and rightly so.

(2) It is impossible that all religions had their origin in the Vedas. I know from experience that great souls like the [Jain] Tirthankars have revealed knowledge of a thousand times deeper import than what the Vedas contain. I, therefore, believe that, since something imperfect cannot be the origin of a perfect thing, we are not justified in asserting that all religions had originated from the Vedas. We may believe that Vaishnavism and other sects had their origin in the Vedas. It seems that the latter existed before the time of the Buddha and Mahavira, the last teacher of Jainism; it also seems likely that they are really ancient works. But we cannot say that only that which is ancient is true or perfect, nor that what came later is necessarily untrue or imperfect. Apart from this, the ideas propounded in the Vedas and in Jain doctrines have existed from the beginning of time; only the outward forms changed. There is no totally new creation or absolute destruction. Since we may believe that the ideas propounded by the Vedas and in the doctrines of Jainism and other religions have existed from the beginning of time, where is the room for controversy? All the same, it is only right that you and I and others should reflect and consider which of these systems of ideas has more power—truth—in them.

9. Q. Who composed the Vedas? Are they anadi? If so, what does anadi mean?
   A. (1) The Vedas were probably composed a long time ago.
   (2) No scripture, considered as a book, is anadi; but with respect to the ideas propounded in them, all scriptures are anadi, for there have been souls at all times who taught them in one form or another. It cannot be otherwise. The emotions of anger, etc., are anadi and so are those of forgiveness, etc. The way of violence, too, is anadi, as is the path of non-violence. What we should consider is which of these conduce to the welfate of the soul?Both classes of things are anadi, though sometimes the one and sometimes the other may be predominant.

10. Q. Who is the author of the Gita? Is God its author? Is there any evidence that He is?
   A. (1) The replies given above partly answer this question; if by God we mean a person who has attained illumination—perfect illuminations—then we can say that the Gita was composed by God. If, however, we accept God as being all-pervading, like the sky, eternally existing and passive, the Gita or any other book cannot have been composed by Him. For, writing a book is an ordinary activity undertaken at a particular point in time and is not anadi.

1 Self-realized men whose teachings evolved into Jainism
2 Without a beginning
(2) The Gita is believed to be the work of Veda Vyasa and, since Lord Krishna had propounded this teaching to Arjuna, He is said to be its real author. This may be true. The work is indeed great. The ideas it propounds have been taught from time immemorial, but it is not possible that these same verses have existed from the beginning of time. Nor is it likely that they were composed by God Who does nothing. They can have been composed only by an embodied soul, who acts. There is no harm, therefore, in saying that a perfectly illuminated person is God, and that a Shastra taught by him is one revealed by God.

11. Q. Does any merit accrue from the sacrifice of animals or other things?
   A. It is always sinful to kill an animal to give it as an offering in sacrifice or injure it in any way, even if this is done for the purpose of a sacrifice or living in the very abode of God. The practice of giving gifts at the time of a sacrifice does earn some merit, but since this is accompanied with violence it, too, deserves no commendation.

12. Q. If a claim is put forward that a particular religion is the best, may we not ask the claimant for proof?
   A. If no proof is required and if any such claim is made without proof in its support, reason and unreason, dharma and adharma, everything will have to be accepted as “the best”. Only the test of proof can show what is the best and what is not. That religion alone is the best and is truly strong, which is most helpful in destroying the bondage of worldly life and can establish us in the state which is our essence.

13. Q. Do you know anything about Christianity? If so, what do you think of it?
   A. I know something in general about Christianity. Even a little study of the subject will show that no other country has gone so deep as India and discovered a religious path which can rival the one discovered by the great seers of India. Among the other religions, Christianity asserts the eternal subjection of the soul, even in the state of moksha. It does not give a true description of the anadi state of the soul, of the law of karma or of the cessation of karma, and I am not likely, therefore, to accept the view that it is the best religion. It does not seem to offer a satisfactory solution of the problems which I have mentioned. I am not making this statement in a sectarian spirit. If you wish to ask more questions on this, you may, and then it will be possible for me to resolve your doubts still further.

14. Q. The Christians hold that the Bible is divinely inspired and that Christ was an incarnation of God, being his son. Was He?
   A. This is a matter of faith and cannot be proved rationally. What I said above concerning the claim that the Gita and the Vedas are divinely inspired may be applied to the Bible too. It is impossible that God, who is free from birth and death will incarnate Himself as a human being; for it is the changes of attachment, aversion, etc., which are the cause of birth and it does not appeal to reason that God, who has no attachment and aversion, will take birth as a human being. The idea that Jesus is, and was, the son of God may perhaps be acceptable if we interpret the belief as an allegory; otherwise, tested by the canons of reason, it is difficult to accept. How can we say that God, Who is free, has or had a son? If we assert that He has or had one, what was the manner of the son’s birth? If we believe that both God and His son are anadi, how can we explain their being father and son? These and other objections deserve examination. If we reflect over them, I think the belief will not be found acceptable.

15. Q. Were all the Old Testament prophecies fulfilled in Christ?
   A. Even if they were, that should only make us think about the two scriptures. Nor is the act of the prophecies having been fulfilled a sufficiently strong reason to justify us in asserting that Jesus was an incarnation of God, for the birth of a great soul can also be predicted with the help of astrology. Even if, however, someone foretold the event by virtue of his knowledge, unless it is established that that person had perfect knowledge of the path to moksha, the fact of his having predicted a future event appeals only to faith as proof of a thing and we cannot believe that no reasoning on the opposite side can diminish its force.

16. Q. Were all the Old Testament prophecies fulfilled in Christ?
   A. Even if they were, that should only make us think about the two scriptures. Nor is the act of the prophecies having been fulfilled a sufficiently strong reason to justify us in asserting that Jesus was an incarnation of God, for the birth of a great soul can also be predicted with the help of astrology. Even if, however, someone foretold the event by virtue of his knowledge, unless it is established that that person had perfect knowledge of the path to moksha, the fact of his having predicted a future event appeals only to faith as proof of a thing and we cannot believe that no reasoning on the opposite side can diminish its force.

17. Q. Can anyone remember his past lives or have an idea of his future lives?
   A. This is quite possible. One whose knowledge has become pure may be able to do so. We can infer the possibility of rain from certain signs in the clouds; similarly, from the actions of a soul in this life, we can understand, perhaps partially, their causes in its previous existence. We can also judge from the nature of the actions what results they are likely to have. On further reflection, we can also know what kind of a future existence the soul is likely to have or what kind of a past existence it had.

18. Q. If yes, who can?
   A. The answer to this is contained in the reply above.

19. Q. You have given the names of some who have attained moksha. What is the authority for this statement?
   A. If you have addressed this question personally to me, I may say in reply that

---

1 This is omitted in the translation of the questions in.
one can to some extent infer from one's own experience how a person whose involvement in earthly existence is about to end is likely to speak or act, and on the basis of this one can assert whether or not such a person attained moksha. In most cases, we can also get from Shastras reasons in support of our conclusion.

20. Q. What makes you say that even Buddha did not attain moksha?
   A. On the basis of the teachings of Buddhist scriptures. If his views were the same as these, then they seem to have been inconsistent with one another, and that is not a mark of perfect illumination. If a person has not attained perfect illumination his attachments and aversions are not likely to disappear so long as he is in such a state; earthly existence is a necessary consequence. One cannot, therefore, claim such a person to have attained absolute moksha. Moreover, it is impossible for you and me to know from independent sources that the Buddha’s views were different from those contained in the teachings attributed to him. Even so, if it is asserted that his views were in fact different and proof given in support of the assertion, there is no reason why we should not accept that as possible.

21. Q. What will finally happen to this world?
   A. It does not seem rationally possible to me that all souls will attain absolute moksha or that the world will perish completely. It is likely to continue to exist for ever in the same state as at present. Some aspect of it may undergo transformation and almost disappear, and another may grow; such is the nature of the world that, if there is growth in one sphere, there is decline in another. Having regard to this fact, and after deep reflection, it seems impossible to me that this world will perish completely. By “world” we do not mean this earth only.

22. Q. Will the world be morally better off in the future?
   A. It would not be proper to encourage any soul which loves immorality to take wrong advantage of the answer to this question. All modes in this world, including morality and immorality, have existed from the beginning of time. But it is possible for you and me to eschew immorality and accept morality, and it is the duty of the atman to do that. It is not possible to assert that immorality will be given up by all and morality will prevail, for such an extreme state cannot come about.

23. Q. Is there anything like total destruction of the world?
   A. If by pralaya is meant total destruction, that is not possible, for complete destruction of all that exists is impossible. If by pralaya is meant the merging of everything in God, the belief is accepted in some doctrines but that does not seem possible to me. For, how can all objects and all souls arrive in an identical state so that such a thing may happen? If they ever do, then diversity cannot develop again. If we accept the possibility of pralaya on the supposition of unmanifest diversity in the souls and manifest sameness, how can diversity exist except through connection with a body? If we believe that such connection exists [in the state of pralaya], we shall have to believe further that all souls will have one sense only and in doing so we shall reject, without reason, the possibility of other modes of existence. In other words, we shall have to suppose that a soul which had attained a higher state and was about to be free for ever from the contingency of existence with one sense only had none the less to be in such a state. This and many similar doubts arise. A pralaya involving all souls is impossible.

24. Q. Can an illiterate person attain moksha through bhakti alone?

A. Bhakti is a cause of knowledge and knowledge of moksha. If by an illiterate person we mean one without knowledge of letters, it is not impossible that he may cultivate bhakti. Every soul has knowledge as its essence. The power of bhakti purifies knowledge, and pure knowledge becomes the cause of moksha. I do not believe that, without the manifestation of perfect knowledge, absolute moksha is possible. Nor need I point out that knowledge of letters is contained in perfect [spiritual] knowledge. It cannot be true that knowledge of letters is a cause of moksha and that, without it, self-realization is not possible.

25. Q. Rama and Krishna are described as incarnations of God. What does that mean? Were they God Himself or only a part of Him? Can we attain salvation through faith in them?

A. (1) I, too, am convinced that both were souls of great holiness. Each of them, being an atman, was God. If it is a fact that all the coverings over their atman had fallen off, there need be no dispute about their having attained absolute moksha. I do not think that any soul can be a portion of God, for I can think of a thousand reasons against such a belief. If we believe a soul to be a portion of God, the belief in bondage and moksha will have no meaning. For then God Himself will be the cause of ignorance, etc., and if that is true, He ceases to be God. In other words, in being regarded as Lord of the soul God actually loses something from His status. Moreover, if we believe that the soul is a portion of God, what motive will a person have to strive for anything? For in that case the soul cannot be regarded as the karta of any thing. In view of this and other objections, I am not prepared to believe any soul to be a portion of God; how, then, can I believe that such was the case with great and holy souls like Rama and Krishna? There is no error in believing that these two were unmanifest God, but it is doubtful whether perfect Godhood had become manifest in them.

(2) The question whether we can attain moksha through faith in them can be easily answered. Moksha means absence of or deliverance from all forms of attachment, ignorance, etc. It can be attained when we cultivate faith in a person whose teaching will enable us to win such freedom from attachment and ignorance, and, reflecting on our true essence, come to have the same faith in our atman that we have in the teacher and identify ourselves with his personality. Worship of any kind other than this cannot win absolute moksha. It may help one to win the means of moksha, but even that cannot be asserted with certainty.
26. Q. Who were Brahma, Vishnu and Siva?

A. If people believed in three gunas as the cause of creation and personified them [as Brahma, Vishnu and Siva], this or similar explanations may make the belief plausible. But I am not particularly disposed to believe that they are what the Puranas describe them to be, for some of the descriptions appear to be allegories intended for religious instruction. Even so, I think it would be better that we, too, try to profit from the instruction they contain rather than attempt in vain to ascertain the principles embodied in the personification of Brahma, and so on.

27. Q. If a snake is about to bite me, should I allow myself to be bitten or should I kill it, supposing that that is the only way in which I can save myself?

A. One hesitates to advise you that you should let the snake bite you. Nevertheless, how can it be right for you, if you have realized that the body is perishable, to kill, for protecting a body which has no real value to you, a creature which clings to it with love? For anyone who desires his spiritual welfare, the best course is to let his body perish in such circumstances. But how should a person who does not desire spiritual welfare behave? My only reply to such a question is, how can I advise such a person that he should pass through hell and similar worlds, that is, that he should kill the snake? If the person lacks the culture of Aryan character, one may advise him to kill the snake, but we should wish that neither you nor I will even dream of being such a person.

[From Gujarati]

Shrimad Rajchandra

---

1 Modes of cosmic energy
1. PROSTITUTION OF IDEALS

I extract the following from a letter on the remarriage of child widows:

In your reply to B., Agra, in the Young India of September 23, you say that child widows should be remarried by their parents. How can this be done by those parents who perform kanyadan, i.e., who give their daughters in marriage according to Shastric injunctions? Surely, it is impossible for parents who have most solemnly and by religious rites renounced all claims on their daughter in favour of their son-in-law to give her in marriage after his death to another person. She may of her own accord remarry if she will, but since she was given by her parents as a gift or donation (dan) to her husband, no one in the world after the death of her husband has any right to give her in marriage. And for the same reason she herself does not possess any right to remarry. She would, therefore, be faithless and a traitress to her dead husband if she remarried without his express consent given at the time of his death. From a logical point of view, it is thus impossible for a widow—be she child, young or old—who was married according to kanyadan system, which is prevalent amongst most sanatanis, to remarry unless her husband had given her permission to do so. A true sanatani husband cannot, however, brook the idea of giving such permission. He will rather fain agree to his wife’s becoming sati, if she can or, at any rate, will like her to spend the rest of her life in devotion to his memory or, which is the same thing, in devotion to God. In this he will solely be actuated by the desire or sense of duty to help the preservation of the high ideals of Hindu marriage and widowhood, which are complementary to and not independent of each other.

I regard this kind of argument as prostitution of a high ideal. No doubt the correspondent means well, but his over-anxiety about purity of woman makes him lose sight of elementary justice. What is kanyadan in the case of little children? Has a father any rights of property over his children? He is their protector, not owner. And he forfeits the privilege of protection when he abuses it by seeking to barter away the liberty of his ward. Again, how can a donation be made to a child who is incapable of receiving a gift? There is no gift where the capacity to receive is lacking. Surely kanyadan is a mystic, religious rite with a spiritual significance. To use such terms in their literal sense is an abuse of language and religion. One may as well take literally the mystic language of the Puranas and believe in the earth being a flat dish sustained on the hood of a thousand-headed snake and Divinity lying in soft ease on an ocean of milk for his bed.

---

1 Vide “Notes”, 23-9-1926.

The least that a parent, who has so abused his trust as to give in marriage an infant to an old man in his dotage or to a boy hardly out of his teens, can do is to purge himself of his sin by remarrying the daughter when she becomes widowed. As I have said in a previous note¹, such marriages should be declared null and void from the beginning.

Young India, 11-11-1926

2. HANDLOOM v. SPINNING-WHEEL

It seems now to be generally recognized that India, having more than 71 per cent of her population as agriculturists most of whom are idle for nearly six months in the year, needs a supplementary industry and that that industry to be universal can only be hand-spinning. But some contend that hand-weaving is better because it is more remunerative and, therefore, a better proposition.

Now let us understand this argument in some detail. It is said that hand-weaving gives about eight annas per day as against one anna from hand-spinning. Therefore, if a person works for only two hours per day, he will earn from hand-weaving two annas against one pice in the same time from hand-spinning. It is added that one pice would be no economic attraction to anybody and that, if hand-weaving could be presented to the people, it would be wrong to ask them to do hand-spinning instead. The protagonists of the handloom contend further that there is no difficulty about getting as much mill-spun yarn as may be required for India’s needs, and, finally, they say that even for the sake of keeping alive hand-weaving, which has hitherto defied the competition of weaving-mills, it should be pushed with vigour and determination. Some of the protagonists of hand-weaving even go so far as to say that the hand-spinning movement is mischievous in that it turns people’s attention away from the possible industry of hand-weaving and misleads them into supporting an impossible industry which has died of its own inherent weakness.

Let us test this specious-looking argument.

In the first instance, hand-weaving is not a practicable proposition as a supplementary industry, because it is not easy to teach, it has never been universal in India, it requires several hands to work at, it cannot be done during odd moments. It has been and can only be generally an independent occupation and is in the majority of cases the sole occupation like shoe-making or smithy.

Moreover hand-weaving cannot be universal in the same sense that hand-spinning can be. India needs 4,661 million yards of cloth per year. A weaver weaves on an average three quarters of a yard per hour of rough khaddar. Therefore, if all foreign, indigenous or mill-made cloth could be excluded, at the most nine million weavers working at the rate of two hours per day would be required to produce the whole of our annual requirements. If it be contended that not so many weavers but so many families would be occupied, then the two annas for two hours would have to be distributed among many, thus materially reducing the earnings of the individual per day.

Now let us consider the possibilities of spinning. We know that it was at one time the universal supplementary industry of India. Millions have not yet forgotten the art and tens of thousands have even now spinning-wheels in their homes. Hand-spinning is therefore capable of immediate and limitless extension. And as it has been found that ten spinners supply one weaver, against nine million weavers ninety million spinners would be able to add to their earnings what to them will be a material and welcome addition, i.e., at least 25 per cent of their income. I have assumed the very high figure of 40 rupees per year per head to be the average income. Unlike weaving, spinning may be interrupted any moment and, therefore, it can be done during all odd moments. Spinning is learnt easily and quickly and the spinner begins to draw some thread from the very commencement.

Moreover, it is wrong to rely upon an unfailing supply of mill-yarn. Hand-weaving and mill-weaving are not complementary propositions. They are mutually antagonistic, the tendency of weaving mills, like all machinery, always being to displace the product of the hand. If, therefore, hand-weaving could become a supplementary industry on a large scale, it would have to be solely dependent on mills which would naturally squeeze the last pie from the weaver for the supply of yarn and would scrap it at the first opportunity.
On the other hand, hand-spinning and hand-weaving are mutually complementary, as can be today proved from the experience of the existing spinning depots. Even as I write, I have letters from co-workers saying that in their centres they have to send away weavers for want of yarn.

It is little known that a vast number of weavers of mill yarn are in the hands of sowcars, and they must be, so long as they rely upon the mill product. The village economy demands that the weaver should receive his yarn not from the middleman but from his fellow-worker the farmer.

Again, so far as can be ascertained, there are at present some twenty lakhs of weavers at work. Every additional loom means an outlay of at least Rs. 15. Every additional wheel need not mean more than Rs. 3\%\%\/. The Khadi Pratishthan pattern costs only Rs. 2\%\%. And, at a pinch, even an improvised takli which need not cost anything can be impressed into service.

Thus, the spinning-wheel appears to be the only foundation on which satisfactory village life can be constructed. It is the centre round which alone it is possible to build up village reorganization.

But it is said that one pice per two hours is no economic attraction to even the poor villager. In the first place, the wheel is not meant for, it is not now presented to, any person who has a more remunerative employment. How is it that thousands of women are today walking a few miles daily or weekly to receive raw cotton and the few pice for the yarn they deliver? If a loom were suggested to them, they would not take it up, they would not have the time or the ability for it. Town-dwellers have no notion of the gnawing poverty of the masses of India. Let us not talk of the machine age in their case. The machinery of Manchester has robbed them of the butter to their bread which the wheel was, for it has been replaced by nothing else equal to it or better. For these, therefore, the spinning-wheel is their only hope.

I do not here examine the more ambitious but chimerical proposals for agricultural improvements. There is room enough for them, I have no doubt. But that is a matter of time and education, whereas the ever-growing poverty demands an immediate remedy which the wheel alone supplies. The wheel does not displace or disregard possibilities in the shape of such improvements. It is a prelude to them. Wherever it has gone, it is affecting the lives of villagers in a variety of ways and it enables the townspeople to establish a living contact with the villagers and their villages.

“If hand-spinning is all you say, how is it that it has not already been universally adopted?”, asks the critic. The question is quite fair.
The answer is simple. The message of the wheel has to be carried to a people who have no hope, no initiative left in them and who would, if left to themselves, starve and die rather than work and live. Such was not the case before, but long neglect has made laziness a habit with them. That laziness can only be removed by the living contact and every example of men of character and industry plying the wheel before them and by gently showing them the way. The second great difficulty is the absence of a ready market for khaddar. I confess that it cannot for the time be compete with mill-cloth. I will not engage in any such killing competition. The capitalist may for capturing the market sell his calico for nothing. The manufacturer whose only capital is labour cannot afford to do so. Can there be any competition between the dead artificial rose, however symmetrical it may be, and the living rose whose two petals will not be alike, or can there be any competition between a wax statue of Cromwell and the living one?
Khaddar is a living thing. But India has lost her eye for the real art and is, therefore, satisfied with the glossy exterior. Revive the healthy national taste for khaddar and you will find every village a busy hive.
As it is, the resources of khaddar organizations are taxed to the utmost in order to create a market for the article. The marvel is that in spite of heavy odds against it, the movement is making headway. Over twelve lacs worth of khaddar was sold only last year. But it is nothing to boast of when one thinks of what needs to be done.

I have thus summarized the case for the spinning-wheel as a supplementary industry as against the handloom. Let there be no confusion of thought. I am not against the handloom. It is a great and thriving cottage industry. It will progress automatically if the spinning-wheel succeeds. It is bound to die if the wheel fails.

I invite criticism of the argument and shall gladly retrace my steps if the argument or the facts cannot be sustained.

Young India, 11-11-1926

Young India, 11-11-1926
3. COW-PROTECTION

A correspondent writes:

As most of the Hindus intuitively feel that the cow should be protected at all events, I too do so. I had witnessed the miserable sight of starving cows in their prime of life, being sold in lots, to Mussalman hide merchants in the famine-stricken areas of the Ceded Districts.

The Hindu scriptures alone seem to have enjoined cow-protection on its followers. I have been trying to understand the philosophy of it. If the cow has to be protected purely from selfish motives, on account of its continuous utility from its birth till after its death, cow-protection should have become universal and not confined to Hindus alone, for, mankind by instinct is selfish. If, on the other hand, it has to be protected on account of its meek and harmless nature, there are other animals as the sheep and deer which also equally require human protection. What then is the special virtue in the cow, exclusively known or useful to the Hindu, over other domestic animals at any rate? If Hindus, not excluding the vegetarian and orthodox sections, are entitled to kill buffaloes, goats, sheep, etc., for purposes of food or sacrifice, what right have we to resent Mussalmans killing the cow for sacrifice or food?

Would not the appeal of the Hindus to the Mussalmans to protect the cow be more reasonable and effective, if we Hindus ourselves gave up animal killing for food or sacrifice?

There is much to be said in favour of the argument adopted by the correspondent. But man does not govern himself by logic. He is a complex being; therefore, a multiplicity of considerations act upon him and move him to do or to refrain from doing things. Logically speaking, therefore, a Hindu who protects the cow should protect every animal. But taking all things into consideration, we may not cavil at his protecting the cow because he fails to protect the other animals. The only question, therefore, to consider is whether he is right in protecting the cow. And he cannot be wrong in so doing if non-killing of animals generally may be regarded as a duty for one who believes in ahimsa. And every Hindu, and for that matter every man of religion, does so. The duty of not killing animals generally and, therefore, protecting them must be accepted as an indisputable fact. It is then so much to the credit of Hinduism that it has taken up cow-protection as a duty. And he is a poor specimen of Hinduism who stops merely at cow-protection when he can extend the arm of protection to other animals. The cow merely stands as a symbol, and protection of the cow is the least he is expected to undertake. But, as I have shown already in my previous writings, he is failing even in this elementary obligation.

The motive that actuates cow-protection is not ‘purely selfish’, though selfish consideration undoubtedly enters into it. If it was purely selfish, the cow would be killed as in other countries after it had ceased to give full use. The Hindus will not kill the cow even though she may be a heavy burden. The numberless goshalas that have been established by charitably-minded people for tending disabled and useless cows is in a way an eloquent testimony of the effort that is being made in the direction. Though they are today very poor institutions for the object to be achieved, the fact does not detract from the value of the motive behind the act.

The philosophy of cow-protection therefore is, in my opinion, sublime. It immediately puts the animal creation on the same level with man so far as the right to live is concerned. But it is no part of Hinduism to prevent by force cow-slaughter by those who do not believe in cow-protection. Hindus will bring the Mussalmans and the rest of the world to their way of thinking only by living the religion of ahimsa as fully as it is humanly possible. They must rely upon the working of the great principle in their own lives and making its effective appeal to the outer world. They will not convert the latter by force of arms. They certainly can by force of ahimsa. We little realize the matchless potency of ahimsa when it is thoroughly put into active operation.

Young India, 11-11-1926

4. TAKLI IN SCHOOLS

Dr. Profulla Chandra Ghosh of Khadi Pratishthan sends me the following notes on the introduction of takli in schools:¹

I congratulate the authorities in charge of the Malikanda national school. A spinning-wheel is any day superior to the takli for obtaining a larger quantity of yarn. And I have never intended to give absolute preference to the takli over the wheel. But I have little doubt in my mind that, in the large number of schools we have, the takli yields better results than the spinning-wheel as has been amply shown by general experience. The reasons are obvious. School-rooms are too small to accommodate the spinning-wheels for all the boys and girls. Secondly, even if room could be found, they are far too expensive compared to the takli. Thirdly, the wheel frequently goes out of order and neither the school masters nor the pupils are able to set them right in a moment. Once the wheel goes out of order, it often takes a long time to repair it. It is not possible to supervise the work of a large number of boys spinning at the wheel. On the other hand, the takli is incredibly cheap. It can be worked by thousands at a time. It can be handled even in a crowded room requiring practically no space for its accommodation. It rarely goes out of order and when it does, it can be instantaneously replaced. Takli-spinning can be supervised no matter how many pupils engage in the operation. The quantitative result of mass spinning on the takli is on the whole more satisfactory than on the wheel. But having said all this in praise of the takli, needless to say I can have no objection to any school taking up the wheel in preference to the takli if it can overcome the objections mentioned by me.

¹ Not reproduced here. The correspondent had argued, giving figures about the progress in spinning on the charkha by boys of the national school at Malikanda, Dacca, that it could not be said that takli was always to be preferred to the charkha in schools. That could be done only in the case of the younger boys who could not ply the charkha.

Young India, 11-11-1926

5. NOTES

KHADDAR AND GOVERNMENT SERVANTS

A correspondent says:

Some of the Government servants are terribly afraid to purchase hand-spun and hand-woven cloth when our hawkers approach them. They are under the impression that they should not purchase khaddar, yet the Bombay Government is openly appealing to the people to encourage Indian industries. Can you say whether the Madras Government servants are allowed to purchase hand-spun and hand-woven cloth without fear of the Government?

I wish I could answer the question. But I have not the power. It is however inconceivable to me that any Government should proscribe the use of hand-spun and hand-woven cloth. It is possible to conceive the insistence on a form of dress, but certainly not the kind of cloth to be used. It is painful to find that there are Government servants who labour under imaginary fears. I have seen many Government servants making free use of khaddar without let or hindrance. If I was a servant of the Madras Government, I should unhesitatingly wear khaddar unless there was positive prohibition to the contrary in which case I should resign.

KHADI WORK AND VOLUNTEERS

Dr. Hardiker has sent me the programme of the work to be done by the Karnataka Branch of the Hindustani Seva Dal. I take the following from the copy before me:

The organizers and workers of the Karnataka Branch of the Hindustani Seva Dal met at the Dal Office, Hubli, on the 13th, 14th and 15th October, 1926, with Mr. Hoskoppa Krishnarao in the chair and after full discussion passed the following resolutions regarding the future programme of work to be undertaken by them:

Resolution 1: This meeting of the organizers and workers of the Karnataka Dal resolves that they should concentrate their attention on the following programme:

(a) To sell khaddar worth Rs. 40,000 (forty thousand) in Karnataka within seventy-two appointed days beginning from the 1st of February 1927 to the 13th midnight of April 1927 (including the National Week), under a scheme to be settled finally by Dr. Hardiker and Mr. Hoskoppa Krishnarao, in consultation with Mahatma Gandhi, Sjts. G. B. Deshpande and S. V. Kowjalgi.

Note: The commencement of work under this item has to be postponed to 1st February, 1927, in view of the Assam Congress necessitating the Dal’s concentrated activities at Gauhati during the preceding period commencing from the middle of November.

This is a good khadi programme. The Dal will have done well if it is carried out. Let me point out from my own experience and that of co-workers that khadi work will not flourish unless the principal workers know the science of ginning, carding, spinning and can distinguish between the different varieties of cotton and know genuine khadi from the spurious article. Khadi work to succeed evokes all the best that is in one. I shall watch the progress of the programme with considerable interest. There was another resolution passed by the Dal inviting me to visit the Province next year during the sale days. I should not give much credit to the volunteers if they expect to sell only 40,000 worth of khaddar with me as one of the sellers. The members should know that I put a fairly high price on my presence. They will have to put before me a more attractive programme than they have prepared if they are to draw me. And they must know that I am but one bride with many suitors to please. And as I do not believe in polyandry, the winner will have to offer a tempting dowry. It would be well for them therefore not to build any hope on my going to Karnatak early next year.

KHADI AMONGST NON-BRAHMINs

A correspondent writes:

You will be glad to learn that the non-Brahmins of Nipani are taking a keen interest in khadi. It is the one platform on which Brahmins and non-Brahmins are uniting. There was a large meeting on the 23rd of October. It was a good meeting. Mr. Rawan was present at the meeting and he gave his wholehearted support to khadi although he said that he continued to abide by the non-Brahmin party’s programme of work. A khadi bhandar was opened at Nipani. This was chiefly due to the exertion of Sheth Mulji Sicca of Cutch. He has promised to sell khaddar at cost price. The non-Brahmin friends seem to be convinced that the question of growing poverty of the masses, which term includes non-Brahmins, cannot be solved without the universal use of khadi. The Nipani leaders therefore feel that it is not enough to be hostile to khadi but it is necessary to encourage khadi by all available means.

I congratulate the non-Brahmin friends of Nipani upon their decision, and hope that they will organize khadi work so as to place it on a stable basis.

SPINNING IN SCHOOLS

The following report about the progress of spinning in the schools under Guntur Municipality will be read with interest:

The number of schools is 35.

Girls’ schools 9 and boys’ schools 26. There are 454 girls and 363 boys. The number of girls spinning is 70 and that of boys 60. 15 charkhas are supplied to the boys’ schools and 17 to the girls’ schools. During the year the boys have spun 24,000 yds. and the girls 26,000 yds. The boys’ yarn weighs 118 tolas and the girls’ yarn 130 tolas. The Municipality purchased 3 maunds of slivers for Rs. 46-8-0. The yarn is in the Municipal office. About 100 of the pupils wear khadi. The number of all the teachers is 87. Out of them 30 are women and 57 are men. Almost all wear khadi. 63 give yarn to the A.I.S.A. One is also a Congress member under the yarn subscription rule.

Rs. 500 worth of khadi was purchased.
Spinning is taught in 10 schools at present. Hindi was being taught in 10 schools but was discontinued owing to an adverse resolution of the Municipal Council.

Khadi is being freely distributed to Panchama boys and poor boys. Caste teachers are working in Panchama schools and Panchama teachers are teaching in schools where high-caste Hindus are studying.

Holidays are being granted on the occasion of the birthday or anniversary of the national heroes.

All teachers are able to spin. Their yarn is in the Municipal office. A charkha has been supplied to every teacher. About two maunds of slivers are used by the teachers.

The other employees of the Municipality are about 100 and almost all of them wear khadi.

SPINNING DURING THE WAR

A Mombasa correspondent sends the following extracts from My Reminiscences of East Africa by General Von Kettow-Vorbeck, showing the possibilities of spinning under stress:

Notwithstanding the great amount of booty taken at Tanga, it was evident that, as the war seemed likely to be prolonged, the stocks in the Colony would become exhausted. The natives at New Moschi began all of a sudden to wear silk; this was by no means a sign of special extravagance; the stocks of cotton clothing in the Indian shops were simply coming to an end. We had seriously to think of starting manufactures ourselves, in order to convert the abundant raw material into finished products. A curious existence now developed, reminding one of the industry of the Swiss family Robinson. Cotton fields existed in plenty. Popular books were hunted up, giving information about the forgotten arts of hand-spinning and weaving; white and black women took to spinning by hand; at the missions and in private workshops spinning-wheels and looms were built. In this manner, in a short time, the first useful piece of cotton cloth was produced. After various trials, the most suitable dye was obtained from the root of a tree called Ndaa, which imparted a brownish-yellow colour, very inconspicuous both in the grass and in the bush, and therefore, specially suitable for uniforms.

Would that we considered India to be in a state of war and refrained from using foreign cloth and even Indian mill-made cloth. All argument against the possibility of hand-spinning will then vanish like smoke. And are we not in a state worse than war when we have proof positive that millions of the inhabitants of India are living in semi-starvation?
“ALL FOR THEE”

A kind Tamil friend sends me for my day of silence quotations that do one’s soul good to read. I do not give in Young India quotations except when there is an association about them and when they are relevant. In the collection the friend has sent me I find the following very appropriate verses from George Herbert:

Teach me, my God and King,
   In all things Thee to see,
And what I do in anything,
   To do it as for Thee.
A servant with this clause
   Makes drudgerie divine;
Who sweeps a room as for Thy laws,
   Makes that and the action fine.¹

I give one more equally appropriate. It is from Ruskin:

When we build, let it be such a work as our descendants will thank us for; and let us think, as we lay stone on stone, that a time is to come when stones will be held sacred because our hands have touched them, and that men will say as they look upon them: See! this our fathers did for us.

Public life would be much purer than it is if we would do everything in the name of the King of kings and not for self but for posterity.

Young India, 11-11-1926

6. A CORRECTION

It gives me great pleasure to be able to publish this correction.² The notes in question were prepared, as I have already stated, first by one co-worker and then recast by another. They had to be done in a hurry. Needless to say, none of the writers had the slightest intention of comparing the two institutions. The object was merely to show the steady reduction in khaddar prices. The correction made by Satis Babu is welcome and enforces the argument advanced by the writers

¹ This is not, however, the first time Gandhiji had come across these lines. He commended them to Esther Faering in a letter on March 17, 1920.
² Not reproduced here. This came from Satis Chandra Das Gupta and pointed out in a letter of November 2, 1926, in the light of figures, the unfairness of the comparison of the Khadi Pratishthan with the Abhoy Ashram, made in the article “Charkha as the Only Cottage Industry” in Young India, 28-10-1926.
who had to depend upon the figures they could then lay hands upon. I am glad too to be able to give the readers the corrected and increased sales of the Pratishthan.

Young India, 11-11-1926

7. LETTER TO DR. K. K. KURUVILLA

SABARMATI,
November 11, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I do remember the correspondence with Dr. Faret. In my opinion, his course is clear. He must persist in picketing in spite of the notice. If he has the backing of public opinion, he will be able to do the picketing. If he has not, he will have to go to jail. And his imprisonment must ultimately bring success. But before taking the step, he should cultivate public opinion and make it clear to the Government that he has no intention of resorting to violent picketing.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

DR. K. K. KURUVILLA
MARTHOUSE SEMINARY
KOTTAYAM

From a microfilm: S.N. 19732

8. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

November 12, 1926

DEAR SATIS BABU,

I feel your pangs from this long distance and, therefore, dread to write to you and still more to ask you to do anything outside your beat.

But the work I am asking you to do may be a little welcome diversion. Do go to Capt. Petaval’s Institute in Bagbazar silently and see what it is. Is there anything in it? He is most insistent and wants me to advertise his movement. I have no faith in it or him. Lest I may be doing him an injustice, I want you to guide me. You will see that now he has Dr. Ray with him.

You must come out of the Slough of Despond and be joyful even though everything may seemingly go wrong. You saw the liberty
I took with your letter about the prices.¹

How is Hemprabha Devi doing? She must write to me at least once a fortnight. Has malaria abated in your colony?
Can you attend on 23rd?
With love,

Yours,

BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 1563

9. LETTER TO C. VIJAYARAGHAVACHARIAR

[November 12, 1926]²

DEAR FRIEND,

Your welcome letter. I cannot plead guilty to the charge that I am partial to the North and indifferent to the South. I do not know that I shall have much to say about the Congress deliberations, even if I go there. I shall want to occupy the position I did in 1915-18, my work being confined to my special subjects. Somehow or other, the councils do not interest me. And what is going on makes me sad.

How are you keeping?

Yours sincerely,

C. VIJAYARAGHAVACHARIAR
ARAMA
SALEM

From a photostat: S.N. 19730

¹ Vide the footnote to “A Correction”, 11-11-1926.
² From the addressee’s letter dated November 17, 1926 (S.N. 12083).
10. LETTER TO H. B. TEJUMAL

[November 12, 1926]

DEAR FRIEND,

To quote from scriptures will not help you. Draupadi’s prayer is a celebrated instance. If one has faith in one’s prayer, I have not a shadow of a doubt in my mind that it can move mountains. Faith and proof are contradictory acts. Hence illustrations are of little avail. The only thing is to pray whether one gets an answer to one’s prayer or not. Prayer should never be directed to a selfish object.

Yours sincerely,

SJT. H. B. TEJUMAL
MEDICAL PRACTITIONER
NEW SUKKUR
SIND

From a photostat: S.N. 19731

11. LETTER TO J. W. PETAVAL

SABARMATI,
November 12, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I am thankful for your persistence. Please continue. Some day I shall understand you and your scheme better. You are getting, on your spinning, enough help. Pray, therefore, let me watch your activity in silence. Some day I must visit your institution in person.

Yours sincerely,

CAPTAIN PETAVAL
POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTE
BAGBAZAR
CALCUTTA

From a microfilm : S.N. 19733

1 Based on the S.N. register
12. LETTER TO GIRI RAJ KISHORE

November 12, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. You may come. But I warn you again. I may simply give you a corner in my verandah for your abode. There may be no intellectual work for you at all and there may be all labour including, of course, sanitation work, water carrying, etc. You may be put on spinning or the like for eight hours per day.

You may be called upon to do your own cooking and, in no case, should your expense exceed Rs. 15 per month. Several here do it for less than Rs. 10.

If this attracts you, you will be happy here, not otherwise.

Yours sincerely,

GIRI RAJ KISHORE
ROHTAK

From a microfilm: S.N. 19734

13. LETTER TO MURLI PRASAD AMBARTHA

November 12, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

Khaddar is advocated not for the ruin of Manchester but for the uplift of the masses.

Mills can give employment only to a few lacs. Millions of people in partial unemployment must have an industry brought to them. The wheel is the only such industry. The question of cost cannot be allowed to affect an industry which is a vital need. Dear khaddar is therefore economically cheaper than cheap khaddar. It is possible to clothe India through khaddar in a year’s time. It is impossible to do so through mills. The latter cannot do it under 20 years at least.

Yours sincerely,

SJT. MURLI PRASAD AMBARTHA
C/O B. GOKUL PRASAD
VAKIL MORADPORE P.O.
PATNA

From a microfilm: S.N. 19735
14. LETTER TO IDA MILLER

November 12, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. M. Roniger will, I think, be translating The Story of My Experiments with Truth.

Yours sincerely,

FR. IDA MILLER

XIII BAUMGARTENSTRASSE, 53

VIENNA

From a photostat: S.N. 19736

15. LETTER TO MULCHAND AGARWAL

Kartika Sud 7, 1983 [November 12, 1926]

BHAISHRI MULCHANDJI,

I have your letter. I have respect for traditional ceremonies but as place, time and circumstances change, so does the nature of traditions. I am neutral as regards the thread and other ceremonies.

I believe in varnashrama but these days both varna and ashrama seem to have vanished. We have all become Sudras. There were never five varnas.

The process of spinning is merely a yajna and open to all; but one who performs it for the sake of livelihood is a vaisya. From the point of view of vocation it is a teacher, only if he works without wages is he a Brahmin.

Yours,

MOHANDAS GANDHI

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 764

16. LETTER TO BEHRAMJI KHAMBHATTA

Friday [November 12, 1926]

BHAISHRI KHAMBHATTA,

Chi. Devdas says that both of you wish to come and stay here with some of your friends but that you are feeling shy. There is no

---

1 The postmark bears the date 13-11-1926. Friday fell on November 12.
reason to feel so. Come without hesitation whenever you wish to. There will be some congestion, but I shall put you up somewhere. Your health, I hope, is excellent. We shall discuss Mr. Eddy’s book when you come. I have already given some thought to it.

Blessings from
BAPU

Bhai Behramji Khambhatta
275 Hornby Road
Fort, Bombay

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 6587

17. LETTER TO SRI PRAKASA

[November 13, 1926]¹

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. The dogs you refer to I do not regard as a nuisance though even in their case I would make their life less precarious than it is. But there are dogs in a city like Ahmedabad who are a danger to society, who are ill cared for and who are not wanted. If they cannot be cared for or otherwise kept as we would be kept, they should be killed rather than that they should be specimens of living death.

I hope to deal with the khaddar question in Y.I.

Yours sincerely,

Sri Prakasa
Sevashrama
Benares Cantonment

From a microfilm: S.N. 19729

¹ Based on the S.N. register
18. LETTER TO VASUMATI PANDIT

Saturday [November 13, 1926]

CHI. VASUMATI,

I have your two letters. I have no worry if you keep well. I can bear your coming here sooner or later. I cannot bear it if your health breaks down. You must certainly be acquainted with Vikram, Indravadan’s brother. He wishes to stay in the Ashram. What have you to say about this?

Devdas was here for a day and then he left for Panchgani.

Blessings from
BAPU

CHI. VASUMATI DHIMATRAM
C/O AMBALAL MATHURADAS
PALIAD-VEDA
P.O. DANGARVA

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 472. Courtesy: Vasumati Pandit; also S.N. 9220

19. LETTER TO TULSI MAHER

Saturday, Kartika Sud 8, 1983 [November 13, 1926]

CHI. TULSI MAHER,

I got your letters. I read some of them to the Ashramites. The dream was good. I cannot tell you more than what you heard in it. It would be enough if that much is accomplished. Hope your health is good. Are there cows and buffaloes in Nepal? The paper on which you have written is hand-made. Is it made there or is it imported? What is the price? Bhansali’s forty days of fast will be over on Monday. His health is excellent.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 6528

---

1 From the postmark
20. IS THIS HUMANITY?—VI

[November 14, 1926]

A friend has sent a long letter containing a number of questions and raising a number of difficulties. He has also sent me his copies of Navajivan with profuse marginal notes on this series of articles. Some of his questions have been already answered in these pages. Without reproducing here the rest of his questions, I propose merely to give my answers.

I think I have been considering the whole question quite dispassionately. I do not think I could be accused of any partiality for himsa or for my own peculiar views in the matter. My partiality is all for truth which I seek to find out through ahimsa. It is my conviction that it cannot be found out in any other way. The question in dispute for me is not whether truth is our goal or not, nor whether ahimsa is or is not the only way to it. There is no possibility of my ever doubting these fundamental principles. The question before me is about the practice of these principles. Every day I see fresh aspects opening out to me. There is every possibility of my making mistakes in the practice of ahimsa and, though I am taking every precaution possible to avoid them, it is possible that I may err occasionally. Let not friends, therefore, impute partiality to me when I cannot agree with them. Let them believe me to be unconsciously in error and bear with me. I now proceed to give the answers.

1. The question to solve is not what is hydrophobia and how to treat it.

2. The municipality or the Government will find a remedy not in accordance with ahimsa but with what they conceive to be public interest. The Mahajan can find the right remedy if they are truly non-violent. Government will never subscribe to the absolute principle of non-destruction of animals (dogs in the present case). Municipalities have members belonging to different faiths and different communities. They cannot, therefore, be expected to insist on a non-violent remedy.

3. The duty of finding a non-violent remedy is the Mahajan’s. It is a mistake to think that the Mahajan is blameless or helpless.

4. For the purpose of the discussion, I make no distinction between a rabid dog and a man who has run amuck and is in the act of dealing death. Habitual violence is a disease. The habitually violent man goes on in his murderous career only because he is beside himself. Both a rabid dog and a rabid man are worthy of pity. When they are found in the act of injuring others, and when there is no other remedy than to take their life, it becomes a duty to do so to arrest their activity. The duty is all the greater in case of a votary of ahimsa.

5. I have never meant that everyone should own a dog. What I have said is that the dogs should in no case be ownerless. Not that the owned dogs will be immune, but the owners will be responsible for them if they are diseased or get rabies.

6. The ownerless stray dogs are not innocent as lambs. They were never so. Owned dogs are generally so. The purpose of the present controversy is to make all the dogs innocuous.

7. I have never suggested that roving dogs should be killed wherever found. I have suggested enabling legislation in the interest of the dogs themselves. That will make humanly inclined people alive to their sense of duty and they will then either own dogs or find out some other remedy and thus make the existence of stray dogs impossible. In refusing alms to the beggar, the purpose is not to starve him, but to teach him self-help, to make him a man. The duty of killing dogs arises in the circumstances and to the extent I have indicated in the previous articles. To say that it is a sin to extirpate dogs is not to contradict me. For I have never expressed a contrary opinion.

8. It is idle to discuss whether Mr. Ambalal’s conduct was or was not proper, or whether my opinion about it was or was not correct. The public is not in full possession of the details of the incident. The broader question of ahimsa is the main issue, and to bring in Mr. Ambalal in the discussion is to cloud the issue.

9. The issue is: Whether, in consonance with the principle of ahimsa, it may be a duty to kill certain dogs under certain circumstances when no other alternative is possible. I submit that it may be and I hold that there cannot be two opinions in the matter. There may be a difference as to whether particular circumstances justify the act. The consolation for a votary of ahimsa lies in the fact that, from his standpoint, such circumstances can only be rare.

10. But I can see one difference of opinion that must for the time being remain. In the letter under consideration as also in many others, I see that there is an instinctive horror of killing living beings under any circumstances whatsoever. For instance, an alternative has been suggested in the shape of confining even rabid dogs in a certain place and allowing them to die a slow death. Now, my idea of compassion makes this thing impossible for me. I cannot for a moment bear to see a dog, or for that matter any other living being, helplessly suffering the torture of a slow death. I do not kill a human being thus circumstanced because I have more hopeful remedies. I should kill a dog similarly situated, because in its case I am without a remedy. Should my child be attacked by rabies and there was no hopeful remedy to relieve his agony, I should consider it my duty to take his life. Fatalism has its limits. We leave things to Fate after exhausting all the remedies. One of the remedies, and the final one to relieve the agony of a tortured child, is to take his life.

But I shall not labour this point. What to my mind is impotence of the votaries of ahimsa is an obstacle to a true understanding of this dharma. I hope therefore that those who differ from me will for the present bear with me.

So much about the thoughtfull letter of a friend. I shall now deal with an angry letter. The letter says:

You have been so much under the Western influence that you have learnt to think it proper to kill lower beings for the sake of man. It is better for you to confess your error and apologize to the world. You should have made up your mind in this matter after exhaustless [sic] sifting. Instead, you have passionately taken sides and discredited yourself.

This is the least offensive sentence I have picked up from letters of this type. I submit I have not formed my opinion without much deliberation. It is not an opinion I have recently formed. Neither is it hasty. One should not let one’s so-called greatness come in the way of the formation of opinion, otherwise one cannot arrive at truth.

I do not think that everything Western is to be rejected. I have condemned the Western civilization in no measured terms. I still do so, but it does not mean that everything Western should be rejected. I have learnt a great deal from the West and I am grateful to it. I should think myself unfortunate if contact with and the literature of the West had no influence on me. But I do not think I owe my opinion about the dogs to my Western education or Western influence. The West (with the exception of a small school of thought) thinks that it is no sin to kill the lower animals for what it regards to be the benefit of man. It has, therefore, encouraged vivisection. The West does not think it wrong to commit violence of all kinds for the satisfaction of the palate. I do not subscribe to these views. According to the Western standard, it is no sin, on the contrary it is a merit to kill animals that are no longer useful. Whereas I recognize limits at every step. I regard even the destruction of vegetable life as himsa. It is not the teaching of the West.

Argumentum ad hominem has no place in a discussion of principles and their practice. My opinions should be considered as they are, irrespective of whether they are derived from the West or the East. Whether they are based on truth or untruth, himsa or ahimsa, is the only thing to be considered. I firmly believe that they are based on truth and ahimsa.

Young India, 18-11-1926

21. VAUTHA FAIR

Fairs are held all over our country. At some place or other annual fairs are held. All sorts of people come to these fairs from nearby places. For the big fairs people come from every part of India.

Such a fair is held every Kartiki Purnima at Vautha in Dholka taluka. On behalf of the District Congress Committee, Shri Dahyabhai has been rendering service there, with the help of a small band of volunteers, for the last several years. This year, too, he has published an appeal for volunteers. Last year and the year before I had intended to attend this fair but could not. This year, too, to my great regret, I am not able to go. But I recommend that those who wish to do social service should go there. Even in the fairs organized for religious purposes, evil practices have grown rampant. Cheats go to such fairs and deceive simple people. Many kinds of immorality are practised there and gambling and other vices encouraged. Volunteers can definitely effect some reform by going there. I hope that those who can spare some days will go there and render all possible services.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 14-11-1926
22. LETTER TO GERTRUDE GROGAN

November 14, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I like your earnest letter.1 When, if ever, God wants me to go to America, He will open the way for me and guide my steps.

Yours sincerely,

MISS GERTRUDE GROGAN
BARNARD COLLEGE
NEW YORK

From a photostat: S.N. 19737

23. LETTER TO REMESHWARDAS PODDAR

Kartika Shukla 9, 1983 [November 14, 1926]

BHAI RAMESHWARIJI,

We have no other way but Ramanama. Chant Ramanama and never be disheartened.

Yours,

MOHANDAS

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 188

24. LETTER TO FEROZE

November 15, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

Your letter. There is no royal road to the control of passions. Constant endeavour and constant waiting upon God are the two things needed.

Yours sincerely,

FEROZE
V. CHAKWANO
P.O. PHALIA
(GUJRAT DISTRICT)
PUNJAB

From a microfilm: S.N. 19738

1 On October 15, 1926, the correspondent had written of America’s need of spiritual guidance and added: “It takes a man of your great insight to furnish it. For the sake of those in America who feel a need for you, come, oh Mahatma, and you will be assured of a sincere welcome” (S.N. 10830).

25. LETTER TO FELIX VALYE

November 15, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

Mr. Pickthall¹ asks me for an article or a message for your magazine. I have not a moment to spare for writing an article. What message shall I send you save to say that my nationalism is intense internationalism? I am sick of the strife between nations or religions.

Yours sincerely,

DR. FELIX VALYE
HOTEL RICHMOND
GENEVA

From a photostat: S.N. 19739

26. LETTER TO H.S.L. POLAK AND MILLIE GRAHAM POLAK

November 15, 1926

MY DEAR HENRY AND MILLIE,

I have both your letters. I can read your grief and fortitude. Such events humble our pride and make us weary of the world’s tinsel. They make us realize the meaning of ‘to be in the world and yet not of it’. Your account of Ceilia and Agnes gave me much joy. Agnes’s life was shaped when I last saw her, Ceilia’s was still in the making. Hers is wonderful sacrifice. If Leon at all remembers me, let him write to me.

With love,

Yours,

BHAI

From the original: Gandhi-Polak Correspondence. Courtesy: National Archives of India

¹ Marmaduke Pickthall, sometime editor of The Bombay Chronicle
27. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

Monday [November 15, 1926]

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I get your letters regularly. Kamala is well and happy now.

There is no need to come specially to attend the meeting of the Charkha Sangh. I hope you are having rest there. If you are not, you should run away to some other place.

Read the wires. I found all the replies satisfactory.

Bhansali’s fast of forty days will end today. He will break his fast tomorrow morning. His strength has been very well maintained. He has not taken any service from anyone.

I hope to start from here on the 2nd December.2 Who will accompany me has not yet been decided.

Devdas has gone to Panchgani because of Mathuradas. Pyarelal had to go to the Punjab because of his sister.

It was necessary for Soniramji to undergo an operation and his mother and others were not willing to have the operation done anywhere except in Rangoon.

Champabehn is here. She has not been entrusted with any responsibilities.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2877

28. LETTER TO LALAN PANDIT

THE ASHRAM,
November 15, 1926

BHAISHRI LALAN,

I am not aware of any violence in my language. Calling a hypocrite a hypocrite is no violence but perhaps there is violence in not calling him so. What would we call a serpent? If my son is worthless and if I describe him using good epithets, I would be guilty of untruth, and in my humble opinion untruth in any form is violence. In calling a worthless person worthless there is no violence, but

1 From the reference in the letter to Bhansali’s fast, it is clear that it was written on the Monday following November 13, 1926; vide “Letter to Tulsi Maher” 13-11-1926.
2 To go to Wardha; Gandhiji reached there on December 4.
unedifying behaviour on our part towards him is violence. I do not read the Bombay Samachar.

\[\text{Vandemataram from MOHANDAS} \]

BHAI LALAN PANDIT
C/O SHETH CHHOTALAL MALUKCHAND
HATHIBHAINE BHARNI VADI
AHMEDABAD

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19962

29. LETTER TO DEVCHAND PAREKH

\[\text{[November 15, 1926]} \]

BHAISHRI DEVCHAND.

It is good that Bhai Fulchand\(^1\) took pity on you. But I can’t afford to do so. Who can do the copying for me? Therefore you have to read my handwriting.

I received your letter only today, therefore I have sent a telegram to Porbandar saying that the March dates would suit me.

We cannot drag Malaviyaji [to the conference]\(^3\). Besides, what will he speak in the Khaddar Conference?\(^4\) I prefer Jaisukhlal Mehta or Vallabhbhai Patel. It is worthwhile if men are drawn through interest in work. What can they do if they come only because of big names.

These are my personal views only. What you all decide is to be accepted as the right thing.

I shall definitely start from here on the 2nd December.

When I shall return is in God’s hand. It should not be surprising if I return only at the time of the Conference. So take from me in the current month whatever work you wish me to do.

Tell Bhai Fulchand that his letter will be discussed when he comes here.

BAPU

\(^1\) From the postmark
\(^2\) Fulchand Kasturchand Shah
\(^3\) For holding the session of the Kathiawar Political Conference
\(^4\) This was to be held along with the Kathiawar Political Conference at the same place; \textit{vide} “Letter to Devchand Parekh”, 26-10-1926.
[PS.]

I am returning the letter in English.

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 5721

30. TELEGRAM TO MADHOJEE, MANDAL MANTRI, NIMKHAR

[On or after November 15, 1926]

I MUST NOT INTERFERE.

GANDHI

From the original: C.W. 4964 b. Courtesy: Parasram Mehrotra

31. INTRODUCTION TO “HAND-SPINNING AND HAND-WEAVING”

SABARMATI,

November 16, 1926

It will be remembered that early last year Sjt. Revashanker Jagjivan Mehta, the Joint Treasurer of the National Congress, announced a prize of Rs. 1,000 for the best essay on spinning. The judges appointed were Sjts. Ambalal Sarabhai, Shankerlal Banker, Maganlal Gandhi and myself. Sixty other essays were received. After much deliberation, the judges decided to distribute the prize between Professor S. V. Puntambekar, at present of the Benares Hindu University, and Sjt. N. S. Varadachari. The essay that is now being presented to the public is the result of the joint effort of these two winners who were requested to amalgamate their essays and give a joint production. It is difficult to say how far the effort is an improvement upon the originals. But workers in the vast field of hand-spinning will find ample material in the following pages to strengthen their position and I should be much surprised if the sceptic does not find enough food for reflection.

The authors have applied themselves to an examination principally of the following propositions:

Are there millions in India who require a supplementary occupation, the majority being idle for want of it during at least four months in the year? Is hand-spinning the only supplementary occupation and, if it is, can it be easily taken up by the people? Is it possible to sell khaddar woven from hand-spun yarn among the people in the teeth of the competition offered by foreign and Indian mills?

---

1 This was sent in reply to a telegram dated November 15 reading: “Kindly wire whom you prefer Birla or Sriprakasa. Congress work suffering.”

The readers will find that the authors have endeavoured to give an affirmative answer to all these important questions. Is it not the duty of everyone who wants to see an amelioration in the condition of India’s masses carefully to read what the authors have stated and to support the khaddar movement if they accept their conclusions? Let them denounce it as a waste of effort, if they can dare controvert the facts adduced by the authors.

M. K. GANDHI

Hand-spinning and Hand-weaving

32. LETTER TO N. S. VARADACHARI

THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI, November 16, 1926

MY DEAR VARADACHARI,

Here is the preface¹. It should be quite in time. If you have to suggest any improvement, do not hesitate to make the suggestion. You may write your own preface and call it foreword or call this foreword and call yours a preface if you like writing one. You will see that the essay is free from error.

Yours sincerely,

From a copy: S.N. 11246

33. LETTER TO KANAK CHANDRA SHARMA²

[November 16, 1926]

I have your letter and the piece of khaddar.

KANAK CHANDRA SHARMA
[SECRETARY AND ACCOUNTANT
A. I. S. A.
NAVGONG
ASSAM]

From a microfilm: S.N. 11247

¹*Vide* the preceding item.
²The reply is scribbled on an undated letter reporting the position of khaddar production work in Navigong district and making suggestions for improved cotton cultivation.
34. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

Kartika Sud 11 [November 16, 1926]¹

BHAJI BRIJKRISHNA,

It was only due to lack of time that I could not reply to your letter earlier. Do come when you feel like coming and go whenever you wish. I want to offer you whatever consolation I can.

Devdas came here and went off to Panchgani.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 2351

35. LETTER TO MUNNALAL G. SHAH

Kartika Sud 11 [November 16, 1926]²

BHAISHRI MUNNALAL,

I have your letter. One who tries to observe brahmacharya, truth, non-violence, non-thieving and non-possession, who believes that untouchability is sinful, who labours without feeling any fatigue, who thinks it is his dharma to clean latrines, who controls the palate and spins and cards daily and wears pure khadi, only such a person may stay in the Ashram.

Vandemataram from

MOHANDAS SRIR MUNNALAL GANGADAS SHAH
BURHANPUR

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 1996

¹ Devdas went to Panchgani in 1926. Kartika Sud 11 fell on November 16.
² The postmark bears the date 18-11-1926. Kartika Sud 11, however, fell on November 16.
36. LETTER TO CHHAGANLAL GANDHI

[Before November 18, 1926]

CHI. CHHAGANLAL,

It will not do if you remain lenient. To be lenient with Ratilal is to be cruel to him. To be strict with him is kindness. What would have happened if the doctor had made an incision on my stomach lightly? Or, how effective would be a person who pierces the earlobes if he pricked the needle lightly.

Even with Ramachandra, be strict as the situation demands and be frank. After you have shown your generosity to the full, he should realize what his shortcomings are.

Remember that the article I have sent about the lift, has to be sent straight to Navajivan if it is all right. If you want to give it in the coming issue of Young India, get it translated into English by Valji or send a copy of it here in time.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a copy of the Gujarati : S.N. 32906

37. FLOWERS FROM THE POET’S GARDEN

Mrs. Blair—daughter of the late W. C. Bonnerjee—sends me the following translation made specially for her by Mrs. Pramatha Chaudhuri, the Poet’s niece. Mrs. Blair says:

She wrote them out for me in Bengali as I wanted a helpful saying for everyday reference such as one can get in English. She selected these quotations from addresses given by the Poet from time to time at Santiniketan. The addresses were written down at the time the Poet gave them, but I do not think they have been printed. I liked the quotations so much that I got them put into English.

I am sure the readers of Young India will like to treasure these flowers from the Poet’s garden.

The centi-petalled lotus of Love, depending on the stalk of Self,

---

1 From the contents; vide fn 1 on the following page.
2 The reference presumably is to the article titled, ‘Ramachandran Lift’, published in Young India, 18.11.1926; vide “Notes”, 18-11-1926.
gradually unfolds itself petal by petal from the self to the family, from the family to society, from society to one's country, from one's country to humanity, from humanity to the Universal Spirit, from the Universal Spirit to the Supreme Spirit, thereby accomplishing its process of evolution.

He whose intellect cannot perceive law and order in the working of the universe is incapable, ineffectual and defeated in every department of life.

They who succeed in the field of material power do so by aggrandizing themselves, whereas they who succeed in the spiritual sphere do so by sacrificing themselves.

Because when a man attempts to see the whole thing at once he sees it indistinctly, therefore he first breaks it up into parts, and then fits them all into a whole.

In proportion as India lost mastery over Nature by giving overemphasis to the spiritual side, so she is now required to pay the penalty for it.

The work that we do from necessity or want, that work is our bondage; but the work that we do out of joy is not bondage; that work is freedom. We realize perfect joy in proportion as we are able to harmonize knowledge, love and work in ourselves.

He who desires to be master of the house must be stricter than all others in obeying the discipline and rules of the house.

When the mind is not prepared to receive ideas, then words do not reveal their full meaning to the irreverent listener.

Life’s mission is a very difficult one, its field is very large, its laws are very difficult to understand, its activities are very various, its sacrifices are very hard to make.

The lamp cannot conceal its own light within itself.

As stagnant water is ever afraid of being polluted by dirt, so today captive India, through fear of pollution, continually raises forbidding walls in order to cut herself off from all connection with the outer and larger world, and keeps even sun and air at a distance.

It is only when we daily draw purity from the source of our character, that words and ideas come to our help.

Man has built up his life on three great planes, the material, the religious, and the spiritual.

We give the name of desire to that external force which attracts our efforts to things outside us.

As external things are the aim of desire, so are inward motives the aim of will.

In all this vast Universe, and throughout this great life of humanity, it is impossible that we should not acknowledge Him at all anywhere.

When the ties of desire are severed, then earth, sky and water, living creatures and inanimate objects, beasts and men—all become filled with bliss, and there is no limit to joy.

That I have come and stood in the midst of this vast universe is a most wonderful event, there is nothing more momentous than it.

There is joy even in the endeavour after realization, let alone the state of fulfilment.

To what an incalculable extent do we waste our strength throughout the day in futile talk and in futile deeds?

It is only when we want to turn towards God that we are able to realize how strong is the attraction of this godless life that we have built up for ourselves.

As the final aim of every tree is to bring forth fruit, so the final aim of this world-tree is to bring forth the perfect man.

Dwelling in the midst of this world, God only gives of Himself; He takes nothing. And when our soul can partake of this nature of God, then will it attain Truth.

Young India, 18-11-1926

38. SPINNING AS DEATHBED CONSOLATION

Two versions have been published in Young India of the story in which the brave Buddhist wife asks her dying husband to dismiss all anxious worldly thoughts out of his mind and to die a peaceful death as she knows how to spin and will maintain the children as well as herself by that means, one in 1921 and the other during the current year. But they were either inaccurate or incomplete. Having since looked up the Pali original, I translate below the first, and part of the second paragraph in Section XVI, Chakkampata (Saraniya-Vagga) of the Anguttara-Nikaya, a canonical work of the Buddhists:

“The householder Nakulapita was dangerously ill and very much worried. Then Nakulamata, his wife, addressing him, said, ‘You should not now give yourself to anxious thought even for a moment. It is very painful that a person should die with anxious thoughts weighing upon his mind, and the Lord Buddha has censured such a kind of death. Perhaps you are afraid that when you are no longer with us, I shall not be able to feed the children and maintain the household. But your fears are groundless, as I am skilful in spinning cotton and in dressing hair (This second expression is not quite clear to me. I wish some Pali scholar throws more light upon it. V. G. D.) and will, therefore, have no difficulty whatever in providing for children as well as myself when you are away. Therefore please dismiss all disturbing thoughts out of your mind.

“ ‘Again perhaps you apprehend that when you are no more I might contract a second marriage. But you must drive away any such fear, seeing that we have for the last sixteen years lived a life of chastity though married, and maintaining a household. Please let your mind be at perfect peace.’ ”

V. G. D

From this note I have removed the original text as I hardly think the readers of Young India want the original texts, Sanskrit or other. But I must not omit the following remark that V.G.D. made under the texts removed.

It is a great pity that all Pali texts are published in the Latin script although Fausboll of Copenhagen, the Danish editor of the Jataka, haughtily observes:

“I have continued to transliterate the Oriental into Latin characters and shall continue to do so in all I publish of Pali, for it is my conviction that the fine Latin characters must not only henceforward be applied to languages which have no literature and to literatures which have hitherto not been published, but also that they one day will supersede all other characters when Europeo-American civilization has, like a lava, laid itself over all other civilizations and made them into Herculaneums and Pompeis.” I wonder how the Buddhist patrons of the Pali Text Society enjoy the fine prospect pictured in the above.

Young India, 18-11-1926

39. THE ARTS OF KINGS AND QUEENS

A correspondent who has personal experience of the service that the spinning-wheel is rendering sends me the following from Ruskin’s Sesame and Lilies:

1

Begin with the first—the lord of them all—agriculture. . . .

Then, after agriculture, the art of kings, take the next head of human arts—weaving, the art of queens, honoured of all noble Heathen women, in the

1 Only excerpts are reproduced here.
person of their virgin goddess—honoured of all Hebrew women, by the word of their priest king—’She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff; she stretcheth out her hand to the poor. She is not afraid of the snow for her household, for all her household are clothed with scarlet. She maketh herself covering of tapestry; her clothing is silk and purple. She maketh fine linen and selleth it, and delivereth girdles to the merchant.’ What have we done in all these thousands of years with this bright art of Greek maid and Christian matron? Six thousand years of weaving and have we learnt to weave?
Might not every naked wall have been purple with tapestry, and every feeble breast fenced with sweet colours from the cold? What have we done? Our fingers are too few, it seems, to twist together some poor covering for our bodies. We set our streams to work for us, and choke the air with fire, to turn our spinning-wheels—and are we clothed yet? Are not the streets of the capitals of Europe foul with the sale of cast clouts and rotten rags? Is not the beauty of your sweet children left in wretchedness of disgrace, while with better honour, nature clothes the brood of the bird in its nest, and the suckling of the wolf in her den? And does not every winter’s snow robe what you have not robed, and shroud what you have not shrouded; and every winter’s wind bear up to heaven its wasted souls, to witness against you hereafter, by the voice of their Christ: ‘I was naked, and you clothed me not?’

and remarks

Scathing indictment indeed, but how fervently he pleads for the spinning-wheel. If he could say this of an admittedly rich country like Europe, how much more should it be true of a country like India, proved beyond question to be poorer?

Young India, 18-11-1926.

40. SOUTH AFRICAN SITUATION

Here are extracts from a letter from Mr. Andrews after his arrival in Durban;

It is good to get here again, and though it has been a difficult time on the voyage, I am so thankful that I came on and did not delay longer. There are any amount of things here to be settled and other things to put straight before the delegation arrives, and it will take every moment of my time to get through.

Today I have had the warmest possible welcome and Rawat’s Bioscope was crowded this evening at the ‘welcome’. I am staying with Sorabji at 19, 1st Avenue. The house at 110, Field Street, is all pulled down and the site sold to Europeans!

The days have been crowded to the full and it is almost impossible to avoid it as I had expected. There was a very serious smallpox outbreak in the Indian quarters and every single smallpox case was that of an Indian. The mortality was as high as 25% and it was of a very virulent type. There were vicious letters in the Press abusing Indians for insanitary habits, etc. The one thing to do was what you did in Johannesburg and after getting vaccinated myself (without which I could have done nothing at all), I got the Medical Officer to let me visit the Indians who were kept in quarantine daily, and did everything I could to pacify them. Also we met and formed an Indian Health Committee and decided to work under the doctor’s orders and he has already set us to work. At once, as soon as this was announced the whole tone of the Press changed and we have been praised where before we were being blamed. Altogether it is going to work out for the best.

I have had time now to consider things fully and get hold of the situation. There is no doubt that if we can get the best public opinion on our side in the next few weeks, we shall get a good Press and materially help the Conference by creating a favourable atmosphere beforehand. It has been rather difficult to persuade them not to have a big demonstration just at the time of the Conference, thinking it would ‘impress’ them. I have been explaining to them that some good solid work [like] clearing out the dirt from insanitary quarters would ‘impress’ far more than all the demonstrations and speeches in the world.

At the same time, the last thing I should wish is that things should go to the other extreme and get slack and lazy and indifferent. What is needed is to direct the excitement and energy into a right channel. I have consulted the best Europeans who are sympathetic and they all say that the hartal and Day of Prayer which we held about a year ago was extraordinarily impressive in the right sense of the word and no one felt it to be provocative. They felt that Indians were doing the right thing in their own way and doing it well.

The reference to the sale of the property in Field Street revives oldest memories. It was one of the oldest properties of which a long lease was purchased by the late Haji Aboobakr Amod,—one of the earliest Indian merchants to settle in South Africa. The property was sublet to the late Parsi Rustomjee who had possession of it till his death. It was more a public place than a private store—most informal Indian gatherings were held there. It was the place where the most important decisions were taken. It was there that Gokhale used to pass much of his day time. It was there that Andrews worked. It sheltered the rich and the poor. It had become a real dharmsala. On the expiry of the lease the Durban Town Council refused to renew the lease and advertised the property for sale subject to the prohibition of Indian bids. The Durban Town Council knew the (to the Indians) sacred character of the place, but the knowledge could not save the property from passing into European hands. Hence the reference to it by Mr. Andrews and the note of exclamation.

His presence there at this juncture is indeed a godsend. The unfortunate outbreak of smallpox might easily have created a panic both among Europeans and Indians. The former might have taken dangerously drastic measures and the latter might have become paralysed with fear. The prompt measures taken by Mr. Andrews averted what might have developed into a calamity.

That godly man’s presence is likely to turn the scales in favour of the settlers. And though not much may be expected of the Conference, he is certainly creating the proper atmosphere for a calm and just consideration of the intricate problem.

Sir Mahomed Habibulla’s deputation has a heavy responsibility on its shoulders. It has the solid backing of unanimous public opinion. Let us hope for the best.

Young India, 18-11-1926

41. SPINNING IN MUNICIPALITIES

It is only by accident that I get information about spinning in the schools under Municipalities and Local and District Boards. If the chairmen or secretaries of Municipalities and Local and District Boards who are in the habit of seeing Young India will kindly send the information about the introduction and progress of spinning in those schools, it will be possible to get accurate statistics about the output of yarn in such schools and the number of boys and girls spinning.

Young India, 18-11-1926

42 CONDITIONS OF PACIFIC STRIKES

A friend sends me an extract from No More War, an organ of the British Pacifists. I copy from the extract the following conditions Mr. A. Fenner Brockway lays down as a test of a pacific strike:

1. A strike in protest of social evils which destroy human life can be as much an act of pacifism as a strike against war. (Starvation wages kill as many human beings as are killed by guns.)

2. If it be said that “constitutional” means could be used to end these evils, the same can be said of war. Our “constitutional” machinery is inadequate. The voters two years ago had neither wage reductions nor war in mind.

3. If it be said that a strike (and particularly a general strike) against wage reductions is an effort to “coerce” the nation or the Government, the same can be said about a general strike against war. As a matter of fact, neither has any promise of success unless the greater part of the nation supports it.

4. It is not accurate to liken a strike to an economic blockade. So far as there is danger of hunger, it would be the strikers themselves who would suffer first. In actual fact, in the recent General Strike, the T.U.C. (Trade Union Congress) was prepared to co-operate in maintaining life and health. The Government refused co-operation.

5. The determining factor as to whether a strike is pacifist or not is the spirit from which it springs. A strike against war in which the motive was hatred of members of the Government rather than of war and which represented a spirit which might be transformed into civil war, would not be an act of pacifism, nor would a strike against wage reductions animated by hatred of the employers or of members of the Government, or by anti-social feeling. But both are acts of pacifism when inspired by the spirit of protest against the evils themselves.

6. Whilst it is admitted that a non-pacifist spirit occasionally showed itself in the utterances, and still more rarely in the acts of strikers, I have not the least hesitation in saying that the dominant motive in the Great Strike was that of self-sacrificing moral protest and not anti-social force or personal hatred. It was this which gave it spiritual power; in this the secret of the wonderful self-discipline of the men was to be found.

A pacifism which can only see the cruelties of occasional military warfare and is blind to the continuous cruelties of our social system is worthless. Unless our pacifism finds expression in the broad human movement which is seeking not merely the end of war, but our equally non-pacifist civilization as a whole, it will be of little account in the onward march of mankind. The spirit of life will sweep on, quite uninfluenced by it.

The No More War Movement will fulfil its purpose just in so far as it recognizes this.

I would only add to these admirable conditions one more test. A pacific strike must be limited to those who are labouring under the grievance to be redressed. Thus if the match manufacturers, say, of Timbuctoo, who are quite satisfied with their lot, strike out of sympathy for its millhands who are getting starvation wages, the match manufacturers’ strike would be a species of violence. They may and should help in a most effective manner by withdrawing their custom from the millowners of Timbuctoo without laying themselves open to the charge of violence. But it is possible to conceive occasions when those who are not directly suffering may be under an obligation to cease work. Thus if, in the instance imagined, the masters in the match factory combine with the millowners of Timbuctoo, it will clearly be the duty of the workers in the match factory to make common cause with the mill-hands. But I have suggested the addition purely by way of illustration. In the last resort, every case has to be judged on its own merits. Violence is a subtle force. It is not easy always to detect its presence though you may feel it all the same.

Young India, 18-11-1926

43. NOTES

RAMACHANDRAN LIFT

Numerous letters have been received both by Mr. Ramachandran and me regarding the Ramachandran Animal Power Lift. Some ask to be supplied with the lift at once, others ask pertinent questions about it. Mr. Ramachandran has left all the letters with me. The lift is patented. The inventor has no lift ready to supply. He has to get it manufactured. He has not the means to attend to many orders with despatch. I am, therefore, trying to secure facilities for rapid manufacture. The inventor has proceeded to Madras to attend to his affairs and prepare to give his whole time to the supervision of manufacture and putting up the lift. I, therefore, urge the correspondents to be a little patient and await the necessary arrangements that must be made before a supply can be commenced. An endeavour is being made to nationalize the manufacture and to secure the lowest possible quotations for the lift.

Correspondents will forgive me for not replying individually to their letters. I deal below with some of the points raised by them:

1. If the arrangements that are pending go through, I hope to publish a diagram with the letterpress.

2. The parts are not at all complicated; on the contrary, the plan is incredibly simple. It is undoubtedly designed to answer village requirements.
3. Small lengths of rails, pulleys and wire ropes have to be supplied from cities.
4. The lift should last several years. The bucket and the rope may require more frequent replacement.
5. So far as I can see, an ordinary village blacksmith should be able to attend to such repairs as may become necessary.
6. The lift must be fixed by a skilled mechanic. The weights, the incline, etc., have to be adjusted. The rails must be truly laid. The pulley must be in its proper position. But I understand that a man with ordinary intelligence can be easily and quickly trained to fix the lift with its appurtenances. The mechanic will have to be paid his travelling expenses, etc. These details are now being attended to.
7. The most economical way is to use a heavy male buffalo, the heavier the animal, the larger the quantity of water it will carry without any exertion.
8. The empty trolley is carried up by the weight of the bucket.
9. The bucket is as a rule 40 lbs. in weight, the trolley 100 lbs.
10. The lift can be employed for any depth, even 125 ft., i.e., it is capable of being used wherever the ordinary mhouse can be.

KHADI SALES

During the period of probation the problem of the sale of khadi is as great as, if not greater than, that of production. Hitherto, the sales have not kept pace with production. The best-managed province for sales is undoubtedly Bengal. The tone set by the Khadi Pratishthan,—the creation of Dr. Ray and his lieutenant Satis Chandra Das Gupta—has been kept up by the organizations that have grown up there. Bengal has also striven with considerable success to manufacture according to local needs. This is sound economy. The method has enabled the workers to come and keep in touch with the buying middle class at the one end and the manufacturing poor class at the other. The consequence is a steady improvement in texture, variety and pattern and in prices from the buyer’s point of view. The remarkable fact about the growing cheapness of khadi is that generally the reduction in prices has not meant a corresponding reduction in wages of carders, spinners and weavers, but has been due to better knowledge and greater efficiency.

The latest instance of organized sales comes from Sylhet. Sjt. Dhirendranath Das Gupta has been managing only a small khadi centre at Kulaura near Sylhet. He reports that he sold during the Puja holidays only over Rs. 2,600 worth of khadi.

Though there is no doubt that in the other provinces, too, considerable improvement has been made as in Bengal, the sales have not been so methodically organized as there. Bihar is trying to come very near Bengal. But the workers all over the provinces should devise methods of stimulating sales. The experiences of Mr. Bharucha and other veterans should be pooled and schemes with variations suiting the various provinces should be devised and put into operation. Hawking and peripatetic exhibitions have come to stay. There is danger of all these schemes being top-heavy if the minutest details are not worked out. There are some stores in the different parts of India which from this standpoint should perhaps be closed. A store costing Rs. 500 per year and selling no more is one that is fit to be closed. There is gross mismanagement or ignorance about it.

THE TRUE SPIRIT

A correspondent writes:¹

For me this correspondent is a member, in spirit, of both the organizations. Technically he will become a member by producing the yarn of his own spinning before a deputy of A.I.S.A. in his district, and sending the equivalent price of the yarn. For some, even to send that amount is not possible. They can then remain members in spirit and enroll themselves as volunteers sending a report of their work from time to time and holding themselves ready to do any service that may be required of them and that they may be capable of rendering.

TEMPERANCE REFORM

For some time past some Christians of Travancore have been earnestly striving to put down the drink habit by working from within, i.e., by seeing and speaking to the people given to the habit. They are trying to organize picketing with the intention of warning the visitors to the liquor dens. The simple procedure seems to have frightened the Travancore authorities. The District Magistrate at Kottayam has served a gagging notice upon Dr. Z. M. Paret who is a well-known Christian in Travancore and, so far as I know, whose non-violent spirit has never been questioned. This is the notice:

¹ The letter is not reproduced here; it stated the writer’s difficulty, in view of his financial position, to pay subscriptions to the A.I.S.A. and the All-India Cow-Protection Association, despite being a spinner and weaver.
Whereas it has been made to appear to me from reports received from the District Superintendent of Police, Kottayam, that you are making speeches inciting people to do picketing before liquor shops and to commit other form of lawlessness and that speeches are likely to cause breaches of the peace and bring the authority of Government into contempt, I do hereby strictly order and enjoin you under Section 26 of the Regulation IV of 1905 not to make any speech, harangue or address from this day in any part of this District of Kottayam.

The notice begs the question by describing every speech advising picketing as an incitement. What the “other form of lawlessness” there can be is not made clear in the order. Thus in Travancore if the Magistrate’s order correctly interprets its law, a premium is put upon the vice of drunkenness. Not only does a State provide facilities for drink but it also prevents reformers from resorting to the only effective and peaceful method of directly approaching the drunkards and appealing to them not to give way to temptation. I hope that the law of Travancore is faultless and that the District Magistrate has erred in his interpretation. The interpretation should be tested in a higher court. In any case, the reformers’ duty is clear. If the law is at fault they must move for its repeal. And if all effort to set it right fails, their peaceful picketing must go on even at the risk of being imprisoned, taking care to avoid enlisting as volunteers persons who cannot restrain themselves under provocation. It is worthy of note that the gag is perpetual.

IS IT HYPER-SUSPICION?

My fears at the very outset that the Agricultural Commission is merely a British commercial enterprise for selling agricultural implements is being confirmed by reports of meetings held in England.

This is an extract from a letter of a correspondent who weighs every word he writes, has no malice in him, and is at present not much interested in politics. I have reproduced the extract because I have shared the fear myself. It is possible that the fear is an echo of my own distrust and that the Commission is a well-meant effort to probe the bottom of the agricultural condition of the people of India. I would be delighted to discover that my fear or suspicion was wholly unjustified. But whilst it lasts and is shared by others, it is much better to express it than to harbour it secretly.

Only the other day, I reproduced an extract from a letter received from another correspondent who was a visitor to the Exhibition. He had gone with a bias in favour of the Exhibition. But he... could not help giving an involuntary expression to his feeling that “the centre of attraction in the Exhibition was agricultural implements and machinery which the peasantry would never use.” Indeed, he went further and said, “Some of the machinery was fit only for the scrap heap.” He knew what he was talking about, having handled machinery on a fairly large scale. He thought that many things were allowed to be exhibited which had not been tested and guaranteed. An exhibition to be instructive and profitable should contain nothing that is not tested. Simple credulous people going there finding in flaring headlines preposterous claims on behalf of machines would naturally buy them and on finding them to be useless rue the day when they purchased them. The wise and just thing, however, is to suspend one’s judgment and to keep an open mind till the report of the Commission is out.

WIDOWS AND WIDowers

A correspondent writes:

I have carefully read the correspondence “A Catechism” and your replies published in the Young India dated 14th October ‘26. While answering the first question of the correspondent on page 357 in para first in the concluding portion, you say, “I should any day subscribe to a reform in the Hindu Law making sinful the remarriage of a widow or a widower who voluntarily married after maturity.”

In my opinion, a reform of this kind in the Hindu Law will be disastrous and to a large extent affect the moral standard of the society as a whole. For instance if a man or a woman married after maturity and unfortunately happens to lose either his wife or her husband after some days of married life, do you mean to say that the man or the woman should not be allowed to remarry even though a great desire of enjoying married life is left unfulfilled, for the only reason that the man or the woman concerned married after maturity? If a reform of this kind is made in the Hindu Law, I am afraid the man or the woman will find out some immoral way of gratifying his or her unsatisfied desire and there will be a wholesale moral corruption in the society. I therefore think that this question should entirely be left to the discretion of the man or woman concerned.

My reply to the catechist was a challenge to man who is the law-giver. He will not allow his liberty to be restricted. My reply, therefore, is an attempt to show that what is considered desirable for man should be equally so for women and that, therefore, a widow should have the same discretion as a widower about remarriage. Moreover, the Hindu
Law is not inelastic like the laws made under the British Constitution. It will be noticed that I have deliberately used the word ‘sinful’ instead of criminal. A crime carries with it punishment imposed by a man-worked State. A sin is punishable only by God or one’s conscience. And I do think that, if Hindu society would rise to the level I have aimed at in my answer, it will be a great gain for it and humanity.

WHAT IS KHADDAR?

A friend enquires whether the following definition of a ‘Congressman’ given in The Leader is a correct definition:

Those who do not use ‘pure’ khaddar, i.e., khaddar woven by themselves out of yarn spun by themselves, have no right to call themselves Congressmen and should not be treated as such.

The correct definition is given in the body of the Congress resolutions. But for the sake of those who have no time to refer to the Congress resolutions, I may state that it has never been contemplated that the cloth to be used by Congressmen has to be woven by themselves. As a matter of fact, neither has the khaddar yarn to be spun by the members. The spinning test is totally apart from the wearing of khaddar, and it is purely voluntary. Whereas the wearing of khaddar is compulsory, the only thing needful is that the khaddar should be hand-spun and hand-woven—it does not matter by whom spun and woven. The yarn spun by the member need not form any part of the khaddar he wears. It is surprising to me that at this time of the day it is necessary to explain the meaning of khaddar. The appropriate question, however, would be how many Congressmen are wearing such pure khaddar as it is defined in the Congress resolution and not as in the quotation.

THE NECESSITY OF TESTING YARN

I have often laid stress upon the necessity of testing all the yarn that is spun either by volunteers or paid spinners. It does not mean that the yarn should be tested every day. But a periodical test is necessary if we are to improve the strength and evenness. These pages have also shown how a testing plant can be improvised without any difficulty. I hope that khadi centres will introduce this much-needed reform.

Young India, 18-11-1926
44. LETTER TO VASUMATI PANDIT

THE ASHRAM,

Thursday, November 18, 1926

CHI. VASUMATI,

I have your letter. You may come to Wardha. You have not given me the news that I had specially asked for about your health. Ramdas left today after staying for two days. Haribhai\(^1\) has come today. He and Kusum\(^2\) will go to Broach tomorrow.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 9221

45. LETTER TO REVASHANKER J. MEHTA

Kartika Sud 14 [November 18, 1926]\(^3\)

REVERED REVASHANKERBHAI,

I have your letter. It would certainly be very good if Jamnalal did do the work of the school.

Please let me know how much money can be invested in the [Ramachandran] lift. Do not have any qualms in regard to the matter. I have never wished to know anything about finances and therefore I may unknowingly make a bold demand. It is for you to check such a demand. If I know for certain that you will, then only will I not hesitate to make demands on suitable occasion.

Good that you have decided to go to Deolali. There is no harm if you send Dhiru\(^4\) here provided he likes to come. It will be no burden to me. The weather is very good at present. It is not possible for me to go to Deolali and now there is no need either.

Regards from
MOHANDAS

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 1260

---

1 Haribhai Desai of Broach; he had worked for some time as Gandhiji’s secretary during the initial period of the Sabarmati Ashram.
2 Wife of Haribhai Desai
3 Reference to addressee’s Deolali trip indicates that the letter was written in 1926; \textit{vide} “Letter to Revashanker J. Mehta”, 25-11-1926.
4 Addressee’s son
BHAISHRI BAPUBHAI,

I am giving in Navajivan the reply¹ to the last paragraph of your letter. I do not wish to give there the reply to the rest of your letter.

Every Hindu should have nothing but respect for Rishi Dayanand’s² life. Satyarth Prakash is disappointing but it is better not to search and find out why it is so. We should exalt the virtues of great men. We may take note of their imperfections, if any, but a devotee should not probe into their causes.

I have deliberately decided not to give extracts from Satyarth Prakash. The person for whose sake I wished to give the extracts has already called on me. I showed him the extracts. If, further, I were to give the extracts [in Navajivan], this great man would be maligned, and his virtues lost sight of and a controversy might start; hence I decided not to give them.

I find the use of the word ‘Arya’ artificial. Whatever may be the origin of the word ‘Hindu’, it carries naturally that meaning which is forced into any other word.

By birth we all are low. It is only when we acquire virtuous qualities that we become dwijas³; this is the purport of one verse. Others emphasize the importance of birth. Each view is valuable from its respective point of view. We take birth according to the sanskaras of our previous births. New sanskaras modify them to some extent. There is humility and conservation of strength in allowing ourselves to be known as we are born.

What we call prarabdha is nothing but the fruit of deeds in our previous births. Human efforts mean our attempts to make desirable changes therein. Sometimes one acts in opposition to the other, while at other times they run together harmoniously. Hence it cannot be said that one is always stronger than the other. We cannot disregard prarabdha; we cannot give up human effort. This explains the importance attributed to effort free from attachment.

Vandemataram from Mohandas

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19965

¹ Not traceable
² Dayanand Saraswati, author of Satyarth Prakash and founder of the Arya Samaj
³ Twice-born

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
47. LETTER TO RAMI PAREKH

Thursday, [November 18, 1926]

CHI. RAMI,

I have your letter after a long time. Everybody is happy here. There is no special illness nowadays. Chi. Ramdas\(^2\) was here for a couple of days. He is in good health. He is touring in Kathiawar and selling khadi.

_Blessings from_
_BAPU_

From a photostat of the Gujarati : S. N. 9702

48. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

_Kartika Sud 14, 1983 [November 18, 1926]_

BHAI GHANSHYAMDAS,

I have your letter. Regarding Geneva I have given my opinion a few days ago at your Kashi address.

It appears from Deviprasadji’s letter that you are bound by promise. If such is the case the question of going or not going does not arise. As it is, you ought to go.

_Yours_,
_MOHANDAS_

From a photostat of the Hindi: C.W. 6138. Courtesy: G. D. Birla

49. LETTER TO PARAMESHWARA DIAL GUPTA

_November 19, 1926_

DEAR FRIEND,

I do not propose specifically to deal with your questions in _Young India_. I have in the past dealt with such difficulties and may do so incidentally in the series I am writing.

I do not regard Rama and Krishna as historical characters as depicted in the books. Ravana represents passions, as Kauravas represent the evil in us. The burden of the _Ramayana_ and the _Mahabharata_ is to teach ahimsa.

---

2. Son of Gandhiji
I do not accept everything related in the Mahabharata as gospel.

If you will reread my writings on ahimsa, you will not find any contradiction between the passages quoted by you.

If a man cannot defend his country by non-violent means, he will be justified in using violent means rather than surrender in a cowardly manner.

I do say that truth must be told at any cost. But one is not always bound to disclose facts.

Yours sincerely,

PARAMESHWARA DIAL GUPTA
CHRIST CHURCH COLLEGE
CAWNPORE

From a photostat: S.N. 19740

50. LETTER TO SATYANAND SARASVATI

SABARMATI,
November 19, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I believe Rajendra Babu to be incapable of doing anything mean. But if you give me permission to send your letter to Rajendra Babu, I would secure his explanation.

I do not repent of my estimate of Mussalmans.

Yours sincerely,

SWAMI SATYANAND SARASVATI
C/O B. N. SINHA
SAMASTIPUR
B.N.W. R.Y.

From a photostat: S. N. 19742
51. LETTER TO DEVCHAND PAREKH

[November 19, 1926]

BHAISHRI DEVCHAND,

I have your letter. We should not put Dr. Pranjivan to inconvenience.
But we can have Revashankerbhai. Would you like Nana-bhai Narsinhprasad? Do you want Jamnalalji? We have the big problem of English, otherwise we could have Rajagopalachari. Would you like to have Kripalani? But I should suggest that you choose a real lover of khadi. I think we should look at the work of a man rather than his name. I have received your wire. The 30th will suit me.

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 5705

52. LETTER TO BEHRAMJI KHAMBHATTA

Friday [November 19, 1926]

BHAISHRI BEHRAMJI,

I have your letter. You may come whenever you can. I will start from here on the 2nd December. It is not certain when I shall return to the Ashram. I had come to know from Devdas that you were in danger of getting leucoderma. Even if you get it, what does it matter? There is no need to worry or be perturbed about it. I assure that you have enough spiritual understanding to be able to live cheerfully even if you have leucoderma. We can talk about this if you come earlier.

Mrs. Eddy’s book is ordinary. It contains nothing new. Her language has a certain strangeness about it. That lady may have some ability but I found that she was misusing her knowledge. The cure for suffering lies in bearing it. Man should never use his spiritual strength to cure his suffering. If Jesus uses his spiritual power to cure the sick, that does not mean that all of us should start using our spiritual power.

---

1. From the postmark
2. By offering him the presidency of the Kathiawar Political Conference
3. Revashanker Zaveri, brother of Dr. Pranjivandas Mehta
4. For holding the meeting of the Executive Committee of the Kathiawar Political Conference
5. Mahadev Desai, writing to the addressee on November 21, and apparently referring to this letter, asked: “Have you received Bapu’s letter regarding Christian science?” The letter, therefore, appears to have been written on the preceding Friday which was November 19.
to cure ourselves. If we adopt remedies to cure the body, which is perishable, they, too, should be physical.

Hence a sick person should pray to God thus:

“O God! this illness is the result of my sins committed knowingly or unknowingly. Deliver me from my sins and give me the strength to bear this suffering.”

If a sick man thinks that he is not sick, it is a kind of delusion. He is a true man who knows that he is sick but remains unaffected by his suffering. A sick person should analyse himself and, realizing that his body and soul are distinct, understand their true relation and the meaning of moksha.

I strongly advise you to leave off Christian science. You may, if you wish, certainly try ordinary remedies for your ailment, or do nothing and have faith in God. That’s the golden mean. Take simple treatment and develop the power of endurance.

If you have anything to say to me in this matter, please do. I have certainly not read Mrs. Eddy’s book as carefully as you are likely to have done. I have just glanced through it. If I have done her an injustice, it has been done unknowingly. But how can I hide from you the impression it has made on me?

And, therefore, the last point is that, whatever my views, you should weigh them and do what your conscience tells you. We ourselves bind or free us. Others merely advise and keep away.

Blessings to you both.

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 7534

53. LETTER TO HARJIVAN M. VYAS

Kartika Purnima 1983 [November 19, 1926]

BHAISHRI HARJIVAN,

I have your letter. My viewpoint is entirely different as regards both your questions.

Mill cloth may or may not contain any fat, but on account of the use of that cloth the fat of millions is being sucked and therefore its use should be given up.

If, while refining foreign sugar, bone dust is used, there is no reason to believe that it is not used in sugar made in our country. But it is good if we make the least use of sugar and such other things.
If we examine minutely how everything is made we shall surely find some sort of defect. So a thoughtful person will make do with the fewest things, and will give up using foreign goods even of good quality when local substitutes are available.

_Vandemataram from_
MOHANDAS GANDHI

BRAHMACHARI HARJIVAN MANISHANKER VYAS
ZAMKA, P.O. BAGASRA, BHAYANI
KATHIAWAR

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19967.

54. LETTER TO SATISH CHANDRA MUKHERJEE
November 20, 1926

DEAR SATISH BABU,

I was delighted to have your long letter. But I was sorry to learn that you had malaria and that Krishnadas had unhappy experiences. You must please take care of yourself and have Krishnadas by your side. I hope you will continue to let me hear from you both about yourself and Krishnadas.

I am thankful for your profitable criticism. I shall deal with some of the points in the series I am writing. Greatest good of the greatest number is a doctrine which I think cannot be defended on the ground of ahimsa. Ahimsa insists on the greatest good of all. My defence of the destruction of the dogs is no doubt partly utilitarian and a concession to and an admission of our weakness. But destruction of suffering animals is defended on the highest ground of religion.

Yours sincerely,

SATISH CHANDRA MUKHERJEE
C/O. S. C. GUHA
DARBHANGA

From a microfilm: S.N. 19743
55. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

Kartika Vad 1 [November 20, 1926]

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I have your letter. May you live long and may your purity grow. No one in this world is free from imperfection. We can only strive to get rid of it. You are making an effort in that direction. A person who makes an honest effort knows no fall. This is the divine pledge.

We shall now meet on the 4th. I intend to go via Tapti Valley [Railway]. Shastriar arrives tomorrow.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2878

56. IS THIS HUMANITY?—VII

[November 21, 1926]

Some of my correspondents do not seem to realize the fundamental consideration underlying my suggestion for the destruction of dogs under certain circumstances. Thus, for instance, I have not made the suggestion in a purely utilitarian spirit. The utility to society incidentally accrues from the act, but the principal consideration is the relief of the long drawn-out agony of the creatures whose present condition it is simply impossible for me to tolerate. In the articles in this series, there has not been even the remotest suggestion that man has the right of disposal over the lower animals and that he may, therefore, kill them for his own comfort or pleasure. One of the writers betrays a strange confusion of thought when he says that the characteristic of an exalted soul is that he remains unaffected by the misery around him. He is callous, rather than exalted, who has not learnt to melt at others’ woe, who has not learnt to see himself in others and others in himself. Intense longing for the happiness of others was the mother of the discovery of ahimsa. And the sage who was the embodiment of compassion found his soul’s delight in renouncing his own physical comfort and stopped killing for his pleasure the dumb creation about him.

1 The postmark bears the date, “23-11-1926”, Wardha, where the addressee received it.
A correspondent reminds me of the advice given me by Shri Rajchandra when I approached him with a doubt as to what I should do if a serpent threatened to bite me. Certainly his advice was that, rather than kill the serpent, I should allow myself to be killed by it. But the correspondent forgets that it is not myself that is the subject-matter of the present discussion, but the welfare of society in general as also of the suffering animals. If I had approached Raychandbhai with the question whether I should or should not kill a serpent writhing in agony, and whose pain I could not relieve otherwise, or whether I should or should not kill a serpent threatening to bite a child under my protection, if I could not otherwise turn the reptile away, I do not know what answer he would have given. For me the answer is clear as daylight and I have given it.

A studious correspondent confronts me with some verses from a Jain philosopher and asks if I agree with the position taken up in them. One of the verses says:

One should not kill even beasts of prey in the belief that by killing one such, one saves the lives of many.

Another says:

Nor should one kill them out of a compassionate feeling that if they were suffered to live longer they might sink deeper into sin.

The third verse says:

Nor should one kill distressed creatures presuming that one would thereby shorten the length of their agony.

To me the meaning of the verses is clear. And it is this that a particular theory should not be the spring of action in any case. You may commit himsa, not in order that you thereby realize in practice a pet theory of yours, but because you are driven to it as an imperative duty. Work which spontaneously comes to one’s lot, or action without attachment, in the words of the Gita, is the duty of a seeker after moksha. Confine your energy to work that comes your way, I conceive the Jain philosopher to say, never seek fresh fields of activity. The verses, to me, define the mental attitude of detachment that should govern one’s action in cases where himsa seems to be imperative and unavoidable.

But I have arrived at my present views independently of any authority, though originally they may have been drawn from various sources, and I submit that they are in perfect consonance with ahimsa, even though they may be proved to be contrary to the teaching of the philosopher.

Young India, 25-11-1926

57. KHADI FROM YAJNA YARN

A member of the All-India Spinners’ Association writes as follows:

Khadi is woven from the yarn received from the members and then it is sold. How are the proceeds utilized? Would it be wrong if this khadi was supplied to the poor at a cheaper rate, charging only the weaving expenses, etc.? What advantage do you find in the present system? I wish you to clarify this matter through Navajivan.

I think that this question has already been answered once. The yajna yarn is received in a very limited quantity—and though its quality is improving day by day and so irregularly that it can just cover the expenses of collecting and storing. Hence the khadi made from this yarn is sold at ordinary rates. Sufficient khadi to meet the demands of poor people is produced neither from yajna yarn nor from any other yarn. But the yajna yarn amply feeds the poor. The khadi that is produced out of the yarn spun by the poor costs more per yard than mill-made cloth. Yet the middle and the rich classes are trying to ensure the success of the art of spinning by purchasing it. When this yajna which is now being performed on a small scale becomes widespread, khadi will be given almost free to the poor, while the rich and the middle classes will wear khadi available at low price. At present the yarn received by the Spinners’ Association satisfies the sentiment which when developed will fulfil the material need. If the Spinners’ Association has no members and if [for membership] there is no condition of good spinning, then there would be no one carrying on khadi work as at present. Thus even though the poor are not enabled to wear khadi made of yarn received by the Spinners’ Association, yet they derive all the benefits of its activities. The very existence of the Spinners’ Association is for the benefit of the poor.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 21-11-1926
58. NOTES

LATE SHRI LALLUBHAI ASHARAM

Who will not feel grieved at the death of Sir Lallubhai Asharam? He was the glory of Gujarat. All are praising him with one voice for his sense of justice. I had very little personal acquaintance with him; but I hear praises of his character from every quarter. Sir Lallubhai possessed the rare combination of knowledge, wealth and character. Every Gujarati, every Indian can be proud of him and emulate his good qualities. May God grant strength and courage to the members of Sir Lallubhai’s family to bear this great calamity.

KHUDI-HAWKING IN KATHIAWAR

I have written earlier that the Khadi Institution at Amreli has produced khadi in large quantities. My view is that this khadi should be consumed in Kathiawar itself. It is our misfortune that khadi has to be hawked. If khadi is consumed locally then the energy spent by the hawkers in selling it can be utilized for increasing production. The production is not done for fun, but for the sake of giving work to unemployed women. Those Kathiawaris who realize this should make full use of the khadi produced in Kathiawar. This is a service to India and this is real economics. It would be doing service to the whole world if all of us would shoulder our individual responsibilities. Society is crushed because its members have to carry others’ burdens. If a few rich would cease riding on the shoulders of the poor, then the burden on the poor would be lightened. But the world will always have the rich and the poor. And so there arises the duty of doing service to the poor. We may not have the strength to live like the poor, but all of us can.

This explains why it is essential for us to spin. If we wear the khadi which is spun and woven by the poor, it would be a service to them to that extent.

We should begin this service with our next door neighbours. So the khadi produced in Kathiawar must be purchased, in the first instance, by Kathiawaris themselves.

This khadi may be found expensive, coarse, or not durable. But I hold that it ought to be purchased in spite of these defects. The chapatis made by a mother though thick, ill-shaped and expensive are preferable to the beautiful round and cheap chapatis of Delhi.

Following this line of thinking, Abbas Saheb will again start khadi-hawking in Kathiawar. Starting on the 19th, the programme is as follows:

- Gondal 19, 20
- Dhoraji 22, 23, 24
- Ranavav 26, 27
- Manavadar, Batwa 1, 2, 3, 4
- Mangrol 4, 5, 6
- Junagadh 10, 11
- Jetpur 20, 21, 22
- Upleta 24, 25
- Porbandar 28, 29, 30
- Veraval 7, 8, 9
- Jamnagar 12, 13, 14

It is my earnest hope that at all these places the people will welcome him and his co-workers and help them in selling off the khadi.

I should like to say that much better khadi is produced at present than that sold four years ago; it is thinner, more durable and cheaper. With the passage of time and with due encouragement, it will be still better and cheaper. It is in our hands to bring this about.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 21-11-1926

59. LETTER TO C. F. ANDREWS

November 22, [1926]¹

MY DEAR CHARLIE,

I have just got your cable about prayer day². I am forwarding it to Sarojini and writing a strong backing leader in Young India.³ The ¹ The original did not bear the ‘year’. This is inferred from the reference to the article about Colonial-born Indians published under “Notes”, 25-11-1926.

² To be observed on December 19, the Sunday following the arrival of the Government of India delegation in South Africa for the Round Table Conference. Charles Freer Andrews, p. 222, has: The proposal was welcomed everywhere; in India, Gandhi and Dr. Westcott the Metropolitan commended it to their people; in South Africa, under the leadership of the Deans of Cape Town and Johannesburg English Christians joined with Indians in prayer, and Dr. da Plessis of Stellenboch issued a similar call to the Afrikaander people. whole Ashram will join you that day in your prayers. I hope to be that day in Wardha. I shall be with you in spirit that day though the body will be there with Vinoba and Jamnalalji.

Shastri\(^1\) was here yesterday. We had a long and quiet chat.

Please remember there can be no response from our side to any scheme of repatriation, voluntary or otherwise. We are bound to look after all returned immigrants. But that can be no part of any scheme.
Any such agreement will immediately make repatriation compulsory in substance though not in law.

I hope you are getting Young India regularly. I do deal with S.A. matters almost in every issue. The coming number will deal with Colonial-born Indians. It is an appeal to them not to ask for any differential treatment.

Hope you are keeping good health.
The elections here have saturated the atmosphere with poison.

With love,

Yours,

Mohan

From a photostat: G.N. 967

60. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

November 22, 1926

DEAR SATIS BABU,

I have your two letters. No one who reads your letter about Capt. Petaval can accuse you of want of humour. For conciseness and biting sarcasm, the letter is not to be improved upon.

Your letter about Prafulla Babu makes me intensely grieved. I wish you had given me the cause for this sudden change. What is he now going to do? It does mean much to me that a man of Kshitish Babu’s silent enthusiasm can be closely drawn to me, i.e., the movement.

You must not lose your equanimity on any account whatsoever.
Read over and over again that part of “Ayodhya Kand” which deals with the banishment of Rama. It is enough to make anyone rejoice in suffering. What though even the whole world should desert so long as

\(^1\) V. S. Srinivasa Sastri
your own faith does not desert you? Khadi if it has truth in it and true representatives will survive many more shocks. You must come to Wardha early and pass a few quiet days there.

Of course you will tell me to write to Prafulla Babu, if you think it necessary.

Here is a letter from Abhoy Ashram for publication. Please tell me what to do with it. I am telling Suresh Babu that I am sending it to you before publishing it.

Hemprabha Devi’s letter is sweet.

With love,

BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 1564

61. LETTER TO HEMPRABHA DAS GUPTA

Monday [November 22, 1926]

DEAR SISTER,

I am very happy to have your letter. You must alwas write to me.

I do not know the reason why Prafulla Babu left. Such things will keep on happening in the world. You are right in saying that in suffering the soul blossoms. This is the teaching of all religions.

I am relieved to know that all of you are now keeping good health.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 1615

62. LETTER TO C. RAJAGOPALACHARI

November 22, 1926

MY DEAR C.R.,

I have your letter. I knew when I wrote the article\(^1\) on hand-weaving vs. hand-spinning, that those whom I had in view would be little touched by it. But I could see that there were many who thought

\(^1\) It appears this letter was written on the same day as the one to Satis Chandra Das Gupta, vide the preceding item.

\(^2\) Vide “Handloom vs. Spinning-wheel”, 11-11-1926.
like them. They might understand the position. If I ever see the Viceroy, I do not expect to fare better with him. Two pice per day sticks in the throat. Acceptance of the wheel means a revolution in one’s outlook.

Well, you have Chhotelal there. I hope you will succeed in making him positively gay. I should even countenance his marriage, if I could make him shake off his moodiness. I will propose a vote of thanks to you at the next meeting of our newly-formed board, if you can renew him and make him think of others besides himself.

Sastri passed a pleasant afternoon with us yesterday. He asked be shown the Ashram and he looked at everything with interest.

Pethick-Lawrence tells me he had a nice time with you.

With love

Yours,

BAPU

[PS.]

What about Wardha?

From a photostat: S.N. 19744

63. LETTER TO RAVISHANKER G. ANJARIA

Kartika Vad 5 [November 23, 1926]

I have looked over your questions. Blind faith surely destroys the soul. Moreover, this is not a subject which requires you to believe in someone. It is therefore proper that everyone should decide for himslef with the help of his own discretion.

You will not find in my article anything to the effect that all stray dogs are in a miserable plight.

Nor have I stated anywhere that all dogs might bite or catch rabies.

Nor have I suggested at any place destruction of the canine race.

I would never suggest violence for the sake of utility. In my opinion, where there is no dharma there is no utility.

But those who needs must destroy dogs can easily busy them-

1 The reference to the two articles about killing rabid dogs which had appeared in Navajivan, 10-10-1926 and 17-10-1926, suggests that the letter was written in 1926.
selves with checking cow-slaughter like others who try to put an end to cow-slaughter though they think nothing of destroying vegetation. Whether the killing of a dog is unavoidable is to be decided on the merits of each individual case. Do not the Hindus who kill goats abjure cow-slaughter?

A man who looks to his own happiness and continually commits violence in quest of it knows not his dharma.

Have no fear that my articles would shake non-violence off its foundations.

Why should we not regard the deliberate breeding of dogs as unnecessary as we do that of mosquitoes and the like?

I do not endeavour to preach violence; I only intend to deprecate false non-violence. In fact, we have been committing grave violence in the name of non-violence. And I find that in these circumstances we cannot readily understand true non-violence.

I have no doubt that my view is based on true non-violence. I can, therefore, wait in patience. Do not be uneasy as I am not likely to ask you or anyone else to kill a dog or any other creature.

Vandemataram from
MOHANDAS

DOCTOR SAHEB RAVISHANKER GANESHJI ANJARIA
MANGROL
KATHIWAR

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S. N. 19968

64. LETTER TO JANAKDHARI PRASAD

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
November 24, 1926

DEAR JANAKDHARI BABU,

I have your letter. I was grieved to hear of your fever and happy to learn at the same time that you have pulled through.

I do not feel inclined to make time for reading the literature about the ‘Coming of the World Teacher’, because it would not carry conviction to me. If a great teacher comes down to the earth, he would leave his mark whether we recognize him or not. So long as we believe in and worship God with all our heart, we are on the safe ground. He will make our way clear to whatever we should do.

Yours sincerely,

JANAKDHARI PRASAD
GANDHI VIDYALAYA
HAJIPUR

From a microfilm: S.N. 19746

65. LETTER TO F. W. PETHICK-LAWRENCE

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
November 24, 1926

DEAR MR. LAWRENCE,

I was delighted to receive your letter.\(^1\) Friends had really prepared me for receiving you and Mrs. Lawrence at the Ashram and I was looking forward to your visit here. I am sorry you were not able to come. I shall certainly be delighted to meet you at Gauhati if I come there. There is just a likelihood of my being unable to attend the forthcoming Congress. I shall know more fully during the second week of December.

I shall be in Wardha near Nagpur between 4th and 20th December.

I, indeed, remember having had the privilege of lunching with you in London when I was there on the South African Deputation.

Yours sincerely,

F. W. PETHICK-LAWRENCE, ESQ.
C/O. GREAT EASTERN HOTEL
CALCUTTA

From a photostat: S.N. 19747

\(^1\) Writing from Adyar on November 16, Pethick-Lawrence who, along with his wife, was then visiting India, had recalled Gandhiji’s visits to them in London many years ago, and hoped to meet Gandhiji again at the Gauhati Congress the following month (S.N. 10840).
66. LETTER TO J. W. PETAVAL

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
November 24, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. In order to know something about your activity as distinguished from your writings, I asked a kind friend in Calcutta to see your place.¹ The enclosed is an extract from his letter.² You, will, therefore, see that I am in my own way trying to study your movement. Let me feel my way to it in the manner I know.

Yours sincerely,

From a microfilm: S.N. 19748

67. LETTER TO DEVCHAND PAREKH

Wednesday [November 24, 1926]³

BHAISHRI DEVCHANDBHAI,

I have your letter. There will be accommodation for as many as will come. We shall consider the cases of Hakim Saheb, Dr. Ansari and others. If you arrive on Monday evening, it will be all right.

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 5710

68. NOTES

ADDRESS TO SASTRI

Ahmedabad honoured itself by using the occasion of the Rt. Hon. Sastri’s private visit to present him with an address and a purse. It is worthy of note that persons belonging to all parties joined the function. Would that such occasions were often seized to demonstrate our oneness in spite of our political or religious differences and also to promote mutually courteous and friendly intercourse among different groups.

COLONIAL-BORN INDIANS

I have received a letter on behalf of colonial-born Indians of South Africa chiding me for “absolutely forgetting them”. The letter ³ The postmark bears the date, 25-11-1926, Sabarmati.

says:

Our only desire is that we should receive only one message from you. I am sure you will not refuse this our last request to you.

I appreciate the affection underlying this rebuke. There is a strong tie binding the colonial-born Indians to me. But there was no special message that I could think of sending to them. The majority of my messages are sent through the weeklies that I am editing. And the pages of Young India and Gujarati and Hindi Navajivan are full of messages to the settlers and their descendants in South Africa. Though I do attend to a great deal of private correspondence, force of circumstances has obliged me to restrict it to its utmost limit and treat these weeklies as a vehicle for correspondence. These weeklies, as a friend once reminded me, are not newspapers but views-papers, for the transmission of my views such as they are. They have also received messages through C.F. Andrews. But these friends want me to send them a special message through the Rt. Hon. Srinivasa Sastri. I know what this request means. The letter reminds me of the days when Gokhale was in South Africa. The colonial-born Indians knew my connection with Gokhale and they rightly expect me to use Srinivasa Sastri as a vehicle for all my thoughts and sentiments. Colonial-born Indians and other friends in South Africa will certainly have their heart’s content through Srinivasa Sastri.

I am writing these notes before meeting him. We shall have discussed the whole of the South African question not only in its relationship to the things that the Union Government can or cannot do, but also to the things that the Indians, including the colonial-born, can and cannot do. But one thing I would say to the latter publicly. Let them beware of the tendency to cut themselves away from the settlers who were not born there and of asking for special privileges by reason of their own South African birth. Let them remember that they are, and remain, Indians in every sense of the term in spite of their South African birth and that, therefore, their duty is to throw in their lot completely with the former and work with them in every possible way. They will, by so doing, serve themselves and the country. Let them remember the work that they did so selflessly and bravely as members of the Stretcher Bearer Corps in 1899 during the Boer War and during the protracted satyagraha struggle between 1906 and 1914. Never was there then a whisper of their cutting themselves adrift or asking for special privileges. They have a great future before them if they will seize the occasion. They can become a living link between South Africa and India, if they will but represent the best of India and assimilate the best of the Western civilization that they come in contact with and as it is represented there by the best Englishmen and the best Boers.

A TISSUE OF MISREPRESENTATIONS

A friend sent me some time ago an article written about me in The Nineteenth Century and After. I glanced through it, but it contained so many misrepresentations that I did not think it worthwhile reading it through, nor did I feel inclined to contradict the many falsehoods contained in it. Those who would credit them were not likely to be affected by any contradiction from me. But now a law student who, from the tone of his letter, has felt deeply hurt by the article, which he does not believe, wants me to deal with two specific statements. They are:

In one of the schools which owed allegiance to Gandhi, a high-caste parent refused co-education of his son with the out-caste, and a high-caste teacher refused to teach a low-caste boy. The question was referred to Gandhi who upheld the high-caste men. That he said he would have helped the untouchables if he could does not excuse him.

The papers of the time published statements to the effect that Gandhi was busy over his work of collection in Bombay and could not come just then, etc.

They are both false. Those who know my work about untouchables know that I have resisted, at the risk of losing friendships and donations to public causes, any attempt to discriminate against untouchables in national institutions. There is half truth in the statement about Chandpur. I did not go there when the trouble broke out. But the reason given by the writer is utterly devoid of truth. I am not omnipotent. I have only a limited sphere of work. I apply myself to the task that comes to me. I go only where I am wanted and where I regard myself competent to render some service. Thus I do not now run to places where Hindus and Mussalmans fight, not because I do not want to go or am preoccupied, but because I feel powerless. Nor do I rush wherever labour troubles occur, even though I may be invited. The work I was then doing had nothing to do with my not going to Chandpur. If I had felt the call I would have gone at all cost.

The law student and others who are interested in me will do well not to be disturbed over misrepresentations regarding me. They are the lot of public workers. My reputation will not suffer by misrepresentations. It certainly will when I am guilty of misconduct. No whitewashing will then save it. But today my withers are unwrung even though a German friend tells me that a German paper accuses me of having promoted a film company. The innocent writer does not know that I have never once been to a cinema and refuse to be enthused about it and waste God-given time in spite of pressure sometimes used by kind friends. They tell me it has an educational value. It is possible that it has. But its corrupting influence obtrudes itself upon me every day. Education, therefore, I seek elsewhere.

THE WHEEL IN ENGLAND

A correspondent writes:

I give below some extracts from Village Industries by J. L. Green:

“Spinning and weaving, too, have been revived here and there as an auxiliary occupation. A good example of what may be done by enthusiasm in this direction exists at Willey, one of the beautiful villages for which Surrey is famous. A few years ago Miss Margaret Lieth, one of the youngest lady inhabitants of the village, commenced a weekly spinning and weaving class in a large comfortable room in her garden, and by her example and energy, she has managed to get practically the whole village interested in the work.

“A third example is the spinning and weaving industry at Winterlow, where several men and women are employed in their own homes and in a weaving-shed.”

If the charkha is not out of place in England how much less is it in India?

This extract but emphasizes the titbits (often quoted in these pages) Sjt. Balaji Rao of Coimbatore has been assiduously collecting to demonstrate the universality of the life-giving industry.

KHADDAR AND MADRAS GOVERNMENT

Sjt. C. V. Rangam Chetti addressed the following letter to the Madras Government:

I have the honour to bring to your kind notice that some of the Government servants are terribly afraid to purchase hand-spun and hand-woven cloths when our hawkers approach them. They are under the impression that they should not purchase these cloths. You are aware that the Bombay Government is openly appealing to the people to encourage Indian industries. In last summer Rs. 800 worth of khaddar was sold by my hawkers at Ooty. Most of the purchasers are Government servants. I have the honour to request that you will be good enough to let me know whether Government servants are allowed to purchase hand-spun and hand-woven cloths without fear by the Madras Government.

To which the following reply has been received by him:

The honorary Manager, All-India Spinners’ Association (Andhra Branch), is informed that the Government have no reason to suppose that either the fear or the impression referred to exists among those in their service.

I congratulate both the parties and I hope that if there are Government employees who refuse to buy khadi for fear of Government, they will shed their fear and their foreign garments.

Young India, 25-11-1926

69. A DAY OF PRAYER

C. F. Andrews has sent me the following characteristic cablegram:

He is an intensely godly man and, therefore, a man of prayer. His politics are guided, coloured and ennobled by his prayers. Prayer with him is no empty formula. It is with him intense and incessant communion with God and waiting upon Him for guidance is his daily work great and small. No work that is done in His name and dedicated to Him is small. All work when so done assumes equal merit. A scavenger who works in His service shares equal distinction with a king who uses his gifts in His name and as a mere trustee. Unlike as among us very imperfect beings, in His Durbar the motive rather than the act itself decides its quality. We infer the intention from the act. He, knowing the intention as much as the act, judges the act according to the intention.

And Andrews, because his intentions are the purest possible, believes that God will ensure his success. He has every reason for his belief. For he has hitherto succeeded where others have failed. No one knows the history of Andrews’s many unseen services. Those the public see are by no means the most significant or fruitful, not to mention contemporary events. Who knows, for instance, how he influenced the many beneficent decisions of Lord Hardinge? Truly with him, his “left hand knoweth not what his right hand doeth”.

This good man has made his own this South African matter to which he was first appointed by Gokhale. He thinks and prays about it intensely. He had prepared me by a previous letter for the cable I have given to the public. He has infected the Indians with his belief in prayer. I know them all and I must own that many have accepted his advice purely as a matter of form or to please him or to make political capital out of the event. But I know that there are some who have endorsed his proposition with absolute sincerity. The sincerity of the few will cover the insincerity or the indifference of the many.

The Dutch element of South Africa is religious according to its own lights. In South Africa, therefore, in times of famines or locust visitations, there are days officially appointed for humiliation and prayer. It is then no wonder that Andrews has found the best European sentiment ranging itself round a proposal which has its seat, not in his brain but in his heart. But he is not easily satisfied. He wants an adequate response from India and her public bodies. He wants no resolutions, he does not ask for money, he wants a melting of our hearts. He wants us, if we will, to look Godward. He wants us to seek help from God.

Andrews has become an Indian because he is an Englishman. He wants to rule not by force but by love. And love ever identifies itself with the loved one. He believes that the reputation of European humanity is at stake in South Africa. So much tribulation has been suffered in South Africa that in his opinion, the future of the relations between Asiatic and coloured races and the European will largely depend upon the deliberations of the forthcoming Conference, which is mainly a result of his efforts. He wants divine blessings on these deliberations and asks our co-operation [in] invoking them. Let no one ask what is prayer and where and who is God. Both prayer and belief in God are supremely acts of faith. Let those, therefore, who have that faith respond to the appeal of this English Indian.

Prayer is a result of realization of our helplessness and our final reliance upon God to the exclusion of all else. We are surely conscious of our helplessness. On the eve of his departure, the Rt. Hon. Srinivasa Sastri has called the Indian cause which he is going to espouse a ‘desperate cause’. Let us then pray on the 19th if we have faith in God. All Hindus, Mussalmans, Christians, Parsis, Jews and others can join if they will. Though we may know Him by a thousand names, He is one and the same to us all.

Young India, 25-11-1926
This is a joint production from the teachers of a Board High School. It is therefore a somewhat representative and responsible document. But for this character the letter bears, I should not have published it. The campaign against untouchability and other social and religious reforms is bringing to light grotesque and subtle ideas held even by men of learning. The defence offered by the teachers of gross superstitions shows how argument follows conviction, and, therefore, shows what a small place argument holds in any great movement. It is the example of the reformer that matters. And when that example assumes power by being proof against misrepresentation, calumny, and persecution even to the point of death, the reform spreads. So will it be with untouchability and the like. But let us evaluate these teachers’ arguments for a while.

In the first instance, they have chosen a bad analogy. I do not know that people are afraid to approach me or to touch me. On the contrary, whenever I travel, I am embarrassed by the over-attention of crowds wanting to touch me. They will not leave me alone even while I am taking my bath.

Secondly, if our untouchable countrymen are afraid to touch the higher-caste men, surely it is not because of the latter’s greater purity, but because they have been taught not to touch them and because of the knowledge that any attempt to touch would be followed by abuse or worse.

Thirdly, the inferiority, in point of character, of the untouchables is an unwarranted assumption. Class considered, probably they are in no way inferior to the others for truthfulness, purity and other public and private virtues, which under favourable circumstances they have been capable of exhibiting as fully as any.

It is a misuse of the doctrine of previous birth to argue that these people will require generations before they can come up to the level of the so-called high-castes. The Gita teaches us that it is as open to an untouchable as to a learned pundit to attain salvation in the existing birth. If the high-castes are really higher, they should have no fear of association with the untouchables. For the latter can only gain by such

1 These ideas were embodied in a joint statement, not reproduced here, in which the authors had questioned the wisdom of Gandhiji’s anti-untouchability campaign, pleaded for sattvic food, suggested that Gandhiji should take to the yoga of the rishis, and persuade some of his followers to live and work in villages.
superior contact without the former becoming in any way degraded especially when they mix among the untouchables for the sake of service and not for the sake of mere sociableness in which there is mutual give and take of vice and virtue. I do not become contaminated by entering a public house if I enter it as a reformer with the intention of weaning the drunkard from his habit as I would be contaminated if I entered a public house with a friend to keep him company and without any preconceived determination of resisting the temptation that the public house or the friend may place in my way.

Equally strange is the argument of the teachers regarding the influence of food on character. I am a keen food reformer, many friends consider me to be fanatical in my zeal for food reform and for reducing one’s food to the simplest terms possible. But I know that the teachers are attaching importance to food out of all proportion and the influence it exerts upon character. If public work were to be suspended till public workers were found who would avoid all condiments and subscribe to a rigid food formula, there would be no public work done. One can only press the advantages of a simple, frugal and non-stimulating diet upon workers. But one dare not stop all public activity till that reform has been achieved. The mischievous habit that has grown up of measuring religion and conduct in terms of food is highly detrimental to the growth of a sound religious sense. For these worthy teachers would even postpone the overdue marriage reform, till people begin to take what they are pleased to call sattvic food. There is no doubt whatsoever that there is a vital connection between diet and self-restraint. At the same time, innumerable instances are on record of people being in the habit of taking ordinary food and still keeping themselves under restraint. Those who are trying to exercise self-restraint find out for themselves the value of regulating the demands of the palate. It would be wrong, therefore, to make of dietetic reform an indispensable condition for other reforms. As for the removal of the cruel practice of child-marriage let the teachers and those who think like them know that there are people who, in spite of their rigidly simple diet, find it most difficult to curb their animal passions. After all is said and done, “the mind is its own place, and in itself can make heaven of hell, a hell of heaven”. And why is there all this morbid anxiety about female purity? Have women any say in the matter of male purity? We hear nothing of women’s anxiety about men’s chastity. Why should men arrogate to themselves the right to regulate female purity? It cannot be superimposed from without. It is a matter of evolution from within and, therefore, of individual self-effort.

As to the results of practice of yoga and non-violence, I cannot subscribe to the claim made by the teachers on behalf of those who take to non-violence and yogic practices. Even the most advanced among them cannot override the irrevocable and immutable laws of nature. They are as much bound by them as any of us. God Himself has reserved no right of revision of His own laws nor is there any need for Him for any such revision. He is all-powerful, all-knowing. He knows at the same time and without any effort the past, the present and the future. He has, therefore, nothing to reconsider, nothing to revise, nothing to alter and nothing to amend.

Non-violent people and yogis do undoubtedly develop certain powers. But they are all within the realm of Universal Law. I do not resort to any yogic practice firstly, because I have inward peace without it (It may be wrong on my part to be content with my present lot.) and, secondly, because I have not found a person whom I could implicitly trust and who could teach me the proper yogic exercises.

As for the movement towards villages, many of my co-workers are already working in the villages. But I confess that it is an uphill task. I own that it is not possible for everybody to be able to settle down in a village because he has the will.

Young India, 25-11-1926

71. KHADI WORK IN TAMIL NADU

The following carefully prepared report of khadi work in Tamil Nadu for the past twelve months will be studied with interest. It shows slow but steady progress in every branch of the work. The reduction in the selling price by 25 per cent is a good gain, though part of it is no doubt due to the fall in the price of cotton. The quality of khadi has perceptibly improved. One feature of the sales is that three fourths of the khadi is now being sold locally. This was not so in the initial 1 Not reproduced here. The report covered the work of 64 khadi organizations in 13 Tamil districts for the period October 1925—September 1926. It gave figures to show that, whereas production through private agencies was increasing, direct production through A.I.S.A. had decreased. It also gave figures to show that prices had been reduced, quality had improved and sales had gone up, and described efforts being made to seek the co-operation of local bodies in introducing hand-spinning in schools.

stages. The hawking scheme is largely responsible for this healthy improvement. The report draws attention to the ignorant and extraordinary Government resolution which prohibits introduction of hand-spinning in schools where hand-weaving is also not taught and which thus renders the introduction of hand-spinning all but impossible. The ignorance of the framer of the resolution is on a par with that of a noted economist who thinks he has demolished hand-spinning all the while knowing it only as hand-weaving.

Young India, 25-11-1926

72. LETTER TO C. VIJAYARAGHAVACHARIAR

THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI, November 25, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I did not say in my first letter that I am not sure of attending the Congress this year for the simple reason that I do not know whether I can [be] of any service? At the same time, I shall not certainly avoid going there if my absence is at all likely to be misunderstood. But I shall consult friends when this wretched election fever has subsided.

My attitude towards Hindu-Muslim unity is a fixed thing. I want it without the slightest bargain and I shall strain every nerve to secure it.

Yours sincerely,

From a photostat: S.N. 12087

73. LETTER TO L. R. PANGARKAR

THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI, November 25, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I deeply appreciate it. I cannot give you any

1 In his letter of November 17, Vijayaraghavachariar had likened Gandhiji to “sandalwood which perfumes the hand that crushes it and would yield none of its fragrance to gentle touches” and hoped that Gandhiji would solve the Hindu-Muslim problem at the Gauhati session of the Congress (S.N. 12083).
idea of how much I avoid writing and speaking on all kinds of subjects that are referred to me. But on some matters when reference is made, it is impossible for me to avoid speaking or writing, even at the risk of losing popularity and more. When saying what you feel is relevant, if you do not say it you are guilty of untruth. I cannot very well alter the whole course of my life by suppressing the truth rather than the telling of it because relevant.

Yours sincerely,

L. R. PANGARKAR, ESQ.
NASIK CITY

From a microfilm: S.N. 19749

74. LETTER TO REVASHANKER J. MEHTA

Thursday [November 25, 1926]

RESPECTED REVASHANKERBHAI,

Received your letter. The matter about the [Ramachandran] water-lift is clear to me. I feel that we ought to keep an eye on Dhiru’s diet.

I shall leave this place for Wardha on the 2nd. I have chanced upon the postcard Chi. Ratilal² wrote to a diamond merchant asking for diamonds. He has not much judgment. He admitted [having done that] when I spoke to him. Both have returned from Dhoraji³.

Pranams from
MOHANDAS

SHRIYUT REVASHANKER JAGJIVAN MEHTA
ROSEDALE
DEOLALI

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G. N. 1265

---

¹ From the postmark
² Son of the addressee’s brother, Dr. Pranjivandas Mehta
³ A small town in Saurashtra
75. A LETTER

THE ASHRAM,
Thursday, November 25, 1926

BHAISHRI,

I have your letter. I have no doubts about the importance of agriculture. But I do not know of any other means apart from the charkha for promoting agriculture.

Vandemataram from
MOHANDAS GANDHI

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19969

76. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

Kartika Krishna 6, 1983 [November 25, 1926]

BHAISHRI GHANSHYAMDASJI,

I got your telegram. I am sorry to tell you that my last letter to you was sent to revered Malaviyaji’s address. It only said this: The reason why I oppose your going to Europe is that you should go as a free person. Copies of such letters are not kept. But this was the purport. It is a different matter if you had promised and are morally bound to go.

Yours,
MOHANDAS GANDHI

From the Hindi original: C.W. 6139. Courtesy: G. D. Birla

77. LETTER TO LILAVATI

Kartika Krishna 6, 1983 [November 25, 1926]

CHI. LILAVATI,

There is no better mantra than Ramanama. In this age and in this country there can be no yajna better than that of the charkha.

MOHANDAS

From a photostat of the Hindi: G. N. 6277

1 Addressee not known
78. LETTER TO VRAJLAL JAGANNATH SHARMA

Kartik Krishna 6, 1983 [November 25, 1926]

SHRI VRAJLALJI,

I have your letter. I beg to be excused for the delay in replying. Your mother can certainly come here. She can also have a room to herself. I hope she will not be hindered by the problem of untouchability.

Yours,
M. K. GANDHI

SHRI VRAJLAL JAGANNATH SHARMAJI
C/O B. N. MOTIWALA, ESQ.
MALABAR HILL
BOMBAY

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 10577

79. LETTER TO E. STANLEY JONES

SABARMATI,
November 26, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I shall be pleased to meet Bishop Welsh when he comes.
Pray tell Mrs. Jones I have not forgotten her commission¹. But I have not yet been able to steal a single minute for the work.

Yours sincerely,
M. K. GANDHI

From a photostat : C. W. 11342. Courtesy : Mrs. Eunice Jones Mathews

80. TELEGRAM TO PRESIDENT, CONGRESS, KHAGARIA

[SABARMATI, On or after November 26, 1926]

NOT INTERFERING ELECTIONS. ALL CHARGE HANDED SWARAJISTS.

GANDHI

From the draft: C.W. 4964. Courtesy: Parasram Mehrotra

¹ Vide “Spinning as Deathbed Consolation”, 18-11-1926
² This was sent in reply to a telegram from the addressee received in Sabarmati on November 26, 1926 which read: “Printed copies telegram purport[ing] your saying voting Congressmen sinful published here confusing Council voters. Wire . . . publication actual facts.”
81. DISCOURSES ON THE “GITA”
[1]
February 24, 1926

This verse' provides the key to the study of the Gita. It is both a prayer and a stipulation. It says, “Whatever you may be, whether Vishnu or Siva, if you are free from attachment and aversions, I bow to you.”

The Mahabharata is not history; it is a dharma-grantha'. Who can ever describe an actual event? A man cannot exactly describe even a drop of water seen by him. God having created him so weak, how can he describe an actual event perfectly? In this battle, moreover, the warriors were, on the one side, the sons' of Dharma, Vayu, Indra and Ashvinikumars and, on the other, a hundred brothers' all born at the same instant. Have we ever heard of such a thing actually happening? Duryodhana rode on the chariot of adharma', and Arjuna that of dharma. The battle described here is, therefore, a struggle between dharma and adharma. Sanjaya is a man of devotion. The battle takes place far away from where he is, and he cannot see it; Vyasa therefore, endows him with divine vision so that he can see what is happening. And what does this signify? Only this: that the epic describes the battle ever raging between the countless Kauravas and Pandavas dwelling within us. It is a battle between the innumerable forces of good and evil which become personified in us as virtues and vices. We shall leave aside the question of violence and non-violence and say

---

1 The talks were given at the Satyagraha Ashram, Ahmedabad, during morning prayers over a period of nine months from February 24 to November 27, 1926. Notes were taken by Mahadev Desai and Punjabhai, an inmate of the Ashram. These were edited by Narahari Parikh and published in book form in 1955 under the title Gandhijinu Gitashikshan.

2 The verse in question was recited by Narayan Moreshwar Khare, music teacher at the Ashram.

3 Work treating of religious and ethical questions

4 Yudhishthira, Bhima, Arjuna, Nakula and Sahadeva whose fatherhood has been attributed to the five gods listed

5 The Kauravas

6 Eldest of the Kauravas

7 The opposite of dharma

8 Third among the Pandavas, the central figure in the epic

9 Who saw and reported the battle to the blind King Dhritarashtra, father of the Kauravas

10 Author of the Mahabharata; he himself figures in some of the episodes described in the epic.
that this dharma-grantha was written to explain man’s duty in this inner strife.

[2]

Chapter I

February 25, 1926

Quite a few such blind men live within us. This is not a battle which took place so many thousand years ago; it is one which is raging all the time, even today.

Duryodhana tells Dronacharya that his own pupil, Dhristadyumna, has planned the deployment [on the Pandava side]. They are, on both sides, his pupils, to whom he has imparted the same knowledge. But it depends on themselves whether they use that knowledge well or ill.

[3]

February 26, 1926

I displayed my ignorance, not knowledge, on the first day. But there is much in the Gita for anyone who, though ignorant of grammar, aspires after moksha. It is stated in the Gita itself that everyone, whether a woman, a Vaisya or a Sudra, can acquire spiritual knowledge if they have devotion to God. All the same, learning should not be slighted. To understand any matter, one must have the knowledge which comes from learning. If any one of you had committed the mistake which I did, I would not have overlooked it.

Well, then, the battle-field described here is primarily the one inside the human body. Does the Gita then prohibit physical fighting altogether? No; fighting there may well be. But here the physical battle is only an occasion for describing the battle-field of the human body. In this view the names mentioned are not of persons but of qualities which they represent. What is described is the conflict within the human body between opposing moral tendencies imagined as distinct figures. A seer such as Vyasa would never concern himself with a description of mere physical fighting. It is the human body that is described as Kurukshetra, as dharma-kshetra. It does become that

---

1 This talk covers the first three verses of Chapter I.
2 The reference is to Dhritarashtra.
3 The Brahmin preceptor who had taught the Pandavas and the Kauravas the art and science of war
4 Brother of Draupadi, wife of the Pandavas
5 That is, on February 25, 1926. Gandhiji had made a mistake while splitting a vowel combination (pashya+etam in I. iii).
6 Field of dharma
when used in the service of God. The epithet may also mean that for a Kshatriya a battle-field is always a field of dharma. Surely a field on which the Pandavas too were present could not be altogether a place of sin.

Bankimchandra says that it is doubtful whether Draupadi had five sons. It is, however, difficult to decide. Karna had the Sun-god as father. Every one of the characters had a miraculous birth. Whether out of compassion for Duryodhana, or because he was generous-hearted, Karna joined the former’s side. Besides Karna, Duryodhana had good men like Bhishma and Drona also on his side. This suggests that evil cannot by itself flourish in this world. It can do so only if it is allied with some good. This was the principle underlying non-co-operation, that the evil system which the Government represents, and which has endured only because of the support it receives from good people, cannot survive if that support is withdrawn. Just as the Government needs the support of good men in order to exist, so Duryodhana required men like Bhishma and Drona in order to show that there was justice on his side.

February 27, 1926

This pair of words can be interpreted in two different ways: aparyapta may mean (1) boundless, limitless, or (2) inadequate, insufficient; and paryapta may mean (1) limited or (2) adequate, sufficient. The meaning will depend on what we believe to be the feeling in Duryodhana’s heart. Of the two meanings of aparyapta, I have accepted “inadequate”, “insufficient”. It has appealed to me from my earliest days. What Duryodhana felt was that their army, protected by Bhishma, was not sufficiently strong, whereas the Pandava army, protected by Bhima, was; for grandfather Bhishma loved both sides and Duryodhana had, therefore, a secret fear that he might not fight with his whole heart.

1 Bankimchandra Chatterjee (1838-1894); Bengali poet and novelist; author of Krishnacharitra—a book which Gandhiji had read during his imprisonment in Yeravda.
2 Uncle of Pandu and Dhritarashtra; to enable his father Santanu to marry Satyavati, he renounced his claim to kingship and pledged that he would never marry.
3 This talk covers verses 10 to 16 dwelling chiefly on verse 10.
4 The second of the Pandavas
February 28, 1926

The use of Sanskrit for prayers is a mere form; the real aim is to let the meaning of dharma sink into one’s heart. Simple like a villager that I am, why should I insist on reading the Gita myself? Why should Mahadev refuse to do that? Why did I take this upon myself? Because I have the necessary humility. I believe that we are all imperfect in one way or another. But I know well enough what dharma means, and have tried to follow it in my life. If I have somewhere deep in me the spirit of dharma and loving devotion to God, I shall be able to kindle it in you. But one cannot light a piece of stone. Only those of you who have some oil and wick in them will light their lamp with this match-stick of mine; only those who have something in them will profit from this discussion.

Our pronunciation should be such that the recitation of the verses would immediately please the mind. I committed a grammatical error yesterday. In the clause shankham dadhmau pratapavan\(^1\), I explained pratapavan as being in apposition to shankham. It should be applied to Bhishma, the grandfather. But my Sanskrit is no better than a villager’s. I am not so proficient in it that, if I commit an error, it would be immediately felt by my ear, would jar on it.

Sanjaya is proceeding with his description of the conches which are being blown in the Pandava camp.

Kairmaya saha yoddhavyam:\(^2\) Arjuna is asking, not whether it is necessary that he should fight, but against whom he has to fight. If he did not wish to fight, he would have told Krishna so on the previous day itself. He had no aversion to fighting as such. In fact, he had obtained Yudhishthira’s\(^3\) permission and secured weapons from Indra that he might fight. Krishna would have, in that case, asked Arjuna to go to Duryodhana and win him over. But that was not the case. Arjuna had fought even during the exile. He had fought when King Virat\(^4\) was attacked by Duryodhana. He was always prepared to fight. His question, therefore, was who they were against whom he would be

---

1. Gandhiji had remarked that Mahadev Desai knew better how to read the verses and explain the meaning, and the latter had demurred.
2. The valiant one blew his conch; I, 12.
3. Against whom I must fight; I, 22.
4. The eldest of the Pandavas
5. With whom the Pandavas lived in disguise during the last year of their exile fighting. We should always bear this in mind.

[6]

March 2, 1926

Arjuna requests Shri Krishna to station his chariot between the two armies, so that he may see the warriors on the field.

He sees that all of them are relatives and friends, whom one cannot easily bring oneself to kill.

Arjuna says: “I do not see any good in killing one’s kinsmen.” The stress here is on “kinsmen”. He says:

I would not fight against them, even for the kingdom of the three worlds; how could I, then, fight against them for a few clods of earth?\(^1\)

Because he has asked for only five villages as the Pandavas’ share. He repeatedly asks how he can be happy after killing his kinsmen. All his arguments are summed up in the question: Kairmaya saha yoddhayam? He is unhappy, not at the thought of killing, but at the thought of whom he was required to kill. By putting the word “kinsmen” repeatedly in his mouth, the author of the \textit{Gita} shows into what darkness and ignorance he has sunk. Arjuna has been arguing from a practical point of view and Shri Krishna, it is hinted here, will try to meet that very argument.

The world will blame a person even for going to a court against his relations. Arjuna is shaken in his whole being, but it is not as if Shri Krishna wanted him to cast off this weakness of his forthwith. If, while seeking to follow the path of good, we do not eschew something which even in practical life we are required to eschew, dharma would cease to be dharma. In our daily life we avoid doing things out of fear of society. In this case, it is not merely a question of avoiding something which even ordinary people would avoid; it is a question of killing hundreds of thousands of men. How could Arjuna bring himself to do that? He had no need to go to Krishna for an answer to the question. If he could have approached us, even we could have told him; “Do not fight.” When the dharma laid down for even this \textit{kaliyuga}\(^2\) requires us to refrain from unnecessary fighting, we should ask why Arjuna thought it necessary to put the question to Shri Krishna and why the two had such a long discussion. We can, therefore, understand the teaching of the \textit{Gita} aright only if we give

\(^1\) \textit{Bhagavad Gita}, I, 35
\(^2\) \textit{Age of strife}

VOL. 37 : 11 NOVEMBER, 1926 - 1 JANUARY, 1927 79
careful thought to the author’s aim and the attendant circumstances. These last verses, however, are of great importance, for the entire argument which follows is based on them; we shall discuss them tomorrow.

March 3, 1926

What people would generally do in their common dealings is regarded as good. If we see anyone here, or elsewhere, who renounces a right in regard to worldly matters and forgives even strangers, not to speak of relations, we would think of him as a good man. If we desist from beating up a thief or any other felon, do nothing to get him punished but, after admonishing him and recovering from him the stolen article, let him go, we would be credited with humanity and our action would be regarded as an instance of non-violence; a contrary course would be looked upon as violence. How is it, then, that Shri Krishna stops Arjuna from advancing such an argument? How can we explain a plainly contrary teaching in Bhagavad Gita? Why does Shri Krishna describe Arjuna as cowardly and weak?

The Bhagavad Gita is consistent from the first to the last verse. That is why we meditate on its teaching and hope to discover from it the path to moksha. We should, therefore, think whether Arjuna’s argument is valid or contains some flaw.

As though he were digging up a mountain to discover a mouse, Shri Krishna describes the Gita, at the conclusion of each chapter, as an Upanishad, as a Yogashastra and as brahmavidya and describes this particular one as a chapter on Arjuna’s despondency.

It is important to consider what Arjuna’s question was and what the circumstances were in which he raised it. Having got his chariot stationed between the two armies, he said he wanted to see who those men were against whom he would be fighting. His reason is, for the time being, clouded. He has lost his nerve. All that has gone before shows that Arjuna is a great warrior and that, when starting out to fight, he does not, like Dharmaraja, hesitate and ask all manner of questions. In the past, he never hesitated even when he had to fight against relations. Even during their fourteen years’ exile, he gave

1 Evidently, this is a slip for Vyasa, author of the Mahabharata.
2 A treatise on yoga
3 Knowledge concerning the Brahman, the Absolute 4 Yudhishtira
free expression to his hatred for the Kauravas before Dharmaraja; what is more, victory in the battle depends entirely on him. Bhima is physically strong and daring, but he lacks Arjuna’s power. In their preparations for the battle during the fourteen years’ exile, the other brothers always placed Arjuna at their head. When there was a battle outside Viratnagar, Arjuna, who had been living there in disguise wanted to be led to the place of fighting. Why does a man, who loves fighting to this extent, want his chariot to be stationed between the two armies and to see who the warriors are on the other side? He knows every one of them well enough. Why does he argue with Shri Krishna and tell him all that he does? He could have left the place immediately. Arjuna has a smaller army—an army of seven *aksh-auhini*¹ as against the Kauravas’ of eleven. Let us suppose that Arjuna flees the battle-field. Though his enemies are wicked people, are sinners, they are his relations and he cannot bring himself to kill them. If he leaves the field, what would happen to those vast numbers on his side? If Arjuna went away, leaving them behind, would the Kauravas have mercy on them? If he left the battle, the Pandava army would be simply annihilated. What, then, would be the plight of their wives and children? I publish in Navajivan a narrative of the European War, and there is a reason for this. It reminds us of the battle of the Mahabharata. I give the narrative so that readers may know the ruin which such a war brings on a whole people. If Arjuna had left the battlefield, the very calamities which he feared would have befallen them. Their families would have been ruined, and the traditional dharma of these families and the race would have been destroyed. Arjuna, therefore, had no choice but to fight. This is the meaning of the battle in crude physical terms; I shall discuss later what it would be if the battlefield were taken to be the human being.

I will tell you tomorrow what I said when I discussed the Gita in *Phoenix*².

[8]

Chapter II

March 4, 1926

Shri Krishna tells Arjuna: Shake off this faintness of heart and arise. His state of mind is imagined to be like that of Christian in the Slough of Despond. Why does Krishna say this to Arjuna, who is in

¹ A division of the army comprising 1,09,350 foot-soldiers, 65,610 horse-soldiers, 21,870 chariot-soldiers and 21,870 elephant-soldiers

² Settlement near Durban, which Gandhiji had founded in 1904 fact ready to forgo everything?

When I was in London, I had talks with many revolutionaries. Shyamji Krishnavarma, Savarkar\(^1\) and others used to tell me that the Gita and the Ramayana taught quite the opposite of what I said they did. I felt then how much better it would have been if the sage Vyasa had not taken this illustration of fighting for inculcating spiritual knowledge. For when even highly learned and thoughtful men read this meaning in the Gita, what can we expect of ordinary people? If what we describe as the very quintessence of all Shastras, as one of the Upanishads, can be interpreted to yield such a wrong meaning, it would have been better for the holy Vyasa to have taken another, more effective, illustration to teach sacred truths.

He has drawn Arjuna and Shri Krishna so vividly that we are inclined to regard them as historical figures. The historian-author, moreover, gives the histories of cities, communities and individual characters and claims that he is describing a battle in which the best men of his age took part. I said how much better it would have been if the revered Vyasa had not adopted the method which he did. This, you may say, was impertinence on my part. But what should one seeking to serve truth do? What must one do if one sees an error? It is not wrong to draw attention, in all humility, to what one feels to be an error. This thought remained in my mind for many years. Then I thought I should read the Mahabharata. I decided to do so, that I might understand the atmosphere of the age in which the Gita was written and feel the good and the evil influences at work in that age. I read in jail a Gujarati version of the Mahabharata which I could get there. I saw that Vyasa did not believe that fighting was wrong. The illustration which he has taken is a very beautiful one. Just as in Aesop’s Fables and in Panchtantra, the authors have created conversations among birds and animals to impart moral teaching, so in the Mahabharata virtues and vices are personified and great moral truths conveyed through those figures. The description of the battle serves only as a pretext. The Mahabharata itself was not composed with the aim of describing a battle. In the Gita, the author has cleverly made use of the event to teach great truths. If the reader is not on his guard, he may be misled. The very nature of dharma is such that one may easily fall into error if one is not vigilant. Anyone rashly imitating Prahlad would do something very wrong. This is the reason for the injunction against the reading of the Shastras by one without qualification. It is not easy for any person to solve the problems of dharma which may face him. He will not succeed till he has made himself fit by observing the yama-niyamas and similar other rules of discipline. To take up a work like the Gita without having equipped oneself in this manner is the surest way of falling into the Slough of Despond. It would be like taking up a study of botany without ever having seen plants.

\(^1\) Vinayak Damodar Savarkar

The author has used the word Gudakesha for Arjuna. It means one who has conquered sleep, who is always vigilant. We should, therefore, think carefully about this illustration of the battle. The first thing to bear in mind is that Arjuna falls into the error of making a distinction between kinsmen and outsiders. Outsiders may be killed even if they are not oppressors, and kinsmen may not be killed even if they are. My son, even if a drunkard, would inherit my property. I would write in Navajivan about another’s son if he was wicked, but would not treat my own son in that manner. The Gita says, “No, this is not right. We have no right to point an accusing finger at others. We should point out the lapses of our own people first.” Arjuna was Dronacharya’s best pupil. Bhishma had actually showered love on him as if he had been his first-born. Arjuna should be ready to kill either of them. It has become his duty to non-co-operate with both, for they have joined the wrong side. Should it become necessary to cut off, with a sword, one’s father’s head, one must do so if one has a sword and is a Kshatriya, and if one would be ready to cut off anyone else’s head in similar circumstances. Shri Krishna, therefore, asks Arjuna to free himself from ignorant attachments in this world. How should I act as editor of Navajivan? Would it be right for me to proclaim with beat of drum the theft committed by an outsider’s child and say nothing about a boy of my Ashram, who may have misbehaved in the same way? Certainly not. The Gita permits no distinction between one’s relations and others. If one must kill, one should kill one’s own people first. Shri Krishna asks Arjuna: “What is this you are saying about people being your relations?” The Gita wants to free him from this ignorant distinction of some people being his relations and others not. He has resolved to kill. It was not right, then, that he should shrink from killing particular individuals. It was not with any selfish motive that he had gone out to kill. Ravana

---

1 Rules of moral discipline and religious observances deserved to be killed by Rama. Why did not the latter take cover behind such wise talk? He knew well enough that Ravana could do no harm to Sita. But he did not argue with himself in that manner. We never say that he fought for the sake of Sita; we believe that he fought in order to kill Ravana.

Even if we believe in non-violence, it would not be proper for us to refuse, through cowardice, to protect the weak. If Arjuna had forgotten the difference between kinsmen and others and had been so filled with the spirit of non-violence as to bring about a change of heart in Duryodhana, he would have been another Shri Krishna. Actually, however, he believed Duryodhana to be wicked. I might be ready to embrace a snake, but, if one comes to bite you, I should kill it and protect you. Arjuna has two courses open to him: he should either kill Duryodhana and others, or else convert them. In the circumstances, Arjuna’s laying down arms would mean the annihilation of all those on his side. His refusal to fight would bring on a disaster. Thus, Vyasa has taken the right illustration. A person who believes in fighting and does not regard it as violence, though it is violence, is here being asked to kill.

[9]

March 5, 1926

The question which Arjuna asks Shri Krishna is not whether it is right for him to kill. His question is whether it would be right to kill his kinsmen. This question arises out of bias. Bhishma and Drona, a kinsman and an honoured person, stand vividly before his eyes. How can he kill them? To a person whose dilemma is not concerning violence and non-violence but is only about whom he may kill, our commonsense can give only one answer. But a godfearing man like Arjuna should pause and reflect before acting. Only a person with deep understanding can solve the rather fine problem whether he should go on with the recitation of gayatri1 or run to the help of someone who is crying out in distress. To a godfearing man, the problem would present no difficulty. The author of the Mahabharata has discussed such delicate issues on almost every page of the epic. He has taken instances from the lives of individual characters and drawn lessons from them. Some of the instances may well have been incidents of history, but he has treated them as poets and seers have

1 Vedic prayer to Sun-god for illumination always treated such incidents. English poets, too, have written plays and poems with historical figures as subjects. The author of the Mahabharata raises, for instance, the question whether the sage Vishv-amitra had secretly eaten beef\(^1\) and whether one should accept food offered by a chamar. The author has, thus, discussed problems of three kinds.

March 6, 1926

From today we begin the argument of the Gita and shall not, therefore, be able to go as fast with the verses as we have been doing.

“Accept innocent happiness, innocent joy, whatever the sou-tace,” said Raychandbhai. Accordingly, we may derive a variety of meanings from the verses of the Gita.

The argument addressed to Arjuna begins with the eleventh verse\(^2\), and continues right up to the last chapter. Shri Krishna starts with the distinction between the atman\(^3\) and the body, for that is the first step to spiritual knowledge. We must first know certain definitions, then alone can we proceed. Arjuna is represented as a seeker, as a man who believes in the atman and observes the disciplines of yama-niyama, and so Shri Krishna starts giving him the knowledge of the atman. One becomes entitled to ask questions and seek illumination only if one has observed brahmacharya\(^4\) and always followed truth, and only then will one’s questions deserve to be answered.
Arjuna has this fitness; he has the genuine spirit of submission and humility.

We have not yet fully discussed the premise on which the argument of the Gita is based. Yesterday we were discussing Arjuna’s plea that it is wrong to kill one’s kinsmen, not that it is wrong to kill at all. He was asked to forget the distinction of kinsmen and outsiders.
The Hindu Shastras say that non-violence is the supreme dharma. The question, therefore, whether or not it is right to kill does not arise.
Only an atheist would raise such a question. Arjuna has observed the disciplines of yama-niyama, among which ahimsa is placed first. But ahimsa is an ideal which it is impossible to realize to perfection. It may be possible to realize it in thought, but not in action. Shankara-

---

\(^1\) The story is told in the Shanti Parva of the Mahabharata.
\(^2\) Of Chapter II
\(^3\) The self, unidentifiable with any one aspect of human individuality
\(^4\) Celibacy, as an expression of perfect control of all the senses charya\(^1\) has said that one seeking \textit{moksha} should have far greater patience than one who would try to empty the sea, drop by drop, with a blade of grass. One must have equal patience for realizing the ideal of perfect non-violence. It is impossible in this body to follow ahimsa fully. That is why \textit{moksha} is laid down as the supreme end of life.

Violence is inescapable. While the eyes wink and nails have to be pared, violence in one form or another is unavoidable. Evil is inherent in action, the \textit{Gita} says further on. Arjuna did not, therefore, raise the question of violence and non-violence. He simply raised the question of distinction between kinsmen and others, much in the same way that a fond mother would advance arguments favouring her child.

The \textit{Bhagavad Gita} traces all maladies to their one source. A physician treats different diseases with different remedies. But, on the basis of researches in medical science, physicians are now coming to the conclusion that, though diseases seem different from one another, in the final analysis they are one. The cause is one, and so is the cure. Similarly, Shri Krishna says that there is only one spiritual evil, with only one cause and one remedy. To explain this oneness, an extreme example is used. If one’s kinsmen deserve to be killed, they ought to be killed; and one must not hesitate even if the entire world were likely to be destroyed in consequence. It is not only Arjuna’s right but his duty to act in this manner. To his question whether one ought not to make an exception in regard to relations, he gets an unambiguous answer. The principle, thus, admits of no exception, just as there can be no exception in the matter of following truth, for truth is God and, if exceptions were admitted in regard to it, God also would be sometimes truth and sometimes not-truth. Thus the rule in this instance admits of no exception.

Shri Krishna tells Arjuna that he is talking specious wisdom. The \textit{Gita} does not teach the path of action, nor of knowledge, nor of devotion. No matter how well one cultivates \textit{vairagya} or how diligent one is in performing good actions or what measure of \textit{bhakti}\(^2\) one practises, one will not shed the sense of “I” and “mine” till one has attained knowledge. One can attain self-realization only if one sheds this attachment to the ego. It is possible only for a person who has

---

\(^1\) 780-812; philosopher and teacher of Vedanta. He travelled all over the country and established a number of \textit{mathas}. His works include commentaries on the \textit{Bhagavad Gita} and the Upanishads and many hymns.

\(^2\) Devotion succeeded in doing so. In English, ‘i’ is a vertical line with a dot above it. Only when this ‘I’ is done away with can one attain self-realization. A man’s devotion to God is to be judged from the extent to which he gives up his stiffness and bends low in humility. Only then will he be, not an impostor, but a truly illumined man, a man of genuine knowledge. The Gita does not advocate any one of the three paths; I have from my experience come to the conclusion that it has been composed to teach this one truth which I have explained. We can follow truth only in the measure that we shed our attachment to the ego.

It is to teach this that Shri Krishna has advanced the beautiful argument of the Gita.

[11]

March 7, 1926

As every human being passes through childhood, youth and so on to old age, so also does he or she meet death. The phrase dehanantarprapti used here does not mean a new body or another life, for what is being discussed here is the fear of death, not that of a new life.

[12]

March 9, 1926

We feel afraid only so long as we take the rope to be a serpent. Likewise, if we know the natural stages of growth of the body, we shall not grieve over death. In order to help Arjuna to overcome his agitation, Shri Krishna tries to explain to him the difference between the atman and the body.

O Kaunteya, contacts of the senses with their objects bring cold and heat, pleasure and pain; they come and go and are transient. Endure them, O Bharata.

O noblest of men, the wise man who is not disturbed or agitated by these, who is unmoved by pleasure and pain, he alone is fitted for immortality.³

Any being who is not subject to the impressions of senses will never experience fear. It is these impressions which are responsible for the feelings of happiness and misery. Someone has said that the muscles of a man who is angry become thirteen times as tense as when he is normal, and of a man who is laughing nine times as tense. That is, one spends more energy when one is angry, and one whose energy is thus wasted cannot attain to immortality. The cultivation of this state requires practice. We can even say of a person who has attained to it that he is God. Once a sannyasi, an impostor, paid a visit to Phoenix. He asked me to recite any verse from the Gita which I knew. I recited this one. During the early days of my legal practice, I was on one occasion very much troubled in my mind. I then went out for a walk. I was very much agitated. I then remembered this verse, and the very next moment I was almost dancing with relief. We should identify ourselves with Arjuna and have faith that Shri Krishna is driving our chariot. Thus, the meaning of the Gita on the commonsense level is that, once we have plunged into a battle, we should go on fighting. One ought not to give up the task one has undertaken. In this way, the illustration used should not be pointless or inadequate and a wise man should not read a wrong meaning in it either.

¹ Gandhiji uses the word ‘shunya’ for ‘dot’. The suggestion is that one progress on the spiritual path in the measure that one travels towards this shunya or zero.
² Passing into another body; II, 13
³ II, 14 and 15. The translation of this and other verses from the Gita is reproduced from Mahadev Desai’s The Gita According to Gandhi.

Vyasa’s own intention was something different. He wanted to write the Mahabharata in such a way that even little boys and girls would study it, remember the virtuous characters in it and learn to keep away from people like the wicked characters in the epic. His aim was to strengthen the finer impulses in us and help us to overcome the evil ones. Before the women, too, he held up the example of Draupadi and thus taught them that they should, when threatened with danger, roar like lionesses and protect their honour. Draupadi could do this and rouse Arjuna, Yudhishtira and Bhima. The author of the Mahabharata has raised woman to a great height through his epic. The chief aim of the epic, however, is to represent the most invisible of all invisible wars. It tells of the Arjuna and other Pandavas in our minds who are battling with the Kauravas in it. The moral problems which confront one in this inner war are far more difficult than those of a physical war. An error in the sphere of practical action will at the most result in the destruction of this perishable body, but the result of an error in this inner invisible war will lead to perdition. The most painful punishment is appointed for evil intention. In the course of time, Pandavas and Kauravas are bound to be forgotten. They will most certainly be forgotten when this Age ends. We should not delude ourselves with the belief that they will continue to be remembered for ever. This Age of ours was preceded by many others. Even when all of them are forgotten, this war in our heart will go on. The Gita shows how we may emerge safe from it. The Krishna of the Gita is not the person who, when the hour of his death arrived, fell to a hunter’s arrow, and Arjuna is not that person from whose hand the Gandiva bow slipped. Krishna is the atman in us, who is our charioteer. We can win only if we hand over the reins of the chariot to him. God makes us dance, like the master in a puppet show. We are smaller than even puppets. We should, therefore, trust everything to God, as children to parents. Let us not eat uncooked stuff. Let Krishna the cook prepare and give us what food of grace. He wills for our atman.

The Gita does not decide for us. But if, whenever faced with a moral problem, you give up attachment to the ego and then decide what you should do, you will come to no harm. This is the substance of the argument which Shri Krishna has expanded into 18 chapters.

[13]

March 10, 1926

The verse' beginning with the phrase matrasparsha applies to sleeping as much as to waking. We have to make ourselves conscious machines. We should cultivate such perfect concentration that, like a man asleep, we are aware of nothing else. Hazrat Ali told his people to draw out the arrow from his body while he was praying, for at that time he would be totally absorbed in devotion to God. One cannot say that such a thing could be done when one was asleep, for one would not be able to fall asleep at all when the body was pierced with an arrow. A person who can be totally absorbed in every task on hand, as Hazrat Ali could be in prayer, who lives in such a state of self-absorption all the twenty-four hours of the day, will attain to immortality.

Shri Krishna now explains why the impressions of the senses are unreal:

What is non-Being is never known to have been, and what is Being is never known not to have been. Of both these the secret has been seen by the seers of the Truth.¹

That which never was cannot exist, and that which exists cannot cease to exist. Even the sun is transient, coming into existence and vanishing. The candle both exists and does not exist, for, when it is burnt up, its substance dissolves back into the five elements. Everything which has a name and a form ceases one day to exist in that particular mode, though it does not cease to be as a creation of God.

¹ II, 14
² II, 16
March 11, 1926

The jnanis, the men of knowledge, have discovered what exists and what does not exist. Name and form are brittle as glass. The jnanis know what is implied in the difference between existence and non-existence. We only know one simple thing: God is, nothing else is.

We shall breathe life into the Ashram by laying down our own lives. Its lands and buildings may disappear, but the spirit we inform it with will never perish.

Know that to be imperishable whereby all this is pervaded. No one can destroy that immutable Being.¹

Know that his Bodiless One, which can lift many Govardhan mountains on its little finger,² is imperishable.

Avyaya means that which cannot be spent.

March 12, 1926

These bodies of the embodied one who is eternal, imperishable and immeasurable are finite. Fight, therefore, O Bharata.³

Aprameya means that for which there can be no evidence, that is, no evidence in the sense in which smoke is regarded as evidence of fire.

Therefore fight, O Bharata. If we argue that since all bodies are perishable, one may kill, does it follow that I may kill all the women and children in the Ashram? Would I have in doing so acted according to the teaching of the Bhagavad Gita, merely because their bodies are perishable? We believe the watchman to have been mad because he had killed a person; if, however, he were to cite this verse of the Gita to justify what he did, we would call him wicked. What, then, shall we say of a person who mouths these seemingly learned arguments and then commits wickedness? To know the answer to this, we should go back to the First Chapter. Arjuna had said that he did not want even the kingdom of gods if he had to kill his kith and kin.

¹ II, 17
² Shri Krishna as a boy is said to have lifted the Govardhan mountain on his little finger.
³ II, 18
for that. But he is bound, in any case, to kill them, for he has accepted the dharma which requires him to kill. This verse with the word yudhyasva applies to him, but it does not apply to others. In this verse, Shri Krishna wants to free Arjuna from his ignorant attachment. When Harishchandra was required to kill a virtuous woman like Taramati¹, his eyes fell on her mangal-sutra² and [recognizing her], he held back. He would not have done so if it had been some other woman. In this case Shri Krishna would have told him that it was his duty to kill her. He would say to Harishchandra: You have lost your wits; you have killed people in the past and now you shrink from killing the woman because of your attachment for her as your wife. You would thus betray your dharma. He would tell Harishchandra that his body as well as his wife’s was perishable. If a person would cut his own throat rather than another’s, then Krishna would tell him that he could crush others as a duty.

Shri Krishna advances another argument.

He who thinks of This (Atman) as slayer and he who believes This to be slain, are both ignorant. This neither slays nor is ever slain.³

The atman neither kills nor is killed. This argument can be advanced only to a person. . . ⁴ It is like putting the cart before the horse. As that is impossible, so the body, if it sought to drive the atman, would never succeeds. If anyone says that it can, he does not know what he is talking about.

March 13, 1926

Suppose that your father was a teacher,¹ that you and . . .
misbehaved in the same way and your father punished . . . but not you; would that be right?⁶ Arjuna did not understand what even a child like you does. Shri Krishna told him all this long argument of the Gita just to explain this.

He who is afraid kills. He for whom there is no death will not

¹ Harishchandra’s wife
² Ornament carrying black or purple coral beads worn as a symbol of the married state
³ II, 19
⁴ Some words have been missing here in the source.
⁵ This was addressed to a child in the audience.
⁶ The child replied to this in the negative.
Those who come to the prayer meeting but do not follow the readings from the Gita should be regarded as not attending the prayers. We shall have truly welcomed the guest who has arrived at our place only if we receive him into the home with love, help him to wash, offer him a clean seat and serve him the best food prepared for ourselves, and ourselves eat only what remains after he has finished. We shall have welcomed him, shall have acted truthfully, only if we act in this manner. But if one frowns at the guest, does not speak to him with love, places before him a dirty, unwashed plate and serves stale food, fails to ask him if he would have another helping and then claims to have welcomed him and offered him a meal, one would have done nothing of the sort but would in fact have insulted the guest. Such conduct, therefore, would be a violation of truth. Rotten and foul-smelling food or, food which has been left over ought not to be offered even to a beggar. If at all we wish to offer food to a beggar, we should offer clean grain. If we would rather give him nothing, we should tell him so discreetly. This would be acting truly. We can thus, by exercising our discrimination, decide what is truthful and what is not.

This is never born nor ever dies, nor having been will ever not be any more; unborn, eternal, everlasting, ancient. This is not slain when the body is slain.¹

This atman was never born and will never die; it is not as though it ever was not and may not be again. The author has used a separate epithet to indicate each of these several aspects. The atman is unborn, eternal and ancient. Everyone knows it. The body perishes, but it does not. One generation knows of it from another. It is a thing that all parents must have explained, or ought to explain, to their children.

He who knows This, O Partha, to be imperishable, eternal, unborn, and immutable—whom and how can that man slay or cause to be slain?²

The Gita has been composed not in the form of aphorisms, but so as to be carried in the mind from moment to moment. It was written not for the learned, but for all the four castes,—rather, all the eighteen castes—to read and understand. It was written for the Sudras, the Bhangis³, and for women—in fact, for all classes. If the author has used a variety of epithets for a subject, though all of them mean the same thing, it is simply in order that we may grasp what he wants us to understand—in the same way that a mother explains a point to her

---

¹ II, 20
² II, 21
³ Community regarded as untouchables attending to scavenging work
As a man casts off worn-out garments and takes others that are new, even so the embodied one casts off worn-out bodies and passes on to others new.¹

Would I be ready to change this body for another, unless I would give up a worn-out one and have a fresh one? If the eyes cannot see, the ears cannot hear and the palate cannot relish food, would a person wish to live on bed-ridden, or die?

This no weapons wound, This no fire burns, This no waters wet, This no wind doth dry.²

Weapons cannot cleave it. If we strike the air with a weapon, can we hurt it? The atman is subtler even than air. Fire cannot burn it, nor can water wet it; how can air, then, ever dry it? Having described the atman thus, the author gives an appropriate epithet to indicate each of its several aspects:

Beyond all cutting, burning, wetting and drying is This—eternal, all-pervading, stable, immovable, everlasting.³

More epithets again: eternal, all-pervading, stable, immovable and everlasting. The verse which follows states the same thing.

Perceivable neither by the senses nor by the mind. This is called unchangeable; therefore, knowing This as such, thou shouldst not grieve.⁴

Such is the atman, Krishna says and you should not, therefore, grieve over anyone’s death. Why should you, then, grieve over the death of your relations?

What do you call the thing which protects us against the sun?⁵ Likewise, there is a word, aja, to designate that which was never born, and another, achhedya, to designate that which cannot be pierced.

Shri Krishna takes Arjuna slowly from darkness to light. Have

¹ II, 22
² II, 23
³ II, 24
⁴ II, 25
⁵ The question was addressed to a child who replied: chhatri, an umbrella.
you seen the atman?!

It is so naughty that it dwells in us and yet we cannot see it. It is the deer that even Ramachandra would not be able to kill. Ramachandra is omnipotent, and so he could kill only that which deserved to be killed.

Having argued thus, Shri Krishna says: “But suppose that the atman has none of these attributes. What of it? What even if it is born and dies again and again? All the more reason why you should not grieve over death.”

And if thou deemest This to be always coming to birth and always dying, even then, O Mahabahu, thou shouldst not grieve.

For certain is the death of the born, and certain is the birth of the dead; therefore, what is unavoidable thou shouldst not regret.

He who dies is certain to be born again. We ought not to grieve over what is inescapable, what cannot be helped.

March 17, 1926

The state of all beings before birth is unmanifest; their middle state is manifest; their state after death is again unmanifest. What occasion is there for lament, O Bharata?

All beings were unmanifest before birth and will again become unmanifest after death. Birth and death are God’s concern. He alone, therefore, knows their mystery. Even doctors have failed here, for they cannot create a body. “Who am I, whence do I come? Am I destined to rise to heaven?” The atman becomes incarnate in birth. We can see this, the middle stage. Men who have thought over these problems have asserted that, for bestowing and taking away life, God does not require even a fraction of the time that is required for drawing and erasing a circle on the blackboard. No mathematician can ever calculate the measure of that time.

Tatra ka paridevana. Why, then, grieve? This is the great mystery of God. As a magician creates the illusion of a tree and destroys it, so God sports in endless ways and does not let us know the beginning and the end of his play. Why grieve over this?

One looks upon This as a marvel; another speaks of This as such:

---

1 The question was again put to a child who answered in the negative.
2 II, 26 and 27
3 II, 28
another hears thereof as a marvel; yet having heard of This none truly knows This.¹

Some wise men see the atman as a thing of wonder and some describe it so. Others hear it so described but cannot understand what it is. Such is our pathetic state. There can be no end to describing God’s greatness, so mysterious is His sport.

Finally, Shri Krishna sums up:

This embodied one in the body of every being is ever beyond all harm, O Bharata; thou shouldst not, therefore, grieve for anyone.²

“O Arjuna, this atman which dwells in everyone’s body can never be killed.” The body’s death is like the breaking of a piece of glass. This cycle of birth and death goes on for ever and ever.

[20]

March 18, 1926

The theft which took place today³ provides a lesson in the application of the Gita. Where there is possessiveness, there is violence. We have to guard things which we think are ours; when we give away a thing to someone, this possessiveness disappears since we no longer regard that thing as ours. All things in the world belong to us, but we are indifferent towards them and do not lose any sleep on their account. In the same way, we should think that the things we keep in the Ashram belong to others as much as to us, and so remain indifferent towards them. The other way is the way of violence, of Satan. That is not the way we have chosen. Ours, however, is a mixed way at present. We have adopted the principle of collective possession, and individual possession is restricted to a minimum. Krishna tells Arjuna to give up this possessiveness, and through these two characters Vyasa tells us to do so.

After discussing the problem from the spiritual point of view Shri Krishna considers it from the mundane point of view. He tells Arjuna what his duty in the practical world requires.

Again, seeing thine own duty thou shouldst not shrink from it; for there is no higher good for a Kshatriya than a righteous war.⁴

A Kshatriya has no duty higher than that of fighting in a

¹ II, 29
² II, 30
³ In the Ashram
⁴ II, 31
righteous war. Why is the war described as righteous? Because it is not of Arjuna’s seeking. He was happy enough in his home, but he was challenged by Duryodhana. The war came to him without his seeking, and had as it were opened the door of heaven to him.

Proceeding, Shri Krishna talks about one’s good name in the world:

The world will for ever recount the story of thy disgrace; and for a man of honour disgrace is worse than death.¹

If a person who has accepted cleaning of latrines as his work wearied of it, saying that it was a Bhangi’s work, Shri Krishna would tell him that he was betraying his dharma, that he would lose his good name, that people would for ever talk ill of him. For a man who has a good reputation in society, its loss is worse than death. Arjuna, Shri Krishna said, would give the great warrior a ground for accusing him of having fled from the battlefield in fear. He sums up this part of the argument with the following verse:

Hold alike pleasure and pain, gain and loss, victory and defeat, and gird up thy loins for the fight; so doing thou shalt not incur sin.²

The argument in this verse is not practical, but spiritual.

March 19, 1926

The verse about “pleasure and pain” is not addressed to Arjuna alone but to all of us. “You will incur no sin by killing your kinsmen.” —this is said repeatedly in the Gita. If a person remains unconcerned with defeat or victory, knowing that they are a part of life, he commits no sin in fighting. But we should also say that he earns no merit. If we seek merit, we shall also incur sin. Even the best thing has an element of evil in it. Nothing in the world is wholly good or wholly evil. Where there is action there is some evil. If Harishchandra had felt any doubt in his mind, what would a holy sage have told him? “Cut your wife’s throat; you will incur no sin.” If a person learns to make no distinction between gain and loss, pleasure and pain, he would rarely be tempted to commit a sin.

If we had blamed the thieves and regarded them as very wicked men, we would have been filled with rage and wanted to kill them.

¹ II, 34
² II, 38
We can do without beating of drums over a birth, but it is difficult not to grieve over a death. If we thus cultivate an attitude of indifference and learn to check anger, we shall one day succeed in freeing ourselves from these pairs of opposites.

The argument in the Bhagavad Gita falls into three parts: (1) “Whence this weakness in you?” (2) Arjuna’s questioning; (3) Krishna awakening his intellect and explaining to him how the atman and the body are separate things. Then follow the practical considerations.

What is one to do? How is one to proceed having known that the atman is different from the body? This is the fourth stage in the argument.

Thus have I set before thee the attitude of Knowledge; hear now the attitude of Action; resorting to this attitude thou shalt cast off the bondage of action.¹

The word sankhya, it has been said, is somewhat confusing. It may be so for the learned, it is not so for us. All that Shri Krishna means is this: “I explained the matter to you from a theoretical point of view. I pointed out the difference between the atman and the body. Having explained this to you, I will now put the argument with reference to yoga. Yoga means practice. After understanding this, you will have to translate your knowledge into action in the manner I shall explain.” The word yoga is used repeatedly in the Gita. It explains how to act. “If you understand this,” Shri Krishna says, “you will escape from the bondage of action.”

March 20, 1926

There is much disputation concerning the meaning of the verse which we took up for discussion yesterday, as will be evident to anyone who makes a deep study of the Gita. I however feel that you should follow the rule that I have followed. It does not matter if that seems like making a virtue of our weakness. We should not involve ourselves in disputations about the meaning of Shastras. Bishop Butler was a man of great learning, but he took a pledge never to enter in a religious controversy. An atheist happened to be on a visit [to England]. The Bishop could have argued with him. But he wrote to a friend saying that he would not enter into any discussion with the atheist. It was possible, he said, that he might not be able to answer an argument of the latter on the instant. It was also possible, he added, that his reasoning might have no effect on others, in which case he would produce on them a wrong impression. It was therefore better, he said, to remain quiet. The atheist was free to question any belief. Why enter into any argument, about the existence of God, which was self-evident?

¹ II, 39

Raychandbhai once thought that he could do good to the world through his gift of attending to a hundred things simultaneously. If, he thought, he gave demonstrations of that gift in the Town Hall in Bombay, with a High Court judge presiding over the function, people would be converted and seek the welfare of their soul. After two or three days, he felt doubts about the wisdom of such a demonstration. It would be, he thought, a display of his own attainments, but would prove nothing about the power of God. Accordingly, he wrote a letter of apology and said that he had decided not to give the demonstration, but did not wish to explain why.

A person may say about Siva: ‘He may be naked, He may wear human skulls round his neck, but He is my God, I want no other.’ We may say the same thing in regard to this verse. Sankhya may mean any number of things. I have explained the idea to the best of my understanding and I have set you thinking. Now I shall demonstrate a practical application. Its many explanations may be of interest to learned men; they are not for us. We wish to study so that we may learn to be servants and devotees of God, may see God. To see God we do not have to enter into disputes. At the moment these children make my world. I wish to awaken their thought, entertain them and explain things to them. I have no aim beyond this. Every day we recite:

What is non-Being is never known to have been,
And what is Being is never known not to have been.

If, despite that, we act as if the unreal was the real, to what purpose do we recite the verse?

At every moment we have to decide whether a particular action will serve the atman or the body. We cannot, however, break open the cage of the body, and so we must simultaneously follow vidya¹ and avidya².

And now follows a verse which explains how a person who tries

¹ Knowledge
² Ignorance; for Gandhiji’s meaning here, vide Isopanishad.
to put this teaching into action is saved.

Here no effort undertaken is lost, no disaster befalls. Even a little of this righteous course delivers one from great fear.¹

No sin is incurred by those that follow the path of action. A beginning made is not wasted. Even a little effort along this path saves one from great danger. This is a royal road, easy to follow. It is the sovereign yoga. In following it, there is no fear of stumbling. Once a beginning is made, nothing will stand in our way.

Only yesterday I wrote to a friend and told him that he suffered not from fistula but from something else. I advised him to keep repeating Ramanama. What one does in this way never goes in vain. How would it have helped him if I had advised him to have a *yajna*² performed? He would not have got a genuine priest to conduct the yajna. There would be many other difficulties. Nor would I advise him to go to Jagannath Puri ³ and make such and such an offering to such and such a deity. What if following my advice, he became an atheist? If, instead, he got smitten with love for Rama, he would be saved from a great fear. He suffers from a mental disease and should become free from attachments. He should constantly think on Rama. Doctors, too, advise us not to think of the disease from which we may be suffering.

This is a very important verse. It contains the profound idea that nothing done is ever lost, that there is no sin there, only safety. This is the royal road, the right angle. All right angles are of 90 degrees. This path is the path of truth. There is no harm, no fear of destruction, in following it. On the other hand, a person who argues whether it is right to tell a lie in order to save a cow or to eat meat to save one’s life, can never be sure where he will end up.

[23]

March 21, 1926

Three points, tests or conditions are mentioned for proving that the atman is different from the body. We can act every moment on the assurance: in this path no effort is ever lost. What can we do right now which will never be lost? What can we think of? There is only one reply, that we must follow the prayers, and that too with perfect con-

¹ II, 40
² Sacrifice
³ A centre of pilgrimage in Orissa
Ramaswamy Aiyar once addressed a meeting in Bombay in the early days of non-co-operation. Khadilkar\(^1\) said then that among all political activities there was only one which satisfied all the three conditions. That activity yields immediate result; there is no obstacle to its progress; and there is the advantage of being saved from the fear of loss of sixty crores of rupees.

Shri Krishna explained the same thing over again in the verse which follows:

The attitude, in this matter, springing, as it does, from fixed resolve but one, O Kurunandana; but for those who have no fixed resolve the attitudes are many-branched and unending.\(^2\)

O Arjuna, the resolute intellect here is one-pointed. Along this path which I shall explain to you, one must hold one’s intellect so firm that there is no wavering. The actions of a man whose intellect is not fixed on one aim, who is not single-minded in his devotion, will branch out in many directions. As the mind leaps, monkey-fashion, from branch to branch, so does the intellect. A person who clings to his life will seek help from any vaid or saint or witch-doctor whom he meets. Similarly, a monkey will fly from branch to branch and ultimately meet an untimely death, the victim of a sling-shot. The mind of a person of uncertain purpose grows weak day by day and becomes so unsettled that he can think of nothing except what is in his mind at the moment. In present-day politics, there is no good at all and plenty of evil, for it is full of flattery and one is not protected from dangers, but, on the contrary, surrounded by them. It does not help us to realize the \textit{atman}; in fact we lost our soul. We lose our dharma, we lose the capacity for good works, lose both this world and the other. If, on the other hand, we can have faith in this spinning-wheel movement, we can serve the world, be happy ourselves, can live safe from a great danger, that is, can live without fear of those who would hold us down. We also secure, simultaneously, a means of ensuring our welfare in the other world. If a person who takes up this work does not seem to be of a fixed mind, you may conclude that he is not following the royal path.

It is only if we have the faith in our hearts that we are all one,

\(^1\) Presumably, Krishnaji Prabhakar Khadilkar, a scholar, journalist, dramatist and public worker of Maharashtra

\(^2\) II, 41
though we exist as separate beings, it is only then that we can feel a sense of equality. Otherwise, even two leaves are not equal.

The next three verses describe the man whose intellect is not resolute.

[24]

March 23, 1926

A person who is of fixed mind in a small matter can be so even in a big matter. If he is asked to make an ellipsoid of clay and concentrate on it, he would do so. In trying to concentrate on any object, one is likely to be distracted by all manner of troublesome thoughts. A person to whom this happens may be described as one whose intellect is not fixed on one aim. One who would succeed in the yoga of works must be of a fixed mind in small matters as well as big.

Now follows the description of an intellect not fixed on one aim. In describing it, Vyasa has run down the Vedas as he has done nowhere else. So many things were interpolated into the Shastras in the course of time, but we have gone on believing that everything in them is divinely inspired. By doing this, we make ourselves mere pedants. Veda means to know. That which helps us to acquire the knowledge of the Brahman, which provides us the best means of acquiring such knowledge, that is the Veda.

The ignorant, revelling in the letter of the Vedas, declare that there is naught else; carnally-minded, holding heaven to be their goal, they utter swelling words which promise birth as the fruit of action and which dwell on the many and varied rites to be performed for the sake of pleasure and power; intent, as they are, on pleasure and power their swelling words rob them of their wits, and they have no settled attitude which can be centred on the supreme goal.¹

Ignorant people, that is persons who are learned and yet devoid of knowledge, utter flowery speech, that is speech which is attractive, on which blossom new flowers every day. Men who wrangle over the meaning of the Vedas; men filled with endless desires (men who have many wishes and teach others to be like them); men who are ever thinking of heaven (who are merely for enjoyments, who always talk of enjoying even this world thoroughly and paint glowing and attractive pictures of life in heaven and) who assert that there is nothing beyond heaven; who always say that our actions in life unfailingly bear appropriate fruits and persuade people to perform innumerable rituals to secure enjoyments and win greatness (there are people who say these things even today.); who advise us to propitiate a great many gods and so make us feel helpless; who induce us to offer fanciful prayers to imaginary gods and turn us away from prayer to the God of all gods—such men push us deeper and deeper into quagmire. The fancies and thoughts which often trouble our minds are also evidence of an intellect branching out in many directions. Even in small matters, we can say, our intellect is not resolute. It will be resolute only if we fix our minds on one purpose and cling to it with discrimination, only if we work without looking for immediate results. At present, whether in politics or social reform we leap from one branch to another. I began with the illustration of a ball of earth and told you that, even if we concentrate on that, we can realize the atman.

¹ II, 42, 43 and 44

I was once asked by someone why I had not succeeded in realizing the atman. I told him that for me the means themselves stood for such realization. The fact that such a question was asked is enough to suggest that the person who put it would not understand the humility which inspired my reply and would approach many others with the same question. This same condition prevailed in Vyasa’s time. How can we expect that a person who is attached to enjoyments of the senses and possession of power, whose mind has been led away by all manner of attractive words, will have a resolute intellect? Samadhi means fixing the mind on God. How can one’s intellect remain fixed and motionless in such a state? The mind of a person who is not satisfied with a lakh which he has earned and hopes to earn ten lakhs the next day, who, addressed as a Mahatma this day, hopes to be so addressed ever afterwards—the mind of such a person is distracted by all manner of thoughts and attractive visions. His mind will not be plain white, like khadi; he is ever wanting to dress his mind, as fashionable women do their bodies in many-coloured saris with borders of various designs. Such a person can never be devoted to God. Only he who has a spirit of extreme humility, who has the faith of Faithful, can be said to have a resolute intellect.

[25]

March 24, 1926

We saw yesterday that those who hanker after enjoyments and

1 In Pilgrim’s Progress
power can never fix their intellect on one aim. Only a person like Hazrat Ali who is completely absorbed in God can succeed in doing so. Only a person whose chitta\(^1\) has become absolutely purified, whose mind has expanded and awakened to light, has become as clear as a mirror, can have in his stainless mind, a vision of God. If any sound emanates from such a person it can only be that of the name of Rama. After explaining this, Shri Krishna described the pedantic student of the Vedas. He now sums up the idea of the three verses in one:

The Vedas have as their domain the three \textit{gunas};\(^2\) eschew them, O Arjuna. Free thyself from the pairs of opposites, abide in eternal truth, scorn to gain or guard anything, remain the master of thy soul.\(^3\)

The Vedas treat of the three \textit{gunas}; you rise above them. (But this is not true. If it is, the Vedas would not be God’s word. Shri Krishna is here talking about the Vedas as expounded by the ritualist pedants. The statement, therefore, gives only one side of the truth. The Vedas which utter \textit{neti neti}—there is nothing except truth—those Vedas are ever the objects of reverence for us. We can cite verses from the \textit{Gita} itself and that it tells us to accept the Vedas as thus understood.)

Arjuna is asked to be above the pairs of opposites, which means to be indifferent to happiness and suffering. He should act in the fighting between the Kauravas and the Pandavas as if he was not personally involved in it. He should be \textit{nityasattvastha}, which means that his mind should always remain steadfast. He should be \textit{niryogakshema}, that is, give up all thought of acquiring, holding and defending possessions. But one must preserve one’s body, at any rate. Arjuna should, therefore, cultivate detachment in that respect. He should cease to concern himself with yoga and \textit{kshema} and live in the \textit{atman}. He should live always thinking that he is not the body, not an entity with a name and a form, that he transcends these.

To the extent that a well is of use when there is a flood of water on all sides, to the same extent are all the Vedas of use to an enlightened \textit{Brahman}.\(^4\)

What may be found in a tank will also be found in a big lake. He who knows the \textit{Brahman} will know everything else. He possesses occult powers, too, for the knowledge of the \textit{Brahman} is the perfec-

\(^{1}\) Mind-stuff
\(^{2}\) \textit{Satvra}, \textit{rajas} and \textit{tamas}, modes of being
\(^{3}\) II, 45
\(^{4}\) “Not this, not this”
\(^{5}\) II, 46
tion of these powers. The three gunas are dealt with in the Vedas; he who rises above them attains to the knowledge of Brahman. The person who has the throne will not covet a position of civil or police authority. He who has reached the Gangotri has known the Ganga. We get from the former all the benefit we would from the latter, and in addition the person taking his abode near the Gangotri is away from the crowd and lives unattached to the pairs of opposites. Near the Hoogli, the Ganga water is turbid, but it is fresh and clear near Rishikesh and Hardwar. The higher one ascends towards the top, the greater the purity and cleanliness.

(Some interpret this verse in a different way, but we shall not go into that.)

After this introduction, Shri Krishna tells Arjuna that the sovereign yoga which he wished to explain to the latter was this:

> Action alone is thy province, never the fruits thereof; let not thy motive be the fruit of action, nor shouldst thou desire to avoid action.

Your right is to work, and not to expect the fruit. The slave-owner tells the slave: “Mind your work, but beware lest you pluck a fruit from the garden. Yours is to take what I give.” God has put us under restriction in the same manner. He tells us that we may work if we wish, but that the reward of work is entirely for Him to give. Our duty is to pray to Him, and the best way in which we can do this is to work with the pickaxe, to remove scum from the river and to sweep and clean our yards. This, certainly, is a difficult lesson to learn. The relationship between the slave-owner and his slave is an unhealthy one. It is based on [the owner’s] self-interest. That between the lion and the goat is of the same character. But man is ever rushing into the mouth of God. A wise man does so consciously and deliberately, and tells God that he wishes to be His slave, and not the world’s. The more God seems to reject him, the more he strives to be near Him. This verse is intended to describe this peculiar relationship. The eye-lids certainly protect the eyes, but they do not do so with conscious intention. They protect the eyes by reflex action. The relationship between God and man is similarly spontaneous. Mirabai has sung: “By a slender thread has Hari tied me to Him, and I turn as He pulls the thread.” The relationship between us and God is of the kind described here. The thread is slender, and a single one besides.

---

1 Source of the Ganga in the Himalayas
2 II, 47
Ma karmafala, etc., means: “Do not act so as to be the cause of your suffering fruits of action; do not be attached to action; or be over-eager to do anything. Think that everything is done by Me. What reason do you have to believe that you do things?” So, if it is God’s will that we must die, He will destroy us; if such is not His will, He will arrest the hand raised against us.

March 25, 1926

Ma te sangostvakarmani: In reading this yesterday, I said karmani instead of akarmani, for that is how I have always read this verse. Akarma means all work which falls outside the sphere of one’s duty. “You should not,” Krishna says to Arjuna, “feel tempted to take up such work, feel drawn to work which is not your duty.”

Act thou, O Dhananjaya, without attachment, steadfast in Yoga, even-minded in success and failure. Even-mindedness is Yoga. Work without attachment, being established firmly in yoga. Yoga means renouncing the fruit of action. It means not desiring the fruit of work which is akarma. We should do no work with attachment. Attachment to good work, is that too wrong? Yes, it is. If we are attached to our goal of winning swaraj, we shall not hesitate to adopt bad means. If a person is particular that he would give slivers to me personally, one day he might even steal them. Hence, we should not be attached even to a good cause. Only then will our means remain pure and our actions too.

Proceeding, Shri Krishna says: One should be even-minded in success and failure. In other words, one should dedicate to Krishna all that one does, surrender oneself completely to Him. The person who has an equal mind towards all things may be described as one established in yoga. Krishna explains the same idea further:

For action, O Dhananjaya, is far inferior to unattached action; seek refuge in the attitude of detachment. Pitiable are those who make fruit their motive.

Work done without the yoga of intellect is extremely harmful. One should, therefore, seek refuge in intellect. “Intellect” means a resolute intellect. Having once made a decision there is no arguing the matter further. Anyone who works for reward is a kripan, that is, a person deserving our pity.

1 II, 48
2 II, 49
March 26, 1926

A person without a fixed purpose has an unsteady mind. Bhartrihari1 has described many forms of this weakness of mind.

Here in this world a man gifted with that attitude of detachment escapes the fruit of both good and evil deeds. Gird thyself up for yoga, therefore. Yoga is skill in action.2

A person who is firmly yoked to his intellect, an intellect which is resolute, who is totally merged in it and who is a yogi, such a one renounces [the fruit of] work both good and bad, that is, is disinterested towards either. Shri Krishna, therefore, asks Arjuna to be a yogi. Yoga means nothing but skill in work. Anyone who wants to decide whether he should or should not do a particular thing, should seek a yogi’s advice. This is why it is said that where there is a prince of yogis like Shri Krishna and a Bowman of prowess like Arjuna, prosperity and power follow as a matter of course.

For sages, gifted with the attitude of detachment, who renounce the fruit of action, are released from the bondage of birth and attain to the state which is free from all ills.3

Yogis renounce the fruits of work, and are freed from the bonds of birth. How can a person who has awakened to the truth about his body ever die? Such a one attains to immortality.

When thy understanding will have passed through the slough of delusion, then wilt thou be indifferent alike to what thou hast heard and wilt hear.4

When your intellect, Shri Krishna tells Arjuna, has crossed the slough of delusion, you will become disinterested towards all that you may have heard in the past or that may seem to you worth hearing in future; that is, you will remain indifferent.

When thy understanding, distracted by much hearing, will rest steadfast and unmoved in concentration, then wilt thou attain Yoga.5

When your intellect, once perverted by listening to all manner of arguments, is totally absorbed in the contemplation of God, you will

---

1 A celebrated poet and grammarian of ancient India, who is said to have been the brother of King Vikramaditya
2 II, 50
3 II, 51
4 II, 52
5 II, 53
then attain to yoga. When a person is firmly established in \textit{samadhi}\footnote{1 The eighth stage in yoga} he is filled with ecstatic love and, therefore, can be completely indifferent to this world.

\[28\]

\textit{March 27, 1926}\footnote{\textit{March 27, 1926} Arjuna now asks how we may know the man established in \textit{samadhi} from his speech. “Speech” means outward sign. The food which the \textit{Gita} offers is different from what one’s mother gives. Before Mother \textit{Gita}, the earthly mother stands no comparison. He who has the \textit{Gita} always engraved in his heart and keeps it there till the moment of death, will attain to \textit{moksha}. A boy who gives himself to daily worship of the \textit{Gita} will be another Dhruva or Sudhanva. We recite these verses daily so that we may understand their meaning and be guided by them.}

Arjuna now asks how we may know the man established in \textit{samadhi} from his speech. “Speech” means outward sign. The food which the \textit{Gita} offers is different from what one’s mother gives. Before Mother \textit{Gita}, the earthly mother stands no comparison. He who has the \textit{Gita} always engraved in his heart and keeps it there till the moment of death, will attain to \textit{moksha}. A boy who gives himself to daily worship of the \textit{Gita} will be another Dhruva or Sudhanva. We recite these verses daily so that we may understand their meaning and be guided by them.

\[29\]

\textit{March 28, 1926}\footnote{\textit{March 28, 1926} “You are my arm,” Shri Krishna tells Arjuna. “It is I who make it move.” We say, likewise, in our morning prayers: “You it is that makes our senses function.” One who is ever patient and works with single-minded attention to the task on hand may be described as a yogi skilled in action.}

“You are my arm,” Shri Krishna tells Arjuna. “It is I who make it move.” We say, likewise, in our morning prayers: “You it is that makes our senses function.” One who is ever patient and works with single-minded attention to the task on hand may be described as a yogi skilled in action.

\[30\]

\textit{March 30, 1926}\footnote{\textit{March 30, 1926} When a man puts away, O Partha, all the cravings that arise in the mind and finds comfort for himself only from \textit{atman}, then is he called the man of secure understanding.\footnote{\textit{II}, 55} One who is of steadfast intellect}

When a man puts away, O Partha, all the cravings that arise in the mind and finds comfort for himself only from \textit{atman},\footnote{\textit{II}, 55} then is he called the man of secure understanding.\footnote{One who is of steadfast intellect} He who banishes all bad desires arising in his mind may be described as a \textit{sthitaprajna}.\footnote{\textit{One who is of steadfast intellect}} We add the word “bad” because here in the Ashram we engage ourselves in ceaseless work and we cannot ask a cripple to get up and walk. Though, of course, ultimately we arrive at a stage when we should banish all desires, even the desire to see God, for to a person in that stage all action becomes spontaneous. After one has seen God face to face, how can the desire to see Him still remain? When you have already jumped into the river, the desire to do so will no longer be there. Our desire to see God ceases when we are lost in Him, have become one with Him.

We would be ill if we remained in a river the whole day. Anyone who sleeps all the twenty-four hours will fall ill, and so also anyone who eats all day long. There is not a single thing in the world which we can go on desiring perpetually. It is because of this that we have the problem of happiness and misery. The more often we desire a thing, the stronger our desire becomes every time. The more we satisfy desires, the more urgent they become. That is also true about our daily discussions of the Gita. Though I cannot make them very interesting, those who really wish to follow them will find their desire becoming daily stronger. No one, of course, will fall ill because of that. Or, maybe, we need not consciously desire a thing which we always want. The sun rises and sets every day; we do not consciously wish that it may. He who has overcome his desires completely, should be natural in all his actions, as walking and similar movements of the body are natural.

There is only one desire in life which is good and the desire for the means to realize it is also good.

Who can succeed in banishing desires in this manner? He whose self abides content in itself is known as a sthitaprajna.

Whenever we hear anyone speaking about God, we should forget everything else and attend to his words. A person such as described above, if he is attending a reading of the Ramayana or the Gita, will be completely absorbed in following them. He will never feel it a strain to rise even at four in the morning.

The state in which the self abides in itself in serene content is the same as described by Narasinh Mehta¹ in this line in a poem of his: “The Brahman dancing in sportive play in front of the Brahman.” The poet here expresses the very same truth. The Brahman has all its joy through the Brahman in the company of the Brahman. The slave can never conceive of his existence without his master. A person who has the name of another on his lips all the twenty-four hours will forget himself in the latter. The *atman*² becomes the *Paramatman*³ in the same manner. The atman may be a ray of the Paramatman, but a ray of the sun is the sun itself. Apart from God, we can have no

---
¹ A 15th-century saint-poet of Gujarat
² The individual self
³ The Universal Self existence at all. He who makes himself God’s slave becomes one with God.

The state described here is not that of a person who lives self-satisfied, surrounding himself with possessions of all kinds. We should learn to be content in ourselves. The means and the end should become one. But who can find joy in the self through the self? One can do that by learning to work in a new spirit. One who takes opium before going to bed will not sleep well, but the man who sleeps in the natural course will sleep in peace, his mind abiding in God.

The verses which follow are by way of an explanation of this verse. Self-help does not consist merely in not seeking help from others; it consists in not needing such help.

If children have faith, they can live as a sthitaprajna does. They have their parents and teachers to look after their needs. They have, therefore, no need to take thought for themselves. They should always be guided by their elders. A child who lives in this manner is a brahmachari, a muni, a sthitaprajna. He is so in the sense that he does what he is asked to and carries out every instruction. Such a child could even become Prahlad.

[31]

March 31, 1926

The verse' beginning with prajahati can never mean that we may remain as we are. If that were the meaning, the second line would have no place in it. The man who lives contented in the self through the self will give up all desires, but one can live in such a state only if the desire to become better, to grow spiritually awakens in one. Anyone who wants to live in such a state must give up everything which is likely to obstruct his effort. If all that we do is merely to indulge in fancies, like Shaikhchilli, it would be better not to think at all, neither good thoughts nor bad. The road to hell is paved with good intentions. That is why it is said that one may cast into a river a ton of thoughts and cling to an ounce of practice.

(I have read in an English book that a boy who eats till he is full cannot preserve celibacy. One should not overload one’s stomach.)

Whose mind is untroubled in sorrows and longeth not for joys, who is

1 II, 55
2 Day-dreamer
free from passion, fear and wrath—he is called the ascetic of secure understanding.¹

The man who does not feel depressed by suffering, is not overcome by suffering (knowing that suffering is always the effect of some cause), who is indifferent amid pleasures and is no more subject to attachments, fear and anger—such a person may be described as sthitadhi, that is, one whose intellect remains steadfast and is never caught in a whirlpool.

Who owns attachment nowhere, who feels neither joy nor resentment whether good or bad comes his way—that man’s understanding is secure.²

The man who has withdrawn interest from all objects, given up desire for them, who is unconcerned, indifferent in good or ill chance, who is neither pleased nor annoyed by anything—such a person’s intellect is steadfast. Shri Krishna gives an illustration of this:

And when, like the tortoise drawing in its limbs from every side, this man draws in his senses from their objects, his understanding is secure.³

The man who holds in his senses to prevent them from going out to their objects, as the tortoise draws in his limbs and holds them as if under a shield, has an intellect which is steadfast. Only that man who voluntarily holds in his senses may be known as completely absorbed in God. When our senses seem to move out of our control, we should think of the tortoise. The objects of the senses are like pebbles. If we hold in the senses, the pebbles will not hurt, that is, if we hold under control our hands, our feet, our eyes, and so on.

[32]

April 1, 1926

Shri Krishna now explains how the senses may be held back from their objects.

When a man starves his senses, the objects of those senses disappear from him, but not the yearning for them; the yearning too departs when he beholds the Supreme.⁴

Only a person who denies the body the food it craves for will cease to be troubled by his senses. The senses of a well-fed man always keep awake, but they lose all their power when he stops eating.

¹ II, 56
² II, 57
³ II, 58
⁴ II, 59
The Shastras say that, if a man’s appetites are not under his control, it would be best for him to fast. We are enjoined to fast during the Ramadan and the extra lunar month of the Hindus to discipline the senses. Suppose that I have decided to go to the city and see a play; if however, I have been fasting on that day, I would feel disinclined to go. If our senses cannot be controlled we should undertake a fast; if they cannot be controlled fully, we should give up food altogether. This is what the first half of the verse means.

And now about the second half:

The appetites subside, but our pleasure in the objects of senses remains. If a person who is fasting feels that his life is secure, he will not suffer because of the fast, but ordinarily desire for food persists. During a fast, impure desires will probably subside, but one gets impatient for the fast to end. Unless the desire for food disappears completely, the fast will not endure. The desire for sacrifice will not endure without renunciation. When we have an opportunity to enjoy anything, we find that our physical appetites become strong again. This, of course, does not mean that we should not occasionally give up things for a temporary period. We should certainly give up anything we can give up.

In the first half, we are told that we should curb impure desires by fasting; but fasting alone does not yield the required result. Something more is needed. If we see God, our instinctive desire for objects of senses will also subside. This last thing confronts us with a problem. Until one’s pleasure in objects of the senses has disappeared, one cannot become established in samadhi, and until one has become so established one will not succeed in overcoming desires.

How to solve this problem? We should persevere in our effort. We should, slowly and gradually, learn to feel God’s presence in the depths of our heart. We should, occasionally, banish the very thought of eating and feel that it would be much better that our body should perish than that we should be enslaved by pleasures. One does not, of course, achieve self-conquest by committing suicide. It is the desires which need to be conquered. Anyone who eats to keep alive his body may certainly eat, but he should stop eating if he finds that eating food rouses his appetites. If he can be patient when fasting, they will subside completely. He may, when they have subsided, ask for milk or water if he wants these for keeping himself alive. It is said about Lord Buddha that he once fainted because he had been fasting. At that time, a woman came and placed a few drops of milk on his lips. Did the milk rouse his appetites? No; on the contrary, he realized God soon after.

The purport of this verse is that we should fast for self-purification. But the Shastras tell us that, while fasting, we should wish with all our strength for freedom from desire. If, in addition, we also yearn to see God, then only will our fasting bear fruit. If we desire that our appetite should subside, it is in order that we may see God. When we are fasting, our one desire should be to see God. Our appetites stand in the way, and so we must weaken their hold on us. After a person has seen God, it is all one to him whether he eats or does not eat. Vinoba told me a story about Chaitanya', that a lump of sugar placed on his tongue remained there undissolved, like a stone. The reason for this was that his pleasure in objects of sense had completely died away. I have said that it is not the palate, but the mind, which feels pleasure. If a man’s pleasure in objects of sense has disappeared, if he has become established in samadhi, or if he is suffering from a disease ‘like jaundice, nothing placed on his tongue will dissolve. Thus, the man who has turned away from pleasures and the man who is stricken with disease ultimately reach the same state, one voluntarily, the other against his will.

Chaitanyadeva felt all the time that it was God’s grace which sustained him and that if he should eat at all, it must be only that he may see God one day. To see Him one should completely conquer one’s appetites, and even the instinctive pleasure one feels in objects of sense must subside. This verse provides the key to such a state. To curb the appetites, we should stop eating, that is, deny our senses their food. When they have no occasion to function, they will be denied their food. If, after this, we take the next step and concentrate our attention on attaining self-realization, our instinctive pleasure in objects of sense will subside completely. The man who attains such a state will be in the same condition as Janaka'.

[33]

April 2, 1926

We shall proceed with the verse we took up yesterday. It is a very important verse. I kept thinking on it the whole day. Four or five

1 A 16th-century religious reformer of Bengal
2 Philosopher-king, famous in the Upanishads as a knower of Reality and master of desireless action hundred years ago, in Europe and Arabia they attached great importance to mortification of the flesh. In the time of the Prophet, prayer, fasting and keeping awake at night were considered essential for subduing the nafas (this is a very good word denoting the sense-organs collectively; it also means desire). The Prophet was often awake till two or three after midnight, and was never particular when and what he ate. It was not merely that he kept the roza fast. That was necessary for everyone to keep, even for people engrossed in worldly affairs. The Prophet, however, undertook a roza fast every now and then. While one is keeping this fast, one is not permitted to take water during day-time, but after sunset it is absolutely necessary that one must drink some water. The Prophet, however, did not apply this rule to himself, and so an associate of his told him: “Since you do not eat, we too will not eat.” The Prophet’s reply was: “No, you should not fast. God sends you no such food as He sends me.” Silenced by the reply, the questioner slapped himself on the face and left, thinking: “We, others, observe the roza because he falls into ecstasies and asks us to fast, but in actual practice we only make a fuss.” To the Prophet, fasting brought happiness, for it was an occasion when he could live constantly in the presence of God. His food consisted of dates. Just as in countries where people drink every home has a vineyard, so in Arabia there are date-palms near every house, and when the Prophet wished to eat he plucked a few dates from these trees. Some others who lived with the Prophet and served him also ate dates. the little flour that was ground for them was also coarse. He used to keep awake for such long hours that the Bibisaheb would wait impatiently for him to lie down to sleep. Besides keeping awake thus, he would withdraw himself into solitude so that he might subdue the senses and be blessed with a vision of God. Jesus did likewise. He lived in solitude, fasted for forty days and subjected his body to the utmost mortification. At the end of forty days, he felt that he heard a mysterious voice, that God was talking to him and that the veil which hid God from him had lifted. Those who followed him taught the same thing. There has been a tradition of fasting and prayer in Europe right to the present day.

And then came Luther in Germany. He said that the others had misinterpreted the texts, and that their lives were all deception. As the sun moves westward, darkness follows close behind it, reaching almost as far as the sun but not quite; in the same way, hypocrisy follows close behind holiness. Luther saw through all this. He plainly saw the superstitions and hypocrisies which flourished in monasteries. It is a strange law of nature that once men become accustomed to a certain thing they continue to do it through sheer inertia. In those days, they even burnt people alive. Those who believed in mortifying the flesh thought it their duty to curb the senses and to kill others who did not do so. Observing these evils, Luther went to the opposite extreme. After all, whatever the evils associated with external practices, it is only through self-control that one can see God. The Protestants, however, believed that there was nothing but hypocrisy in the Catholic practices, and so they destroyed a most potent means of realizing God. Because this means harmed some people, it does not follow that it harms all. But they believed that it did.

In India, too, this wind is blowing at present. It is often said that control of the senses is difficult to achieve, but in truth it is not so. This is not only my present belief; I held it even when I was conducting my experiments. Three things are essential for control of the senses: (1) faith; (2) a conviction of the necessity of subjugating the senses, so strong that we would persist even if we were all alone in this belief; (3) food is body’s nourishment, a means of keeping it alive, but it is also the cause of the senses becoming turbulent and, therefore, when it ceases to serve the purpose of nourishing the body, eating should cease. When steam fails to make the engine run, when the pipe through which it flows is rusted, its supply ought to be stopped. A wise engineer would know that, if this supply were not stopped, the engine could burst. The position with regard to food and the body is identical, and, therefore, if feeding the body results in the senses becoming turbulent, we should stop eating. As, however, our instinctive pleasure in food will not disappear when we stop eating, we should also pray for God’s grace. We have a poem in which we say that we should pray for God’s forgiveness for the thousand sins which we commit. We are drawn to these sins against our will, we slip into them slowly and gradually without consciously wishing to commit them. We should pray for God’s mercy so that we may be forgiven the many thousand sins of this kind. Hence, if anyone is convinced that he ought to kill his physical appetites, he does nothing wrong is fasting. If he has faith, it will certainly be rewarded. If it is not rewarded, God’s promise to man will be falsified; but our experience is that this never happens. One must not shrink from a fast of ten or twenty or fifty days. Gibbon\textsuperscript{1} never made any statement without first verifying its truth. He has mentioned Catholics fasting for as many as fifty days. They had certainly mastered the senses to the degree. In this miserable age, people become impatient if they get no result in five days. Let no one think that our pleasure in objects can be quickly destroyed. If it is not destroyed and the man can control himself no longer, he may eat, but he should not accept defeat. He should start a fast again. This readiness to stake one’s all and perish is bound to be rewarded with victory. The man will ultimately win but only if he perseveres after failing ten or even twenty times. There is such great beauty in this effort, and that is why I advise it. What is followed in the Roman Catholic Church is also enjoined in Islam. The people who at present do evil things in the name of Islam have little understanding of it. Those, on the other hand, who go on praying in their obscure homes, certainly realize God. They give up all indulgences. One cannot indulge in pleasures and live a life of renunciation at the same time. If we understand the truth that we eat only to give the body its hire, then we are fit to understand the Gita.

One more point (which I will not elaborate today). It is, that the author of the Gita has categorically laid down the principles. We shall find no error in them if we examine them in the abstract, but when we try to put them into practice we experience difficulties. But I will take up this point later.

Having told Arjuna this with regard to cravings of the senses, Shri Krishna proceeds as in the next verse:

For, in spite of the wise man’s endeavour, O Kaunteya, the unruly senses distract his mind perforce.\textsuperscript{2}

However much an intelligent man may strive, the senses are restless, they shake his self-control and forcibly draw his mind towards their objects; they draw even a jnani\textsuperscript{3} after them. The senses are like uncontrollable horses. If the rider is not vigilant and the reins are not all right, there is no knowing where they will carry him. “A monkey, and drunk besides”\textsuperscript{4}, that is how it will be.

Holding all these in check, the yogi should sit intent on Me; for he \textsuperscript{1} Edward Gibbon (1733-94); author of The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire

\textsuperscript{2} II, 60
\textsuperscript{3} A man of spiritual knowledge and illumination \textsuperscript{4} A Gujarati saying whose senses are under control is secure of understanding.

“The sthitadhi, having controlled all his senses, will rest wholly absorbed in Me. Anyone who strives in this manner and succeeds in holding his senses under control, such a one is a yogi.”

Thus Shri Krishna shows how to become a sthitaprajna.

[34]

April 3, 1926

I explained yesterday that, in order that our pleasure in the objects of senses may subside completely, fasting, bhakti; prayer and vigils are necessary. But the pleasure [in objects] will not disappear till we have realized God. The question is, can it disappear completely while the body is there? I have come to the conclusion that no one can be called a mukta while he is still alive; one may be said at the most to have become fit for moksha. When we speak of Janaka as a muktatma, the word mukta is used in a general sense and the term means that he was a man who would attain deliverance after his death, that he would not have to be born again. It is doing violence to the meaning of words to say that a man has attained deliverance even while he lives in the body, for the necessity for deliverance remains so long as connection with the body remains. A little reflection will show us that, if our egoistic attachment to ourselves has completely disappeared, the body cannot survive. If we have no wish at all to keep the body alive, it must cease to exist. If we but move our hand the mind is bound to move too. If, now, we would completely withdraw the mind from the body, the latter should become “as the burnt silken thread, only the form surviving”. Some attachment is bound to persist while our bodies are capable of motion. Scientists remove air from a bottle, but a little of it remains in it. The air becomes more and more rarefied, and only a scientist would know that there was any inside. Similarly, our pleasure in objects does not disappear completely while the least degree of association with the body persists, as signified by its movements. Moreover, as long as we commit even a little violence, moksha is not possible, and the slightest movement of the body involves some violence. Even if the body is lying completely motion-less, its functioning involves some violence, however little it may be. There is violence even in the act of thinking, and so long as that is so man

1 II, 61
2 Devotion to God cannot attain a state of perfect self-realization, his mind cannot even comprehend such a state.

Thus, the cravings of the senses die away only when we cease to exist in the body. This is a terrible statement to make, but the Gita does not shrink from stating terrible truths. Truth does not remain hidden because it is not stated. Moksha is the supreme end, and even eyogis can experience it only in contemplation. We must, therefore, say that the Dweller in the body cannot be free while He dwells in it. The prisoner is in jail and the king promises him that he will be released; but till he is actually released he cannot be said to have come out of the cage.

He can only imagine his condition after release. In the same way, if there is anyone waiting to receive and greet the atman on its release, he cannot do that as long as it remains imprisoned in this cage of the body.

And this cannot but be so. How can it be otherwise than that the state after release will be different from the state before it?

Truth is so profound and great a thing that, as we think more and more about it, we realize that to have a direct experience of it, we should completely shed our attachment to the body and yearn every moment for moksha. As we think of moksha in this light, its value in our eyes should daily increase. If it is the most important thing in life, it should be clear to us that it cannot be attained while we live in this body. Till the gate of the body prison has opened, the fragrance of moksha is beyond our experience. Whether terrible or not, this is the truth.

We need not spend much thought or indulge in intellectual exercises over this problem. Once we are decided on the end, we should concentrate our attention on the means; if they are right, the end is as good as attained. If we have trust in our father, we may rest assured that we shall get our share in his property and need not ask him whether he has made a will. Similarly, we need not argue about this matter. The thing is like Euclid’s straight line. No one in the world has as yet succeeded in drawing a perfect right angle, but we can construct buildings with the help of instruments which approximate to a right angle. Likewise, we can only conceive the state of moksha. We can conceive a perfect straight line only when we erase the straight line before us; similarly, we can attain deliverance only when we leave the body.

In a man brooding on objects of the senses, attachment to them springs up; attachment begets craving and craving begets wrath.
Wrath breeds stupefaction, stupefaction leads to loss of memory, loss of memory ruins the reason, and the ruin of reason spells utter destruction.\(^1\)

Dwelling constantly on objects of sense-pleasure produces attachment for them. Shri Krishna here explains the order in which withdrawal from sense-objects is to be accomplished. If we constantly think about having a certain object, the mind will become strongly attached to the thought of its possession, and this in turn will grow into a passionate desire to possess it so that the object takes still greater hold of our mind. Attachment produces impatience and passion gives rise to anger. When we fail to get the object of our desire, we become angry. As it recedes from us, we get angry with others. Anger clouds a man’s vision, so that he loses his judgment and forgets what he is. “Who am I, and from whence?”—he forgets to ask. If he could but recollect, would he not realize what was proper and what was not proper for him? The man who forgets what he is loses his power of discrimination. Such a person is as good as dead. Quite a few persons mount the gallows with perhaps a smile on their face. But they depart from this world and have no future in the other. Thus, through constant dwelling on objects of sense the man is ultimately destroyed. He as good as commits suicide. It is not merely that his body perishes; he will not rise from his fallen state for many lives to come. One should, therefore, crush the craving of sense the moment it arises. The first thing to do is to get over the habit of dwelling on objects of sense-pleasure in our imagination. For that purpose, one should constantly think on God, should live as it were in a state of samadhi.

[35]

April 4, 1926

But the disciplined soul, moving among sense-objects with the senses weaned from likes and dislikes and brought under the control of atman, attains peace of mind.\(^2\)

He who lives with his senses no longer subject to attachments and aversions and perfectly under his control becomes fit for God’s grace. When a man’s ears, nose, eyes, and so on, go on performing their functions naturally without conscious willing on his part—the winking of the eyelids does not need to be willed, there must be some disease if it is otherwise—we say of such a person that his sense-

---

\(^1\) II, 62 and 63
\(^2\) II, 64
organs, having become free from attachments and aversions, function spontaneously.

What is the natural work of the ear? We describe a man as established in samadhi when his atman abides in serene content in itself. His senses must be under his perfect control. The ears of a man whose mind has become one-pointed must have become the servants of his atman. Actually, however, we are the slaves of our senses. From this slavery we must win swaraj for the atman. The ears should in fact listen only to the divine music of the atman. They would not, then, hear even the loud beating of drums. While the atman dwells in this body, it should live as the latter’s master and god, and use the senses to do only their natural work. Such a person has no charm for Panditji’s singing; he attends only to the praise of God.

As Sanjaya had been given the gift of divine vision, so there are divine eyes and ears behind our bodily eyes and ears. The person who is ruled by his atman will have the gift of inner senses and will not need the outer ones. These latter are always subject to some degree of attachment and aversion. Our hands may be cut off, but they will not move on their own—such should be the degree of our self-control. There was once a great bishop in England who held out his hands to be burnt first. Hazarat Ali did not feel the pain of the arrow, for his mind was absorbed in the contemplation of God. The man who has not sold himself to his senses as their slave, but has made himself God’s slave has no right to ask for a reward from Him in the form of His grace. He who has become God’s slave will, instead of trying to be a master in this world, believe even while he suffers God’s lashes that they are for his good. Why do we pray to God to breathe greater life into us? God had His own interest—a divine interest—in creating man and that is that the latter should so live that he would not seek pleasures of the senses, but would devote himself entirely to His contemplation and service.

This is the principle. In daily life, one should choose the best that is possible for one. If a man is incapable of hearing the divine song in him, he may listen to good songs sung by others. He should do work which would make him feel in tune with his atman. As long as we must use our moral judgment, we should choose what is good and shun what is evil. We shall then succeed in making the senses do their natural work. For one who lives in this way,

1 Presumably this refers to Thomas Cranmer (1489-1556), Archbishop of Canterbury, who was burnt at the stake.

Peace of mind means the end of all ills, for the understanding of him whose mind is at peace stands secure.¹

When God’s grace descends on us, bringing us peace, all our suffering ends. Who can harm him who is protected by Rama? He on whom God daily showers His grace has all his sufferings destroyed.
The intellect of a man whose chitta has become calm and whose only thought is of God, stands secure and is protected against error. Shri Krishna now describes a condition the opposite of this:

The undisciplined man has neither understanding nor devotion; for, for him who has no devotion there is no peace, and for him who has no peace whence happiness?²

The meaning is that the man who has not become one in God, who is not a yogi established in samadhi; lacks the faculty of intellect altogether. One who is unsteady has an intellect which is manybranched; of what good is such an intellect? It feels no devotion, it does not utter Ramanama. He who lacks devotion and does not meditate on God, how can he attain peace? The man who is filled with devotion sits in single-minded con-templation of God, but the other man who has no peace, how can he be happy?

[36]

April 6, 1926

Before we resume our reading of the Gîta, let us apply to our practical situation what we have already learnt. Today is the sixth³, the day of India’s awakening. I look upon it as a day of religious awakening, though ordinarily it would be regarded as a day of political significance. On that day we had kept a fast, bathed in a river and gone to temples; Muslims had offered prayers in mosques and Parsis in their fire-temples. Who can say how many of them were sincere? At that time, of course, everyone seemed to be sincere. That was the day on which we started satyagraha. We commenced civil disobedience in the evening by selling copies of Hind Swaraj⁴. All, Hindus, Muslims and Parsis, seemed to have gone crazy on that day.

¹ II, 65
² II, 66
³ April 6, 1919 was observed throughout India as a day of protest against the Rowlatt Bills: vide “Speech at Chowpatty, Bombay”, 6-4-1919.
⁴ Published in 1909 and proscribed in March 1910 by the Government of
Bombay 3.
Today, too, we have kept a twenty-four hours’ fast. We should understand the aim behind it. The aim is to bring about spiritual awakening in us. Our aspiration to go from untruth into truth, from darkness into light, is not something for the distant future; it is immediate. For us, non-violence and truth are symbolized in the spinning-wheel. It may be made only of wood, but if we see in it the _chintamani_ then it becomes the _chintamani_. It is intelligent to regard the spinning-wheel to be what it is, but it is more intelligent to regard it as the _chintamani_. If even the dullest can see God in a clod of earth, what may we not see in the spinning-wheel?

What is wrong, if we see swaraj in the spinning-wheel? Our idea, therefore, does not violate dharma. We should understand this when we keep a fast and spin. The Satyagraha Ashram will go on doing its work even when the rest of the country goes to sleep. And we shall, as I have said, get swaraj through the spinning-wheel. The _Bhagavad Gita_ says that women, Vaisyas and Sudras, all classes of people, can win freedom. In the same way, all of us can do this. Whether or not we are stout and well-fed, we can do this work if we are strong in mind. Let us, therefore, cultivate firmness of mind; if we do not let the senses distract the mind, we can become fit for satyagraha.

Let us now take up the verse which we are to discuss today.

_For when his mind runs after any of the roaming senses, it sweeps away his understanding, as the wind a vessel upon the waters._

A pleasure-loving man wastes his time in aimless wandering; he must have new suits of clothes every day, he eats and drinks what pleases his palate and goes about dressed in finery. If one of his pleasure-loving senses is so undisciplined that it seeks gratification anywhere and anyhow and if his mind is totally enslaved by this one sense, it will drag his intellect behind it as the wind drives a ship before it in the sea and wrecks it on a rock or runs it aground. Thus the man whose senses are completely out of his control and whose mind is totally enslaved by one of them will be ruined through gradual stages explained earlier as the consequences of attachment. If the mind is enslaved by even a single sense, one is lost.

_Therefore, O Mahabahu, he, whose senses are reined in on all sides from their objects, is the man of secure understanding._

---

1 A fabulous gem that fulfils all the desires of its owner
2 II, 67
3 II, 68
The man whose senses are under his control and are kept away from their objects is a man established in samadhi.

When it is night for all other beings, the disciplined soul is awake; when all other beings are awake, it is night for the seeing ascetic.¹

In conclusion, Shri Krishna gives the mark of a sthitaprajna in one verse. He is awake when it is night for other human beings, and when other human beings and all the creatures seem to be awake, it is night for the ascetic who sees.

This should be the ideal for the Satyagraha Ashram. Let us pray that we may see light when all around us there is darkness. If we are brave, the whole world will be brave; as in our body, so in the universe—this is how we should feel. We should thus be ready to take upon ourselves the burden of the whole world, but we can bear the burden only if we mean by it doing tapascharya² on behalf of the entire world. We shall then see light where others see nothing but darkness. Let others think that the spinning-wheel is useless, and believe that we cannot win swaraj by keeping fasts. We should tell them that we are sure we shall get it; for, as the Gita says, yavanarthan adapan, that is, if through fasts and similar practices we can obtain the position of a liveried servant in God’s Kingdom, why cannot we secure such a position in our swaraj? The world will tell us that the senses cannot be controlled. We should reply that they certainly can be. If people tell us that truth does not avail in the world, we should reply that it does. The world and the man established in samadhi are like the west and the east. The world’s night is our day and the world’s day is our night. There is, thus, non-co-operation between the two. This should be our attitude if we understand the Gita rightly. This does not mean that we are superior to others; we are humble men and women, we are a mere drop while the world is the ocean. But we should have the faith that, if we succeed in crossing to the other shore, the world, too, will. Without such faith we cannot claim that the world’s night is our day. If we can achieve self-realization through fasting and spinning, then self-realization necessarily implies swaraj.

¹ II, 69
² Voluntary suffering as moral discipline
³ A reference to II, 46
April 7, 1926

Yesterday, we learnt an important mark of the sFITaprajna. What seems light to other people is darkness to the yogi. For instance, we tell a great number of people that they should eat sparingly, but a man who has spent his days in devotion to God will immediately understand that, if he eats full meals every day, it will be a hindrance to his life of devotion. Such a yogi, therefore, will keep himself alive on very little food while other people go on feasting on delicacies. But he will not parade his self-control. Narasinh Mehta ridiculed in his song renunciation, knowledge, meditation, etc., and gave the palm to the gopi’s love, but this sounds strange to people in the modern age. The truth is that those whom the world knows as yogis are not really yogis, nor what the world describes as the four modes of liberation¹ or as spiritual enlightenment are such in fact. These phrases are used merely to deceive the world. The man who really lives a life of contemplation will outwardly seem a man of the world. His mind may be absorbed in God all the hours of the day, but he will move in the world like other men. He will not go about trumpeting that he lives a life of contemplation. The gopis in their love go on dancing, for, knowing that their love is pure, they are not afraid of the world’s censure. Mira said that she paid no heed to what the world said, since she had not left her husband but only wished to discover the true meaning of devotion to one’s husband. Gopichand² is living in a palace of gold. He is looking admiringly at his body, which is exuding the fragrance of *abir*³ and gulal, and his face is lit up with a smile of joy. And then, it happens, tears drop from the eyes of Mainavati⁵ who is watching him from the balcony above. Gopichand wonders from where the water-drops can come, seeing that there are no clouds in the sky. Mainavati explains to him that his body which

---

¹ Namely, attaining salokya (the world of God), samipya (nearness to God), sarupya (the form of God), sayujya (union with God)
² A king in Hindu mythology who by his renunciation displayed the purest love for his mother
³ White powder
⁴ Red powder
⁵ Gopichand’s mother
he so admired will one day perish, it will be covered with wrinkles, the teeth in the mouth will loosen and come out and the eyes will see no more. What will his body avail him, she asks, if he were to die just then? She has wasted her whole life, but he has time yet to escape and save himself. Is it likely that a mother would give such advice? What the world prizes highly seemed of little worth to this mother, for she was a woman of spiritual wisdom. As the earth rotates on its axis, once every twenty-four hours we are hanging with our feet up and heads down. We can move about in this position because the earth pulls us towards itself like the ants moving on the surface of a lump of sugar.
We, the ants on the earth, do not know that the latter is round and is in constant motion. The spiritually enlightened man and the yogi know the hidden truth of these things and tell us what is unreal. What the world takes as real is unreal to them. What it describes as darkness, they will describe as light. The yogi has an inner vision which is different from the world’s. The body should live as prisoner of the atman. It should function entirely under the latter’s control.

He is whom all longings subside, even as the waters subside in the ocean which, though ever being filled by them, never overflows—that man finds peace; not he who cherishes longing.

The sea, though being ever added to, remains confined within its bounds; it stands where it has always stood despite countless rivers emptying their waters into it. The man in whom evil impulses and desires subside in the same manner is a yogi. The man who is a slave of desires, whose senses are for ever being allure by their objects, such a person is not a yogi. He is a yogi who is like the sea, who is not like a rivulet or a brook which soon overflows and soon dries up.
Christian¹, too, was a yogi and a man of contemplative life. His voice sounded but one refrain. A man, whose mind is constantly absorbed in God, whether he is bathing or eating or drinking, how can he feel evil desires? Like the sea, he is ever full. Rivers and streams fall into it and come to rest, and their waters are cleansed of their dirt. If this dirt spread out in the sea-water, would the latter be as clear as it is? We actually go to a sea-coast to enjoy its fresh air. In like manner, every evil desire subsides and disappears in the sea of a yogi’s mind.

¹In Pilgrim’s Progress
The man who sheds all longing and moves without concern, free from the sense of ‘I’ and ‘mine’—he attains peace.\(^1\)

Such peace may be experienced by a man who has given up all cravings and lives untroubled by desires. He attains to it by shedding the consciousness of “I” and “mine”. He alone is a true yogi who never feels “I am doing this”.

This is the state, O Partha, of the man who rests in Brahman; having attained to it, he is not deluded. He who abides in this state even at the hour of death passes into oneness with Brahman.\(^2\)

The brahmi state is that in which we realize the Brahman. Having attained it, we are never overpowered by the darkness of ignorance again. It has already been said that objects of sense lose all attraction for us when we have seen God. Similarly, here again Shri Krishna sums up the argument by saying that, having attained to the brahmi state, a man never falls again into delusion. A person who is in this state at the moment of his death attains brahma-nirvana.\(^3\) This statement can mean either of two things: one, that he will attain to the Brahman if he is in that state at the moment of death, and, two, that he will attain eternal peace if he always lives in such a state, right up to the moment of death. If a man who has lived a wicked life till now takes to a good life from tomorrow, there is nothing he will lack. But it will not avail a man to have been good all his life if in his last days he becomes wicked. That man, then, may be said to be good who remains so till the last day of his life. That is why it is said: “Call no man good till he is dead.” However good a man may have been, he may yet weaken in his old age and worry over his children and his social affairs. We may know that a man has attained moksha only if he died in the brahmi state.

The nirvana of the Buddhists is shunyata, but the nirvana of the Gita means peace and that is why it is described as brahma-nirvana. We need not concern ourselves with this distinction. There is no reason for supposing that there is a difference between the nirvana mentioned by Lord Buddha and the nirvana of the Gita. Buddha’s description of nirvana and this other description of nirvana refer to the same state. A number of learned men have shown that the Buddha

---

\(^1\) II, 71
\(^2\) II, 72
\(^3\) Absorption in the Brahman
\(^4\) Nothingness
did not teach a doctrine denying the existence of God. But all these are pointless controversies. What can we say about a state which is so different from anything known in our life that we cannot describe it even when we have attained to it? If it is agreed that our bodily existence is not a thing to be cherished, all these other controversies are unmeaning.

This is the end of Chapter II. Sthitaprajna means a person who has become completely free from attachments and aversions.

[38]

[Chapter III]

April 8, 1926

The Chapter which we completed yesterday is known as Sankhyayoga. We saw that, after discussing the distinction between the body and the atman, Shri Krishna told Arjuna that he had explained the Sankhya view, that is, analysed logically the distinction between the body and the atman. This did not help Arjuna to know it in his own experience, but he grasped it intellectually. Arjuna’s duty of fighting was explained to him, but only so far as it could be done with the help of argument. Shri Krishna then explained yoga to him, that is, the method of acting in a disinterested spirit. This led to the discussion concerning the sthitaprajna.

From the last verse of Chapter II, it would seem that Shri Krishna had nothing further to add. Indeed, if Arjuna had not again put a question to him, there was really nothing for him to add. The brahmi state includes bhakti too. But in view of the natural tendency in everyone to let his desires rule his reason, truth has to be repeated often so that it may be made more clear. If an unenlightened man decides for himself, he usually decides in favour of worldliness. Therefore he has to keep on repeating to himself that he is the atman, for it is not a truth experienced by him at all hours of the day. A son who has no doubt in his mind at all need not tell his mother that he is her son. The repetition of Ramanama and dwadashmantra¹ are for people who have not had self-realization. After release from the body, the man who explains and the man who listens, the two will be one. So long as the body exists, the problems of the means [of attaining moksha] will remain; that is why Vyasa expanded the Gita this length. There is nothing in it which is not contained in the verses which we recite at the time of our evening prayers. Vyasa has placed before readers a divine truth through the Gita. Whether Sankhya or yoga, sannyasa or the life of the house-holder, all these paths are essentially one. Action and inaction mean the same thing, this is the substance of the Gita’s teaching. Since these different paths are so mixed up with one another, we should understand their essential identity if our one aim is to know God and realize the unreality of all else. The way to know Him is not to sit cross-legged, but to work in a disinterested spirit.

¹ Literally, sacred formula of twelve syllables: Om Namo Bhagavate Vasudevaya

A man does not become a yogi because he is known to have performed a thousand yajnas or made huge gifts. We have to take into account whether he was free from attachment to the ego, whether he willingly turned [in Mira’s words] as God pulled him with a slender thread, whether he worked accordingly, and so on. Vyasa wants to tell us that a yogi should offer up to God everything he does, whether it be good or indifferent, should look upon Him as the sole author of everything. And so he makes Arjuna ask Krishna:

If, O Janardana, thou holdest that the attitude of detachment is superior to action, then why, O Keshava, dost thou urge me to dreadful action? Thou dost seem to confuse my understanding with perplexing speech; tell me, therefore, in no uncertain voice, that alone whereby I may attain salvation.¹

First, Shri Krishna put forward the logical argument, and then he described the marks of the sthitaprajna. He also explained that yoga meant karmasu kaushalam.² Arjuna complains that Shri Krishna has confused his judgment by such contradictory advice, and requests him to tell him some one thing clearly and definitely.

I have spoken, before, O sinless one, of two attitudes in this world—the Sankhyas’, that of jnanayoga and the yogis’, that of Karmayoga.³

---

¹ III, I & 2
² Skill in action
³ III, 3
⁴ III, 4
Merely by refusing to work, one can never experience the state of naishkarmya (freedom from experiencing results of action), or attain to moksha.

We shall meet this word karma again and again in the Gita. What can it mean? It must have, of course, a restricted meaning. But it will help us to understand the relevant verses in the Gita if we take the word in its broadest meaning. Karma means any action, any bodily activity or motion. In the Gita’s definition of the word, however, karma includes even thought. Any motion, any sound, even breathing, are forms of karma. Some of them we cannot avoid performing. Some of them we perform as a matter of necessity, some others are involuntary. The divine in us urges us on to the path of good, and the demoniac to that of evil. Even if the man is good the demoniac element in him drives him to evil courses. Another man may be wicked, but the divine element in him forces him to follow good. Thus action is impelled by nature, or is the result of compulsion or volition. How do you say, Shri Krishna asks Arjuna, that you will not work? You will not stop riding the horses of your fancies. Even sannyasis are helpless, let them say what they will. Even the decision to stop breathing is karma. Even the refraining from karma is karma. It will not, therefore, to attain to the state of naishkarmya. Renunciation of action and the state of naishkarmya should come spontaneously.

For none ever remains inactive even for a moment; for all are compelled to action by the gunas inherent in prakriti.\(^1\)

No one can cease from karma even for a moment. To listen and not to listen, both are forms of karma. Sattva, rajas and tamas, the three forces or modes of prakriti, drive everyone to action, whether he will or no. A tamasik man is one who works in a mechanical fashion, a rajasik man is one who rides too many horses, who is restless and is always doing something or other, and the sattvik man is one who works with peace in his mind. One is always driven to work by one or another of these three modes of prakriti or by a combination of them.

He who curbs the organs of action but allows the mind to dwell on the sense-objects—such a one, wholly deluded, is called a hypocrite.\(^3\)

---

1. Cosmic energy, as distinguished (in the Sankhya philosophy) from Purusha, the Cosmic Consciousness, witness of the action of prakriti
2. III, 5
3. III, 6
Anyone who curbs the organs of action outwardly but dwells all the time on the objects of sense and gives free rein to his fancies, and then believes that he has attained to naishkarmya, such a person is sunk in ignorance and his claim is mere hypocrisy. A person who gets his hands tied up but in his mind strikes the enemy, does in reality strike, though outwardly he does not seem to do so. He does not get the pleasure of actually striking, but certainly experiences the fruit of doing so. Please do not misunderstand what I have said. It does not mean that there is no scope for effort or striving, nor that, in that case, we had better act as we feel inclined to. We are constantly thinking of doing something or other, but reflection also helps us in restraining our hands. There can be no hypocrisy in ceaselessly fighting the enemy who holds us in his grip. The point of the verse is that there should be no contradiction between thought and action. It is hypocrisy to yearn inwardly for an object and outwardly keep away from it. It is not hypocrisy if, despite one’s best efforts, one does not succeed in always remaining vigilant, for the evil habit has had a long hold over us. Only, one should not merely try but also wish to remain vigilant. Hence, it is wrong for anyone who mentally dwells on objects of sense and outwardly shuns them to describe himself as a sannyasi or yogi. The psychological effects of our actions in past lives cannot be wiped out all at once. Waves of desire will continue to rise. They will drench us again and again, but one day they will leave us dry. If someone forces me to take up and hold a lamp in my hand, I can say that I did not hold it, for I was not willing to do so. If a person is forced to do anything, his action is not his. For instance, a person who is forced to let off a gun is not a murderer. On the other hand the man who supplied him the powder and planned everything is a murderer. If the man who actually fires the shot does so of his own free will, he too is a murderer. In this way, there should be concord between thought and action. Where this is absent, it is difficult to judge to whom to attribute intention and to whom action. We kept a fast on the sixth; if, however, we dwelt in our minds the whole day on the pleasure of eating, our fast was no fast. On the other hand, a person is not a hypocrite if, though tempted to eat, he suppresses the desire every time he feels it and so keeps struggling all the time. The man who does evil things has no hope. But he who struggles against evil thoughts will tell himself that he would die rather than let himself do an evil thing; he will go on fighting against his evil thought. The brahmachari between whose thoughts and actions reigns perfect harmony and who is always pure in mind deserves the highest reverence. It is the nature of the mind to be ceaselessly active, thinking of one thing or another. He who strives ceaselessly to restrain it is sure to win the battle. It is not as if he never gratified sex-urge, but he does so with discrimination. He is a true sannyasi and yogi between whose thoughts and actions there is such complete harmony that he is not even aware that he observes brahmacharya. He should be a man who has made himself a eunuch. If the person is a woman, she should not be conscious at all of being a woman. The man’s impotence should not be the incapacity of disease; he should have voluntarily cultivated it. He should become completely free from desire, should become incapable of doing evil. Even a vigilant man may fall, but ultimately he will win complete freedom from desire. A man who remains non-violent in action will in time become free even from the desire to strike anyone.

There is no outward difference between a fool and a wise man. The former has no pretensions. The latter wants to be taken as a fool. Outwardly, the behaviour of the two will seem alike. The man whose mind is active with intense energy will appear dull. The earth rotates with such great speed that it seems to be stationary. There is no reference here to the idea of shunya. Buddha’s nirvana was also not shunya. There is only a seeming inertness.

April 10, 1926

We saw yesterday that a man, while himself remaining in the background, may provide the means of killing and get someone else to do it, and thus become guilty of the heinous sin of murder. His guilt is even greater than that of the person who actually kills. Yudhishthira went to Drona and Bhishma and asked them: ‘What is this you have decided to do?’ They replied that it was their stomach which had forced them. This means that a slave or servant, being unable to oppose his master’s wishes, is less guilty than the latter. The person, on the other hand, who plots a murder and gets someone else to execute the plot is far more wicked than the latter. He is a hypocrite, moreover, as the verse explains.

1 They had agreed to fight on the side of the Kauravas though they knew that justice was on the side of the Pandavas.
Proceeding, Shri Krishna explains the opposite manner of acting:

But he, O Arjuna, who keeping all the senses under control of the mind, engages the organs in karmayoga, without attachment—that man excels.¹

The first point is that one should go on doing karma through the respective organs of action, and the second is that one should hold the same organs under one’s control. Shri Krishna has thus divided the physical organs into two classes. The ten organs are the sentries. Five of them function as spies and the other five carry out orders. Hands, feet, etc., belong to the latter class. If the eyes, the nose and other sentries of their class do not remain under our control, we can stop using them. We can curb them every moment. Holding them under control, we make the sentries of the other class carry out orders. He is the best man who controls the functioning of his organs in this manner and works without attachment. A man who gets angry cannot be described as non-attached, he is, in truth, strongly attached.

Do thou thy allotted task; for action is superior to inaction; with inaction even life’s normal course is not possible.²

One should do the appointed work, the task which has been assigned to one, for action is superior to inaction. No one can cease completely from action even for a moment. If that is so, it is better that we work of our own free will. Why need we consult anyone for doing niyata karma, that is, for doing work specially meant for us? For, we cannot even keep our bodies alive without working.

This world of men suffers bondage from all action save that which is done for the sake of sacrifice; to this end, O Kauntya, perform action without attachment.³

Yesterday I explained the meaning of the word karma. Similarly, we should discuss the meaning of yajna too. Some learned students of the Shastras believe that the Gita is not concerned with work like a cobbler’s or like spinning, that is, with work which we do in our practical life. By karma they mean such things as ritual offering of food to the manes, and exclude spinning and weaving from its definition. But the Gita is very much concerned with practical life. A dharma which does not serve practical needs is no dharma, it is

¹ III, 7
² III, 8
³ III, 9
Even cleaning of latrines should be done in a religious spirit. A man of such spirit will ask himself, as he does the work, why there should be so much foul smell. We should realize that we are full of evil desires. The excreta of a person who is suffering from a disease or is full of evil desires are bound to emit foul smell. Another person who does not do this work in a religious spirit but shirks his duty will remove the contents anyhow, and not clean the bucket; such a man does not do the work as a religious duty. He has no compassion in him, nor discrimination. Thus, dharma is certainly connected with practical life. We have, therefore, accepted a broad definition of karma, and will accept an equally broad definition of yajna. We will discuss this tomorrow.

[41]

April 11, 1926

As we have the word yajna in our language and the practice is enjoined in our dharma, so the Bible and the holy books of the Jews too have each a corresponding word, and an idea similar to that of yajna. We find three things in the Koran: (1) animal sacrifices, on the Bakr-i-Id day; (2) it refers to a practice which also obtained among the Jews, a father sacrificing his son—Ibrahim does this; and (3) Ramadan, which is a form of sacrifice, that is, parting with or giving up something which is dear to us. In the same way, we see in the Bible the meaning of the term sacrifice expanding after Jesus. He told the people that they could not realize their aim by this sacrifice of animals, that for performing a sacrifice in the right sense of the term they would have to do much more than kill animals. He told them that it was not a sacrifice to destroy other lives, that one should give one’s own life as sacrifice. With that idea, he sacrificed his own life for the eternal welfare of the world, for its spiritual welfare, for washing away its sins and not merely for feeding the people. Among the Hindus, too, the practice of human sacrifice was prevalent at one time. Then followed animal sacrifice. Even today, thousands of goats are sacrificed to Mother Kali. Yajnas are also performed for securing the fulfilment of many worldly desires. The root word in the English term “sacrifice” had a good meaning; it meant “to sanctify”. In Sanskrit, yaj means “to worship”. In the Old Testament, the word for yajna means “to renounce”. But the underlying idea, that all actions performed for the good or service of others are forms of yajna, will be accepted by everyone. Maybe our motive in sacrificing an animal is that of public good, for instance, securing rainfall. The motive in this may be that of public good, but it is not a true sacrifice in which we kill other creatures. We may tell ourselves that we have made a sacrifice in paying for the goat, but the crores of other Hindus are not likely to share that belief.

\(^1\) The opposite of dharma

In Gujarat, too, we find this practice prevails in places. A buffalo is sacrificed on the Dushera Day¹. Our reason, however, tells us that there is no sacrifice in this, that we do not really worship God by doing this. However, the belief underlying this practice, too, is that we serve public good through it. We should, therefore, include two points in the definition of yajna: it is something which is done to serve others’ good, but without causing suffering to any creature. We serve the good of the world by refraining from causing suffering to other creatures, because we shall refrain from doing so only if we cherish the lives of other creatures as we do our own, only if we believe that the body is transient. If we interpret correctly the word yajna as it is used in the Gita, we shall find no difficulty in understanding its teaching and living in accordance with it. We can perform a yajna with the mind as much as with the body. Of these two meanings of yajna, we should accept that which suits the context every time.

We need not go into why in the past people performed—or even at the present time do perform—an animal sacrifice. We shall answer the question in one or two sentences. Man selects for his food what is available in his environment. What objection, moreover, can there be from people’s point of view to anything done for public good which is not in itself regarded as sinful? Where people believe that the rains will not come unless some person or creature is sacrificed, no hesitation is felt in performing such a sacrifice. As man’s beliefs become more enlightened, the meanings, which people attach to certain words also become more enlightened. Even if Vyasa had defined the words which he used, we would ask why we should accept the meanings given by him. For instance, non-co-operation has come to mean much more than we at first intended it to mean. There is no harm in our enlarging the meaning of the word yajna, even if the new meaning we attach to the term was never in Vyasa’s mind. We shall do no injustice to Vyasa by expanding the meaning of his words. Sons should enrich the legacy of their fathers. Why should we object if anyone regarded the spinning-wheel with greater sentiment than what we seek to create in the people about it? It is quite possible that in future people may see harm in the spinning-wheel, may come to think that no one should wear cotton clothes at all, because they do harm. They may, for instance, believe that clothes should be made from fibres extracted from banana leaves. If people should come to feel that way, anyone who still clings to the spinning-wheel would be looked upon as a fool. A wise man, however, will mean by the spinning-wheel not an article made of wood but any type of work which provides employment to all people. That is also the case with regard to the meaning of the term yajna. Thus, we may, and should, attach to it a meaning not intended by Vyasa.

¹ The tenth day of Asvina, the month in the Hindu Calendar roughly corresponding to October.

Together with sacrifice did the Lord of beings create, of old, mankind, declaring:

“With this may you cherish the gods and may the gods cherish you; thus cherishing one another may you attain the highest good.”

We should think carefully what the term god, too, means. Who are god Indra and other gods? Who are the god of water and the god of woodlands? There was an argument once over one of the verses in our morning prayers, whether it was proper to worship Saraswati conceived as a figure with hands and feet. Just as it was explained at the time that Saraswati was not a goddess living somewhere far away in the clouds, so are Indra and others not gods living in the heavens; they symbolize the forces of nature. If only we take the thirty-three crores of gods in whom we believe to stand for man, we would serve our own good and also that of the whole world, of all the creatures in it. The gods symbolize the different forms of energy, the forces which sustain the universe. Even the belief in terrible gods does not deserve to be dismissed. The power of God in all its three aspects—creative, protective and destructive—is beneficial, but we do not understand the real meaning of these three aspects because of our limited knowledge. The Nagapanchami day is observed to save ourselves from harm by snakes. It is not right to observe any such day to appease snakes. And so also about ghosts and spirits. What are ghosts? They are merely creatures of our imagination. Our aim should be, instead, to worship the sustaining energy of God, to worship it in all its aspects.

---

1 III. 10 & 11

April 13, 1926

We cannot give any arbitrary meaning to the term yajna. We can adopt only a meaning which is consistent with the use of the word in the Gita. We may draw all possible conclusions from the principles of geometry, but they should be such as Euclid would not question or oppose. We do no injustice to the poet in going beyond his meaning. Any purpose which a well serves will be served by a lake too. If water can be used for a good purpose, it can also be used for an evil purpose. We can destroy a dam and thereby render innumerable fields useless. So the meaning which we have attached to the term yajna, namely, any action performed with a view to public good, is not inconsistent with the use of the term in the Gita.

“*This world suffers bondage from work unless it is work done as yajna”; in this verse, the word yajna can also be interpreted to mean Vishnu and the worshippers of Siva may take it to mean Siva. In other words, any work dedicated to God helps one to attain moksha.

“*Along with yajna the Lord created men.” Which type of yajna is meant here? Does the term have any special meaning? I think it has. The reference here is not to mental or intellectual work. Brahma did not ask human beings to multiply and prosper merely by working with their minds; what He meant was that they should do so through bodily yajna, by working with the body. Scriptures of other religions enjoin the same thing. The Bible says: “With the sweat of thy brow thou shalt earn thy bread.” Thus bodily labour is our lot in life; it is best, then, to do it in the spirit of service and dedicate it to Shri Krishna. Anyone who works in that spirit all his life becomes free from evil and is delivered from all bonds. Such a person is like a soldier in the King’s army, who is content to carry out orders. He is as worthy as the General. Both have equal value in God’s eyes, for He looks only to the attitude. Arjuna’s arrows availed him not when

1 The Creator
2 Gandhiji said this in English.
Krishna was no longer by his side, and he was robbed by a Kaba'. The verse, commencing with sahayajna then, talks of bodily yajna, of a kind, moreover, through which gods and men would serve each other’s needs. By gods we may understand all living beings or God’s sustaining energy. Gods are the invisible forces. So long as a person has someone in sight for whom he works, he is not engaged in service; real service consists in working for those whom one does not know personally. The thirty-three crores of gods belong to the world of imagination. Children cannot even conceive this number. We cannot take in with our eyes so many beings assembled at one place, nor count them. We cannot see these gods, as we see our children, and yet we cultivate a living relationship with them. By and by, the sphere of our service will enlarge itself to embrace the whole world. We have thus left aside the word gods and interpreted the verse to mean that we should serve the humblest human beings, even those whom we never see, with respect and honour and looking upon them as gods and not as our servants; we should, in other words, serve the whole world.

This verse tells us that we should undertake bodily labour to do service. Man simply cannot live without such work. If he had not violated this law, he would not suffer as much as he does, the rich would not have become masters of immeasurable stores of wealth and the millions would not be suffering in poverty. God is a great economist. He is omnipotent. We cannot refrain completely from storing things for future use. But God never stores, for he can destroy and create the universe with a mere thought. He wants us, therefore, to provide only for each day. If we want anything the next day, we must labour for it. He has warned that we are doomed if we do not labour, if we do not bend the body and work with it. He has commanded that we should willingly endure every kind of suffering. If we honour this law in our life, there would be no hunger and no sin or immorality in this world. Evil desires will never disturb a man who labours all the twenty-four hours for the good of the world (I say twenty-four hours because one keeps working even in sleep.). If the labourers in the world were filled with evil desires as we are, the world could not last. The rich seek all kinds of luxuries. If the workers, too, did that, where would the world be? In the West, nowadays the idea has come to prevail that men and women are born to gratify all their desires. Adharma is being propagated. If people worked with the shovel or pick-axe, would they be disturbed with evil desires? We should submit ourselves, therefore, to this restraining law. If we do our bodily yajna properly, all will be well with us, we shall advance the good of our atman and of the world, our mind and body will be ruled by our atman and we shall be filled with serene peace. It can be said that such a person, even though acting, does nothing.

---

1 A highway robber

I cannot understand the idea that one can perform a yajna by lighting a few sticks. It does not do to say that doing so purifies the air. There are many other ways of purifying the air. Why should we at all pollute the air? It is always pure. It is we who pollute it. But this is not the aim behind a yajna. When the Aryans first came to this country, they tried to civilize the non-Aryan races. Maybe the idea of yajna was originally conceived for the uplift of the latter. There were big forests in those days, and it may have been regarded as everyone’s duty to help in clearing these forests, for it was a social necessity. And because this work was regarded as a duty, it came to be looked upon as a means of attaining moksha. Innumerable ceremonies were devised, all of which required the lighting of fire. If these rishis had lived in the desert of Sahara, they would have conceived of yajna as refraining from cutting a single twig, as planting of trees or drawing a certain quantity of water. In burning wood in this age, we misuse the capital of our forefathers; or we show ourselves witless pedants by understanding the thing in a literal sense. If we think of the matter now, we shall see that burning sticks is no longer a form of bodily yajna. If we would undertake any such yajna in this age and in this country, it is spinning, the reason being the same as in the instance I cited of the forests. At that time, the very thought of cutting trees for wood in a forest might have shaken a man with fear; but the man who had faith would have started the work straightway, for the person who had asked him to do it was inspired with absolute conviction. Such a man of faith would simply go on cutting trees (Recall the instance of Stevenson and the ditch near Manchester. He asked people to go on and on filling it with earth.) If the order for cutting down trees had not gone out, snakes and poisonous air would have remained of course. Someone has said that a true idea is born in the mind of one person who acts upon it, and thus, it starts on its career. If you employ the right means, the end is certain to follow. All that is necessary is to make a start. A man of faith will go ahead with his work, undeterred

1 Literally, seers
by difficulties. He knows no such thing as failure. Let the world believe in failure, he would say, I do not know what it is. This is what is meant by disinterested work. Such a person hopes for nothing, and works in patience; he resorts to no scheming and is never in too much hurry for the result.

April 14, 1926

We discussed yesterday the meaning of the term yajna. Using one’s limbs, labouring, working for others’ good, these ideas follow from this one verse. What is meant by saying that mankind was created along with yajna? As we cannot escape the cycle of birth, old age and death, so also bodily labour is our lot in life from which there is no escape. But what actually happens is that man becomes self-centred and follows his own wishes in every matter, or works in order that he may be able to indulge in pleasures. But the world cannot go on thus, and if the world cannot go on, the individual who behaves in this manner also cannot live. Man is born a helpless creature. The child needs someone—a mother-god or father-god—to look after it. Man is born dependent, and dies in dependence. Freedom is a state of the mind. A man can describe himself as swadhin only to the extent that he feels so, for he can say that he submits himself to a law of his own free will. But there are laws disregard of which would make government impossible; a man cannot, however, commit a crime and escape its consequences. Not only that, the relations of the person committing a crime also suffer with him. A crime ultimately proves as harmful to its author as the swallowing of raw mercury. Man is, thus, dependent on others in all things. He is his own master in only a few matters. It is, therefore, best for him to do everything in the spirit of yajna. Yajna was created simultaneously with us, so that we may serve the gods and the latter may serve us. If we let ourselves be ruled by them, they, too, will be ruled by us. The right yajna for this age is the yajna of spinning. We should, however, think of yajna only in its primary meaning which we have discussed. All other forms of yajna follow from that. Our most important activity is eating and drinking. Even our body is born as a slave. If we learn to keep it alive exclusively for the good of the atman, we should attain moksha. The body is meant to be spent for the good of the atman and of the

1 Dependent on oneself world. Different men act in different ways, and if we believe in what the law terms “a legal fiction”, that the king does no wrong, then the king also becomes good. If today the Princes are wicked, so are their subjects. In these other matters too, we keep up some legal fictions.
We entertain such a fiction about the spinning-wheel, too, that through it we establish a bond with the world, having abandoned the old fiction that we establish such a bond by burning sticks and pouring ghee into the fire.

It is not recently that I have come to attach this meaning to yajña; I have understood it in that sense ever since I first read the Gita. What I read about the Russian writer Bondoref’s [views on] “bread labour” only confirmed my idea, but the idea was with me from the beginning and has grown stronger with years. The Russian writer has stated one side of the truth. We understand the other side too. We now understand the idea of bread labour better, for by yajña we do not mean labour as a means of livelihood. Thanks to the associations which the term calls up, we do not restrict yajña to mean this and no more. Labour in this context means bodily labour. He alone should eat who has laboured for twelve hours. Anyone who sincerely wants to observe brahmacharya, to preserve purity and to be free from evil desires, must engage himself in bodily labour. People who do physical work are not subject to the sway of such desires as much as we are. Maybe they are dull in mind; but it is better to be dull in mind than to be a prey to evil desires. The world would go on even if there were no intelligent men and women in it, but it would be nowhere if all people refused to do physical work. We have exercised our intelligence in acknowledging the law of bodily labour. The one universal form of such labour is agriculture and it should, therefore, be looked upon as yajña.

“Cherished with sacrifice, the gods will bestow on you the desired boons.” He who enjoys their gifts without rendering aught unto them is verily a thief.

The gods, gratified by yajña, that is, by your work for the service of others and your bodily labour, will grant you the means to gratify your desires; that is, the gods in the form of society will grant them to you. Anyone who receives what they give but offers nothing

1 Gandhiji uses the English expression.
2 III, 12
to others is a thief. He is a thief who does not do bodily labour for society.

The righteous men who eat the residue of the sacrifice are freed from all sin, but the wicked who cook for themselves eat sin.\(^1\)

Those holy persons who eat only what is left behind after the yajna is over become free from all sins. They who first offer to society, to Shri Krishna, what they get to eat, live free from sin. But those who cook food only for themselves, who work only for selfish ends, take in nothing but sin when they eat. That is why one should regularly and daily perform yajna, make a sacrifice, of which body labour is the foundation. The greatest yajna consists in observing the very first commandment of God, the commandment with which every human being is sent into this world.

From food springs all life, from rain is born food; from sacrifice comes rain and sacrifice is the result of action.\(^2\)

If people did nothing, there would be no rains, which means that there would be no rains if people did not perform yajna. Work which is necessary must be done. But people are simply not ready to exert themselves and plant trees. Rains are plentiful in forests. But there they are of no benefit to human beings; in fact they do terrible harm. They do not do that after human beings start working in those forests. Cherapunji has the heaviest rainfall in the world, but what good does all that rain do? (Of course, the rainfall there serves as a standard of comparison for rainfall in other parts of the world, but that is a different matter.)

In this verse, the Bhagavad Gita enunciates the principle explained by scientists that there can be no rain in regions barren of vegetation.

\(^{[44]}\)

April 15, 1926

Know that action springs from Brahman and Brahman from the Imperishable; hence the all-pervading Brahman is ever firm-founded on sacrifice.\(^3\)

This verse is a little difficult to understand. “You should know,” Krishna says to Arjuna, “that karma springs from Brahman, and the latter from yajna.” In an annotated Gita found in Bihar, karma is explained as Brahman, and a little below, the latter is explained as the source of the universe, as that which fills the entire universe, and from which arise Brahma, Vishnu and Siva, or, in other words, as that which we describe as dwelling in the hearts of all creatures, that which is the common element of belief among all faiths and sects.

It is true that Brahman springs from yajna. Wherever we find anyone filled with the spirit of renunciation, anyone whose atman abides in serene content within itself, who suffers when others suffer and who practises the supreme yajna of maintaining a sameness of attitude towards all, there we may be sure that Brahman is present. But there is one thing, whether about this yajna or any other, namely, that it should not be so performed as to cost the body nothing. Dharma is not to be followed with tender regard for one’s body. That is dharma in following which one suffers in the body to the limit of one’s endurance. There is no yajna for him who is not ready to mortify his body. What right does a person have who undertakes bodily labour for the sake of the world—if there are thirty-three crores in India, there must be billions in the whole world, and if to these we add the insects and other forms of life, then each of us is but one hair on the body as compared with the total number of living creatures in the world—what right does such a person have to feel that he works for the world? If all my hairs were to be plucked off, I would die, but one hair lost means nothing. If we look round in the world, we shall see that the whole of it is within us. If we forget which is the hair and which the world, we shall come to feel one with the world. We shall then spend this body in the service of the world all the hours of the day.

All this talk about knowledge is because of the body; otherwise, for an unembodied one, how can there be any question of knowledge? The highest knowledge of all in the world is knowledge of the self. Moreover, the idea of a human being having no body exists only in our imagination. Mortification of the body, therefore, is the only means of self-realization and the only yajna for everyone in this world. We are all labourers. If the rich would look upon themselves as labourers as much as the people who work with their bodies are labourers, the latter would get all that they want. They would then feel quite satisfied with their condition and devote themselves wholeheartedly to their work. If the working men, however, deliberately claim that they are the equals of their masters, they are sure to come to grief. If we follow the methods of the British in running our government when we have swaraj, we would be behaving as masters. But we wish to give up the ways of masters and turn ourselves into workers. If, while working as labourers, we learn to be detached and make ourselves ciphers, we would come out of the darkness of night. This is the idea in the verse containing the phrase eternally founded in yajna.

But, then, who is the Brahma mentioned in the first verse of this group? Who, again, are Vishnu and Siva? I do not look upon them as distinct Beings. We may take them to represent aspects of God or His powers. They are represented in the puranas as being different from other gods. All that is partly right and partly wrong. They imagined all these things because they wanted to teach people dharma somehow. In truth, there is no such Being as Brahma or Siva. The only reality is the neuter Brahmān. But as God is conceived of as doing nothing, it was imagined that this universe comes into existence out of Brahma. If I destroy a man’s belief in a Brahma with four faces, in what way do I enlighten him? How will that profit me? If such a person asks me whether I share his belief, I will tell him that I do not. But others who believe in a personal God should be free to do so. And so Brahma means the active energy of God. In fact in Tilak Maharaj’s Gita, Brahma is explained as prakriti; I will say, then, that prakriti is Brahma. Whatever our belief, what we have to understand from all this is that in every yajna God’s presence may be felt, and that, where there is no yajna of body labour, God, too, is absent, though, of course, we believe that God is present everywhere. Human beings go on working with their bodies and that keeps the cycle going. I have no doubt at all that the Imperishable here means God.

He who does not follow the wheel thus set in motion here below, he, living in sin, sating his senses, lives, O Partha, in vain.¹

Such a person’s life is a burden on others. The earth rotates ceaselessly all the twenty-four hours of the day, and anyone who merely rests on it doing nothing lives to no purpose. One who is always engaged in yajna is not subject to the binding effects of karma. But he who, disinclined to work, pleads aham Brahmasmi² in justification of his idleness, is stated by the Gita to be living in sin. This is what Narasinha Mehta meant when he wrote that those who

¹ III, 16
² I am Brahman; one of the four “great utterances” in the Upanishads renounce the world will not win deliverance and those who enjoy life will. Here, “those who enjoy life” means all the people in the world who labour with their bodies and “those who renounce the world” means the incorrigible idlers.

I have explained the wheel in this verse to mean the spinning-wheel. I look upon it as the means of supreme yajna in this age. He who plies it will have lived worthily, will have won the battle of life.

[45]

April 16, 1926

Yajna means any activity for the good of others.¹ A man works for the good of others when he spends his body in their service. If we look upon our body as the property of the world and use it so, we would retain our control over it but always keep it clean, would not let it be eaten up by white ants. All this, however, should be done in a spirit of dedication to God. It would give us profound happiness if in using it we act as its trustees or guardians. A watchman who serves as one who held his body as a trust may assure us that he would be constantly seen coming to our house, and that this fact by itself was enough to keep off thieves, and if we have trust in such effect of his name we might let this Rama², this watchman, go, grant him moksha. Similarly, [we should have faith that] any physical labour undertaken in the spirit of service will produce rain.

That is a poet’s explanation³ and it is correct. The word yajna comes from the root yaj, which means “to worship”, and we please God by worshipping Him through physical labour. What should we do if we want rain over a desert? We should plant trees there. We should plant trees in any region over which we want rain, and cut them down in those regions where it rains in excess.

The original intention behind the idea of yajna was that people should do physical work. We forgot the root and came to concern ourselves with branches and leaves, believing that by pouring oblations into fire we perform a yajna. In the old days, it was necessary to cut down trees and burn up the wood in order to clear the land. What was the idea in the pupils approaching their teachers wood

¹ A member of the audience had asked Gandhiji how yajna could produce rain.
² A general name for servant, current among Gujaratis in Bombay ³ A child in the audience had said that their service through physical labour would please God.
in hand? Cutting down trees and burning wood had become a form of yajna. At the present time, spinning has become a yajna. If water was scarce and we had to fetch it from a distance of two miles, fetching water would be a yajna.

Laborare est orare—Work is worship. We can connect this dictum with the idea in this verse.

April 17, 1926

If we use our intellect for serving others, would that also not be a form of yajna? This verse does not say that all forms of yajna produce rain. It only says that without yajna there can be no rain. That does not mean that all forms of yajna can produce rain, just as it is not true that all edible things can support life.

It may be asked what connection there can be between the facts of physical life and spiritual matters? The laws which hold in the spiritual world hold also in the phenomenal world. All the rules which concern the physical body have the welfare of the atman as their aim. That should be our primary aim in all our physical activities. We must turn away from everything which does not help us to attain self-realization. One thing, of course, is true. Just as bodily labour undertaken with a view to service will produce rain, so the employment of our intellect in the service of others will promote the welfare of the world.

How do we explain the fact that sometimes yajna fails to produce rain? An effect follows a chain of causes, all of which are not visible to us. Besides yajna, many other favourable circumstances have to be present. We have no ground for believing that a given action must always produce a given effect. There may have been a thousand other factors which had contributed to the appearance of that effect on a previous occasion.

No event or action is without its effect. Was the earthquake in Japan at the end of the last war the result of Divine wrath? The explanation given by... was that when man becomes cruel, nature too may become so. There is, however, no question of cruelty on the part of nature. How can we regard anything which is pure justice as cruelty? Man does everything through pride. Not so God. To attribute cruelty to Him is to measure Him with a yardstick which we

1 The name is omitted in the source.
apply to human beings. This is the point of view which produced philosophical atheism. How can we turn God into a human being? From another point of view, He certainly acts, for He bestows life and consciousness. It is He who is ever active and does everything, hears without ears and sees without eyes. It is not correct to believe that an earthquake may be punishment for sin. Why should we believe, either, that an earthquake is a punishment? If a nation is sunk in sin and God wants to save it, He might send an earthquake with that aim. If I wish to commit an immoral act, a most heinous one, and if God sends a snake to bite me in order to prevent me from doing what I intend, would that be His wrath? He does that in order to save me. Take the story of Nala and Karkotak. Karkotak told Nala that if he did not transform him into an ugly figure, he, Nala, would perish with the advent of Kaliyuga. Similarly, we should not believe that possession of a kingdom is necessarily the reward of holy merit earned by our goodness. God’s ways are inscrutable. We should be afraid of answering all such questions. We may answer simply that we do not know. Of course, we can know God’s laws, we have a right to ask what they are. But a wise man restrains his curiosity and tries to know only as much as is necessary for attaining self-realization. Even in that sphere, there ought to be a limit somewhere. Even scientists have not been able to discover how the soul comes into being. I do not find it impossible to imagine that one day man will be able to prevent earthquakes, just as he is able to change the courses of rivers. But the power to bring about such changes is a trival matter. The laws of physical nature pale into insignificance when compared with those of the atman, for the former concern only the world of name and form. It is wise not to have too much curiosity regarding them. We may know what is necessary for us in order to offer praise to God, and, having acquired enough for that purpose, we should have no more curiosity in such matters.

[47]

April 18, 1926

But the man who revels in atman, who is content in atman and who is satisfied only with atman, for him no action exists.1

1 III, 17 & 18
He has no interest whatever in anything done, nor in anything not done, nor has he need to rely on anything for personal ends.¹

There is nothing for such a person to do; not that he does nothing, but it makes no difference to him whether he does or does not do it. He is equally unconcerned in either case. He has no end to pursue through other beings.

It may seem to us that both the verses say the same thing. If we do not think carefully, we shall probably feel that they contradict the verses which precede them. It was said in one of them that anyone who refused to work the rotating wheel was a sinful and indolent man. Here, on the other hand, it is said with reference to the man living contented in the atman that there is noting for him to do. It may seem, but it is not, a paradox to say that one who works in the spirit of service will live contented in his self and there will be nothing which he wants to do. If we place an ant on a ball and keep the latter rotating, there will be nothing for the ant to do but to rest where it is, content with itself. It will tell itself that the ball was rotating, and itself with it, and that was enough. If, now, an ant-hill was provided inside the ball and it was necessary for the ant to move and reach it, it would say that it would be moving inside a rotating ball and have to exercise no choice in doing so. What duty can a prisoner have? He merely carries out orders. The man who lives in the self makes himself the slave of the self. He carries out the orders of the self, and, therefore, has his happiness in the self and lives contented in it. (If the prisoner I referred to just now was a satyagrahi, he would say that he would go on listening carefully to this master, the self, and so win it over.) If he is all the time absorbed in listening to the voice of the self and acts so as to conform to the turning wheel, what would be there for him to do? Tolstoy states somewhere this same thing, that man in his foolishness boasts that he will do this and he will do that, that he will relieve the suffering of people in distress and so on. But it will be enough, says Tolstoy, if this person comes down from off the backs of the people he is sitting on. The people on whose backs he is riding, they have nothing to do. We are riding on the backs of the poor. There is nothing we need do, except get off their backs—if, that is, we follow only the voice of the self inside. There is nothing for us to do because we are not even aware of doing anything when we do it spontaneously.

¹ III. 17 & 18
Thus, the man who refused to do yajna was described earlier as indriyarma; as an incorrigible idler, and another who is ceaselessly employed in work is described as one who is content in the self. He works so much, and that spontaneously, that there is nothing for him to do.

I understand better than Panditji himself the point of the question which he put. How is it that the Gita talks about rain? In a discussion about spiritual matters, everything must be about the atman. This is probably what he has in mind. The Gita leads the reader on to worms and insects, to birds and animals, and so on finally to rain, and tells him that, if people do enough physical work, they will get as much rain as they need. We can infer some such general principle from its teaching.

Can rain have any connection at all with whether we lead sinful or virtuous lives? It may have, but we do not know how. If we understand a part of the whole, then we shall understand the whole. We know something about the world of invisible things if we understand the visible world. For instance, if we make it a practice to walk long distances, the atman within us too will be governed by the rhythm. If, thus, we understand how we should act in one matter, we shall also know how to act in other matters. For this purpose, too, there is a rule we can follow, and that is that we should discover a principle or a law which has no exception. For instance, water is water only if it contains one part oxygen and two parts hydrogen. This law has no exception, in the same way that a right angle must have ninety degrees, neither more nor less. If, therefore, we know what the “wheel thus set in motion” is, in accordance with the rule explained above that a principle should have no exception, we shall experience no difficulty. Shri Krishna has explained here a law of physical nature first and then, through it, a spiritual law.

[48]

April 20, 1926

Therefore, do thou ever perform without attachment the work that thou must do; for performing action without attachment man attains the Supreme.\(^4\)

\(^1\) III, 16

\(^2\) How could yajna produce rain?

\(^3\) Vide translation of III, 16.

\(^4\) III, 19
The verses here have different meanings, but it is not that one verse applies to the enlightened man and the other to the man yet striving for enlightenment. One and the same verse can be understood to apply to both, in the same way that the Gita as a whole can be interpreted to refer to both the types of war, the outer and the inner. This verse, therefore, means that we may say of a person whose attachment to the ego has disappeared that there is no karma for him, that he may do something and yet do nothing.

For through action alone Janaka and others achieved perfection; even with a view to the guidance of mankind thou must act.¹

When Janaka was informed that his city was burning, he merely said: what if it is burning? The man who is directing the operations of a fire brigade can go on giving directions only if he keeps himself where he is. Can he leave his place of duty if he is told that his town or his house is on fire? He has completely given up thinking about himself. The person who follows the maxim, “Honesty is the best policy”, exchanges a diamond for a cowrie. If the man who follows truth does so with the hope that he will thereby succeed better in his business, his truthfulness will be a cause of bondage for him, but it will be the cause of his deliverance if he follows it for the sake of moksha. Anyone who acts in this manner is a yogi, for yoga means skill or wisdom in action. He who does all these things with a selfish motive is a mere stone; he who does them for the highest end is like Jada Bharata², though, in the end, he does attain illumination. The line “Live as you like”³ applies to him. For that, however, the person should go on working ceaselessly. “He intends nothing to serve other ends”.⁴ This can be said only of one who has cleansed himself completely of the ego.

Whatever the best man does is also done by other men; what example he sets, the world follows.⁵

¹ III, 20
² His story is told in the Bhagavat. An illuminated soul from his birth, outwardly he lived as an imbecile, indifferent to all slights.
³ The first line of a verse from Akha, a 17th-century Gujarati poet, whom Gandhiji often quotes
⁴ A line from Rajchandra, who had exercised a profound influence on Gandhiji’s thinking in his early years.
⁵ III, 21
People will adopt the standards which such a person sets. They will always observe what the eminent do. To what extent does Gandhi follow truth in life? Even the thoughts in which a great man indulges will produce an effect. His is a lame truthfulness who speaks truth as a matter of policy, but he who is truthful in his thoughts will act aright though he be dumb. Every thought of such a person is bound to come true. He is the ideal man whose actions, speech and thought are in harmony with one another. Everyone will follow him. This is the reason why I have placed the spinning-wheel before people; if there are any who devote themselves to it whole-heartedly, all will follow them. If those who worship an image of clay can realize God, why not a person who spins?

[49]

April 21, 1926

Today is Ramanavami Day. On this day we have a reading from the Ramayana for two hours and, in the morning, there is a discourse on the incarnation of Rama. People fast, or take only one meal or eat only fruit. We shall put into practice what we have learnt from the Gita by celebrating the Ramanavami today in this manner. I am faced with a conflict of duties. Though I am in the Ashram, I may not be able to join in the celebration. There is another duty I have to discharge. Pandit Motilal has written to me and asked me to send for a certain person and discuss some matters with him. I shall, therefore, be in the Ashram but engaged in discussions with him; when the Ramayana is being read, I shall be busy looking after the preparations for his lunch. All this is wrong. If I had become totally absorbed with all these activities in the Ashram and made it a rule to join in every celebration as I unfailingly attend prayers at four in the morning, I would have told Motilalji that today being Ramanavami I would be able to free myself only for half the day. But I do not yet have such firmness of mind, and therefore, cannot act in that manner. It would not seem natural in me to do so. But I should let the Ashram advance in that direction. So long as we have not become truly civilized, we are half animal and half human. If we could be complete men, our lives would be devoted wholly to the pursuit of goodness. I often feel that, as your leader, I should set an example in every matter. But I cannot

---

1 The birth-anniversary of Rama on the ninth day of the bright half of Chaitra, a month corresponding to April-May do so unless there is complete harmony between my thought, speech and action. You should, of course, go on with the usual programme. Keep a fast and have a reading from the Ramayana. Please bear with my deficiency, and see that you do not follow this weakness of mine after I am dead. My inability today to remain firm is not part of my normal nature. But it is my duty, I owe it to you, to present myself to you as I am.

I shall take no time now, speaking on Rama’s life; I shall speak about it when readings from the Ramayana begin soon after the rest period is over.

Just now I shall only say that we should make it our aim to spread among the people a realization of the holy power of Ramanama. Which is the Rama of the Ramadhun that follows the bhajan? Is he the Rama of Tulsidas or Valmiki, or the Rama whose birth-anniversary falls today? Are these Ramas different from one another, or are they the same Rama? We shall understand all this if we reflect carefully over the matter. I shall have to leave some of these points. I can only follow my own sentiment in this matter. Let everyone dwell today on the thought that Ramanama will save us. I still feel troubled in my mind sometimes. When I worry over my work, like other people, I start repeating Ramanama. I sometimes keep thinking about the Gita and the meaning of particular verses when I retire for the day; I start repeating Ramanama, then fall asleep, for I know that it is my duty at that time to sleep. If we wish to fill the whole world with the power of Ramanama, it is not by constantly repeating the sounds ra and ma that we can succeed; we must ceaselessly think on God. If the mind is disturbed by all kinds of evil thoughts or if we get angry, we should start repeating Ramanama. If our aim is to use Ramanama to deceive the country so that it may follow us, it is a very wicked thought. For us Ramanama is a boat for crossing to the other shore. We should, therefore, put it in the proper place, enveloped with sweet fragrance. I was once presented with a copy of the Koran. Haji Habib told me that it could be kept with proper care only at his place, and nowhere else, for they would put it above other books and touch it with their hands only after washing them properly. This, he said, I might not do. In this way man envelops in fragrance the thing which

1 Repeating the name Rama as a sacred formula
2 A song for group singing, with frequent repetition of the name ‘Rama’
3 Devotional song is dear to his heart. God will certainly be displeased with the man who keeps the Koran in the holiest place but his mind in an unholy place.

We should thus give a wide meaning to Ramanama. We should extract the utmost benefit from anything to which our heart is drawn.

[50]

April 22, 1926

Whatever the best man does is also done by other men; what example he sets, the world follows.¹

We should learn from this verse that if young people follow the bad example of their elders, it is the elders who should be blamed.

For me, O Partha, there is naught to do in the three worlds, nothing worth gaining that I have not gained; yet I am ever in action.²

For whom should one cook, for one already full or for one fasting? For others, of course. To Shri Krishna, the whole world is a guest, and he loves all the creatures in it (and he must, for the world is his creation!). People look upon me as Purushottam, says Krishna, so I must observe proper measure in everything, otherwise the universe would perish.

Indeed, for were I not, unslumbering ever to remain in action, O Partha, men would follow my example in every way.³

I have to be busy every moment to see that the world goes on, for I am its ruler, I am the master of the ceremonies. Since I make the world dance as I will, I am also called Natavar.⁴ This ruler of the world cannot afford to sleep by day or by night, nor can he rest from work.

If I were not to perform my task, these worlds would be ruined; I should be the cause of chaos and of the end of all mankind.⁵

I must, says Krishna, keep the fire burning the whole day, otherwise there would be confusion in the social order, and, I would be responsible for the destruction of society.

We work so that we may please God, and if we give up doing that the people will observe no discipline, will refuse to work and feel completely lost.

¹ III, 21
² III, 22
³ III, 23
⁴ The Supreme Player
⁵ III, 24
Just as, with attachment, the unenlightened perform all actions, O Bharata, even so, but unattached, should the enlightened man act, with a desire for the welfare of humanity.¹

One must work just as ignorant people do, except that they work with attachment. We, too, must take up a pick-axe and work like them. A wise man should be as industrious and work as hard as others; only, he should work for the good of the world, disinterestedly and without attachment. (If you spin for the poor without attachment to your work, you will serve your own good and theirs). If you work in this spirit, you are a man of spiritual knowledge and, though working, are doing nothing. Does a person who has kept the ekadashi² fast commit a sin by attending to cooking? He or she cooks, in a disinterested spirit, for children and guests.

[51]

April 23, 1926

The enlightened may not confuse the mind of the unenlightened, who are attached to action; rather must he perform all actions unattached, and thus encourage them to do likewise.³

A wise man should not confuse the judgment of ignorant people who are attached to the work which they do, should not, for instance, ask them to go without a thing because we can do so. Shri Krishna has said a little earlier that if he did not work for the people, there would be confusion of varnas in society. He says the same thing in this verse in different words. If Arjuna took any unexpected step, people would not understand his intention and might do something which he had never wanted them to do. He had asked those hundreds of thousands of men to assemble there ready for battle. How could he, now, cause confusion in their minds? He should, therefore, go on doing his duty in the spirit of yoga, unattached to the fruits of his work, and inspire others to work likewise.

All action is entirely done by gunas of prakriti. Man, deluded by the sense of ‘I’, thinks ‘I am the doer’.⁴

The man who is sunk in ignorance believes in his pride that his actions are his, whereas they are prompted by his nature, by sattva,

¹ III, 25
² The eleventh day in either half of the lunar month
³ III, 26
⁴ III, 27
rajas and tamas. (Anyone who says that he bats his eyelids is either a fool or suffering from a disease of the eye. He does not wink his eyes really, he harms them.) But he who acts as if he were a mere witness of his actions will win admiration for everything he does. The work done by a person without much ability but also without attachment to his ego will produce better results than that done by another who is attached to his ego. Take the example of a state ruled by a king and his minister. The latter works within the framework of the administrative setup. In just the same way, we are pilgrims in this world and obey the laws of the world. If we lay claim to what we are prompted by our nature to do, we sow confusion in the minds of the ignorant. We should realize that we are no more than servants bound to carry out another’s orders, and should voluntarily act as if we were slaves. Mira described herself as being a slender thread, because she submitted to her nature. She used the phrase “slender thread” because she had submitted herself to God’s will so completely that there was no question of her resisting. He who eats simply to give the body its hire will not think of pleasing his palate. Anyone who lives in accordance with this law will forget his ego completely, surrender to Krishna everything he does.

[52]

April 24, 1926

The verse which we shall discuss today presents a problem, for its meaning has been completely perverted. It is interpreted without any reference to the context. There was a libertine in Rajkot. He used this verse to justify his dissolute life. He was a student of the shastras and could cite appropriate Sanskrit verses, on occasion, and so enjoyed a good status in society. He used to say that nature followed its own urges and that, therefore, he was not to blame, that he was untouched by either sin or virtue.

But he, O Mahabahu, who understands the truth of the various gunas and their various activities, knows that it is the gunas that operate on the gunas; he does not claim to be the doer. ¹

He who classifies gunas and karma into their sub-divisions, divides them into their different types and then analyses each, and so arrives at the truth about them will know that everything is the result

¹ III, 28
gunas acting upon one another and will not get involved in their activities through attachment to them. The impostor I mentioned used to say that prakriti was God’s maya\(^1\), and he was not responsible for her actions. If, however, we understand the meaning which the term prakriti bears in the preceding verse, we shall see that there was nothing we need do of our own choice. Only that person who has ceased to be attached to any work can say, like King Janaka, that he is not responsible for the actions of his prakriti. But the man who is full of ignorant attachment and thinks little cannot take cover behind this verse. The point of this verse is, in the extremely difficult business of running this world, in the running of this intricate machine (the very thought of which is sufficient to make one’s head spin), what is there that I can do? What strength have I? I dare not touch a single part of it. Anyone who considers carefully how this world is kept going will see that the different gunas are ceaselessly active and doing their work. Let us take the small example of the spinning-wheel. Suppose for a moment that the spindle became conceited. Its part in the working of the wheel is quite small. It has no motion of its own, and if it believed itself or the string to be the source of the motion, it would commit a grievous error. If it decides to become bent, it would produce a discordant note while rotating. It might feel that, instead of rotating monotonously, it was now moving in a novel manner, but it would soon lose its place. When dying, it might perhaps realize that it had made a terrible mistake, that its pride had cost it its very life. Let us suppose now that the spindle has no such pride. It will then think that its motion was not its own, that it contributed nothing to the spinning, the string did its work and the wheel did its. It might then say that the gunas operate on the gunas and that it was of no interest to itself how they worked. I must work, the spindle would tell itself, as a mere slave, otherwise I and my relations would be ruined. It would then feel no pride and would no longer be carried away by foolish notions. We could say of such a spindle that it had learnt wisdom. The same argument applies to human beings. No one can go on indulging himself and then argue that his conduct was the result of the gunas doing their work according to their nature. We would come to grief if we made wrong comparisons. If, pointing to the example of an animal, we, too, act as it does, we would become animals. A man, on the contrary, must bear in mind that he is a human being, and that he resembles animals up to a point and no more; that is, he resembles them in respect of the physical needs of sleeping, eating, breeding, etc. The man who decides that he need not eat and sleep as animals do, that he need not, like a dog fight for a piece of bread, such a person will reflect deeply and, having discovered the truth, always live as a mere witness. The animal instincts will not have completely disappeared, but he will realize, if he has understood the law which rules human life, that he must not be a slave to sleep, food and sex, that, in other words, the laws of animal life do not apply to him. As soon as he has understood the laws of prakriti, he will see that they are the basis of the laws governing human life. In regard to the machine of his body his only right, he now sees, is to maintain a disinterested attitude towards it. He will not, then, touch anything unclean with his hand or see it with his eyes. Such a person will become free from bondage to the body and be able to say that in all his actions it is the gunas which act according to their nature, that the ears do their work of hearing, the eyes of seeing, and so on. He will act like the spindle in our example as if he were inert matter with no will of his own. His body will function mechanically. It will then indulge in immorality no more than a log of wood does. By its nature, the human body is but a corpse and, by itself, is as sinless as a log. The senses will not do evil of themselves, so long as the mind which controls them does not wish to do evil. He who has discovered the law of human life will study the working of the gunas and act accordingly like the man who prints after setting the types carefully. The types which have become worn out have to be melted back into metal and cast again, and then reset; in like manner, the man who is guided by the truth that in all matters it is the gunas which do their work will make himself completely inert, doing nothing on his own.

\(^1\) A term in Vedanta; it means the illusory world of phenomena and also the creative energy which projects that world.

April 25, 1926

The senses are not just 16,000¹, their number is infinite. If we make them dance as we wish, instead of ourselves dancing as they wish, we would be the directors of the drama of life. In the first Chapter, even the evil-minded Duryodhana asks his warriors to remain

¹ Lord Krishna is believed to have ruled over 16,000 senses, which are represented as His queens.
in their positions and protect the patriarch Bhishma. If, likewise, we protect the director of the drama, who dwells within us, play our part in accordance with his instructions, the director would not become weak.

Deluded by the gunas of prakriti men become attached to the activities of the gunas; he who knows the truth of things should not unhinge the slow-witted who have not the knowledge.¹

This world is maya, it is a rotating wheel, and, therefore, those who are sunk in darkness remain attached to guna and karma. Those who are under the spell of the gunas of prakriti are swayed by all kinds of desires, yield to grief and ignorant attachments. The man of knowledge should not unsettle the ignorant, he should not lift him from one place and put him in another. For instance, says Shri Krishna to Arjuna, you are on a battle-field, ready for fighting, and so are these others; you have now chanced to learn some wisdom, but you should not, because of that, shake others from their beliefs. If anyone of us should suddenly become enlightened with profound knowledge, it does not mean that he would be able to change all others immediately. He is a fool who seeks to change overnight other people who are following their own ways in life. This, of course, does not mean that, where the system itself is bad, we should not try to reform it. That would be a complete perversion of this idea.

[54]

April 27, 1926

Cast all thy acts on Me, with thy mind fixed on the indwelling atman, and without any thought of fruit or sense of ‘mine’ shake off thy fever and fight!²

After explaining all this—after explaining what karma is and why one should do it—Shri Krishna tells Arjuna that, dedicating every action to Him, having purified his mind, fixed it on his atman and emptied it of all desires, and without entertaining any thought of gain, he should go on doing karma (not that, Shri Krishna explains, he should win a kingdom and enjoy it but) as a matter of duty and irrespective of whether or not he was likely to benefit. (We should, for instance, get up at four in the morning as a matter of duty without thinking whether it will do us any good). You should, Shri Krishna says, shed your attachment to the ego and work—that is, work with the thought that you are not the doer of the karma and its fruit is not meant for you to enjoy, acting as if you were a piece of inert matter like the spindle of the spinning-wheel and like the wick of a lamp which goes on burning by itself. If I did not bring into existence all the factors necessary for the burning of the lamp, how would the wick burn? The wick was shut up within the cotton pad. How did that cotton know that it would one day be made into a wick? It was spun and twisted and then made into a wick. If Arjuna wanted to be like the wick, to think of himself as the atman within and not his body, he must learn to shed his attachment to the ego and empty himself of all desires. By first choosing good against evil and then becoming unattached to either, one can transcend both. So long as we dwell in the body, it functions according to its nature. We should live in accordance with this truth, otherwise we shall invite moral ruin. We should, therefore, aim at the highest. The same is true about our aspiration for moksha. One who is already in water no longer desires to jump into it. If it were true that in water we melt away, we would not at all want to jump into it. Just then, however, moksha was not Arjuna’s goal, nor did he aspire after it or hope for it. We should have as our ideal a state unaffected by hope or desire though, of course, our present state is that of human beings full of desires. Being in a state unaffected by desire is the same as having the absolute conviction that we shall attain moksha. This idea of a state unaffected by desire is to be understood both in regard to our spiritual aspiration and the needs of the body, that is, both in regard to the ultimate goal and practical concerns. In regard to the former, there is no question of being affected by desire. The man who is incapable of doing evil, what interest can he have in good and evil? It is not true that, after the evil in one is completely destroyed, one is able to do good. We only imagine that it is so. When a person never feels the urge to use a sword, how can we attribute non-violence to him? This is a scientific truth, and not poetry; it states a principle concerning the atman. Be in such a state, Shri Krishna tells Arjuna, that is, be perfectly still in your mind, and fight. This idea that one should learn to act like inert matter occurs at many places in the Mahabharata. Why did Shri Krishna ask them to place an iron image of Bhima before Dhritarashtra? He made everyone his instrument, and then asked them to place an iron image of Bhima—what does all this mean? He asked Arjuna to become passion-free and fight, that is, to banish all impatience and anxiety from his mind and then fight. I would kill a snake or flea or bug only if I am angry or annoyed.

¹ III, 29
² III, 30

We shall discuss tomorrow what Krishna meant when he asked Arjuna to “fight”.

April 28, 1926

Shri Krishna asked Arjuna to banish all impatience and anxiety and then fight. When he said “fight”, he meant that Arjuna should do what he regarded as his duty. If we could know every time what we should do, if everyone’s duty, in a given situation was evident to him, all of us would have the same ideas of duty. But that is not so. On the contrary, we have to reflect to discover what our duty is. We have to apply numerous tests and then only do we see what our duty is. That is why Shri Krishna asks Arjuna to be passion-free and do his duty. One can do one’s duty only if one banishes all impatience and anxiety in regard to it. Anyone who has lost control over his speech-organs will seem to talk in a disconnected fashion. The fact is that all of us talk in that manner. An Italian has described all human beings as mad. If we were not mad, we would not indulge in all this vain prattle; though, even when prattling, we prefer to prattle in one way rather than another. Since, therefore, we must make a choice at every step, Arjuna is asked to do his duty without being over-excited about it, that is, without attachments and aversions. We need not doubt the intentions behind the actions of a mother who has ceased to make any distinction between her own child and another’s. Freedom from attachment and aversion is the first step towards understanding one’s duty. Following this line of thinking to its logical conclusion, we would see that a non-violent man is one who is free from attachments and aversions. For instance, Harishchandra saw the auspicious necklace round Taramati’s neck and recognized it. He saw that he had to cut off the dear head of her whom he adored. You will ask me how

---

1 At the end of the fighting, the blind Dhritarashtra wanted to embrace Bhima, but Shri Krishna saw that he wished to crush Bhima in his arms and so advised an iron image of Bhima to be placed before the king.
this is an illustration of non-violence. Violence does not consist in the act of cutting off someone’s head; it consists in the motive behind the act. How if we knew that Harishchandra would have preferred to kill himself rather than kill Taramati? Suppose it had been the King’s order that, if the Chandal could not bring himself to kill the person before him, he could kill himself, Harishchandra would have certainly preferred to put the knife to his own throat. But he was given no such choice. He had actually brought down the knife and it was then that the gods held back his hand.

Take another instance, that of a doctor who has to carry out an operation. The doctor who operated upon me was all kindness. Even if he was not, he did not in any case wish to harm me. If the doctor was called upon to amputate someone’s leg, he would certainly not derive pleasure from the operation. His only motive would be to help the patient. Not only the doctor, but the patient too knows that the amputation is for his benefit. Thus operations involve the use of all kinds of knives and lancets, but they involve no violence.

A third instance. Let us suppose that a man has had his head half cut and it is hanging loose from the neck. He signs to passers-by and requests them to kill him so that he might be spared the suffering.
Most passers-by, let us suppose, take no notice and go on. One, however, stops and looks at the man, sees his suffering and realizes that his death is certain. This person, then, may surely sever the head completely and end his suffering. This, too, is non-violence. It is so because the passer-by was not prompted by any selfish motive in what he did.

We hear in our country many persons advance such arguments to justify killing, but they are insincere; those, for example, who kill snakes are cowards. They are afraid of dying themselves, and their only thought in killing a snake is to save themselves from being bitten by it. The violence involved in killing a snake may be pardonable, but violence there certainly is. There is violence (may be pardonable violence) in killing even a person who is the most wicked of men in the eyes of the world, for killing him will not make the world a happier place, and those who kill him do not do so because they are really concerned about his welfare. If one person is out to destroy the entire world, and all the people in the world prefer to be destroyed rather than kill him, it is possible that that person will be terrified by the violence he would have perpetrated, and after that there would be no more violence in the world.

Thus, to be vigatajvara means to be without aversions and attachments. One may even commit violence then. If anyone, deceiv-ing himself, commits violence in the name of non-violence, of course he would not attain moksha. There is a possibility of moksha for one who commits violence but knows that he does so, but there is none for the hypocrite.

And so Shri Krishna said, “Cast all thy acts on Me.”1 He thus asked Arjuna to fulfil a number of conditions and then to fight.

Those who always act according to the rule I have here laid down, in faith and without cavilling,—they too are released from the bondage of their actions.2

To do one’s duty means to fight and struggle. Since every karma involves a choice, there is necessarily a struggle. Even though caught in this way between opposites, you will have transcended them if you dedicate every action to Krishna, do everything without attachment or aversion, have faith in God and present every karma as a gift to Him. If you believe God to be the author of all you do, you will be touched neither by sin nor by virtue. God comes down in the form of Vaman4, with an appealing face like a mother’s, and begs us to trust everything to Him. He who accepts my teaching, says Shri Krishna, and acts accordingly, without attachments and aversions and without partiality to anyone, is not bound by the effects of any karma.

[56]

April 29, 1926

But those who cavil at the rule and refuse to conform to it are fools, dead to all knowledge; know that they are lost.5

Even a man of knowledge acts according to his nature; all creatures follow their nature: what then will constraint avail?6

1 The source has ‘non-violence’, evidently, a slip.
2 III, 30
3 III, 31
4 One of the incarnations of Vishnu. He begged from the demon King Bali as much ground as he could cover in three steps and, on the request being granted, covered Heaven and Earth in two steps and claimed the King’s head for the third.
5 III, 32
6 III, 33
This verse has been taken to mean that a wicked person can never reform himself. An instance of this is provided here by...; she lies there away from us, and how can we persuade her to change her ways? But, then, the aspiration to realize God is also part of human nature. The beast’s nature is merely to feed and sleep. It cannot meditate on Rama every morning, but man is different. Ramdas Swami exhorted people never to depart from the path of virtue, the path of the highest virtue. But this verse says something altogether different; (all creatures follow their nature). If a person has the nature of an animal, how far will another succeed, try as long as he might, in reforming that person? How long can we keep such a person suppressed? What can we do to a person who refuses to behave better than an animal? I could have hit that girl with my sandals, but it would have made her more obstinate still. One day, however, she may feel Rama’s grace and, remembering this incident, reform herself. This verse is not intended to discourage a man from struggling against his nature. One must of course struggle to improve oneself. But should some other person tell us day in and day out that we remain as beasts and do not improve, there is bound to be a quarrel every time. Take the example of a teacher and a pupil. If the pupil himself tells the teacher that the latter should cane him or box his ears whenever he did anything wrong, the teacher should certainly do that.

Yesterday, we mentioned three illustrations of non-violence. This is one more instance of it. Pupils such as the one in this illustration control themselves and are also controlled by others. Our minds may be disturbed by innumerable evil desires, but we do not welcome them, as we do not welcome a disease which may attack us. Our natural desire is to get well, and the doctor, therefore, is free to put any restrictions on us; the patient will thank him for doing so. But what good will it do to punish a person who does not himself wish to change? Anyone who has ceased to be a human being and behaves like a beast cannot be reformed by others, true though it is that Rama dwells in his heart too. Of course, one should never despair of being

---

1 The name is omitted in the source.
2 A 17th-century religious reformer of Maharashtra able to improve oneself. But how can outward self-control help a man to whom wickedness has become second nature? His release can come only with death. Ravana told Mandodari\(^1\) that he was an enemy of Rama, that he wished to die. And die he did, through his own sins.

_Nigraha_ means trying to control oneself or others. One may try to control a friend, or one’s wife or sister or pupil, if they wish to reform themselves. But what can we do if they oppose us? What can even an emperor do to a person who has abandoned all shame? No one will succeed in his efforts to reform such a person.

We can offer satyagraha only against a person who has some love in his heart. We can control another only if there is mutual love between us; where there is no such love, the only course for us is non-co-operation with the other party. Tulsidas advised non-co-operation with the wicked.

[57]

_April 30, 1926_

Men believe in their pride that they can imprison others and beat them into submission. But we know that thefts and murders have not stopped. What, then, should one do? Everyone should look after himself. This verse certainly does not mean that one should not try even to control oneself, for we have already read: holding all these in check, the yogi should sit intent on Me.\(^2\) The senses are so powerful that trying to control them taxes our energy to the utmost and involves us in violent struggle against ourselves. Shri Krishna tells Arjuna there that he who controls them—passionately beats them down into submission and reins them in, as we do a horse—we do no violence in using the whip thus—and sits meditating on Him, self-controlled, is a man established in _samadhi_. A little later, he says: therefore Mahabahu, he whose senses are reined in on all sides from their objects. . . .\(^3\)

_Nigraha_ means another person trying to impose discipline on us. Addressed to Arjuna, the verse means: “If you believe that you can control your army, you should understand that it will not obey you, for it does not think as you do, its heart is set on fighting. By

---

\(^1\) His wife
\(^2\) II, 61
\(^3\) II, 68
running away from battle, you will be instrumental in the warriors forsaking the traditional duty of their caste and being guilty of conduct unworthy of themselves."

Each sense has its settled likes and dislikes towards its objects; man should not come under the sway of these, for they are his besetters.1

Attachment and aversion are an inseparable pair. The senses feel either the one or the other towards their objects. We should not be swayed by them, for they are the thieves trying to rob the purusha2 within us. They are ever after us, go where we will, and rob us of all our earnings. There is thus the fullest scope for human striving; in fact, it is one’s duty to strive. Having done that duty, one may console oneself with the preceding verse; struggling tirelessly, we may tell ourselves that we can go no further than our nature permits. But taking up such an attitude does not help us. We must continue to struggle ceaselessly. We should continue till we reach the breaking point and that with the conviction that we are bound to succeed. Any man or woman or child who takes cover behind the preceding verse and stops struggling will be a thief in God’s eyes. The line, "seeking pearls, men plunge into the sea, reckless of their lives," describes the spirit of desperate earnestness in striving.

Better one’s own duty, bereft of merit, than another’s well-performed; better is death in the discharge of one’s duty; another’s duty is fraught with danger.4

We should strive to the best of our ability in our own sphere of work, but waste no effort on anything which lies outside it. It would be dangerous for us to go and live in a mansion in Bombay, but it would be a sign of our being happy if we are content to live here in the Ashram.

[58]

May 1, 1926

To speak the truth is a dharma common to all. But there are special duties, that is, duties which pertain to individuals. Suppose that one’s job is to clean lavatories. Such a person should not envy another whose job is to keep accounts. The man who cleans lavatories

---

1 III, 34
2 In Sankhya philosophy, the inner witness watching the play of prakriti
3 From a poem by Pritam, a Gujarati poet, (1720-98)
4 III, 35
as carefully as he does the utensils in his home observes his dharma in the truest manner. It would not be right for Arjuna to think of retiring to a forest and spending his days telling beads on the rosary. His duty was to fight and kill. Retiring to a forest may be the right course for a rishi, it was not so for Arjuna. Even if the dharma meant for Arjuna seemed less worthy, for him it was the best. Why should he, Shri Krishna asks him, talk egotistically, acting like the proverbial dog who believed that he was drawing the heavily-laden cart? He assures Arjuna that, if there was any sin in the latter following his dharma, the responsibility for that would be His, Krishna’s. During the years which Ramachandra spent in the forest, Bharat did not himself rule the kingdom as king but acted as the former’s representative. Ramachandra’s sandals were placed on the throne and Bharat carried on the administration in Ramachandra’s name. There was not a moment when he was not absorbed in thinking on Rama. Similarly, Shri Krishna asks Arjuna why he thought that, if he won the battle, the kingdom would be his. If he had no wish to enjoy the fruits of his effort, it was actually his dharma to fight and win the kingdom. He should act only as an instrument.

Then what impels man to sin, O Varshneya, even against his will, as though by force compelled?¹

We shall discuss Shri Krishna’s reply tomorrow.

[59]

May 2, 1926

How is it that a person is often driven to a wrong path against his or her will?

It is Lust, it is Wrath, born of the guna—rajas. It is the archdevourer, the arch-sinner. Know this to be man’s enemy here.²

The reply, according to Shri Krishna, was simple. When the child refuses to go to school, is simply unwilling to go, what is the reason? He refuses to go because he wants to run away with a bad play-fellow or because he is planning some mischief. Thus, one cause is kama³. It is man’s evil thoughts which drive him to evil deeds. The second cause is anger. We get angry when we do not get the thing we want. Anger has its source in rajas. These two great enemies of man

¹ III, 36
² III, 37
³ Desire
drive him to sin. The reign of kama is different in its effect from the reign of Rama. Those who prosper under Rama’s reign understand the sport of God which this creation is. Those, on the other hand, who are swayed by desire and anger will see, in the creation, not Rama’s sport, but Satan’s. Like Kumbhakarna’s kama is ever waiting, open-mouthed, for its prey. When its appetite is not satisfied, its victim is filled with anger. Know, Shri Krishna tells Arjuna, that this is your enemy. Since the two are twins, He has used the singular pronoun enam.

As fire is obscured by smoke, a mirror by dirt, and the embryo by the amnion, so is knowledge obscured by this.

If there is any smoke, it stays only for a while. As soon as it has gone, the fire gives full heat. The mirror will have to be cleaned, and only then will it give service, provided of course we know that the thing is a mirror. But the foetus covered by the placenta can do nothing about it, it cannot even cry. The man who is under the sway of desire and anger passes through these three stages.

Knowledge is obscured, O kaunteya, by this eternal enemy of the wise man in the form of Lust, the insatiable fire.

This kama harms, like an enemy, even a man of spiritual knowledge.

[60]

May 4, 1926

The senses, the mind and the reason are said to be its seat; by means of these it obscures knowledge and stupefies man.

Therefore, O Bharatashabha, bridle thou first the senses and then rid thyself of this sinner, the destroyer of knowledge and discrimination.

Subtle, they say, are the senses; subtler than the senses is the mind; subtler than the mind is the reason; but subtler even than the reason is He.

Shri Krishna now explains the various stages. It is true indeed that the senses are powerful—they control the body. The mind is stronger than the senses and the intellect stronger than the mind. But stronger still than the intellect is the atman which dwells in the body. The senses, the mind and the intellect, these three are the dwelling

---

1 Ravana’s brother in the Ramayana, a voracious eater who slept for days at a stretch.
2 III, 38
3 III, 39
4 III, 40, 41 & 42
places of desire and anger. But the atman in you, Shri Krishna tells Arjuna, is higher than all of them. If we seize the house in which the enemy lodges, we shall be able to kill him, or he will leave the place and run away. Occasionally, one may forget Him who is the Lord over these three, but that need not worry us, since the moment we think about that Lord we shall be able to overcome all of them.

Thus realizing Him to be subtler than the reason, and controlling the self by the Self (Atman), destroy, O Mahabahu, this enemy—Lust, so hard to overcome.¹

“Subduing the atman by the atman” means overcoming the baser, the demoniac impulses in the mind through the atman, that is, through the godward impulses; in other words, Arjuna should, Shri Krishna tells him, master his egotistic instincts by striving for spiritual welfare and, assured that his real self was more potent than the intellect, he should storm the fort and seize it. The senses are the gatekeepers and the mind is the minister. What the senses tell the mind is reported by the latter to the intellect, and the intellect decides and issues its order. If, however, we regain the sovereignty which is rightfully ours, then we would be able to subdue the mind, the intellect and the senses whom at present we have accepted as our masters, as in our country we have accepted foreigners as our masters and believe that we get the food we eat because of them.

Our atman should be vigilant day and night. One whose atman is so awake will not have dreams in his sleep. But we are bound to have them if we are slaves of sleep. Shri Krishna thus assures Arjuna that, if he keeps constant watch, he will be harassed neither by thieves coming in from outside nor by those that dwell within. If we do not establish our rule over the body, it will yearn for things which we do not approve of and we shall forfeit our authority over it.

[61]

May 5, 1926

If we wish to deal worthily by even the most wicked person, we should assume that he has no evil intention. He is bound to have good feelings somewhere deep in his heart. The atman never gets angry. It remains unattached and unmoved. If we cannot overcome desire or anger in us even in some measure, we should tolerate them when they invade us.

¹ III, 43
No one has yet succeeded in laying down a universal rule about how we should act towards a thief. We should, however, bear in mind that however we act we should be inspired by love for him. We must think and find out how we may win him over with love. We should assume that it is not in human nature to steal. Even as rational beings we should be convinced that there is no human being in the world who is beyond all hope of change. Love is a kind of force of attraction. Science tells us that even dust has the property of attracting other things. Even a particle of dust possesses some kind of power of attraction; that is why Mirabai sings about the bond of love. That bond is much stronger than that of a slender thread can ever be. Why should we be filled with passion or get angry whenever we lose anything?

Such is the yoga described in this third chapter. There is ceaseless movement and change. We cannot choose but work with the body as ceaselessly as the ball of this earth rotates. What is the way, then, of saving ourselves from work? The Gita replies that, by shedding all attachment and aversion, we escape the fruits of our actions.

[Chapter Four]

I expounded this imperishable yoga to Vivasvan; Vivasvan communicated it to Manu, and Manu to Ikshvaku.

Thus handed down in succession, the royal sages learnt it; with long lapse of time it dwindled away in this world, O Parantapa.

We are doing things every moment, but it is God who has placed us on his wheel and is moving it like a potter, producing ever new shapes. “This yoga was known from the beginning of time, but has perished in this age. People have forgotten the art of working without attachment and aversion. Were it not so,” Shri Krishna said, “I would not have had to be a witness to this battle.”

The same ancient yoga have I expounded to thee today; for thou art My devotee and My friend, and this is the supreme mystery.

The highest truth may be imparted only to a bhakta, for such a person will serve the world’s good.

1 Mirabai’s lines read: Hari has tied me with a slender thread /And I turn as He pulls me.

2 IV, 1 & 2

3 IV, 3

4 A devotee of God
Shri Krishna says,

This yoga, “was known in ancient times, I taught it to Vivasvan, he taught it to Manu, and Manu taught it to Ikshavaku. At this Arjuna wonders. You and I, he says, live in the present age, and you say you taught this to people in former times; how can that be?

Later was Thy birth, my Lord, earlier that of Vivasvan. How then am I to understand that Thou didst expound it in the beginning?

Many births have we passed through, O Arjuna, both thou and I; I know them all, thou knowest them not, O Parantapa.¹

When we sing about the succession of births for human beings through 84,00,000 living forms, we refer to our having had countless lives before the present one, and we state our inference that death is only a change from an old house into a new one. But it is only a person who remembers his previous lives that can say this with certainty. Shri Krishna states categorically that, being a yogi, he remembered his previous existences but the Arjuna could not remember his. He could say this; we cannot.

Though unborn and inexhaustible in My essence, though Lord of all beings, yet assuming control over My nature, I come into being by My mysterious power.²

The Hindu belief in avatars may present a difficulty to some of us. Avatar means descent. Our descent means God’s descent too, for He is present in every creature and in every object. All this is His maya. All concrete things—our body, the material objects, all these—exist at definite points in space and time, but the atman was not born in time, it pervades all space and exists through all time. We do not know it by direct experience. If we wish to understand the principle known as God, either with the help of reason or through faith, we should first know the atman. What is it? So long as we live in ignorance, it is more distant than even the sky, but in our awakened state we cannot say that it is removed from us by even so much as an inch. It is that through which we came into being and through which we exist if you believe that you are that, then “I” and “you” are identical—but only a person devoid of egotism can assert that. “I”

¹ IV, 4 & 5
² IV, 6
and “you” are identical in the sense in which the ring and chain are in the final analysis but gold. Name and form are only for a moment; while things have them, they are no more real than a mirage. That into which things merge when they cease to have name and form is ever the same.

And so Krishna says:

“Though I was never born in time, though I am the Lord of all creatures, I incarnate Myself and am born as a human being.”

This is the essential nature of the atman. If we realize this truth, we would always act in conformity with that nature; we then act, though born as human beings, as if we were never born. If the atman in each of us is identical with the atman in everyone else, one atman born in a body means all of them born, and all others born means that one born too. This is a difficult idea to grasp. “This is maya,” says Shri Krishna, “and through it I incarnate Myself in this world time and again.”

We can follow reason only up to a point. What, then, does avatar mean? It is not as if God comes down from above. It would be right to say, if we can say it without egotism, that each one of us is an avatar. The atman in every body is as potent as the atman in any other, though outwardly we see differences. In our awakened state all are one, though in our ignorant state we may seem separate existences. In real truth, there are not several, there is only one.

If we constantly reflect over this essence named the atman, we shall regard no one as an enemy to be killed and shall have nothing to get angry about. We shall then see that anyone who hits us hits himself too.

When Krishna says that He incarnates Himself as a human being, he only uses the idiom of common speech. God never incarnates Himself as an atman and is never born as a human being. He is ever the same. When, from our human point of view, we see special excellence in some individual, we look upon him as an avatar. In God’s language there is no such word as avatar; it exists only in the language of human beings.

[63]

May 7, 1926

Arjuna asked Shri Krishna how He could have expounded this yoga to other people of olden times, to which Shri Krishna replied that they had had many previous existences, which He remembered but Arjuna could not. He added that, though He was not subject to birth and change, though He was the Lord who dwelt in the hearts of all creatures, He submitted to the action of prakriti, which was His creation, and through the power of his maya came down to live on the earth.

He then proceeds to explain in what circumstances God incarnates Himself as a human being.

For whenever Right declines and Wrong prevails, then O Bharata, I come to birth.¹

In these lines Shri Krishna held out an assurance to the entire world. If God remained inactive when dharma was eclipsed, man would be helpless. In this Kaliyuga, all human efforts produce results contrary to what was intended. Hindus and Muslims, for instance, continue to fight among themselves. Can anyone prevent this? I was passionately eager to do such penance that they should never fight. But all my efforts failed. Does that mean that this fighting will go on for ever? Assuredly not. Will God let human beings overindulge their senses with impunity? He tells us that He will tolerate our self-indulgence within limits, for He knows that we would weary of it. I will tolerate, He says, a little fighting and will not incarnate on the earth just because of that. But when men recognize no limits in fighting, demolish temples and kill people indiscriminately, that would mean eclipse of dharma. That would be wickedness in the name of dharma, it would mean the spread of adharma and disorder. Do not, God says to comfort men, give way to despair when such things happen. “It is good,” He says, “that you feel helpless at such a time, for by making you feel so I humble your pride.” We remember what Surdas² says: “I have tried my strength in one way and another, till I am weary and can do no more; you must save me now;” that is how man thinks in his pride, that he will do this, and he will do that, but God humbles his pride. Man, however, has this promise from the Lord. He need not despair and feel that, if he fails in some task, it will not be done. Let him have faith that God will have it done. So the Lord has said in these lines that, whenever necessary, He comes down to live on the earth, and sets everything right. If He did not do that, He would not enjoy our worship and reverence. What dishonour can there ever be for a man who lives as God’s slave? It is the slave’s master who will be judged from the manner in which the slave lives. Is it, therefore,

¹ IV, 7
² A 16th-century saint-poet of Northern India ever likely that God will let dharma be eclipsed? If adharma prevails, God will forfeit our reverence and worship. He has, therefore, no choice but to incarnate Himself as a human being.

To save the righteous, to destroy the wicked, and to re-establish Right I am born from age to age.¹

Shri Krishna has told us that we do nothing, nor does He. Who, then, destroys the wicked, and how are they destroyed? It is God’s inviolable law that karma never fails to produce its effect. We can say that a human being may be able to counter-act the effects of karma, and yet assert that karma never fails to produce its effect. The point is not that a person may not have to suffer the fruits of his actions, but that, if he cultivates non-attachment, even while in fact suffering the fruits of action, he would not inwardly feel that he suffered them. But suffer them he must. No karma is ever forgiven. It is, therefore, the wickedness of the wicked which destroys them. When, in this world, one human being kills another, the former is only an instrument. Arjuna was a bowman of prowess and brave warrior. When he killed his enemies, it was not his strength which prevailed against Duryodhana. The latter was destroyed by his own sins. Hence the saying, “The pot of sin is bound to break on day.” If it was true that God comes down from above and destroys the wicked, He would be as much under the sway of ignorance as we are. But that is not what happens. If we have faith and understand God’s law, we would be sure that the wicked would be destroyed through their own sins.

Destruction of the wicked does not mean their physical destruction. Physically, both the wicked and the virtuous perish. It may be that a bhakta will pass away in the prime of his youth, and a wicked person will live up to the age of 76; shall we say that this was an instance of God’s injustice? Kesar Bhagat was bitten by a serpent yesterday and died; should we, therefore, believe that he was a wicked man? In fact he was a good man; he was, though a mere labourer, a bhakta and a man of upright character. We would be punished with degradation if we believed that a man must have been wicked because he died early.

Yes, it is true in one sense that the good do not die, for we sing their glory ever afterwards. Everyone sings the glory of Rama, but no one of Ravana. If we think of him still, it is in order that we may keep ourselves free from his sins, run away from them. On the contrary, if we sing the virtues of a man and assimilate them, let them sink into our very soul, they are bound to become stronger in us day by day. Virtues never die. If we see the contrary in the world, that is but God’s maya. It is true that virtues are cultivated with effort, and that vices require no such effort; but ultimately vices perish and virtues prosper. The appearance to the contrary is the effect of maya. If that were not so, what is said here about “destruction of the wicked” would not be true.

¹ IV, 8

Shri Krishna does not mean here physical destruction of the wicked. While the vasana with which a man died exists, he cannot but be born again. It is stated, it is true, that a good man will not be born again, but only if he rises above the place of gunas. There is, beyond the gunas of good and evil, a state which is characterized by no guna. It is not an undesirable state, but a desirable one. It is the state of moksha, a state which endures for ever. But the assurance which God holds out here is not that goodness never perishes, but that evil most certainly does. When evil seems to prevail in the world, He, the Witness within, manifests Himself and shows that in truth it does not, shows it by the example of His own life. When evil spreads in the world, some persons, inspired by God, feel in their hearts that it is not enough for them to be a little good, that they must do tapascharya and be exceptionally good, so good that people would look upon them as perfect manifestation of the Divine in man. That is how Shri Krishna came to be worshipped as the fullest avatar. God has in these verses assured man that whenever dharma is eclipsed and the reign of adharma spreads, He comes into the world to protect the good, to destroy the wicked and restore the rule of dharma. This means that dharma is never destroyed. Shri Krishna did not say that while the wicked are destroyed, the good are not. He himself passed away, and that too meeting an untimely death.

If we take a total view, we shall see that it is not wickedness but goodness which rules the world. The wicked can prevail only when they number crores, but goodness will rule when embodied to perfection even in one person. Non-violence has been described as so powerful that all forces of violence subside in its presence. Under its influence, even beasts forget their nature. Even one good person can change the world. Such a one enjoys an empire over people’s hearts; we do not, because we follow goodness only as best we may. The type of good man I have mentioned has but to send a message, and people will do what he wants them to do, such is the power of goodness. Where wickedness prevails, there is disorder in every field of life, but where goodness rules, order prevails and people are happy. They are happy not in the sense that their material needs are satisfied but in the sense that they lead virtuous and contented lives. As for material possessions, some men have crores of rupees and yet live a distracted life; that is no sign of being happy.

1 Desire clinging to one’s self even after the death of the physical body

This verse, then, means that when adharma spreads, some men undertake tapascharya and, through their tapascharya, generate goodness in the world. Even the wicked bow in reverence before goodness. Its power is felt by beasts too. This can happen even in the present age. Anyone who has completely shed hatred and ill will, who has succeeded in making his life a perfect embodiment of truth, can command everything in life. He does not have to ask that anything be done. He has only to wish and the wish will be fulfilled.

God does not have to be born and to die, to incarnate Himself on earth as a human being. It is but His maya that we see in the world. That maya is described here and we are reassured that wickedness prevails only for a while but goodness endures for ever. We should, therefore, cultivate goodness in ourselves and see that we do nothing whereby we may become wicked.

[64]

May 8, 1926

God destroys evil and restores goodness by inspiring man’s heart with noble ideals. On the balance goodness must prevail in the world, otherwise the world would perish. We see that a family in which evil increases is ruined, like, for instance, the Yadava race, which perished. It had taken to evil ways. Though a man like Krishna dwelt among them, the Yadavas took to immorality and drinking, fought among themselves and were killed. Even a strong and self-willed man whom no one dares attack will sooner or later fall at someone’s hands; this is so true that no member of the Yadava race survived. When there is so much evil in the world that on the balance there is more of it than good, that their sum is a minus quantity, the destruction of the world is certain. The body endures only so long as there is vitality in it; in the same way, the world would perish if at any time there should be less of goodness and more of evil in it. That is why the Lord said that He appeared in the world in every age.

He who knows the secret of this My divine birth and action is not born again, after leaving the body; he comes to Me, O Arjuna.¹

Is there any reason why such a person should not merge into God? He would see that his body was perishable, and that it was not worthwhile to waste his energy on it. Was it not better, he would ask himself, to strive to realize the immortal atman? The atman is confined in the cage of this body, held in the prison of the body like a criminal. All of us have committed a crime, so to say, and are, therefore, imprisoned in the body; witness, for instance, Tulsidas and Surdas saying in their poems that there was no greater sinner in the world than they. We sin from the moment we are born, and that is why we are born again and again. Being confined in the cage of this body, we cannot soar as high as we wish. But we can do so if we reflect over the mystery of God’s incarnations and actions in the world of men. If we realize the truth about the atman which is a lion, we shall become lions. How can we realize that truth? To explain that, Shri Krishna says:

Freed from passion, fear and wrath, filled full with Me, relying on Me, and refined by the fiery ordeal of knowledge, many have become one with Me.²

“Those who know the mystery of God’s incarnations and actions become free from attachments, from fear and anger,” says Shri Krishna. “They become absorbed in Me. (If you open their hearts, you will find the image of Rama inside.) They live in complete surrender to Me. Purified by knowledge and tapaschaprya they have become as I am, have lost themselves in Me.” Shri Krishna has explained here how we may know that a person has understood the mystery of God’s incarnations and actions.

[65]

May 9, 1926

In whatever way men resort to Me, even so do I render to them. In every way, O Partha, the path men follow is Mine.³

¹ IV, 9
² IV, 10
³ IV, 11
In other words, people reap as they sow. As the quality of your bhakti, so is its reward. If there is any motive behind your bhakti, if you seek anything through it, you will get what the quality of your bhakti entitles you to. You will get, not what you wish to get, but what you deserve to get. We may wish to become God, but that does not mean that we shall become God. We shall get only that which we have earned by our manner of life. We shall get what we deserve. If you walk a distance of four miles, you will get only what is at the end of it. If you eat kariatu to have a purge, it does not mean that the effect will follow. Kariatu will at the most cure a mild fever. If you swallow castor oil and then wish that you should get no motion, you cannot have it so. This is the meaning of the line: In whatever way men resort to Me, even so do I render to them.

Shri Krishna then says: mama vartmanuvartante manushyah Partha sarvashah.

“Everyone follows a path which leads to Me.” This verse has a history behind it. When Tilak Maharaj was alive, he had cited this verse in the course of a discussion about violence and non-violence. I had argued that we should bear with a person who might have slapped us. In reply, he cited this verse to prove that the Gita upheld the principle of “tit for tat”. That is, we should act towards a person as he acts towards us. I cling to the reply which I gave to him then.² I had argued that this verse could not be used in support of his contention. We should not act towards a person as he acts towards us. If he is bad to us, we may not therefore be bad to him. This verse merely lays down God’s law. Shri Krishna says that He will worship a person as the latter worships Him. That means, we reap as we sow. One cannot do evil to others and expect good for oneself. Man has no right to return two slaps for one. But a principle quite the opposite of this prevails in the world, and as education spreads the position becomes worse. Uncivilized people may return two slaps for one, may fight back when attacked, and among them the relation of father and son may not be always sweet. If, however, a father behaves as a civilized man, he would use wisdom and endure the son’s misconduct in patience, and so teach him to behave with humility. If the son is good, then he would suffer his parents’ weaknesses in patience, and that is the better way of the two. We prefer the second to the first. Besides, we read in the preceding verse about the type of man who can realize God. It says that those serene persons who are vitaragabhayakrodhah, that is, who are free from all attachment, fear and anger, realize God. The present verse cannot contradict that one, but completes its meaning. The previous verse says that a person who yields to attachment and anger will not realize God. If one yields to anger, one will reap the fruit of anger. We are thus taught not to yield to anger but to banish attachment, fear and anger from us.

¹ Chiretta
² Vide “Note on Tilak’s Letter”, after 18-1-1920.

In the second line, therefore, the Lord says that men are governed by His law. He means that law, the law of karma, which rules the world. We can truly say that God is law. God created His law and left the world to its governance, reserving to Himself no right to interfere with its operation. He then told men to decide for themselves whether they would or would not continue to be born in the world, as though making the position clear to them in advance so that they might not blame Him afterwards.

If we worship God, He would be pleased; but it does not mean that, if we do not worship Him, He would be displeased and would change His law. The law is immutable. Ishvar is not a ruler though literally the word means “a ruler”. But, then, since God does nothing, he suffers nothing either. He neither acts nor suffers the consequences of action. He stands apart, detached. We have given free rein to our imagination and employed all manner of epithets to describe God, and we quarrel about Him needlessly. Take the instance of the Jain and the Vedanta philosophies. According to the latter, all things are pervaded by God, whereas the former holds that no such being as God exists. We adopt a third attitude,—one which is the right one for laymen to adopt—namely, that God both exists and does not exist. God is not a ruler; He is all-pervasive, He is life, He is unconditioned and devoid of form. His rule consists in the rule of His law. No one has questioned the existence of His law. Not a single school of philosophy has done so. That law is of course a living law. If we equate it with God, recognize that it is God, people will then have no reason for quarrelling. That is the implication of this verse.

The principle of “You will reap as you sow” is part of even man-made law. Anyone who steals is punished. Even a thief has to submit to the law. He is not a rebel. The person who defies a law with deliberate intention to do so is an outlaw, but the murderer who is punished for his crime is not an outlaw. We become outlaws when we commit civil disobedience, for our disobedience is deliberate. Those who commit civil disobedience, and do so deliberately, are also outlaws, but the person who steals in abject helplessness is still ruled by the country’s law. In the same way, man too is ruled by God’s law, whether he submits to it willingly or not. That immutable truth is stated in this verse:

---

1 God

Those who desire their actions to bear fruit worship the gods here; for in this world of men the fruit of actions is quickly obtainable.¹

Every desire bears its proper fruit. So long as any desire is left in us, we cannot escape the round of birth and death. If we strive for yogic powers, our effort will certainly be rewarded, though not necessarily in the manner described in books on yoga. Chanting a mantra² is not necessarily rewarded in exactly the same way as described in the Shastras. Men try to discover God’s laws, they conclude that certain actions will have certain results. If they get hold of the truth, may be there will be some efficacy in the mantras which they employ; but, then, even self-seeking and insincere men use this method. Or, it may be that the ceremonies accompanying the chanting of the mantra were not correctly performed; if so, the hoped-for result would not follow. I do not know anything about mantras for counteracting the effects of snake-bite, but there may be something in these claims. Some persons assert that we still know very little about the laws underlying the efficacy of such mantras. In this age they are discovering the laws of the visible world, but the number of such laws is infinite. Shall we ever succeed in discovering them all? Similarly, there are laws governing the invisible world too. In future, the laws of that world—the powers of the mind—may also be discovered. Mantras originated in the discovery of such laws. But, like the hypotheses about the visible world, the principles behind particular mantras may or may not be true and, according as they are true or not, the mantras may succeed or fail.

¹ IV, 12
² Formula with magical efficacy
The author of the Gita knew this and, therefore, advised us to take no interest at all in these things. If we go after them, we may perhaps have our desires fulfilled, and so he said that people who hanker after worldly success worship various gods. But that, he said, will profit them little in the end. It will not increase the sum of happiness in the world. If, however, we decide to work in a spirit of disinterested service, we would not concern ourselves with mantras, nor shall we be required to study innumerable Shastras. Just one little Shastra will suffice, the practice of bhakti—Ramanama. We shall not even have to study the whole of the Gita, it will suffice if we understand its substance. We should find out and take the place appointed for us in this world-machine created by God. A man who has no desires, how well his work shines! We suffer because of our innumerable desires. People do not keep to their places of duty and that creates disorder and confusion in the world. That man who, instead of being absorbed in his work, is always discontented has not found his right place in the world-machine. If even in a family every member is discontented, the family would be disrupted. In similar circumstances there would be chaos in a country’s government, too. If everyone working in this world-machine seeks a reward for his work and, therefore, constantly changes the spheres of his work, there will be no order anywhere; the condition of such a person is like that of one who wastes himself in pleasures and then runs about in search of tonics and pills. With our minds full of cravings, we run after things in the world. While our attachment to the ego remains, we shall never taste the sweet ambrosia of Self-knowledge. The Gita, therefore, tells us that if, giving up attachment to the ego, we attend to the best of our ability to the task which has fallen to our lot, an emperor’s work and that of one who cleans lavatories will be esteemed of equal worth in God’s court. There, King Janaka and the man who cleaned lavatories in his palace have an equally honoured place. Suppose, however, that a present-day ruler and Janaka’s Bhangi were to present themselves in God’s court at the same time, in all likelihood, the Bhangi would be given an exalted place and the ruler would be left out. In God’s court a man with a crown is not esteemed as of greater worth than one who has nothing on his head. The latter will be regarded worthy of a crown while a man with a jewelled crown will receive no attention. Hence the Gita says that he who works without attachment to the ego works best and becomes qualified for moksha.

May 11, 1926

The order of the four varnas\(^1\) was created by Me according to the different gunas and karma of each; yet know that though, therefore, author thereof, being changeless I am not the author.\(^2\)

“I have,” Shri Krishna says, “created four varnas on the basis of character and work.” These are Brahmin, Kshatriya, Vaisya and Sudra. What should be the character of a Brahmin? What is distinctive of him? He is a Brahmin who knows Brahman, who lives most in the consciousness of God. And a Brahmin’s work in life is to teach and help people to realize God. Besides this particular gift, he will also have the qualities of character which mark the other varnas. The Kshatriya’s special dharma is protection of society. He should, above all, be a brave man. The Vaisya occupies himself with commerce. That is his special dharma. If he did not follow it, perhaps the world would not go on as it does. The Sudra’s special dharma is service. If he combines with his service the spirit of yajna or the motive of public good, he will win the reward of his life. There is here no question of higher and lower. If we regard the person who cleans lavatories as lower and another who reads the Gita as higher, that will be the end of us. The majority in the world are engaged in the work of service. If a man combines the spirit of yajna with such work, he will be a mumukshu. A Sudra is expected to have humility, but humility does not mean abjectness. He serves no one except God.

Anyone for whom action is a necessity is subject to continual change. God is spotless and without form. He has no need to sleep or eat and drink. He does not move, and yet it is He who does everything. The weather expert will tell us that the storm was produced by changes in atmospheric pressure, but as he looks back for antecedent causes, he will reach a point beyond which he will not be able to go. God is an expert law-maker, for He is the author of all laws, though, being perfect, He is under no necessity to act or do anything. He never violates His law. God is present in everything that exists and, therefore, He and His law are one. He is spirit. That is, His law is spirit, it is God Himself. He is, and also is not, the doer of things. Since the universe displays some order in its running, we may assume that God is the author of that order. But the Lord has told us here that He is its author and yet is not its author—that is His mystery beyond human understanding.

---

\(^1\) Divisions of society
\(^2\) IV, 13

Actions do not affect Me, nor am I concerned with the fruits thereof.1 “Fruits of action do not cling to me, for I have no desire for them,” says Shri Krishna. Once a machine is set in motion, every part in it works automatically. When we have learnt to function in this manner, like a machine, we shall have gained the true end of human effort. We shall then be fit for direct realization of God.

May 12, 1926

God works like a machine. He is His law. He is the author of law and He it is who administers it. What perfect order this represents! There is never a question of His suspending His law or of deciding to uphold it. The machine has been going on from eternity. God’s law exists and has been in operation since the time that He came into being, if we can say such a thing about Him. We indeed conceive such a necessity for Him. He never suffers the effects of karma, for He has no wish to be fulfilled through any karma. Every part in a machine goes on working ceaselessly; it is the man behind the machine who operates it. In regard to God, we also imagine that He is Himself the machine and its operator. Can anyone say of a machine that it suffers the effects of karma or has any wish to be fulfilled through karma? A machine simply goes on working. If, in the same manner, we become totally immersed in our work, so that we are one with our work, we lose ourselves in that work. But, then, we should first ascertain our duty. The man of lust loses himself in his lust, so much so that he becomes the very embodiment of lust. Even simple contact with such a person is dangerous. We should not lose ourselves in our passions in that manner. Our duty is to strive for self-realization and we should lose ourselves in that aim. Such a person can never be disturbed by evil desire and, at last, he becomes one with God. If we lose ourselves in God, become machines, make ourselves as clay in God’s hands, is it any wonder that we may become one with Him? We should lose ourselves in God so completely that we do not remain separate from Him at all. This verse explains how we can do so. It is to explain this that the Lord says here that karma has no effect on him, for he desires nothing through karma.

1 IV, 14

“Anyone who knows this truth about Me is never bound by karma.” How can he be? He who knows God’s law will work but will desire nothing through work. Why do we feel the strain of work? Because, as we work, we remain attached to the “I” within us; were it not so, we would never feel impatient or worried. We should be so absorbed in our work that we do not even notice the time when we should stop it. We should thus work on like machines. I once saw a beautiful painting in a Roman Catholic Church, the work of a gifted painter. It is the time of prayer. Women have been working in the fields, pickaxes in hand. As one of them was about to dig with her pickaxe, the bell tolled for prayer and the pickaxe fell from her hand, she bent her body as though kneeling for prayer and started praying. The poet—for the painter is a poet—had imagined the woman as working like a machine. For these women work was worship. There is a saying in Latin which means that bodily labour is a form of worship. Anyone who believes that it is so will automatically kneel down at prayer time. A person who has resolved that he will always get up at four will roll up his bed as the clock strikes four. If such a person misses praying at prayer time, he will feel weary and oppressed and will not be able to concentrate on any work.

A person who works with such devotion, how can he suffer the effects of karma? That is, he never feels the strain of work. He is ever fresh. There are so many who cannot be happy unless they are working. They never feel the need to stop work for a moment and stretch themselves for rest. If any visitors interrupt them in their work, they feel miserable. Such persons never feel the effects of karma.

1 IV, 14
The man of lust loses himself in his lust, but he wearies of his indulgence because he seeks pleasure from it. Anyone who seeks pleasure is bound to weary of it sooner or later. If a person indulges his palate, he cannot but fall ill; he is bound to suffer from some disease. But what disease can he suffer from who never indulges his palate, who does not eat for enjoyment? One should do the task on hand without expecting pleasure from doing it, do it merely as one’s duty. He who approaches his work in this spirit, who desires nothing through it, will not have to suffer the effects of karma. God does not suffer the effects of karma though He controls this vast machine. The signs which indicate that we suffer such effects are the need we feel for food and water and the wearing out of our bodies. God is ever awake. We are awake for some time and then sleep, we eat and feel hungry. But God, though He is ever awake, does not have to make an effort to keep Himself awake, He does not sleep and does not eat. Though He acts, He does nothing. Behind every act of ours, there is a trace of egotism and attachment to the “I”,—an action of the will. We will to act, we have to do so, before we do anything. God keeps awake for ever without a moment’s interruption. We cannot do so. If, however, we keep such a state before us as our ideal, we can do the best work. That is why Shri Krishna said: yoga is skill in action.\(^1\) That is, the man who is firmly established in yoga always does better work than one who is restless and impatient in his work.

Knowing this did men of old, desirous of Freedom, perform action; do thou, then just as they did—the men of old in days gone by.\(^2\)

The seekers of moksha in old days knew this truth and worked in such a spirit. To realize God means to work like God, with single-minded devotion and ceaseless vigilance. Though living in the human body, we should imitate God as much as we can. “Our forefathers did this. You too,” Shri Krishna tells Arjuna, “should act in the same manner” (Man is ruled by vows. God has no need to take any. Everyone should resolve that he or she will not fall asleep here. You ought not to give me pain by dozing here.) How is it that Arjuna thought about dharma when he was required to kill his relations? Shri Krishna, therefore, rebuked him and said that he should not think on those lines, for in old times people worked without thinking of any reward for work. If one works in that spirit, one is not bound by the effects of karma. “Think how I act,” says Shri Krishna. “I create society with its four classes, but I am not bound by the effects of karma, for I remain unattached.” “You too”, He tells Arjuna, “should act in that manner.”

---

\(^1\) II, 50

\(^2\) IV, 15

You, students, should study with the same devotion as the brahmacharis of old days. They bore themselves in such a manner that, though mere boys, they seemed to be grown-up, mature men. I speak of more than forty years ago. I distinctly remember that, at our place, in the absence of the priest his young son read the Bhagavata, and he read it very well indeed; so good was the education he had received at home. He must have been barely fifteen. Those whom we describe as brahmacharis today must behave as the brahmacharis of old did. You should sit upright, like a pole. Practise prayers for a whole month, and then you will discover that you are making some progress. What is the meaning of your feeling restless as you sit here? What is the good if you feel that, when you leave this place, you will get back into bed?

“Do your work and leave the responsibility to me,” says Shri Krishna. “What is it you can do? Everything is done by me. Left to yourself, you will remain slumbering. On your own, you do only evil. You cannot say that I incline you to remain slumbering or to do evil. I inspire you to do only good. It is Satan who inclines you to remain slumbering, to abuse people, to behave disrespectfully to others and to cheat people in the name of spinning.”

May 13, 1926

“Do your work and leave the responsibility to me,” says Shri Krishna. “What is it you can do? Everything is done by me. Left to yourself, you will remain slumbering. On your own, you do only evil. You cannot say that I incline you to remain slumbering or to do evil. I inspire you to do only good. It is Satan who inclines you to remain slumbering, to abuse people, to behave disrespectfully to others and to cheat people in the name of spinning.”

Our eyes are closed with bandages, like those over the eyes of the bullock in the oil-press. These bandages are not eternal, but we let them stay because we have grown used to them as natural, as fear is natural to us. There was a lion cub who, having always lived among goats, would tremble with fear like a goat. Then a real lion happened to meet him, and he held a mirror before him. The cub roared, and escaped from the company of the goats. This cub had not been forced to put a bandage over its eyes, the bandage had just grown of itself. In the same way, everyone of us has the bandage of ignorance grown over the eyes, and we do not know that it is not our dharma to live in evil, to submit to the round of birth and death. Our dharma is to rise ever higher until at last we can rise no more. We can have no rest till we have reached the goal. There will be eternal peace when we have reached it, that is, the peace of moksha. If you are on the top of the Himalayas, you are certain to fall from there, the top itself will crumble one day. It will crumble because it is ever changing. There is no changing in the state of moksha and no falling from there. Moksha means destruction of the shackles of birth and death, getting out of that round, it means deliverance from evil. If we meet a worthy guru, and he loosens the bandage of ignorance over our eyes and holds before us the mirror of knowledge, we would know what we are, would know whether we deserve to go from birth to birth or are fit for something else. In truth we deserve better than to follow this round, we belong to a higher station. We shall become fit for that station when the darkness of ignorance has vanished. The Lord told Arjuna that He would show the way by following which he could save himself from evil, that his actions till then were only a means of binding him. Shri Krishna wished to help Arjuna to deliver himself from that bondage, but what could He have taught him if the latter had not questioned Him eagerly, had not shown that he thirsted for knowledge, if he had not told Him: “I am like one sunk in ignorance; I do not know what my duty is; I have faith in you; show me what my dharma is?”

---

1 Students attached to preceptors in hermitages
2 IV, 16

For it is meet to know the meaning of action, of forbidden action, as also of inaction. Impenetrable is the secret of action. ¹

One should know what karma is, what vikarma—that is, forbidden karma—is, what akarma—that is, ceasing from karma—is. The truth about karma is a deep mystery.

Who sees inaction in action and action in inaction, he is enlightened among men, he is a yogi, he has done all he need do.²

¹ IV, 17
² IV, 18
The aim of this verse is to show that one who does karma may still not be doing anything. I have already in a previous discourse mentioned my own example and told you that if I worked with attachment to my ego there were occasions when I would become mad. But things go on and leave me unaffected because I do everything merely as my duty. Even if every boy here were to leave me, I would not shed one tear. I would, on the contrary, dance with joy like Narasinh Mehta and sing “Happy am I that the net is no more”. If we work in such a disinterested spirit, we can follow the example of the Lord who said that, though He had created society with its four classes, He was not their creator. That is so because of the principle that one may do karma and still not have done it.

We are caught in the motion of the wheel of this world. Our duty is to work ceaselessly as a part of this machine. We should spend every minute of our waking life in doing work which has fallen to our lot, and do it as if we are impatient over it and yet not be so, be calm in fact. The bullock that keeps the water-wheel in motion goes round and round, but no bucket falls from its place. If it were not a bucket but our heart in that place, it might even fall off; the bucket, however, does not fall off, it remains in its place, calm. We should be filled with such calm. On the other hand, if our heart is agitated, we may rest from work but shall not have ceased from action, we would still be working. The bonds tighten round such a person and there is but misery in store for him. If he believes that those who let themselves be entangled in the affairs of life weave bonds of karma round them and that he himself is free, he will be under a delusion, for every thought is a form of karma. That is why the Lord has said that the truth about karma is a deep mystery. Those who do karma through their thoughts load themselves with burdens so heavy that they will never be able to throw them off. On the other hand the man who becomes absorbed in work, does it as duty, and, if he finds that he cannot do a particular thing, leaves it alone,—such a person weaves no bond of karma round him.

Last evening, I rebuked . . . ¹ and other boys. On that, . . . ² told me that there was harshness in my voice and asked me if it was not a sign of anger in me. I said that I was not God. I only strive for perfection, but I am not fit to be anyone’s guru. I am full of desires, and so, when I am excited, my voice is naturally raised. If I had succeeded in banishing every desire from me, I would be able to do as much work as I am doing now, but my voice would ever be the same. I aspire to reach such a state. It is true that sometimes my voice is raised and there is a little flash of anger in my eyes. This is the state Arjuna had in mind when he asked the Lord how a person is overcome with evil desire against his will. I am still swayed by desire and anger. I say this to illustrate the truth that we cease from karma in the measure that we do karma without any thought of its fruit. If I run away from a task in despair, if I get upset or raise my voice because... does not listen to me, I weave the bonds of karma round me. Having undertaken a duty, having agreed to look after some children entrusted to me and sharing the responsibility of bringing them up, how can I now run away from the task? If I retire to the heights of the Himalayas and live there in peace, I would be indulging my body in idle comfort and weave round myself the bonds of karma. I must, therefore, remain in the midst of these responsibilities, and win moksha through them. If I become free from anger and shake off ignorance, if I become more vigilant and alert, I would be doing no karma even when occupied in some karma. This illustration explains both the ideas, of a person doing no karma even when occupied in karma and of another who, though he believes that he is doing no karma, is in fact weaving the bonds of karma round himself.

¹ The names are omitted in the source.
² Ibid

Everyone should apply this illustration to himself, forgetting all about me as an individual. I have mentioned my own example merely in order to explain that we are all imperfect. I say, not merely out of modesty or as a matter of form, but with detachment, that I am imperfect. This is not my modesty, but the simple truth. When I am completely free from the sway of desire and anger, you will always see me calm, more so than you see me today. I am striving to be free from these. I feel that one day I shall attain such a state of calm.

In this age, we do not have the means with which to measure ourselves. The Gita was composed to help us. It says that we should

---

1 III, 36
2 The names are omitted in the source.
work like machines and pour out our life in our work.

[69]

May 23, 1926

We should think further about the first line of the verse beginning with \textit{karmanyaakarma}.

We saw in a previous verse that no human being ceases from karma altogether even for a moment. That means that the very process of living is a form of karma. Eating, speaking, thinking, sleeping, all these are forms of karma. \textit{\ldots} \textsuperscript{1} said that, when he retired to that place to seek peace, he had tried to stop even thinking, for thinking, too, is a form of karma. Thus, no one can escape doing karma. Still the \textit{Gita} distinguishes between karma and \textit{akarma}, between the yogi and ordinary human beings, between night and day, and explains that the involuntary processes in the body are not karma; that is, even though we do such karma, we weave no bond round us through it. I have an aim in this discussion of the \textit{Gita}, and that is that children should understand some of the ideas and act accordingly, and, therefore, the discussion is certainly a form of karma for me. If I had accepted the work of teaching and if explaining the \textit{Gita} came naturally to me, then this very work would perhaps deserve to be described as \textit{akarma}. Even so, the idea of \textit{akarma} is like the Euclidean definition of a straight line, and the work of explaining the \textit{Gita} would be \textit{akarma} only in a relative sense. Karma becomes relatively \textit{akarma} when it is undertaken for the service of others, for the sake of our higher good. We may be said to eat and breathe with that aim only if we have voluntarily and deliberately dedicated our body to the service of Shri Krishna. He who lives with the knowledge that his body is not his, that God makes it dance as He wills, may be said to have realized God. All karma done in that spirit is \textit{akarma}. Anything else, though seeming \textit{akarma}, is in truth karma. A yogi may have ceased riding fancy’s horses, and still his \textit{samadhi} may be a form of karma for him if he has sought it for better health. Some persons suffering from consumption learn to enter into such \textit{samadhi}; it is plain that their aim in doing so is to cure themselves of their disease. Their karma in this case is not inspired by the motive of higher good. Only that karma is so inspired in which our aim is realization of God and nothing else,

\textsuperscript{1} IV, 18
\textsuperscript{2} The name is omitted in the source.
when this aim, too, is pursued with spontaneous naturalness. The person who is inspired by it is not in the least conscious of it. In all that he does, there is only the yearning for realizing God and no other thought. Such a person loses the very consciousness of his body, as the gopis did. Even those who are possessed by lust lose the consciousness of their bodies, but they go to hell because they have given themselves up to the pursuit of lust and do not yearn to see God. When such a person, after he has had enough of pleasure, experiences the joy of devotion to God, he realizes that this latter joy is far superior to the pleasure he got by giving himself up to lust, that by losing himself in the pleasure of lust he grew weaker, whereas by losing himself in the joy of God he was filled with strength. After this experience, he is no more negligent in work but learns to be proficient in it. He who does everything for the sake of the higher good and dedicates all his work to God has ceased from karma. Just as the judge dispenses justice and the hangman hangs the condemned man in the name of the king, so if we feel that in this empire of the universe we are God’s slaves and are prompted by Him to do what we do, all our actions will be for our higher good.

He whose every undertaking is free from desire and selfish purpose, and he who has burnt all his actions in the fire of knowledge—such a one the wise call a pandita.

That person whose undertakings are never inspired by selfish desire or personal aims but are altogether spontaneous, whose karmas have been burnt up by the fire of knowledge (everything that exists and will cease has life in it, which means that a piece of stone has life in it, but, though it does no karma it has no knowledge either)—such a person will not be like a stone in regard to karma but, on the contrary, may do all manner of karma and will still have his karmas burnt up by the fire of knowledge. For instance, this earth created by God is in unceasing motion and yet seems at rest; it seems so though it is spinning with a speed which would make us giddy if we could see it. When typing on a typewriter has become mechanical work with the typist, the finger will alight on the right letter even when he is not looking at the keyboard; he who is able to work in such spontaneous manner and is fully alert, like the typist, in everything he does, may be described as the Buddha.

1 IV, 19
June 2, 1926

We may be doing much work, but without any consciousness that we are working.¹ We wish to know the atman dwelling in this human body—wish to know it directly so that its knowledge may become a part of our being as it was with Sudama². An experienced carpenter will make a board effortlessly, whereas one with only a theoretical knowledge of the craft will not be able to make one. He who has learnt to work effortlessly in this manner goes on working mechanically and still remains detached. The verse beginning with *yasya sarve samarambhah*³ describes the character of such a person. We do not have to make any effort for winking the eye; all our actions should become spontaneous like this. Anyone who has acquired control over his thoughts to this degree will never have an evil thought; such a person will move in the world as if he was no more than a corpse. He will seem so to us because he has no desire and no aim, is not subject to attachments and aversions; he is a man who has ceased from karma.

This work of explaining the Gita which I am doing is prompted by a personal motive, the wish to see that the boys understand it.

He who has renounced attachment to the fruit of action, who is ever content, and free from all dependence,—he, though immersed in action, yet acts not.⁴

He who has given up desire for the fruits of karma, who is ever contented, not more so at one time and less at another time, who is always satisfied with what he has—such a person may be ever so deeply engrossed in work but in truth he does nothing. As Narasinh Mehta has said, an ascetic and a perfectly chaste woman do not know the pleasure of earthly love; if any such person were to come and see us plying the charkha all the hours of the day, he would think that we had become mad, that we were so occupied with work that we paid no attention to performing daily worship. But, according to the Gita, we can say that we were doing no work, for we had no selfish aim in our

---

¹ The remark was prompted by the sight of a mad man who came towards the meeting, muttering the word “Prabhu”, God.
² An indigent Brahmin friend of Krishna
³ IV, 19
⁴ IV, 20
work and did it simply as our dharma, did it merely because of our faith [in the value of spinning]. With scepticism all round us, to go on spinning with the faith that it would bring swaraj indicates the state of unvarying inner content in which we live. This is true, of course, of only those people who attribute all this power to the charkha and devote themselves whole-heartedly to it.

Expecting naught, holding his mind and body in check, putting away every possession, and going through action only in the body, he incurs no stain.¹

He alone does not feel the body to be a burden who hopes for nothing, whose mind is ever steady and who has completely given up the desire for possessions. How does this become possible? The body, too, is a kind of property which we possess. We should so use it that we would not mind its perishing today rather than tomorrow. If we cultivate such an attitude, we would not feel the body to be a burden. Ladha Maharaj had given up all concern with this particular form of property, the body, and kept repeating the name Siva all the hours of the day; anyone who works in that spirit, with the sole aim of giving the body its hire and not for the sake of pleasures, may be doing karma all the time and still he stores up no sins.

[71]

June 3, 1926

That person who is described as doing shariram karma does not have to suffer the fruits of karma. This does not mean that his karma bears no fruit, but only that he seeks none. In other words, he does not attribute the karma to his atman. For instance, I listen to the Gita being read out. I should do so with humility, for listening to it is my duty; the fruit of listening to it will follow of itself, whether we think of it or not, in the same way that a seed which has been sown grows by itself into a tree. This seed has no ego. We are animals to the extent that we have some needs in common with them, but in certain respects we are different from them. The consciousness that we do things should disappear from us. A person who writes his diary every day does not think about how much his hand worked during the day; in that way all our work should be done mechanically.

Even an action which one took to be most virtuous karma may turn out to be sin. Supposing one is born a prince through the virtue of meritorious work, how does it profit one? What good is there in being born a prince? To be born poor and to be born a prince, these are two extremes of the same state. We say that we should try to make do with less sleep, and that may seem contrary to the teaching of the verse we are discussing. But we make the effort in order that by and by sleeping less may become natural to us, just as we try to rise above rajas and tamas by engaging ourselves in sattvik activity.

¹ IV, 21

Shariram karma means karma for keeping the body alive. Observance of brahmacharya and other rules has become difficult for us because we pamper the body too much. We have made difficult what should be quite natural to us. It is not natural for human beings to violate brahmacharya. We seek pleasures because we live as if the body and the atman were identical. If, instead, we look upon the body as only a material object and think merely of keeping it alive somehow, we would not run after pleasures. How can we be ever disturbed by evil desires if we look upon our body as the temple of the atman? Should anyone maintain himself merely by doing half an hour’s writing every day? No. Anyone who does so is a thief. The mind works for the atman, and so does the body, but we ought to undertake physical labour to maintain the body. Even the work of teaching cannot serve as a means for this purpose. Only agriculture or similar work can count as work for the sake of the body.

Content with whatever chance may bring, rid of the pairs of opposites, free from ill will, even-minded in success and failure, he is not bound though he acts.¹

He who is satisfied with what he gets in the ordinary course of things, who has risen above the pairs of opposites, such as happiness and suffering, has no ill will in him and bears an equal mind towards success and failure, is indifferent towards them—such a person does not dance with joy on getting something which is welcome to him and does not start lamenting his lot when disagreeable things happen—he may do karma and still be not doing it, that is, will not be bound by the effects of his karma.

Of the free soul who has shed all attachment, whose mind is firmly grounded in knowledge, who acts only for sacrifice, all karma is extinguished.²

¹ Characterized by sattva

² IV, 22

² IV, 23
That person who works without attachment is free, that is, he is not bound by the effects of karma. He whose mind has become steady through knowledge and who always works in the spirit of yajna has all his karmas burnt up in the fire of knowledge.

It would be far better that we die than that we eat merely to serve ourselves. That is, if we cultivate a state of mind such that we eat and drink in order that we may serve God, serve the atman, that is, eat and drink in the spirit of yajna, then we shall have ceased from karma.

[72]

June 4, 1926

If we recite certain verses thousands of times over and over again and with faith, they acquire great power for us. A Muslim should not tire of reciting kalamas\(^1\) and a Hindu should not tire of reciting the gayatri or of repeating Ramanama or the dwadash mantra. I have discussed today’s verses at great length with Vinobaji, too, but I am not sure of their meaning. The Gita was composed after the time of the Vedas, and the different sects have tried so to interpret its teaching that it may support their own tenets. It is too much to believe that the Gita condemned Vedic rituals. I have, therefore, tried again and again to get a meaning which would not conflict with the Vedic practices. Not that this was necessary for myself. My task is to find in them a meaning that would satisfy you. The teacher of the Gita did not lay down that those who came after him should always read in it only the meaning which he himself had in mind. Now, it says that every karma done in the spirit of yajna leaves no effects behind it. Any action done without reference to one’s own interest is a form of yajna. The next verse follows as a consequence from this, and also explains the manner of doing such yajna.

The offering of sacrifice is Brahman; the oblation is Brahman; it is offered by Brahman in the fire that is Brahman; thus he whose mind is fixed on acts dedicated to Brahman must needs pass on to Brahman.\(^2\)

That which is thrown into the yajna is Brahman and so is the oblation (arpan has been interpreted to mean all the materials used for the purpose of the yajna). If that oblation is thrown by Brahman

\(^1\) The creed of Islam as expressed in the verse from the Koran: There is no God but Allah and Mohammed is His apostle.

\(^2\) IV, 24
into the fire which is also Brahman, it is bound to act as Brahman. Anyone who relates all his karmas to Brahman will merge into the latter. How can a person who sees God in every aspect of a yajna have to suffer the fruits of karma? He becomes both the ladle used in the yajna and the oblation poured out by its means. He looks upon God as a potter and offers himself as clay to Him and lets Him make from it any pot He pleases. The verse thus explains how there may be akarma in karma.

June 5, 1926

Shri Krishna now explains the different types of yajna:

Some yogis perform sacrifice in the form of worship of the gods, others offer sacrifice of sacrifice itself in the fire that is Brahman.\(^1\)

I have been told by Vinoba that there is support in the Vedas for the view that a person who has attained to knowledge of the Brahman need not worry about performing yajna. One who has made his life itself a long yajna, why should he undertake any other yajna?

A woman who is nearly blind has come among us. She has a fine voice and sings Raghupati Raghav Raja Ram. She is a Tamilian. She has come here with her husband’s permission. She appears intelligent. We should feel that anyone who serves her performs a yajna. Such service serves our higher good. But to a person who performs a yajna by means of a yajna, that is, who has made his whole life a yajna, doing a yajna comes most naturally. Such a person is ever engaged in doing yajna with ceaseless vigilance. He identifies himself with all creatures in their suffering. The meaning here is not that he gives up doing yajna. Rather, it becomes his very nature to engage himself in yajna, just as it is natural for God to dwell in the heart of the basest of human beings. Some persons make a sacrificial offering of sense organs, hearing and others, into the fire of self-control; that is, they stop hearing with their ears, speaking with their tongues, savouring food and drink with the palate and seeing with their eyes. Others make a sacrificial offering of sound and other objects of sense into the fire of the sense-organs. Here the process is reversed. Since we cannot stop our ears altogether, we should hear only what is good. Since we cannot keep our eyes shut for ever, we should use them only to see the glory of God everywhere. This is what is meant by saying that some persons sacrifice the objects of sense into the fire of the organs of sense.

\(^1\) IV, 25

June 6, 1926

When Kishorelal was living apart from others in a cottage, he tried to cultivate self-control. He was disturbed by the noise of passing trains while reading the Jnaneshvari. I made the suggestion to him that he should block his ears with pieces of rubber. But he got used to the situation and declined to use any such pieces.

But what about children? The only course for them [in such circumstances] is to take measures to stop the functioning of the organ in question, for the state of inward concentration is not easy for them to cultivate. That is how we should act in regard to sound and other objects of sense.

Proceeding, Shri Krishna says:

Others again sacrifice all the activities of the senses and of the vital energy in the yogic fire of self-control kindled by knowledge.

Others stop the functioning of all sense organs, stop even the movement of prana, that is, breathing, make themselves motionless and enter into samadhi, become firmly established in the atman and, lighting this yoga with the fire of knowledge, make a sacrificial offering of all the organs into it.

If a person cannot control his mind by any other means, he may adopt this way. Or one may get angry with oneself and stop the functioning of all one’s organs. Some persons become angry with themselves because they do not succeed in their efforts to observe brahmacharya. Those who sail to the North Pole sacrifice money in millions over and over again, without getting disheartened. The man who tries to observe brahmacharya but fails in his efforts becomes desperate and undertakes an indefinite fast, resolving in his mind that he will not let any organ of the body function because, so long as even one of them is functioning, his mind revels in evil thoughts; he, therefore, decides that it is best to stop all organs from functioning. This is lighting up the fire of the yoga of control of the atman. This is no mere samadhi of the body, it is samadhi illumined by knowledge.

---

1 Commentary on the Gita by Jnaneshvar, a Maharashtrian saint of the thirteenth century
2 IV, 27
A man striving for success in brahmacharya suffers pain as a woman in labour does. If a person cannot bear obstruction to his efforts to cultivate self-control, we see that he gets upset. This is why I often say that such a person is like a milch cow and that we should bear his kicks.

Some sacrifice with material gifts; with austerities; with yoga; some with the acquiring and some with the imparting of knowledge. All these are sacrifices of stern vows and serious endeavour.¹

There are people in this world who perform the yajna of money (who let their wealth be shared by others). Some others perform *tapas*² and imprison the monkey which is our mind. Some others, still, practise yoga or devote themselves regularly to holy studies, to the study of the Vedas. Some perform the yajna of the pursuit of knowledge. They do not read, but devote themselves to reflection and meditation. Ascetics who put themselves under strict vows perform a yajna in that manner.

[75]

June 8, 1926

Others absorbed in the practices of the control of the vital energy sacrifice the outward in the inward and the inward in the outward, or check the flow of both the inward and the outward vital airs.³

Some throw *pranavayu*⁴ as sacrifice into *apanavayu*⁵, while others hold the latter in the former. Some others still hold both. All these are practitioners of *pranayama*⁶.

Yet others, abstemious in food, sacrifice one form of vital energy in another. All these know what sacrifice is and purge themselves of all impurities by sacrifice.⁷

[76]

June 9, 1926

Those who partake of the residue of sacrifice—called amrita (ambrosia)—attain to everlasting Brahman. Even this world is not for a non-

¹ IV, 28
² Austerities
³ IV, 29
⁴ Vital air in the lung
⁵ Vital air in the abdomen
⁶ Breath control
⁷ IV, 30
sacrificer; how then the next, O Kurusattama?"

To strive and conquer desire is also a form of yajna. The Gita teaches us to look upon all activities for paramartha as forms of yajna. Paropakar means working for others; but the idea that we work for others is only an illusion. We always work for ourselves. We shall attain deliverance only if we work exclusively for our higher self. All activities for paramartha, therefore, aim at one’s own good.

Coming back to the verse, those who consume what remains after the yajna is over, that is, those who utilize for themselves only the time which remains after they have completed the yajna, enjoy amrita and attain to the timeless Brahman. The person who has done no work during the day but, like a heifer idling in mud, has spent his time in bed, steals the sleep which he enjoys at night. The man who does no yajna can win nothing in this world; what then can he win in the other world? He is lost in both.

[77]

June 10, 1926

The verse which we have been discussing has a wide meaning. It means that we should eat only after all others have had their food. So long as the embodied soul lives in this world, it has no choice but to have relations with others. To become disinterested in the body, therefore, means that one should devote oneself exclusively to the service of others so that one may attain the Brahman beyond time. We should be as impatient to attain it as a lost sheep is to get back to its fold. Those who, on the contrary, live only for themselves prosper neither in this world nor in the next. Therefore, Shri Krishna tells Arjuna: stop thinking of some people being and others not being your relations. If you may kill any people, you should kill these too.

Even so various sacrifices have been described in the Vedas; know them all to proceed from action; knowing this thou shalt be released.¹

One meaning given to this verse is that there are these different types of yajna in the sight of the Brahman [sic]. This interpretation omits any reference to the Vedas, for the Gita has actually denounced them. And, moreover, the verses² in question are found nowhere in the

¹ IV, 31
² Literally, the Supreme good; the term also means altruism.
³ IV, 32
⁴ That is, the verses in the Gita enumerating the different types of yajna; IV, 24 to 30
Vedas. Ordinarily, of course, the verse should mean this: “The Vedas describe these different types of yajna. You should know that all of them exist through karma; only so can you win moksha.” After explaining the meanings of karma and akarma, the Lord makes it clear in this verse that it is simply impossible for anyone to live without doing karma. That of course does not mean that a state of akarma is impossible. Every karma done for the good of the atman, though it appears to be karma, is in reality akarma. If we can renounce the fruits of karma, that is, work only for others, then we may work like horses. On the other hand, when working for ourselves, we should be like a piece of inert matter, have no interest in the work at all. This is a state of the heart, an attitude of mind. Anyone who cultivates that attitude towards everything he does, sleeping, eating, drinking or cleaning the lavatory, will attain to moksha.

The words evam bahuvridhah in this verse mean that the different types of yajna are enumerated only as illustrations. Others can also be included if they satisfy the Gita’s definition of yajna.

Knowledge-sacrifice is better, O Parantapa, than material sacrifice, for all action which does not bind finds its consummation in Knowledge (jnana).\footnote{IV, 33}

The person who performs the yajna of knowledge makes a greater sacrifice than another who performs the yajna of money, for the yajna of knowledge includes everything, money and all other things. Knowledge covers everything, which exists in the world, without reference to the distinction between living and non-living. If we understand the terms dravya\footnote{Any material; in a restricted sense, the term means “money”} and jnana in a wide sense, a yajna of knowledge includes yajna of every kind of dravya. Anyone who imparts the highest knowledge to us, convinces us to the very depth of our being that the body is not the atman, performs a very great yajna indeed.

\[78\]

\textit{June 11, 1926}

The masters of knowledge who have seen the Truth will impart to thee this Knowledge; learn it through humble homage and service and by repeated questioning.\footnote{IV, 34}

“You can obtain this knowledge,” Shri Krishna tells Arjuna, “by bowing before a guru in utmost humility,—by prostrating yourself before him, fuel in hand,—by serving him and by frequent questioning, by harassing him with questions, and in no other way. The enlightened ones who have seen the truth will impart this knowledge to you.”

[79]

June 12, 1926

When thou hast gained this knowledge, O Pandava, thou shalt not again fall into such error; by virtue of it thou shalt see all beings without exception in thyself and thus in Me.1

“When you have received that knowledge,” proceeds Shri Krishna, “your understanding will never again be clouded by the darkness of ignorance and you will make no distinction like that between kinsmen and others, you will learn to regard all beings with an equal eye so that you will see them all as existing in you and in Me; in other words, for you everyone will be a kinsman. The entire universe is filled by Me, and, therefore, you will see Me in all objects. When the ‘I’ in you has melted away, then it will be jale Vishnu, sthale Vishnu, Vishnu Parvatamastake2 for you.” Once we have realized that this whole universe exists in God, how can there be any problem of violence and non-violence for us? We would feel even thieves and tigers to be ourselves. Till we feel in that way, we may be sure that we have not attained to a state of knowledge at all.

[80]

June 13, 1926

Can we claim that we have the knowledge described in the verse which we have been discussing? Suppose that we learn in one day to recite it; do we then become seers of truth? Do we become so when we teach that verse to others? Of course not. We cannot have this knowledge merely by talking about it. We understand with our reason that the universe is the same as ourselves, but we can only imagine what that means. We cannot grasp the idea or feel its truth. The moment we leave this place, we shall treat all others as different from us. Only that person in whom this idea has sunk from the intellect to the heart—even an intellectual nincompoop can have a heart which is an ocean of compassion—can feel its truth in direct experience. Shri

1 IV, 35
2 “Vishnu in water, Vishnu on land and Vishnu on the tops of mountains”
Krishna says to Arjuna: “When I say that men of knowledge will impart this knowledge to you, I do not mean that they will convince your reason; I mean that they will awaken in you the faith that it is so. You will then realize that it is because of your reason that you see things as separate from one another, that in truth they are one.” God, ourselves and all objects in the universe are in essence one Reality. Even God vanishes and we have only neti, neti. When a person has realized this, his ignorance will have completely vanished.

Even though thou be the most sinful of sinners, thou shalt cross the ocean of sin by the boat of knowledge. ¹

“Even if you are the most wicked of sinners,” says Shri Krishna, “you will cross the sea of darkness and ignorance with the ship of knowledge”—crossing the Swayambhu-Raman’ sea of moha ² sang Raychandbhai.

Hunger cannot be satisfied by the knowledge that there is food in the vessel, or even when that food is swallowed down into the stomach; it is only when it is digested in the stomach and converted into blood that we may say that our hunger is satisfied.

As a blazing fire turns its fuel to ashes, O Arjuna, even so the fire of knowledge turns all actions to ashes. ⁴

First, knowledge was compared to a ship, and now it is compared to fire. It burns up the bonds of karma.

[81]

June 15, 1926

For me, the Gita is the ship, not because it is a learned work but because I have liked it, it has appealed to me in my old age, or because some verse in it has been a great support to me, put it any way you like.

Man does not live by bread alone, whereas the lower creatures need only food to live. Anna Kingsford used to say that men seemed like tigers and snakes. Certainly, the lower creatures are as brethren to us. We all come from the same source. But they need only food to

¹ IV, 36
² The name given in Jain literature to the farthest sea, which was believed to be so vast that no one could cross it
³ The state of delusion in which the self takes the phenomenal existence as real live, whereas man lives by performing yajna. Everyone performs yajna in one way or another. The spinning-wheel is one type of yajna. Prayers, too, are a yajna for us. They represent a mode of spiritual cleansing. Till we have performed that yajna, we should feel uneasy inside us. Only those who attend to these readings of the Gita in that spirit, not others, may be said to be really interested in it. If we were not thus interested in these readings, we would engage a teacher more learned than even Vinoba and with his help, study the Gita in order to learn Sanskrit or be honoured as pundits in society. Instead, we join these prayers in order that they may sustain us in our life. Man’s need for prayer is as great as his need for bread. A bad man will use his ears to hear evil of others and see sinful things, but the good man says that, had he a thousand eyes and ears, he would use them to contemplate the vision of God for ever and to heat devotional songs, and employ his five thousand tongues to sing His praises. It is only after I have prayed here every day that I feel the bliss of having tasted the amrita of knowledge. For that man who wishes to be a real human being, dal and roti are not his food. They count little to him. His real food is prayer. On Sundays, I need to lie in bed till late in the morning, and in vain would Ba’ try to get me out of it. She used to spoil my mornings, which was not right. Many women do this sort of thing. They should not. Actually I had an excuse for what I did, for in those days I did not pray (as I do now). Even so, I tell you of my mistake. Sleeping for longer hours on Sundays did not make me the less drowsy on Mondays. You are brahmacharis. You ought to get up in time and attend prayers every day. You may excuse yourselves from other duties, but never from prayers. You should cultivate such a state of mind that for half an hour you will have only one thought in your mind, and no other. Everyone should set apart some time in this manner for reflection. It provides an opportunity to feel one with all living creatures. That is enough for today by way of introduction to the Gita.
⁴ IV, 37

[82]

June 16, 1926

There is nothing in this world so purifying as Knowledge. He who is perfected by yoga finds it in himself in the fulness of time.¹

¹ Kasturba Gandhi
² IV, 38
We see nothing in this world as holy as this knowledge (The purest yajna, therefore, is the yajna of knowledge.). He who has become fit for moksha through the practice of yoga comes to this knowledge in the course of time by his own effort. That knowledge is realization of the self. As soon as this realization is attained, all the burden of this body and of karma will melt away.

It is the man of faith who gains knowledge—the man who is intent on it and who has mastery over his senses; having gained knowledge, he comes are long to the supreme peace.¹

Anyone who has unshakable faith will win deliverance with the help of Ramanama only. Parents purposely give their children the names of the Lord. That also may save them. That person who is for ever devoted to the Lord, who is self-controlled and who can fall into sleep any time he chooses, who has perfect control over every sense attains this knowledge and soon wins peace—moksha through it.

June 17, 1926

We do a sum in mathematics with the help of our reasoning faculty. It does not matter whether or not we have faith in mathematics. But, for spiritual knowledge, faith is essential. Does a child have to train his intellect in order to love its mother or father? An illiterate mother loves her child with her heart. We may have a love relationship of any kind with God. The poet has presented to us only a few aspects of Divine love. A person who has no conception of the vast sea may be given some idea of it by telling him of rivers and streams.

But the man of doubt, without knowledge and without faith, is lost; for him who is given to doubt there is neither this world nor that beyond, nor happiness.²

That person who does not value knowledge, who lacks faith, that is, who is a sceptic, will perish. He prospers neither in this world nor in the other.

He who has renounced all action by means of yoga, who has severed all doubt by means of knowledge—him self-possessed, no actions bind, O Dhananjaya!³

“Therefore,” Shri Krishna says, “the doubt in your heart, born of ignorance, destroy it with the sword of knowledge and take up

¹ IV, 39
² IV, 40
³ IV, 41
yoga—karmayoga— and get ready.”

[84]
[Chapter V]

June 18, 1926

Thou laudest renunciation of actions, O Krishna, whilst at the same time thou laudest performance of action; tell me for a certainty which is the better.²

Shri Vyasa uses the figure of Arjuna to make it clear that he wrote the Mahabharata only as a yajna and that those who read it for their spiritual good would also be performing a yajna.

[85]

June 19, 1926

When can we say that a person who is eating is, nevertheless, not eating? Can we say that because, while eating, he absentmindedly puts a morsel into his nostril? Anyone who thinks about play while he is eating is merely inattentive; we cannot say that he is disinterested in eating. But a person may be eating with proper attention and yet we may say of him that he is, nevertheless, not eating. Of whom can we say this? Of one who eats as though he was performing a yajna, who offers up his action of eating to Shri Krishna, who eats with the feeling that he does so in obedience to the Lord’s command. Or, such a person may also tell himself that it is not he, but his body, that is eating—the atman does not eat, or drink or sleep; he will then eat to serve others, to serve the lame, the crippled and the afflicted. That will be service of God, for God who dwells in the afflicted is also like them. That person’s karma of eating will be in truth akarma, and will not bind him. If we aspire to be good, we must ceaselessly work to serve others, serve them in a perfectly disinterested spirit. We should not serve anyone with the hope that he, too, will serve us one day, but we may serve him because the Lord dwells in him and we serve that Lord. If we hear anyone crying in distress for help, we should immediately run to him and help him. We should help the Lord crying in distress. After doing what was needed, we should feel that it was all a dream. Would the Lord ever cry in distress? In this way, all our acts of service will seem to us as dreams.

¹ The yoga of disinterested work
² V. 1

Those who offer delicacies to the Lord before partaking of them, do they really perform an act of dedication to Shri Krishna? No, they don’t. They themselves eat those delicacies. They do not eat them in the spirit of yajna. If a person offers the best part of such dainties to others to eat and himself eats only the indifferent items which remain behind, we may describe him as yajnashishtamritabhuj.\(^1\)

Renunciation and performance of action both lead to salvation; but of the two, karmayoga (performance) is better than sannyasa (renunciation).\(^2\)

\[6\]

June 20, 1926

When Shri Krishna said nehabhikramanashosti \(^3\) He assured us that no effort undertaken to follow dharma is ever wasted. Man cannot completely refrain from karma, and therefore, it is easy for everyone to follow karmayoga. Renunciation of karma, on the other hand, is a difficult matter, for it requires knowledge, whereas karmayoga can be followed even by an ordinary person. To retire into a cave in the Himalayas and sit there for ever doing nothing—it is extremely difficult to succeed in such an effort. It is a hard task to cultivate such stillness that one would not be tempted by anything even in one’s thoughts. The Lord, therefore, tells us that karmayoga is a better path, since the other one is beset with obstacles and is likely to encourage hypocrisy, while the karmayogi runs no such risk.

Him one should know as ever renouncing who has no dislikes and likes; for he who is free from the pairs of opposites is easily released from bondage.\(^4\)

Why should a karmayogi be looked upon as superior to a sannyasi? A karmayogi is necessarily a sannyasi. But a karmayogi of what type? One who has no ill will, who desires nothing and is ever devoted to his duty, who is not affected by the pairs of opposites, easily becomes free from the binding effects of karma.

It is the ignorant who speak of sankhya and yoga as different, not so those who have knowledge. He who is rightly established even in one wins to

\(^{1}\) One who eats the amrita left behind in a yajna; IV, 31
\(^{2}\) V, 2
\(^{3}\) In, II, 40
\(^{4}\) V, 3
Men of little understanding think them to be distinct from each other, but not so the wise. In truth, they are two sides of the same coin. Anyone who becomes established in either reaps the fruit of success in the other too.

A thing at rest and another in intense motion seem alike. The earth, for instance. Rest and motion are a pair of opposites. But he who remains unaffected by such opposites reaps the fruit of both.

The goal that the sankhyas attain is also reached by the yogis. He sees truly who sees both sankhya and yoga as one.2

The state which is attained through sankhya, that is, through renunciation of karma, is attained by the karmayogi too. He alone has true knowledge who understands that sankhya and karmayoga are the same thing. That is, if we consider the essence of the two, we shall find no difference between them at all. Hence work done in the spirit of yajna, done without egotism for our higher good and for the service of others, has a place in both.

June 22, 1926

Karma means work which circumstances make it necessary for us to undertake, not that which we do of our own choice. We should feel that we need not even pray for praninam artinashanam or wish to work ceaselessly with that aim. When the ‘I’in a person has vanished and he has merged into God, he feels no need to pray for anything. He will do only such work as circumstances make necessary for him. If he has no inclination of his own, only the purest type of work will come to him, and he will do it with the feeling that Narayana does everything. When Harishchandra got ready to put the knife to his wife’s throat, was it really Harishchandra who was acting? It was the Lord who prompted him to act as he did, and Harishchandra only carried out His order. The unhappy man, he had made himself a

---

1 V. 4
2 V. 5
3 “End to the suffering of all creatures”, from the verse:
   I do not desire a kingdom nor that I may go to heaven or win liberation.
   I only desire that the suffering of all creatures in pain may end.
4 Vishnu
mere servant. Having made ourselves servants of the Lord, it is not for us to choose what we shall do and what we shall not. We should do any work which comes to us and at the same time leave the burden of such work to Narayana to shoulder.

But renunciation, O Mahabahu, is hard to attain except by yoga; the ascetic equipped with yoga attains Brahman ere long.¹

For him who has not learnt to offer all his actions to Shri Krishna, sannyasa is extremely difficult to practise. The truth is that sannyasa is impossible to practise except through karmayoga. Really speaking, therefore, sannyasa is karmayoga, and nothing else. He who has become free from attachments and aversions, who has shed the “I” in him, has become a true sannyasi.

The yogi who has cleansed himself, has gained mastery over his mind and all his senses, who has become one with the atman in all creation, although he acts he remains unaffected.²

He who is established in yoga soon attains the Brahman. Anyone who successfully follows karmayoga becomes established in yoga. He who has become pure, he whose evil impulses have all been burnt away and become reduced to a burnt thread in which only the twists of the original material are visible, will act mechanically in everything he does. That of course does not mean that he pays no attention to what he is doing; it only means that he has no egotistic feeling that he himself is doing anything, though the thread which he draws out will be as straight as that drawn by a machine. An unthinking person works mechanically and the Lord’s servant, too, does merely what he is asked to do. But he does not work for payment and, therefore, his work shines out, whereas the hired labourer’s work does not shine out as he works for money. No supervisor is required to keep watch over a Lord’s servant at work. Outwardly, he seems dull, but inwardly he ever lives in the Brahman. He will have all the virtues of a machine and none of its defects. Besides, the man who lives in the atman, who has subdued the demons in him and mastered the senses, who sees himself in all creatures and all creatures in himself, will make no distinction between relations and others. He will ever live as a servant of all, and will partake only of what remains after others have had their share. Of such a person it can be said, kurvannapi na lipyate, that he works, but is not bound by the effects of karma.

¹ V. 6
² V. 7
The yogi who has seen the Truth knows that it is not he that acts whilst seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, eating, walking, sleeping, or breathing.

Talking, letting go, holding fast, opening or closing the eyes—in the conviction that it is the senses that are moving in their respective spheres.¹

These two verses are a commentary on the preceding verse. The man who knows the Truth acts as if he himself did nothing. Whether seeing or hearing, smelling, eating, walking, lying down to sleep, breathing, speaking, parting with or accepting anything, winking—in all these he will feel that it is his senses which are functioning according to their nature. Such a person acts but does not do anything. A yogi can take up this attitude, and so can a rogue, as also a devotee of the Lord. He who has consecrated his heart to the Lord will feel no desire to do anything for himself. Even when he retires to sleep, he will say that it is his body which will fall into sleep. The functions of the body are not evil in themselves. We make them so. If the body works without interference by us, it will emit nothing but fragrance. We can thus take it as a mathematical truth that our work will tend to evil in proportion as we are conscious of the ‘I’ in us and it will tend to good in proportion as we shed that ‘I’.

[88]

June 23, 1926

If we keep loudly reciting the two verses which we have been discussing, we do not become yogis thereby. We should cultivate such a state that we wholly cease to be conscious of the ‘I’ in us. Only that person can apply these verses to himself who is always completely absorbed in the task on hand, whose every action is dedicated to Shri Krishna and who seeks no benefit for himself from anything he does. If he uses his ears, it is to hear praise of God. If he uses his eyes, it is to have darshan² of the Lord. Nor does he ever suffer. Whenever anything happens which might cause him pain, he would think that the pain was not felt by him. ‘If’, he would tell himself, ‘I forget the ‘I’ in me when suffering this pain and think of Rama, no one would be able to know that I had been stung by a scorpion.’ He would feel that it had stung his body and that there was a red spot on it, that is all. He works mechanically, and still everything he does shines out. His

¹ V, 8 & 9
² Sight of an object, place or person regarded as holy actions grow ever more beautiful. He never tires of work, never feels upset and confused.

He who dedicates his actions to Brahman and performs them without attachment is not smeared by sin, as the lotus leaf by water.¹

Shri Krishna says this to guard against anyone making unworthy use of the preceding two verses. Such a person remains untouched by sin, as the lotus leaf remains untouched by water. The term “sin” is used here in a wide sense, and covers both sin and virtue. Such a person does not have to suffer the consequences of either sinful or virtuous action. He goes on working, but remains unaffected by work. Leaves of other plants get wet and decay, but the lotus is not moistened by water.

Only with the body, mind and intellect and also with the senses do the yogis perform action without attachment for the sake of self-purification.²

The yogis work, but only with their bodies, with their minds or their intellectual faculties or their senses, and feel that they themselves are not working since they work without attachment and with the aim of self-purification. To work with this aim means to dedicate one’s work to the Brahman.

We worked for self-purification in 1921, but afterwards strayed from that path and so found ourselves in difficulties.

He who works for self-purification goes on working with his machine in a disinterested spirit.

A man of yoga obtains everlasting peace by abandoning the fruit of action; the man ignorant of yoga, selfishly attached to fruit, remains bound.³

Renouncing the fruits of karma, the yogi wins the peace which is the reward of faith and devotion, the peace which brings moksha—the peace enjoyed by the man established in Brahman. That is not the peace of a stone or the peace which the unthinking man enjoys, or that which the man of lust absorbed in the pursuit of lust enjoys for a while; it is the peace of the man established in Brahman, the bliss which belongs to the atman.

The man who is not established in yoga stays in the grip of desire. He who works under the sway of ignorance must be a man attached, that is, one who is bound through attachment to fruits of work or with the snake-like coil of expectation and sense-cravings.

¹ V. 10
² V. 11
³ V. 12
When a snake is provoked, it can coil round us and crush us to death, but at the most it breaks our bones. To Mirabai, however, the snake in front of her seemed Shaligram\(^1\) dancing. At the worst it would have harmed her physically, but the snake which bites the man of lust destroys his very soul.

[89]

June 24, 1926

We should understand the meaning of the words of the Gita not merely to satisfy our curiosity but with the aim of putting its teaching into practice. In my case, the constant reading of the Gita has filled my life with prayer. We should leave alone what we cannot put into practice. It is a misuse of our intellectual energy and a waste of time to go on reading what we cannot put into practice. I have to say this because of a complaint Shri Vinoba has made. As the students do not go to bed early, they find it difficult to rise early and their health suffers. The students complain that the teachers, too, do not retire early but keep awake talking till midnight. This does not accord well with the spirit in which we have been reading the Gita. We should be sarvabhutatmabhutatma\(^2\) or atmavat sarvabhuteshu. For the sake of our neighbour, we should desist from making noise or, if we talk, talk in low whispers, as thieves do. I, too, should retire early in the evening.

What does the phrase brahmanyakadhaya karmani\(^3\) mean? God does not arouse him who does not wish to wake up. That means that we should adjust ourselves to the weakest limbs in society; or eliminate them, destroy and burn or bury them. If we are not ready for this, we should not exert ourselves to reform or raise any class of people.

Renouncing with the mind all actions, the dweller in the body, who is master of himself, rests happily in his city of nine gates, neither doing nor getting anything done.\(^4\)

The self-controlled man, that is, the man established in the atman, mentally renounces all karma and lives in peace. To renounce all karma mentally means to make the mind indifferent to them, to withdraw it into an attitude of detachment towards work and feel that

---

1. Shri Krishna
2. Who sees his atman as one with the atman in every creature; in V, 7
3. Who sees himself in all creatures.
4. In V, 10
5. V, 13
we are not doing what we are engaged in, that it is God who impels us to do it. Surely we do not feel, as we breathe, that we are breathing. We have mentally renounced that karma. It becomes necessary to breathe with a conscious effort of mind only when natural breathing is obstructed. At all other times, it goes on mechanically. The atman dwells, ever at rest, in this body with nine doors doing nothing and causing nothing to be done. Though it may be working or acting to make others work, it will not be doing so if it has mentally renounced karma.

June 25, 1926

This life is a play proceeding before us. If we devote ourselves to our work without taking interest in the play or letting our mind be distracted by it, we would be karmasannyasis. Suppose that a prisoner is asked to attend and witness another being whipped. He attends without any interest. His eyes see what is happening, but his mind may not be attentive. I would see a thing to which I become a witness by chance, but I would leave the place without stopping even a moment longer.

We recognize relationships, that this is a son and that is a brother, regard it as our duty to see that the bonds endure, and act accordingly—in all this we are involved with our minds. There is no mental renunciation of karma.

The Lord creates neither agency nor action for the world; neither does He connect action with its fruit. It is nature that is at work. The Lord says: “Ultimately I am the Creator of all beings. That means that, when you see I see, and when you do not see I, too, do not see.” That is [His] nature. This is a truth before which speech fails.

We may assert, from different points of view, that God is the Doer, and also that He is not.

If you withdraw interest from the functioning of your senses, they will never feel any strain and you will not feel exhausted. Of course, some exhaustion you will always feel, since complete annihilation of the ‘I’ sense is impossible. We discussed yesterday the idea that we should speak not of “self-realization” but of “self-purifi-
Self-purification is to be achieved through the body. We act through the atman to the degree that we have to act through the body. In truth, however, the atman does nothing, nor does it cause anything to be done.

June 26, 1926

When God the Artist painted this human eye, He so made it that the atman should shine through it. He certainly could not have intended it to cast lustful glances. The function of the eye is to ensure the safety of the body and to see God. What are the thoughts which come to your mind when you look upon the image of Hanuman? Of brahmacharya, bhakti and service. And of strength, for he was Ramachandra’s servant and Ramachandra always gives his servants the strength they need. In this way the moment we look at anyone’s eyes we should be able to see the atman behind.

The Lord does not take upon Himself anyone’s vice or virtue; it is ignorance that veils knowledge and deludes all creatures.

Man’s real nature is to serve others and to work for self-purification, and so we should not cherish the ‘I’ in us. This is why it is said here that God does not take upon Himself anyone’s sin.

But to them whose ignorance is destroyed by the knowledge of atman, this their knowledge, like the sun, reveals the Supreme.

When a man’s ignorance, which envelops the knowledge in him, has been destroyed by that knowledge, the light of God is revealed to him. God is the witness of all that occurs. The idea that we should live in obedience to Him, act only as prompted by Him—that is knowledge. We can experience its truth directly only when all the twists in the heart have straightened out and the atman alone shines there forever.

June 27, 1926

When the night in one’s mind has turned to dawn, one comes in the presence of God.

Those whose intellect is suffused with That, whose self has become one

---

1 V, 15
2 V, 16
with That, who abide in That, and whose end and aim is That, wipe out their sins with knowledge, and go whence there is no return.\(^1\)

He whose intellect has become fixed on the Lord, who has merged in Him, who is exclusively devoted to Him and who ever lives absorbed in Him, who has dedicated his all to the Lord and trusts to Him alone, such a person, attains deliverance; the sins of such a one are washed away by knowledge.

The men of Self-realization look with an equal eye on a Brahmin possessed of learning and humility, a cow, an elephant, a dog and even a dog-eater.\(^2\)

Pundits, that is, men of knowledge, see all things with an equal eye. They have the same regard for a Brahmin rich in learning and gentleness, for a cow, an elephant, a dog or a Chandal. They feel that the \textit{atman} in each of these is identical with the \textit{atman} in themselves. The only difference is that in some the \textit{atman} is enveloped by layers upon layers of ignorance, and in others these layers have fallen off. What was said earlier, that the yogi sees himself in others, means the same thing as this. Ganga water in separate vessels is Ganga water after all.

In this very body they have conquered the round of birth and death, whose mind is anchored in sameness; for perfect \textit{Brahman} is same to all, therefore in \textit{Brahman} they rest.\(^3\)

They have conquered the world on this very earth, in this very life, who are equal in mind to all human beings, who have no taint of impurity in them, who abide in God and live ever devoted to Him.

When can we say of a person that he is \textit{samadarshi}? Can we say so of that man who would give equal quantities to an elephant and an ant? Indeed no. We can say it of him who gives to each according to his or her need. A mother will give nothing to her child who is ill and will give another who is well as much as he can eat. A person who is filled with the spirit of non-violence, with compassion, will so act that the world will say of him that he behaved towards all as if they were himself, did justice to all; that he gave water to him who needed water and milk to him who needed milk.

No one can be like God, absolutely free from impurity and equal towards all. One can, therefore, become \textit{samadarshi} only by

---

\(^1\) V, 17
\(^2\) V, 18
\(^3\) V, 19
losing oneself in Him.

June 29, 1926

Let us describe some instances of equal regard for all. One is that of the elephant and the ant. Second, if an enemy and a friend arrive at his place together, both hungry, the samadarshi will offer food first to the enemy. He would feel that to be justice. He would be afraid lest there be some hatred for the enemy lurking in his heart, and he would satisfy him first. The friend, too, would appreciate his motive.

A pundit\(^1\) does not mean one who is merely learned, but one who is both learned and wise. If anyone warns him that feeding an enemy would be like giving milk to a snake, he would cite in reply this verse from the Gita and say that he was man of faith, that his father was a lover of the Gita and so was he, that they had never come to harm by following its teaching. ‘Why should I, therefore, not continue to do so?’, he would ask.

One rule of swadeshi is that in serving people we should give priority to those who live near us. There is also an opposite rule, that we should serve first those who are distant from us and then those who are near us. Near in the first rule means physically near, and distant in the second rule means distant from us mentally. Both may mean the same thing. An enemy may be physically near and distant mentally; we should, despite his being distant, serve him first.

The reason behind this rule of swadeshi is that we cannot reach all human beings in this world. If you ignore your neighbour and seek to serve someone living far away, that would be pride on your part.

We display good manners, culture and learning in serving first those who are mentally distant from us.

\(^1\) The reference is to V. 18.
We should make ourselves like that with which we wish to be one. If we wish to lose ourselves in Brahman, we must become samadarshi as Brahman is.

He whose understanding is secure, who is undeluded, who knows Brahman and who rests in Brahman, will neither be glad to get what is pleasant, nor sad to get what is unpleasant.¹

June 30, 1926

He who has detached himself from contacts without finds bliss in atman; having achieved union with Brahman he enjoys eternal bliss.²

The person, who has become liberated into unity with Brahman and who is not attached to the objects of his outgoing senses, experiences true happiness in his atman. One can have peace only by remaining unattached. It is impossible to prevent the impact of sense-impressions; that is why Shri Krishna speaks of the need to become unattached. If we constantly meditate on the holy feet of Rama, the impact of external impressions will have no effect on us. The atman that is united in yoga with Brahman, that is, which has attained to the state of samadhi in which it merges into Brahman and abides in it for ever, such an atman enjoys undying bliss.

For the joys derived from sense-contacts are nothing but mines of misery; they have beginning and end, O Kaunteya; the wise man does not revel therein.

The man who is able even here on earth, ere he is released from the body, to hold out against the flood-tide of lust and wrath,—he is a yogi, he is happy.³

Shri Krishna is repeating here what he has already explained in Chapter II.

He who finds happiness only within, rest only within, light only within,—that yogi, having become one with Nature, attains to oneness with Brahman.⁴

That yogi who finds his happiness and his peace within him, who does not need external objects to make him happy, who is ever self-absorbed and is inspired by the light which shines within him,

¹ V. 20
² V. 21
³ V. 22 & 23
⁴ V. 24
such a yogi has merged into Brahman and attains nirvana in it.

We should read the Bhagavad Gita in order that its poetry may be revealed to us.\(^1\) There are two types of nirvana. One is destruction of one’s body, after which, however, the necessity of being born again and again remains as ever. The other nirvana is brahmanirvana, which is a state of void. But the void is in regard to the external world; within it is all bliss of illumination.

They win oneness with Brahman—the seers whose sins are wiped out, whose doubts are resolved, who have mastered themselves, and who are engrossed in the welfare of all beings.\(^2\)

Rishis who are sinless and pure attain to brahmanirvana. Rishis of what description? Those whose doubts have vanished, who hold their atman a prisoner (have control over it) and who rejoice in the good of all creatures.

Such a rishi can bear ill will to no one. He is ever ready to serve the welfare of even the most wicked. He serves the whole world. A person can become the very embodiment of selfless service only if Rama dwells in his heart. Anyone who is earnestly concerned for the good of another cannot bear any real suffering on the part of the latter. We have heard of fathers who get cholera if their sons are infected by it, though of course their concern was only for their sons. A father may not be happy with his son, and still he cannot bear when the latter suffers. A rishi like this would be moved to profuse tears by the suffering of others, and he would strive ceaselessly to end it.

---

\(^1\) This sentence is in square brackets in the source.

\(^2\) V, 25

\(^3\) In the Mahabharata, Yudhishthira refused to enter Heaven unless a dog that followed him was also allowed to go, with him.

\(^4\) Thick, round cake of unleavened bread, made of coarse millet

\(^5\) This paragraph is placed within brackets in the source.
palate, and the cause of that, again, is the mind.

Rid of lust and wrath, masters of themselves, the ascetics who have realized \textit{atman} find oneness with \textit{Brahman} everywhere around them.$^3$

Those yogis who are free from desire and anger, whose minds have become steady and who are ever absorbed in their \textit{sadhana} $^2$ who have realized the self, are always and in all circumstances in a state of \textit{brahmanirvana}.

That ascetic is ever free—who having shut out the outward sense-contacts, sits with his gaze fixed between the brows, outward and inward breathing in the nostrils made equal; his senses, mind, and reason held in check; rid of longing, fear and wrath; and intent on Freedom.$^3$

Outward action is a symbol of inner action. It is not enough that breathing is regular and the eyes are focused on a point between the brows; these actions should be symbols of an inner state.

The first verse here runs on into the second one.

Knowing Me as the Acceptor of sacrifice and austerity, the great Lord of all the worlds, the Friend of all creation the yogi attains to peace.$^4$

Since God is the Friend of all creatures, why need such a person fear Him?

Since He accepts all service and all our karmas, they can never be fruitless. In dedicating everything to Him, we necessarily act without thought of self. And we are convinced in the heart of our hearts that nothing that we do will remain fruitless.

\[96\]

Chapter VI

\textit{July 2, 1926}

The last chapter raised the question, "Of sannyasa and karmayoga, which is superior?" Shri Krishna has tried to answer the question, but the problem is not one which can be easily solved. The personal God and the impersonal \textit{Brahman}, both are real; and likewise he who rests in absolute peace and he who is ceaselessly occupied in work, both are right, for the sannyasi is in fact working and the other one who is always working rests in absolute peace. One person may feel that there is nothing he need do, that he is already in the presence

$^1$ V. 26
$^2$ Single-minded effort for self-realization
$^3$ V. 27 & 28
$^4$ V. 29
of God; such a person can cease from work. He who has free access to the king’s court, what more need he do? When the subjects themselves know the king’s will and carry it out, what work need the king do? It would surprise the subjects only if he came forward to work. I have still to remind you again and again that you should not doze here, that you should be attentive, and so on; but a day will come when it will not at all be necessary for me to do this, for all of you will have then learnt to work methodically. It is, therefore, right and proper that at present I keep telling you these things and take interest in these matters; it will be equally right if, by and by, I stop doing so and let myself rest in peace.

But Arjuna does not say yet that he has understood the point, and so Shri Krishna takes up the same argument again in Chapter VI.

He who performs all obligatory action, without depending on the fruit thereof, is a sannyasi and a yogi—not the man who neglects the sacrificial fire nor he who neglects action.¹

He who deposits all his works in God’s treasury, and goes on doing his duty without looking for reward—for, as we know, God is the enjoyer of yajna and tapas,—is both a sannyasi and a yogi. But that person who never lights the fire for yajna—originally it was an act of public service to keep a fire burning in the home for performing a yajna—or never works, is neither a sannyasi nor a yogi. Such a person would in fact be a prince of idlers.

What is called sannyasa, know thou to be yoga, O Pandava; for none can become a yogi who has not renounced selfish purpose.²

Shri Krishna says: “Know that yoga is the same thing that the learned describe as sannyasa. For you, it is not sannyasa to run away from the battle; sannyasa for you lies in fighting—it is I that enjoy a yajna—for the person who has not renounced personal motives for action can never be a yogi. Sannyasa is not something which can be demonstrated outwardly; it is a matter of the spirit within. The restless play of desires and fancies should cease; only then can one be a sannyasi.”

[97]

July 3, 1926

For the man who seeks to scale the heights of yoga, action is said to be the means; for the same man, when he has scaled those heights, repose is said

¹ VI, 1
² VI, 2
to be the means.¹

For the muni who aspires to master yoga, the only means is work (For yoga has been defined as skill in action). If a person lets himself be beaten for a long time on the anvil of work, some day he may be shaped into a yogi. For him who has established himself in yoga, who has attained to a state of spiritual equipoise, whose mind has become steadfast, for such a person the right means [of continuing in this state] is shama, that is, resting in peace.

The argument here is the same that we discussed yesterday. Today, I have to try and explain my meaning in different ways. To succeed in my effort, I have to see that my meaning sinks into you, so that you understand it as clearly as I do. This effort is a kind of yoga and will be rewarded with success. When you learn to understand my meaning through a mere gesture, then the right means for us will be silence. A factory is filled with noise the whole day, but, when the time for closing it arrives, complete peace reigns in it. That machine required the means of work in order to be a yogi; afterwards, peace became the means. That is how a well-ordered machine acts. Such peace is not the peace of the grave or the peace of lethargy or inertness; it is the peace of conscious life, the peace of the sea.

When a man is not attached either to the objects of senses or to actions and sheds all selfish purpose, then he is said to have scaled the heights of yoga.²

When a person remains unattached to objects of the senses or to work, but uses his senses and works in a detached spirit, such a person, then, who has renounced all personal motives for work, is said to have established himself in yoga.

By one’s Self should one raise oneself, and not allow oneself to fall; for Atman (Self) alone is the friend of self, and Self alone is self’s foe.³

You can win moksha only by your own effort. Today, we simply act as enemies of our atman. The atman is self-effulgent, and so it must win its freedom by its own effort. Who can light the divine sun? He rises into freedom as soon as it is dawn. He comes, established in yoga, and sinks into peace in the evening (But does the sun really sink into peace? Shall I have sunk into peace even when I die?).

¹ VI, 3
² VI, 4
³ VI, 5
In our ordinary language we say that God grants freedom to the atman, for we do not know how to express the idea in any other way. But can the atman ever merge in God except through its own power? It has all the attributes of God, and that is why it can merge in Him. As the atman is self-effulgent, so is God. A thing cannot merge in something else with unlike attributes. We are advised to take care and see that our atman does not destroy itself, for it is in the power of the atman to do so, though, of course, it cannot annihilate itself completely because it is imperishable. The man who says “I am an atheist” contradicts himself in that very statement. We cannot add a single moment to the life of this universe, and so also we can never succeed in destroying the atman.

His Self alone is friend who has conquered himself by his Self; but to him who has not conquered himself and is thus inimical to himself, even his Self behaves as foe.¹

While we live, there are two sides in us: the demoniac and the divine, the God-like and the Satanic. So long as this strife goes on, it is our duty to fight Satan and protect ourselves. In the war between gods and demons, it is the former who always win in the end. When the world is no more, God will laugh and ask where Satan was. The atman of the atheist acts as his enemy. The truth is that the atman of each of us does so, thanks to the evil of kaliyuga.

Of him who has conquered himself and who rests in perfect calm the Self is completely composed, in cold and heat, in pleasure and pain, in honour and dishonour.²

That person who has overcome the lower self in him and who is ever unperturbed, in heat or cold, pleasure or pain, honour or dishonour,—any praise or censure given to us is like a stream which flows away towards God and disappears—the Paramatman is such a person becomes samahita³. Even in him who is the very image of unquiet, who is filled, not with non-violence, but with violence, who is not truthful but untruthful—even in such a one the Supreme Self abides in perfect equipoise.

¹ VI, 6
² VI, 7
³ Gandhiji has not indicated the meaning which he attaches to it.
July 6, 1926

We can say that the atman dwells in perfect equipoise when what is outside of us is a reflection of what is within. It will not do if the body is erect but the mind is not so. Today our minds are not erect. The dog has four legs, and we have two, and yet our minds behave like those of four-legged creatures.

The yogi who is filled with the contentment of wisdom and discriminative knowledge, who is firm as a rock, who has mastered his senses, and to whom a clod of earth, a stone and gold are the same, is possessed of yoga.1

Jnana here means listening to readings from the Shastras, meditating over them, studying them, and vijnana means realizing the atman in direct experience. Jnana is understanding through reason, and vijnana is that knowledge which sinks through reason into experience. Jnana is knowledge obtained from the Shastras, whereas vijnana is knowledge which is part of one’s experience. Non-violence will have become direct experience for us in this sense when our whole life comes to be permeated with the spirit of compassion, when non-violence manifests itself in us in its true essence. That boy who comes to feel compassion as his own experience will to that extent have purified himself, or attained knowledge of the self.

He whose atman is filled to perfect contentment with such jnana and vijnana, who dwells firmly like kuta—he is a kutastha that is, who endures blows, as the anvil does without ever breaking into pieces, remains unshaken in the midst of even extreme suffering—who has subdued his senses completely, such a one may be described as a yogi who has attained freedom. He has become united with God, has become inwardly purified. To such a yogi, clay, stone and gold, all are equal. All three come from earth. Earth which has hardened is stone. Gold, silver, diamonds, sapphire, all these are transformations of earth. But they are all without any worth—everyone of them is but dust. If we shed greed, we would look upon all these articles with the same eye.

He excels who regards alike the boon companion, the friend, the enemy the stranger, the mediator, the alien and the ally, as also the saint and the sinner.2

1 VI, 8
2 VI, 9
He who has the same regard for friend and foe, for one who deserves to be hated and one who is a kinsman, for the sadhu and the sinner, as he would have for clay and gold, he may be said to have won the battle of this life. The same law applies to the world of the living which applies to the world of inert matter. As clay and gold are ultimately the same substance, so the sadhu and the sinner are ultimately one.

The sadhu and the sinner are forms of the same reality. They are both manifestations of the atman. The layer of uncleanness has disappeared from over the sadhu’s atman and is becoming ever thicker over the sinner’s. We shall have risen above the ordinary level only when we learn to have equal regard for either. Tulsidas has shown by his example how we can do that.

Let the yogi constantly apply his thought to atman remaining alone in a secluded place, his mind and body in control, rid of desires and possessions.¹

A yogi should constantly live in a solitude and be in union with the atman. To live in solitude means to withdraw the mind from the outside world. He who lives by himself and seeks to control his mind should shed all desires and, having renounced all possessions, yoke the atman to the Paramatman in contemplation. Renunciation of possessions includes renunciation of the desire for possessions too. He who practises japa² in solitude in the hope of winning a kingdom is no yogi. A man who possesses a few lakhs of rupees may be less acquisitive than another who daily gives away money in charity and sacrifices wealth but is constantly thinking of money.

July 7, 1926

Rahasi³ means in a quiet place free from noise and ekaki⁴ means living by oneself. One can live in solitude and by oneself even in the midst of the bazaar in Ahmedabad.

Even so, one must have physical solitude. One can go to a cremation ground and, thinking on the perishable body, experience the feeling of solitude. Yatachittatma⁵ means one who is free from

¹ VI, 10
² Constant repetition of a name or formula believed to have spiritual power
³ In VI, 10
⁴ Ibid
⁵ Ibid
physical or mental restlessness. A man can make do with a mere langoti\textsuperscript{1}, which even a flying kite may bring him. Can anyone, however, do without some possessions for the comfort of the body? We should supply the body its minimum needs and not seek to multiply them. If we go on multiplying bodily needs, we shall ever be going from birth to death and from death to birth. So long as the turban is there, we may use it but we should not buy another to replace it; likewise, we may look after the body, but only to supply its minimum needs. We shall not then have to be born and to die again and again. Atmanam unjita\textsuperscript{2} means yoking the atman to the Paramatman. Fixing for himself, in a pure spot, a firm seat, neither too high nor yet too low, covered with kusha grass, thereon a deerskin, and thereon a cloth.\textsuperscript{3}

One should place a seat in a holy spot—desha may mean even “country”, for it was supposed that Bharat was karmabhumi—a country in which people engage themselves in karma with ceaseless vigilance is a karmabhumi—whereas one is born in other countries to enjoy the fruits of one’s actions (though India is no longer such a country today)—One should place a firm seat, neither too high nor too low. One should spread out kusha grass and ajin, and then cover the spot with a piece of cloth. Ajin means deerskin. This is mentioned because in those days deer used to be hunted. A yogi devotes himself to his practice for quite a long time. He should, therefore, protect himself carefully lest he should feel cold and his limbs become cramped. He should place himself on such a seat and remain there motionless.

Sitting on that seat, with mind concentrated, the functions of thought and sense in control, he should set himself to the practice of yoga for the sake of self-purification.\textsuperscript{4}

[101]

July 8, 1926

I gave a wrong meaning yesterday to the phrase yatchit-tendriya.\textsuperscript{5} To control the activity of the chitta and the senses means to

\textsuperscript{1} Codpiece
\textsuperscript{2} In VI, 10
\textsuperscript{3} VI, II
\textsuperscript{4} VI, 12
\textsuperscript{5} In VI, 12
restrain such activity. Yogah chittavrittinirodhah. If the waves are continually rising, we describe the sea as stormy. There is no essential difference between the sea and the waves in it. All souls are like waves in water, that is, they are but different forms of that water. We need not ask why we should let waves rise in ourselves. Human beings conceive God as a kind of doll; respectable people even make gold images of Him. All this goes on. The rising of a wave means being born, and the wave subsiding means death. Telling himself this, a man may become steady in mind and let the wave of desire subside in it. Patanjali tells us that if we restrain the waves from rising, we shall know whether the master of the chitta is desire or whether it is God. Expanding the phrase chittavritii, Shri Krishna spoke of chutta and indriyas in this verse.

Keeping himself steady, holding the trunk, the neck and the head in a straight line and motionless, fixing his eye on the tip of his nose, and looking not around.

Tranquil in spirit, free from fear, steadfast in the vow of brahmacharya, holding his mind in control, the yogi should sit, with all his thoughts on Me, absorbed in Me.²

[102]

July 9, 1926

These four verses describe processes of yoga. I remember to have read in jail that they would take not less than six months to learn. These processes are physical actions, and we cannot be certain that everyone will profit from them. The body and the mind, however, are so difficult to control that in our country people attach special importance to these processes. When such ideas are given importance in theory, all kinds of experiments are undertaken, as, for instance, climbing Dhavalgiri as a holy effort. Two Italian boys had decided to tour round the whole earth walking. They were just young boys. They were happy with what they had undertaken. When I asked them what they hoped to learn from their tour, one of them got very angry. They would acquire a venturesome spirit, from which they themselves would profit, but in other ways they would have simply thrown away their lives. The same is true about pranayama and other processes which have been mentioned. There is no fraud behind them, and no intention to impose on people; they are a means of fixing our mind on God. If I resolve to observe silence even when in the midst of a bazaar, why should I let my mind be distracted by the noise around me? Similarly, while attending these prayers, too, we are at once in the midst of society and in solitude.

¹ “Yoga is controlling the activity of the mind”—Patanjali in Yogasutra.
² VI, 13 & 14

The yogi, who ever thus, with mind controlled, unites himself to \textit{atman}, wins the peace which culminates in \textit{Nirvana}, the peace that is in Me.\footnote{VI, 15}

We may attain the peace which follows our merging in \textit{Brahman} if we are good children of God.

Yoga is not for him who eats too much, nor for him whofasts too much, neither for him who sleeps too much, nor yet for him who is too wakeful.\footnote{VI, 16}

Yoga is not meant for the person who eats too much. He will not succeed in his efforts for spiritual discipline. Nor will the person who eats nothing, who takes a vow of total abstinence from God, succeed in his yoga. Similarly, the man who sleeps or keeps awake too long also will not succeed.

It should be borne in mind that this is said in continuation of the preceding four verses. It is true that anyone who eats or sleeps too much can achieve nothing. Some persons live merely on the physical level; they can achieve nothing worth while. But the converse requires a little thinking about. He who has undertaken spiritual discipline but cannot bear hunger will be in the same mental condition as the starving millions in the country. He will not be able to provide his \textit{chitta} the nourishment it needs and so he will not succeed in fixing his thoughts on God. And the same is true about keeping awake.

There is no fear that anyone here intends to abstain from food or to keep awake too long in this manner. This verse refers to a person who imposes such discipline on himself for progress in yoga. But a person who, however hard he tries, cannot acquire control over his senses, whose eyes always open to cast lustful glances and whose other senses, too, crave indulgence—let such a person certainly undertake long fasts, even if his body should perish in consequence. He should do nothing for outward show. We look upon truth as the chain which binds us all together here. Any of us here who fasts will not deceive himself. He may fast if he feels that he cannot curb his cravings in any other way. An idea has come to prevail nowadays that in this world one must satisfy one’s desires. Hence my advice to you that you should not spare yourself any harshness in striving for self-purification. If a person loves to boast about secretly gratifying his eye, ear or palate, it would do him much good to take any number of vows to curb the body and cultivate vigilance. If we wish to, we can certainly control the senses. But we do not wish do so, and then look for excuses. The Gita advises such persons not to eat or sleep too much.

\footnotesize{\textsuperscript{1} VI, 15
\textsuperscript{2} VI, 16}

The four verses we have discussed describe a method which serves as a kind of help like that with which a child may learn to walk. They advise one to follow the golden mean. Having adopted such a method, one’s effort should be to do or to die. If people sacrifice so much to discover the North Pole, will it be too much if we lay down our lives in the effort to discover the North Pole of the atman?

[103]

July 10, 1926

Shri Krishna advised moderation in the beginning, the avoiding of excess in all matters. It is only by and by that one can judge what constitutes excess. He said, therefore, that in the beginning one should proceed slowly.

A time may come, however, when we shall not feel as excess what may seem to be so to an ordinary person. When a person is distracted by innumerable evil impulses and feels himself helpless to curb them, he may employ satyagraha against his body and against God. We should scrupulously practise non-violence towards others, but we would come to grief if we adopt it in dealing with our body. Against our body we must employ non-co-operation. That is, we must begin by non-co-operating with the evil impulses in our heart. We must tell the body that we have been paying it hire in the form of food for working as our watchman, but that we have decided to stop paying it from today because it is not doing its duty properly. We may pay rent only for a house which serves to protect us, of which the roof does not leak and the walls are not dilapidated. Why pay for a house which is rotten inside? The other one with a leaking roof and dilapidated walls can be repaired, but what can we do with a house the air in which has become poisoned? Thus, if the body does not fulfil the conditions of our leasing it, we have a right to go on an indefinite fast.

To him who is disciplined in food and recreation, in effort in all activities, and in sleep and walking, yoga (discipline) becomes a relief from

224

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
all ills.¹

The man who avoids excess, what does he gain? He who is regular in food, rest and so on, who acts with due moderation in everything, who is moderate even in his sleep, will find that his practice of yoga ends all his suffering.

When one’s thought, completely controlled, rests steadily only on atman, when one is free from longing for all objects of desire, then one is called a yogi.²

When the mind has come under our complete control, when it is easily restrained by us, when it is fixed constantly on the atman, that is, acts in everything in obedience to the atman, when it has become completely disinterested, that is, become free from all desires, then the person may be said to be established in yoga.

As a taper in a windless spot flickers not, even so is a yogi, with his thought controlled, seeking to unite himself with atman.³

The condition of the yogi who is regularly practising yoga and who has acquired control over his mind is like that of a lamp in a windless place, which does not flicker. If we are unsteady in mind, the storm of the cravings of the senses blows out the atman as a breeze blows out the lamp. As the latter gets its food from air, so the atman gets the food it needs through the senses and the mind. The lamp gets its food from air which is motionless; likewise the atman gets nourishing food from the mind if we keep the air of its impulses still.

Where thought curbed by the practice of yoga completely ceases, where a man sits content within himself, atman having seen atman.⁴

When the impulses in a person’s mind have subsided and the mind is filled with peace, when through the practice of yoga the mind has come under one’s control and its impulses have subsided, when the person sees the atman through the atman, that is, when his mind has become absorbed in the atman and he lives for ever content in the atman,—such a person has become a yogi.

[104]

July 11, 1926

Watt discovered that if we collect steam and let it escape through a pipe, it will draw a load of any weight. Similarly, those boys who

¹ VI, 17
² VI, 18
³ VI, 19
⁴ VI, 20
restrain all their outgoing impulses and concentrate them in one direction will be able to carry any weight on their shoulders. How much, then, would we benefit if we restrain all these impulses and let them subside and be transformed into devotion to God.

Where he experiences that endless bliss beyond the sense which can be grasped by reason alone; wherein established he swerves not from the Truth;¹

When compared with the highest bliss—the bliss which abides forever—the pleasures of the senses are but momentary. That bliss cannot be felt through the senses, it can be experienced only by the intellect. If a person has perceived with his intellect the reality which God is, if he has understood with it his duty and then yoked himself to the chariot of God, if, shaking off lethargy, he has entered his name in God’s office for duty—such a person will never be shaken from his purpose.

A person whose mind has become fixed in this manner does not cease even for a moment to be conscious of the reality which is God. He is a yogi.

Where he holds no other gain greater than that which he has gained; and where, securely seated, he is not shaken by any calamity however great;²

Having attained this state, the person does not even dream that he can gain anything better still. Such a condition is possible only if one thinks about nothing but Ramanama even in one’s dreams, if one has worked the whole day in a disinterested spirit of service. If we have not spent the night in sound sleep, if we have had a bad dream, we may understand that our mind is still full of greed, attachment, etc. He whose mind does not sleep at all during any hour of the day is firmly established in yoga, he is single-minded in his devotion.

I once saw in Pretoria jail a Negro who had a mind so strong, like a demon’s, that he never shrunk back, no matter how much he was flogged. The yogi’s mind, however, becomes like a god’s: his skin glows and the mind never wavers. If the mind of a person who dwells in solitude is wandering in all directions, though physically alone he lives amidst a crowd.

That state should be known as yoga (union with the Supreme), the disunion from all union with pain. This yoga must one practise with firm resolve and unwearying zeal.³

¹ VI, 21
² VI, 22
³ VI, 23
What has been described as yoga means complete absence of suffering. The state beyond happiness and suffering cannot be described in words. We speak of it as peace. When we are in that state, we are said to be in yoga. We should establish ourselves in such yoga with a determined mind, without getting tired of the effort.

July 13, 1926

Anyone who depends for his happiness on external circumstances makes it plain that in fact he does not want to be happy. In the end such a person becomes unhappy. But he who feels neither happiness nor misery—we should throw both into the river Sabarmati—if we become glad on getting something which is to our liking and feel miserable when we get something which we do not like, either state of mind is bad—he who rises above both happiness and misery has achieved yoga. Yoga means absence of suffering, never feeling miserable. If anyone abuses us, we should lay the abuse at God’s feet. Likewise, if anyone praises us, the praise too we should lay at His feet. This is the meaning of non-possessiveness. He is a yogi who cultivates such a state of mind and feels himself as light as a flower.

Shaking oneself completely free from longings born of selfish purpose; reining in the whole host of senses, from all sides, with the mind itself;

With reason held securely by the will, he should gradually attain calm and with the mind established in atman think of nothing.¹

Such a person is a yogi; that is, he escapes from the dualities of happiness and suffering.

Wherever the fickle and unsteady mind wanders, thence should it be reined in and brought under the sole sway of atman.²

Proceeding, Shri Krishna explains in different words the idea of the preceding verses. He has asked Arjuna to fix the mind on the atman. What more can He say? But He tries to explain the idea still more clearly.

One should withdraw the mind from any object or thought to which it wanders, hold it in check and bring it under the control of the atman.

¹ VI, 24 & 25
² VI, 26
The speed of air can be measured by a meterologist and that of electricity by a scientist. But no machine has yet been invented to measure the speed of the mind. It is unsteady and restless. We should withdraw it from every direction in which it flies and fix it in the right place, that is, in the atman.

For, supreme bliss comes to this yogi, who, with mind becalmed, with passions stilled, has become one with Brahman, and is purged of all stain.¹

Such a yogi, whose mind has become stilled, whose rajasik impulses, whose egotism and pride, have all completely subsided, and who has become merged in Brahman—such a yogi will experience the supreme bliss.

The yogi, cleansed of all stain, unites himself ever thus to atman, easily enjoys the endless bliss of contact with Brahman.²

The yogi who has thus learnt to yoke his atman constantly [to God], who has been purified of his sins, who has felt the contact of Brahman, enjoys everlasting bliss.

The man equipped with yoga looks on all with an impartial eye, seeing atman in all beings and all beings in atman.³

He who is established in yoga, who looks upon all with an equal eye, sees himself in all other creatures and all other creatures in himself—such a yogi with an equal eye for all can enjoy the bliss of merging in Brahman.

[106]

July 14, 1926

The verse which we took up yesterday is an important one. The yogi is not one who sits down to practise breathing exercises; he is one who looks upon all with an equal eye, sees other creatures in himself. Such a one attains moksha. To look upon all with an equal eye means to act towards others as we would towards ourselves. That idea is explained still further in the following verse.

He who sees Me everywhere and everything in Me, never vanishes from Me nor I from him.⁴

“He who sees Me everywhere and sees all creatures and objects in Me, I am never absent from such a person. He is always dear to Me,

¹ VI, 27
² VI, 28
³ VI, 29
⁴ VI, 30
he is never far from Me”,—as Hanuman was never far from Rama-chandra.

[107]

July 15, 1926

It is not easy to see all creatures in ourselves. The key with which to achieve this is given in the next verse, and that is, that one should see others in oneself by seeing them and oneself in God. As ice becomes what it is from water, so we have all come from the same water and shall turn again into that water. The hailstone which realizes that it is water in substance will feel itself as water. God and God’s maya are one; what distinction, then, can there be between a Brahmin, a Chandal and a Sudra? That is why the sage Bharadwaja asked Rama whether the latter had killed Ravana or only his own maya. Rama is never absent from us and we are never far from Rama.

The yogi who, anchored in unity, worships Me abiding in all beings, lives and moves in Me, no matter how he live and move.¹

“The yogi,” says Shri Krishna, “who worships Me the dweller in all creatures, who, after merging in Brahman, feels that he is Brahman and that the world exists in Brahman and who worships Me with that feeling, such a yogi, though ever engaged in outward activities, lives in Me.”

As they say, “walking with unsteady steps on the earth but fixing the mind on the sky”, so a person who has his eyes always fixed on the sky of his heart dwells in God every moment, whether walking or eating or drinking, or in any condition whatever. There are impostors who claim that, though they may indulge in immoral pleasures, they are still yogis. They tell us that, being victims of maya, we may hold that some things are permitted and others forbidden, but that they themselves are bound by no rules. If we ask them to exchange their gold for our stone, they will not agree. They will answer that they are learned men and the gold had better be with them. But about the actions of a person who has banished all evil from his heart, the world will say—he himself will not claim it—that though doing karma he dwells in God.

He who, by likening himself with others, senses pleasure and pain equally for all as for himself, is deemed to be the highest yogi. O Arjuna.²

¹ VI, 31
² VI, 32
He who acts towards others as if they were himself will meet their needs as if they were his own, will do to others what he would to himself, will learn to look upon himself and the world as one. He is a true yogi who is happy when others are happy and suffers when other suffer.

Only that person who has reduced himself to a cipher, has completely shed his egotism, can claim to be so. He alone may be said to be such a person who has dedicated his all to God. But this is a difficult state to achieve, and so Arjuna puts a question.

I do not see, O Madhusudana, how this yoga, based on the equal mindedness that Thou hast expounded to me, can steadily endure, because of fickleness (of the mind).¹

When we are travelling in a train, we cannot see clearly the things outside. That is how it is.

For fickle is the mind, O Krishna, unruly, over-powering and stubborn; to curb it is, I think, as hard as to curb the wind.²

Arjuna says: “O Krishna, the mind is fickle, it unsteadies the heart, it is strong, and obstinate in its fickleness. We can see this truth if we can curb it, but it is as difficult to curb it as it is to curb air.”

Undoubtedly, O Mahabahu, the mind is fickle and hard to curb; yet, O Kaunteya, it can be held in check by constant practice and dispassion.

Without self-restraint, yoga, I hold, is difficult to attain; but the self-governed soul can attain it by proper means, if he strive for it.³

July 16, 1926

We may have studied the Gita with great care and attention, but we can achieve nothing if we lack strength of heart. We should strive for self-purification in respect of all our attachments. We should overcome ignorant attachments and carry out self-purification. Arjuna has become a bridge between Shri Krishna and the world. Possessing such knowledge and after having enjoyed, the privilege of Shri Krishna’s company for so long a time, he should have no question to ask. It is for the benefit of the world that he puts all the questions.

If one, possessed of faith, but slack of effort, because of his mind straying from yoga, reach not perfection in yoga, what end does he come to, O

¹ VI, 33
² VI, 34
³ VI, 35 & 36
He who does not persevere in his effort to be a yogi, who does not strive hard enough, who has faith but whose mind has wandered away from yoga—he may have retired into a secluded spot in a forest but his thoughts dwell in the world without—what becomes of such a person who has failed to reach the goal of his yoga? Does he rise or does he fall?

Without a foothold, and floundering in the path to Brahman, fallen from both, is he indeed not lost, O Mahabahu, like a dissipated cloud?

A person may have read a number of books and been struggling for some spiritual progress. But afterwards he thinks and tells himself: No, I feel inclined to retire into solitude and put my head in God’s lap and offer satyagraha to him.” One, however, who has let his mind wander in all sorts of ways and has become full of doubts perishes like a scattered cloud. He becomes like a jug without a bottom. Because he has strayed from the path towards Brahman which he has been following, does such a person perish?

This my doubt, O Krishna, do Thou dispel utterly; for there is to be found none other that Thou to banish this doubt.

Shri Krishna answers this question with a solemn assurance.

Neither in this world, nor in the next, can there be ruin for him, O Partha; no well-doer, oh loved one, meets with a sad end.

Shri Krishna says: “No, Arjuna, such a person is destroyed neither in this world nor in the other, for a weak yogi who strives half-heartedly is certainly not destroyed. No one who strives for good ever comes to harm.” In these words, Shri Krishna assured the whole world that He would always welcome those who sought Him as persons engaged in a good effort, no matter with what energy they pursued their aim. Every action bears fruit and in particular no effort for realizing God is ever wasted. A person making such an effort never falls, but always rises. If he has faith, what does it matter if he connot strive with determination? Whatever his achievement, he will be counted as a soldier in God’s army.

Fallen from yoga, a man attains the world of righteous souls, and having dwelt there for numberless years is then born in a house of pure and gentle blood.¹

Such a person rises, after his death, to the world which men of good deeds attain and, after dwelling in it for a long time, is born in a family of men who are holy and possess shri—that is, men who enjoy God’s grace, not necessarily posses riches—for it is difficult for one born in a rich family to practise yoga or chant Ramanama. Is Vishnu, with whom dwells Lakshmi, believed to be the Lord of Lakshmi because He owns a mint? No. Lakshmi means bhakti. The sage Agastya may be described as a man who enjoyed shri, for he had obtained from Shiva the boon of bhakti. Shri Krishna ate a dish of green leaves offered by Vidura.² It is in the family of such a person that one who has fallen from the path of yoga, a weak yogi who none the less has faith, is born.

Or he may even be born into a family of yogis, though such birth as this is all too rare in this world.³

Or he is born in the family of a wise yogi. Born in such a family, he learns to have an equal mind in all things right from his childhood. Bhakti is a daily practice in the family of such a yogi. We may say that Sudhanva and Narad were so fortunately born.

There, O Kurunandana, he recovers the intellectual stage he had reached in his previous birth, and thence he stretches forward again towards perfection.⁴

He acquires in this family the state of equal-mindedness which I explained to you. He acquires in this life the state which he had failed to acquire in his previous life, whether or not he remembers his effort in that life.

In Italy, there is an eight-year-old boy who plays on the Sitar [sic] as if he was born with the skill.

Similarly, if a boy of eight can look upon all with equal regard, we shall conclude that that is the effect of his mode of life in a previous birth. He will then strive further in the same direction and

¹ VI, 41
² Character in the Mahabharata known as “the wisest of the wise”, he gave good advice to both the Pandavas and the Kauravas, but in the war he sided with the former.
³ VI, 42
⁴ VI, 43
ultimately reach his goal.

By virtue of that previous practice he is borne on, whether he will it or not; even he with a desire to know yoga passes beyond the Vedic ritual.¹

Because of his experience in the previous life, such a person is spontaneously drawn towards God. He who is a yogi and yearns for knowledge crosses the shabdabrahman, that is, goes beyond the endless forms of karma and rituals enjoined in the Vedas, not beyond the karma which we undertake with a view to service or in a disinterested spirit but beyond the karma prompted by personal motive and activities undertaken for the sake of various personal gains.

But the yogi who perseveres in his striving, cleansed of sin, perfected through many births, reaches the highest state.²

Perserving in his effort, such a yogi destroys the effects of his sins and, succeeding in his aim after many lives, attains moksha.

[110]

July 18, 1926

The capital of self-purification acquired in this life will never be wasted.

The yogi is deemed higher than the man of austerities; he is deemed also higher than the man of knowledge; higher is he than the man engrossed in ritual; therefore be thou a yogi, O Arjuna!³

Shri Krishna says: “I ask you to be a yogi, for the yogi is superior to the person who performs tapascharya, and he is considered superior even to the man who is a jnani. Here jnani does not signify a person who is merely learned in Shastras or is wise in practical affairs. The yogi is superior also to one who spends all his time in rituals and similar pursuits. You should, therefore, be a yogi.”

And among all yogis, he who worships Me with faith, his inmost self all rapt in Me, is deemed by Me to be the best yogi.⁴

Among all classes of yogis, the best of course is the one who has faith in God. As the rays of the moon are the only thing which will make the chataka bird happy, so nothing is as effective as constant repetition of the Lord’s name for ending man’s threefold suffering in this world.

¹ VI, 44
² VI, 45
³ VI, 46
⁴ VI, 47
A Swami from Pushkar Raj once came to visit me. He asked me: “Why have you taken up the spinning-wheel now in your old age?” In a region in which water is scarce, anyone who digs with a shovel—digs for water so that he may serve others—is repeating Ramanama though he may not be literally doing so, and reaps the fruit of repeating it. There are many in the world for whom food is the only Brahman. It is dharma to undertake physical labour and make such a starving person labour too, till he can get food. That sannyasi put his question to me, but he did not know that I was practising akrama through karma.

In this sixth chapter, Shri Krishna has explained how one may cultivate the spirit of sacrifice through work; he has explained the means of learning self-control. As the method, however, is difficult to practise—though it is not essential that everyone should follow it—, the question is raised whether a person who fails in such an effort does not get the worst of both the worlds. Replying, Shri Krishna says: “No; nothing done with a spiritual motive is lost.”

[111]

Chapter VII

July 20, 1926

Hear, O Partha, how, with thy mind rivetted on Me, by practising yoga and making Me the sole refuge, thou shalt, without doubt, know Me fully.

I will declare to thee, in its entirely, this knowledge, combined with discriminative knowledge, which when thou hast known there remains here nothing more to be known.

Among thousands of men hardly one strives after perfection; among those who strive hardly one knows Me in truth. That is, this knowledge is of supreme worth and not everyone can acquire it.

Earth, Water, Fire, Air, Ether, Mind, Reason and Ego—thus eight-fold is my prakriti divided.

This is My lower aspect; but know thou My other aspect, the higher—which is Jiva (the Vital Essence) by which, O Mahabahu, this world is sustained.

---

1 A holy place in Rajasthan, sacred to Vaishnavas
2 VII, 1, 2, 3
3 VII, 4 & 5
[Shri Krishna says to Arjuna,] “There is also another prakriti of Mine which you may call para prakriti. It exists in living creatures, and is superior to the prakriti in inert matter; through it the entire universe exists.”

July 21, 1926

We should regard an enemy as one with us. We should reflect how we with someone who is afraid of us to behave towards us. Even if it is in his power to cut us to pieces, we want him to be fair to us. If we have imprisoned someone, we should not put him under greater restraint than necessary, though he may be our enemy. In any case, we cannot torture him to death. This is no more than the law of the world. Even obeying that law, though we fear snakes and do not wish to die, we also want to complete the reading of the Gita and to acquire the highest knowledge, to serve a few people in the world and bring the spinning-movement to success, to work in the cause of cow-protection. With this aim, we may wish to protect ourselves. I don’t wish to suggest that you cruelly tortured the snake. But certainly you did not simply lift it and remove it elsewhere. This is a difficult matter. We may catch a snake and remove it, but should do so gently. We should not inflict pain on it. We should think on this matter not because Kishorelalbhai wants us to do so, but because we want to put the teaching of the Gita into practice. We should certainly not beat up a snake for our pleasure. We must not derive pleasure from tossing a kitten. This is ignorance and cruelty. Even a child should think how he or she would feel if someone treated him or her in the same manner.

Why does the Gita counsel us to treat Chandals and Bhangis in the same manner as we do others?

We should actually feel towards them in the same manner. It is in vain that one reads the Gita if one does not try to live in such a spirit. We should not get pleasure in torturing snakes and other creatures like them. We catch a snake and hold it tight with sticks, but we may do this because we have no choice in the matter. Our attitude should be the same as when we take special care of the body and even pamper it, but feel how much better it would be if we did not do this. We should adopt a fixed attitude of mind, that in such matters we should do the minimum necessary and no more. Do not tell yourselves that you will think about these matters when you have white hair on your heads. You must make the best use of your youth right now. As Lord Krishna said, among thousands only one person strives for self-realization, that is, for self-purification, and among the thousands who strive only a rare person comes to a right knowledge of Him. Hence we should strive hard and long. We should look upon ourselves as those exceptional persons among thousands. We should try to become philosophers. We should aspire to be the rare individuals among those thousands, and hope that we shall succeed.

Know that these two compose the source from which all beings spring; I am the origin and end of the entire universe.¹

Shri Krishna says: “The apara prakriti, the soul that lives in the visible world, and the para prakriti, the invisible world, believe these to be the cause of all creatures that live. For I am the source of the whole universe, and am that in which it subsides. That is, I am the cause of creation and destruction. Do not think, therefore, that you kill anyone.”

There is nothing higher than I, O Dhananjaya; all this is strung on Me as a row of gems upon a thread.²

“As the beads are held together by the string, so this universe is held by Me.”

In water I am the savour, O Kaunteya; in the sun and the moon I am the light; the syllable AUM in all the Vedas; the sound in ether, and manliness in men.

I am the sweet fragrance in earth; the brilliance in fire; the life in all beings; and the austerity in ascetics.³

Know Me, O Partha, to be the primeval seed of all beings; I am the reason of rational beings and the splendour of the splendid.⁴

[113]

July 22, 1926

Of the strong, I am the strength, divorced from lust and passion; in beings I am desire undivorced from righteousness.⁵

“I am the strength of the strong, but that strength which is used without selfish motive or attachment. Such was King Janaka’s

¹ VII, 6
² VII, 7
³ VII, 8 & 9
⁴ VII, 10
⁵ VII, 11
strength. I am the kama in creatures which is not contrary to dharma.” “Kama not contrary to dharma” means the desire for moksha, or the desire to end the suffering of creatures.

If we desire to end the suffering of others, our suffering, too, will end. This is true in the ordinary sense of the words. But in Sanskrit the desire to end the suffering of others is described as a mahaswartha. It means interest in the moksha of all creatures. Anyone who feels such a desire would be striving hard for his own moksha.

Know that all the manifestations of the three gunas, sattva, rajas, and tamas, proceed from none but Me; yet I am not in them; they are in Me.

We say that we should offer up everything to God, even evil. The two, good and evil, are inseparable, and so we should offer up both. If we wish to give up sin, we should give up virtue too. There is possessiveness in clinging even to virtue.

We say of the physical Rama that he both had and did not have a body. He had contradictory attributes, he was personal God and impersonal Brahman, he had attributes and was beyond attributes. For the evil, God is evil. He is in truth the very image of compassion, but He cannot violate His law and so we say that He destroys evil.

Befogged by these manifestations of the three gunas, the entire world fails to recognize Me, the imperishable, as transcending them.

Truly speaking, even those who are ruled by sattvik impulses may be said to be under their power because of their ignorance.

For this My divine delusive mystery made up of the three gunas is hard to pierce; but those who make Me their sole refuge pierce the veil.

It is said in the Bhagavat that in Kaliyuga anyone who constantly repeats Om namo Bhagavate Vasudevaya will cross this sea of becoming and reach the other shore. This is true of Ramanama, too.

The deluded evil-doers, lowest of men, do not seek refuge in Me; for, by reason of this delusive mystery, they are bereft of knowledge and given to devilish ways.

---

1 Literally, supreme self-interest
2 VII, 12
3 VII, 13
4 VII, 14
5 VII, 15
July 23, 1926

Four types of well-doers are devoted to Me, O Arjuna; they are, O Bharatarshabha, the afflicted, the spiritual seeker, the material seeker, and the enlightened.¹

My worshippers whose actions are ever the holiest fall into four classes, says Shri Krishna. They are: (1) those in distress, (2) those who yearn for jnana or seek moksha, (3) those who worship Me for worldly benefits, and (4) the jnanis who worship God as His servants and seek nothing from Him. They tell God that it was simply their duty, as His subjects, to worship Him, and that it made no difference to them whether or not He rewarded them.

Of these the enlightened, ever attached to Me in single-minded devotion, is the best; for to the enlightened I am exceedingly dear and he is dear to Me.²

Among them all, the jnani, who always lives in union with Me, yoked with Me, calls upon Me “tunhi, tunhi” ³ and lives as a bhakta, keeps repeating My name as if he was reciting a kalama from the Koran, is the best.

Mirabai was a great devotee of the Lord, but she belonged to the class of jnanis. “I am,” Shri Krishna says, “very dear to such jnanis and they to Me. We are thus like the lover and the beloved.”

All these are estimable indeed, but the enlightened I hold to be My very self; for he, the true yogi, is stayed on Me alone, the supreme goal.⁴

All these four classes are noble people, though maybe some of them believe in mantras and worship God through them. Is it not better that, instead of spending their time in sin, they should worship God?

Is not a man who begs before the king’s palace better than another who enters it to rob? The self-respect of a suffering man is fully preserved only if he approaches the king and no one else for help. There are people in the world who, when they suffer, seek succour not from God but from others. The Lord, therefore, is certainly pleased when people go to Him. “All these are certainly worthy men,” says Shri Krishna, “but of them all the jnani is My very soul,

¹ VII, 16
² VII, 17
³ “Thou, Thou”
⁴ VII, 18
Myself as it were. He who has yoked himself to Me has risen to the highest state."

At the end of many births the enlightened man finds refuge in Me; rare indeed is this great soul to whom ‘Vasudeva is all’.\(^1\)

After many lives, the \textit{jnani} seeks refuge in Me. “After many lives” means after a long and hard struggle. Such a person is always saying, not with his tongue merely but with his very heart, that this whole universe is a manifestation of Vasudeva.\(^2\) A mahatma of that greatness is very rare.

Men, bereft of knowledge by reason of various longings, seek refuge in other gods, pinning their faith on diverse rites, guided by their own nature.\(^3\)

Selfish men whose minds are clouded by all kinds of worldly desires and who seek the help of witch-doctors worship lower deities. Some, for instance, vow to make a gift of so much rice or so many coconuts to the Mother-goddess at Khodiar; they obey their nature and worship her in that manner.

We may say that Ladha Maharaj belonged to the class of men who are driven by suffering to worship God, but he may also have been a \textit{jnani}. We do not know his mental state.

\[115\]

\textit{July 24, 1926}

Whatever form one desires to worship in faith and devotion, in that very form I make that faith of his secure.\(^4\)

If they think that they of their own accord worship the gods whom they do, they are ignorant. They do not get their faith from those deities. What help can a mere courtier give to one who has direct access to the king? For instance, Sudama went straight to Shri Krishna, and then the courtiers’ attitude towards him changed. Such a person need not worship any other deity.

Possessed of that faith he seeks to propitiate that one, and obtains therethrough his longings, dispensed in truth by none but Me.\(^5\)

\(^1\) VII, 19
\(^2\) Vishnu
\(^3\) VII, 20
\(^4\) VII, 21
\(^5\) VII, 22
If there were many independent deities who could act on their own, there would be no God.

But limited is the fruit that falls to those short-sighted ones; those who worship the gods go to the gods, those who worship Me come unto Me.¹

Short-sighted worshippers of gods reap perishable fruits. Only one type of person wins deliverance. Those who worship the lower gods rise so far as the world of those gods. Those who worship Me come direct to Me.

Not knowing My transcendent, imperishable, supreme character, the undiscerning think Me who am unmanifest to have become manifest.²

“These persons of little intelligence do not know My unmanifest state,” says Shri Krishna. “They mistake the manifest universe for the invisible reality behind. They do not know the best part of Me at all (the part beyond the manifest), do not know Me as the changeless, supreme Purushottama.” If, for instance, we worship the Sun, who gives light and heat, we divide the divine power of God into its several aspects and worship one of them. Instead, we should try to know the highest, the invisible state of God. This visible universe is ever taking new shapes. The gods change their forms but God is ever the same.

July 25, 1926

Our intellect has not the power to tear up the veil from before the atman and set it free. One who has felt the desire to do this has no little intellectual power. So long as we have not reflected deeply over these matters, we imagine beings with as many as ten heads. Then someone may wake up and ask whether the atman can ever have heads. He would then remember his study [of the Gita], remember the verses in the Second Chapter and realize that the atman was unmanifest and could not be pierced or wetted. “Unthinking men,” Shri Krishna says, “wish to measure Me with their little yardsticks, they make an image of Me and act as if it was Myself.”

Veiled by the delusive mystery created by My unique power, I am not manifest to all; this bewildered world does not recognize Me, birthless and changeless.³
“I do not vouchsafe light to all. Everyone cannot know Me, for I am veiled by the \textit{maya} of My yoga.” If God had not created such \textit{maya}, we could not have existed in this visible universe. But, then, one may ask, why did God create this universe at all? To ask this question is like a clock asking why its maker made it. A creature must have complete faith in its creator. “The unthinking man enveloped in \textit{maya},” says Shri Krishna, “does not know Me, the Unborn and the Immutable.”

\textbf{July 27, 1926}

“I am not luminous to all, that is, everyone cannot see Me. Human beings are blinded by My light. Such is the power of My \textit{maya} that people can truthfully say that at this moment some lives are being born and some are dying.” But we should understand that these transformations are not real. Who can know that Reality which is veiled behind objects with name and form? If someone told us that in his country rivers get frozen and that human beings and vehicles pass over them, we would not easily understand his statement; this idea of Reality veiled behind these objects with name and form is similar to that. It is true, nonetheless. The Lord says that this is due to the power of His \textit{yogamaya}, that His real essence is the Unmanifest.

I know, O Arjuna, all creatures past, present and to be; but no one knows Me.

All creatures in this universe are bewildered, O Parantapa, by virtue of the delusion of the pairs of opposites sprung from likes and dislikes, O Bharata.

But those virtuous men whose sin has come to an end, freed from the delusion of the pairs of opposites, worship Me in steadfast faith.

Those who endeavour for freedom from age and death by taking refuge in Me, know in full that \textit{Brahman, adhyatma} and all karma.

Those who know Me, including \textit{adhibhuta, adhidaiva, adhiyajna}, possessed of even-mindedness, they know Me even at the time of passing away.\footnote{VII, 26, 27, 28, 29 & 30}

Those who think of Me, even at the moment of death, as \textit{adhibhuta, adhidaiva} and \textit{adhiyajna}, are men who have become steady. They who know Me as the Lord of all creatures, of the gods and of \textit{yajnas}, that is, as the Creator and Preserver of the whole

\footnote{VII, 26, 27, 28, 29 & 30} universe, and know that this world of flux has no effect on Me whatever, are men united to Me in yoga.”

[118]

Chapter VIII

July 28, 1926

In Chapter VII, Shri Krishna fulfilled his promise, explained both \textit{jnana} and \textit{vijnana} and assured Arjuna that once he had understood these he would never be touched by evil.

The \textit{apara prakriti}, the world of visible objects, can be perceived with the senses and known through the intellect, but the \textit{para prakriti} can be apprehended only when we go beyond the senses, the intellect and the ego. If we wish to know God’s transcendent essence, we should in some measure be what He is. We, too, have the two essences, \textit{apara} and \textit{para}, in us, of which we should subdue the \textit{apara} and acquire better knowledge of the \textit{para}.

The main question raised in Chapter I was, how can one kill one’s kinsmen? The answer to this extended to seven Chapters. And now begins the eighth. Shri Krishna is making all this effort with the aim of removing the confusion of thought and the ignorance which had unsettled Arjuna’s mind. He has been brought to the point of distinction between the \textit{apara} and the \textit{para prakriti}.

What is the \textit{Brahman}? What is \textit{adhyatma}? What karma, O Purushottama? What is called \textit{adhibhuta}? And what \textit{adhidaiva}?

And who here in this body is \textit{adhiyajna} and how? And how at the time of death art Thou to be known by the self-controlled?\footnote{VIII, 1 & 2}

Arjuna asks Shri Krishna, “You have told me about \textit{Brahman}, \textit{adhyatma}, karma, \textit{adhibhuta} and so on. But what do these terms mean? And what is \textit{adhiyajna}? What is meant by saying that he whose mind is yoked to the Lord can know all this at the moment of death?”

[119]

July 29, 1926

Shri Krishna answers Arjuna’s question.

The Supreme, the Imperishable is \textit{Brahman}; its manifestation is \textit{adhyatma}; the creative process whereby all beings are created is called \textit{karma}.\footnote{VIII, 3}
That which never perishes and is the ultimate Reality is Brahman. Our nature is adhyatma.

The Lord of us all is the power which creates this adhyatma. Creating all beings and keeping them in existence is an act of renunciation and is known as karma.

July 30, 1926

We cannot have personal relation with all beings in the world, but can have spiritual relation with them.

Anyone who feels no desire to do good to others harms not only himself but others too. If a woman expecting a baby does not protect, she may die and the baby, too, may die. To protect it is her karma, which is a form of renunciation. If such a woman is not regular in eating, if she thinks evil thoughts and eats unwholesome food, both she and the baby would be harmed. We are continually harming ourselves in this manner. Some of us may be inclined to ask how the world is concerned if we harm ourselves. But in harming ourselves, we harm both ourselves and the world.

Karma here certainly does not mean an act of creation. Vyasa’s writing of the Gita and the Mahabharata was a great visarga (an act of renunciation). It is impossible that the jewel of a work like the Gita would signify by the term karma the merely physical act of creation.

Adhibhuta is My perishable form; adhidaivata is the individual self in that form; and O best among the embodied, adhiyajna am I in this body, purified by sacrifice.¹

That is, Shri Krishna says that He is the Lord of yajnas and grants their fruit. The modes of being which belong to the living creatures in the world are perishable modes.

[120]

July 31, 1926

There is a saying in Latin which means that the way to Hell is paved with good intentions. Good intentions by themselves do not succeed, but the person doomed to Hell believes that they do, without his having to strive to realize them. We cannot give all that we with to, but we can receive everything we would. However much I try, if you do not receive what I give, what can I do? If all of you make a serious effort, you can stop wasting others’ time. If you but try to get up at four, you will most certainly not fail. What does it matter even if the effort breaks us? Moksha is for those who strive till they break.

¹ VIII, 4

Krishna is the Lord of yajna, and we worship Him because, though in human form, He worked all His life. He was awake every moment, awake even when the Pandavas slept. The latter’s eyes were always fixed on Him. He did not wish to harm the Kauravas or help the Pandavas; His only aim was to see that right prevailed. He spent his body working ceaselessly all His life, but it retained its light till the last. The word prayatna in just an ordinary word, but the thing itself is such that the moment you resolve on it you will begin to reap the fruit. Krishna had resolved that the Pandavas should win and, therefore, their victory was certain. He was the very embodiment of disinterested service, and wished to harm none. When Parashuram was lying with his head in Karna’s lap, the latter was bitten by some deadly creature and was bleeding profusely, but he did not move an inch. Surely, he too was a human being, like any of us. We should, similarly, make good resolutions and strive to realize them, offering up the fruit of our effort to Shri Krishna.

By describing Arjuna as the best among beings endowed with a body, Shri Krishna suggests that he need not fear anyone at all.

[122]

August 1, 1926

And he who, at the last hour remembering Me only, departs leaving the body, enters into Me; of that there is no doubt.

Or whatever form a man continually contemplates, that same he remembers in the hour of death, and to that very form he goes, O Kaunteya. Hence they say, you will reap as you sow.

We should let no impurity enter our thoughts. Parents give us the human form, sometimes a form like their own. The subtle changes which take place within us become visible through our eyes. If we get a disease, we should believe that we ourselves are the cause of it. A person whose mind is so strong that he influences his surroundings, instead of being influenced by them, gets no disease. It is for our good, therefore, to believe that our illness is the result of our sins. If we have been repeating Ramanama from the depth of our heart, how can even a dream, if it is evil, leap over that protecting wall and enter our mind? If any does, we may believe that we have been uttering Ramanama only with our lips. If we have any fear whatever in our heart, that too is a form of evil and we suffer from many serious diseases because of it. Hence, as we free ourselves more and more from evil impulses and desires, we become less and less subject to disease. Even persons whose ears and noses and all other limbs had been infected are known to have recovered. The body possesses a natural power of recovery. Recovery brought about with the help of herbs lasts for some time only; and the man who has overcome his evil desires and cultivated devotion to God will refuse to be cured with the help of herbs and say that, when the evil in him has disappeared, he will be all right. If, as a result of this attitude, he dies, he will welcome death.

Anyone who thinks wicked thoughts will find that in one day his body has become ugly. Once a person charged with murder came to me. I merely looked at him and told him that he was trying to deceive me. He left at once.

[123]

August 3, 1926

Thinking is a form of karma. Thoughts have such power that sometimes their effects are more terrible than those of actions. If someone finds a pistol placed in his hand by another person and is forced to fire it, he cannot be said to have committed violence because he had acted under force. But he who harbours violence in his thoughts and, keeping himself in the background, incites others to do violence, is guilty of terrible violence. Besides, there are also enemies within which prompt us to commit violence. Despite our effort to think the best thoughts and act upon them, we are driven to commit sin. It is the desire and anger in us which are responsible for this. All the same, our efforts at self-control and good thoughts help us. If the God of death himself puts a pistol in a person’s hands and forces him to commit violence, such violence will not harm him. He will ever have the name of Narayana on his lips and, when he dies, his end will be good. Ordinarily we do not see this happen, for our thoughts are those of miserable wretches. They ought ever to flow in a self-controlled stream. A person whose thoughts are of this kind repeats the name of Narayana while engaged in any work. His actions are not his, they are prompted by the Lord within.

Shri Krishna has packed in these two verses the essence of all philosophy: man will reap as he thinks.

Therefore at all times remember Me and fight on; thy mind and reason thus on Me fixed thou shalt surely come to me.

With thought steadied by constant practice, and wandering nowhere, he who meditates on the Supreme Celestial Being, O Partha, goes to Him.¹

No one should believe that it will suffice if he does this at the moment of death. He who has been striving in this direction from his childhood will win the battle and the other will lose. We boarded a ship at Delagoa Bay to see Gokhale off. The latter was playing billiards. I had not joined him. He thought I did not like his playing that game and asked me: “Do you think I enjoy playing this?” “No,” I said, “you are trying to prove the ability of our country-men.” In this way, even his playing was dedicated to Lord Krishna. I of course knew it. I am sure in my mind that my effort to learn dancing was also not prompted by love of dancing. At that time, my only thought was to acquire all the accomplishments which make a gentleman. The point is that everything we do should be dedicated to Shri Krishna. We can so dedicate only the work which comes to us unsought, not that which we undertake of our own choice. Though the inmates of the Ashram attend to different tasks, dedicating them to Shri Krishna, in reality all of them are doing the same work if there is complete harmony in their thoughts. If that is not so, and only one person is earnest about spinning and others let their minds wander, then they cannot be said to join the former in spinning.

[124]

August 4, 1926

Who so, at the time of death, with unwavering mind, with devotion, and fixing the breath rightly between the brows by the power of yoga, meditates on the Sage, the Ancient, the Ruler, subtler than the subtlest, the Supporter of all, the Inconceivable, glorious as the sun beyond the

¹ VIII, 7 & 8
darkness,—he goes to that Supreme Celestial Being.¹

He who knows all attains to that supreme, divine Purusha. At the moment of departing, that is, when dying, one should think on that Purusha Who is beginningless, Who rules the world and Who is in essence finer than the finest we can conceive.

In the sixth century B.C., there ruled in Lydia a king named Croesus². He had immense wealth. The Greek saint and law giver, Solon³ once went to see him. Croesus asked him whether anyone could be happier than he himself was. Solon’s reply was that only after a man has died can we say whether he had been happy. This same Croesus was afterwards attacked and defeated by King Cyrus of Persia. He was sentenced to be hanged. As he was being taken to the gallows, he shouted Solon’s name thrice. On being asked by Cyrus why he did that, he repeated Solon’s reply to his question. Cyrus freed him and kept him as his adviser. When the King died, he left his son in the care of Croesus. In much the same way, it is only after a man’s death that we can say whether he has passed into a higher world.

Proceeding, Shri Krishna describes that supreme Purusha, Who is the Creator of everything that exists, Whose essence cannot be comprehended by our minds, Whom only the yogis see in their contemplation, Who has the glory of the sun (shines like the sun, with the light of timeless consciousness) and Who is beyond the darkness of ignorance. Our reason cannot conceive how infinitely small and how infinitely vast He is. He who, when leaving this world, thinks with a fixed mind on this Purusha,—only his mind is fixed who has yoked himself to the Lord in bhakti and who possesses the strength acquired by long sadhana—thinks of Him with bhakti and with the power of his yoga, who refuses any treatment or medicine to save his life—keeps his mouth shut,—who knows that he is leaving for a world where there is no darkness and no suffering or happiness, and who focuses his prana on the point midway between his brows and meditates,—such a person attains to the realm of the Supreme, the Divine Purusha described in this verse.

¹ VIII, 9 & 10
² The last king of Lydia, 560-546 B.C.
³ c. 638-558 B.C.; Athenian statesman and poet. The story of their meeting is narrated by Herodotus, but is chronologically impossible.
That which the knowers of the Vedas call the Imperishable (or that word which the knowers of the Vedas repeat), wherein the escetics freed from passion enter and desiring which they practise brahmacharya, that Goal (or Word) I will declare to thee in brief.

Closing all the gates, locking up the mind in the hridaya, fixing his breath within the head, rapt in yogic meditation;

Who so departs leaving the body uttering AUM—Brahman in one syllable—repeatedly thinking on Me, he reaches the highest state.¹

While in the previous verse Shri Krishna referred to other states of mind, here He speaks only of meditation on the Lord.

That yogi easily wins to Me, O Partha, who, ever attached to Me, constantly remembers Me with undivided mind.

Great souls, having come to Me, reach the highest perfection; they come not again to birth, unlasting and (withal) an abode of misery.²

Why is it misery to be born over and over again?

A STUDENT: One may not be born a human being—in every life.

But what does it matter if one is born a monkey. We may enjoy our life dancing and jumping about all the time.

ANOTHER STUDENT: Can one be sure that, after one dies, in the next life, one will be born a Brahmin?

Should we not welcome that state in which there is no death? Are there any who like dying? Those who do, die again and again. He who does not want death gives up his attachment to bodily life, closes all the bodily doors without much thinking. If he forgets the body, mortifies it every moment, he will not have to die. It is because there is death for everyone who is born that life is a cause of suffering. The birds are ever happy, but then they have no knowledge and are not free. Would you like it, if someone changed all the boys into birds? That state in which there is no death and no birth, no disease, no attachment and no aversion, that supreme state is known as moksha.

¹ VIII, 11, 12 & 13
² VIII, 14 & 15
August 6, 1926

Even big mountains, sun and moon and stars, all things are transient. If our lives were as long as one crore years, perhaps we would not feel the transience of our existence. We are not conscious of the transience of the sun, but science tells us that it is not eternal. Both from a profound and from a superficial view, it is transient. Ramanama alone is imperishable. Life and death are both transitory states; not only are they so, they are the cause of all suffering.

Why? It is not because the Gita says so that we should regard them as the cause of suffering; we should feel in our own lives that they are so. The best way of ensuring that after death we pass to a higher world is to feel every moment that life in this world is from its very nature full of suffering, so that we give up attachment to it and free ourselves from the dualities of love and hatred.

We can understand even with our reason that life in this world is full of suffering. If we but think, we shall realize that the very process of birth of all creatures is something repulsive. This is what is meant by saying “I am sin”, “I have my source in sin”. This existence being enveloped in maya, we take pleasure every moment in what should repel us. We have no sense through which we can feel in all its intensity this pain [which the process of birth means]. Even our state after birth is, from the beginning to the end, one long imprisonment. We love fondling a child, because it smiles and laughs with pleasure. But, then, prisoners also laugh. We take pleasure in this slavery because it is a part of our existence, but in truth it is a state in which we can not rest in peace even for a moment. Look at the physical frame of this body. It excretes dirt through countless pores, such dirt as we cannot bear touching. If only we reflect, we shall find nothing to attract us in this body. But, then, even this prison is a house through which we can win our freedom. If we come to regard it in that light, we shall make the minimum necessary use of it. The way to freedom, of course, does not lie in committing suicide. Anyone who kills himself will certainly be born again. He will yearn all the more to return to life. The ideal of self-control had its origin in the knowledge of the manner in which life comes into existence and of other facts of our physical life. This body is not to be pampered, but to be mortified and subjugated. If it sees that it does not get what it craves, it will on its own leave us in terror. If, Shri Krishna says, people realize the misery of this existence, the state to which He will raise them will be a little better than their present one. That supreme state is not to be conceived as one in which the higher bliss which we experience in this life will also vanish. On the contrary, we shall have it thousand fold in that other state. With this thought constantly in one’s mind, one should get absorbed in the duties of this life, forget oneself altogether in them. One should see oneself in the whole world and the world in oneself, and act towards others accordingly. The ideal of non-violence also had its origin in this realization that, when human life as such is full of suffering, we should cause suffering to none.

From the world of Brahma down, all the worlds are subject to return, O Arjuna; but on coming to Me there is no rebirth.\(^1\)

All the worlds, including the world of Brahma \(^2\) will return to their source. The sun, the moon, Brahma, Vishnu, all will perish. “But,” Shri Krishna says, “once a human being comes to Me, he never perishes.”

This is what I have tried to explain in my talk today.

[127]

August 7, 1926

There is great poetry in this verse. This little drop contains knowledge as vast as the sea, and the more that knowledge becomes part of our experience the more we discover its poetry. In such a verse, the poet soars on the wings of his imagination, released from the bondage of the body and the senses. His imagination works on what he has heard with his ears and seen with his eyes and, going beyond the certainties of reason, he says that all that is known through the senses is a product of the human mind; that is, he imagines that since we ourselves perish, this whole universe will perish too. All that the human mind can imagine or conceive is perishable, is subject to ceaseless change. He who has dedicated himself to truth will not be prepared to forsake it merely because the world does not agree with him, as if his truth depended on the world and he was acting in a play. Shri Krishna, therefore, the Prince of Yogis that He is, says here that we believe there is happiness in the world of Brahma but that there is

\(^1\) VIII, 16

\(^2\) One of several heavens, distinct from the absolute, impersonal Brahma no happiness even there.

He asks Arjuna to go to the world beyond all these worlds, the world in which He Himself dwells. This is simply beyond our imagination. But what is beyond our imagination does exist, nevertheless. If a person dies striving to reach that world, there is no rebirth for him.

Those men indeed know what is Day and what is Night, who know that Brahma’s day lasts a thousand yugas and that his night too is a thousand yugas long.¹

[128]

August 8, 1926

A day and a night of ours are made up of 24 hours. They say that anyone who focuses his eyes on the tip of his nose and meditates will find bliss, but it is necessary to go beyond this. In order to become a jnani one must learn to look deep into things. Anyone who practises this method but goes beyond it will study his self and draw far-reaching conclusions, will realize that things are not what they seem. We do not, thus, require a Gita to tell us that Brahma must have a day different in length from ours; we can see this ourselves if we use our brains. It seems to us an absolute certainty that the Sun will always be there. He will be a jnani who understands the nature of time from a study of one object existing in time. Such a person will take into account all the factors, which ordinary men and women fail to do. The latter would generally reason that, since no one practises control of the senses, it is impossible to practise and ought not to be attempted; if we reason thus, we shall invite ruin upon ourselves. This is fallacious reasoning.

If we want to know what is a day and what a night, we should have a standard of measurement. How can we measure infinite time? A day as long as a thousand yugas and a night of equal length! We should know that there is a day and night of such length in order that we may learn patience, and that, if the result of our effort takes time to show itself; we may not give way to despair. We may have faith in the spinning-wheel, but what progress can we expect from devoted work of only four or five years? We may see no tangible result in our own life-time. Nonetheless, we should have faith and go on working. Having devoted ourselves to this work, we should not give way to des-

¹ VIII, 17
² The Creator in the Hindu Trinity pair, nor be proud of ourselves. Let us remember that a thousand yugas make one day, and out of a thousand Parvatis one succeeds. There were a great many Parvatis and Shambhus who failed, before one Parvati and one Shambhu succeeded. We should know that this is how the power of tapas works.

At the coming of Day all the manifest spring forth from the Unmanifest, and at the coming of Night they are dissolved into that same Unmanifest.¹

When Brahma’s day² begins, the Unmanifest becomes manifest. All these creatures, which had vanished into nothingness, come to life again. When his night begins, the whole creation vanishes, that is, merges into the Unmanifest. In this way, all creation appears and vanishes, and does so endlessly. We have no reason to believe that the universe is fixed and motionless; in fact it is revolving, with a speed a thousand times greater than that of a spindle. The Earth will return into nothingness, will perish, but there will certainly be some who will survive that final destruction.

This same multitude of creatures come to birth, O Partha, again and again; they are dissolved at the coming of Night, whether they will or not; and at the break of Day they are re-born.³

When the night comes, whether we wish it or not, the universe returns into nothingness, and when the day comes a new creation appears.

How long shall we remain caught in this endless cycle? To reassure us on this, Shri Krishna says:

But higher than that Unmanifest is another Unmanifest Being, everlasting, which perisheth not when all creatures perish.⁴

There is another Unmanifest Reality beyon this Unmanifest⁵ and it is immutable; it is the immutable Reality immanent in all perishable creatures. Everything which exists will perish, but the ground of all this existence is imperishable. Thus, we go a good deal further than the tip of our nose.

¹ VIII, 18
² A day and a night of Brahma consist of 8,640,000,000 years or 2,000 mahayugas.
³ VIII, 19
⁴ VIII, 20
⁵ The source to which the visible universe returns at the end of the cycle; vide verse 18 above.
This Unmanifest, named the Imperishable, is declared to be the highest goal. For those who reach it there is no return. That is My highest abode.¹

Shri Krishna says: “You can come to Me by patient striving and living in this world only as a witness. Have faith and, devoting yourself to duty, work out the welfare of your soul.” The substance of all this is that the supreme Brahma never perishes, everything else does.

[129]

August 10, 1926

The form in which the timeless essence which is God manifests itself is known as His incarnation. We can know that essence in every creature. The principle of oneness does not mean that all of us should become beasts; it means, on the contrary, that God is present in the heart of even the most wicked of creatures, and that the latter awakes to His presence when the time comes. Ramachandra’s picture as a child is a product of the poet’s imagination, but we may believe it as true, knowing that higher consciousness is present even at that age. If a little child is a jnani and still behaves as we know children do, we should say, “The Brahma sports before the Brahma.”² Such a child would be a visible form of the Brahma, in the same sense that Parvati was the embodiment of tapascharya and Krishna of yoga, of the Brahma.

[130]

August 11, 1926

This Supreme Being, O Partha, may be won by undivided devotion; in It all beings dwell, by It all is pervaded.³

“That supreme state, to be attained in yogic contemplation, is beyond my reach”: so sang Raychandbhai.

Now I will tell thee, Bharatarshabha, the conditions which determine the exemption from return, as also the return, of yogis after they pass away hence.⁴

“I shall now describe that state” (the word may also mean time) “after reaching which, or that path after treading which, there is no returning.”

¹ VIII, 21
² The line is from a poem by Narasinh Mehta
³ VIII, 22
⁴ VIII, 23
Fire, Light, Day, the Bright Fortnight, the six months of the Northern Solstice—through these departing men knowing Brahman go to Brahman.\(^1\)

It is often said that this and the next verse do not fit into the teaching of the Gita, but we will treat them as if they did.

The Gita did not drop down from heaven, nor is it as if every work that Krishna said to Arjuna was written down. Vyasa has given what the Lord said to a seeker and, in doing so, he would include even things which he himself did not understand from his own experience. It may have been a general belief in those times which made people particular that they did important things at particular hours of the day only, or welcomed death during a certain part of the day. The favourites of a king can approach him only at a fixed hour, and no one else can go to him at that time. Similarly, it may have been the prevalent belief in those days that only people who died in an auspicious hour would reach God; this, of course, did not mean that those who died in some other hour had not aspired and striven in their lives to reach God after death.

Those who die when there is fire and light, on any day in the bright half of one of the six months following the winter solstice, will reach the Brahman. This statement may be intended to have either a literal or an allegorical meaning. If the latter, it means, that anyone who has attained a state like the bright half of the month, a state of knowledge as bright as light, will not return to this world after death. On the other hand:

Smoke, Night, the Dark Fortnight, the six months of the Southern Solstice—through the yogi attains to the lunar light and thence returns.\(^2\)

Such a person lives in heaven and, when the merit earned by his virtuous deeds is exhausted, he returns to the earth.

We may, therefore, take either of the two meanings. Anyone who has not attained to full illumination will have to return to this earth; in other words, he who spends his life in disinterested work and prays daily to the Lord with love and devotion will not have to return, for he will have cut asunder the bonds of karma. Anyone who departs after a life of disinterested bhakti will not have to return.

\(^1\) VIII, 24
\(^2\) VIII, 25
August 12, 1926

Some persons treat these two verses as interpolated; we cannot do so, for the copies of the Gita which we use contain them. If the meaning of any verse contradicts the very meaning of the Gita, we may reject that verse, otherwise we should try to reconcile it with the rest of the teaching, as we did yesterday. Kala [in these verses] means state, condition. We do not know whether, in the age when the Gita was composed, the North and the South Poles were discovered. For those who live in the region of the North Pole, the day and the night are as long as our six months. The period following the winter solstice is a time of light and signifies a waking state, whereas the period following the summer solstice signifies a state of ignorance. We have compared the latter state with the state full of desire and the former with that which is free from desire.

The Lord, Shri Krishna, now proceeds:

These two paths—bright and dark—are deemed to be the eternal paths of the world; by the one a man goes to return not, by the other he returns again.¹

These two paths, the bright and the dark, that which leads to a state from which there is no returning and the other which leads to a state which is impermanent, have existed from the beginning of time. The bright state is that of the illumination of knowledge and the dark state is that of ignorance. Dying in one state, a person never returns; dying in the other, he is bound to return.

The yogi knowing these two paths falls not into delusion, O Partha; therefore, at all times, O Arjuna, remain steadfast in yoga.²

The yogi who knows the distinction between these two paths never succumbs to darkness. He realizes that disinterested bhakti is the best form of bhakti. If we have faith in the Lord and bhakti for Him, why should we forever be begging things from Him? Anyone who is filled with faith and love will feel that there is nothing for him to beg. He will have offered everything to the Lord, placed himself at His mercy. He may say: “All that is mine is yours.” Such single-minded bhakti is uttarayana³, it is light, and so on. What, again, is the

¹ VIII, 26
² VIII, 27
³ Northward course of the sun significance of Krishna’s advice to remain yoked to Him at all times? It means that one should cling to knowledge and single-minded devotion. The gods are immortal, but only compared to human beings. They, too, will perish in time. “Therefore,” says Shri Krishna, “instead of going to the gods who will perish, if you come to Me, then alone will you get knowledge and in no other way.” Arjuna should, Shri Krishna says, keep the knot in his heart, the little grains of dust which cover the knowledge within, so thoroughly cleaned that at the moment of death he will spontaneously have the right thoughts.

Whatever fruit of good deeds is laid down as accruing from (a study of) the Vedas, from sacrifices, austerities, and acts of charity—all that the yogi transcends, on knowing this, and reaches the Supreme and Primal Abode.¹

We saw in the verse beginning with yavanarthu udapane² that he who has acquired this light and knowledge is in the condition of one who has secured that beyond which nothing else remains to be obtained.

[132]
Chapter IX
August 13, 1926

I will now declare to thee, who art uncensorious, this mysterious knowledge, together with discriminative knowledge, knowing which thou shalt be released from ill.

This is the king of sciences, the king of mysteries, pure and sovereign, capable of direct comprehension, the essence of dharma, easy to practise, changeless.³

There was a man who, whenever he got very angry, sat down to do sums in algebra; anyone else who tried to do this, when he ought to be repeating Ramanama, would find the effort a burden-some task. If someone is dying and cries for help, it would be unfeeling arrogance to tell him that you were busy doing sums in algebra, for it would be moment when the Shastras could well be thrown into the sea. Doing a sum in algebra is not in itself a duty, but the aim behind it may be a duty. Through it, I may know who and where I am. Doing a sum is not by itself a duty, the first duty is service. For instance, eating is never a duty in itself. He is a true man who leaves the dinner table and runs to do an act of service.

¹ VIII, 28
² II, 46
³ IX, 1 & 2
The knowledge of this duty is rajavidya. It is the king of all secrets, it is sacred and the highest knowledge, it is dharma and worthy to be followed in action, and easy to follow besides; once acquired, it is never destroyed. “I will impart that knowledge to you,” says Shri Krishna.

[133]

August 14, 1926

Men who have no faith in this doctrine, O Parantapa, far from coming to Me, return repeatedly to the path of this world of death.

By Me, unmanifest in form, this whole world is pervaded; all beings are in Me, I am not in them.¹

So long as our eyes of knowledge have not opened, we have no choice but to see with the eyes of faith.

And yet those beings are not in Me. That indeed is My unique power as Lord! Sustainer of all beings, I am not in them; My Self brings them into existence.

As the mighty wind, moving everywhere, is ever contained in ether, even so know that all beings are contained in Me.²

Air fills space, but space is not identical with air. We can say that air fills space. Though space is empty, we can say that it is filled with air. And yet space is not air. The air which fills space is still not in it, so God who dwells in all creatures is still not in them. In one sense, He is not in them, for we can see other things with our eyes but not Him.

He who has faith and he who lacks it, both are sincere in their beliefs. God exists for him who has faith, but does not exist for him who lacks it.

A Shastri will be able to explain the point of these two verses.

The Ganga water does, and yet does not, contain dirt. Similarly, even the most wicked of beings exists in God. The cruelest of men, even a Chandal, exists in Him, and yet does not. God is above good and bad. Vyasa puts these contradictory statements together, for our reason knows its limitation in trying to describe the truth. It is enough if we understand that God pervades the entire universe.

¹ IX, 3 & 4
² IX, 5 & 6
August 15, 1926

Innumerable ways of falling are open to a man, he need not make any effort for the purpose; it is for rising that one has to strive. We may revere and always keep in a proper place a holy book which we believe helps us on the path of good; but anyone who goes no further than showing it outward reverence will find such reverence a means of bondage. There should, therefore, be discrimination even in reverence; only so will that reverence help us to advance. Outward reverence for a holy book is not all. We should go further than that. We should try to follow the teaching of the book in our life. God is omnipotent and we are His creatures. When, however, we, who are mere ants in His sight try to eat Him up, He uses a part of His infinite power. He is so near that we feel we can touch Him this very moment, and yet we never do, so far away He is. As space and air exist one in the other, so do God and the universe. He who has faith certainly exists in God; he who lacks it does not. God does not force Himself on anyone, but He does not close the door, either, against anyone who aspires to be united to Him—such is His nature.

All beings, O Kaunteya, merge into my prakriti, at the end of a kalpa, and I send them forth again when a kalpa begins. The holy books speak of such rise and disappearance of the worlds.

The individual soul, of course, passes through birth and death. But the universe, too, comes into existence and disappears. If the soul, therefore, wishes to know its essence, it will have to transcend the universe. We know for certain that this lamp will one day be destroyed, and yet it is the only thing we can use; it is essential, therefore, that we take care to keep it clean. This Ashram has build-ings, which are its body, so to say. They will be destroyed one day. But the Ashram’s soul, which is its ideals, will never perish. To realize that imperishable essence, we may even need to put up buildings of brick and mortar. In this way, we must use our reason and discrimination and keep working. If we wish to live in this world, we must put to use even things which will perish, but only with the aim of realizing the imperishable essence beyond them.

1 The notes of this discourse were taken by Punjabhai.
2 IX, 7
Resorting to my prakriti, I send forth again and again this multitude of beings, powerless under the sway of prakriti.¹

[135]

August 17, 1926

But all this activity, O Dhananjaya, does not bind Me, seated as one indifferent, unattached to it.²

God acts according to His prakriti, and yet He does nothing since He is above even His prakriti.

If a king does sinful things, his subjects too suffer. But God, being omniscient, can do nothing without thought. Sin means only what is done without taking thought. How can a person who thinks before acting commit a sin? Likewise, how can one who is by nature inclined to sin act virtuously? If one does good spontaneously, in the same way that our eyes wink automatically, one will not have to suffer the fruits of such good actions. It is man’s nature to do good, for all selves are one. That being so, the apparent separateness of each self has no significance. When this is realized, man’s ego melts away. Man’s essence, which is atman, is all-pervading, for he who has realized it will not see himself as different from others, but will see all in himself. For such a person, therefore, doing good becomes his nature. When he seems to be serving other creatures, he is doing so not out of kindness to them but is merely following his own nature. To us who are enveloped in maya, it may seem that he is practising virtue, but in truth it is not so; he is acting only according to his nature towards all creatures.

[136]

August 18, 1926

With me as Presiding Witness, prakriti gives birth to all that moves and does not move; and because of this, O Kaunteya, the wheel of the world keeps going.

Not knowing My transcendent nature as the sovereign Lord of all beings, fools condemn Me incarnated as man.³

“Creatures sunk in darkness, dwelling in the human body, do not know Me,” says Shri Krishna, “they disregard Me”(Has not

¹ IX, 8
² IX, 9
³ IX, 10 & 11
Tulsidas said that those who make a distinction between Rama and God are ignorant and know nothing? We project our ignorance on to God too.) “They do not know My supreme state, do not know Me as the Lord of all creatures. Labouring under the illusion that I am a human being, they do not know My real essence.”

[137]

August 19, 1926

Vain are the hopes, actions and knowledge of those witless ones who have resorted to the delusive nature of monsters and devils.

But those great souls who resort to the divine nature. O Partha, know Me as the Imperishable Source of all beings and worship Me with an undivided mind.¹

The mahatmas, who are ruled by their divine prakriti, like Vibhishana² and others, worship Me with their minds illumined by knowledge and with single-minded devotion—Me who am the Creator of all beings.

Always declaring My glory, striving in steadfast faith, they do Me devout homage; ever attached to Me, they worship Me.

Yet others, with knowledge-sacrifice, worship Me, who am to be seen everywhere, as one, as different or as many.³

“Others worship Me by striving for knowledge. Some of them worship Me as the only One (that is, believing that all this is Vasudeva), some others worship My different manifestations and others still worship Me in everything which exists.

We may take vishvatomukham to go with mam, and understand the line to mean that “they worship Me who am the same in all or dwell in all”; or we may interpret ekatvena to mean “with devotion” and prithaktvena to mean that “they look upon Me as the Lord and themselves as My devotees and worship Me in that spirit”. Or, ekatvena may mean “worshipping Me as Impersonal Absolute” and prithaktvena may mean “worshipping Me as personal God”. In any case, vishvatomukham taken as an independent, third term, yields no sense.

¹ IX, 12 & 13
² In the Ramayana; he tried to persuade his brother, Ravana, to restore Sita to Rama. Failing in this effort, he went over to Rama and was accepted by him.
³ IX, 14 & 15

260 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
August 20, 1926

I am the sacrificial vow; I am the sacrifice; I the ancestral oblation; I the herb; I the sacred text; I the clarified butter; I the fire; I the burnt offering.

Of this universe I am Father, Mother, Creator, Grandsire; I am what is to be known, the sacred syllable AUM; the Rig, the Sama and the Yajur; I am the Goal, the Sustainer, the Lord, the Witness, the Abode, the Refuge, the Freiend; the Origin, the End, the Preservation, the Treasurehouse, the Imperishable Seed.¹

I am gati which means moksha—the state which human beings strive to attain. I am the sustainer, the Lord, and the witness. I am the abode, and the shelter. I am suhrid which means a kind friend who serves me without expectation of reward.

I give heat; I hold back and pour forth rain; I am deathlessness and also death, O Arjuna, Being and not-Being as well.²

I give heat, but in the form of the sun which gives happiness and the light of knowledge to all creatures. I draw the rains and release them. I am death and I am immortality; I am being and also non-being.

That is, every object and every state which we can think of in this universe are God. This means that God is not merely all that is good, He is also the evil. Nothing exists unless He wills it. It is not true that God is the Lord of light and Satan of darkness. While we live in this body, we may believe in these dualities. We should engrave Tulsidasji’s words in our hearts, that while we are enveloped in maya all this, which is false, will seem as true. The nacre will appear as silver and the sun’s rays will appear as the mirage. We shall continue to think in this way till a jnani opens our eyes and convinces us that the appearance of the rope as the serpent, of the nacre as silver and of the sun’s rays as mirage, is but the work of our imagination. We believe that God is both good and evil and, believing that, some of us ask what harm there is in following evil. But it is quite wrong if we argue thus. The point is not that we should act like scorpions or centipedes, but that we should have goodwill for them, without ourselves becoming poisonous like them. The Lord has here stated a profound truth which is beyond the capacity of our reason to comprehend. What He has stated cannot possibly be true in this world. We can only imagine that it must be true in some sense. Being and non-being, virtue and sin, immortality and death, these are contradictory things. They cannot be true for human beings, they can be so only for God. That third state [in which contraries are reconciled] is not a mere mixture of the two. Hydrogen and oxygen together yield water, but water does not display the separate properties of either; it has characteristics of its own. Similarly, we must not imagine that God has in Him the qualities of both virtue and sin, but should think that He has something else which is different from either. If we had both virtue and sin in us, there would be an explosion, but Siva swallows both. The existence of the two in God is a miracle, and He alone knows its mystery. We should make no attempt to cultivate such a state. If we try to combine the two in us, such an attempt to imitate God will simply destroy us.

¹ IX, 16, 17 & 18
² IX, 19

Followers of the three Vedas, who drink the soma juice and are purged of sin, worship Me with sacrifice and pray for going to heaven; they reach the holy world of the gods and enjoy in heaven the divine joys of the gods.¹

Those who perform the rituals enjoined in the three Vedas, who drink somarasa (in the region of the North Pole somarasa was food and it would be a crime to refuse it to anyone, for if given to a dying man it saved life), who wash away their sins and worship the Lord by performing sacrifices, pray that they should go to heaven. They go to the sacred realm of Indra and there enjoy divine pleasure such as gods do.

[139]
August 22, 1926

They enjoy the vast world of heaven, and their merit spent, they enter the world of the mortals; thus those who, following the Vedic law, long for the fruit of their action earn but the round of birth and death.

As for those who worship Me, thinking on Me alone and nothing else, ever attached to Me, I bear the burden of getting them what they need.²

Yoga means realization of God and kshema means safeguarding of the means which help us to attain it.

Even those who, devoted to other gods, worship them in full faith, even they, O Kaunteya, worship none but Me, though not according to the rule.³

¹ IX, 20
² IX, 21 & 22
³ IX, 23
The right method is to have no intermediary between oneself and God. “But,” Shri Krishna says, “those who seek Me through the gate-keepers that stand between, they too worship Me, for they worship these in order to reach Me.”

For I am the Acceptor and the Director of all sacrifices; but not recognizing Me as I am, they go astray.

“I am,” says the Lord “the recipient and the Lord of all yajnas.” That is, he who does everything without thinking that he himself does it can say that not he but the Lord does everything. “Those, however, who do not know the truth and, therefore, do not know Me, return again to the world.”

The sinful man, so long as he is conscious of his ego, describes himself as the most wicked of men. Tulsidas says, on the one hand, that there could be none as lustful, lecherous, degraded and adulterous as he was and, on the other hand, attributes all his sins to God, for, since he had no ego in him, how could he have committed those sins? The river Ganga washes away all kinds of sins, but she receives no stain. Likewise, the timeless body in Rama is sinless. The physical Rama, of course, is subject to sin. If we prevent this idea and start committing sins and then say that sins cannot touch us, we shall be like the frog in the fable who tried to blow his body into the size of an ox and so burst. A bhakta will say: “I am a sinful man, but I am in your hands.” Beyond this, our reason does not work. “Do not describe man as God; he is not God, but he is not different from the light of God.”

[140]

August 24, 1926

Those who worship the gods go to the gods; those who worship the manes go to the manes; those who worship the spirits go to the spirits; but those who worship Me come to Me.

Any offering of leaf, flower, fruit or water, made to Me in devotion, by an earnest soul, I lovingly accept.

The Lord did not accept the fruit sent by Duryodhana, for he had not sent it with love. His motive was to get his own aim served through Shri Krishna. He wanted the Lord’s help on his own terms. He had not mastered the self. But Vidura, who was a man of simple heart, offered a plain dish of leafy greens and the Lord accepted it.

1 IX, 24
2 IX, 25 & 26
with love, for Vidura’s bhakti was unrivalled and his heart was straightforward and clean. He felt no awe for the wealth of the mighty.

Whatever thou dost, whatever thou eastest, whatever thou offerest as sacrifice or gift, whatever austerity thou dost perform, O Kaunteya, dedicate all to Me.

So doing thou shalt be released from the bondage of action yielding good and evil fruit; having accomplished both renunciation and performance, thou shalt be released (from birth and death) and come unto Me.¹

“If you live thus, you will be free from the bonds of karma which are sometimes good and sometimes evil in their fruit, for I shall be the recipient of all that you enjoy.” He who has purified himself through sannyassayoga—who dedicates to the Lord all that he does, who keeps on doing useful work right till the end of his life, but in a spirit of dedication to the Lord,—such a one goes to Him after death.

I am the same to all beings; with Me there is none disfavoured, none favoured; but those who worship Me with devotion are in Me and I in them.²

If we seek refuge in the Lord, He will give us all that we can wish. If we go to the Ganga, we can have the Ganga water, but we shall have only as much as fills our cupped palm if that is all we seek. The Lord provides a grain for the ant and a cart-load for the elephant.

[141]

August 25, 1926

A sinner, however great, if he turns to Me with undivided devotion, must indeed be counted a saint; for he has settled resolve.³

A man like Ajamila may have resolved to purify himself of the evil in him, and he may sit down in a firm posture for yoga; maybe his thoughts do not leave him, but he is none the less a sadhu who keeps repeating Om and is firm in his resolution. But another person who is not firm in his mind and not regular in practice, who follows no method in his work, may be a good man and still he does not deserve to be called a sadhu.

For soon he becomes righteous and wins everlasting peace; know for a certain, O Kaunteya, that My bhakta never perishes.⁴

Such a person soon becomes a holy man, and attains inviolable

¹ IX, 27 & 28
² IX, 29
³ IX, 30
⁴ IX, 31
peace of mind. We should not, therefore, regard even the most wicked of men as wicked. He can become good in this very life. Shri Krishna says: “Be certain, O Arjuna, that no bhakta of mine ever perishes.”

This body perishes, but he dies after becoming a good man rather than a wicked one.

For finding refuge in Me, even those who though are born of the womb of sin, women, Vaisyas, and Sudras too, reach the supreme goal.\(^1\)

“Anyone who surrenders himself or herself to Me,” assures the Lord, “whether man or woman, Vaisya or Sudra, or one born among wicked people—in a family of the most wicked Chandals—even then such a person will attain the supreme state.”

The Lord has given a great assurance to the world in these verses. This is His reply to those learned in the Vedas. Such persons argue that those who have not studied the Vedas cannot realize God. It was believed in those days that women, Vaisyas and Sudras cannot attain moksha. In fact, Krishna tended cows as a boy in Nanda’s family and did the work of a Sudra. The Vaisya’s function was rearing cows and agriculture. But in course of time those who were engaged in agriculture came to be regarded as Sudras. Shri Krishna says here that, even if Vaisyas and Sudras are not able to study the Vedas, they can certainly attain the blessed state. Anyone who, though ignorant of the Vedas, knows the Brahman, and has a pure heart is certain to attain this state.

How much more then, the pure Brahmins and seer-kings who are my devotees? Do thou worship Me, therefore, since thou hast come to this fleeting and joyless world.

On Me fix thy mind, to Me bring thy devotion, to Me offer thy sacrifice, to Me make thy obeisance; thus having attached thyself to Me and made Me thy end and aim, to Me indeed shalt thou come.\(^2\)

“Forget yourself in Me,” says Shri Krishna, “meditate constantly on Me, let your atman be in ceaseless communion with Me, and live with your heart ever united with Me; if you live thus, I shall draw you towards Me.”

“You need only allow yourself to be drawn, and shall not resist. You may not draw Me, but I can draw you. You will be able to understand this riddle, no one else will.”

---

\(^1\) IX, 32

\(^2\) IX, 33 & 34
This chapter has also been named Rajavidya\(^1\) and Rajaguhya-yoga\(^2\). Shri Krishna tells Arjuna that He has explained the highest knowledge and expounded the highest mystery—the meaning of yoga and kshema. The union of yoga is to be achieved with the Lord; one should not aspire to earn great riches or rise to a position of honour or win an empire in this world. All that is needed is a fixed determination to realize God. What is the good of any pleasure we can get through the senses—the eyes, the nose, the ears and so on? We should not be allured by it, for such pleasure is short-lived. There were emperors, but they have passed away. He whom we seek dwells in our hearts, and the holy temple in which He sits opens only by the means of prayer. The Lord explained this by saying manmana bhava madhakto madyaji\(^3\). “I am,” He says, “the author and sustainer of all, I am the friend, I am the source, the cause of existence and of the final destruction—I am all this. There is nothing else. I am all that there is. You are of no consequence. The other gods in the worlds in between will also perish, like you. I alone never perish. If you wish that you should not perish, you should come to My world, and that you can do by surrendering your whole mind to Me. Whether you are engaged in bathing or washing or any other like activities, if you are repeating my name the while and if you dedicate to Me all that you eat, if you worship Me as you give your body its hire, you will surely come to Me.”

[142]

Chapter X

August 26, 1926

Yet once more, O Mahabahu, hear My supreme word, which I will utter to thee, gratified one, for thy benefit.

Neither the gods nor the great seers know My origin; for I am, every way, the origin of them both.

He who knows Me, the great Lord of the worlds, as birthless and without beginning, he among mortals, undeluded, is released from sins.\(^4\)

Those who know Me as the Unborn, the Beginningless and the Supreme Lord of all creatures do not sink into the darkness of

---

1. The sovereign science
2. The yoga of sovereign mystery
3. In IX, 34
4. X, 1, 2 & 3
ignorance. A person who has sunk in darkness knows the night as day and the day as night. Among all these creatures who are bound to perish, the jnani becomes free from all sins, for he will have no vestige of aversion and attachment, no trace of egotism; he will remain unaffected by the pairs of opposites, will ever be humble and believe that it is the Lord who provides for his living.

Discernment, knowledge, freedom from delusion, long suffering, truth, self-restraint, inward calm, pleasure, pain, birth, death, fear and fearlessness;¹

Non-violence, even-mindedness, contentment, austerity, beneficence, good and ill fame,—all these various attributes of creatures proceed verily from Me.²

All the qualities mentioned in these two verses, intellect, knowledge, the absence of ignorant attachment, forgiveness, truthfulness, control of the senses, serenity, happiness and suffering, birth and death, fear and absence of fear, ahimsa, inward poise and contentment, tapas, making gifts, good name or evil reputation among men—the-conditions exist in all creatures and I am the cause of each one of them.

The Creator of all beings is also the cause of all the good and evil which we see in these beings.

[143]³

August 27, 1926

The seven great seers, the ancient four, and the Manus too were born of Me and of My mind, and of them were born all the creatures in the world.

He who knows in truth this My immanence and My yoga becomes gifted with unshakable yoga; of this there is no doubt.⁴

Everything which exists is created by the Lord. He who believes, not merely with his reason but with his heart, that no creature can live or act without His permission or except as He wills, yokes himself to Him in single-minded devotion, but he who forgets the Lord and believes in his pride that he rises by his own efforts labours under a delusion. There is no doubt at all that he who believes in God from the depth of his heart and obeys the Lord who dwells in him attains to a state of serenity which is never perturbed.

¹ X, 4
² X, 5
³ The notes of this discourse were not taken by Mahadev Desai.
⁴ X, 6 & 7
I am the source of all, all proceeds from Me; knowing this, the wise worship Me with hearts full of devotion.

With Me in their thoughts, their whole soul devoted to Me, teaching one another, with Me ever on their lips, they live in contentment and joy.

To these, ever in tune with Me worshipping Me with affectionate devotion, I give the power of selfless action, whereby they come to Me.

In this way, knowledge comes spontaneously to a bhakta. He does not have to wade through big volumes. But he who believes that he will acquire knowledge first and cultivate bhakti afterwards will fail miserably in his aim. No one can acquire knowledge in that way. Such knowledge breeds, if anything, pride. But he who lovingly cultivates devotion for the Lord and constantly thinks on Him gets knowledge without any special effort to that end.

Out of every compassion for them, I Who dwell in their hearts, destroy the darkness, born of ignorance, with the refulgent lamp of knowledge.

[144]

August 28, 1926

Lord! Thou art the supreme Brahman, the supreme Abode, the supreme Purifer! Everlasting Celestial Being, the Primal God, Unborn, All-pervading.

Thus have all the seers—the divine seer Narada, Asita, Devala, Vyasa—declared Thee; and Thou Thyself dost tell me so.

All that Thou tellest me is true, I know, O Keshava, verily, Lord, neither the gods nor the demons know Thy manifestation.

Thyself alone Thou knowest by Thyself, O Purushottama, O Source and Lord of all beings, God of gods, O Ruler of the universe!

Indeed Thou oughtest to tell me of all Thy manifestations, without a remainder, whereby Thou dost pervade these worlds.

O Yogi! constantly meditating on Thee, how am I to know Thee? In what various aspects am I to think of Thee, O Lord?

Recount to me yet again, in full detail, Thy unique power and Thy immanence, O Janardana! For my ears cannot be sated with listening to Thy life-giving words.

One who does engraving work every day does not tire of it. He returns to it whenever he is free. Similarly, Arjuna, who loves

1 X, 8, to 10
2 X, 11
3 X, 12 to 18
repeating Krishna’s name in devotion, requests Him again and again to describe His powers till the latter can say no more.

[145]

August 29, 1926

Yea, I will unfold to thee, O Kurushreshtha, My divine manifestations,— the chiefest only; for there is no limit to their extent.¹

I am the Atman, O Gudakesha, seated in the heart of every being; I am the beginning, the middle and the end of all beings.

Of the Adityas I am Vishnu; of luminaries, the radiant Sun; of Maruts I am Marichi; of constellations, the moon.

Of the Vedas I am the Sama Veda; of the gods, Indra; of the senses I am the mind; of beings I am the consciousness.

Of Rudras I am Shankara; of Yakshas and Rakshasas Kubera; of Vasus I am the Fire; of mountains Meru.

Of priests. O Partha, know Me to be the chief Brihaspati; of army captains I am Kartikeya; and of waters, the ocean.

Of the great seers I am Bhrigu; of words I am the one syllable ‘AUM’, of sacrifices I am the Japa sacrifice; of things immovable, the Himalayas.

Of all trees I am Ashvattha; of the divine seers, Narada; of the heavenly choir I am Chitraratha; of the perfected I am Kapila the ascetic.

Of horses, know Me to be Uchchaihshravas born with Amrita; of mighty elephants I am Airavata; of men, the monarch.

Of weapons I am Vajra; of cows, Kamadhenu; I am Kandarpa, the god of generation; of serpents I am Vasuki.

Of cobras I am Ananta; of water-dwellers I am Varuna; of the menes I am Aryaman; and of the chastisers, Yama.

Of demons I am Prahlada; of reckoners, the Time; of beasts I am the lion; and of birds, Garuda.

Of cleansing agents I am the Wind; of wielders of weapons, Rama; of fishes I am the crocodile; of rivers, the Gangas.

Of creations I am the beginning, end and middle, O Arjuna; of sciences, the science of spiritual knowledge; of debaters, the right argument.

Of letters, the letter A; of compounds I am the dvandva; I am the imperishable Time; I am the creator to be seen everywhere.

All-seizing Death am I, as also the source of things to be; in feminine virtues I am Kirti. (glory), Shri (beauty), Vak (speech), Smriti (memory), Medha (intelligence), Dhriti (constancy) and Kshama (forgiveness).

Of Saman hymns I am Brihat Saman; of metres, Gayatri; of months I am Margashirsha; of seasons, the spring.²

¹ X, 19
² X, 20 to 35
“I am Brihat Saman among Saman hymns and Gayatri among metres. Among the months, I am Margashirsha (when in old times the Aryans lived in the region of the North Pole, this was regarded as the first month of the year and that is why it is mentioned here). Among the seasons I am Spring.”

---

August 31, 1926

Of deceivers I am the dice-play; of the splendid, the splendour; I am victory, I am resolution, I am the goodness of the good.¹

“I am the gaming of those who indulge in gambling.” (This is merely intended to point out that God exists not only in what is good in the world, but also in what is evil. Shri Krishna could also have said that He was the sin of the wicked. He could certainly have said that He was Ravana among the demons, for He let Ravana have his way and enjoy himself only as long as He chose. The author’s intention is only to assert that God is omnipotent. God’s creation contains both good and evil. By saying this, Shri Krishna gives us some freedom to choose between the two. To us who are confined in the prison of this body, he grants that freedom. He gives us the freedom to shake off our bonds. If a prisoner condemned to imprisonment for life is permitted a seemingly unimportant condition by fulfilling which he can be free, it will be a great thing for him, for he can secure his freedom through it. We are in the same condition, for the Lord has assured us that we can be what we wish to be.) I am the splendour of the splendid. I am victory, resolution and the goodness of the good.

Of Vrishnis I am Vasudeva; of Pandavas Dhananjaya; of ascetics I am Vyasa; and of seers, Ushanas.

I am the rod of those that punish; the strategy of those seeking victory; of secret things I am silence, and the knowledge of those that know.

Whatever is the seed of every being, O Arjuna, that am I; there is nothing, whether moving or fixed, that can be without Me.

There is no end to my divine manifestations; what extent of them I have told thee now is only by way of illustration.

Whatever is glorious, beautiful and mighty know thou that all such has issued from a fragment of My splendour.

¹ X, 36

---

270 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
But why needst thou to learn this at great length, O Arjuna? With but a part of Myself I stand upholding this universe.¹

If we have an idea of the infinite powers of the Lord, we shall become humble. We will not then follow the example of Narad who once felt proud of the one power which he possessed. The Lord has said that even being proud is His privilege. The substance of all that He has said is that we should learn to be the humblest of the humble. Knowing that there is no limit to the power of God, we should submit to violence if anyone attacks us, without offering violence in return. If we attempt to resist him with violence, God will humble our pride, for there has been no demon, from Ravana downwards, whom the Lord has not destroyed.

[147]

Chapter XI

September 1, 1926

This is regarded as an important chapter. The Gita is a poem with a profound meaning, and the eleventh Chapter is the most poetic of all. If we wish to learn true bhakti, we should know this Chapter by heart. If we do so, we shall feel, when reciting it, that we are bathing in a sea of bhakti.

Out of Thy grace towards me, Thou hast told me the supreme mystery revealing the knowledge of the Supreme; is has banished my delusion.

Of the origin and destruction of beings I have heard from Thee in full detail, as also of Thy imperishable majesty, O Kamalapatraksha!

Thou art indeed just as Thou hast described Thyself, Parameshvara! I do crave to behold now that form of Thine as Ishvara.

If, Lord, Thou thinkest it possible for me to bear the sight, reveal to me, O Yogeshvara, Thy imperishable form.

[148]

September 2, 1926

Behold, O Partha, my forms divine in their hundreds and thousands, infinitely diverse, infinitely various in colour and aspect.

Behold the Adityas, the Vasus, the Rudras, the two Ashwins, and the Maruts; behold. O Bharata, numerous marvels never revealed before.

Behold today, O Gudakesha, in my body, the whole universe, moving, and unmoving, all in one, and whatever else thou cravest to see.¹

¹ X, 37 to 42

"See the Adityas," Shri Krishna says, "the Vasus, the Rudras, the Ashwins and the Maruts, all together. See the entire world, animate and inanimate, all as one reality."

This cosmic form includes, good and evil, Hindus and Muslims, believers and atheists, all.

"You may also see," Shri Krishna adds, "anything else you wish to see."

But thou canst not see Me with these thine own eyes. I give thee the eye divine; behold My sovereign power!

With these words, O King, the great Lord of Yoga, Hari, then revealed to Partha His supreme form as Ishvara.²

[149]

September 3, 1926

The teaching of the Gita was not meant to be merely preserved in a book; it was meant to be translated into action. Mahadev and Punjabhai take notes of what I speak, but had we arranged recording on a gramophone plate, every word could have been taken down. Could we have said, then, that the gramophone machine had understood the Gita? It is an inanimate object. Similarly, what will this knowledge profit us if we merely take down notes and do not put the teaching into practice? We should, therefore, serve the people among whom we live, and help our elders in their domestic chores. Why should Ba find it necessary to send for Kusum to help her? Why should she request Ramachandra, who is a guest here just for a few days, to help her wash the kitchen? Why should she, who is at present under a vow of eating only once a day, not get some time for rest? If you give her no help, you are like the gramophone in our example.

With many mouths, and many eyes, many wondrous aspects, many divine ornaments, and many brandished weapons divine:

Wearing divine garlands and vestments, anointed with divine perfumes, it was the form of God, all marvellous, infinite, seen everywhere.

Were the splendour of a thousand suns to shoot forth all at once in the sky that might perchance resemble the splendour of that Mighty One.

Then did Pandava see the whole universe in its manifold divisions gathered as one in the body of that God of gods.³

¹ XI, 1 to 7
² XI, 8 & 9
³ XI, 10 to 13
The whole universe, despite its manifold divisions, is gathered there in Him (Like a tree and its leaves. The tree is like the cosmic form of the Lord, the root and the leaves being one. The root contains the whole world of the tree, and the leaves represent that world divided into many forms.). Arjuna saw thus the [cosmic] form of the God of gods.

Then Dhananjaya, wonderstruck and thrilled in every fibre of his being, bowed low his head before the Lord, addressing Him thus with folded hands:

[150]

September 4, 1926

Within Thy form, O Lord, I see all the gods and the divers multitudes of beings, the Lord Brahma on his lotus-throne and all the seers and the serpents divine.

With many arms bellies, months and eyes, I see Thy infinite form everywhere. Neither Thy end, nor middle, nor beginning do I see, O Lord of Universe, Universal-formed!

(On the one hand, Arjuna says that Shri Krishna has a definite form and, on the othe, he says that He is formless. In other words, His form is so vast that in truth He is formless.)

With crown and mace and disc, a mass of effulgence, gleaming everywhere I see Thee, so dazzling to the sight, bright with the splendour of the fiery sun blazing from all sides,—incomprehensible.

You bear crown, mace and disc. You are a mass of radiance which glown at all places.

(The sun gives some faint idea of the Lord’s light, but it is no more than a dim point of light in comparison with the Lord’s.) Thou art as lustrous as fire and the sun. Thou art dazzling to the sight because of thy immeasurable effulgence.

Thou art the Supreme Imperishable worthy to be known; Thou art the final resting-place of this universe; Thou art the changeless guardian of the Eternal Dharma; Thou art, I believe, the Everlasting Being.

Cannot we say that the rains yesterday were an aspect of this infinite cosmic form of God? He has placed the sun at such a great distance from us; what would have been our condition if it had been a

---

1 XI, 14
2 XI, 15 & 16
3 XI, 17
4 XI, 18
little nearer? Can we, then, imagine Arjuna’s condition with Shri Krishna standing near him, Krishna glowing with the light of a thousand suns.

Thou hast no beginning, middle nor end; infinite is Thy might; arms innumerable; for eyes, the sun and the moon; Thy mouth a blazzing fire, overpowering the universe with Thy radiance.¹

By Thee alone are filled the spaces between heaven and earth and all the quarters; at the sight of this Thy wondrous terrible form, the three worlds are sore oppressed, O Mahatman!²

(This Sabarmati, too, is an aspect of the infinite power of God. If the warning received yesterdays comes true and there is a heavy flood, we would simply shake with fear.)

Here, too, the multitudes of gods are seen to enter Thee; some awestruck praise Thee with folded arms; the hosts of great seers and siddhas, ‘All Hail’ on their lips, hymn Thee with songs of praise.³

September 5, 1926

One feels as though these versed were specially written for us.

We had information from the Collector that there would be a heavy flood in the Sabarmati. Naturally, I was agitated in my heart, not knowing what to do. But I reminded myself of the verses which I daily recite before the women: “Govind, Dwarkavasin” and so on. Krishna would be welcome if he flew to our help on His Garuda. Otherwise, if all these things were carried away in the flood, our honour would be saved. Let anyone who survives to witness the destruction live on faithful to our vows.

I had advised them to construct the loom-shed as far away as the road. “The weak will pretend to be good” as the saying goes, and so we have nothing to do but wait in patience. If the authorities of the [Sabarmati] jail invite us to take shelter in it, I will ask them if they have invited the people of Vadaj too. I will tell them that they should offer shelter to all others before they invite us.

You should eat, not to gratify your palate, but to keep yourselves alive to keep up your strength. As I sit here in peace, we heard the blowing of the mill whistles, and so I remarked, “No one can escape work.” It is the same story: “We seek refuge with the Lord who is the ship that ferries us across this sea of creation.” Shall we never be free from this affliction [of work]? When afflicted with other deseases, we may keep repeating the Lord’s name, or the dwadash mantra or any other prayer which will bring us peace of mind. Which is a greater storm, the inward storm in the heart or this outward storm of work? Is this latter storm more of an affliction than that our eyes and ears should disobey us and attend to things which they ought to shun? Every inmate of the Ashram has wings. I should like even the women to have them. Anyone who wishes to leave is certainly free to do so, either by train or to the city on the other side. As the headman of a village, this is all I can tell you. If you can think of anything better, please do.

¹ XI, 19
² XI, 20
³ XI, 21

The Rudras, Adityas, Vasus, Sadhyas, all the gods, the twin Ashwins, Maruts, Manes, the hosts of Gandharvas, Yakshas, Asuras and siddhas—all gaze on Thee in wonderment.

At the sight of Thy mighty form, O Mahabahu, many-mouthed, with eyes, arms, thighs and feet innumerable, with many vast bellies, terrible with many jaws, the worlds feel fearfully oppressed, and so do I.

For as I behold Thee touching the sky, glowing, numerous-hued with gaping mouths and wide resplendent eyes, I feel oppressed in my innermost being; no peace nor quiet I find, O Vishnu!

And as I see Thy mouths with fearful jaws, resembling the Fire of Doom, I lose all sense of direction, and find no relief. Be gracious, O Devesha, O Jagannivasa!

All the sons of Dhritarashtra, and with them the crowd of kings, Bhishma, Drona, and that Karna too, as also our chief warriors—

Are hastening into the fearful jaws of Thy terrible mouths. Some indeed, caught between Thy teeth are seen, their heads being crushed to atoms.

As rivers in their numerous torrents run headlong to the sea, even so the heroes of the world of men rush into Thy flaming mouths.

As moths, fast-flying, plunge into blazing fire straight to their doom, even so these rush headlong into Thy mouths, to their destruction.

Devouring all these from all sides, Thou lappest them with Thy flaming tongues; Thy fierce rays blaze forth, filling the whole universe with their lustre.

Tell me, Lord, who Thou art so dread of form! Hail to Thee, O Devavara! Be gracious! I desire to know Thee, Primal Lord; for I comprehend not what Thou dost.¹

¹ XI, 22 to 31
Doom am I, full-ripe, dealing death to the worlds, engaged in devouring mankind. Even without thy slaying them, not one of the warriors, ranged for battle against thee, shall survive.¹

Therefore, do thou arise, and win renown! Defeat thy foes and enjoy a thriving kingdom. By Me have these already been destroyed; be thou no more than an instrument, O Savyasachin!²

“Savyasachin” means one who can use a bow with the left hand, that is, with either hand.

Drona, Bhishma, Jayadratha and Karna, as also the other warrior chiefs—already slain by Me—slay thou! Be not dismayed! Fight! Victory is thine over thy foes in the field.

Hearing this word of Keshava, crown-wearer Arjuna folded his hands, and trembling made obeisance. Bowing and all hesitant, in faltering accents, he proceeded to address Krishna once more.

Right proper it is, O Hrishikesha, that Thy praise should stir the world to gladness and tender emotion; the Rakshasas in fear fly to every quarter and all the hosts of Siddhas do reverent homage.³

“And why should they not bow to you? You are the destroyer of the demons.” The demons are our enemies, external and internal. What even if the river should swallow us and destroy us? How much more fearful is the flood inside us? Who will destroy the demons inside? And so Arjuna said:

And why should they not bow down to Thee, O Mahatman? Thou art the First Creator, greater even than Brahma. O Ananta, O Devesha, O Jagannivasa, Thou art the Imperishable, Being, not-Being, and That which transcends even these.

Thou art the Primal God, the Ancient Being; Thou art the final resting-place of this Universe; Thou art the Knower, the ‘to-be-known’, the supreme Abode; by Thee, O myriad-formed, is the Universe pervaded.

Thou art Vayu, Yama, Agni, Varuna, Shashanka, Prajapati, and Prapitamaha! All hail to Thee, a thousand times all hail! Again and yet again all hail to Thee!⁴

¹ XI, 32
² XI, 33
³ XI, 34 to 36
⁴ XI, 37 to 39
September 8, 1926

There was once a woman in Madras who was a devotee of the Lord. She used to worship Him with her back towards the idol. A learned man rebuked her for doing so, but she cited this verse in reply, and the learned pundit was speechless. If all space is pervaded by God, when we find his eyes, ears and noses on all sides, why should we sit facing in a particular direction to worship Him?

All hail to Thee from before and behind! All hail to Thee from every side, O All; Thy prowess is infinite, Thy might is measureless! Thou holdest all; therefore Thou art all.

If ever in carelessness, thinking of Thee as comrade, I addressed Thee saying, ‘O Krishna!’ ‘O Yadava!’ nor knowing Thy greatness, in negligence or in affection.

If ever I have been rude to Thee in jest, whilst at play, at rest-time, or at meals, whilst alone or in company, O Achuta, forgive Thou my fault—I beg of Thee, O Incomprehensible one!

Thou art Father of this world, of the moving and the un-moving; Thou art its adored, its worthiest, Master; there is none equal to Thee; how then any greater than Thee? Thy power is matchless in the three worlds.

Therefore, I prostrate myself before Thee, and beseech Thy grace, O Lord Adorable! As father with son, as comrade with comrade, so shouldst Thou bear, beloved Lord, with me, Thy loved one.

I am filled with joy to see what never was seen before, and yet my heart is oppressed with fear. Show me that original form of Thine, O Lord! Be gracious, Devesha, O Jagannivasa!

I crave to see Thee even as Thou wast, with crown, with mace, disc in hand; wear Thou, once more, that four-armed form, O thousand armed Vishvamurti!

It is to favour thee, O Arjuna, that I have revealed to thee, by My own unique power, this My Form Supreme, Resplendent, Universal, Infinite, Primal—which none save thee has ever seen.

Not by the study of the Vedas, not by sacrifice, not by the study of other scriptures, not by gifts, nor yet by performance of rites or of fierce austerities can I, in such a form, be seen by anyone save thee in the world of men, O Kurupravira!

Be thou neither oppressed nor bewildered to look on this awful form of Mine. Banish thy fear, ease thy mind, and lo! behold Me once again as I was.¹

¹ XI, 40 to 49
Beholding again Thy benign human form I am come to myself and am once more in my normal state.

Very hard to behold is that Form of Mine which thou hast seen; even the gods always yearn to see it.

Not by the Vedas, not by penance, nor by gifts, nor yet by sacrifice, can any behold Me in the Form that thou hast seen.

But by single-minded devotion, O Arjuna, I may in this Form be known and seen, and truly entered into, O Parantapa!

First we should know the Lord, then see Him and then merge into Him. We may tell Him: “You may eat me up, I will not resist if You do. I am Yours, and I want to be one with You. What harm can it do even if You eat me up?” Telling us that He can grind us into paste with his teeth and throw it out, He tells us that we can know Him through bhakti. We can pass His test only through faith. When we know that everything takes place through Him and that we live and die as He wills, how can we be affected by anything?

He alone comes to Me, O Pandava, who does My work, who has made Me his goal, who is My devotee, who has renounced attachment, who has ill will towards none.

The Lord has given the whole substance of Chapter XI in this last verse. “He who works for Me is ever devoted to Me, who is attached to nothing and bears ill will to none—not even to a person who may have committed a heinous sin—but ever blesses him instead,—such a person comes to Me.”

To love God means to be free from attachment to any work. We should of course do work, but without egotistic attachment to it, simply for the love of God. A lustful man forgets his love for parents and children when seeking gratification of his lust and abandons

1 XI, 51 to 54
2 XI, 55
3 The notes of this discourse were not taken by Mahadev Desai.
himself blindly to it. This also is a form of non-attachment. But the cause is a filthy one, whereas love for God is good. And now for the meaning of the verse [with which we began].

Of the devotees who thus worship Thee, incessantly attached, and those who worship the Imperishable Unmanifest, which are the better yogis?¹

The Lord replies:

Those I regard as the best yogis who, riveting their minds on Me, ever attached, worship Me, with the highest faith.

But those who worship the Imperishable, the Indefinable, the Unmanifest, the Omnipresent, the Unthinkable, the Rock-seated, the Immovable, the Unchanging,

Keeping the whole host of senses in complete control, looking on all with an impartial eye, engrossed in the welfare of all beings—these come indeed to Me.²

---

9

September 11, 1926

Greater is the travail of those whose mind is fixed on the Unmanifest; for it is hard for embodied mortals to gain the Unmanifest Goal.³

Those who have fixed their minds on the Unmanifest, that is, who worship the formless Brahman, experience greater difficulty in their effort, for it is extremely difficult for us, embodied souls, to know the unmanifest state.

It is very difficult to meditate on shunya. The moment we attribute a single quality to God, we cease to worship the Unmanifest. We must all, nevertheless, realize that beyond the Personal God there is a Formless Essence which our reason cannot comprehend. The consummation of bhakti lies in the bhakta merging in God, so that ultimately nothing but One Formless God remains. Since, however, it is easier to reach this state through the worship of the Personal God, the Lord says that the other path of seeking the Formless Essence directly is difficult to follow.

But those who casting all their actions on Me, making Me their all in all, worship Me with the meditation of undivided devotion,

¹ XII, 1
² XII, 2 to 4
³ The notes of this discourse were not taken by Mahadev Desai.
⁴ XII, 5
Of such, whose thoughts are centred on Me, O Partha, I become ere long the Deliverer from the ocean of this world of death.\textsuperscript{1}

\textit{September 12, 1926}

The verse beginning with \textit{kleshodhikatarastesham}\textsuperscript{2} has given me great light; for it says that devotion to the Unmanifest is difficult to cultivate and that it is a harder path to follow. The reason given is very significant. If one retires to a forest and meditates on God, one can certainly realize Him. Likewise, one who serves as an accountant or clerk or manager in a firm can also do that. Both may be in the same state of mind and can, therefore, reach the same goal.

If we are sincere in our devotion to the cause of the spinning-wheel movement, the country is bound to embrace it in course of time. This faith is an illustration of the path which human beings should adopt, this is the path of \textit{bhakti}, of the worship of a Personal God, for the spinning-wheel is visible to us and we see power in it. If, however, we worship the spinning-wheel for itself, our worship will be like the worship of the Unmanifest \textit{Brahman}. It will be so, that is, if we merely worship the spinning-wheel without spinning on it. In my view, however, even if a time comes when we decide to withdraw into complete silence, it will not mean that we have abandoned the spinning-wheel or forsaken our aspiration for the \textit{Brahman}. If indeed we ever retire to some high peak on the Himalayas, it will not be because we shall have lost interest in the spinning-wheel or been disillusioned with the people. To retire with such a motive will be no way of worshipping the Unmanifest. Of course, we shall benefit in some way even if we do so. If a man decides out of disgust to observe \textit{brahmacharya} or to give up immorality, he will certainly benefit. But his action will not have been prompted by true knowledge. Similarly, this idea of retirement is not meant for anyone who is disgusted with the spinning-wheel or with the people.

If a person, however, feels that there is an Essence beyond this universe of objects with name and form and that he must know it, and if he leaves this world and withdraws into solitude with that aim, that also is a legitimate path. But it is a difficult one even if one is sincere in one‘s aspiration to cultivate \textit{bhakti} or the Unmanifest. The idea that the \textit{Brahman} is real and that the visible universe is illusory is simply

\begin{enumerate}
\item \textsuperscript{1} XII, 6 & 7
\item \textsuperscript{2} XII, 5
\end{enumerate}
beyond the capacity of our reason to comprehend. How difficult it must be, then, to live according to it? It is only when our body is completely transformed into an armour that nothing will pierce it. The Shastras narrate the stories of Prahlad\(^1\) and Sudhanva\(^2\). As these stories show, it is possible, even while one is physically alive, to live as if one had renounced one’s body. It is extremely difficult for a man to cultivate such a state of mind and live for ever absorbed in the \textit{atman}. All but one in a crore live in illusion and error. They will not break away from their ignorant attachment and will have to be born again in this world.

The path of karma is the easiest to follow. The path of reason can lead one into great error. The path along which we have the least danger of falling into error is the one described in the verse beginning with \textit{nehabhikramanashosti}\(^3\). Neither Christians nor Muslims, nor certainly Hindus, have risen above the worship of the Personal God. There is a book by Shibli\(^4\) in which he has discussed the question whether or not God has a body. Even a person who aspires to cultivate devotion exclusively for the Unmanifest worships some visible symbol. We can of course understand with our intellect the idea that the body is unconnected with the \textit{atman}. To say that one can attain \textit{moksha} while physically alive only means that, after death, one will not have to be born again. Has anyone ever been able to say what his state after death will be? The spiritualists and Theosophists are not correct, in my view, about what they say concerning spirits, in the sense that no one has been able to know and tell the whole truth.

For this reason, Shri Krishna told Arjuna that it would be better for him to take no interest in the problem at all. “Silence is golden in this matter,” he says. “Don’t you see, you dear simpleton, that I Myself have taken on a human body? And you ask Me, of all persons, whether worship of the Unmanifest is better, or that of the Personal God. You had better stop asking such questions and do as I tell you. Free yourself from all thoughts of violence and act towards all creatures with equal love and regard.” If we understand this truth, we

---

1 A devotee of God who was persecuted by Hiranyakashipu, his unbelieving father
2 Son of king Hansadhwaj in the \textit{Mahabharata}, who defying his parents and adhering to truth and God, smilingly threw himself into a cauldron of boiling oil
3 II, 40
4 Presumably, \textit{Life of the Prophet} by Maulana Shibli would escape many problems. We should not mind if, because we worship the Personal God, we are called idolaters and criticized for being so. And, therefore, proceeding, Shri Krishna says:

On Me set thy mind, on Me rest thy conviction; thus without doubt shalt thou remain only in Me hereafter.

If thou canst not set thy mind steadily on Me, then by the method of constant practice seek to win Me, O Dhananjaya.¹

What is the difference between abhyasayoga and meditating on God? I think the former means listening to readings from holy books, reflecting on them and letting the mind dwell on their teachings. It means associating ourselves with men who are engaged in doing these things and listening to prayer songs and group devotions, for every little offering we make, leaf, flower, fruit or water, ultimately reaches God.

[158]²

September 14, 1926

If thou art also unequal to this method of constant practice, concentrate on service for Me, even thus serving Me thou shalt attain perfection.

If thou art unable even to do this, then dedicating all to Me, with mind controlled, abandon the fruit of action.³

“Do not,” Shri Krishna says, “be impatient to reap the fruit of your efforts.”

Better is knowledge than practice, better than knowledge is concentration, better than concentration is renunciation of the fruit of all action, from which directly issues peace.⁴

Here jnana does not mean mere learning, but it means genuine experience of truth in however limited a measure. Meditation, which means concentration of the mind [on God], is better than such jnana, but renunciation of the fruit of action is said to be better even than such meditation. Shri Krishna says this because a person practising meditation may possibly be deceiving himself. Moreover, jnana does not mean ultimate self-realization. Jnana and meditation are compared here in their restricted meanings and one is described as better

¹ XII, 8 & 9
² The notes of this discourse were taken by Punjabhai.
³ XII, 10 & 11
⁴ XII, 12
than the other. Renunciation of the fruits of action is mentioned last, but in truth it should be the first step. One who practises it becomes free from attachment to the ego.

Shri Krishna then proceeds to describe the characteristics of a man of this type.

Who has ill will towards none, who is friendly and compassionate, who has shed all thought of ‘mine’ or ‘I’, who regards pain and pleasure alike, who is long-suffering;

Friendship can exist only between equals, but one should feel compassion towards all. We cannot throw a cricket bat at a dog to hit it. How would we feel if our parents or teachers did that to us? Even if we are obedient sons of our parents, how would we feel towards them if they threw a bat at us to hit us? We shall not discuss here what our duty towards a dog is. It is certain, however, that it is not right for us to hit one. Forgiveness lies in not being angry even with a dog which may have bitten us. Tit for tat is a wrong principle. It is certainly not based on forgiveness. What can we gain by being wicked with the wicked? The good of both lies only in our showing love and compassion even for such persons.

We should understand the difference between selflessness and freedom from egotism. The first means not making a distinction between ourselves and others. It describes a person who regards the entire world as his family. The second term describes a person who believes that it is not he who has done a particular thing, that it is God who has done it.

[159]

September 15, 1926

Who is ever content gifted with yoga, self-restrained, of firm conviction, who has dedicated his mind and reason to Me—that devotee (bhakta) of Mine is dear to Me.

Who gives no trouble to the world, to whom the world causes no trouble, who is free from exultation, resentment, fear and vexation,—that man is dear to Me.

The meaning of this verse is already contained in the term adweshta.

1 XII, 13
2 XII, 14 & 15
3 In XII, 13
Who expects naught, who is pure, resourceful, unconcerned, untroubled, who indulges in no undertakings,—that devotee of Mine is dear to Me.¹

The whole of Chapter XII describes the characteristics of a bhakta. If we compare the verses² which describe a sthitaprajna with these, we shall find them similar.

On whom does a bhakta of God rely except on Him? Shuchi means a person who is pure both in body and mind. Daksha means a person who does everything which he undertakes, wholly in a spirit of dedication to God. Udasin means one who remains unaffected even if all his many plans come to nothing. One who is a sarvarambhaparityagi will not go in search of work, work will come seeking him. God Himself will appoint his work and call him to it. Such a person, knowing that God shoulders the burdens of us all, leaves everything to Him. A slave need not go looking for work.

Who rejoices not, neither frets nor grieves, who covets not, who abandons both good and ill—that devotee of Mine is dear to Me.

Who is same to foe and friend, who regards alike respect and disrespect, cold and heat, pleasure and pain, who is free from attachment;

Who weighs in equal scale blame and praise, who is silent, content with whatever his lot, who owns no home, who is of steady mind,—that devotee of Mine is dear to Me.³

“He does not get elated, though an emperor may bow to him,” so sang Raychandbhai.

They who follow this essence of dharma, as I have told it, with faith, keeping Me as their goal,—those devotees are exceedingly dear to Me.⁴

All of us have our appointed tasks, as Brahmins or Kshatriyas, Vaisyas or Sudras. Anyone who does his work without hope of reward and in a disinterested spirit is a bhakta of God. The Second Chapter contains verses describing a sthitaprajna. They describe the state of mind of a yogi living absorbed in a mystic world. This Chapter XII describes, in our ordinary language, the state of mind of a bhakta.

¹ XII, 16
² In II, 55 to 72
³ XII, 17 to 19
⁴ XII, 20
Chapter XIII

September 16, 1926

From Chapter XIII begins a new subject. It discusses the body and its nature.

This body, O Kaunteya, is called the Field; he who knows it is called the knower of the Field by those who know.¹

Pandavas and Kauravas, that is, divine and demoniacal impulses, were fighting in this body, and God was watching the fight from a distance. Please do not believe that this is the history of a battle which took place on a little field near Hastinapur; the war is still going on. This is the verse we should keep in mind in order to understand the meaning of the phrase dharmakshetra.

And understand Me to be, O Bharata, the knower of the Field in all the Fields; and the knowledge of the Field and the knower of the Field, I hold, is true knowledge.²

Our bodily life will have been lived to some purpose if it is spent in thinking which of these two we should serve and which we should go to for refuge.

September 17, 1926

What that Field is, what its nature, what its modifications, and whence is what, as also who He is, and what His power—hear this briefly from Me.

This subject has been sung by seers distinctly and in various ways, in different hymns as also in aphoristic texts about Brahma well reasoned and unequivocal.³

This theme has been expounded analytically by seers in manifold ways in various hymns. It has been discussed in the Brahmasutras⁴ with steps logically arranged and clearly explaining the connection between cause and effect; and every word has been weighed so that not a syllable could be altered.

The great elements, Individuation, Reason, the Unmanifest, the ten senses, and the one (mind), and the five spheres of the senses;

¹ XIII, 1
² XIII, 2
³ XIII, 3 & 4
⁴ Aphorisms on Vedanta philosophy by Badarayana
Desire, dislike, pleasure, pain, association, consciousness, cohesion—this, is sum, is what is called the Field with its modifications.¹

The five mahabhutas, ahamkar, which sustains those bhutas, buddhi, the avyakta (prakriti), the ten sense, the mind and the objects of the five senses, so also desire, ill will, happiness, misery, association, consciousness, cohesion—this, in brief, is the Field with its modifications.

Sanghat means the power of the different elements in the body to co-operate with one another. Dhriti does not mean the abstract virtue of patience, but the property of the atoms in physical bodies to cohere. This property is made possible by ahamkar, which is latent in the unmanifest prakriti.

Freedom from pride and pretentiousness, non-violence, forgiveness, uprightness, service of the Master, purity, steadfastness, self-restraint;

Aversion from sense-objects, absence of conceit, realization of the painfulness and evil of birth, death, age and disease;

Absence of attachment, refusal to be wrapped up in one’s children, wife, home and family, even-mindedness whether good or ill befall;

Unwavering and all-exclusive devotion to Me, resort to secluded spots, distaste for the haunts of men;

Settled conviction of the nature of the atman, perception of the goal of the knowledge of Truth,—

All this is declared to be knowledge and the reverse of it is ignorance.²

Shauch means outer and inner purity. It can be achieved by repeating Ramanama. This purity can be properly preserved only if the heart is constantly kept clean by repeating Ramanama. Every morning, we should weep with tears streaming from our eyes and ask ourselves why we did not remember to start repeating Ramanama, and why we, of all people, had a bad dream.

Absence of interest in the objects of senses means the awareness that certain things ought to be treated as forbidden by us, that they ought to be unacceptable to us.

The attributes described include the realization of the evils of birth and death, of old age, disease and suffering. One who realizes this starts with the thought: “I am sin.” Why is it, we should ask ourselves, that we are afflicted with all manner of diseases? We ought to learn to cultivate equanimity of mind towards everything which may happen, good and evil. What does living in solitude mean?

¹ XIII, 5 & 6
² XIII, 7 to 11
Retiring into a cave to live there alone by oneself? Our effort will have been worthwhile only if we can feel solitude even in the midst of a huge crowd. To live in solitude means to sit in a spot meditating on one single thought.

September 18, 1926

I will (now) expound to thee that which is to be known and knowing which one enjoys immortality; it is the supreme Brahman which has no beginning, which is called neither Being nor non-Being.¹

Why does Shri Krishna say this, when they say that the Brahman is sachchidananda and that it alone is real? What he means to say is that Brahman does not mean being, the contrary of non-being. When we use the word sat in connection with the Brahman, its meaning transcends the two opposites and it signifies neither being nor non-being. It is, so to say, a neutral term. God cannot be described as evil, nor as good. He is above either. The reality which is God is beyond the three categories of time.

Everywhere having hands and feet, everywhere having eyes, heads, mouths, everywhere having ears, It abides embracing everything in the universe.

Seeming to possess the functions of the senses, It is devoid of all the senses; It touches naught, upholds all; having no gunas, It experiences gunas.

Without all beings, yet within; immovable yet moving; so subtle that It cannot be perceived; so far and yet so near It is.

Undivided, It seems to subsist divided in all beings; this Brahman—That which is to be known is the Sustainer of all, yet It is their Devourer and Creator.²

Though indivisible He seems to be there divided in all beings. He is worth knowing. He sustains all the creatures. He is their destroyer and yet the Creator of them all.

September 21, 1926

All contrary qualities are attributed to God because we cannot free our minds from dualities.

¹ XIII, 12
² XIII, 13 to 16
Light of all lights, It is said to be beyond darkness; It is knowledge, the object of knowledge, to be gained only by knowledge; It is seated in the hearts of all.¹

He is the Superlight. He is beyond darkness, that is, He is self-effulgent. . . .

He is Himself Knowledge. He is also the object of Knowledge to be realized only by Knowledge.

Thus have I expounded in brief the Field, Knowledge and that which is to be known; My devotee, when he knows this, is worthy to become one with Me.

Know that prakriti and purusha are both without beginning; know that all the modifications and gunas are born of prakriti.

Prakriti is described as the cause in the creation of effects from causes; Purusha is described as the cause of the experiencing of pleasure and pain.²

Karya (anything done under compulsion of desires) and karan (the desires)—prakriti is the cause of their creation. Purusha is the cause of the experience of happiness and misery.

God is described as having two aspects. Under one aspect we should know Him as prakriti and under the other as purusha. The world is ever changing, and is therefore maya. The purusha is not transient, for He is the witness.

For the purusha, residing in prakriti, experiences the gunas born of prakriti; attachment to these gunas is the cause of his birth in good or evil wombs.³

September 22, 1926

It is enough if we look upon God as a king and if all of us become His slaves, that is, disclaim any right over our bodies.

What is called in this body the Witness, the Assentor, the Sustainer, the Experiencer, the Great Lord and also the Supreme Atman, is the Supreme Being.⁴

The purusha dwelling in this body is para, that is, beyond maya but He witnesses and gives consent. He is the bharta who sustains

¹ XIII, 17
² XIII, 18 to 20
³ XIII, 21
⁴ XIII, 22
everything, and also the Enjoyer. He is, moreover, the God of gods and is described as Paramatman.

Fire has the power of burning, but it can burn nothing without God’s consent.

He who thus knows purusha and prakriti with its gunas, is not born again, no matter how he live and move.¹

If anyone claims that he is a bhakta of God and that, therefore, the sins he may commit are committed by God, he is wrong. But it would be right if the world said of him that he was a man of God and that everything he did was done through him by God. If anyone asks us whether we have attained spiritual knowledge, our reply should be: “Only God knows; I do not know.” Our reason may be carried away by pride at any time and become evil, but the man who has attained to perfect knowledge will never be misguided by his reason. Our belief is that Rama and Krishna were incarnations of God. How can we be sure that King Rama was not a hypocrite and his rule was not evil? How do we know that Krishna was not the most wicked of men? But we have no right to indulge in such doubts. Whomsoever we worship, we should look upon as Purna Purushottam,² that is best. If we believe that the people of India have faith in God, we should worship Him accordingly.

This verse does not sanction self-indulgence, but points out the great value of bhakti. Every karma has the effect of binding the soul, but one can become free from the bonds of karma by dedicating all one’s karmas to God. Thus, anyone who has become free from the egotistic idea of being the author of anything and who recognizes every moment of his life the authority of the Dweller within will never commit sin. It is in egotism that sin has its source. There is no sin where there is no consciousness of the “I”. This verse explains how to act so that one may commit no sin.

Some through meditation behold the atman by themselves in their own self; others by Sankhya Yoga, and others by Karma Yoga.³

¹ XIII, 23
² Perfect incarnation of God; the description is generally limited to Shri Krishna
³ XIII, 24
September 23, 1926

Yet others, not knowing (Him) thus, worship (Him) having heard from others; they too pass beyond death, because of devoted adherence to what they have heard.¹

If, having heard it explained that we shall be saved by dedicating all our work to God, we act in this spirit, then we can say that “he who . . . is not born again, no matter how he live and move” applies to us.

Wherever something is born, animate or inanimate, know, thou Bharatarshabha, that it issues from the union of the Field and the knower of the Field.²

If we examine things separately, human beings, grains of dust, water, and so on, our conclusions [about their origin] will be different in each case. If, instead, we go to the very first cause, we shall no more think of objects having their distinctive forms and names. The Ravana who invests things with such charm that we willingly submit to its spell is far more dangerous than the other one of the story who killed people physically.

Who sees abiding in all beings the same Parameshvara, imperishable in the perishable, he sees indeed.³

Though things are ever perishing, there is an indestructible element in everything which remains unaffected by any change, He alone sees who sees this.

When he sees the same Ishvara abiding everywhere alike, he does not hurt himself by himself and hence he attains the highest goal.⁴

When he sees the same God abiding alike at all places he does not destroy the self by the self-believes that, with the destruction of his body, he himself does not perish—and consequently he achieves the highest status.

Who sees that it is prakriti that performs all actions and thus (knows) that atman performs them not, he sees indeed.⁵

¹ XIII, 25
² XIII, 26
³ XIII, 27
⁴ XIII, 28
⁵ XIII, 29
Who realizes that prakriti is the doer of all actions and sees that atman is not the doer—though all things take place through God's maya, the Supreme Purusha involved in the process is not their author—he alone who does so sees indeed.

When he sees the diversity of beings as founded in unity and the whole expanse issuing therefrom, then he attains to Brahman.¹

---

September 24, 1926

The Gita is a work intended to be a guide in life and we should be able to find in it support for all our actions in practical life. Not all can understand Dr. Tribhuvandas’s book²; a vaid or a doctor can understand it more easily than laymen. We are in the same position as the latter [in relation to the Gita].

This Imperishable Supreme Atman, O Kaunteya, though residing in the body, acts not and is not stained, for He has no beginning and no gunas.

As the all-pervading ether, by reason of its subtlety, is not soiled, even so atman pervading every part of the body is not soiled.

As the one Sun illumines the whole universe, even so the Master of the Field illumines the whole field.

Those who, with the eyes of knowledge, thus perceive the distinction between the Field and the knower of the Field, and (the secret) of the release of beings from prakriti, they attain to the Supreme.³

Who knows the difference between the Field and the knower of the Field, and who knows how creatures may become free from the bonds of prakriti and maya, he realizes moksha.

---

September 25, 1926

In Chapter XIII Shri Krishna explained the nature of the Field and the knower of the Field, the means of understanding the nature of each and the different characteristics of such knowledge. The very first characteristic of knowledge is stated to be amanitva. Hence, however great one’s knowledge, if one is proud of that knowledge, one has read the Gita in vain. Where there is pride, there is no

---

¹ XIII, 30
² Ma-ne Shikhaman (Advice to a Mother)
³ XIII, 31 to 34
knowledge. A man who has knowledge is always free from pride and ostentation, is straightforward, serves his guru, is pure and steady, is a man of self-control and is free from egotism, and he does not suffer because of old age and disease. He is not attached to his son or wife or home, is filled with unswerving devotion for the Lord, lives in solitude, takes interest in spiritual studies and is devoted to the pursuit of philosophic truth.

Chapter XIV

September 26, 1926

We assemble here for studying the Gita, that is, for learning to follow its teaching in daily life. When we have a stomachache, we consult a book of home remedies and use the medicine suggested. The Gita is such a book of home remedies for us. We find in it medicines for our spiritual disease. If we want to make the Gita our Kamadhenu, we should make it our only source as far as possible. We may consult any number of books in the world in support of what we derive from the Gita, but should be satisfied with its sole authority. For this, we should have singleminded devotion to it. Such devotion should become spontaneous in us.

In a certain place, people used secretly to catch fish from the village pond. The village committee decided that, since in any case people caught fish,—did so in secret and were then afraid of being discovered—they should be required to take out licences for catching fish and some revenue raised by that means. This led to a dispute between two parties and the dispute was brought to me for settlement. I was afraid to give a decision, for people are not content to leave it to others to exercise discrimination in religious matters and faith on their behalf. If we are guided by some other person’s ideas about dharma, we would be lost when he was dead. It would have been much better if those village people had decided to consult the Gita or the Veda or the Koran, instead of asking me. We should look upon any of these works as the means of solving our spiritual problems. But I was told afterwards in reply [to my suggestion] that one could find support from a book for any idea. The true meaning of Kamadhuk, however, is that it satisfies a pure wish only. If the Gita satisfies any wish, it would not be a kamadhuk but would be aunt Putana¹. When the authors of the Shastras said that Sudras and others should not read Vedas and other [sacred] works, probably their reason was that the latter might interpret these works to justify their own wishes in particular matters. Anyone who approaches the Shastras without scrupulous regard for truth and non-violence will derive no benefit from them. It is possible to draw any number of evil ideas from the Bible, the Vedas, the Koran and other scriptures. I have come across persons who justified even murder on the authority of these works. The Gita, however, will serve as a safe guide to anyone who reads it with truth and non-violence as his guiding principles. Everyone should decide for himself with its help. The work will not be a Kamadhenu to any person who consults Kishorelal or me, and accepts our interpretation of it. Instead of borrowing faith from others, one should have one’s own faith and come to decisions accordingly. If the intention is sincere and there is no desire for outward show, any error that the decision may contain will be forgiven. A person acting in this manner learns a lesson from his error and discovers the right path.

Yet again will I expound the highest and the best of all knowledge, knowing which all the sages passed hence to the highest perfection.

By having recourse to this knowledge they became one with Me. They need not come to birth even at a creation, nor do they suffer at a dissolution.²

[169]

September 28, 1926

The great prakriti is for me the womb in which I deposit the germ; from it all beings come to birth, O Bharata.³

Among the very first sentences in the Bible is; God said let there be light, and there was light; [that is,] let there be a universe, and a universe came into existence. A potter has to mould clay into a shape on his wheel and then put the thing into fire to bake; God does not have to act in that manner. He is a magician, He simply puts the seed in his imagination—which is prakriti, Lakshmi or Mother Goddess of the world—and the universe comes into existence.

¹ A female demon who attempted to kill the infant Krishna by suckling him, but was herself sucked to death by the child
² XIV,1 & 2
³ XIV, 3
Whatever forms take birth in the various species, the great prakriti is their Mother and I the seed-giving Father.\(^1\)

I am the mahadyoni of all the forms which take birth in the various species, as also the source of the seed—

Sattva, rajas and tamas are the gunas sprung from prakriti; it is they, O Mahabahu, that keep the imperishable Dweller bound to the body.

Of these sattva, being stainless, is light-giving and healing; it binds with the bond of happiness and the bond of knowledge, O sinless one.\(^2\)

Those persons whose food, recreation and thoughts are sattvik are healthy. A person who merely eats sattvik food but is not sattvik in his general way of living and in his thoughts should be looked upon as a diseased person.

Rajas, know thou, is of the nature of passion, the source of thirst and attachment; it keeps man bound with the bond of action.\(^3\)

Know that rajas is associated with desire. This may mean either that it has its source in, or that it is the cause of, desire. It creates attachment for cravings. It keeps the embodied one (i.e., living being) bound with the bond of karma.

Tamas, know thou, is born of ignorance, of mortal man’s delusion; it keeps him bound with heedlessness, sloth and slumber, O Bharata.\(^4\)

Pramad means all kinds of unworthy wishes arising in us. Alas is pramad in a worse form still. Nidra, which is next, is the state of mind natural to those sunk in darkness. A man who is established in Samadhi and is always awake feels no need to recline for rest or stretch his limbs for relaxation. A lethargic person would not get up even from a place which had caught fire. It is his slumber that is referred to as part of the meaning of tamas.

[170]

September 29, 1926

Sattva attaches man to happiness, rajas to action, and tamas, shrouding knowledge, attaches him to heedlessness.\(^5\)

Sattva leads to happiness and the quality of rajas to karma. (This is not karma as it is defined in the Gita; it is the karma of him

---

\(^1\) XIV, 4
\(^2\) XIV, 5 & 6
\(^3\) XIV, 7
\(^4\) XIV, 8
\(^5\) XIV, 9
who is always doing something or other without pausing to think.)

Tamas covers up knowledge and leads to pramad.

_Sattva_ prevails, O Bharata, having overcome rajas and tamas; rajas, when it has overpowered sattva and tamas; likewise tamas reigns when sattva and rajas are crushed.\(^1\)

If a person overcomes rajas and tamas, he can create _sattva_. (All the three exist in us. We should make a special effort to cultivate that which we want to strengthen.) If we wish to strengthen rajas, we should subdue the other two and, if the quality of tamas, we should stop the activity of both sattva and rajas.

When the light—knowledge—shines forth from all the gates of this body, then it may be known that the _sattva_ thrives.

Greed, activity, assumption of undertakings, restlessness, craving—these are in evidence when _rajas_ flourishes, O Bharatarshaabha.

Ignorance, dullness, heedlessness, and delusion—these are in evidence when _tamas_ reigns, O Kurunandana.

If the embodied one meets his end whilst _sattva_ prevails, then he attains to the spotless worlds of the knowers of the Highest.\(^2\)

That is, he attains spiritual welfare. When he is nearing death, such a person refuses to take any medicine which may be offered, and says that he will have nothing but Ganga water. He who awaits death in peace in this manner is a _sattvik_ man.

If he dies during the reign within him of _rajas_, he is born among men attached to action; and if he dies to _tamas_, he is born in a species not endowed with reason.\(^3\)

The world of beings of action means the human world. The dark world means the world of brutes.

The fruit of _sattvik_ action is said to be stainless merit; that of _rajas_ is pain and that of _tamas_ ignorance.

Of _sattva_, knowledge is born, of _rajas_, greed; of _tamas_, heedlessness, delusion and ignorance.

Those abiding in _sattva_ rise upwards, those in _rajas_ stay midway, those in _tamas_ sink downwards.

When the seer perceives no agent another than the _gunas_ and knows Him who is above the _gunas_, he attains to My being.\(^4\)

When the _atman_ dwelling as witness in this body sees none else, but knows only Him who is above the _gunas_, that person comes to Me.

---

\(^{1}\) XIV, 10
\(^{2}\) XIV, 11 to 14
\(^{3}\) XIV, 15
\(^{4}\) XIV, 16 to 19
When the embodied one transcends these three gunas which are born of his contact with the body, he is released from the pain of birth, death and age and attains moksha.¹

[171]

September 30, 1926

Arjuna asks:

What, O Lord, are the marks of him who has transcended the three gunas? How does he conduct himself? How does he transcend the three gunas?

He, O Pandava, who does not disdain light, activity, and delusion when they come into being, nor desires them when they vanish.²

The Lord replies:

He who transcends the three gunas, does not suffer because of light or activity or darkness—that is, when any of them predominates over the others—and does not wish that it should prevail or subside.

This is one of the few difficult verses in the Gita. Should not one wish to have knowledge? In fact, in the gayatri mantra itself—in the best Vedic prayer—we pray to the shining Being to purify our intellect, to make it sattvik. We also pray: tamaso ma jyotirgamaya³. We aspire to be lifted from the darkness of attachment to illumination, from darkness to light. What, then, should we make of the statement in this verse? If we, living in the Ashram, did not cherish the aspiration which we do, we would fail in our aims. We must teach every child to say this prayer the very first thing in the morning. We should pray, tears streaming from our eyes, to be saved from the army of Kauravas, the army of deep slumber.

What, then, does the Gita teach? That we should not mind even if the slumber becomes deeper, should not even wish to get out of it? Should we say, I have no wish, the three states are the same to me? If anyone feels thus, you may be sure he will be totally ruined. Either we should regard this verse as an interpolation, or as the very key to the meaning of the Gita. If you remember, in the beginning Arjuna does not ask whether or not it is proper to kill, but asks what good he could expect from killing his kinsmen. And so the Lord asks him: “What is this distinction you make between kinsmen and others? Your duty is to do the job of killing, irrespective of whether they are your kinsmen

¹ XIV, 20
² XIV, 21 & 22
³ “Take me from darkness to light,” an Upanishadic prayer or others.” Similarly, Arjuna does not hear ask Shri Krishna which of the three gunas is best. He knows that ultimately one must transcend all the three. We can know a person who possesses one of the three gunas. It is not difficult to distinguish among the three classes. But can we find anyone in this world who has risen above the gunas altogether? This verse gives the Lord’s reply to that question. What other reply could He give? A person who has risen above the three gunas will not let himself be deceived by the threefold distinction of good, bad and indifferent, and we shall not see in him the effects of any of the three gunas, so rare will be his state of mind. But this is an important chapter, and we shall think more about it tomorrow.

[172]

October 1, 1926

We discussed one idea yesterday. Talking of a person who does not feel concerned whether light, activity or darkness prevails or subsides, we saw that we find no one of the sort in the world. We come across no person who does not wish to get rid of what we regard as evil—lethargy, inertia or excessive activity—or does not wish to acquire pure knowledge. On the contrary, we pray for such knowledge. The word jijnasū1 came into use because of our aspiration for knowledge, and we should pray that this aspiration may ever grow. This verse, therefore, should fill us with greater enthusiasm for doing our duty. Our aim is to strive to end the suffering of the entire world.

It is a general rule that we should not take any statement of a writer in isolation, but should consider it in its total context.

Now, then, for whom is this verse meant? Well, it is meant for one who has risen above the gunas. It enumerates the characteristics of such a person. This is what he would appear to us to be. We do not know how he in fact acts. We say, for instance, that the sun is a blazing fire, but scientists say that it is utterly black. An English poet has said that things are not what they seem. This is Sankara’s theory of maya. It means that things do not appear as they are, that they are not what they seem to be, for everything is known to us through the medium of the waves in our minds.

Surely, the rainbow is not in truth what it seems to be. It is mere appearance. That is why it has been said that this world is like waves in

1 One who seeks knowledge water, or like a rainbow.

By what sign shall we, who live in the three-coloured world, recognize the man who has transcended the three gunas? He will not feel unhappy if the world mistakenly labels a man bad, or regards him as a man of knowledge or a lethargic man. What does it matter if the world thinks that we are mere agitators?

Thus, one who has risen above the three gunas will not seem to the world to be happy when one sees activity or unhappy when one sees lethargy. Such a person has come out of the duality of happiness and misery. He has risen above the pairs of opposites. A person like this should seem to us untouched, unconcerned, by anything. He should be absolutely free from egotism.

There is, thus, a state which is different even from the middle one. The Bhagavad Gita has stressed this point again and again. It teaches you just one thing, to shed the thought of “I” in such matters. We say neiti, neiti. You think I am such a person. In truth, I am “yes” and you are “no”.¹ A person who has risen above the three gunas should appear to the world to be a cipher, a mere stone. That is, he could have got rid of his “I”. The world has looked upon Rama as God incarnate, for it could not do otherwise. Shankara asked Parvati how she could suppose that Rama felt miserable because of separation from Sita. He was, he said, pained to see that she had attributed ignorance to Rama, who had shed his egotism and worked like a cipher.

[173]²

October 2, 1926

Every day we are born anew. Ayurved tells us that every seven years the whole body of a person changes into a new one, but that we are not aware of the change because it takes place slowly. The body does not change all of a sudden at the end of the seventh year, as if by magic, but the old body gradually wears out and is replaced by a new one. Thus, creation and destruction follow upon the heels of each other. There is no point of space so completely empty that you can put anything there without displacing something else, that is, you cannot create without destroying. Even the mind becomes either stronger or weaker day by day. Everything in the world is in a state of ¹ Gandhiji meant that one was more conscious of one’s own “I” than the “I” of another.

² The notes of this discourse were not taken by Mahadev Desai.
flux. Nothing is fixed. Only God is both fixed and changing.

A person who has risen above the three gunas is one who has become a cipher. But when can one be in such a state? In his poem beginning with the words apurva avasar, Shri Rajchandra sings: “When the body has become as the burnt rope”. That should be our condition. When a rope is burnt, only its form remains, and none of its other properties survive. Such a rope may be said to have risen above the three gunas, for it no longer has the property in virtue of which it can be used for connecting or binding things or drawing water from a well. A person who has risen above the three gunas is like such a rope. As a rope may produce on us the illusion of a snake, so we may think of such a person as being like inert stone or having no interest in any activity, but he does not care. It is our dharma to be like such burnt rope.

The only way of rising to this state beyond the three gunas is to cultivate the sattvik quality, for in order to rise to that state one is required to cultivate the virtues of fearlessness, humility, sincerity, and so on. So long as we live in the body, there is some evil, some violence. The most, therefore, that we can do is to be sattvik in the highest degree possible.

The state beyond the three gunas can only be imagined. It does not seem possible to maintain it in action. In concrete action, our state must be sattvik in the highest degree. We cannot say even of a seemingly perfect man that he has risen beyond the three gunas. We can only say that he seems to be like one who has so risen. Someone has said in English that, outwardly, we shall find no difference between a sinner and a man of virtue, but that the greater a sinner the more virtuous he can be. He ever thinks of his sinful life and gives up his vices one by one. To such a sinner, even a beautiful temptress like Rambha is but a wooden or stone figure. In this way, he becomes pure in no time.

If we wish to attain moksha any time, to rise above the three gunas, we should cultivate in us the sattvik qualities. That is why we pray: tamaso ma jyotirgamaya. So long as a person feels that he serves others, he is selfish. If he believes that he has risen above the three gunas, he is a great hypocrite. If we really serve others, people will certainly know that. How can we ourselves know it? It is said in the Bible: “Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand does.” That is the mark of a person being sattvik. The characteristics of such a person are almost similar to those of one who has risen above the three gunas, though, of course, the latter is undoubtedly on a higher level than the former since he knows neither what his right hand nor what his left hand does.

He, who, seated as one indifferent, is not shaken by the gunas, and stays still and moves not, knowing it is the gunas playing their parts;

He who holds pleasure and pain alike, who sedate, who regards earth, stone and gold, as all the same, who is wise and weighs in equal scale things pleasant and unpleasant, who is even-minded in praise and blame;

Who holds alike respect and disrespect, who is the same to friend and foe, who indulges in no undertakings—that man is called gunatita. ¹

A person who has risen above the three gunas knows what it is to be in that state but cannot describe it. If anyone can describe his state, he is not a person who has so risen, for he is still conscious of his “I”.

He who serves Me with an unwavering and exclusive bhaktiyoga transcends these gunas and is worthy to become one with Brahman.

For I am the very image of Brahman, changeless and deathless, as also of everlasting dharma and perfect bliss. ²

A person who struggles ceaselessly and hard to overcome his shortcomings may not perhaps succeed, in this birth, in overcoming them all, but in the end he will surely benefit. Today the world will censure him for his shortcomings; if, however, he bears all that in patience, and strives ever harder, he is sure ultimately to get peace of mind. Peace lies in the very fact of struggling. It is a source of great reassurance. Hence, we should strive to cultivate sattvik qualities.

[174]³

Chapter XV

October 3, 1926

The Lord Said:

With its root above and branches below, the ashvattha tree, they say, is imperishable; it has Vedic hymns for leaves; he who knows it knows the Vedas. ⁴

Shvah means “tomorrow”. Ashvattha, therefore, means this transient world which will not last beyond tomorrow. It is changing every moment. That is why it is ashvattha. He is a man of spiritual

¹ XIV, 23 to 25
² XIV, 26 & 27
³ The notes of this discourse were not taken by Mahadev Desai.
⁴ XV, 1
knowledge who knows the real nature of this world and also knows dharma.

[175]

October 5, 1926

Above and below its branches spread, blossoming because of the gunas, having for their shoots the sense-objects; deep down in the world of men are ramified its roots, in the shape of the consequences of action.¹

In the first verse, Shri Krishna shows the means of going beyond this world. In this verse, he has described the world from another point of view, that of the ignorant man.

Its form as such is not here perceived, neither is its end, nor beginning, nor basis. Let men first hew down this deep-rooted Ashvattha with the sure weapon of detachment:

Let him pray to win to that haven from which there is no return and seek to find refuge in the Primal Being from whom has emanated this ancient world of action.²

We shall remain apart from this world, while working in it, when we no longer look upon it as God’s sport but, regarding it as the sphere in which people run after enjoyments, cut it off at the root with the weapon of non-co-operation. In no other way is it possible to cut it off at the roots, for it is without beginning and without end. That is why Shri Krishna has advised non-co-operation.

To that imperishable haven those enlightened souls go—who are without pride and delusion, who have triumphed over the taints of attachment, who are ever in tune with the Supreme, whose passions have died, who are exempt from the pairs of opposites, such as pleasure and pain.³

They who crave to win that haven are indifferent to honour or insult. They are absolutely free from delusion. They have scored triumph over the taints of attachment. Those who are always atmarthi (that is, who are aware every moment that they are not their physical bodies but are the atman), whose cravings for objects of senses have subsided (who look not fear-struck but serene at the moment of death) are the enlightened souls that go to that imperishable haven.

¹ XV, 2
² XV, 3 & 4
³ XV, 5
On every leaf of the banyan tree are inscribed the Vedas, which means that Ramanama is inscribed on its every leaf. The world is a holy gift made by God out of His grace; the tree of the world grows from the navel of Brahma. But there is another world with its root below, whose leaves are the various objects of sense-pleasure; that world is the world of desire.

Adhyatmanityah means those whose thoughts dwell with love on Rama, who repeat His name and do His work.

[176]

October 6, 1926

Neither the sun, nor the moon, nor fire illumine it; men who arrive there return not—that is My supreme abode.

Its light is not borrowed from the sun or the moon or the fire, for it shines with its own light, men who reach it return not—that is my supreme abode.

A part indeed of Myself which has been the eternal Jiva in this world of life attracts the mind and the five senses from their place in prakriti.

“Every hair on the body chants the Vedas,” so sang Tulsidas.

When the Master (of the body) acquires a body and discards it, He carries these with Him wherever He goes, even as the wind carries scents from flower-beds.

Having settled Himself in the senses—ear, eye, touch, taste, and smell—as well as the mind, through them He frequents their objects.

The deluded perceive Him not as He leaves or settles in (a body) or enjoys (sense-objects) in association with the gunas; it is only those endowed with the eye of knowledge that see Him.

We see only the world, but do not see God who is immanent in it.

[177]

October 7, 1926

Yogis who strive see Him seated in themselves; the witless ones who have not cleansed themselves see Him not, even though they strive.

---

1 XV, 6
2 XV, 7
3 XV, 8 to 10
4 XV, 11
The first thing necessary, therefore, is the observance of the rules of yama-niyama.

One who has not observed them is apt to give wrong meanings to the verses of the Gita. Such a person would tell himself that, since the objects of senses are created by God, we should accept and enjoy them. They alone, who have become purified, who have suffered in the furnace of tapas, will read the right meanings.

The light in the sun which illumines the whole universe and which is in the moon and in the fire—that light, know thou, is Mine.¹

There is a story in an Upanishad which tells how some gods took the form of yakshas and went to test Agni, Vayu, etc., but were worsted.²

It is I who, penetrating the earth, uphold all beings with my strength, and becoming the moon—the essence of all sap—nourish all herbs.³

Pervading the earth, I uphold all beings with my strength, and becoming the moon, the producer of all sap, nourish all herbs, food-crops and all else that grows in the fields.

It is I who, becoming the Vaishvanara Fire and entering the bodies of all that breathe, assimilate the four kinds of food with the help of the outward and the inward breaths.⁴

Vaishvanara means the heat which digests food. The four types of food are what is sucked, what is licked, what is drunk and what is eaten.

And I am seated in the hearts of all; from Me proceed memory, knowledge and the dispelling of doubt; it is I who am to be known in all the Vedas, I, the author of Vedanta and the knower of the Vedas.⁵

[178]

October 8, 1926

There are two Beings in the world: kshara (perishable) and akshara (imperishable). Kshara embraces all creatures and their permanent basis is akshara.⁶

¹ XV, 12
² Gandhiji had probably the Kenopanishad in mind. If so, he did not recollect the details of the story correctly.
³ XV, 13
⁴ XV, 14
⁵ In his rendering Gandhiji has used the word “intellect” in place of “the dispelling of doubt”.
⁶ XV, 15
⁷ XV, 16
In this world there are two Beings—\textit{kshara} and \textit{akshara}. \textit{Kshara} means all beings which are subject to death, which have a name and form. The immutable reality behind them, the power of which sustains all, is \textit{akshara}.

The Supreme Being is surely another—called \textit{Paramatman} who as the Imperishable \textit{Ishvara} pervades and supports the three worlds.

Because I transcend the \textit{kshara} and am also higher than the \textit{akshara}, I am known in the world and in the Vedas as \textit{Parushottama} (the Highest Being).\footnote{XV, 17 & 18}

Because I transcend \textit{kshara}, that is, the world of name and form and am also higher than \textit{akshara}, the world and the Vedas know Me as the highest among all beings.

He who, undeluded, knows Me \textit{Parushottama}, knows all, he worships Me with all his heart, O Bharata.\footnote{XV, 19}

He is above all opposites. Once we have risen above this world, which is but \textit{maya}, need we think of God as its author?

Thus I have revealed to thee, sinless one, this most mysterious Shastra; he who understands this, O Bharata, is a man of understanding, he has fulfilled his life’s mission.\footnote{XV, 20}

I have disclosed to thee this most secret (the best even of the best) Shastra; he who understands this becomes a man of understanding, fulfils his life’s mission and also becomes free from his debt.

\[179\]

Chapter XVI

\textit{October 9, 1926}

The Lord said:

Fearlessness, purity of heart, steadfastness in \textit{jnana} and yoga—knowledge and action, beneficence, self-restraint, sacrifice, spiritual study, austerity, and uprightness;\footnote{XVI, 1}

Non-violence, truth, slowness to wrath, the spirit of dedication, serenity, aversion to slander, tenderness to all that lives, freedom from greed, gentleness, modesty, freedom from levity;

Spiritedness, forgiveness, fortitude, purity, freedom from ill will and arrogance—these are to be found in one born with the divine heritage, O Bharata.\footnote{XVI, 2 & 3}
Sattvasanshuddhi means purity of the self or inner purity. Jnanayogayavasthiti means certainty of knowledge; jnanavyavasthiti means unceasing direct experience, and yogavyavasthiti means constant awareness of God, sense of identity with Him. Ahimsa also embraces violence deliberately committed out of compassion (When Dr. Nangi was to perform an operation, he used to fast on the day previous, so that no emotional disturbances in him, like anger, etc., might affect the patient). A teacher who punishes his pupils without anger will have tears streaming from his eyes as he canes him. Consider Yudhishthira’s forbearance—when, in King Virata’s court, the King struck him, he did not let the drops of blood fall from his nostrils on the ground. Forbearance means returning good for evil, so profound is its significance.

[180]

October 10, 1926

Pretentiousness, arrogance, self-conceit, wrath, coarseness, ignorance—these are to be found in one born with the devilish heritage.1

Dambha means pretending to possess what one does not. Darpa means boasting about something which one possesses in only a small measure. Abhiman means being proud of a quality which one possesses. Narad showed pride when he had vanquished Kamadeva2 and he fell because of his pride. Parushya means harshness.

The divine heritage makes for Freedom. The devilish for bondage. Grieve not, O Partha; thou art born with a divine heritage.

There are two orders of created beings in this world—the divine and the devilish; the divine order has been described in detail, hear from Me now of the devilish, O Partha.

Men of the devil do not know what they may do and what they may not; neither purity, nor right conduct, not truth is to be found in them.3

Those who lack purity and truthfulness and whose conduct is not moral are diseased men and women. There can be no disease unless there is mental evil or bodily error. A person whose atman is awake every moment of his life constantly prays that his body be filled with light. How did Ladha Maharaj overcome his leukoderma?

1 XVI, 4
2 God of love
3 XVI, 5 to 7
Every time he applied the bel leaves on the affected parts, he prayed that light should enter his body. We can prevent unhealthy emotions from disturbing our body only if we daily pray for the flow of light into it. I would ask every person who suffered from a disease if he was free from attachments and aversions. Outwardly we may be clean and our conduct may be moral; but, in the absence of truthfulness, it is all as hollow as a drum. We gather here to cultivate that truthfulness.

[181]

October 12, 1926

‘Without truth, without basis, without God is the universe’ they say; ‘born of the union of the sexes, prompted by naught but lust.’

Holding this view, these depraved souls, of feeble understanding and of fierce deeds, come forth as enemies of the world to destroy it.

Given to insatiable lust, possessed by pretentiousness, arrogance and conceit, they seize wicked purposes in their delusion, and go about pledged to unclean deeds1.

Given to boundless cares that end only with their death, making indulgence or lust their sole goal, convinced that that is all.

Caught in a myriad snares of hope, slaves to lust and wrath, they seek unlawfully to amass wealth for the satisfaction of their appetites.2

How can desire and anger overcome him who is protected by willing submission to holy authority?

Anger consumes many times more energy than does joy. It is because people spend more energy than they can afford that injustice and tyranny prevail in the world.

[182]

October 13, 1926

Anger involves expenditure of energy by thirteen muscles, whereas laughter by only ten. Enjoyment of sense-pleasure leads to death. Brahmacharya leads to immortality. Once Raychandbhai was suffering from headache. I asked him to which theatre he had been to see a play. He replied that he had been witnessing a play at night, lying at home, and said that he did not wish to consume his energy in 1 Gandhiji’s rendering has “of sinful bent of mind” in place of “pledged to unclean deeds”.

---

2 XVI, 8 to 12
trying to cure his headache. It was good, he told me, that I saw him as he was. He was, he said, less powerful than God’s law.

Sexual indulgence necessarily leads to death. If people gave themselves up to it, God’s rule in the world would end, and Satan’s prevail.

This have I gained today; this aspiration shall I now attain; this wealth is mine; this likewise shall be mine hereafter.

This enemy I have already slain, others also I shall slay; lord of all am I; enjoyment is mine, perfection is mine, strength is mine, happiness is mine.

‘Wealthy am I, and high-born. What other is like unto me? I shall perform a sacrifice! I shall give alms! I shall be merry!’ Thus think they, by ignorance deluded.¹

Living in this way, man gambles away the ratnachintamani² of his body. Even Yudhishthira had gambled, and lost Draupadi too in the throw. We can, however, say that he had less of anger and desire in him than Duryodhana. We ourselves are full of that mixture. We must strive our best to raise ourselves to a higher level.

And tossed about by diverse fancies, caught in the net of delusion, stuck deep in the indulgence of appetites, into foul hell they fall.

Wise in their own conceit, stubborn, full of the intoxication of pelf and pride, they offer nominal sacrifices for show, contrary to the rule.³

Yajna is only a pretext; their real aim is to serve their own interests.

October 14, 1926

Given to pride, force, arrogance, lust and wrath they are deriders indeed, scorning Me in their own and others’ bodies.

These cruel scorners, lowest of mankind and vile, I hurl down again and again, into devilish wombs.

Doomed to devilish wombs, these deluded ones, far from ever coming to Me, sink lower and lower in birth after birth.⁴

Threefold is this gate of hell, leading man to perdition,—Lust, Wrath

¹ XVI, 13 to 15
² A precious stone which yields everything that is desired
³ XVI, 16 & 17
⁴ XVI, 18 to 20
and Greed; these three, therefore, should be shunned.¹

One who keeps himself free from these does not devote himself to the pursuit of worldly happiness, but follows the path of spiritual welfare.

The man who escapes these three gates of Darkness, O Kaunteya, works out his welfare and thence reaches the highest state.

He who forsakes the rule of Shastra and does but the bidding of his selfish desires, gains neither perfection, nor happiness, nor the highest state.

Therefore let Shastra be thy authority for determining what ought to be done and what ought not to be done; ascertain thou the rule of the Shastra and do thy task here (accordingly).²

In this context, we should say that we would obey our conscience. But, then, even Ravana would say that he obeyed his conscience. He alone can use this plea whose mind has become purified by knowledge acquired from Shastras. So the question is, what is Shastra? The Vedas, the works of history, the Puranas all these are Shastras. They, however, contain contradictory statements. Shastra comes from the root shas. Someone has argued that the Gita teaches the principle of “tit for tat”, and quotes Shaikh Sadi in his support, who said that he who was good to the bad would be bad to the good. But Shastra is subject to the principles of truth and non-violence. Shastra rules, and does not aim at spreading anarchy. But of this more tomorrow.

[184]

October 15, 1926

Whenever we have a social problem to discuss, we should think of authorities and consult them; as, for instance, in connection with the problem of dogs which is unnecessarily agitating me. If, however, our foundations are not strong, consulting a Shastra will avail us nothing. If the foundations are strong, it should be our principle that we will cling to truth at any cost. We shall have read Shastras to some purpose if we are determined that, even if Yudhishtira told a lie, our ideal shall be truth.

If by Shastra we mean a book, the Bible, the Koran and other books have been before mankind for so many hundreds of years, but no one has come to the end of these problems. The intention in this verse is to tell us not to look upon ourselves as an authority, that is, not to be guided by our wishes and feelings. So long as one’s intellect has not become vigilant and the heart is not filled exclusively with Ramanama, one should be ruled by the authority of the Shastras. Here Shri Krishna refers to the struggle in us between divine and demoniac impulses. So long as we are in that condition, we should be guided by the authority of the Shastras. That Shastra means shishtachara that is, we should follow the example of those forefathers of ours who were holy and fearless. The ideal of conduct among shepherds may be stealing sheep, and among meat-eaters eating meat. A boy once wanted to discuss with me whether or not we can eat meat, but his mother did not let me discuss the subject with him. She was right. She thought that nothing could be brought about by force. If the boy became a vegetarian, she thought, there would be a quarrel in the family. One must certainly fear shishtachara. It may be disregarded only if it requires one to violate truth, etc. Where the tradition of guru and disciple has disappeared, men will follow their own wishes. The Gita has advised us: tadviddhi pranipatena but it is not so easy to find a guru. If we keep on the search for a guru, we shall always have some wholesome fear in our heart. With the thought of a guru constantly in our mind, it will remain pure. The Gita tells us that, if the divine impulse has quickened in us, we should be humble. [One should think] “I know nothing. I want to ask God, or a guru, but how may I see either?” We should, therefore, pray. He who prays with faith in God will one day be saved. He who talks as if Brahman was in him will not be saved. The literal meaning of the verse is that we should be guided by the authority of the Shastras. The derived meaning is that we should be guided by shishtachara. To be shishta means that, in the absence of a guru, we should be humble, and to be humble means to worship our personal God. That is, we should look upon ourselves as insignificant creatures, like bugs and fleas, and worship God. If you are humble, you will be saved. If you are humble and sincere, the veils before your eyes will be lifted one after another.

¹ XVI, 21
² XVI, 22 to 24

Chapter XVII begins with the idea explained in this verse.

---

1. The prevailing social standard of right conduct
2. Acquire knowledge by prostrating yourself (before a guru); in IV, 34
Chapter XVII

Arjuna said:

What, then, O Krishna, is the position of those who forsake the rule of Shastra and yet worship with faith? Do they act from sattva or rajas or tamas?¹

By disregarding the manner enjoined in the Shastras means by disregarding the shishtachara, or without the guidance of a guru, and with faith means with some little humility. Shri Krishna’s reply to this is indirect. Not to accept Shastra as an authority and to have faith are inconsistent with each other. Faith consists in accepting the authority of Shastra.

Shri Krishna replies:

Threefold is the faith of men, an expression of their nature in each case; it is sattvik, rajas or tamas. Hear thou of it.²

Arjuna and Shri Krishna are friends, but the former does not understand that Shri Krishna is playing with him. It is certainly not Arjuna’s intention to corner Shri Krishna in argument. But the latter thinks that He might play with Arjuna a little. The Lord need not bother Himself why Arjuna put this question. He assumes that a person may disregard the manner enjoined in the Shastras, and then asks what kind of faith such a person has. Is it sattvik or rajasik or tamasik?

[185]

October 16, 1926

The faith of every man is in accord with his innate character; man is made up of faith; whatever his object of faith, even so is he.³

Faith can be enlightened. Everyone needs faith, provided one is not misguided by it. If anyone clings to a straw, he will certainly fall, but he will not fall who clings to the branch of a tree. Mrs. Besant has said that a person needs steps till he has climbed to the top. Shastra is such a step. Once a person has climbed to the top, he needs neither steps nor banisters. The top appears so perfectly flat to him that he pays no attention to what is below.

¹ XVII, 1
² XVII, 2
³ XVII, 3
Sattvik persons worship the gods\(^1\), rajasik ones, the Yakshas and Rakshasas; and others—men of tamas—worship manes and spirits.

Those men who, wedded to pretentiousness and arrogance, possessed by the violence of lust and passion, practise fierce austerity not ordained by Shastra.

They, whilst they torture the several elements that make up their bodies, torture Me too dwelling in them; know them to be of unholy resolves.\(^2\)

Those who do not even abide by the rules enjoined by Shastras but in their pride follow their self-chosen way fall into such a state.

If you put truth in one scale of the measure and tapas, Shastras and similar things in the other scale, the former will weigh heavier. That Shastra which seeks to suppress truth is of little use. Those who follow such a Shastra are men of demoniac inclination. If truth is timeless, so is untruth; and, likewise, if light is timeless, so is darkness too. We should embrace what is timeless only if it is combined with truth.

October 17, 1926

If a Shastra is not supported by truth and non-violence, it may even be the means of our fall. As they say, we should swim in our father’s well, not drown ourselves in it. Father in this context means shishtachara. It is said that one cannot get knowledge without a guru. The moment you have found one, you know what the shishtachara is. But these are such hard times that one does not easily find a guru. If we are doing God’s work, it is bound to be in harmony with shishtachara. That is why we are enjoined to keep repeating the Lord’s name while doing any work. This verse explains in what spirit we should do this. Our faith must not be in ghosts and spirits or in demons. We ought to pray only to a beneficent deity.

Of three kinds again is the food that is dear to each; so also are sacrifice, austerity, and charity. Hear how they differ.

Victuals that add to one’s years, vitality strength, health, happiness and appetite; are savoury, rich, substantial and inviting, are dear to the sattvik.\(^3\)

Victuals that are bitter, sour, salty, overhot, spicy, dry, burning, and

\(^1\) In his rendering Gandhiji has added here: “Gods mean sattvik powers or impulses”.

\(^2\) XVII, 4 to 6

\(^3\) XVII, 7 & 8
causing pain, bitterness and disease, are dear to the rajas.

Food which has become cold, insipid, putrid, stale, discarded and unfit for sacrifice, is dear to the tamas.¹

If we cling to this classification, we shall not come to the right conclusion. Shri Krishna has first explained the qualities of the sattvik man, and then his taste, etc. Ladu-lovers have included ladus in sattvik food. They do not help one to safeguard one’s brahmacharya. In interpreting the meaning of rasya, too, we should use discrimination. There must have been a reason in that age for making such a classification, for there must have been persons even then who would eat a handful of chillies at a time. In the present age, there is no need for eating snigdha foods. If here we start eating ghee, our food would be, not sattvik or rajasik, but such as a demon would love. The inclusion of bitter, sour and saltish foods is quite correct. Then the verse mentions food which has been left over. Stilton cheese (a food containing countless germs) is of this class. Daliya and mamara do not belong to this class.

[187]

October 19, 1926

That sacrifice is sattvik which is willingly offered as a duty without desire for fruit and according to the rule.

But when sacrifice is offered with an eye to fruit and for vain glory, know, O Bharatashreshtha, that it is rajas.

Sacrifice which is contrary to the rule, which produces no food⁷, which lacks the sacred text, which involves no giving up and which is devoid of faith is said to be tamas.⁸

A yajna without dakshina means one in which no gifts are made to the poor.

Homage to the gods, to Brahmins, to gurus and to wise men; cleanliness, uprightness, brahmacharya and non-violence—these constitute

¹ XVII, 9 & 10
² A sweet shaped like a ball
³ Relishing
⁴ Containing fat
⁵ & "Processed gram and rice
⁶ Gandhiji’s rendering has "grain” in place of “food”.
⁷ XVII, 11 to 13
austerity (tapas) of the body.¹
That is tapas in which one goes through physical discomfort or hardship.

Words that cause no hurt, that are true, loving and helpful, and spiritual study constitute austerity of speech.

Serenity, benignity, silence, self-restraint, and purity of the spirit—these constitute austerity of the mind.

This threefold austerity practised in perfect faith by men not desirous of fruit, and disciplined, is said to be sattvik.

Austerity which is practised with an eye to gain praise, honour and homage and for ostentation is said to be rajas; it is fleeting and unstable.

Austerity which is practised from any foolish obsession, either to torture oneself or to procure another’s ruin, is called tamos.²

A person who fasts for a hundred days or keeps standing on one foot performs not sattvik but tamasik tapas.

[188]

October 20, 1926

Charity, given as a matter of duty, without expectation of any return, at the right place and time, and to the right person is said to be sattvik.⁴

It may not in all circumstances be right to give what it is right to give in certain circumstances. This is also true about recipients. It is but right to give food to one who has lost the use of his limbs altogether. But suppose there is a blind man who is suffering from fever and comes begging. He would be an unworthy object of our charity if we gave him food. If we give him a blanket and he sells it, then also will our gift have been made to an unworthy person. In one place, it may be right to give food, in another something else, and in still another a third thing. The principle is the same in all cases, but its application will vary according to place, time and person. The same is true about yajnas.

Charity, which is given either in the hope of receiving in return, or with a view to winning merit, or grudgingly, is declared to be rajas.

Charity given at the wrong place and time, and to an undeserving

¹ XVII, 14
² XVII, 15 to 19
³ Gandhiji’s rendering has: “to one who is not in a position to do good in turn”
⁴ XVII, 20
recipient, disrespectfully and with contempt, is declared to the tamas.

AUM TAT SAT has been declared to be the threefold name of Brahman and by that name were created of old the Brahmans, the Vedas and sacrifices.

Therefore, with AUM ever on their lips, all the rites of sacrifice, charity and austerity, proceed always according to the rule, by Brahma-vadins.

Those who seek knowledge of the Brahman dedicate all their yajnas, gifts and tapas to Shri Krishna. They do everything in the name of Hari, in the name of Aum.

With utterance of TAT and without desire for fruit are the several rites of sacrifice, charity and austerity performed by those seeking Freedom.

SAT is employed in the sense of ‘real’ and ‘good’; O Partha, Sat is also applied to beautiful deeds.

[27] Constancy in sacrifice, austerity and charity, is called SAT; and all work for these purpose is also SAT.

Aum comes first in all these actions. Sat signifies the process of their performance. If we wish that we should be steady in our yajnas and gifts, then Aum signifies the commencement and sat signifies the process. Sat signifies process and also stands for Hari. Brahma satyam jagannimity has been stated in this sense.

Whatever is done, O Partha, by way of sacrifice, charity or austerity or any other work, is called asat if done without faith. It counts for naught hereafter as here.

Aum tat sat means that all that exists is Aum, that our “I” is unreal, that God alone is and nothing else is real, that we are all running after things in vain.

We should even eat our food in a sattvik spirit. There are persons who eat as an act of worship. We should resolve that we wish to live as ciphers in this world. The world may kick us from one place to another as if we were a ball, but we will not let ourselves be so kicked. We will use our knowledge, our bodies, our strength and money, all

---

1 Expounders of Brahman
2 XVII, 21 to 24
3 Vishnu
4 Gandhiji has not given a translation of this verse. He has, however, referred to its content in the comment which follows.
5 XVII, 25 to 27
6 XVII, 28
for the service of others, and that too not with the desire to earn a good name for ourselves. Thus, Aum tat sat is a vow of humility. It -teaches us to realize our utter insignificance, to be completely free from egotism. If the Imam Saheb¹ would recite it, here is a kalama for him.

[189]

October 21, 1926

The threefold classification of gifts, faith, tapas, etc., given in Chapter XVII is only an illustration. We can make as many categories
-as we like. The intention was to show that the reign of the three gunas prevails throughout the universe. A cooking or other utensil is an inert object, but it contains air inside; likewise, everything is pervaded by the spirit. Existing apart from the three gunas is God. We have to merge in Him. Even if we cultivate the sattvik qualities to their highest perfection in us, something of rajasik and tamasik will remain. But, without worrying ourselves about this, we should continue to strive and cultivate finer and finer sattvik qualities in us, for the impulses which agitate us the least and consume the least amount of our energy are sattvik impulses. Though Janaka was as good as a disembodied soul even while he lived in a body, the difference between him and us is only one of degree. It is true, of course, that for one like him there was no returning to this life after he was dead.

Chapter XVIII

In Chapter XVIII Arjuna requests Shri Krishna to explain to him the distinction between sannyasa and tyaga. He says:

Mahabahu! I would fain learn severally the secret of sannyasa and of tyaga, O Hrishikesha, O Keshinishudana.²

The Lord replies:

Renunciation of actions springing from selfish desire is described as sannyasa by the seers; abandonment of the fruit of all action is called tyaga by the wise.³

There is no real distinction between the two. Kamya karma seems to mean all karma—though I am not sure that I am right. Total renunciation of karma is not possible. The renunciation of all karma, then, is sannyasa, and tyaga means renunciation of fruits of karma.

¹ Abdul Kadir Bawazeer
² XVIII, 1
³ XVIII, 2
Yesterday I interpreted kamya karma to mean all karmas. Surendra then reminded me of the explanation given by Vinoba, namely, karmas undertaken with definite motives. But every karma has some motive behind it. That we may be unattached to it is a different matter, but the motive is bound to be served. The existence of the body itself means karma. Though we live in the body, we can live unconcerned with it.

Some thoughtful persons say: “All action should be abandoned as an evil”; others say: “Action for sacrifice, charity and austerity should not be relinquished.”

Hear my decision in this matter of tyaga, O Bharatasattama; for tyaga, too, O mightiest of men, has been described to be of three kinds.

Action for sacrifice, charity and austerity may not be abandoned; it must needs be performed. Sacrifice, charity and austerity are purifiers of the wise.

But even these actions should be performed abandoning all attachment and fruit; such, O Partha, is my best and considered opinion.

It is not right to renounce one’s allotted task; its abandonment, from delusion, is said to be tamas.

He who abandons action, deeming it painful and for fear of straining his limbs, he will never gain the fruit of abandonment, for his abandonment is rajas.

But when an allotted task is performed from a sense of duty and with abandonment of attachment and fruit, O Arjuna, that abandonment is deemed to be sattvik.

Neither does he disdain unpleasant action, nor does he cling to pleasant action—this wise man full of sattva, who practises abandonment, and who has shaken off all doubts.

For the embodied one cannot completely abandon action; but he who abandons the fruit of action is named a tyagi. ¹

When we have resolved to renounce the fruits of all karmas, we will engage ourselves only in karma which is in the nature of a duty for us. By the sannyasa mentioned in the first verse, the poet meant renunciation of all karmas. The central idea of Chapter XVII was that one should work without selfish motives. The state of mind in which such motives will have disappeared most is the sattvik state. Total renunciation of karma is impossible while we live in the body, and the atman’s connection with the body will remain right till the moment of death. What a person who has fallen into a state of samadhi can do is to stop the movements of the heart so that the heart-beat will not be perceived even with a stethoscope. The practitioners of yoga tell us that the soul can leave the body at will and fly away for a while. But to what purpose? We can certainly reduce the pulse-rate at will. The truth is that if a yogi really wishes that his soul should leave his body, his faculty of speech and his mind, it will certainly do so. I have no doubt that, if we do not will that the body should endure, it will certainly fall. But our desire to give up the body is never intense, for we feel even a pin-prick. A person like Ramdas Swami can even dwell in another’s body and feel his suffering, but he cannot be conscious of the bodies of all, except in imagination. All that we can do, therefore, is to shun karmas which have any trace of egotism in them.

¹ XVIII, 3 to 11

[191]

October 23, 1926

Harishchandra’s actions belonged to the category of tyaga. He was equally ready, when duty required him, to perform apparently evil as well as good actions.

To those who do not practise abandonment accrues, when they pass away, the fruit of action which is of three kinds: disagreeable, agreeable, mixed; but never to the sannyasis.

Learn, from me, O Mahabahu, the five factors mentioned in the Sankhya doctrine, for the accomplishment of all action:

The field, the doer, the various means, the several different operations, fifth and the last, the Unseen.

When Fate was no longer favourable, Arjuna was robbed though he still had with him the same bow and arrows which he always had.

Whatever action, right or wrong, a man undertakes to do with the body, speech or mind, these are the five factors thereof.

This being so, he who, by reason of unenlightened intellect, sees the unconditioned atman as the agent—such a man is dense and unseeing.

He who is free from all sense of “I”, whose motive is untainted, slays not nor is bound, even though he slay all these worlds.

If I put a pebble in . . . ’s hand and incite him to fling it at . . .

---

1 Gandhiji’s rendering adds here: “in which karma has been discussed”.
2 XVIII, 12 to 14
3 XVIII, 15 to 17
4 The names are omitted in the source.
5 Ibid
would the sin be on his head or mine? Arjuna dragged Krishna all the way from Dwarka [to Hastinapur] and was now saying that he did not wish to fight. Was that right? Shri Krishna tells Arjuna: “I ask you to fight.” What harm need Arjuna fear, then? The sword in Harishchandra’s hand was not his, nor was it Kashiraja’s. Harishchandra could have resorted to satyagraha, but should he have done that simply because the person in question was Taramati? When one’s self-interest is involved, one should do an [unpleasant] thing irrespective of whether in itself it ought to be done. If, however, no self-interest had been involved, if it was not that the woman was his queen, if Harishchandra had been repelled by the deed itself, so much so that his hand would have refused to obey him, he could have resorted to satyagraha.

If read superficially, this verse is likely to mislead the reader. We shall not find anywhere in the world a perfect example of such a person; as in geometry we require imaginary, ideal figures, so in practical affairs, too, we require ideal instances when discussing ethical issues. This verse, therefore, can be construed thus only: “We may say [for the sake of argument] that he whose sense of ‘I’ has melted away altogether and whose reason is tainted with no trace of evil whatever can kill the entire world; but one who is completely free from the egotistic sense of ‘I’ has no body, and one whose reason is absolutely pure is simultaneously conscious of time in all its categories, past, present and future, and there is only one such being, God, Who does nothing though doing everything and Who is non-violent though He kills”. Man, therefore, has only one course open to him, that of not killing and of following the shishtachara—of following Shastra.

Knowledge, the object of knowledge, and the knower compose the threefold urge to action; the means, the action and the doer compose the threefold sum of action. For instance, the idea that we must get swaraj is knowledge, and the person who deserves it is the knower. But this is not enough to bring us swaraj. There should be corresponding work for swaraj—the means of winning it. We can think out similar instances of any class of 1 Harishchandra was sold by sage Vishwamitra to recover the sacrificial gift due from him. When his wife, Taramati, came to the burning-ground to cremate her son, Harishchandra threatened to strike her with his sword because she prevented him from obeying his master and removing the shroud from the corpse.

2 XVIII, 18
activities.

Knowledge, action, and the doer are of three kinds according to their different gunas; hear thou these, just as they have been described in the science of the gunas.

Know that knowledge whereby one sees in all beings immutable entity—a unity in diversity—to be sattvik.\(^1\)

Things in this world seem distinct from one another, but in reality they are not so. If the jaundice in our eyes disappears, we would see all things as one, undivided reality.

That knowledge which perceives separately in all beings several entities of diverse kinds, know thou to be rajas.\(^2\)

That knowledge is rajasik which perceives separately in all beings different entities of various kinds.

It is through the rajas spirit that we make these three classes: I, mine and others. Attachments and aversions arise from this. The sattvik state has no room for attachments and aversions.

And knowledge which, without reason, clings to one single thing, as though it were everything, which misses the true essence and is superficial is tamas.\(^3\)

_Tamas jnana_ is that in virtue of which a person does everything with attachment, without seeing any purpose in what he does and believing that it is without significance and of no consequence.

In tamas knowledge, all kinds of notions are mixed up and it is believed that there is no such Being as God.

That action is called sattvik which, being one’s allotted task, is performed without attachment, without like or dislike, and without a desire for fruit.

That action which is prompted by the desire for fruit or by the thought of ‘I’, and which involves much dissipation of energy is called rajas.\(^4\)

A sattvik person does not go seeking work. A rajasik person is engaged one day in inventing an aeroplane and is busy the next in discovering how to reach India from England in five hours. Such a person sets apart half an hour out of twenty-four to deceive his _atman_, and devotes the remaining twenty-three and a half to his body.

Is the charkha work rajasik, or is it sattvik too? This can be

---

\(^1\) XVIII, 19 & 20

\(^2\) XVIII, 21

\(^3\) XVIII, 22

\(^4\) XVIII, 23 & 24
decided only by reference to the spirit in which it is done. If a person plies the charkha merely for the sake of money, his work is rajasik, but it will be sattvik if he does so for the good of the world, in the spirit of a yajna.

That action which is blindly undertaken without any regard to capacity and consequences, involving loss and hurt, is called tamas.¹

In tamas, a person plunges into work without thinking of the consequences. One who works without desiring the fruit of his work knows what that fruit will be, but does not yearn for it.

[192]

October 26, 1926

That doer is called sattvik who has shed all attachment, all thought of ‘I’, who is filled with firmness and zeal, and who recks neither success nor failure.²

Free from the sense of “I” means one who works merely as an instrument. To say that he should have no attachment does not mean that he should be indifferent; on the contrary, such a person should be more active than others. The relation of God’s devotee to God is, in one sense, that of the lover and the beloved, though in reality the two are as different from each other as north is from south. The devotee remains unattached [to sense-pleasures], whereas the lustful lover and beloved lose their vitality day by day. Do the British officials who come out to India lack anything in endurance and energy? They seem to be yogis, but they are not free from attachment. They believe in ends, and will adopt any means, fair or foul, for their sake. But one who is free from attachment is concerned with nothing but work and displays unfailing determination and energy. He displays determination and energy even in plying the charkha. A person who works in this spirit is a sattvik doer.

That doer is said to be rajas who is passionate, desirous of the fruit of action, greedy, violent, unclean, and moved by joy and sorrow.

That doer is called tamas who is undisciplined, vulgar, stubborn, knavish, spiteful³, indolent, woebegone, and dilatory.

¹ XVIII, 25
² XVIII, 26
³ Gandhiji’s rendering has; “easily excited by joy or sorrow in success or failure”.
⁴ In place of “spiteful”, Gandhiji’s rendering has: “lacking firmness of decision”.

320
Hear now, O Dhananjaya, detailed fully and severally, the threefold division of understanding and will, according to their gunas.

That understanding, O Partha, is sattvik which knows action from inaction, what ought to be done from what ought not to be done, fear from fearlessness\(^1\) and bondage from release.

That understanding, O Partha, is rajas, which decides erroneously between right and wrong, between what ought to be done and what ought not to be done.

That understanding, O Partha, is tamas which, shrouded in darkness, thinks wrong to be right and mistakes\(^2\) everything for its reverse\(^3\).

[193]

October 27, 1926

That will, O Partha, is sattvik which maintains an unbroken harmony between the activities of the mind, the vital energies and the senses.\(^4\)

If a person clings to the decision he has made without being exercised about the consequences, does not change it from day to day, then we may say that he possesses a will that is unswerving. “By yoga” means in a spirit of dedication to God.

That will, O Partha, is rajas which clings, with attachment, to right-eousness, desire and wealth, desirous of fruit in each case.\(^5\)
The first signifies dedication to God and the second attachment. Because of that attachment, one pursues dharma, artha\(^6\) and kama\(^7\). The decision of such a person may be faulty.

That will, O Partha, is tamas, whereby insensate man does not abandon sleep, fear, grief, despair and self-conceit.\(^8\)
Everything we do involves grief and ignorance and, at any rate, disappointment and fear.

Hear now from Me, O Bharatarshabha, the three kinds of pleasure.

Pleasure which is enjoyed only by repeated practice, and which puts an end to pain.

\(^1\) In place of “fear from fearlessness”, Gandhiji’s rendering has: “which things one should guard against and of which things one need have no fear.”
\(^2\) Gandhiji’s rendering has: “sees everything in a wrong light”.
\(^3\) XVIII, 27 to 32
\(^4\) XVIII, 33
\(^5\) XVIII, 34
\(^6\) Wealth, power
\(^7\) Pleasure
\(^8\) XVIII, 35
Which, in its inception, is as poison, but in the end as nectar, born of the serene realization of the true nature of atman—that pleasure is said to be sattvik.¹

One must do tapascharya for such happiness. It involves renunciation and, therefore, means hardship in the beginning. Everything in which one must sacrifice sleep and give up lethargy, for instance, study and learning and teaching, is a kind of tapascharya. But the reward is knowledge of the self. The bliss of knowing the atman is of the same character as the atman. The happiness of the body comes wholly from the satisfaction of desires, and because it depends on the satisfaction of desires it is transient. It is as transient as the life of a butterfly or a flash of lightning. The other happiness abides for ever. The happiness which springs from the serenity resulting from knowledge of the atman is like amrita.

That pleasure is called rajas which, arising from the contact of the senses with their objects, is at first as nectar but in the end like poison.²

Suppose we have been to a play or some such show. We enjoy witnessing it, but afterwards suffer for loss of sleep and also on account of the effect of the play on our mind.

That pleasure is called tamas which, arising from sleep and sloth and heedlessness, stupefies the soul both at first and in the end.

There is no being, either on earth or in heaven among the gods, that can be free from these three gunas born of prakriti.³

We should, therefore, strive to become free from these.

[194]

October 28, 1926

The duties of Brahmins, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas and Sudras are distributed according to their innate qualifications, O Parantapa.

Serenity, self-restraint, austerity, purity, forgiveness, uprightness, knowledge and discriminative knowledge, faith in God are the Brahmin’s natural duties.⁴

Serenity, self-restraint, tapas (to keep body, speech and mind under control by hard discipline), purity, forgiveness (to wish well, from the heart, even to a person who may have hit us with a stone), straightforwardness (to have no impurity in one’s eyes, to behave

¹ XVIII, 36 & 37
² XVIII, 38
³ XVIII, 39 & 40
⁴ XVIII, 41 & 42
decently), knowledge and knowledge based on experience (not bookish, dry knowledge), faith in God—these are the natural duties of the Brahmin.

A person may have the qualities enumerated above, but may not believe in God, may be lacking in faith and devotion; if so, those very qualities will prove harmful. For instance, in Europe these days they train the body for prize competitions and wrestling matches. These persons, too, are required to exercise discipline over the body, but that is done without devotion to God and helps them in no way. Hence belief in and devotion to God should be among the most important characteristics of a Brahmin.

Valour, spiritedness, constancy, resourcefulness, not fleeing from battle, generosity\(^1\) and the capacity to rule are the natural duties of a Kshatriya.\(^2\)

A Brahmin, too, should have these qualities. For instance, Vashishtha and other sages had them. Likewise, a Kshatriya should have the qualities of a Brahmin; for example, Yudhishthira, Ramachandra, etc., were Kshatriyas but possessed the virtues of Brahmins. Bharata was the very ideal of what a Brahmin should be. In this way every individual should display, in varying measure, the qualities associated with all the castes, and a person will belong to the caste whose virtues he possesses in a predominant measure. These will determine his natural karmas.

Tilling the soil, protection of the cow and commerce are the natural functions of a Vaisya, while service is the natural duty of a Sudra.

Each man, by complete absorption in the performance of his duty, wins perfection. Hear now how he wins such perfection by devotion to that duty.

By offering the worship of his duty to Him Who is the moving spirit of all beings, and by Whom all this is pervaded, man wins perfection.\(^3\)

Anyone who worships the atman—the Brahman—God that exists pervading the universe like its warp and woof,—reaches the goal; true success crowns him alone who sees prayer or worship in the karma which has fallen to his lot as his duty, who has made service and every karma of his a form of prayer.

\(^1\) In place of “generosity”, Gandhiji’s rendering has: “being always ready to help the poor”.

\(^2\) XVIII, 43

\(^3\) XVIII, 44 to 46
Better one’s own duty1, though uninviting, than another’s2 which may be more easily performed; doing duty which accords with one’s nature, one incurs no sin.

One should not abandon, O Kaunteya, that duty to which one is born,3 imperfect though it be; for all action, in its inception, is enveloped in imperfection, as fire in smoke.4

This does not apply to actions like a stealing; it applies only to actions which have been described in the preceding verses as the natural karmas of the four castes. Even if one sees some evil in such karmas—as, for instance, Arjuna’s shrinking from fighting because of his weakness of attachment— it is best to do them, for every karma, every beginning, is tainted with some evil.

He who has weaned himself from attachments of all kinds, who is master of himself, who is dead to desire, attains through renunciation the supreme perfection of freedom from action.6

Here by sannyasa is meant, not renunciation of all karmas but only the renunciation of the fruit of all karmas and it is such renunciation alone which can be successfully practised.

Learn now from Me, in brief, O Kaunteya, how he who has gained this perfection, attains to Brahman, the supreme consummation of knowledge.7

[195]

October 29, 1926

Equipped with purified understanding, restraining the self with firm will, abandoning sound and other objects of the senses, putting aside likes and dislikes.

Living in solitude, spare in diet, restrained in speech, body and mind, ever absorbed in Dhyananayoga, anchored in dispassion.

Without pride, violence, arrogance, lust, wrath, possession, having shed all sense of ‘mine’ and at peace with himself, he is fit to become one with Brahman.8

Ahangar, bala and darpa include one another, but it would not be like the Gita to use only one term. Its manner is to say the same

---

1 Gandhiji’ rendering adds here: “karma which is one’s duty”.
2 Gandhiji’ rendering adds here: “karma which is somebody else’s duty”.
3 Gandhiji’ rendering has: “which has come to one unsought”.
4 XVIII, 47 & 48
5 Gandhiji’ s rendering has: “He who has given up attachment to everything that is, has become free from attachment”.
6 XVIII, 49
7 XVIII, 50
8 XVIII, 51 to 53
thing over and over again in different ways. Laghvashi: I observe the vow of taking not more than five articles in my daily food, but, even if I keep it literally, I shall not have succeeded in keeping it well. Haridas mentioned dates and gave some good ones as gift. He watched my mood and offered me one to eat. I relished it, and immediately became conscious of a lapse. Even as it is, I told myself, you eat more than others do. I ate the date and it stuck in my throat. This is what should happen if we treat the body as something out of which we must take work.

In this verse, we are asked to purify the intellect and to be laghvashi. To be laghvashi does not mean merely to be moderate in eating, but to be satisfied with one article when we feel we can make do with two. It is as though this misfortune befell me because we would be discussing the word laghvashi today. A person may take a vow that he would live exclusively on milk, and then consume fifteen pounds a day, or convert it into *mava*¹ and eat it. Why is it that such a person won’t add water to milk and drink it? A barrister friend in England used to read for sixteen hours a day. He used to add water to his soup. Real hunger will prompt one to eat things that taste like amrita.

One with Brahman and at peace with himself, grieves not, nor desires; holding all beings alike, he achieves supreme devotion to Me.

By devotion he realizes in truth how great I am, who I am; and having known Me in reality he enters into Me.

Even whilst always performing actions, he who makes Me his refuge wins, by My grace,² the eternal and imperishable haven.

Casting, with thy mind, all actions on Me, make Me thy goal, and resorting to the yoga of even-mindedness³ fix thy thought ever on Me.

Fixing thus thy thought on Me, thou shalt surmount all obstacles by My grace; but if possessed by the sense of ‘I’ thou listen not, thou shalt perish.

If obsessed by the sense of ‘I’, thou thinkest, “I will not fight”, vain is thy obsession:(thy)nature will compel thee.

What thou wilt not do, O Kaunteya, because of thy delusion, thou shalt do, even against thy will, bound as thou art by the duty to which thou art born.⁴

---

¹ Milk boiled till it becomes a thick paste
² Gandhiji’s rendering adds here: “not through his own strength”.
³ Gandhiji’s rendering adds here: “knowledge and meditation”.
⁴ XVIII, 54 to 60
“Hence,” says Shri Krishna, “dedicate everything to me and, free from attachments and aversions and ever devoted to me, do the task which has fallen to your lot; so acting, you will remain untouched by sin.”

[196]

October 30, 1926

God, O Arjuna, dwells in the heart of every being and to His delusive mystery whirls them all, (as though) set on a machine. ¹

We are sitting on this ball of earth, which does not stop from rotating or revolving even for a moment. It keeps rotating and revolving all the twenty-four hours. The stars and the sun do the same. Thus, nothing in the world is motionless. But things do not move through their own power; it is God’s power which keeps everything in motion. Just as we keep a machine in motion only as long as we choose and it has no power of its own to move, so also does God keep us in motion as He wills. We should not, therefore, be proud that we have done something. We should shed our egotism, become as a machine in God’s hand and carry out His will, look upon Him as our all and obey His plan.

In Him alone seek thy refuge with all thy heart, O Bharata. By His grace shalt thou win to the eternal haven of supreme peace.

Thus have I expounded to thee the most mysterious of all knowledge; ponder over it fully, then act as thou wilt.

Hear again My supreme word, the most mysterious of all; dearly beloved thou art of Me, hence I desire to declare thy welfare.

On Me fix thy mind, to Me bring thy devotion, to Me offer thy sacrifice, to Me make thy obeisance; to Me indeed shalt thou come—solemn is My promise to thee, thou art dear to Me.

Abandon all duties and come to Me, the only refuge. I will release thee from all sins, grieve not! ²

This verse is the essence of all Shastras and of the Gita. Shri Krishna tells Arjuna: “You should give up all arguing and take refuge in Me. That will be wholly for your supreme good. Only the service of the atman will advance a person’s welfare.”

¹ The notes of this discourse were not taken by Mahadev Desai.
² Gandhiji’s rendering has “the clay of the potter’s wheel”, in place of “set on a machine”.
³ XVIII, 61
⁴ XVIII, 62 to 66
Utter this never to him who knows no austerity, has no devotion, nor any desire to listen, nor yet to him who scoffs at Me.

He who will propound this supreme mystery to My devotees, shall, by that act of highest devotion to Me, surely come to Me. All knowledge is preserved only when imparted to a person who is worthy of it, and not when imparted to one who is unworthy of it.

Nor among men is there any who renders dearer service to Me than he; nor shall there be on earth any more beloved by Me than he.

And who so shall study this sacred discourse of ours shall worship Me with the sacrifice of knowledge. That is My belief. That is, he who studies this intelligently will become free. Merely reciting the verses mechanically and without understanding their meaning will certainly not bring freedom.

[197]

October 31, 1926

And the man of faith who, scorning not, will but listen to it,—even he shall be released and will go to the happy worlds of men of virtuous deeds.

Hast thou heard this, O Partha, with a concentrated mind? Has thy delusion, born of ignorance, been destroyed, O Dhananjaya? Arjuna said:

Thanks to Thy grace, O Achyuta, my delusion is destroyed, my understanding has returned, I stand secure, my doubts all dispelled; I will do Thy bidding. Arjuna’s memory, which had become clouded, has become clear. He has understood what his nature and his duty are, and his doubt has gone.

Sanjaya said:

Thus did I hear this marvellous and thrilling discourse between Vasudeva and the great-souled Partha.

It was by Vyasa’s favour that I listened to this supreme and mysterious Yoga as expounded by the lips of the Master of Yoga, Krishna Himself.

1 Gandhiji’s rendering has; “this knowledge”.
2 XVIII, 67 & 68
3 XVIII, 69 & 70
4 Gandhiji’s rendering adds here: “one whose faith is blind may scorn”.
5 XVIII, 71 & 72
6 XVIII, 73
O King, as often as I recall that marvellous and purifying discourse between Keshava and Arjuna, I am filled with recurring rapture.¹

If we do not feel a new interest in this every time we read it, the fault must lie with us, it cannot be that of the author of the Gita.

And as often as I recall that marvellous form of Hari, my wonder knows no bounds and I rejoice again and again.

Whereasover Krishna, the Master of Yoga, is, and whereasover is Partha the Bowman, there rest assured are Fortune, Victory, Prosperity and Eternal Right.²

To Shri Krishna has been attached the epithet Yogeshvar and to Arjuna Dhanurdhara; this means that there are fortune, victory and eternal right only where there is perfect knowledge joined with light and power. He who has knowledge should have the fullest strength to use it; there should be perfection of knowledge and it should be fully translated into action.

We have taken this to be an imaginary conversation. The author of the Mahabharata has given us a wonderful work; he has displayed in it his perfect knowledge. He had entered into Krishna’s heart. Dhanurdhara means a person devoted to duty. Is there anyone who has attained to absolute knowledge? For that person, however, who has the strength of spirit to act upon what seems certain knowledge to him, there is no such thing as defeat; he may even have prosperity, and more than that he does not wish. If he goes on acting in that spirit, even his errors will be corrected in course of time. We know that we should always speak the truth, but manage to tell only half the truth but he who has pure knowledge and the necessary energy to act upon it, that is, has taken up a bow and arrow, will never depart from the path of morality.

We do not intend to give up the reading of the Gita; its reading at prayer time will continue, a few verses every day. We may also discuss some of them, if we wish to.

This is a work which persons belonging to all faiths can read. It does not favour any sectarian point of view. It teaches nothing but pure ethics.

¹ XVIII, 74 to 76
² XVIII, 77 & 78
CONCLUSION

November 4, 1926

The conclusion of our study of the Gita is that we should pray and read holy books, and know our duty and do it. If any book can help, it is this. Really, however, what help can a book or a commentary on it give? In the end, we achieve only as much as it is our good fortune to do. Our only right is to purushartha. We can only strive and work. All human beings, and animals too, struggle. The only difference is that we believe that behind our struggle there is an intelligent purpose. What is the purpose, however? Merely to keep alive this body, or to know that which has taken on this body? To raise it or advance it, if that is possible? For the first object we work in any case, whether we wish or no. Our body itself is so made that it makes us work for it, even if we are unwilling. For instance, while the baby still in the mother’s womb, its organs do function in one way or another. Though unconsciously, it does breathe. That also is a kind of effort. But it is not purushartha. Only effort aimed at the welfare of the atman can be described as purushartha. It has been described as the supreme purushartha. All else is futile expenditure of energy. For such purushartha, one of the means is reading the Shastras and reflecting and meditating on them. In order that our study may be really useful, it is necessary to repeat our recitation over and over again with attention to pronunciation, rhythm, etc. It is necessary to create an atmosphere of holiness round the Gita. If we are completely indifferent to it, then of course there is no question of attending to grammar, pronunciation, etc.

The truth about ourselves is that we strive for the supreme purushartha and know how to seek the means for it. We would honour and revere the Gita. It will certainly protect us. It is a deity of the mind. If so, we should read it daily as a part of our prayer.

What lesson shall we draw from all this? Today I will place before you only one idea. The Gita does not give the central importance to karma, nor to jnana nor to bhakti. It gives importance to all these. Oxygen is a very useful ingredient of air, but we cannot have only oxygen, other gases are equally necessary. Similarly, every element which the Gita includes is essential. Karma, jnana and bhakti, all three are essential, and each in its place is of central importance. Without bhakti human effort by itself will not succeed, and, without

---

1 Striving or determined effort
\textit{jnana, bhakti} will not bear fruit. Hence we see at places \textit{bhakti} or \textit{jnana} treated as a means which helps us in doing the right karma.

We can, however, do without any of the three elements, thanks to something else which has been explained. We cannot easily understand \textit{jnana} and can understand \textit{bhakti}, but we can understand karma more easily than either. Decorating the image, repeating Ramanama, all this is karma. Activity of every kind is karma. Karma means body. When any thought takes on a body, assumes form, it becomes karma. Body is a visible thing. To the degree that we can see the body, we can see karma. We cannot, therefore, live without karma, and that is why, we can say, the \textit{Gita} has stressed karma. However, \textit{bhakti} and \textit{jnana}, too, are essential. Let us suppose that we have boarded the ship; who is to give it motion now? Who will start it? We feel happy at the sight of the ship and board it, with faith [that it will move]. Similarly, karma is indeed necessary, but we shall reach the goal only when an intelligent engineer starts and drives the ship. The idea of renouncing karma is a futile one. Even a sannyasi cannot live without karma. This argument, however, comes in later.

The \textit{Gita}’s karma is not karma done under compulsion; it must be prompted by some little measure at any rate of knowledge.

[2]

\textit{November 5, 1926}\footnote{This was Diwali day.}

Following the path of non-violence, we discovered the value of the spinning-wheel, as also of \textit{brahmacharya}. Beyond the river [Sabarmati] is \textit{bhogabhumi} while this is \textit{karmabhumi}. We wish to follow the path of renunciation. But no renunciation is truly such unless it gives us joy. We cannot live without joy. It is but proper that we should celebrate Diwali in a different manner from how it is done on that side of the river. We should today draw up a balance-sheet of our work. Our books of accounts are in our heart. We should have completely cleared the debit side. A business man always credits in his book at least one and a quarter rupee [on the New Year day]. We can \footnote{The source has \textit{jnana}, which seems to be a slip.}

\footnote{Place for enjoyment}

\footnote{Place for duty}
follow him by making some good resolution. If we read the Gita regularly, we shall understand our duty easily.

The karma which the Gita advocates is done of one’s own free will, and it is such karma as one cannot live without at all. There is another definition of karma besides this. Karma means body. So long as the body is connected with the soul, it has motion and acts. But karma also means violence. Hence complete freedom from karma, which means from the body, is moksha. We should seek an existence that dispenses with this body and is beyond this world full of violence. In this world which is all karma, we should strive to cultivate a state of akarma. The Gita has shown how we can do this. We shall discuss this by and by.

November 6, 1926

The peace of mind and the joy we feel when, with closed eyes, we recite the verses from memory are really great. We feel less joy when we read the verses.

Today is padavo (the New Year Day). May you succeed in the good resolutions which you made before coming here. Anyone who has not made a single resolution should make one at least, that he or she will be sincere. If you do not become so, the bright outer surface will be no more than gilt and the inside will be base metal. Nothing will shine without truth; let everyone, therefore, resolve that he will show himself as he is. The joy one can get by showing oneself as one is, is not to be had by decorating one’s figure or beautifying oneself. There is untruth in wearing your cap at an angle, in wearing the sari in a particular style and dressing your hair smartly. Anyone who dresses himself in various fashions so that he may appear more handsome than he is starts learning a lesson in falsehood. We can build a palace on the foundation of truthfulness.

Chapter III deserves special attention. We saw yesterday that karma means the body, it means violence, and I told you then that I would discuss this idea further today. This Chapter dwells on the necessity of yajna. Yajna means work for the benefit of others. Afterwards, it is explained that every karma is tainted with evil, as it involves some measure of violence. However, violence committed for the sake of yajna is not violence. Yajna here does not mean that yajna in which they kill animals. There was a time when such yajnas were regarded as true yajnas, but now most people believe that they are not so. Since, however, every karma involves violence, I have divided violence into two categories. There is violence when the intention is to give pain, otherwise it is only an act of killing. Breathing involves killing, which is unavoidable violence, and is, therefore, forgiven. Without such unavoidable violence, we cannot keep alive the body for its sacred pilgrimage. It is a principle of homoeopathy that the patient should take in the smallest possible quantity the very substance which has caused the disease. Similarly, if we wish to become non-violent in this violent world, we shall advance as we gradually become more and more non-violent. On the other hand, trying to overcome violence with violence leads to evil consequence. Akarma means reducing karma and the degree of violence involved in each karma. One who does that will not go seeking work to do. Such a person will ultimately reach a state in which his thought itself will be action. We cannot pursue even bhakti or jnana without some measure of karma—we shall see tomorrow how this is so.

November 7, 1926

Since every karma involves violence, our ideal is to escape all karma, which means to win deliverance from this life. This does not mean that the world in which we live should vanish or be destroyed; it means that one should voluntarily renounce activity and sit at home quietly, that is, live in Vaikunth\(^1\), knowing that this world of name and form is transient and that it is unprofitable to take pleasure in it. This, however, is not possible. We cannot, through force of will, have this world vanish from before us, or bring about the moksha of all people in it. Everyone, then, should seek his moksha; but how? By committing suicide? One who kills himself will not escape the body. It is opposing the law of nature to seek escape in this manner. It is with the mind that we have to renounce the body. If every karma involves violence and evil, we can mentally renounce karma. Does it mean that, after renouncing karma in that manner, one can do any karma one chooses? No. At present we mentally draw to ourselves innumerable things. When we have mentally renounced all karmas, a great many of them will fall off on their own. Such a person will then use to his benefit, as much as he can, the world from which all air will have escaped. “Only the outward form surviving, as of the burnt rope”; however, the burnt rope will also occupy a little space. Even if it is

\(^1\) The abode of Vishnu reduced to dust particles and they fly away into air, they will certainly occupy some space somewhere! It is our belief that if the outward form vanishes and the dust particles, too, vanish, then everything will have vanished. Like the sea, God neither increases nor decreases. The dust particles, obeying their nature, will have merged in Him. When we have renounced karma mentally, all attachment to it will have ceased. Such a person will not even think what his duty is. He will be working only as directed by others. It is not he who will be doing the unavoidable, residual karma; God will be doing that. If I am not responsible even for my breathing, I am doing it under force, not willingly. A person who acts in such manner is non-violent. No one can be more non-violent than this while living in the body. Hence, as we saw in Chapter III, karma done in the spirit of yajna, that is, for the benefit of others, does not bind. To do karma for the benefit of others means to enlist ourselves as soldiers in God’s army, to dedicate to Him our all, body, mind, wealth, intellect. I read a book by a protestant named Wallace. He saw that their activity of converting others to Christianity did no good. He decided to mix with our people. He fell in love with the religions of India, but he could not forget Jesus. He then embraced the Roman Catholic Church, and felt that he was nothing as an individual, that the Church was all. He made an image, Parthiveshwar Chintamani, and resolved to surrender himself to it. As for the line of guru and disciple [to which he should belong], he looked upon society as a whole as his guru. This idea has appealed to me. If the Pope is immoral, there is bound to be corruption in society, but any person who has decided that he will do nothing on his own but do only what the Pope asks him to do, will only benefit himself. A protestant would say that one should obey one’s conscience, but this Wallace kept his conscience out and surrendered himself to the Pope. His giving up concern for his conscience was a great idea. He has narrated a story. A Hindu once advised him 1 that repeating Ramanama was good and a Muslim advised the name Khuda. He repeated the names Rama and Khuda by turn. He once saw that another person uttering Ramanama was floating on water. Thereupon, he started saying Khuda-Rama and began to sink. God then told him: “My friend, I am both Khuda and Rama.” This man, Wallace, thus wanted to cultivate single-minded devotion. His worshiping another person wholeheartedly was itself worship of his conscience. Everything becomes easy only when one surrenders oneself to God and lives as a cipher. A person who does so will have renounced all karma. Suppose a woman regularly goes to the haveli, and that the other women who go there are immoral. This woman, however, will be saved. The man who taught the mantra of Ramanama could not float, but the other one who learnt it and used it with faith did. Similarly, this woman who goes to the temple sees no immoral figure in the image, she sees only God. She would swim across and be saved; the others would be drowned. In the same way, anyone who mentally renounces all karma will be doing even the unavoidable, residual karma unwillingly and, therefore, will not be responsible for them. If he eats, he does so unwillingly; he breathes, too, unwillingly. How smooth everything becomes as soon as we mentally renounce all karma. We shall discuss tomorrow the meaning of violence and non-violence and of bondage and moksha.

1 It is not clear from the source who is meant.

November 9, 1926

A person can be free from karma only when he gives up his body altogether. Even the wish to live in the body must be renounced. If it is not, one will have to pass through many more lives. The wish to live in this body is what is termed dehadhyasa. That is the sea of existence. While we remain in it, we shall ever be tossed about by the waves. In the course of time, then, we may perceive the deep truth that what we call happiness is not happiness but only an illusion of happiness, that misery is not misery but only an illusion of it. If a person mentally renounces karma, he becomes free from the sense of “I” and “Mine”. He, therefore, resolves to work only in the spirit of yajna and for the benefit of others. Work done in such spirit is ahimsa, but only when two conditions are fulfilled by it. One is that there should be no element of selfishness in our motive, and the second is that there should be no self-interest of ours in it, that on the contrary it should be for the good and for the benefit of the world. If these two conditions are fulfilled then even the most dreadful-seeming act may be regarded as an act of ahimsa. We attribute ahimsa to an act, but we can do that only if the act is for the service of others. If a person can truthfully claim that he eats and performs other like acts in a disinterested spirit he is free from attachments. The wish to live in the

1 Vaishnava temple body remains so long as I cling to it. We cannot hold a string in a disinterested spirit; holding it is an act of will. If a person has withdrawn his mind from the body as much as is humanly possible, he wins freedom from bondage to the body. What I am discussing is the question of violence and non-violence, of living in the body and being free from bondage to it. If this bodily life has no sense, use the body for the services of others, for a life of prayer to God. Those who advised us thus were not ignorant men, they spoke from experience. It is we who did not understand them. It is extremely difficult to give up our clinging to the body. Someone may well ask how we can explain this idea to a child. My reply is that it is only in young age that this idea is easily understood; one cannot understand it after one has lost one’s teeth. A historian has said that there is no difference in outlook between youth and old age. Youth has desire and the capacity to satisfy it; in old age, the capacity is wanting and so the desire becomes stronger. If we do not follow the example of Menavati, who explained to Gopichand [the futility of attachment to bodily life], we shall invite misery upon ourselves. I go a step further and say that an old man is far more thoughtless than a young man. A prince is always surrounded by hakims\(^1\) and consuming yakutis\(^2\) but he is ever talking Vedanta\(^3\). Thus, boys and old men are the same in this regard.
Anyone who imbibes something, however little that may be, from these verses from the whole work, commencing with Aum—can attain complete peace. For him there will be only work undertaken for the service of others; the innumerable other karmas will have fallen away.
If, while we live in this body, we keep it yoked to work like a bullock to the cart, it will run after fewer things to do and with very much less intensity. We shall, then, seem to be doing nothing, but in fact we shall be working with energy which it is impossible to describe. We should seek out one activity or karma from among the countless in the world, or rather one activity or karma should come seeking us. Anyone who wants to serve will find objects of service anywhere. At the end of all discussion, Shri Krishna asked Arjuna in Chapter XVIII: “Surrender yourself to Me, do this very thing, but in obedience to My command.
Dedicate your all to Me and go on with it.” How this can be done, we shall discuss later.

\(^1\) Practitioners of Unani system of medicine

\(^2\) Unani tonics

\(^3\) Metaphysics (especially of the Upanishads)
Today we are to have a bird’s-eye view of the discussions, but I simply could not think out what to say. Right at the end of the work, in Chapter XVIII, Vyasa wondered what he had been making Krishna teach Arjuna, whether it was knowledge or ignorance, pure bhakti or something else. So he made Krishna brush aside all else and say: “Abandon all duties and come to Me, the only refuge.” He later made Arjuna also say that he had forgotten what he had been taught. The Lord replied that He, too, did not always remember the discussion and said that He would teach something new. And so He taught another Gita which no one remembers.

Swami . . . has been wandering for twenty-seven years, but till this day he has discovered nothing. Finally, now, he has joined the sect of . . . . I am talking in a tone of despair, but what I am saying is true. How does one, and how should one, seek refuge in the Lord? Shri . . . , the goldsmith, asked me to give him something, saying “Else, what could I carry back with me?” I looked at him for a while, unable to think of anything. Then I said: “Repeat Ramanama.” What was it, however, that I gave him? And what did he receive? Things don’t work that way. This is an old custom, but how many people following it seek refuge in Rama? The Gita was not the first work which advised us to seek refuge in the Lord. How, then, can we end our restless yearning? We must look inwards, not outwards, to discover the way. If we look outwards, where should we search? If God, on the other hand, is not outside of us but inside, how may we look inwards? How shall we blow up the big rock that lies across our way as we look inwards? To seek God means to sink into ourselves, that is, to renounce all activities. Since, however, it is not possible to renounce all activities, we should engage ourselves in as few activities as possible, reduce ourselves to the utmost insignificance. To seek God is not a Herculean task, as the world may think it is; all that is necessary is to make oneself humble and yoke the mind to work every minute for the welfare of the atman. It is we who obstruct ourselves in this effort.

1 In XVIII, 66
2 The Mahabharata, “Ashvamedha Parva”
3 The names are omitted in the source.
4 Ibid
5 Ibid
What should we do to overcome the obstructions? This is the first thing taught in the science of yoga. I have been thinking what education we should plan for boys and girls. They must get training in this. We should not deprive them of their right to get it. We wish to identify ourselves with the poor, but the children of the poor get nothing. From their infancy they work in the fields. Wherever the farmers’ work is done systematically, their children are employed in such work right from their early years and few people think about the problems which exercise us. The way to realize God, which means the way to win swaraj too, is to do something which seems altogether unimportant, and that is, to show ourselves as we are even before children. If such behaviour becomes natural to us, the children will also watch it with admiration. I told you about Wallace. He said at the end: “I have still not surrendered my reason, and it is a protestant reason.” But he did surrender his reason, his views, his all, and the salt was absorbed in the water of the sea. That is what the Buddha called nirvana. Such a person would not even remember that once he was an insignificant entity and think that he had now become the sea. We should, therefore, experience our insignificance, undertake the least important task and for its sake renounce everything, cultivate perfect disinterestedness.

We can achieve nothing by busily running about. The Gita advised Arjuna to give up concern with all dharma, that is, to take up the least important work and experience his insignificance. It tells us, in effect: “Live as a servant of the world; it is beyond your capacity to do more.”

[7]

November 12, 1926

Can procreation for yajna be described as consistent with brahmacharya? Yes, it can. In it, however, the desire for progeny is more important than concern for yajna. Whereas the world simply cannot go on without non-violence practised as yajna, we cannot say that procreation is essential. If the smritis say, nevertheless, that brahmacharya is possible for a householder, they use the term brahmacharya in a restricted sense which we have completely rejected in our discussions.

Besides, there is one more argument. If destruction is violence,

1 Sacred books prescribing rules for personal conduct and social life creation, too, is violence. Procreation, therefore, involves violence. The creation of what is bound to perish certainly involves violence.

[8]

November 13, 1926

The Mahabharata is a unique work and in it the Gita has a unique place. Describing a physical battle, it gives an account of an invisible fight and shows through it that in the physical battle not only those who lose but even those who win are defeated. The five or six who survived lived as though they were dead. Dhritarashtra becomes miserable, and so does Kunti. We see in the Swarga-rohana Parva the fate which meets the five brothers and Draupadi. They die one after another. Yudhishthira, too, is hardly able to reach the end of the journey. And, therefore, Vyasa says that what they got from their victory was no better than dust.

This does not mean that we should stop striving. In one sphere, Fate is all powerful, and in another purushartha. Purushartha means striving, and supreme purushartha means escaping from the pairs of opposites. Living in the world of opposites is no better than collecting dust with our hands. It is, however, the purpose of the Gita to show that every particle of dust can become as valuable as a jewel in certain conditions. The three gunas are aiming arrows at you from all sides. If you remain unmoved as they pierce you, you can win. Those arrows may fall on the body and on the atman dwelling in the body, but, let them fall as long as they may, what harm can they do me so long as my atman is awake?

What is the condition under which this may be so? To explain who can understand this problem, Shri Vyasa gave the Arjunavishtadayoga. Arjuna here stands for the atman seeking knowledge. So long as the intellect is not aroused by circumstances, it will not feel the desire for knowledge. The Gita is not for the intellect so long as it remains ensnared by worldly allurements. Is the Gita for students? It is for all those who have faith, such faith that they wish to be Arjunas. A student who believes the statement of his teacher that India is 1,900 miles in length and 1,500 miles in breadth will not take up a rod and start measuring the distances. He takes the statement on trust. Similarly, when the teacher tells the pupils in the first standard that the earth is

1 Mother of the Pandavas
2 Chapter I
round, an intelligent pupil will believe him and start arguing with another who holds that it is flat. The pupil who is convinced of the truth of the statement will not question it. Such a pupil will also take on trust statements concerning dharma, which is also a kind of geography, as he does those about the physical science of geography. He will exercise his curiosity in regard to many problems, but some things have to be accepted on trust. For instance, the definition of a straight line. Afterwards, such things become clear as daylight. The years of student-life are a time when one should take things on trust. Why students, even grown-up people take things on trust. We have no choice but to have faith in the ultimate things which remain unexplained by reason. A student’s reason is virgin, and it is not taxed much. As it sharpens and acquires light and power, he goes on solving problems with its help by repeatedly putting questions, bowing humbly to the teacher as he does so. The only condition is that the pupil should feel curiosity and be eager to know. That is why Chapter I is called Vishadayoga. The term means the path which unites one to God through despondency. If we wish to be filled with exclusive devotion to God, to win moksha, we should go through despondency...¹ told me: “Cannot we see God through fasting? Is it not right that we should punish the body severely if we feel all the time distracted by evil thoughts?” “There are,” he said, “so many bawas in the country. Some of them lie on spikes in the fierce sun and derive great contentment; surely they cannot be thinking evil thoughts at that time?” We shall find such persons in Europe too. Fakirs also have that experience. There have always been people in the world who did tapas, and theirs is not a crazy notion. I have merely put before you my humble view. I do not ask you to do such things. Our aim is to mortify the mind, to teach it patience in order to purify it. Fasting and similar lashes are sufficient for that. If we could be certain that we would always succeed in our aim by fasting, everyone would fast. Do you think there are only a few in this world who seek knowledge? There are many such. People suffer a great many hardships to secure worldly things; do you think, then, that nobody would come forward to suffer being pierced with a nail in the neck for this purpose? I have seen persons who stabbed themselves with a knife as they begged for a pice. If people can do this to themselves for a pice, why should they not do it for a throne? But that path is not easy. We have a middle way open to us, which is the only one worth following. But there is a point in what . . . ¹ told me, and that is that we should have a burning aspiration in this direction. We should have the same impatience and yearning for _moksha_ which lustful men and women display for the gratification of their lust. Let us renounce our yearning for worldly things and cultivate yearning for _moksha_ instead. The first condition for one to be like Arjuna is that one should feel a burning aspiration. People start making distinctions between “mine” and “others”. There is no doubt about whether we may kill or not. We know that we may not kill. The eternal law is not the law of killing. Arjuna did not have the strength to follow that independent law, and merely asks how he could bring himself to aim his arrows at Drona and Bhishma. In this way, he made the false distinction between “his” and “others” and declared that he would not fight. But he is a mature man. He does not decide impulsively while sunk in darkness. He is all love for Krishna. Sinking with nervous fear, he asks Krishna to solve his problem. It is only when we feel nervous like him that we shall be cured. We shall not be cured till we feel a crisis. The experience is like the pangs of childbirth. Arjuna’s experience is that which overwhelms one when one feels born again; may all of us have this experience. If the feeling endures, we would be saved.

¹ The names are omitted in the source.
² Mendicant sadhus

[9]²

In Chapter II, [we see that] the seeker should be eager. A person gets knowledge only when he suffers so much for it that his body becomes completely wasted and seems as if it would pass away any moment. We learn the same lesson from the story of _Gajendramoksha_ and the narratives about Draupadi and others. When one has suffered so much, one gets knowledge and one’s reason becomes purified. When Pilgrim felt that he was surrounded by fire on all sides, he ran without worrying about his wife and children. When we have such a feeling, we may say that our reason has become purified, and all veils will then be lifted. Arjuna’s heart is in the right place, but it is enveloped in ignorance and, therefore, it cannot help him to decide. So Krishna explains the distinction between _atman_ and the body. He advances one argument to convince Arjuna, till he is overwhelmed by it. Arjuna was worrying so much about the body; he should now worry

¹ The names are omitted in the source.

² The date of this discourse is not given in the source.
equally for the atman. Krishna explains to him that the two things are distinct. The atman neither kills nor is killed. It is the body which perishes. Arjuna should know that in any case it will die, and should not worry about it. But this was only an argument. What should you to do, you will have no cause to repent. Even if you make only a moderate effort, it will be rewarded. You should take my word that what you do, however small, will bear fruit.” What type of person is he who works without worrying about the result? To answer this question, Shri Krishna describes the characteristics of such a person in Chapter II itself. The description creates so much interest in Arjuna, who was yearning for knowledge, that he feels eager to hear further.
He has no inkling yet of bhakti. One cultivates it only when one forgets everything else. Mira was filled with bhakti when she realized that having seen the light of the sun and the moon, she did not need the light shed by a glow-worm. If such a person still needs to do karma, it is only for serving others and not for his own sake. A bhakta may do exactly what we do, but his reason will show him how to do it in a different manner. And so the Lord explains how to do karma, and thereafter He explains the secret of bhakti. [Understanding that], one’s attachment to the body falls away, the atman becomes stronger and awakens more fully day by day, and ultimately one sees it in a divine vision.

When Arjuna becomes utterly weak, his intellect is awakened. Shri Krishna then tells him: “Your intellect by itself will not serve you. You will need to do yoga, karmayoga.” Tilak Maharaj has demonstrated this with many convincing arguments. He has shown that the intellect needs, as it were, to take a partner to itself and be a householder. When Arjuna asked Shri Krishna to explain to him the characteristics of the person practising both forms of yoga, the latter enumerated the characteristics of a sthitaprajna. This confused Arjuna. Would such a person be a man of karma or a jnani?

In Chapter III, therefore, Shri Krishna explains the meaning of karma. No one can live at all without karma. Mirabai begged of the Lord that she should think on Him with every breath she took. We do not breathe consciously, but do so instinctively. A healthy person does all karmas with detachment in the same manner as he breathes. Karma may be a sign of health and it may also be a sign of disease. For instance,

---

1 The date of this discourse is not given in the source.
the manner in which a person suffering from asthma breathes indicates that he has a disease. This is also true of a man who feels suffocated. Similarly, one’s karma may be a sign of health in some other person, but not in oneself. After this, Shri Krishna gave the example of Janaka and others. Citing His own example, He said that He, too, had to work and keep the machine going. He could not so much as stretch His limbs for rest. Arjuna could sleep, Shri Krishna said, but He could not. Even then, He was always detached. If we follow this example, our intellect would retain its power till we are a hundred, or rather it would grow in strength with years. But human beings are attached to sense pleasures. If they were not, they would always attain perfect knowledge in course of time. If our experience is to the contrary, let us not pay attention to that. We are imperfect human beings and deduce imperfect principles from our imperfect experience. There should be, therefore, some flaw somewhere if experience tells us otherwise. Look at a fruit. As it grows bigger, it becomes more juicy and richer. The date has fallen off the tree and dried, but how sweet it is! Similarly, the intellect of a person who does not violate God’s law should ripen and grow with years. In actual experience, however, we find that as a person grows older, he or she declines in strength and intelligence. Such a person has been a lover of gross pleasures in his life.

For an ordinary person, Chapter III is as valuable as a silver pot. It is extremely useful.

[11]

We have seen that God does not cease from karma even for a moment. How, then, can we win moksha? The reply was that the body should be left to do its karmas, that the atman was not involved in them. This teaching has been altogether misinterpreted by immoral people. But, truly speaking, it is easy enough to understand that the bond of the body itself involves karma. If there were no body, there would be no need to do karma, and God having no body He has no need to do karma. But the Lord says that, even though He has no body, He does not cease from karma. He should, therefore, be thought of as having one, for this entire visible creation is His body. When we think of Him as having no body, He is a Formless Reality. If the atman realizes that the body does its karma, it will be free from the bond of the latter. How can one feel that it is the body which goes on doing certain karmas? The body cannot do karma without the ego. Without the atman, the body itself can do nothing. This is one more problem. This makes the atman a doer. It means, then, that the atman, joined to the ego, dwells in the body and does things. What we should do then was explained in Chapter III. “Service of others brings holy merit to one, and through harassment of others one incurs sin.” We may unhesitatingly do what is most for the benefit of others. We shall, of course, assume that the person doing that will be as detached from it as he can be. When we take the least credit for such work, it will be done with the most efficiency. A person walking with his natural speed of a mile an hour will outdistance another running at a speed of sixty miles, for the former will have his joy in his atman, whereas the latter will be full of doubts. His running will on the whole serve no purpose. If our work is free from egotism, though our speed may be slow, we are certain to reach the goal. Let us by all means work in the spirit of yajna and for the benefit of others. All that we should concern ourselves with is whether it is the body or the atman that we serve. To say that man is born for service of others is true in one sense only, because all his work is prompted by self-interest. If this self-interest is the interest of the atman, then one’s work is for the benefit of others. All the activities of such a person will be prompted by the motive of service.

1 The date of this discourse is not given in the source.

Hence, the Lord concluded this part of the argument with the verse, “Better one’s own duty, bereft of merit.”¹ That means that, be one’s own dharma what it is, even if it is seemingly without merit, it is better than another’s which may have greater merit in it. Arjuna was attracted by the dharma of other people, and therefore, the Lord told him that, however good it was, it was not his dharma. Dharma well performed cannot be another’s, for in fact such dharma cannot be well performed. Only one’s own dharma can be well performed. The truth is that ultimately Arjuna will have to renounce both his own dharma and that of others, but he cannot have that moksha right now. Swadharma is what is natural to one. For him who works without egotism, his dharma lies clear before him. It grows and expands on its own. We can satisfactorily perform only our dharma, that which lies before us. We are deluded if we think that we can do teaching better than the work of cleaning lavatories which may have been assigned to us. We do as much good by cleaning lavatories as we would by teaching. From one point of view, the former is certainly without merit. What is cleaning lavatories in comparison with studies? The Ganga stands nowhere in comparison with the sea. The Ganga’s

¹ III, 35
The date of this discourse is not given in the source.
you to make a show of your knowledge of it. If you know the verses by heart, you will get a little electrical energy from them at some hour of the day. You will think of some verse or other, and it will save you. These verses are like oxygen. For those who read the Gita with faith, it is like the fabled wish-yielding tree. It can end all of our threefold sufferings. We may not see such a result in this life, but our faith should not be shaken on that account. If the result does not come, the reason will be deficiency of our own effort and not want of truth in the idea itself. It is only if we read the Gita in this spirit that it will prove the amrita of knowledge.

[13]

How should we define swadharma? The varnashrama had its origin in this idea. It is not peculiar to Hinduism, but prevails all over the world. In view of this, it is necessary to consider what swadharma means. In Chapter XVIII, we were even told that following one’s swadharma one attains perfection; that is, following one’s swadharma one attains equality with all. In this transitory world, we see equality nowhere. No two leaves are equal. But the Gita shows the way to equality. We shall see tomorrow how it does that.

[14]

Swadharma, though devoid of merit, is better than paradharma, so much so that, if need be, one should prefer to die while doing one’s swadharma. The reason is that paradharma may prove dangerous. We should be careful about this. No one should do work which belongs to another, for that may be dangerous. Suppose that there is a powerful minister in a country. Asquith was superior in authority to the commander-in-chief of the army, but his dharma was only to issue orders and it was for the latter to give effect to them. Obeying his orders, the commander-in-chief would order the army to march to the battle-field. Suppose Asquith became vain and himself wanted to lead the army; if he did that, the country would be destroyed. The minister is of course next to the King in authority, but his taking upon himself this paradharma would be fraught with danger. Now think of the commander-in-chief. Suppose he wanted to rise to a higher position of authority and to become a minister, so that he might order the next commander-in-chief. If he did, there would be a great struggle for power in the country and it would be destroyed. The commander-in-chief would lose the position he already enjoyed, without getting the one he wanted. One more condition is also essential. The commander-in-chief should do his work, and the minister his; neither is superior or inferior to the other. This requires a sense of dharma on the part of both. If they have it, neither would feel superior or inferior to the other, for each would do his own dharma well and earn 100 per cent marks.

---

1 The dates of these discourses are not given in the source.
2 Ibid

In God’s court, one’s attitude to work will be given the highest importance. No one there will take into account who was superior and who inferior in status and authority. One should never believe that one’s own dharma is superior and another’s inferior. Or rather, one should believe that one’s dharma is the best for one. Take the example of a mother’s attitude to her child. If the latter is ugly, the mother will shower all the greater care on it and will quarrel with anyone who slights it. In the same way, one’s own dharma helps one to win moksha. The Mahabharata contains many examples of this truth. In Tulsidas’s work, too, Guha and Shabari were devoted to God as they did their own work, and so attained the supreme state.

Varnashrama had its origin in the idea of swadharma. We do not see today the true idea of varna. It is limited now to restrictions about inter-dining and inter-marriage. The idea of varna is not peculiar to Hinduism. Such dharma which was peculiar to one society would become narrow, and one need not die for it. If our dharma is universal and valid at all times, one should be ready to die for it. Varna does not consist in customary practices regarding inter-dining and inter-marriage; the division of society into varnas is a division of functions. The idea of pollution by touch was a later accretion. The distinctions of varna prevail all over the world. We find them in every country. Most parents have to think what they will do about their children when they grow up, and the boys and the girls, too, have to think about their future. Exercised over these problems, we sacrifice our interests in this world and our welfare in the next. Worried by them, we lose sight of our means of deliverance. Can anyone else show us what our swadharma is? Doing swadharma does not mean the freedom of the individual and subordination of society. If a man seeks moksha and still believes that he is independent, he will utterly fail in his aspiration. One who seeks moksha behaves as society’s servant. To win moksha means to merge in the sea. To attain that state means to be one with an infinitely vast sea. We are but germs in society. That word “germs” signifies our subordination to it. We are, in truth, free in such subordination. Our duty is what society assigns to us. Of three persons who work together, one is bound to be the leader. A commander-in-chief must consult the minister in certain matters; and likewise the minister, too, should consult the former in some other matters. The definition [of swadharma], then, is that one must do the work assigned to one by one’s superior. From this, we shall by and by rise to a higher stage.

[15]

How is that in this Gita which is concerned with moksha we are asked to do work which may have no great significance, and to concern ourselves with swadharma? Can we win moksha in this manner? Yes, we can. In the Mahabharata there is Tuladhar’s story. The Brahmin in search of knowledge got it from a butcher. The devotee whom Mahadev [Desai] mentioned was a potter, and Bhojo Bhagat was a cobbler. In saying, “better is death in the discharge of one’s duty.” Shri Krishna has not laid down a principle very difficult to follow. The idea of swadharma involves restrictions on oneself. Swa means that which one has been able to digest. If we are not able to digest [what we eat], many disturbances in the system will follow and we would get diseases. If, observing others round us consuming dudhapak and growing fat, we also eat it, we would come to grief. Swadharma indeed helps everyone to win moksha. But, till we have won it, what should we do as human beings living in these physical bodies? If we understand the body’s dharma and do it, we shall have to voluntarily accept subordination in order that we may become perfectly ourselves. It is to God that we have to subordinate ourselves. Can we hope that, because we recite antar mama every day, God who is asleep in our hearts will awake? To wake Him, we shall have to seek someone’s help. Swadharma means the work which falls to our lot from hour to hour. We should do the work assigned to us by others. We have to submit ourselves to our conscience, but what will a person do if he has no conscience? When we have eliminated the “I” from us, then will God take the place vacated by it. We have to accept subordination for His sake. Having accepted a job anywhere, we

---

1 The date of this discourse is not given in the source.
2 Gujarati poet, 1785-1850
3 In III, 35
4 Boiled, sweetened milk cooked with a little rice
5 A Bengali bhajan included in the Ashram Bhajanavali should do it with single-minded devotion and sense of duty; we should do it even if this work which falls to our lot is unattractive to us, repels us or smells of violence. If in a world like ours full of violence, such work falls to our lot, we must do it. A task of this kind fell to the lot of Harishchandra. When he raised his sword to kill his wife, he had no violence in him. Did he wish ill to his wife? His heart was filled with compassion. The poet says that he had hardened his heart, but in truth he had hardened only his hand. If we were painters, we would not draw him with a face distorted by a feeling of aversion. If he had in fact raised his sword with reluctance on his face, we would have to say that he was overcome by ignorant attachment and that, having risen so high, at last he fell; this blot would have remained on him. We cannot imagine any sign of suffering on his face. Following his example, we should do with perfect devotion and without hesitation any duty which falls to our lot. It is best, in the first instance, not to take up a task, but, having taken up one, we must not forsake it. Consider, for instance, a large black ant whose feet, if stuck in jaggery, will not let go their hold of it; they remain stuck to it. Not to forsake the task undertaken, that is but the definition of satyagraha itself. Everyone, from a child to an old man, should cling to the task undertaken till he or she breaks. This is internal meditation, this is Vedanta. Of course, the work done in this spirit should be dedicated to God. We should be totally absorbed in any work which we may be doing. If such absorption is inspired with a selfish interest in work, it will bring about our fall, and if with a sense of dedication to God it will lift us up.

[16]\(^1\)

So, then, this is one idea, that swadharma is better than paradharma. The next question is: if no one can escape doing karma, what is the difference between the karma of a wise man and that of an ignorant man? The former performs yajna for others, the latter works for himself. If we do karma as yajna, it would be as if we did no karma. Shri Krishna then advanced the argument of society’s good, and told Arjuna that he should work on without wasting a single moment in idleness, should work on without concern for the “I” and dedicating to God all that he did.

How does it happen that, though trying to act in this way, man sometimes commits sin? If, in doing swadharma, we follow our own wilful inclinations, do it in pride, we are not doing swadharma. What is the reason that, though most people in the world do their swadharma, the pile of sins in the world remains as huge as ever?

\(^1\) The date of this discourse is not given in the source.

With Chapter III the Gita ends. It need not have been followed by anything more. Even in the third Chapter, there are five or six verses which are really important. The rest of the Gita is intended to explain more clearly what has been said in the first three chapters.

Shri Krishna tells Arjuna, in reply to his question, that desire and anger ride on our two shoulders. If they are with us while we do our swadharma, then we gain nothing. Can we say that many of those who enter the Councils act unworthily? They do it to serve others. But their action is prompted by desire, by the aim of getting the better of the Government; there is anger behind it and, therefore, it is not right.
Desire and anger are blood-brothers. They dwell in the senses and the mind. We can, therefore, overcome them only by subduing these.
Hence it is that the way to moksha is said to lie in becoming free from attachments and aversions. This is the reason why we are advised to become free from them. If we are enslaved by something, is there anything we would not do for its sake? Vishvamitra did hard tapas, but afterwards he felt that his tapas was superior to Vasishtha’s; from that arose desire, which provoked anger. One should understand this with one’s reason at any rate and move as slowly as a snail; one may then work on without fear of any kind.

[17]

November 23, 1926

We ought to cultivate such a state of mind that on no day can we have peace unless we have recited verses from the Gita. What a contrast between the noise at the evening and the peace in the early morning! We should not be satisfied merely with reciting the verses or leading their recitation anyhow. Day by day our recitation should improve in regard to pronunciation. One person’s lapse in this matter is the lapse of all. As this is true of the music in a concert, so is it true of the music of life. If we pray with the heart and the mind in unison, why should we care for the perishable body? Why should we be concerned whether it lives or falls? We may not mind the distance from others which this material thing imposes on us; after all, how far apart can a material thing keep us? If we have cultivated the unity of our self with

---

1 Sages in the Ramayana
2 Ibid
the selves of others, with God as witness, if we treat the lapse of one as the lapse of all, it will be very good indeed. If we also pronounce the words correctly, we shall approach God with water in a vessel as clean as possible. We shall have placed a bel leaf in the water with utmost attention to cleanliness, and filled the vessel with water from the purest source. Such outward attentions are meaningless in themselves; but they lend grace where there is faith. A man of faith will make his gift as artistic as he can. Today’s craftsmanship is lifeless and no craftsmanship at all. How much patience must the craftsmanship of olden days have required? How many years must have been spent on learning it? We have come across no engineer of the old school, one who had built palaces in his time. Our effort to master correct pronunciation is a sign of our heart-felt love; we should not, thus, let our recitation of the Gita become dry at any time.

In Chapter III, Shri Krishna explained the supremacy of karma. After explaining that, if we wish to practise yoga through karma, we should dedicate to God every karma which we do, He explained what other things should accompany karma. It should be enriched with knowledge. Let us think about the path of knowledge and the path of karma. Anyone who follows the former exclusively becomes heartless; he who follows the latter exclusively becomes dull in mind. For the right choice of karma we should combine the methods of both the paths. Both are excellent, but neither can be practised without the other. Is there anything as humble as a stone, or anything which does as much karma as it does? How utterly dedicated to God is its karma? It goes on working for ever in the same, unchanging manner; but, as a mere piece of stone, it never wins moksha. A stone should cease to be a stone and should become Ahalya, should come alive. On the one hand, we should be as inert as a stone, and, on the other, we should become the very image of knowledge, and this in such manner that no one can say whether the person is a man of karma or of knowledge. Then will his purushartha be complete. Where jnana and karma unite, bhakti will follow as a matter of course. For the moment, we have seen that there should be a combination of the two. When we have understood the meaning of both, we shall see no difference between sankhya and yoga. That is the substance of Chapter IV. I shall not go into a discussion of the different types of yajna.

1 A character in the Ramayana. Her husband’s curse had turned her into a stone, which regained her living form at the touch of Rama’s feet.
Hathayogis\textsuperscript{1} believe Chapter VI to have been written for them. Their belief is that it was written because hathayoga has a place in the practice of yoga. I do not share this view, though I admit that hathayoga has some utility. We should avail ourselves of all possible means which help in self-realization. It is said about the purely physical processes described in hathayoga that those who go through them will attain self-realization. Jnanadeva went riding on a wall to receive someone who was coming to see him riding a lion. But what then? He thereby brought yoga into discredit. These processes do not necessarily take one to God. The secret of rising towards God lies in the mind. In this very Chapter there is the verse: $Uddharedatmanatmanam natmanamavasadayet$.\textsuperscript{2} That is, this Chapter teaches the importance of controlling the self. Mortification of the body is also as much for the control of the mind as for the control of the self. Anyone who practises these processes, knowing that they help control of the mind, will certainly derive much profit from them. We have not taken them up because we have not met anyone who knows them. We have been visited by many who believed in them and recommended them to us, but none who knew them. Hence I have done nothing in that field. But I do have them in my mind. I mention this thing so that, if you come across a sadhu who is like me a seeker, you should avail yourselves of his services. Our bodies have become very weak. If we know these physical processes very well, they would be found to be far more effective exercises than what they teach in England. The sixth Chapter of course discusses the importance of rules. It also explains the means of doing karma in a disinterested spirit. \textit{Jnana} signifies the knowledge of man who knows the Shastras and the term \textit{yogi} means one who knows the science of karma.

This Chapter explains the conditions which must be fulfilled before we can do karma in a disinterested spirit. It is not possible to do karma in that spirit without control of the self. Those who control themselves from hour to hour, only they can work in that spirit. Thieves, robbers and immoral men never talk about doing karma in a disinterested spirit. Many persons use the \textit{Gita} to justify their actions. But disinterestedness is a state of the mind, and such a state can never be cultivated without effort and without self-control. One whose left hand does not know what his right hand does, such a one knows what it is to be equal-minded. Our yardstick is the ability to see others as \textsuperscript{1} The date of this discourse is not given in the source.

\textsuperscript{2} Practitioners of yoga in its purely physical aspect

\textsuperscript{3} In VI, 5 ourselves. We should think whether we should be happy if others did to us what we do to them.

Disinterestedness can never be cultivated without a spirit of renunciation. That is the true meaning of Chapter VI.

[19]

The Bhagavad Gita is divided into three parts: six chapters for the syllable tat, six for tvam and six for asi.

In Chapter VI, Shri Krishna explains the means of controlling the senses. In the seventh chapter, he discusses the distinction between jnana and vijnana. Vijnana means knowledge of particulars. jnana embraces God’s para prakriti, and vijnana relates to His apara prakriti. Chapter VIII discusses further what is included in vijnana.
The last verse in Chapter VII says that he who performs the three types of sacrifice, adhiyajna, adhidaiva and adhibhuta, goes to the Lord. Discussing akshara, Shri Krishna explained that one should meditate exclusively on that, for one becomes like that on which one meditates. He explained adhidaiva to mean that He was the Parabrahman, supreme above all, and asked why, since this was so, anyone should seek to please other deities lower or higher. It is God alone that one should worship and serve. But what does serving God mean? Shri Krishna said that He was both the invisible Reality and the visible world. If so, the karma which we do is also done by Krishna. If He is the master of the show, can we believe that we do anything? As the dirty water which falls into the Ganga is purified, so we should believe that the sins we commit are committed by God, for he who harbours no sinful thoughts cannot commit sin. Anything to which motion is imparted retains it for some time. If we fell a tree, for some time the leaves would remain green, but they would soon begin to wither. If a person has overcome both his conscious and unconscious desires, they will not rise again. In Chapters VII and VIII, Shri Krishna explains what Creation is and describes the visible world and the nature of karma, and shows that everything exists in God. Why does He lay so much stress on the necessity of doing karma in a disinter-ested spirit?
These two chapters sufficiently explain the reason. A person who has plunged into water goes on swimming in it, but the latter is in no way

---

1 The date of this discourse is not given in the source.
2 The three syllables constitute the great Upanishadic text tat tvam asi, “That thou art.”
concerned. Similarly, God is a sea of compassion. This too, however, is merely a conception of our mind. Truly speaking, God is neither a generous-hearted Being nor a sea of compassion. It is in such a God that we lie and move.

[20]

Chapters IX and X are to be taken together. Shri Krishna says: “I dwell in all creatures, hence do all things for my sake.” And so He said: “On Me fix thy mind, to Me bring thy devotion.” In Chapter X Arjuna asked Shri Krishna to show him His divine powers. The stream of bhakti which flows from Chapter VII onwards gathers volume from chapter to chapter. Shri Krishna shows Arjuna His divine powers and urges him again and again to dedicate everything to God. All the four chapters lead us towards bhakti. Chapter IX, especially, is about rajavidya and rajaguhya. It is really a great support for persons like us given to a life of sin. Even the most sinful person is promised help and support. The Gita would not approve anyone running down mantras from the Vedas. It says, on the contrary, that even the most sinful man will be saved if he dedicates everything to Shri Krishna. This knowledge is guhya only so long as it has not touched the heart.

[21]

Shri Krishna showed His cosmic form to Arjuna and explained to him that it could be seen, not by those who had studied the Vedas and gained other like qualifications, but only by those whose hearts were steeped in bhakti. What a vision it must have been! My enthusiasm for the Gita grows day by day. I agreed to talk about the Gita and explain its meaning, and I liked the idea; but my pleasure in the discussion has grown from what it was when I started. I get daily more absorbed in it. We, who are given to self-indulgence, cannot always taste this joy. The real joy comes from bhakti, that is, it is spiritual. This interest is growing because it is like savouring food which is digested more and more completely from day to day, and it influences our conduct accordingly. Such is my state of mind. I feel that in this chapter the Gita reaches its highest point. We take twelve

---

1 The date of this discourse is not given in the source.
2 In XVIII, 65
3 This date is given on the title page of Gandhijinu Gitashikshan.
minutes to recite it, so that we are likely to feel tired by the time we have come half-way. If we let ourselves sink it in, we should be saved. Shri Vyasa has described the vision so vividly that we feel as if we see it with our own eyes. Beholding it, we wonder what our own place in this universe is. It is nothing. It is as small as a grain of dust. Where are we in this universe of stars, suns and planets? If a hair could speak, it would describe its place thus: “I have value so long as I am a part of the body; separate me from it and my value is lost. The essence of life in me cannot vanish; as for the material substance, even the vast universe is transient, existing only as name and form.” We are nothing, compared with that visible manifestation of God, this vast universe. Being what they are, whom can we kill? Even if we kill anyone, we too shall die simultaneously. As we understand this more and more, we should become steeped ever more fully in bhakti.

Even those who go out visiting other places should keep up the daily practice.

[From Gujarati]

Gandhijinu Gitashikshan

82. LETTER TO C. NARAYANA RAO

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
November 27, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter.¹ Why do you want to leave your permanent service? I think it is quite possible for one to serve one’s country no matter in what situation of life one may be, provided, of course, that the occupation itself is clean. In any case, in addition to the reason [for] wanting to leave service, please supply me with the following information:

What is your age? Are you married? Have you children? Are your parents alive? Have you any dependents? Are you keeping excellent health? Are you prepared to do continuous physical labour for 8 hours per day? Can you be satisfied with mere sanitation, field work or work in the kitchen or work at the spinning-wheel and the ¹ Writing on November 19, the correspondent had expressed a desire to leave his job and enter the Ashram for “leading a happy and peaceful life”.

354 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
like? Do you know Sanskrit? How far have you studied? What languages do you know?

Yours sincerely,

SJT. C. NARAYANA RAO
CLERK, EXCISE DEPTT.
BERHAMPORE

From a microfilm: S.N. 11020

83. LETTER TO RICHARD B. GREGG

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
November 27, 1926

I see you are adding to my debt. I already owe you a reply to several questions in your previous letter.¹ And I have now before me another letter with quotations from Thomas Paine.² The quotations I hope to use as you suggest. I have not yet gone through them.

The articles on khaddar you may use just as you like.

I am glad you have appreciated the articles “Is This Humanity?”. I felt that I should make my position clear irrespective of whether it sounded or was in fact tenable or not. It is enough that the views expressed therein represent my definite conclusions.

You will notice the flaw in your analogy. You compare duty towards the ward with your duty towards moral welfare of the assailant. Now the moral welfare of the assailant is not at stake when you are defending the ward. It is his physical existence that is at stake. And, if instead of the assailant being a stranger, it was another ward, but stronger than the one then under your protection, you would still have to defend the one under your protection against the other ward who is about to assail the former and whom you have no other means of overcoming. God will judge your duty in accordance with your intentions. Indeed, one may go a step further and assume the one who is to be protected not to be a ward, but an utter stranger who has sought protection. There is a beautiful tale in the Mahabharata. A great prince³ had a pigeon flying to him for protection against a hawk. The hawk feels that the pigeon is his lawful prey duly appointed as such ¹ For Gandhiji’s earlier letters to Gregg.

² Vide “Price of Freedom”, 9-12-1926.
³ King Sivi of Ushinara, near Gandhara
by God. The prince wards him off by saying that whilst pigeons ordinarily were a lawful prey for hawks, he cannot neglect the obvious duty of protecting those who sought his protection and the prince generously offered his own flesh as substitute. This, of course, is the most spiritual method of dealing with the hawk. But where one is too weak to adopt that method, one would be bound to carry out the law of protection by resisting the approach of the hawk by force. And this one would do in accordance with the law of ahimsa. I don’t know whether I have made my position clear.

I see you are not coming to pass your winter in Sabarmati. I am sorry in two ways. First, because, though I shall be away, the Ashramites will miss you. Secondly, because, it is the fear of the Ashram climate and water that is deterring you. We, diet reformers, should really discover ways of bending climate to our will rather than succumb to them. I know, however, this is counsel of perfection. The step you are taking is prudent and therefore in the circumstances superior to the counsel of perfection which cannot be carried out without taking risk. I shall follow with considerable interest your researches in the tutorial line.

Devdas is quite well and strong. He has gone to nurse Mathuradas at Panchgani. I leave for Wardha on the 2nd December. My love to you and the Stokes and Sundaram and Savitri.

Yours,

R. B. GREGG

SIMLA

From a photostat: S.N. 12088.

84. IS THIS HUMANITY?—VIII

[November 28, 1926]

Letters on this subject are still pouring in, but I fail to discover in them any new question or any fresh argument advanced. I would therefore ask those who have been thinking on this subject to read this series of articles over and over again. I do so without the slightest hesitation, inasmuch as they are the result not of ideas hastily formed, but of experience of many years. I have presented no new principles, but have tried to restate old principles. I cannot say how far the presentation is correct, but as it represents my honest conviction, and as many friends expect me to solve intricate problems in ahimsa, I can only ask them to turn to the series I have been writing. Some of my correspondents wrench my own sentences from their contexts and quote them against me, some quote part of them and omit the most essential remainder.

Thus I have never advocated the extirpation of dogs as a class. On the contrary my suggestions have been made for their betterment. I have repeatedly said that I have suggested the destruction of certain dogs under certain circumstances. Even this may be open to question. If it is, the objector should address himself only to that and nothing more.

I continue to be the same votary of ahimsa that I was before. I still continue to hold life not only in man and animal, but in plant and flower, as sacred, and yet make use of vegetables and flowers and fruit. Only the spirit behind the use is: ‘He that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the spirit shall of the spirit reap life everlasting.’ Destruction of dogs, even as that of plant or vegetable, is advised only when it is a matter of imperative duty, and only when it is meant not to sow to the flesh, but to the spirit.

What torments me is the impotence of the votary of ahimsa. Ahimsa is not impotence. Ahimsa is nor powerlessness. Ahimsa is unconquerable power. We shrink from it as we are dazed by its overpowering lustre. Only very few of us can catch a glimpse of it. Ahimsa is the distinguishing characteristic of an untrammelled spirit. It is at the root of a number of other qualities—discrimination, detachment, penance, equability and knowledge. It is the way of the brave, not of shrinkers. He who would understand ahimsa must understand the meaning of the inevitable himsa one sees about oneself. This statement, I know, is liable to abuse. But what is there free from this danger? Is not even God’s name turned to the worst account? Have not rivers of blood been made to flow in His name? Have we not worshipped the Devil in His name? But that does not diminish His glory. That does not mean that we shall take His name in a secret corner.

All action is tainted inasmuch as it presupposes himsa. And yet we free ourselves from the bondage of action through action itself. This body is the receptacle of sin, and yet we seek to achieve salvation by making of that abode of sin God’s own sanctuary. Even so with himsa.

And this himsa, calculated to take us on the onward path, must be spontaneous, must be the lowest minimum, must be rooted in compassion, must have discrimination, restraint, detachment at its back, and must lead us every moment onward to the path of ahimsa.

I propose to conclude this series with a brief reference by way of illustration to the way in which we are trying to solve the dog problem in the Ashram.

The problem is as old as the Ashram itself. The activity of the Mahajan has made it more serious, and we have put up with it not without reluctance. It is our practice to destroy rabid dogs. Two or three such cases have occurred during the last ten years. Healthy dogs have not been destroyed. They are being refused food. I see that, if the rule is strictly observed we would be all happy, but we cannot do so. Every inmate does not yet realize the necessity of it, and those who do are not sufficiently alive to the observance of the rule. And there are also employees in the Ashram,—how can they be made to observe the rule?

Some dogs we feed, there being no other alternative. Two bitches and their puppies are being maintained at present. The puppies have been kept in cozy boxes or baskets to keep them from cold, and are being given milk and the dams get specially prepared food.

On the other hand, we have applied to the Mahajan to remove stray dogs from here. The request has been accepted, though their cart has not yet come.

I have explained to the best of my light our duty to the dogs. Everyone has to act according to his own light. Let no one learn from me the duty of destruction. He may under certain circumstances permit himself to have recourse to it. I have laid down the limits. Everyone observes and will observe the law according to his own capacity. I have referred to the present practice at the Ashram simply to serve as an illustration of what my opinion means.

The religion of ahimsa consists in allowing others the maximum of convenience at the maximum of inconvenience to us, even at the risk of life. Everyone has to determine for himself the amount of inconvenience he is capable of putting up with. No third party can determine it for him. Religion, even as the soul, is both one and many.

Young India, 2-12-1926
85. SPEECH AT CONVOCATION OF GUJARAT VIDYAPITH, AHMEDABAD

November 28, 1926

I take it as God’s favour that I have been able to be present here this year as I was last year. I congratulate the students who have received degrees and prizes and pray that their aspirations may bear fruit. I did not know what to say on this occasion. Just then Shri Chintaman Vaidya came to my rescue. The moment I received this week his letter saying that he would be coming here on business, the burden on me was lifted. His name is not unknown to students. His scholarship too is well known. He has published books on the Mahabharata and on Indian history. He has served his motherland not only through books but also through public work. Like our Vidyapith, there is a Vidyapith in Maharashtra also. He has been serving it. He holds the office of its Vice-Chancellor. The status of that Vice-Chancellor is higher than that of ours. Shankaracharya is the Chancellor there. Nanabhai¹ can work in consultation with me, while Shri Vaidya himself bears the entire responsibility there. It will certainly be worth your while to listen to what he has to say. And yet I have a few things to say to you.

All of you can see that in numerical strength the condition of the Vidyapith is deteriorating. But that does not frighten me in the least. Even today I have the same faith in its mission that I had when under good auspices I set up this Vidyapith in 1920. I may boldly say that my faith is being even strengthened. Numerical strength does count in the world, but so far as our movement is concerned we have to rely only on the strength of quality. When the numerical strength is small we need not be disheartened, but we must maintain special vigilance. Today a handful of British official rule over India. Do they have that much self-confidence? As there are 250 districts in India, there must be 250 Collectors. How many men have to be controlled by a single Collector? And yet he can play tennis in the evening and enjoy sound sleep at night. He does not feel worried even in a forest. As we have to fight him, cultivate self-confidence even though you are a handful. If we have thousands of workers, we can afford indolence or neglect of duty, but when the number is small, everyone has to be particularly vigilant.

¹ Nrisinhprasad Bhatt, then Vice-Chancellor of Gujarat Vidyapith
I assure you that I have not the slightest anxiety about the future of the Vidyapith. If you would remain vigilant in your work, the future is certainly bright. Even if there is but one student in the Vidyapith, he will definitely do his work. And for the sake of that one student—even if I were in Kashmir—I shall come here to award him a degree. You should never think that my enthusiasm at that time will be less even by an iota. I can say that I shall have all the greater enthusiasm in awarding a degree to that single student and I shall take greater pride in it—if I am entitled to take such pride.

The Vice-Chancellor has requested me to lead the Vidyapith along the lines of independent education. I welcome the ideals which he has set forth. Further I have been asked whether we shall retain the temptation of prizes. We have to make the students realize that education is itself a prize. The fruit of a sacrifice is the sacrifice itself. I welcome this idea also. But I am one who acts knowing one’s limitations. We have to work against such a powerful wind that I dare make no changes.

I have committed no folly in establishing the Vidyapith. You too should if you can have the same faith. I know our drawbacks, because I am full of them. Do not allow weaknesses to creep in.

[From Gujarati]

_Sabarmati, Vol. V, Autumn Issue, 1926_

86. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

_Monday [November 29, 1926]_

CHI. BRIJKRISHNA,

Mirabehn will reach Delhi on Friday at about 10 or 11 and will be staying, at Vidyavatiji’s Gurukul. She goes there with the intention of learning Hindi. Meet her at the station and take her to Daryaganj.

Give her the help she needs. I am hoping that someone from the Gurukul will be at the station.

If you feel like coming to Wardha’, do come over.

_Blessings from_

BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 2353

1 Mirabehn was in Delhi on Friday, December 3, 1926; _vide_ “Letter to Mirabehn”, 3-12-1926. The preceding Monday was November 29.

2 On December 3, 1926, Gandhiji left Ahmedabad for Wardha, where he stayed up to December 20, 1926.
87. LETTER TO PURUSHOTTAMDAS THAKURDAS

ASHRAM,
Monday [November 29, 1926]

BHAISHRI PURUSHOTTAM,

You have done what no one else has succeeded in doing. As I had promised, I have been studying currency this month.\(^1\) Last week I finished reading the Royal Commission’s report.\(^2\) I was very happy to read your minute. This does not mean that I understand the subject. You probably have no idea of my ignorance of the subject. The distinction between Gold Exchange standard, bullion standard and Exchange standard is still not clear to me. Just now I have been reading Madan’s books. I do not know when I shall be ready to give my opinion. I am getting ready to display my ignorance. Meanwhile, from a distance I watch with admiration your fight.

Vandemataram from
MOHANDAS

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19970

88. STRENGTH IN WEAKNESS

I make no apology for reproducing General Smuts’ great speech\(^3\) on Emily Hobhouse at the time of burying the ashes of Emily Hobhouse in Bloemfontein. The speech makes clear what one individual with force of character can do; what a woman, miscalled the weaker sex, can do; what true patriotism means.

Young India, 2-12-1926

89. THE WHEEL OF LIFE

The headline is of my making but what follows is an abstract of C. Rajagopalachari’s notes\(^4\) submitted to the Royal Agricultural

---

\(^1\) Vide “Letter to Jaisukhlal Krishnalal Mehta”, on or after 7-9-1926.
\(^2\) The Royal Commission on Indian Currency, headed by Hilton Young, was announced by the Viceroy on August 20, 1926. In its report, the commission recommended fixing the value of the rupee at 1s 6d gold and the creation of a Central Bank. The addressee, who was a member of the Commission, differed from the majority on these two points.
\(^3\) Not reproduced here
\(^4\) Not reproduced here. The notes said that within a short time the number of Commission. The value of the notes lies in their being an accurate record of his experience. After a careful perusal of the note, the reader will answer for himself whether the spinning-wheel is or is not truly the Wheel of Life for India’s millions. C. Rajagopalachari’s second suggestion that the temptation of drink must be removed from the poor people is worthy of serious consideration by those who will solve the problem of economic distress. If the men will use up in drink the hard-earned coppers of their women spinners, even the spinning-wheel will be but a frail support.

Young India, 2-12-1926

90. NOTES

CURRENCY

For the past many years, I have resisted the pressure of friends to study the currency question, not because it is not one of the most important questions engaging public attention but because I have more than enough to do and because I know nothing about the science and I never speak or write on subjects of which I have not acquired a knowledge to my own satisfaction. I am now no longer able to resist the pressure. The friends urge that I must assist in popularizing its study, and use such influence as I possess among the masses for their education in this vital matter. I do not share their enthusiasm. I am not sure that the masses can be made to understand the very intricate riddles of currency. But I dare not brush aside the weighty statement they make that the present currency policy of the Government if carried out means a strain upon the resources of the dumb millions of India which they are ill able to sustain. I have therefore promised to study the question, open the columns of Young India for its discussion and if possible to express my own opinion about it. In redemption of that promise I am in a position to publish elsewhere what I hope is the first instalment of a series of articles on spinning-wheels plying in Tamil districts alone had gone up to 30,000; that the average income from each wheel was Rs. 14-9-8 per year which, when compared with the Rs. 50/- that some of the agriculturist families got from their land per year, was substantial amount.

1 The Royal Commission on Indian Agriculture. The formation of the Commission headed by the Marquis of Linlithgow was announced by the Viceroy on January 20, 1926, and its sittings took place in the winter of 1926-27.
currency from the pen of Professor P. A. Wadia. I have myself just finished a preliminary study of the report of the Royal Commission. I confess I do not understand it as I would understand say a work on the economics of the spinning-wheel. I am in search of a teacher who would make the language of currency almost as real to me as that of the spinning-wheel. Then but not till then shall I be able to express my own opinion on the problem. Meanwhile I promise to devote to its serious study all the odd moments I can spare.

STRAY DOGS v. VILLAGE DOGS

A friend says: “You advocate the destruction of stray dogs. Do you include in the category the very useful village dogs?”

Most certainly I do not. I have made that perfectly clear in the pages of Navajivan. The village dogs are the cheapest and the most efficient police we have for protecting villagers against thieves at night and intruding dogs and other animals during the day. But I have not advocated indiscriminate destruction even of stray dogs. Many other remedies have to be adopted before that drastic measure is resorted to. What I have insisted upon is a municipal bye-law authorizing municipalities to destroy unowned dogs. This simple legislation will protect the dogs from cruel neglect and put the Mahajan upon their mettle. It is the indiscriminate and thoughtless charity which has to be resisted. That charity which feeds dogs and indeed men who choose to become beggars harms the beggars and the society which encourages such false charity.

THE WORTHIEST LADY

A correspondent sends the following interesting cutting1 taken from a history of Rome.

Young India, 2-12-1926

---

1 Not reproduced here. The extract described how four Romans disputed about whose wife was the worthiest of them all and discovered that it was Lucretia, wife of Lucius Tarquinius Collatinus, distinguished for her beauty and domestic virtues, who was working at the loom while the other three feasted.
91. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

SURAT.

December 3 [1926]

CHI. MIRA¹.

Your telegram received. Delighted. God be with you.²

With love,

BAPU

SHRIMATI MIRABAI
KANYA GURUKUL
DARYAGANJ
DELHI

From the original: C.W. 5188. Courtesy: Mirabehn

92. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

Friday [December 3, 1926]³

CHI. MATHURADAS.

It is night now and I am on my way to Wardha by the Tapti Valley train. I have been under such heavy pressure of work of late that I have hardly been able to cope with letters. The last five days’ post is still lying unattended to.

Devadas is not giving any satisfactory news about your health. If your stomach has distended and you cannot digest food and are feeling restless then you must reduce your intake of food. When Kaka Saheb had indigestion, he too was made to give up food. There is nothing to worry about if you have to fast for a couple of days. It will also be good if you can keep yourself on milk and fruit for a few days. If you want, I can also discuss it with Dr. Jivraj. All the doctors here are of the opinion that in your condition you must eat less and eat light food. You must eat only what you can digest and consider

¹ The superscription in this and other letters addressed to Mirabehn is in Devanagari.
² Gandhiji had sent Mirabehn to the Kanya Gurukul in Delhi to learn Hindi and to teach carding and spinning.
³ The addressee received the letter on December 6, 1926. The Friday prior to this date corresponded to December 3.
everything else poison. You have done well to resign from the Municipality.

I shall be at Wardha till the 20th at least.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

93. LETTER TO PURUSHOTTAMDAS THAKURDAS

[December 4, 1926]

BHAISHRI PURUSHOTTAMDAS,

It is all right that you wrote in English. Allow me to continue to write in Gujarati. I have not been able to read your articles. If you have any off-prints please send me. I have invited Jaisukhlal Mehta to Wardha to gather more information. I am writing this on my way to Wardha. I shall be at Wardha till the 20th.

Vandemataram from

MOHANDAS

From the Gujarati original: Purushottamdas Thakurdas Papers. Courtesy: Nehru Memorial Museum and Library

94. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

WARDHA,

Kartika Krishna 14, 1983 [December 4, 1926]

Bhai Ghanshyamdasji,

I have your letter. I have no difficulty in reading your letter. If no promise is broken by your not going to Europe, then it is my belief that this is not the time for you to go there.

I do not wish to write anything about your victory. There are certain battles in which defeat is victory. I do not know if what has happened now is good for you or not. My advice is for you to observe objectively everything that happens in the Assembly.

I know that I have served the country through my silence; however, I am not confident that I can unite the various parties. My

1 From the postmark

2 Central Legislative Assembly

VOL. 37 : 11 NOVEMBER, 1926 - 1 JANUARY, 1927 365
heart shrinks from the idea of going to Gauhati. I have even written to Srinivasa Iyengar and Motilalji asking to be excused. When I feel confident, I shall myself step into the arena.

I do not know where it would be proper for me to stay in Calcutta if I had to go there. Unless I am forced to go to some other place, I would like to live under your care.

Yours,
Mohanandas

From the Hindi original: C.W. 6140. Courtesy: G. D. Birla

95. CULTURE

Elsewhere I reproduce almost word for word the talk Mahadev Desai gave on the takli during the Youth Week, for it embodies his inmost thoughts and the attendant circumstances are worthy of note. That speech was not delivered for its own sake. But some young men got bored listening to it and they started a disturbance. I have often written to say that the practice of causing disturbances does not become India’s culture. In this country, at any rate, those who do not like someone’s speech may not pay attention to it, and if they find it repugnant they may walk out. But they should not employ force to stop a speaker from speaking. To shout down someone is nothing but use of force. If intolerance grown among us, it will hamper our progress. We have no reason to believe that what we do not like must assuredly be bad. Certainly there are many things in the world which taste bitter in the beginning but turn out to be sweet in the end.

A nation whose youths discard restraint, courtesy, humility and tolerance courts destruction. The reins of national life are in the hands of youth alone. Their responsibility is greater than that of old people because the latter have given whatever they could or as much as they wished to give [to the nation]. Youths are today shaping the new order and making fresh contributions. Those who had made noise forgot this responsibility of theirs. Mahadev Desai’s speech was being communicated by his hands. Hence it was such as could be followed through the eyes. The youths were unable to stop the speech that was being conveyed by the hands.

1 For the annual session of the Congress
2 Celebrated at Ahmedabad in November, 1926
When they realized this inability of theirs, they stopped their shouting. But they certainly earned discredit by shouting. The next day the papers reported that the youths prevented Mahadev Desai from giving his speech on the takli. This brought discredit not to Mahadev Desai but to those who had shouted. But their discredit is tantamount to our country’s. A country’s credit is not distinct from that of its citizens.

Showing repugnance against the takli is like marching an army against an ant. It has been shown in Navajivan by extracts quoted from old books that the takli is one of man’s oldest tools. The takli is poor people’s machine, it is their asylum. Just as the plough is the means of producing food, so is the takli the means of producing cloth. Huge mills may arise out of the takli. A spinning-mill means a mill containing taklis. Just as a man who, plugging the pipe-connections to the different houses, trains them towards his own house and thereby makes others dependent on him for water supply, a spinning-mill too makes independent spinners dependent by getting within itself all the various taklis. Thus, a takli is a symbol of freedom, a mill that of dependence. How then can one dislike such a thing as a means of support? It is our duty to realize the power of that tiny thing. He who makes us realize its power deserves our gratitude, deserves a good turn from us.

Just as we should starve if we renounced the plough, we have become naked by giving up the takli. Because a few get clothes, we should not think that crores of people also get them. Records prove that lakhs of our brothers and sisters go about naked and suffer from hunger.

The takli has a twofold power—to cover the body and to feed it—because spinning provides us with cloth and the money saved thereby goes to augment our power of purchasing food. Hence I have given to the takli or the spinning-wheel the name of Annapurna.

The takli dispels our lethargy, covers our body and supports it. How can such an implement be disliked?

Moreover, a takli brings us into contact with our poor brethren and enables us to share their hardships.

The sages have given us through a story-poem an idea of the power of a tiny blade of grass. The wind could not blow it away. The fire could not burn it up. Someone may well ignore a blade of grass

---

1 Goddess of plenty considering it worthy of contempt, but if countless numbers of them were not there we would get neither food nor water. The power that lies hidden in a tiny blade of grass also lies hidden in the takli. I request those who have scoffed at the takli to read the dialogue between Yaksha and the gods. Those who belittle the takli belittle the poor. Those who belittle the poor cut off their own legs, cut off the branch on which they are sitting. The rich exist because the poor are there. If there were no poor, how could there be room for the rich?

Young men, whether in a school or a college, whether non-co-operators or co-operators, whether among those who shouted and created disturbance or its unhappy witnesses, do not give up our old culture, do not give up courtesy, do not give up love of the poor. Just as the sword is a symbol of destruction, the takli is a symbol of sustenance. Those who used the sword in the form of shouting did no creditable thing. You should not discard the takli or calumniate it. Mahadev has drawn your attention to your duty. It is my firm faith that those who do not perform the yajna of spinning and do not wear khadi, which is its prasad\(^1\), know neither the poor nor their ways. You too should have that faith.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 5-12-1926

96. LETTER TO BEHRAMJI KHAMBHATTA

WARDHA,
December 5, 1926

BHAISHRI KHAMBHATTA,

I got your letter. Your coming here made me very happy indeed. Come again. As you progressively shed the love of the body, you will have more and more peace of mind. I have still not got hold of the name of that oil. I will find it.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: C.W. 4367. Courtesy: Tehmina Khambhatta

\(^1\) Gift of grace

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
97. TELEGRAM TO CHHAGANLAL GANDHI

December 6, 1926

TO CHHAGANLAL GANDHI
ASHRAM, SABARMATI
AMERICAN FRIENDS WELCOME.

BAPU

From the original as delivered: S.N. 11249

98. LETTER TO ASHRAM WOMEN

WARDHA,
Silence Day, December 6, 1926

SISTERS,

As I had promised, the first thing I am doing in the morning after breakfast is to write this letter to you.

It is now five minutes to seven, and so all of you must be on your way to the prayer ground. Whatever time you fix, keep to it. I am sure that those of you who have agreed to attend [the prayers] would be doing that unless it be for very serious reasons. I have suggested to Ramniklal¹ that he should explain to you one or two verses from the Gita every day. But you may make him read anything you like. Do not give up the practice of writing. Keep trying to improve your handwriting.

But all this is not dharma itself, it is only a help in following dharma. The definition of dharma is contained in the verses which we used to read daily. What we want to learn is how to follow dharma. It lies in altruism. Altruism means desiring and working for the good of others and serving them. Begin this service by loving one another like sisters and sharing one another’s griefs. This is but one point. As I wish to write to you every week, let me end my speech here.

Dakshabehn, Kamalabehn and Chi. Rukhi are quite well. All of them travelled by third class but the train was not crowded and so they experienced no hardship. I was the only one to travel in the second class. Lakshmidas² is immersed in the charkha work. What happened

¹ Ramniklal Modi, a teacher in the Ashram School
² Lakshmidas P. Asar
there about reading from the Gita has also happened here. For the rest please read my letter to Chi. Purushottam.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 3629

99. LETTER TO MURIEL LESTER

WARDHA,

December 6, 1926

DEAR MISS LESTER,

I was able to finish reading your letter last night. I fear you will see more of the things you have described if you stay in India long enough. Religion is a complex problem, as complex as life itself. It is remarkable how much humbug can pass under its hallowed name. But what you have seen is a passing phase. The remote village life is in its way deeply spiritual, in my opinion more so than in the West. That is the permanent part of mass Hinduism. It will be finally judged by its influence on them. For ages the cult of violence has failed to produce any impression on them. History has no record of these villages having in a mass taken part in violence. Not therefore that they are totally non-violent. But they are comparatively so. However, all this is futile writing. What matters is how we live ourselves irrespective of what the whole world may do. The more I see of the world the more humbled I become and the more fully I learn to lean on God. I must not go beyond two pages.

Yours,

M. K. GANDHI

From a photostat: G.N. 6560
100. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

Monday [December 6, 1926]¹

CHI. MIRA,

I had expected to hear from you today. This is my second letter to you. The first was a card. I see that it is possible to send you the Autobiography² if it is written on Mondays, as I have done. Here is the translation therefore. Please revise and post here the same day in which case it will be in time. If you cannot revise the same day you may send direct to Swami. This should reach you on Wednesday and if it is posted even on Thursday, I should get it in time on Saturday. .. The last day for posting to Ahmedabad for Y.I. is Sunday here. Now you know what you can do. This arrangement will continue so long as I am here.

Here is Rolland’s letter.³ Sparrow⁴ has translated it for me. Here it is. If you think it is accurate, you need not translate anew for me.

Love.

BAPU

From the original: C.W. 5189. Courtesy: Mirabehn

101. LETTER TO LALTA PERSHAD SHAD

WARDHA,

December 6, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

You will forgive me for not acknowledging earlier your letter of 30th October. The reason for the delay in acknowledging it was that owing to the heavy correspondence, your letter was inadvertently put away in a file and was handed to me only last week.

Exactly the same pressure has been brought to bear upon me as you have put to go and see the Sat Gurus who the writers consider are likely to satisfy my craving. Only three or four days ago, I received a telegram from Madras Presidency “Come at once, show you the guru you want.” Should I have gone there and should I respond to all such

¹ Date supplied by the addressee
² The Autobiography commenced appearing in instalments in Young India, 3-12-1925. Gandhiji used to send Mirabehn Mahadev Desai’s translation of each chapter for revision.
³ Vide Appendix “Romain Rolland’s Letter to Gandhiji”, before 12-12-1926.
⁴ Miss Helene Haussding
letters? In my opinion, that is not the way to follow out the search for a guru. When I say that at the proper time the guru will come to the seeker, it is not a sign of arrogance but a statement of a well-known truth. You do not move about on the earth in search of God. He is to be found in your heart. And so does the guru, the perfect man, seek out all those who are craving in all humility and sincerity. The problem before me, therefore, is not so simple as you put it, nor is it a case of wilfulness or obstinacy.

I made a commencement with the English book you have sent me, but I must tell you that I have not been able to make further progress, for the simple reason that the things already taken by me leave no moment’s rest or interval.

Yours sincerely,

S.N. LALTA PERSHAD SHAD
KAYASTH MOHALLA
AJMER

From a photostat: S.N. 19761

102. LETTER TO V. V. DASTANE

WARDHA,
December 6, 1926

MY DEAR DASTANE.

I have your letter. Of course you know that my consent regarding the translation of the Autobiography into Marathi is subject to Swami’s approval. But I think Swami was agreeable.

From what you have written, it seems to me that Munshiji is morally liable to support only his father. The rest are his sons and his wife and perhaps the three infants who are, I suppose, young children and not grown [-up] once. The eldest son should be called upon to support himself. It will be a service to him and a burden off from Munshiji’s shoulders. If the daughter-in-law cannot live with her husband, she can be accommodated in some Ashram where she can earn her own living. The 10-years-old boy should also be put in an Ashram. Munshiji himself should select some work suitable for him and which he should be bound to do. I wonder if the daughter-in-law is the housewife and housekeeper in the family. Even if it is so and if she consents, the son should be asked to leave the house unless he will work for his own living. In any way Munshiji himself should object to being a burden on the nation when there is no occasion for it.

Yours sincerely,

From a microfilm: S.N. 19762

103. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

WARDHA,
Monday [December 6, 1926]

I enclose a letter for the Ashram women’s association. I was pained to find that you are still in an uncertain state of mind. I do not think any other place will suit you better than the Ashram. Even in the Ashram there may be something you do not like. If that is so, you may try to change it. If you are constipated, the remedy is in your own hands. Or you may get drinking water from Ahmedabad. Enough of it for one person to drink can easily be brought from the city. If you boil the water from the river and then drink it, it will be as good as water from the city. You must make a firm resolve to remain cheerful. Do not change your mind about coming here after the 14th. You will certainly get help here in your Sanskrit studies at any rate. And the climate will of course suit you. Do not hesitate to write to me frankly.

Tell Ramniklal that I feel rather worried as I have no news about Punjabhai’s d health. What is his address? If Ramniklal gets any news about Punjabhai’s health, ask him to write to me.

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Pateln, pp. 41-2

104. LETTER TO PRABHASHANKAR PATTANI

SATYAGRAHA ASHRAM,
WARDHA,
Magsar Sud 1, 1983 [December 6, 1926]

SUJNA BHAISHRI,

You are welcome. I got your letter at Wardha. You give no news about your health. Write about it. I shall have to go to Kathiawar in

1 As in the printed source
2 Punjabhai Shah, an inmate of the Ashram
March. We shall certainly meet then. I will write if I have to come earlier. I also got a letter from you written from England.

Vandemataram from
MOHANDAS

From a Photostat Of The Gujarati Original: C.W. 3217. Courtesy: Mahesh Pattani

105. LETTER TO DEVCHAND PAREKH

Monday [December 6, 1926]

BHAi DEVCHANDBHAI,

I send the accompanying for you to read and preserve. I have sent a suitable reply. I have written to tell him\(^1\) that he need say nothing on the political situation, [and also that] we shall not ask him often to go to Kathiawar.

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 5722

106. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI

WARDHA,
Silence Day [December 6, 1926]\(^2\)

CHI. RAMDAS,

I got your letter. Where there is faith and straightforwardness, success follows sooner or later. Can one admire sufficiently Abbas Saheb’s\(^3\) straightforwardness? His faith is equally great, and so circumstances continue to favour him. Tell Abbas Saheb that I liked Rehana\(^4\) very much this time. I spent hours with Mirabai. Soheli also met me at Baroda. She is grown up now and is engaged and so she

---

1. For a session of the Kathiawar Political Conference
2. The postmark bears the date December 9, 1926. The preceding Monday fell on December 6, 1926.
3. Amritlal Thakkar, who had been invited to preside over the session of the Kathiawar Political Conference and who seems to have explained his difficulties in accepting the invitation
4. From the postmark
5. Abbas Tyabji
6. Daughter of Abbas Tyabji

374 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
was feeling very shy. She did not even talk to me. Manilal\(^1\) will land in Bombay on the 11th. Most probably Omar Seth will insist upon his getting off at Porbandar.

_Blessings from_
_BAPU_

[PS.]
Blessings to Abbas Saheb.

CHI. RAMDAS GANDHI
C/O CHI. GOURISHANKER VYAS
MANAVADAR
KATHIAWAR

From a photostat of the Gujarati original: G. N. 6851

107. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

WARDHA,
_Wednesday [December 8, 1926]\(^2\)_

CHI. MANI,

I have your postcard. Come by all means. The morning train is more convenient than the night train. But do what you like. I am not waiting to get married, so that I may change my mind every moment. This is the privilege of unmarried girls. Boys too exercise a little of it.

_Blessings from_
_BAPU_

[From Gujarati]
_Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelne, p.42_

108. LETTER TO VASUMATI PANDIT

_[December 8, 1926]\(^3\)_

CHI. VASUMATI,

I got your letter. Ba is still in the Ashram. I have about ten people here—Mahadev, Subbiah, Keshu, Lakshmidas, Krishnadas, Kamala-behn, Dakshabehn (whom you do not know) and Rukhi. Over

---

\(^1\) Manilal Gandhi
\(^2\) As in the printed source
\(^3\) From the postmark
and above these, Rajagopalachari and other gentlemen have also arrived. Don’t you want to come to Wardha? I believe I shall be here up to the 20th at least. I hope you are in good health. Miss Haussding is also with me. Mirabehn has gone to Delhi.

Blessings from
BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 473. Courtesy: Vasumati Pandit

109. LETTER TO RAJKISHORI MEHROTRA

Wednesday [December 8, 1926]¹

CHI. RAJKISHORI,

I have your letter. I would very much love to send you somewhere for education. But it would mean that you have given up the desire for further progeny, that you have resolved to observe brahmacharya, that you have vowed to spend your life in the service of others, and that you have given up the shelter of your own parents and parents-in-law. Have you their permission? To be self-reliant one has to forgo the attendance of servants and so on. Observing you, I find that you have not yet attained control of the palate; nor have you given up other pleasures. Consider all these things and then let me know your firm decision. Meanwhile you may put in a good deal of study even while you are in the Ashram. Do it.

Blessings from
BAPU

From the Hindi original: C.W. 4954; also G.N. 7479. Courtesy: Parashuram Mehrotra

¹ From the postmark
110. LETTER TO PRABHUDAS GANDHI

[Before December 9, 1926]¹

CHI. PRABHUDAS,

I found it rather hard to come away leaving you behind. Your unsteady mind also is responsible for your ill health. It is to one’s advantage to let the mind become a little insensitive. Thinking overmuch is not a good sign. Just as it is a sign of disease if the heart-beat is too slow or too fast, so is it with the mind. To be equiminded, one has to avoid being both. It is a rather unusual state of mind. Lacking a word to describe it, we speak of it as something which means that one is neither too sensitive nor too insensitive, but that is not so. It is something quite different from this since equiminded means suspension of both states of sensitivity and insensitivity. You should try to cultivate such a state of mind. However, it may be said that it cannot even be cultivated. What you need to do, therefore, is to overcome your sensitiveness.²

From the Gujarati original: S.N. 32979

111. HER OTHER SERVICES

In sending me a cutting from Indian Opinion, Phoenix (Natal), a friend drew my attention to an omission from General Smuts’ tribute to Emily Hobhouse copied some time ago in these pages. It refers to her effort to introduce spinning and weaving industry amongst the distressed Boer women after the Boer War. Here is the passage³ in question.

Young India, 9-12-1926

¹ The addressee has noted at the top of the letter that he received the letter on December 9, 1926.
² This marks the end of page one of the letter. The remaining pages could not be traced.
³ Not reproduced here
112. PRICE OF FREEDOM

Mr. Gregg sends me¹ the following extracts from a written address by Thomas Paine to the soldiers of General George Washington’s American army in the Revolutionary War, December 1776, fighting against the British for the freedom of the thirteen American Colonies:

These are the times that try men’s souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country; but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap we esteem too lightly; ’tis dearness only that gives everything its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed, if so celestial an article as Freedom should not be highly rated.

I once felt all that kind of anger, which a man ought to feel against the mean principles that are held by the Tories: a noted one, who kept a tavern at Amboy, was standing at his door, with as pretty a child in his hand, about eight or nine years old, as I ever saw, and after speaking his mind as freely as he thought was prudent, finished with this unfatherly expression, “Well, give me peace in my day.” Not a man lives on the continent but fully believes that a separation must some time or other finally take place, and a generous parent should have said, ‘If there must be trouble, let it be in my day that my child may have peace,’ and this single reflection, well applied, is sufficient to awaken every man to duty. Not a place upon earth might be so happy as America. Her situation is remote from all the wrangling world, and she has nothing to do but to trade with them.

I call not upon a few, but upon all, not on this state or that state, but on every state; up and help us; lay your shoulders to the wheel; better have too much force than too little, when so great an object is at stake. Let it be told to the future world, that in the depth of winter, when nothing but hope and virtue could survive, the city and the country, alarmed at one common danger, came forth to meet and to repulse it. Say not that thousands are gone, turn out your tens of thousands; throw not the burden of the day upon Providence, but ‘show your faith by your works’ that God may bless you. It matters not where you live, or what rank of life you hold, the evil or the blessing will reach you all. The far and the near, the home countries and back, the rich and the poor, will suffer or rejoice alike. The heart that feels not now is dead; the blood of his children will curse his cowardice, who shrinks back at a time when a little might have saved the whole, and made them happy. I love the man that can smile in trouble, that can gather strength from distress, and grow brave by reflection. 'Tis the business of little minds to shrink; but he whose heart is firm, and whose conscience approves his conduct, will pursue his principles unto death . . . .

There are cases which cannot be overdone by language, and this is one. There are persons too who see not the full extent of the evil which threatens them; they solace themselves with hopes that the enemy, if he succeed, will be merciful. It is the madness of folly to expect mercy from those who have refused to do justice; and even mercy, where conquest is the object, is only a trick of war; the cunning of the fox is as murderous as the violence of the wolf, and we ought to guard equally against both.

It is remarkable how similar are the qualities required of soldiers of peace and soldiers of war. Thomas Paine’s speech could be addressed almost word for word and with complete appropriateness to the Congress volunteers of 1921 who enrolled under the Ahmedabad Congress pledge of complete non-violence in thought word and deed. Whether you secure freedom by the use of physical force or spiritual force, i.e., through self-suffering, the price to be paid must be heavy, if it is to be a valuable article. Bravery and perseverance in the face of odds are as necessary, if not more, to the man of the spirit as to the man of the sword. Whether we will win swaraj by violent means or non-violent, we shall have to discard ease and comfort, not to speak of luxuries. Pratap reduced himself to penury for the sake of what he believed to be freedom. Prahlad delivered his body for free destruction for what he believed to be his freedom. But there are among us not a few who would gain swaraj for a song. Thomas Paine tells us that such a thing is not possible.

Young India. 9-12-1926
113. THE GREATEST GOOD OF ALL

A constant reader of Young India sends the following:¹

I reproduce this letter for it helps me to elucidate my own position. If such a very careful reader of Young India, as I know this correspondent is, misunderstands my position as is evident from his letter, how many more occasional readers must have done likewise? Several readers did draw my attention to the danger of a misunderstanding arising owing to the traditional hardness of our hearts which makes us prone to seize every opportunity of doing violence. One can only be—one ought to be—most careful in the handling of delicate problems; but no fear of misuse of statements can be permitted to stop a free and honest discussion of fundamental truths. For me, I shall learn to be and do right only by prayerful discussion, elucidation and interchange of views. This letter I have quoted is an instance in point. The discussion has brought to light an honest misunderstanding of difference between the correspondent and myself in the interpretation of the same principle.

Whilst I am of opinion that Dr. Blazer was well acquitted, according to the test laid down by me, he was wrong in taking the life of his daughter. It betrayed want of faith in the humanity of those around him. There was no warrant for him to suppose that the daughter would not have been cared for by others. The position in the case of dogs under the circumstances assumed by me is materially different from the position in which Dr. Blazer found himself. Nor am I able to subscribe to the view that an idiot has no soul. I believe that even the lower creation have souls.

Weightier still is the difficulty which another earnest reader puts and which may be thus summarized:

I appreciate the position you have taken up. It is the only true position. But does not your argument after all resolve itself into the utilitarian doctrine of the greater good of the greater number? And if that is your position, wherein does the doctrine of non-violence differ from the utilitarian which makes no pretence to non-violence and which will not hesitate to destroy life if the destruction would lead to the greater good of the greater number?

¹ Not reproduced here. The correspondent enclosed a newspaper cutting which carried a report of how a Dr. Blazer had chloroformed his imbecile daughter because he felt there would be no one to look after her once he was dead. It also carried the report of a French actress who shot her lover at his own request as he was suffering from an incurable disease. The jury in both cases acquitted the accused.

In the first place even though the outward act may be the same, its implications will vary according to the motive prompting it. Thus as non-violence in the West stops at man and, even then, only where possible, there is no compunction felt either over subjecting animals to vivisection for the supposed greater good of mankind or over heaping up most destructive armaments also in the name of the same doctrine of utility. A votary of non-violence, on the other hand, might have done one act of destruction in common with the utilitarian, but he would prefer to die rather than make himself party to vivisection or to an endless multiplication of armaments.

The fact is that a votary of ahimsa cannot subscribe to the utilitarian formula. He will strive for the greatest good of all and die in the attempt to realize the ideal. He will therefore be willing to die so that the others may live. He will serve himself with the rest, by himself dying. The greatest good of all inevitably includes the good of the greater number, and therefore he and the utilitarian will converge at many points in their career but there does come a time when they must part company, and even work in opposite directions. The utilitarian to be logical will never sacrifice himself. The absolutist will even sacrifice himself. The absolutist, when he kills a dog, does so either out of weakness or in rare cases for the sake of the dog himself. That it is a dangerous thing to decide what is or is not good for the dog, and that he may therefore make grievous mistakes is irrelevant to the fact of the motive prompting the act. The absolutist’s sphere of destruction will be always the narrowest possible. The utilitarian’s has no limit. Judged by the standard of non-violence the late War was wholly wrong. Judged by the utilitarian standard each party has justified it according to its idea of utility. Even the Jallianwala Bagh massacre was justified by its perpetrators on the grounds of utility. And precisely on the same ground the anarchist justifies his assassinations. But none of these acts can possibly be justified on the greatest-good-of-all principle.

Young India, 9-12-1926
Incongruity

With my resumed travelling, if it has to be continued, begins my sorrow—crowds coming to have darshan with unmistakable affection in their bright eyes and smiling faces, but doing nothing of what I have ceaselessly poured into their ears. On the 4th instant, girls and boys presented to me in the early morning hours at Jalgaon their neatly made strands of hand-spun yarn but with a few honourable exceptions, they themselves were dressed in millmade cloth. I wonder if the girls and the boys knew why they were spinning at all. The girls had been spinning only for four months and they belonged to the municipal school.

Good work

The report before me of their spinning tells me that the work of introducing spinning in certain schools of the municipality was entrusted to East Khandesh District Khadi Board. How businesslike it would be if this example was followed by the other municipalities and organization of hand-spinning was entrusted to Khadi Boards who are naturally expected to have experts for the work? In this school they have both the takli and the charkha. The maximum spun by a single girl on the wheel was 7,188 yards of yarn. The highest count was 22. The maximum per hour spun on the takli was 120 yards; on the charkha, 375 yards. The report says:

Takli-spinning has so much fascinated the girls of standard IV that 15 of them learnt to spin on charkha and have spun during their spare time. Their example has induced some girls of standard III also to learn on charkha. The contagion is spreading and the number of such voluntary girl-spinners is steadily increasing. The spinning has become a pastime with some as they come to spin even on holidays. 12 prepare their own slivers while 2 have commenced even to learn carding.

It is to be hoped that before long every girl will card her own cotton and prepare her own slivers and that the teachers will induce the girls to take to wearing khaddar. The best way of doing it is fully to explain to the girls the reason for spinning and to place every facility for procuring khaddar at reasonable prices and of the type they need. The teachers should also establish contact with the parents of the girls and secure their active co-operation in the work. The fact is that all this work can only be thoroughly done when the organizers throw their whole soul into it, as witness the extraordinary success of the work among the Labour Union schools of Ahmedabad. All the spinning teachers would do well to make themselves the improvised testing appliance which has been described in these pages. Speed without strength is waste. To draw thread is not enough. It is necessary to draw thread that can be used for warp.

Young India, 9-12-1926

115. KHADDAR IN THE PUNJAB

The following is a summary1 prepared in the A.I.S.A. office of an exhaustive report in Hindi received from the A.I.S.A. agency, Punjab. The original contains details which the summary has omitted for the sake of condensation. In the original I find that khaddar work is going on in 42 centres. I invite the reader to visualize what this means. It means a living contact with toilers in these villages and distributing wealth among them in exchange for their labour. ‘So do the merchants’ one may be thoughtlessly inclined to say. But there is a great difference between a merchant who goes in their midst to exploit them and a patriot who goes to them to invite them to work and receive wages for their labour. When the wheel is firmly established, its appeal will be irresistible. Its result will be banishment of starvation for those who would work without having to tear down their homes. The feature of the Punjab work is that it has now become almost self-supporting. It has practically no bad book debts. Exchange of yarn for khaddar at an additional charge of 2 as. per yard is a valuable feature fraught with great consequences. It is possible, I suppose, only in a place like the Punjab where, as the report says there is a large number of men and women still wearing khaddar. Lala Kishan Chand Bhatia naturally takes pride in the fact that he has been able to have sheets locally printed at reduced prices. He has also imported the Khadi Pratishthan wheel and copied it with effect. The cry in the Punjab as elsewhere is want of patronage. Khaddar cannot be sold as fast as it is produced. All may not die for the country, may we not for its sake even wear khaddar unless it is equal in appearance and price to the latest machine-made stuff from Manchester or Japan? If we will not even give one extra pice for khaddar or put some restraint upon our sartorial taste, What is our patriotism worth? The

1 Not reproduced here
Punjab has cotton, spinning, weaving and commercial ability. Will it not have enough patriotism to buy up khaddar as fast as it can be made? It should not be necessary for Jamnalalji or me or any one else to go to the Punjab, collect money for khaddar work or to sell it.

Young India, 9-12-1926

116. DOWN WITH SUPERNATURALISM!

To
THE EDITOR,
Young India
SIR,

When you judge the action of a ‘believer’ like Aurangzeb in desecrating and demolishing a place of worship like the Kashi temple as ‘belying’ his ‘belief’, viz., Islam (in Young India of 4-11-'26), are you not presuming to know more of Islam than the Prophet of Islam himself? For you must know that Mahomed himself, the beau ideal of Aurangzeb, when he entered Mecca in triumph against the enemies, destroyed all the objects and places of ‘idolatrous’ worship in that city, leaving a few of them like the Kaaba stone which he himself believed in! So then you must either (i) say that Mahomed was one of those ‘so-called believers who belied’ their belief,—which will not be in keeping with your former dictum that the great religious teachers of mankind were men who had exhibited the image of God in their own persons (vide Young India, 8-7-'26, page 244, column 2); or (ii) allegorize away the iconoclastic career of the Arabian Prophet (May peace be on Him!), as you usually do with whatever in the scriptures of any sect taken literally you do not ‘understand’ or whatever in them similarly understood does not ‘appeal to your reason’; or (iii) repudiate the universally received life story of Mahomed as spurious. If there is a fourth way, please point it out; but please remember that Aurangzeb has been styled a ‘living saint’ (Zinda Pir, etc.) by all Sunni divines and historians who have never a word to say against his temple destruction, so far as I know, but many of whom on the contrary have glorified him therefor.

Is this fact not remarkable, seeing how the Ulema of India are today divided on the subject of the desecrations, the demolitions and massacres which Ibn Saud, the Wahabi, has been responsible for in Mecca, Medina and Taif, one section (the Ahle hadis) Justifying those deeds as quite Islamic, and the other (Shiás, Hanafis, etc.) declaring them un-Islamic? But I have yet to meet a member of that learned and pious fraternity who will wholeheartedly condemn Aurangzeb’s high-handedness on the Hindus’ holiest of holies. It is much like those Sanatanis who would lynch you for trying to do away with 1 This appeared in the correspondence column of Young India.

2 The source has “believed in” which was corrected in Young India, 23-12-1926.
untouchability in India and at the same time lynch also, if they could, those white-coloured folk in South Africa who are maintaining untouchability with the Indians there.

I am thus led to think that conflict and inconsistency are in the nature of all non-rational faiths of supernatural pretensions. Hence, however much you try to ‘liberalize’ such religions, you will never have truly liberalized them before you have improved them out of existence altogether. To mend them is to end them, and can only one liberalize them away; that is my opinion in which, the more I think, the more I am confirmed.

Prince Yudhishthira seems to have glimpsed the truth when he answered the Yaksha in this wise:

कृत्यीविभिन्ना स्मृतिपरश्च भिला,
रै को मुनिन्यं गतं प्रमणम् ।
धर्मस्य तत्त्वं निपितं गुहायाम् ॥

So in the cave where it lives we will do best to leave it!

Yours, etc.,

A SEEKER AFTER TRUTH

The reader will be glad to have this beautiful letter. The writer’s hit at me is quite delicious. But I do not propose to adopt any of the three courses he thinks I usually take for defending the indefensible. There is so far as I know nothing in common between the Prophet’s destruction of idols in Mecca and the reputed destruction by Aurangzeb. And should it turn out that the Prophet had erred on occasions, his error would but prove his fallible nature without in any way diminishing his glory as an inspired seer exhibiting on most occasions the image of God? He never himself claimed infallibility. On the contrary, he often consulted his companions and when he was once told by Omer that he need not consult anybody as he had direct dealings with God, it is recorded that he retorted that if he had on that occasion a message from God, he would not have consulted Omer. I know that “A Seeker after Truth” does not seriously mean that I “allegorize away”, without good cause, whatever is inconvenient. I hope that his banter is meant merely to ‘draw me’. Whatever the cause, I assure him and all concerned that whenever I regard any narrative as an allegory, I have substantial and intrinsic evidence for my belief. Nor do I repudiate without sufficient cause anything as spurious or apocryphal. As a fellow-seeker after Truth I hope I have courage enough to own my errors and limitations. There are things in all religious books which baffle me. I hope some day to have them made clear to me. Till then, I cultivate humility, patience to wait. Man need not know all.

The most serious part however of the writer’s letter is his repudiation of the supernatural. I suggest to him that rationalists have as many conundrums and inconsistencies to account for as supernaturalists. Is the uniform testimony of some of the purest and noblest men so much humbug and hallucination when they say that according not to their belief, but experience, there is something beyond the senses? Is it not an arrogant claim to lay down the law that there is nothing beyond the five senses? Who does not feel that there are mysteries impenetrable by reason? Do not the daily and so-called sudden transformations of the character of those who worship in faith incontestably show that there are things that reason cannot understand or explain? The celebrated verse quoted by the writer after all presents the difficulty of knowing dharma except through the heart. And, after all, the author of the great book from which the verse has been taken was himself a believer in the supernatural. The mystery of creation and death is itself a living demonstration of the supernatural. It will be time enough to scoff at it when man has by his reason succeeded in creating life.

Young India, 9-12-1926

117. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

WARDHA,
December 9, 1926

CHI. MIRA,

Your two letters came into my hands the same day. I am glad you wrote so fully. Please continue the habit. I miss you in my walks here. We traverse the same old route. I hope you got my two letters. Nothing yet certain about going to Gauhati. You will make it a point to see Hakimji and M. Mahomed Ali. You should see his wife and daughters too.

With love,

BAPU

From the original: C.W. 5190. Courtesy: Mirabehn

1 To attend the Congress session
118. LETTER TO SHUAIB QURESHI

WARDHA,
December 9, 1926

MY DEAR SHUAIB,

The papers you sent me through Shankerlal about the Nigoi ground have been lying with me and in front of me all these long days. I have now read the whole of the thing carefully. The minutes of the meeting of the arbitrators, or whatever they may be called, have not been signed by all the parties. Messrs Bhopatkar and Dandekar were, therefore, strictly speaking, justified in making any corrections they chose. I am not going into the merits at all. Nor are the corrections made, I think, vitally different from the context.

So far as I can see there is only one material correction, namely, ‘Hindus should ever have access to it as before.’ Is that not contemplated by the original draft?

What is the cart track in clause 4 meant for? Was it intended that the cart track will enable the people to visit Dehu but not so as to enable them also to visit the paduka? Having gone so far as to retain the rights of Hindus to visit the paduka, everything else becomes, in my opinion, of little consequence.

If you are interesting yourself in this matter, I would advise you carefully to study the documents and then guide the trustees. If the Hindu arbitrators are still agreeable to the substance of the understanding set forth in D, I think that there is every prospect of a settlement.

What are you now doing? Do you propose to discharge the burden you have taken on your shoulders on behalf of the All-India Spinners’ Association? You have to render an account of your doings in that behalf to the President and, what is more, to the still small voice within.

Yours sincerely,
M. K. GANDHI

From a photostat: S. N. 12381
DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter\(^1\) for which I thank you. The book[s] that I can recommend regarding Hinduism are Sir Edwin Arnold’s translation of the Bhagavad Gita called the Song Celestial, his Light of Asia, Max Muller’s India: What It Can Teach Us, Dutt’s abridged Rama-yana and Mahabharata in verses. There are several other books but I think that these give one a fair idea of Hindu thought.

Do you know that since 1915 I have discontinued giving sittings to photographers?\(^2\) I have not one single copy of my own photograph. Those that are on sale at stationery shops and elsewhere are all snapshots. If you want me to get hold of one of these which friends tell me hardly represent me, I shall buy a copy and gladly sign it. But I would far rather like that the boys thought more of what I stand for than what my exterior is like. But I do not wish to dogmatize. They shall make their own choice or you for them.

Here is my message to your boys: Above all think, speak and do the truth at any cost, with special emphasis on any.

Yours sincerely,

GORDON LAW, ESQ.
BOYS SECRETARY
YOUNG MEN’S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION
NEWBURG
NEW YORK, U.S.A.

From a photostat: S.N. 19756

---

\(^1\) Law, writing on November 5, had requested for information about what he should read from the Hindu scriptures (S.N. 10836).

\(^2\) The correspondent had pleaded for one signed photograph of Gandhiji; ibid.
120. LETTER TO DR. SURESHER BANNERJI

WARDHA,
December 9, 1926

DEAR SURESH BABU,

I have your letter. I hope you will entirely get rid of your heart trouble.

I do not know whether to feel glad or sorry over Profulla Babu’s decision. It all depends upon the motive behind it. I have written to him asking him to come to Wardha if he will. His severing the connection with the Pratishthan has given a severe shock to Satis Babu. You must some day come to Wardha and make Vinoba’s acquaintance.

I have not forgotten the promise to pass a few days with you on my return from Gauhati if I go to Gauhati at all. I am yet undecided.

Yours sincerely,

DR. SURESH BANNERJI
ABHAY ASHRAM
COMILLA

From a microfilm: S.N. 19757

121. LETTER TO RAMDEV

WARDHA,
December 9, 1926

DEAR RAMDEVJI,

I have your letter. I do not remember having received the communication containing extracts about the ‘pranks of anglicized Indians’. If you will send me a copy of that communication, I will see what I can do with it. I shall await your short article.

You may publish the scheme or do as you like with it.

I have in mind the forthcoming visit to the Gurukul to which I am really looking forward but you won’t expect me to stay there for 13 days. Is that also the time of the Kumbha Mela?

The short article is received.

Yours sincerely,

SJT. RAMDEVJI
GURUKUL UNIVERSITY
P. O. GURUKUL KANGRI
(BIJNOR) U.P.

From a microfilm: S.N. 19758
122. LETTER TO DR. B. C. ROY

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

December 9, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have purposely kept your telegram pending correspondence I am carrying on with Motilalji and other friends. I am not yet certain about my going to Gauhati. Motilalji just sends me a peremptory wire, but I am awaiting for his considered reply to my letter. In any event, if I do go to Gauhati, on my way going there I shall be in Calcutta only for a few hours pending the departure of the Assam Mail. I am therefore unable to give you any definite reply just now.

I hope the Hospital is flourishing.

Yours sincerely,

DR. BIDHAN ROY
CHITTARANJAN HOSPITAL
RUSSA ROAD
CALCUTTA

From a microfilm : S.N. 19759

123. LETTER TO HAKIM AJMAL KHAN

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,

December 9, 1926

DEAR HAKIM SAHEB,

About the time I left the Ashram I got a letter from you. It was written by your secretary. I have not understood the letter. I do not know what Mr. C. Vijayaraghavachariar has written to you. Do you want me to write to him?

I hope that you are now thoroughly restored. I wonder if you are now taking any interest in public life. I came to Wardha 4 days ago and I am likely to be here for some time. I am trying to avoid going to Gauhati this time and I am trying to persuade Motilalji and others to let me off.

Yours sincerely,

HAKIM SAHEB AJMAL KHAN
SHARIF MANZIL
DELHI

From a photostat: S.N. 19760

390 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
124. LETTER TO DR. N. S. HARDIKAR

WARDHA,
December 9, 1926

DEAR DR. HARDIKAR,

I have not been able to reply to your letter earlier, for the simple reason that I have been overwhelmed with work and I had not the copy of Young India before me at the time I received your letter.

To draw me to Karnatak, you should really be able to sell one lakh worth of khaddar and collect one lakh for khaddar work. You say you would win me for remodelling the political life of Karnatak. Do you believe in the ability of khadi to remodel political life? Do you know that I have staked all upon khadi? The proposition enunciated is that you advance the political life in the country in exact proportion to the advance of khadi and no more. The moment I have driven this truth home, that moment will begin the forward movement.

Yours sincerely,

D R. N.S. HARDIKAR
HUBLI

From a microfilm : S.N. 19763

125. LETTER TO H. C. HULL

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 9, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your kind letter.¹ Yours is the fourth invitation I have received to visit America. Somehow or other, I do not think [sic] as yet the call within. If I am to be guided by the mere desire, I should straight away respond to your invitation. But something within me tells me that I could not deliver my message more effectively by ¹ Hannah Clothier Hull had written on November 6 to say how warmly the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom would welcome Gandhiji’s visit to the United States and added: We consider that your message for Peace and Goodwill is a message for people everywhere and that delivered personally would be a great help to the whole movement (S. N. 10837).

going to America than by living it myself here, however inadequately it may be.

Yours sincerely,

HANNAH CLOTHIER HULL
NATIONAL CHAIRMAN
504, WALNUT LANE
SWARTMORE, PENNA
U.S.A.

From a photostat:  S.N. 19764

126. LETTER TO FRANCISCA STAN DENATH

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 9, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I am so sorry that you did not get khaddar. I thought I had attended to it. On receiving your letter that you have not yet got it from Swami who was then travelling, I have now spoken to Swami and I hope that you received it before this letter.

I have not contributed anything whatsoever to the paper Conscience referred to by you. I came to know of its existence only through you. So many people are just now making use of all sorts of things in connection with me without my authority or knowledge.

You will let me know in due course whether the khaddar you received was of much use there. Of course, in that climate you will not hesitate to use all the warm clothing you need. The rule about khaddar is of local application, not of universal application. We in India dare not, when we have got our own cotton and ability to turn it into cloth, use cotton fabric which is not made here and which is imported from outside even though millions of people who are now idle for want of occupation could be usefully occupied in the khaddar industry.

Yours sincerely,

MRS. FRANCISCA STAN DENATH
TRAUTMANS DORFGASSE NO. 1
GRAZ (IN STYRIA)
AUSTRIA

From a microfilm:  S.N. 19765

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
127. LETTER TO S. B. SPILLENAAR

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 9, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter.¹ There is no bar to anybody who enjoys good health and who is prepared to go through hardships of life, to live in poverty, and to do continuous labour, being admitted as a member of the Ashram. But I would advise you not to come to India whose climate is different from yours and where customs and habits are also so different. I think that you should try to reproduce the Ashram life there with such changes as may be found necessary. I cannot advise you to undertake the risk of coming to India and endangering your health or being otherwise disappointed.

Yours sincerely,

SOHANNA BATTEEJEE SPILLENAAR
61, P.W. 114TH STREET
NEW YORK CITY

From a photostat: S.N. 19766

128. LETTER TO ROLLO RUSSELL

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 9, 1926

I was delighted to hear from you after so many years. I have got the book you have sent me. Much as I would like to read it, I do not know when I shall be able to read it.

Mine is a very difficult life—more so than when you saw it in Johannesburg. I have also after some experience come to see that it is not what you read but what you think that affects your life. I do hear about you from the Polaks now and then and it gives me delight to know that you were the same innocent soul that I knew in Johannesburg.

¹ In the course of a lengthy letter dated October 20, Spillenaar, “a teacher of music and art” who had lost interest in her work and now evidently desired “spiritual enlightenment”, had written to Gandhiji seeking admission to the Ashram for herself and her eleven-year-old son (S. N. 10931).

I am sending a line to Mrs. Russell

Yours sincerely,

KENT HOUSE
1, NOTTINGHAM PLACE
W.I.

From a photostat: S.N. 19767

129. LETTER TO MRS. ROLLO RUSSELL

AS AT THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
December 9, 1926

DEAR MRS. RUSSELL,

I was delighted to have the volume of verses written by your husband. I prize the gift though I am unable to say when I shall be able to read the volume. My time is all mortgaged.

Yours sincerely,

MRS. ROLLO RUSSELL

From a microfilm: S.N. 19768

130. LETTER TO EMIL RONIGER

AS AT THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
December 9, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I have no desire whatsoever to drive a commercial bargain. If I receive anything from the sale of the translation, it would simply go towards the upkeep of khaddar or untouchability work I am doing here. I suppose for the present you will confine yourself to the German translation. You will let me know in what other languages you expect the Autobiography to be translated. I have myself no notion as to the time when the Autobiography will be completed. There is yet a vast ground to cover.

If you think it worth while, the German translation of the first and second parts which are now completed may be published.

Suppression of passages from an autobiography does not appeal to me. Its merit lies in its being published in its complete form even though it may be crude or uninteresting to those who may not know the language of the narrator. You may however consider this point and imagine me to be open to conviction. If possible, you should let me know, by way of illustration, what you would like to suppress.

I shall be pleased to meet Dr. Hurlimann when he arrives here.

Yours sincerely,

EMIL RONIGER, ESQ.
REINFELDEN
SCHWEIZ

From a copy: S. N. 32245

131. LETTER TO JOHN HAYNES HOLMES

AS AT THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI,

December 9, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter enclosing the draft agreement prepared by the Company. You will see that I have made 3 additions, all of which are, in my opinion, necessary. I have signed the agreement before two witnesses and initialled the additions whether made by me or the Company.

The two parts I contemplate publishing as soon as possible. It is open to the Macmillan Company to publish the volumes as they get completed. But if they do not feel inclined to do so, they must not mind the sale of Indian edition outside India. Hence the inscription of the addition to clause 121.

Yours sincerely,

DR. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES
12 PARK AVENUE
NEW YORK CITY
(U.S.A.)

From a copy: S.N. 32231

1 Which read: “The author reserves the right to a cheap edition of the said work for sale in India, it being provided, however, that the sale of the said edition shall be restricted to India, after the time the company’s copyright edition is available for sale.”
132. TELEGRAM TO S. SRINIVASA IYENGAR

[On or before December 10, 1926]

REACHING GAUHATI 24TH.

The Bombay Chronicle, 11-12-1926

133. LETTER TO G. V. KETKAR

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 10, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. The idea of a Gita Day and the manner in which you want it observed does not appeal to me at all. What is more, I do not agree with the interpretation you have sought to put upon it. I can’t belittle the teaching of the Divine book by confining it to a description of a clash of arms between rival clans on an earthly battlefield.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

From the original: C.W. 982. Courtesy: G. V. Ketkar

134. LETTER TO A. A. PAUL

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 10, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I wonder what is going on about the contemplated Chinese visit.1 The Indian programme before me for the next year is so heavy and there are many other such considerations that I should now like to know definitely, at the earliest possible moment, if and when I must go to China. You will please make it clear to the friends who are in correspondence with you that they are in no way bound to carry out visit programme, because they have contemplated it and have in a way

---

1 Srinivasa Iyengar had been elected President of the Congress session due to be held at Gauhati.

2 Through A. A. Paul, Gandhi had received an invitation to visit China and had tentatively agreed to do so in the autumn of 1927.
even given me the invitation. The visit, therefore, should be brought about only if there is a real felt want. I am sick of spectacular demonstrations. I have no desire for making speeches. The only thing I love is simple heart-to-heart conversation and an elucidation of difficulties. I would like you to cancel the contemplated visit without reference to me, if you arrive at the conclusion that not much good is to be expected out of it. My own opinion is, that in the present disturbed state of China,¹ the visit will miscarry. My message is one of unadulterated non-violence and truth. People are ill-fitted to receive such a message when feeling runs high and blood is hot. Nothing but a clear, proper call, therefore, should move me to China. Even if our friends in China are insistent and you also come to the conclusion that the visit should be paid, you will of course leave the final decision to me. Let there be the fullest material possible sent to me so as to arrive at a proper decision. In all such matters, it is the answer [to] the prayer that enables me to arrive at my decision.

Yours sincerely,

A. A. PAUL, ESQ.
KILPAUK
MADRAS

From a photostat: S.N. 11378

135. LETTER TO DR. B. C. ROY

WARDHA,

December 10, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have seen your telegram to Mahadeo. I do not remember having received any letter from you and [to] the telegram I sent you a reply from Wardha by post² which I hope you have now received. It is now settled that I am going to Gauhati. I leave here on the 22nd, reach Calcutta on the 23rd morning and entrain the same day for Gauhati. I

¹ China was, at this time, going through a phase of civil strife. Various provincial war-lords contended against one another for supremacy, and the Kuomintang under Chiang Kai-Sheik had not yet established itself as an effective central authority.

² Vide “Letter to Dr. B. C. Roy”, 9-12-1926.
hardly think you want me to perform the ceremony\(^1\) during the few hours that I am in Calcutta.

I propose to stay with a friend in Calcutta who used to come very often at Russa Road when I was there and who got me to promise that I would stay with him next time I went to Calcutta. His name and address are: Sjt. Khandelwal, 50, Harish Mukerji Road, Calcutta.

Yours sincerely,

DR. B. C. ROY
36, WELLINGTON STREET
CALCUTTA

From a microfilm: S. N. 19754

136. LETTER TO D. K. PHADAKE

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 10, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter and the pages of your translation of Lokamanya’s life by Mr. Kelkar.

I should like you to come to Wardha, hire some rooms near-by and watch me at my work from early morning to nine o’clock at night and if you find that there are any moments when I am free, you can inspan them for going through your book and then writing a preface. But if you cannot do so, you should take it from me that I have absolutely no leisure left to me and I have hardly time to go through the tasks that I have already undertaken. You must, therefore, please forgive.

Yours sincerely,

D. K. PHADAKE, ESQ.
6, KOCHIN STREET
FORT
BOMBAY

From a microfilm: S.N. 19755

\(^1\) This presumably refers to the laying of the foundation-stone of one of the wings of Chittaranjan Seva Sadan, which ceremony Gandhiji performed; vide “Speech at Chittaranjan Seva Sadan, Calcutta”, 2-1-1927.
CHI. MIRA.

I have your 4 letters. Two I have acknowledged already.

I suppose you know the meaning of \textit{chi}. It stands for \textit{chiranjivi} meaning ‘long-lived’. That is the blessing which an elder prefixe to the names of the younger members of his family.

I like all your letters. I am glad you had an early opportunity of going to the Mussalman friend. Miss Grover’s name I had forgotten altogether. I was delighted that you went there. She is a good earnest soul, much devoted to her work.

You should give me your day’s doings, and describe the prayers, the studies and the meals. Tell me what you are eating. How are your bowels acting? What is the quantity of milk you are taking? What are the times of your meals? Are there mosquitoes there? Do you take your walks regularly? Do you write any Hindi? Does anyone teach you? What fruit are you getting?

I duly got the corrected chapter.\footnote{From the postmark} You should find out the posting time.

I leave Wardha on 21st inst. Motilalji\footnote{Motilal Nehru} insists on my going to Gauhati. I hope you will be getting your Y. I. regularly. If you do not, you should ask Swami and write to Mrityunjay to attend. I take it you will be getting Hindi \textit{Navajivan} also.

You will not forget the Urdu script please.

The American friends, mother and daughter, are still here. I think I told you about their arrival. The daughter is a teacher in an important school. They are leaving tomorrow. Jamnalalji has over 40 guests on my account. Poor Jankibehn!\footnote{Jamnalal Bajaj’s wife}

I am keeping exceptionally good health. Exercise regularly morning and evening.
You can’t complain of any brevity about this letter.
With love,

BAPU
Saturday

I was uncertain about the correctness of the passage in Rolland’s letter which you have now corrected. It reads perfectly intelligible now. Please do not return the original. File it among your papers.

B

From the original: C.W. 5191. Courtesy: Mirabehn

138. KATHIAWAR POLITICAL CONFERENCE

I congratulate the Committee of the Kathiawar Political Conference on choosing Shri Amritlal Thakkar as President of its forthcoming session.

Names of a number of luminaries in the political field had been suggested but when Amritlal Thakkar’s name came up, no one had anything to say against it. As I understand it, the main consideration underlying this choice is that the president should be at least someone from Kathiawar and a man of character with a patriotic spirit. Shri Amritlal Thakkar could easily stand this triple test and come out successful. We cannot today find a worker who can excel Shri Amritlal Thakkar in point of character; whether in Kathiawar, in Gujarat or in India. His sacrifice for the sake of the country was perhaps earlier than that of all of us. His devotion has brought credit to him and his country and it is difficult to compete with him in dedicated service. Moreover, the field of activity which he selected for such service is as easy as it is difficult. It is easy because there are only a few who take interest in serving the communities whom he has chosen to serve and so he achieves quick results. It is difficult because if no results that startle the world are forthcoming, the raw or unseasoned workers would feel despondent. But Amritlal became the priest to Dheds and Bhangis and not being satisfied with it became the servant and friend of the Bhils.

1 Vide Appendix “Romain Rolland’s Letter to Gandhiji”.
2 Which was to be held at Porbandar in March 1927 but could be held only in January 1928.
3 One of the communities traditionally regarded as untouchables
4 Aboriginal tribe in Gujarat and Central India
What will such a man do at a political conference? This point did not occur to those who selected him; but it did to Amritlal Thakkar. Taking me to task for allowing his name to come up for selection, he writes to me a letter whose summary is given below:

The fact that this question occurred to him points to the fine state of his mind. But does he not know that nowadays the Political Conference has made it its business to serve the Antyajas and others? Who can say that this service is not implied by and included in khadi? Not only that, but the Conference this year has directly rendered no mean service to the Antyajas and others and has spent no small amount of money for them. Thus the very activities which are dear to Shri Amritlal Thakkar constitute the present field of operation of the Conference. Moreover, Amritlal Thakkar is the pioneer of khadi work in Kathiawar. I do not, however, know whether his love of khadi or his faith in it is still the same as before. He will most probably clarify this point at the Conference.

Now there remains politics. In my opinion, there can be no conference or other politics outside of such constructive activities. I have visualized the same for the whole of India. If India leaves off the so-called politics and plunges itself only in constructive activities and works with the devotion of a Thakkar, swaraj will be secured very easily. Moreover, if I apply this principle to India I would naturally apply it in particular to Kathiawar. This does not mean that no political work should be done in Kathiawar or outside it. He who can only do political work and finds constructive activity futile will certainly plunge himself in politics alone. We shall take the cue from them and follow them. If we do not like their work, we shall allow them to go their way. When they will see that none of us follows them, they will doubt the correctness of their way and will retrace their steps. The Kathiawar Conference has taken of this golden way. I hope the Conference will not deviate from that path. I do not know of a single incident by reason of which the Conference should so deviate. If we become good, alert, free from fear, become united—the ruler too will easily become good, alert, loving and friendly towards his subjects. The divine rule “if one is good, “the world is good” is no mere popular saying but a truth. “As the subjects so the ruler” is truer in 1 Not translated here. In the letter Thakkar had asked Gandhi how he could fit in with politics when his field of work was with Dheds, Bhangis, Bhils, Kolis and others.

---

this democratic age than “as the ruler so the subjects”. Hence politics means a relationship among the people from the lowest to the highest strata and unity among all. This unity is a sort of constructive work wherein there is need of mutual relationship for all. Long speeches or articles cannot tell upon the rulers as the quiet, humble, modest work on khadi has been doing. But only the wise can listen to the silent eloquence of khadi. Earnest work and concentration are needed to listen to that sweet speech. Removal of untouchability means self-purification and union of hearts with the poor. To me speeches made in the Councils appear as nothing before this power.

But these are my own thoughts. I offer them to the Kathiawaris and to Shri Amritlal Thakkar. They may accept what they like out of them and reject the rest.

I had asked the Conference in Bhavnagar to place me in charge of political work. The Conference did so. I believe the Conference has not erred therein. I have not been able to achieve anything that I can flaunt. I have suffered a defeat, I have been disappointed a little, but no other way occurred to me; there was and there is only that way. The Conference of entire Kathiawar can do only this much, can merely implore. That the people of the various States can do something special is a different matter. The workers of the various States who are familiar with the political conditions in their States can and should do the work there. I have deliberately set a limit to the field of activities of the Kathiawar Political Conference. Our President should consider whether we should cross this limit or not and should show us a new way if possible.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 12-12-1926

139. ANTYAJ DIRECTORY

The Antyaj Directory which has been brought out by Shri Amritlal Thakkar’s Antyaj Seva Mandal, has been purposely published by me, word for word, in the Navajivan. I am afraid some of the readers must have got annoyed on seeing it, and those who were not annoyed might not have read it. If both these classes of readers exist

---

1. At the session held there in 1925
2. Association for service of untouchables
3. In its issues of November 7, 14, 21, 28 and December 5, 1926

402 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
then I would specifically recommend them to retrieve the previous issues and read the directory. The reader will get some idea of the amount of hard work put in compiling this directory. Investigations were made in 88 villages of the Anand taluk itself. Such detailed investigation in each and every village demands the sacrifice of a great deal of time.

The facts found in the directory bring disgrace to those who follow Hindu dharma. One who reads this directory will realize immediately how much we have failed in our duty towards the Antyajas. A stranger may well say that the people of the place where Antyajas cannot have an adequate supply of even drinking water do not know the barest elements of religion.

The reader will note that in most of the villages Christian missionaries have been active. But this thing is as shameful for us as it is creditable to them. The service that we are now rendering to the Harijans may well be considered as satisfactory in view of the fact that formerly we were doing nothing at all. But it is a matter of shame for us as long as there is even a single village without a Hindu worker for the Harijan or without proper facilities of drinking water.

Shri Amritlal Thakkar assigned the work of this directory to Shri Parikshitlal1. Shri Parikshitlal is a graduate of the Vidyapith. This vast field is open for every graduate of the Vidyapith. Service to the villages is true service to the nation, because the people of India live in the seven lacs of her villages. India does not exist in her cities which are mere degraded images of Europe’s cities. And those who have realized that the service of villages starts with khadi and the cause of the Antyajas have known almost everything there is to know.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 12-12-1926

140. LETTER TO HARI-ICHCHHA

WARDHA,
Magsar Sud 7, 1983 [December 12, 1926]

CHI. HARI-ICHCHHA,

I had certainly preserved this song of yours. Send me an acknowledgment. I am sure you are continuing your Hindi studies

1 Parikshitlal Mazmudar, later President of the Gujarat Harijan Sevak Sangh

VOL. 37 : 11 NOVEMBER, 1926 - 1 JANUARY, 1927  403
and attending prayers regularly. Chandan and others must have improved their health. Do all the women spin?

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 4909. Courtesy: Hari-ichchha Kamdar

141. LETTER TO DR. KARL THIEME

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 13, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. Here are my answers to your questions:

(1) The attempts at solving the Hindu-Muslim question have not yet been successful. It is a matter of time.

(2) I am unable to endorse any scheme of co-operation with the British Government until the system is adequately changed, i.e., until military expenditure is very considerably reduced to the advantage of India and prohibitive tariff imposed upon all foreign cloth and until prohibition is declared. I have no select material to send you but you can gather all the information on these points in the pages of Young India whose principal writings are now available in book-form. The book can be had of Mr. S. Ganesan, 29, Pycrofts Road, Triplicane, Madras.

Yours sincerely,

DR. KARL THIEME
LEIPZIG
GERMANY

From a photostat: S.N. 12319

142. LETTER TO DR. B. C. ROY

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 13, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

The enclosed has remained with me for a long time, buried among the papers which I was then unable to attend to. As I have a few moments to spare to go through arrears, I have come across the enclosed which I send you for such remarks as you may wish to make.

Yours sincerely,

From a microfilm: S.N. 19750

143. LETTER TO DHIREN

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 13, 1926

MY DEAR DHIREN,

Your letter of 9th instant has lain with me for some time. But pressure of work has been so overwhelming that much of my correspondence has remained in arrears. I know your letter ought not to have so remained. But you will believe me when I tell you that there has been of late not one moment for me to spare and I have been obliged to put off many things which I otherwise might not have.

I hear from Urmila Devi that you are keeping good health and that you are keeping yourself busy. I hope, too, that you have made considerable progress in spinning. I wish you would learn carding also there if you are permitted to do so. If you have even seen the process of carding, you could easily learn it even without any tuition.

Now for your question. An innocent prisoner need not starve and, in my opinion, he does not lose his dignity by accepting maintenance money from his custodians. But I do think that he may not take anything beyond his bare sustenance. But he need not stint himself to the extent of damaging his health or starving his relatives if the custodians pay him enough to enable him to support those who were depending upon him. Thus, after all, the question of amount is a matter for each individual to settle for himself. But I have no doubt whatsoever about the propriety of accepting maintenance money.

Yours sincerely,

SJT. DHIREN
C/O SUPERINTENDENT
CENTRAL JAIL
MIDNAPORE (BENGAL)

From a photostat: S.N. 19751
144. LETTER TO S. K. JAIN

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 13, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

Your letter of 3rd October last has lain with me without attention for want of time. If the young man will correspond with me giving me all the particulars about his life and tell me whether he will be prepared to go through the discipline at the Satyagraha Ashram for six months before he is put to any work, I shall see what can be done. As a matter of fact, there is no difficulty about accommodating any number of young men of character and ability.

I am in Wardha up to the 20th instant, after which date, it would be better to address your letter to my permanent address.

Yours sincerely,

SJT. S. K. JAIN
15, NAGJI BUNGALOWS
MATUNGA, G.I.P.
BOMBAY

From a microfilm: S. N. 19752

145. LETTER TO T. N. NATHANI

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 13, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I do not remember the swami or the incident. But it is quite likely that I asked him, if he came to the Ashram, whether he spun. But I could not have turned my back towards him as he must have found me busy at the time. It is my habit now to receive visitors whilst I am spinning so as to save time. I talk and spin at the same time.

I do remember having received a complaint about my having been represented in some photo prints as Lord Krishna. I do also remember having written strongly against it. But I have no re-collection of how many lines I wrote about the incident. I do not think that the weight of a writing is to be justified by its length.
I have not yet found a single swami coming to me whom I could instinctively tell as my guru.

Yours sincerely,

TARACHAND NANAKRAM NATHANI
HALANI, (via) MEHRABPUR, N. W. RLY.

From a photostat: S.N. 19753

146. LETTER TO PRABHASHANKAR PATTANI

WARDHA,
Monday [December 13, 1926]

SUJNA BHAISHRI,
You know that Chi. Mathuradas\(^2\) stays in your bungalow at Panchgani. He has not so far paid any rent. He and I earnestly desire that something should be paid. I have also told him that he should vacate the bungalow during the season; they are therefore, getting ready to vacate it by the end of February. I wish you to let me know the amount of the rent. Write to me about your health.

Vandemataram from
MOHANDAS

From a photostat of the Gujarati: C.W. 3208. Courtesy: Mahesh Pattani

147. LETTER TO ASHRAM WOMEN

WARDHA,
Magsar Sud 11, 1983, December 13, 1926

Today also I am thinking of you after my breakfast. It is exactly 6.50, your time for prayers. You may miss everything else but not this. It means co-operation among ourselves, and between ourselves and God. It is a real purifying bath. As the body becomes dirty if we do not bathe, so also the pure soul appears impure unless the heart is washed with the water of prayer. Do not, therefore, miss prayers any time. At 4 o’clock in the morning, there is an opportunity for cooperation among all. Not all the women, however, are able to attend the prayer. But the 7 o’clock prayer is an occasion of co-operation

\(^1\) From the postmark
\(^2\) Mathuradas Trikumji
among women. It should be possible for all of them to attend it. Co-operation among Ashram women is very essential.

The two American ladies who had stayed with you for a day came here. They left yesterday after staying here for three days. They are mother and daughter. The daughter is unmarried and is twenty-five years of age. She teaches one of the higher classes in a college of five hundred girls. Her Principal has sent her on tour to study how moral education is given in different parts of the world. Her mother accompanies her as her guardian. The two go everywhere in the world fearlessly. How I wish that we had such fearlessness, and this young woman’s devotion to service!

Mirabehn’s life should set all of you thinking. You must be receiving letters in Hindi from her. From her letters to me I see that she has won over the hearts of the Gurukul girls with her simplicity and affectionate nature. She has made herself one with the girls, and has been teaching them carding and spinning very well. She does not waste a single moment. I expect such devotion, sacrifice and purity from you. Is it too much to hope that you should become experts in your work, live a pure life and take yourselves to all parts of the country? Every moment I realize the need for women workers. We find many self-sacrificing men. But do we see anywhere self-sacrificing women coming out for public work? Woman is an embodiment of self-sacrifice. But at present her self-sacrifice is confined to the family. Why should she not make for the nation even greater sacrifices than what she does for her family? Any woman who dedicates herself to dharma will ultimately make such sacrifice for the whole world. But one’s country represents the first stage. And when the interest of one’s country is not in conflict with the interests of the world, service in the cause of one’s country takes one towards moksha.

My request to you this week is that all of you should think seriously of this.

I address this letter to Tarabehn' since Manibehn may not be there. But I should like you to appoint a leader from among yourselves.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 3632

1 Wife of Ramniklal Modi
148. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

WARDHA,
Tuesday, December 14, 1926

CHI. MATHURADAS,

I have received your letter. In my letter to Devdas I have said everything I wanted to say about you. Hence there is nothing more to say. In my opinion, if you keep yourself increasingly on fruit and milk you will be greatly benefited. I would also like your being given Kuhne’s baths. I gave that treatment to Uttamchand at the Ashram and his fever left him. I am aware that physically you are more delicate. But I would not be afraid on that account. However, that question does not arise now. After hearing about the condition of Jawaharlal’s wife¹, I have less faith in allopathic treatment. Surgery is good. The rest is a matter of chance. Even so we cannot help depending on it because there are amongst its practitioners people who genuinely go by their beliefs.

You must muster up the courage to go to the Himalayas.

I have discussed the matter with Pyarelal. He is perfectly ready to accompany you there. He is not keen to come to Assam. After the Congress is over, Devdas will replace him if it should be found necessary.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

149. A LETTER²

WARDHA,
December 15, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

Your letter has been placed in my hands only just now. Much as I should like to speak to your hostel on ahimsa, I fear I shall have no

¹ Kamala Nehru, who was undergoing treatment for tuberculosis in Switzerland ² The addressee is not known.
time on the 21st when I shall be in Nagpur only for a few hours. I may not leave Wardha before that date.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

From a photostat: C.W. 4505. Courtesy: Mrs. Lumsden

150. LETTER TO MAGANLAL GANDHI

Wednesday and Thursday [December 15/16, 1926]¹

CHI. MAGANLAL,

I have your two letters. I hope you do not have the misgivings you expressed in your earlier letter. You have never given me a cause to discard you as a useless person. And I do not consider any person as useless. So how could I think of you in those terms?

I took upon myself the responsibility of work in Vijapur and other places not because I was disappointed with the work but in order to take over from you the unbearably heavy burden of work. Your body which was once as strong as a lion’s has now become a skeleton. I could not bear that. Whatever fault I found in you, I looked upon them as your illness. Under heavy pressure of work, a man develops a kind of intolerance. I saw that in you and even drew your attention to it. In due course, you will be rid of it provided I help you. With the knowledge of my situation, I can visualize yours. I am indeed burdened with work. How can I know what others around me suffer on account of it but I do realize it and therefore remain quiet most often. Discard the feeling that you have hurt me. I am not hurt at all.

I have already sent the plan of Kaka’s house. I vaguely remember that I had given Bhansali’s [plan] to Chhaganlal. It is certainly not here. In case it is not traced, tell Bhansali to make it again. But you should get that plan there. Ask someone to enquire from Chhaganlal. Get the final plan done by Tyabji’s man. Chhaganlal knows what measures I had suggested for the sake of economy in the plan of Valjibhai’s house. He would have arrived by now. Find out from him.

¹ From the reference in the postscript to celebration of Prayer Day for South Africa on the 19th; December 19, 1926 was observed as a day of prayer wishing success to the Round Table Conference in South Africa to solve the problems of Indian settlers. Vide “Letter to C.F. Andrews”, 22-11-1926, “A Letter”, 15-12-1926 and “Letter to Maganlal Gandhi”, December 1926. The Wednesday-Thursday prior to this date fell on 15th and 16th December 1926 respectively.
Entrust the work to Vikram, Parsibhai, etc.

I understand about Kevalram. Tell him whatever you feel like. He has faults no doubt but I believe he is a good man. He cannot but be influenced by the generosity we show to him.

It is the best thing for Giriraj, Shankaran, etc., to do combined cooking. One possibility is that you take food with them, or, you all may have a combined kitchen. There is only one kitchen at present and it is better to maintain it in such a way that all the guests can eat there. Do not stretch the issue till it snaps but put up with it if you can. Try to find out what can be done and do what you feel is proper. One remembers the master’s advice only till one crosses the gate.

Blessings from

BAPU

[PS.]

19th is the prayer day for South Africa In consultation with Kakasaheb, do what ought to be done there on that day. For Khadi work in Panch Talavadi, send a hundi of Rs. 600/- to Balwantrai and debit it in the account of Ka[thiwad] Ra[jya] Pa[rishad]. That money is for buying cotton.

Ramachandra is going there. A new agreement has been signed with him according to the enclosed documents. The previous one has been cancelled because the new patent has to be obtained and there were other difficulties too. Now we do not have to take risk for a long time. Arrange to get the lift manufactured soon in the factory there. If you want to train some of the workers who are already there, do that. I want to give some work to Pragji. I feel that now you should engage Pragji for this work and get everything done through him. At present, he should be given a salary of Rs. 75/- per month. Take from him this and any other work you want him to do. If you approve of my suggestion, write to Pragji yourself. I would like it better if he stays alone for the time being. I enclose herewith a letter for him. That will help you. If you do not want any new suggestions from me, send the enclosed letter and call him there.

Blessings from

BAPU

[PPS.]

Take Pasubhai’s advice regarding the lift. He is capable of 1Vide also “Letter to Manilal Gandhi”, December 1926 suggesting modifications. He has told me that he has studied about lifts.

Account for the expenses on the lift as follows
Cost price + 25 + office expenses + expenses incurred on operation.
Amreli office will buy cotton worth Rs. 3.000/-. Accept hundi for that.
I wanted to read this again but could not.

BAPU

From the Gujarati original : S.N. 32912

151. FROM HIS HIMALAYAN HEIGHTS

A friend who has all his life lived in the plains of India and who is now combining work with recreation in the Himalayas, being lost in admiration over the snowy range, sends me the following quotation:

Lifted above the world in silence, terrible in their cold and their distance, yet beautiful beyond all words, what are the Himalayas like? Why, they are like a great monk, clothed in ashes, lost in meditation, silent and alone! They are like the great god himself, Siva Mahadeva.

and ends with Holmes’ ‘tribute to silence’:

Silence is the true language of cosmic adoration.

Young India, 16-12-1926

152. SOUTH AFRICAN SITUATION

Mr. Andrews cables as follows from Pretoria:

Prayer day endorsed by Dutch Church nineteenth. Hertzog receives delegates’ seventeenth. Then retires. First session twentieth.

The endorsement of the prayer day by the Dutch reformed Church is a great step towards securing an atmosphere favouring a just solution of the difficult question. The Dutch Church is a most conservative body in South Africa. It has rarely taken a broad view of the Indian or the general colour question as it is called in South Africa. The reception that is to take place on the seventeenth by General Hertzog of the delegates to the Conference is a step in recognition of

---

1 The members of the Indian deputation who were visiting South Africa to discuss with the Union Government problems of South African Indians the tremendous importance of the Conference and of the issues that are to be discussed by the Conference.

I hope that the Indian public will back wholeheartedly the noble effort of this single-minded Englishman. One may thoughtlessly say that it costs nothing to offer prayers and that the pressmen will announce that prayers were offered for the success of the mission at so many places. But in reality, it is a most difficult thing that Mr. Andrews has asked us to do. One can give of one’s possessions willingly or unwillingly or even for a show. One may give unwilling intellectual assent to a proposition. But there is no such thing as unwilling or showy heart co-operation. And what Mr. Andrews wants is heart co-operation, for, prayer is nothing else but an intense longing of the heart. You may express yourself through the lips; you may express yourself in the private closet or in public; but to be genuine, the expression must come from the deepest recesses of the heart. Let those who can, that is those who believe in the cause of the Indians of South Africa and who believe in God and therefore in prayer, set apart some time on the nineteenth instant for the heart co-operation with the Indian settlers of South Africa and invoke God’s blessings on the deliberations of the Conference.

If there is anybody in India who still does not know what the Indian cause in South Africa is, let him or her understand that the very existence of the Indians in South Africa is at stake. Specifically, the Asiatic Bill¹ that was suspended during the last session of the Union Parliament and which will be subject matter of discussion is a bill which is so designed as to make it impossible for any self-respecting Indian to remain in South Africa. Let those who do not know the legal position of Indians in South Africa realize that they have practically no political status whatsoever within the Union. They have no rights even of residence in Orangia except as domestic servants. In many parts they cannot become owners of landed property. Throughout South Africa, the trading rights have been considerably curtailed and the administration of the existing legislation regarding trading rights is becoming more and more severe against Indian traders, even against those who are holders of trading licenses of long standing. I say nothing about the social barriers that have been erected against them and consequent difficulties about freedom of travelling etc. They have hardly any facility for the education of their children worth the name. The position, therefore, it will be seen, is precarious enough as it is.

¹ The Class Areas Bill
The Asiatic Bill if it is passed will put the finishing touch. The Conference has been brought about after tremendous difficulties to ease the situation and to secure the barest justice for the Indian settler. And it is on this effort that C. F. Andrews seeks to invoke the blessing of God on the nineteenth instant. Let those who believe, in all humility, tender their heart co-operation.

_Young India_, 16-12-1926

153. NOTES

“PROSPEROUS” INDIA

Mr. A. M. Samuel, Minister for Overseas Trade, is reported to have thus spoken to the Lincoln Chamber of Commerce:

India is our best customer. She buys about £ 90,000,000 worth of goods from us a year, mostly manufactured goods of high finish containing a large amount of British labour. Any increase of trade with India, therefore, would be welcome because by increasing the employment of labour we would be carrying out the main policy of the present Government, namely, the reduction of unemployment figures.

India bought from us immense quantities of iron and steel goods and railway material. She was prosperous and had large sums with which to purchase imported goods. She only awaited a level of prices which would suit her views. The credit of India stood very high, second only to the credit of Great Britain herself. Many firms in the Lincoln district already possessed properly equipped sales and technical organizations in India, but the Government representatives in India asked firms to provide efficient and technical representation upon the spot. The sale of highly complex machinery and plant called for an increased backing up by technical advisers. The salesman needed a technical adviser at his right hand always to assist him in obtaining contracts. It was necessary that the British technical representatives should be in touch with the buying engineers in India to explain the details of the machines offered or sold. We still supplied 80 per cent of the machinery imported into India, and most of the British firms had their own technical agents in India, but he still came across reports of Indian purchasing authorities complaining that they did not get the services from the British expert staffs that they desired. They also complained that we did not maintain an adequate supply in India of stocks and spare parts.

As regards the Indian market for agricultural machinery, he knew that British firms had gone to great trouble and expense to develop this market without any considerable success. The Indian Government, however, was striving to assist the Indian cultivator, and one of the best methods to do so was to put better agricultural implements into his hands. Agricultural and co-operative credit departments were being set up in India to show the people how to use and repair modern implements and to assist them to purchase them.

There is no doubt that Mr. Samuel honestly believes that we are prosperous, and that it would add to our prosperity to buy all the machinery that England can manufacture, whether agricultural or otherwise, as also technical skill. How far from truth both these statements appear to us to be. We know that India is not prosperous; that it is daily growing poorer, and some of us know also that the problem of poverty will never be solved by an indiscriminate importation of machinery and technical skill from England, or any other foreign land. As Gokhale put it years ago, this kind of importation stunts our growth. We become more and more hewers of wood and drawers of water. What we need to do is to add to our capacity for labour with our hands and feet the necessary technical skill, so that we may devise our own machinery suitable to our requirements. A slavish imitation of the West can but kill all initiative or skill and therefore the capacity for living with anything like decent comfort. It is such speeches like Mr. Samuel’s which arouse suspicions about the object of Commissions like the Royal Agricultural Commission, as was recently adverted to in these pages.

Young India, 16-12-1926

154. KHADI PRATISHTHAN

Last week I published a comprehensive summary of the report upon the progress of khadi in the Punjab. I now give below a similar report from the Khadi Pratishthan omitting the balance-sheet, because the items that the reader would be interested in are included in the body of the report. Khadi workers will carefully study the reports I am publishing so that they can compare the methods of work adopted in different provinces. The reader will note that magic lantern lectures for popularizing khadi are a special feature introduced by the Khadi Pratishthan and are being now taken up in other parts of India. The technical department is also a strong feature of the Pratishthan. After considerable difficulty, the Pratishthan has secured its own premises, where extensive experiments are being carried on in dyeing and bleaching all of which makes khadi more attractive.

Young India, 16-12-1926

1 Vide “Khaddar in the Punjab”, 9-12-1926.
155. LETTER TO SHIVABHAI PATEL

WARDHA,
Thursday, December 16, 1926

BHAI SHIVABHAI,

I have your letter.

There is no reason for you to worry. Strictly speaking, I do not regard a violation of the vow to have occurred, but our responsibility for that is slight. You did not consciously desire that the thing should happen, and, therefore, no elaborate atonement is necessary. Whenever you have an involuntary discharge in dreams, you should take light food or even forgo a meal the next day. Or, when you become conscious that it has occurred, you should get up and take a hip-bath. If this is not possible, you should clean the wet part, and repeat Rama-nama. This cleaning will be enough atonement. What you should do depends on the state of your mind at the moment. After cleaning yourself in this manner, you should not make yourself unhappy about the occurrence or brood over it. If you have slipped either in regard to eating, reading, thinking or selecting your company, see that you do not commit a similar error in future. Only a person who is completely free from desire can escape involuntary ejaculation, and that too with ceaseless effort.

You should give up your evening meals and casual snacks. Nothing should be taken just to gratify the palate. You should be content with whatever pleasure you get from the food that you must take.

Blessings from

BAPU

[PS.]

There is no news about your brother yet.
I have not gone through the letter after writing it.

From a photostat of the Gujarati: S.N. 9491
156. LETTER TO HARDAYAL NAG

[December 17, 1926]

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter\(^1\) which I was delighted to receive. I do not know what I shall be doing at Gauhati. I shall act as the Spirit leads me.

Charkha is surely not dying in Bengal. It may be in Chandpur. The output of khaddar in Bengal is steadily increasing and so are the sales.

If you are not keeping very good health, I certainly do not think it is worth while troubling [you] to come to Gauhati. Whatever I do there will undoubtedly be known to the public. But I have advised all non-co-operators not to trouble about coming to Gauhati with the expectation of any fireworks display or even the expectation of any non-co-operation programme being discussed, apart from khaddar.

Forward, 24-12-1926

157. LETTER TO S. HIGGINBOTTOM

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
December 17, 1926

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. It is evident that thoughts produce effects, perhaps, more powerful than the spoken word; for, if you have thought so much of me, for which many thanks, I have thought none the less of you and I have spoken to so many about you and your acts.

I do not think there is any chance of my passing through Allahabad in the near future and I have in front of me a prolonged tour. But I am likely to be at the Ashram at the end of February when, if you could come over and pass a day or two, we could have a quiet time together and you could see the Ashram activities and also give us

\(^1\) As in the source
\(^2\) The correspondent had asked for Gandhiji’s programme at the Gauhati Congress.
the benefit of your valuable advice in the agricultural work we are doing.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

SAM HIGGINBOTTOM, ESQ.
ALLAHABAD AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE
ALLAHABAD

From a photostat: G.N. 8935

158. MESSAGE TO PUBLIC MEETING, WARDHA

December 19, 1926

I am glad you are having a prayer meeting in response to the appeal of that good soul Andrews. The problem in South Africa is the problem of the removal of untouchability. The work of the conference now being held in South Africa will have a far-reaching effect not only on Indians but on all Asiatics, Negroes and others. Let us pray to God that He may inspire the members of the conference with wisdom and that justice may be done.

The Bombay Chronicle, 22-12-1926

159. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

December 19, 1926

CHI. MIRA,

I have been having your delightful letters. I dare not attempt a long letter just now. When I write to Rolland, it shall go through you. But do you think it is necessary to write? I am glad you have come in touch with Mrs. Gadodia. You must take long walks.

With love,

Yours,

BAPU

From the original: C.W. 5192. Courtesy: Mirabehn

1 Gangadharrao Deshpande presided at the meeting. The message was read out by Mahadev Desai.
160. LETTER TO RAJKISHORI MEHROTRA

WARDHA,

Monday [On or before December 20, 1926]¹

CHI. RAJKISHORI,

I had been intending to talk to you in detail but could not get the time. Parasram tells me your mind is not at peace in the Ashram. Parasram does not intend to keep you there under compulsion. If you wish to stay somewhere else you may do so. You should not force Parasram to leave the Ashram. He is bound to provide you a maintenance but not to stay with you if you do not like to stay where he does. The wife follows the husband but the husband cannot follow the wife because he is often obliged to go to various places for earning a livelihood or for self-improvement.

I hope you and the boys are in good health. Write to me what you feel without any hesitation.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Hindi original: C.W.4953. Courtesy: Parashu Ram Mehrotra

161. LETTER TO PARASHU RAM MEHROTRA²

Silence Day [On or before December 20, 1926]¹

“Adhere to work entrusted. Sending instructions.”

You must have got the above telegram. Remain absorbed in your work. Keep sending money to your parents as you used to. Do the Young India work and that of Hindi teaching. More when I come. Stop worrying.

Blessings from

BAPU

[PS.]

Neither you, nor Rajkishori, nor the children should fall ill.

Mind.

I leave Wardha on the 21st.

From the Hindi original: C.W. 4957. Courtesy: Parashu Ram Mehrotra

¹ The date is based on the recollection of Parashu Ram Mehrotra.
² The first sheet of the letter is not available.
³ Ibid
162. LETTER TO ASHRAM WOMEN

"Silence Day, Magsar Sud 1, [19]83 [December 20, 1926]

DEAR SISTERS,

I got Chi. Radha’s letters written on behalf of all of you. It is good that you have chosen Gangabehn as your leader. But may I draw your attention to the necessity of your helping her to discharge her duties well, now that you have made her your leader? By appointing an illiterate sister of yours as your leader, you have given due importance to character and sacrifice. This is as it should be. Knowledge is useless without character. Have no doubt whatever about this.

A leader means the most important servant. A king acquires the right to issue orders only when he has risen above all others in his ability to serve. His orders would then be, not for serving his self-interest, but for the good of the community. These days irreligion parades as religion. Kings, therefore, run after pleasures instead of living as men of self-sacrifice, and exercise authority only to that end. But you have appointed Gangabehn as your leader with a religious aim. This means that you have decided Gangabehn to be the chief servant among you all who are trying to become servants.

Please remember that all of you are tied to Mother India with a cord of hand-spun yarn. If you give up spinning, you give up service too. Do not, therefore, neglect the spinning-wheel. Today Rama dwells in the spinning-wheel. The fire of starvation is raging all around. I do not see any other help against it except through the spinning-wheel. God always reveals Himself to us in some concrete shape. That is why we sing of Draupadi that for her God took the form of garments. Anyone who desires to see God today may see Him in the form of the spinning-wheel.

I have exceeded my limits. I did not wish to write more than two sheets. I cannot cope with my work if I become too greedy to write to you.

I send to Chi. Maganlal all the letters of Mirabehn. I want all you sisters to listen to them carefully, try to understand them and reflect over them. In my view she is at present the ideal woman worker among us.

1 Daughter of Maganlal Gandhi
By asking me to write to you on good paper with a margin, Radha has laid on me a fairly heavy burden. I shall bear it as far as I can.

I say nothing regarding my health, since it is very good. Jamnalalji and Janakibehn are sheltering me and giving me plenty of quiet. It seems I have gained four pounds. I am able to eat well. At every meal I eat a little of what Ba prepares for me. I have still some of it left.

I shall leave this place tomorrow. Mithubehn¹, Jamnabehn and Perinbehn² are coming here from Bombay for khadi work. I shall meet them at Gondia.¹ You should find out from the map where Gondia is.

Dakshabehn and the German lady left yesterday, the former for Bardoli and the latter for Banaras.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G. N. 3630

163. LETTER TO MAGANLAL GANDHI

[December 20, 1926]⁴

CHI. MAGANLAL,

I had been wanting to write to you for a long time but could make it only today.

I had asked Mahadev to write to you about Rukhi. I suppose he has done that. I have asked Valji, too, to write to you. The doctor is of the opinion that after she gets some strength, her appendix should be removed. This time she might recover completely. But as long as her appendix is not removed, she will have to be very careful about her diet and, till then, she will not put on weight and will remain weak. Show her to Haribhai and if he suggests, have her operated. There is no risk and from Govindbhai’s case, we know that Haribhai is a very careful person. I have explained everything in detail to Keshu. For the

¹ Mithubehn Petit
² Perinbehn Captain
³ Gandhiji visited Gondia, now in Madhya Pradesh, on December 22, 1926.
⁴ From the reference to Gandhiji’s departure for Amravati +tomorrow+ and arrival in Calcutta on a Thursday; he left for Amravati on 21st December 1926 and reached Calcutta on 23rd, a Thursday, leaving for Assam the same day. Vide also “Letter to Ashram Woman”, 20-12-1926.
time being, Rukhi should live on milk and fruit. If she is constipated, she should be given enema to keep her bowels clean. She should not move about. Nothing to worry if she sits. If Haribhai suggests that she should be immediately admitted to the hospital, then do so. I will take Rukhi with me in the same train by which I am going to Amaravati tomorrow. At two stations, she will have to change trains but I have made arrangement for that. Rukhi will reach there on Wednesday night. Do give her enema at night if she does not pass stool the whole day and has not taken enema at Surat or if she feels even slightly heavy in the stomach. Otherwise let her go to bed. Add water to her milk before heating it. Send me a telegram of her arrival there. I will reach Calcutta on Thursday and on the same day at 3 O’clock, will catch the Assam Mail. So I can get the telegram only if you send it early on Thursday. I have asked Keshu to take my address with him.

I send herewith a postcard from Vajubhai. He wants cotton. My feeling is he works in the villages of Bhavanagar State on behalf of Pattani Saheb. And if that is so, why does he not take cotton from the state. Even then, I have written to Balwantrai to have a talk with you. If you think it proper, get him some cotton and lay down whatever conditions you want to. Cotton could be given only as a loan and in return we should either get khadi or money.

Write to me if we have an unduly large stock of khadi there and you are not able to sell it off. If you can dispose it off by converting it into useful things, do that. We should have the capacity to stock khadi.

I hope you have sent the copies of the Agreement with Ganga-behn to Deshpande.

Parnerkar had come here to see me. He has impressed Jamnalalji, Vaijnath and me. He will reach there by the 7th. He is to be given Rs. 125/- per month and a place to stay. Debit his salary in the account of All-India Cow Protection Society. If you feel that something should be debited for the house rent do that also. I want the entire dairy account to come under the All-India Cow Protection Society. Put into practice those suggestions of Parnerkar which are acceptable to you. The tannery (charmalaya) will also be brought under All-India Cow Protection Society.

This will no doubt take a lot of your time. You will be able to cope with the work if you do only planning and supervision. It is necessary to have someone trained by Ganesh. For the dairy, Shiva-bhai Haribhai is there.

I have already written to you about Ramachandran.
Let me know immediately if you find the work heavy or feel uneasy about it. Do not hide your feelings in order to save me from worry.

Inform me immediately if you feel I am making a mistake. If I am not convinced, put up with me. But do not hide your feelings in the belief that I am not going to correct myself.

I am intentionally setting up cow-protection and other industries there. I think it is not beyond our capacity. We must make it a success.

Blessings from

BAPU

[PS.]

I am sending herewith other letters from Mirabehn. I want the girls to read them carefully. Of course, others should also read them.

I will not have the time to read this letter again.

From the Gujarati original: S.N. 32940

164. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

WARDHA, Silence Day [December 20, 1926]

CHI. MATHURADAS.

I am enclosing herewith the letter from Pattaniji. His goodness is beyond measure. You write a letter to him direct. I still feel that we should send him whatever money we can in such a way that his feelings are not hurt. He may well use the amount for any charitable purpose he wants. If you feel that your financial situation is such that you must save every pie you can, then you need not send anything. And if you cannot leave Panchgani you should not hesitate to stay on there. Write to Pattaniji and send the letter to me. I shall post it to him after perusal.

Pyarelal must have reached there in time. Devdas had written that you could not be left without someone to help you.

Blessings from

BAPU

[PS.]

Till the 28th, write to me only at the Gauhati address.

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

1 The addressee received this on December 22. The silence day, i.e., the Monday, prior to this date, fell on December 20.
165. LETTER TO G. D. BIRLA

Monday [December 20, 1926]

BHAI GHANSHYAMDASJI,

Received your two letters. I am returning Bhai Shriprakash’s original letter.

I was glad to read the plain story of your department. Elections have polluted our atmosphere. I have seen enough of this. After all the trouble taken, the country is not going to gain but lose. But I cannot advise you to leave the Assembly. The idea of being neutral is that not even a vote should be cast under pressure from anyone, as usually happens.

The assurance you gave me was needless because I have faith in your earnest efforts. Even then your assurance is gratifying.

I shall arrive in Calcutta on the 23rd and leave for Gauhati the same day. I shall stay at Bhai Khandelwal’s. When I was in Calcutta he used to call often. I had told him that, when I went to Calcutta again and if it was not for political reasons, I would stay with him, and he insists on it now. And so I shall have to stay at his place. You aren’t going to Gauhati, are you?

Yours,

MOHANDAS

From the Hindi original: C.W. 6141. Courtesy: G. D. Birla

166. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, WARDHA

[December 20, 1926]

. . . I do not know what else I am expected to do. During the year of silence, I have given my most earnest thought to it and have come to the conclusion that we can have swaraj, even Ramrajya, if we fulfil the triple programme—a programme in which men and women,

---

1 The reference in the letter to Gandhiji’s arrival on 23rd in Calcutta en route to Gauhati suggests that the letter was written on the preceding Monday, which fell on this date.
2 Extracted from Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”. A Gujarati report of what appears to be the same speech was published in Navajivan, 26-12-1926.
3 As given by Mahadev Desai young and old, Hindus, Mussalmans, Christians, Government servants and all can alike take part. I am, if possible, more convinced than ever that swaraj is impossible to be attained if there is no Hindu-Muslim unity, if we still suffer from the curse of untouchability and if our middle classes refuse to understand the gospel of swadeshi. Don’t think that I am sticking on to this programme out of obstinacy or perversity. There is nothing on earth that I would not give for the sake of the country excepting, of course, two things and two only, viz., Truth and Non-violence. I would not sacrifice these two for all the world. For, to me Truth is God and there is no way to find truth except the way of Non-violence. And I do not seek to serve India at the sacrifice of Truth or God. For I know that a man who forsakes Truth can forsake his country, and his nearest and dearest ones. . . . Now is the time to act. For how long is a man to go on talking? He may do so once, twice, aye, a hundred times, but action or example is his last resort. . . . Even if the whole of India ranged on one side were to declare that Hindu-Muslim unity is impossible, I will declare that it is perfectly possible, I will say that, if there is anything like God or Truth on earth, Hindu-Muslim unity is also possible. Even if masses of people were to burn khadi publicly and say that it is an insane programme, I will declare that those people have gone mad. In the same way, even if all the Hindus of India were to be ranged against me in declaring that untouchability, as we know it today, has the sanction of the Shastras or the smritis, I will then declare that these Shastras and these smritis are false. Everywhere shall I go forth thus uttering the three articles of my creed—my kalma and my gayatri,—so that I may be true to myself and my Maker.

Young India, 30-12-1926

167. LETTER TO RAMESHWARDAS PODDAR

ON THE TRAIN,
Tuesday [December 21, 1926]

BHAIRAMESHWARIJ,

I got your letter as well as Rs. 50. You have done nothing wrong by not coming to Wardha. Even if you have done something wrong,

1 The postmark bears the date 22-12-1926, which was a Wednesday.
you have made up for it by sending the money. I am passing the money to Amritlalji. Repeat Ramanama.

Yours,
MOHANDAS

From a photostat of the Hindi: G. N. 187

168. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

GONDIA,
[December 21, 1926]¹

CHI. MANI,

I am aware of your affection for me. But surely you do not expect to stay with me all your life. But you can live with my work.
That means that you should prepare yourself for it. Do not waste a single minute there. Write to me regularly. I too shall write as often as I can.

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Pateline, p. 39

169. SPEECH AT OPENING OF GYMNASIUM, AMRAOTI

[December 21, 1926]²

You know that I am a man conscious of my limitations and it is not in my nature to have more things than I can attend to. But I could not resist Dr. Patwardhan’s request. I was glad to be told that this gymnasium was open to Hindus and Mussalmans alike, and that not only Mussalmans but untouchable youths are members of it. I rejoice to see that the institution is thus free from communalism.

Our Shastras say that a boy who would keep his body fit and strong and make the best use of it should observe brahmacharya. I have travelled all over the country and one of the most deplorable things I have noticed is the rickety bodies of young men. So long as ¹ The source has “1926”. Gandhiji was in Gondia for a few hours on December 21.

² Extracted from Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”.
³ Mahadev Desai says: “The year’s silence was broken on the evening of the 20th at the same place [Wardha], and active touring began yesterday. Amraoti, Nagpur and Gondia being the places visited. . .” Gandhiji was at Nagpur on December 21. It is likely that he visited Amraoti earlier on the same day.
we labour under the curse of child-marriage, and so long as many members of our society are children of such marriages, so long much bodily exercise is an impossibility. Who will recommend physical exercise to consumptives? We should therefore lay the axe at the root of this curse, if we would see our young men and women strong and healthy and India on the path of vigorous and healthy growth. Manu has laid down that a student should observe brahmacharya up to his 25th year at least. All physical exercise will be futile so long as these conditions are not satisfied.

But there is another thing to which I should like to draw your attention. You know that I am pledged to have nothing to do with things even remotely connected with violence. Whatever others may say, I am convinced that the way of non-violence is the only way and the highest and permanent religion for me. How is it then, someone might ask, that an avowed votary of non-violence like me has at all associated himself with an institution like this? The reason is clear.
Ahimsa or non-violence means the renunciation of the capacity to use violence. He who has not that capacity is therefore incapable of exercising non-violence. Non-violence is a mighty spiritual force but its votary should have the power to use physical force and should consciously and deliberately refuse to exercise that force. Not that physical training is a sine qua non for acquiring capacity for violence, but we may not encourage our youths to have feeble physiques in order to be capable of ahimsa. You cannot make a man non-violent by depriving him of arms. One of the many crimes of the British rule in India is that we have been forcibly deprived of our arms—not indeed with a view to making us non-violent even if such a thing was possible but to emasculating us. I want India to be strong and free to exercise its strength and yet to renounce it.

Thus I like institutions like these for physical training. But let me utter a word of warning. No institution that has as its object the subjection of a community, whether Hindu, Mussalman, Parsi, or Christian, can have my blessings. Only that institution can have my blessings which aims as the growth of the physical culture of all communities, of all the youths of the nation, to whatever creed or community they belong. I should not have come here, did I not know that the gymnasium I have opened belonged to the latter type, and whilst once more congratulating you I wish and pray that you may all be true and pure, and your lives may be consecrated to the service of our nation and of our religions.

Young India, 30-12-1926

170. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, NAGPUR

December 21, 1926

Mahatmaji exhorted the people to help the Tilak Vidyalaya with money. He reiterated his faith in khaddar and said that, if the people were willing to follow his advice, they could get swaraj in a few years. Mahatmaji was pained to see people wearing foreign cloth and said that he was tired of hearing Mahatma Gandhik Jai. What he wanted was real work. From this morning he had assumed active work and would travel through the length and breadth of India to preach his message of the charkha.

Forward, 22-12-1926

171. THE MESSAGE OF GANGA AND JUMNA

A friend thus writes:

We have more Gangas and Jumnas than the two. It is true they bear other names. They are, however, watering our vast plains from the North to the South and the East to the West. The message that the Ganga and the Jumna gave to this friend is not the only message that the mighty rivers of India are giving to her inhabitants. They remind us of the sacrifice we must make for the sake of the land we are living in. They remind us of the process of purification that we must continuously go through as the rivers themselves are going through from moment to moment. I wrote nearly 10 years ago that the gayatri, the common prayer of Hinduism, was one of the precious gifts of the Ganga. Her shining waters must have given the rishis of old the inspiration. In the modern rush, the chief use we have for our rivers is to empty our gutters in them and to navigate our cargo vessels, and in the process make them dirtier still. We have no time, as the friend had, to stroll down to these rivers, and in silent meditation listen to the message they murmur to us.

Young India, 23-12-1926

---

1 The meeting was held at Chitnis Park on the seventh anniversary of the Tilak Vidyalaya.

2 The letter is not reproduced here. The correspondent had described the feelings of ecstasy that the river Jumna had inspired in him.
172. NOTES

A. I. S. A. RESOLUTIONS

The following resolutions were passed by the Council of the All-India Spinners’ Association at its meeting held at Wardha from 13th to 16th December 1926.

I. Resolved that all sale depots conducted directly by the All-India Spinners’ Association or through provincial departments be instructed strictly to avoid all sales on credit whether they be retail sales or wholesale transactions with other depots.

II. Resolved that cash securities be insisted on from hawkers covering the amount of stock taken by them for sales. In special cases, however, where desirable hawkers are unable to furnish such security, personal sureties may be taken from them. In all cases hawkers should be strictly warned that they should make no credit sales on any account and periodical settlements of accounts should be made. If at any time a hawker is unable to pay up the cash for the stock sold or the balance of stock does not tally, the hawker should be at once discharged and steps should be taken against him for recovery of the monies due.

III. Whereas it is not desirable that the sale depots should be run in places where the public does not give adequate support enabling them to be conducted without loss, all provincial departments are instructed to close down depots where, after two years’ experience, it is found that the charges incurred exceed 6\(\frac{1}{4}\)\% of the total sales effected per year, and to open new depots only where they expect this standard to be reached at least in the course of a year.

IV. Whereas it is necessary, at present, to concentrate our efforts on such centres, where, by reason of greater unemployment or special adaptability to the industry of hand-spinning and hand-weaving, there are greater facilities for the production of khadi, it is resolved that, in proposing schemes of work, provincial agents and secretaries should not undertake to open or maintain centres of production which can be run only at a loss. But where it is considered desirable in the interests of the movement that any centres should be run or maintained at a loss, it should be borne in mind that no more than 10\% of the total capital invested for production in the province should be invested in such pioneer effort.
KENYA INDIANS

In another column is published a letter from Mr. D. B. Desai, a settler of Kenya, referring to an increase in the poll tax which Indians of Kenya have been made to pay for the past twelve years and more. The letter is remarkable for the wealth of details it contains. If the facts set forth in it are true, it is a serious reflection upon the Europeans of Kenya and the Kenya Government. The reader will recollect that the Indians of Kenya did not submit to the poll tax without protest. Of course the protest was useless. But one would have thought that there would be no further addition to the iniquitous tax. If, however, my correspondent is right, by a currency trick the tax was raised by 50 per cent., i.e., it went up from 20 shillings to 30 and now the amending legislation raises it to 50 shillings. The reasons given for the rise would seem to be utterly absurd. The reader must read the letter to know how the tax is to be utilized. The Kenya Indians have certainly every reason for hoping that the public and the Government will come to their assistance and demand a veto of this discriminating and unjust legislation.

Young India, 23-12-1926

173. KHADI SERVICE

The Council of the All-India Spinners’ Association, after most careful and exhaustive discussion and after considering all the opinions that had been received upon the draft published some time ago in these pages, has recast the rules which the reader will find published elsewhere. Forms of application and contract of service are also published. This service provides those who want to serve the cause of khadi an opportunity of so doing and, at the same time, a modest remuneration for themselves.

The Board of Studies will also be the Examination Board. It does not mean necessarily that all the Examiners will examine all the candidates. But the various examinations required under the rules will be conducted by one or more of the examiners selected by the Chairman of the Board.

Suggestions were received that the course which extends to 3 years is altogether too long for the remuneration promised. But all the members came to the conclusion that 3 years were none too long for the subjects to be studied and the practical work to be done. Experience gained during the last five years has shown that continued practice is necessary to learn the various arts that are included in the course. Those who have gone out to organize khadi work in the different villages with less experience and knowledge have found themselves handicapped. The science of hand-spinning is capable of progressive improvement. Researches that are being made from time to time show that there is room for the best among us to apply themselves to the development of the art so that without extra effort or time the income of the millions, for whom hand-spinning is designed, may be almost doubled.

1 For the text of the letter, vide Appendix “Kenya Indians: D.B. Desai’s Letter”, 12-12-1926

It is an unfortunate fact that in our schools and colleges handicrafts find no place. All the knowledge, therefore, gained in the schools and colleges is of little use for the training required for khadi service. Therefore a graduate has to start almost on equal terms with a raw youth. Indeed, it is possible for the former even to labour under a handicap, if he has developed, as many do develop, a repugnance towards physical exertion.

The second question that came up for anxious consideration was that of remuneration. The Khadi Service is designed for meeting the need of paupers. It is impossible to hold out bright pecuniary prospects in such a service. I have no doubt whatsoever that the scale of salaries devised by the Government is out of all proportion to the condition of India’s masses. It has relation to the requirements of the inhabitants of a rich island and therefore means an almost unbearable burden upon the poor millions. Let no one, therefore, compare the remuneration offered under the Khadi Service with that obtainable under the Government service. At the same time, I make bold to say that the start offered is as good as that offered by the Government. Where the Khadi Service fails in comparison is in the ultimate prospect. The maximum attainable under the Government may reach four figures whereas Khadi Service offers an increase amounting to Rs. 20 at the most. For those, therefore, who have received an English education to enter this service is undoubtedly a sacrifice. But is it too much to ask the English-educated youths of the country to make what after all is a very small sacrifice? I consider it to be very small, for it should be remembered that they have received their English education at the expense of the masses. It is an exclusive education which the masses can never get. And it is an education which, if it has given us a few self-sacrificing patriots, has also produced many more men who have been willing accomplices with the Government in holding India in bondage.

It will also be noted that to the poor and deserving, the service offers a suitable scholarship and at the end of the training, while the rules bind the Association to keep those who may be found properly qualified employed for 10 years, they leave it open for them to serve the Association or to seek prospects elsewhere. This relaxation has been purposely made in order to induce young men to come and learn the art of spinning and all it means even though they may not join the Service.

Young India, 23-12-1926

174. HAND-WEAVING AMONG PARSIS

A correspondent extracts for me the following passage from the Gazetteer of the Bombay Presidency, Volume VII, Page 155, edition 1883:

The Parsi weavers of Gandevi were of special note, and in 1787-88 Dr. Hove, a European traveller, visited that town for the express purpose of learning from the Parsis some knowledge of their art. The industry has died out for above fifty years. The Parsi women of the priestly class still, however, make a large number of sacred threads kusti or kasti, worn by Parsi men and women. These find a large sale in Bombay and cost Rs. 3 or more according to the labour displayed. Some of the Parsi women also make tape for cots and rough dhoti and khadi to order for local traders, but the Parsis as a rule have quite abandoned the weaving in which they excelled.

What a great boon to India and to themselves it would be if the Parsis who are conducting liquor shops were to exchange the immoral liquor traffic for the uplifting and productive occupation of weaving in which they excelled only 50 years ago! The reference to the hand-spun kasti reminds me of the stalwart Parsi sister whom I met in Navsari and who told me that the Parsi ladies of Navsari who made their livelihood out of kasti-spinning and whose sacred fingers gave the religious touch to the kasti were hounded out by those who had gone there under the guise of reformers to substitute the hand-spun thread with the machine-spun.

Young India, 23-12-1926

175. ALL-INDIA SPINNERS’ ASSOCIATION

The annual report of the All-India Spinners’ Association has been just published. It is brief enough for any busy man to go through. A spinners' association means an association not of but for the poorest. It cannot be of the poorest, for they have no knowledge of what an association is and have not even labour to save which they can give to their association. It follows therefore that if there must be an association for them, others who live on their labour make some small return to the poorest of their brothers and sisters. Of such then is this Association made. They are all too few for the purpose. I wish there were more. But whether they are few or many, their work is substantial. It has on its record 110 carders, 42,959 spinners and 3,407 weavers among whom were distributed over 9 lakhs of rupees at the lowest computation. This distributing work was done at 150 production centres catering to the needs of roughly 1,500 villages. I have mentioned these salient facts merely to whet the reader’s appetite. There is not an idle word in the report. It is simply a fairly well arranged catalogue of facts and figures. The reader, if he cares to look at it, will find therein the quantity of khadi produced and sold during the year. He will find too how many young men are earning their living in this growing organization, and how many other ancillary activities are undertaken by it. The report can be had by writing to the All-India Spinners’ Association office, Ahmedabad, and sending 4 annas stamps.

Young India, 23-12-1926

176. INTERVIEW TO THE PRESS

CALCUTTA,

December 24, 1926

Before he left for Gauhati, Mahatma Gandhi, interviewed on the question of a new programme, said it was too early to talk because the programme had to be settled by the Congress. He said:

Everyone may have his own views, but it is difficult to say what the Congress will accept. So far as I am aware, the people are going with an open mind and a sincere desire to arrive at some workable programme which can be accepted by different groups, but it is too risky to prophesy anything about what the programme is going to be, even roughly.

On the working of the Reforms, Mahatmaji remarked:

So far as I can say, there will be certainly strongest disinclination to work the Reforms until, naturally, the sore point that Bengal feels, namely, indefinite detention of political prisoners, is honourably and satisfactorily settled.

_The Bombay Chronicle, 25-12-1926_

177. TELEGRAM TO LAJPAT RAI

_December 24, 1926_

RECEIVED STUNNING NEWS. YOU SHOULD GO DELHI PREVENT EXCITEMENT OR RESENTMENT. WIRE PARTICULARS.

_The Leader, 28-12-1926_

178. TELEGRAM TO INDRA VIDYAVACHASPATI

[December 24, 1926]

HAVE RECEIVED STUNNING WIRE. FATHER DIED LIKE A HERO.

[From Hindi]

_Hindi Navajivan, 6-1-1927_

179. SPEECH AT A.I.C.C. MEETING, GAUHATI

[December 24, 1926]

A press reporter had come to me and asked me to say something. I told him I could not. I felt too overwhelmed to be able to say anything. Mrs. Naidu also pleaded with me for a message. I again refused. Since I have been, this time, ordered to speak, I shall try to express what I feel. But I am in no condition really to say anything. I can, however, tell you how the news affected me. As soon as I received Lalaji’s wire I conveyed the news to Malaviyaji and others and sent telegrams to Lalaji and Swamiji’s son Indra. In that telegram, rather

---

1 The news of Swami Shraddhanand’s assassination was received by Lajpat Rai at Calcutta on December 23, and the next day he conveyed it to Gandhi, who was on his way to Gauhati to attend the A.I.C.C. meeting. The telegram reached him at Sorbhog, a wayside station. Gandhi sent this telegram to Lajpat Rai who, along with M. R. Jayakar, left Calcutta for Delhi the same night.

2 Mahadev Desai, in his “Gauhati Letter”, says that Gandhi sent this telegram on hearing of the assassination of Swami Shraddhanand.

3 The text of the speech has been extracted from Mahadev Desai’s “Gauhati Letter”.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
than express sorrow or grief, I said that this was no ordinary death, that I should not weep over it. Unbearable as it is, my heart refuses to grieve; it rather prays that all of us may be granted such a death.

From Swami Shraddhanand’s point of view what has happened may be called a blessed event. He had been ill. I had not been aware of it but a friend told me that it would be a miracle if Swamiji survived. Later, in reply to a telegram of mine his son wired that he was slowly improving. I was assured that Dr. Ansari was looking after him with solicitude. Thus he was in bed gravely ill and in bed he was murdered. All men, of course, must die but of what worth is their dying? In India and wherever there are Hindus and Mussalmans, the death of Swamiji before his time will produce an effect very different from what would have been produced if Swamiji had died a natural death. I have not sent brother Indra any telegram or letter expressing sympathy with him. There was nothing I could say to him except that the death his father had met was a blessed death.

But I have said all this from the point of view of Swamiji and from my own point of view. I have repeatedly said that I make no distinction between Hindus and Mussalmans. I am a Hindu by birth and I find peace in the Hindu religion. Whenever peace seemed to elude me, it was in the Hindu religion that I found it. I studied other religions also and I decided that, whatever its defects and drawbacks, Hinduism alone could be the religion for me. That is what I feel and that is why I call myself a sanatani Hindu. Many sanatanis feel exasperated by this claim of mine and say: How can this man who has come back from England with all these new-fangled ideas be a Hindu? But this does not weaken my claim to being a Hindu, and Hinduism tells me to abide in friendship with all. So I have to think of the viewpoint of Mussalmans also.

And when I look at this matter from the Mussalmans’ viewpoint, things are different. This deed was done through the hand of a Mussalman. Entering the house under the pretext of having a religious discussion with Swamiji he committed this monstrous act. The servant had told him that Swamiji was ill and could not see him. There was some argument at the door. When Swamiji heard it, he said: “Well, let him come.” And although Swamiji need not have talked with him, he did so. He had not the strength, in fact, to talk much. All he wanted was gently to persuade him to go away. So he called him and said: “My friend, you can talk with me to your heart’s content after I get well. But now I am bed-ridden.” At this the visitor asked for water to drink. Swamiji told Dharam Singh to get him some. As soon as the faithful servant turned his back, he took out a revolver. He fired two shots, not satisfied with one. Swamiji died then and there. Hearing the shots Dharam Singh ran to save his master, but it was too late! It was not God's will that Swamiji's body should be saved. Dharam Singh was also hit and is now in hospital. The killer, Abdul Rashid, is in police custody. It pains me to imagine the feeling that this will evoke among the Hindus. Without doubt this will create ill feeling for Mussalmans among the Hindus. Today there is no love between the two communities. There is no trust. Both do realize that at the end they have to live together like brothers, but meanwhile each, conscious of its weakness, wants to fight with the other, become strong and then unite. In these circumstances, and with the poison that is spread in the newspapers, it is difficult to say what this deed will lead to. That was why I wanted to keep silent. I cannot calm the storm that is raging within me, I cannot suppress it and I cannot express it before you.

We should learn a lesson from the fact that Swamiji died by the hand of Abdul Rashid. Let this make us try to understand each other. It would be wonderful if we realized that we cannot live together in perpetual conflict. But the atmosphere that prevails today holds out no hope that we shall escape with only one murder,

I shall say nothing at the moment of my personal relationship with Shraddhanandji. He opened out his heart to me. About six months ago when he visited the Ashram, he said to me: “I get many letters holding out threats to my life. But they do not worry me.” You see, he was a brave man. In all the world I know no one braver than Swamiji. He had no fear of death for he had faith in God. That is why he used to say: “Even if they take my life what would it matter?” There is nothing to be wondered at that he was killed. There would be nothing to be wondered at if there were more murders. Today it is a Mussalman who has murdered a Hindu. We should not be surprised if a Hindu killed a Mussalman. God forbid that this should happen but what else can one expect when we cannot control our tongue or our pen? I must, however, say that if any Hindu imitated this act he would only bring disgrace to Hinduism.

I have said that it would be better if, instead of ignorant people fighting among themselves, the leaders who harbour enmity towards each other were to do the fighting. But it should not be that an individual from among the ignorant folk takes the life of a leader.
Let us pray to God that we may understand the real meaning of this assassination. This is a testing time for Hindus and Mussalmans. Let the Hindus remain peaceful and refrain from seeking revenge for this murder. Let them not think that the two communities are now enemies of each other and that unity is no longer possible. If they do, they will be committing a crime and bringing disgrace upon their religions. And, in my opinion, if a Mussalman thinks than Abdul Rashid did well he will be disgracing his religion. For that is not his religion. His religion is something else. Now is the opportunity for the Mussalmans to show the real teachings of Islam. Shraddhanandji and the Hindus have, of course, got what they had to, but as a man and as a friend and brother of Mussalmans, I must tell them that it will do both our communities good if we would understand this in the right spirit. May God give us faith and wisdom to survive this test and to behave towards each other, after this deed, in such a way that God can say that the two communities did what they ought to have done.

[From Hindi]
Hindi Navajivan, 6-1-1927

180. SPEECH AT SWADESHI EXHIBITION, GAUHATTI

December 25, 1926

Mahatmaji said that his faith in the charkha was intense and was increasing day by day. He, therefore, welcomed all opportunities of doing propaganda for organizing the charkha movement. For swaraj he had laid down three conditions, of which he held the spread of spinning-wheel to be the foremost. Indeed, this was the one platform where crores could work together—juveniles, adults, men and women could all contribute their mite. And more than this, it was a platform which offered women the best scope for taking their due share in the national movement for swaraj. He was, indeed, sure that success in the charkha programme would itself go a great deal towards the fulfilment of the second condition, namely, Hindu-Muslim unity.

He was studying the currency problem with a view to forming his own opinion on the controversy that was going on in respect of the exchange ratio. But from what he had read, he felt that really towns lived on villages and middlemen were helping to bleed the peasants and the country and were sending out of the country crores of

1 The opening of the Swadeshi Exhibition by Gandhiji drew large crowds who lined the route and shouted “Mahatma Gandhiki Jai” as he entered the exhibition grounds. The attendance within the enclosure was large and on the dais, besides Gandhiji, were seated Malaviya and Sarojini Naidu. Other leaders present included Srinivasa Iyengar, Dr. Moonje, Motilal Nehru, Abul Kalam Azad, B. G. Horniman, V. J. Patel, Mohamed Ali, Swami Satyadev, Mrs. Aney and Lala Girdharilal.
rupees. He stated on the testimony of the Government Collectors’ reports that villages were being ruined and that at least one-tenth of the people of India did not have enough to eat. For one hundred years the town people had bled the villager white. Why then would not they give the villager some return by taking to khaddar and thereby encouraging a movement which was full of the greatest possibilities for the uplift of the country? The Congress was a great institution, but it had not reached the villagers to any appreciable extent.

The Spinners’ Association, organized under the Congress, had been given by the Congress complete swaraj and the Association had already secured touch with 1,500 villages and was providing work for 50,000 women and 4,000 weavers. Those who visited places of pilgrimage knew the state of beggary there. He held it a crime to give charity to the people capable of doing work if they were provided proper employment. The fifty thousand women who had been provided work by the Spinners’ Association were those who had had no employment and did not earn a penny. If their operations could be extended and if he could be backed by the knowledge that leaders like Pandit Motilal, Pandit Malaviya and Maulana Mohamed Ali were taking to the spinning-wheel, his message would be heard and the problem of beggary could as well be tackled. A vast field remained to be covered as there were something like seven lakhs of villages in India. The price of khaddar today was practically half of what it was in 1921 and certainly it was untrue to say that there was less of khaddar produced.

Forward, 27-12-1926

181. ALL-INDIA COW-PROTECTION ASSOCIATION

It is said that the work of this Association proceeds but sluggishly. Its Working Committee met in Wardha on the 17th of this month. A resolution was passed to start the work of the committee meeting after postponing it for half an hour, due to want of quorum; in the meantime Dr. Moonje arrived and then the meeting commenced its work with the requisite quorum. This sort of thing should not happen in any organization. But as we have little or no interest in the constructive programme, only a few people attend such meetings if there is no financial gain in doing so.

This Association has to secure cow-protection through institutions selling milk and hides; hard work, finance, talent, etc., are therefore necessary. Who would like to attend a meeting of such an Association?

And yet, the question of cow-protection is very important from the religious and economic points of view. Agriculture is not possible without the well-being of cattle and man cannot live without agriculture. Moreover, we cannot have milk without cattle and the life of the people becomes difficult without milk.
The well-being of cattle depends entirely on their intelligent rearing and such knowledge cannot be gained without effort. Hence the object of the All-India Cow-protection Association is to spread such knowledge through experiments and to remove the repugnance that people have towards the trade in hides and tanning.

Who should take interest in this? Every thinking man and woman should. Whether many take interest or a few, such associations should continue their work with determination and prove their faith in it.

Hence the Committee has passed four resolutions.

Since an expert in the art of dairy management is available, the President has been authorized to spend up to Rs. 50,000 in order to implement the experiment of a dairy.

A gentleman is available for running the leather workshop and hence expenditure up to another Rs. 50,000 has been sanctioned to run this experiment.

The Association does not yet have so much money. The Association would hardly have Rs. 10,000. As for the rest, it is uncertain. There is a hope that the remaining amount will be provided. Friends have offered to help. And I have the faith that money will be positively available if the work as well as the workers are good. Hence I have taken the above-mentioned authority from the Committee. Those interested in the welfare of the cow should render such help as they may wish to offer. Every pie is and will be accounted for. Account will be regularly published. Success or failure in the work depends on circumstances. It is hoped that at the end of the experiment both the activities can be shown to be self-supporting.

I wish to introduce the workers engaged in this work after I am well acquainted with this work. If these experiments succeed, they would I think, provide the key to cow-protection.

The other resolution are to make the Association self-sufficient in membership. The society is in need of workers and not officers. Hence there is a resolution to the effect that if a member of the Committee absents himself from three consecutive meetings, membership lapses automatically. This resolution is essential because only those who can give the benefit of their view while the Committee formulates resolutions deserve to continue as members. How can those who do not remain present give such benefit? The secretary will start correspondence with every member in this behalf.

The fourth resolution applies to the members. Those members who do not pay in their subscription for the following year will not remain members. This is just to give a reminder. The members and representatives of this Association should be responsible individuals. Really speaking, these two principles should be regarded as inevitable in all institutions that members must pay the subscription and that the representatives must be present at the meeting.

It is my hope that those who subscribe to the objectives of the Association will welcome all these four resolutions and help the Association as much as possible.

It may be said that the Committee had just to approve the arrangement regarding the secretary. Shri Valji Govindji Desai was appointed Secretary on a salary of Rs. 200 a month. Shri Valji Desai is a go-sevak\(^1\) and a learned man. He did not ask for Rs. 200 out of greed but because his family responsibilities were large. I could not find a more qualified Secretary than Shri Desai. According to the Constitution of the Association the responsibility for the choice rested with me. When Shri Valji Desai was appointed for this work, it was felt positively available if the works as well as the workers are good. Hence I have taken the above-mentioned authority from the Committee. Those interested in the welfare of the cow should render such help as they may wish to offer. Every pie is and will be accounted for. Accounts will be regularly published. Success or failure in the work depends on circumstances. It is hoped that at the end of the experiment both the activities can be shown to be self-supporting.

I wish to introduce the workers engaged in this work after I am well acquainted with this work. If these experiments succeed, they would, I think, provide the key to cow-protection.

The other resolutions are to make the Association self-sufficient in membership. The society is in need of workers and not officers. Hence there is a resolution to the effect that if a member of the Committee absents himself from three consecutive meetings, membership lapses automatically. This resolution it essential because only those who can give the benefit of their views while the Committee formulates resolutions deserve to continue as members. How can those who do not remain present give such benefit? The Secretary will start correspondence with every member in this behalf.

The fourth resolution applies to the members. Those members who do not pay in their subscription for the following year will not remain members. This is just to give a reminder. The members and representatives of this Association should be responsible individuals.

\(^{1}\) One who serves the cause of cow-protection
Really speaking, these, two principles should be regarded as inevitable in all institutions that members must pay the subscription and that the representatives must be present at the meeting.

It is my hope that those who subscribe to the objectives of the Association will welcome all these four resolutions and help the Association as much as possible.

It may be said that the Committee had just to approve the arrangement regarding the Secretary. Shri Valji Govindji Desai was appointed Secretary on a salary of Rs. 200 a month. Shri Valji Desai is a go-sevak\(^1\) and a learned man. He did not ask for Rs. 200 out of greed but because his family responsibilities were large. I could not find a more qualified Secretary than Shri Desai. According to the constitution of the Association the responsibility for the choice rested with me. When Shri Valji Desai was appointed for this work, it was felt that he would have to devote all his time to the work of cow-protection. Later it was found that he could spare some time. So we both decided that he should utilize that time in literary activities and earn some income out of it. Since he can get that type of work, he informed the Association that he would not receive from it more than Rs. 50 a month. He has been taking this amount since July last. The Association has accepted his decision with thanks. He has been granted permission to do during his spare time any outside work available to him. I must say that the work that Shri Valji Desai is doing in his spare time may not be regarded as done for the Association itself, but it is, to a large extent, definitely connected with the work of cow-protection. It does not appear necessary to pass on this information. It does not appear necessary to pass on this information to the readers of Navajivan.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan, 26-12-1926

182. SPEECH AT FLAG-HOISTING CEREMONY, GAUHATI \(^2\)

December 26, 1926

DR. HARDIKAR AND VOLUNTEERS.

I am glad to see you here this morning. I hope that the National flag unfurled by me this morning will be kept flying for ever and you

---

\(^1\) One who serves the cause of cow-protection

\(^2\) Delivered in Hindi after unfurling the Congress flag in front of the Congress pandal in the morning. Dr. N. S. Hardikar was in charge of the volunteers. will all do works befitting the honour of the great flag. I bless you for your service to the Motherland.

Forward, 27-12-1926

183. RESOLUTION AND SPEECH AT CONGRESS SESSION, GAUHATI

December 26, 1926

RESOLUTION

This Congress expresses its horror and indignation at the cowardly and treacherous murder of Swami Shraddhanand and places on record its sense of the irreparable loss the nation has sustained by the tragic death of a brave and noble patriot who dedicated his life and his great gifts to the service of his country and of his faith and espoused with fearless devotion the cause of the lowly, the fallen and the weak.

BROTHERS AND SISTERS,

You must have noticed that the resolution I have moved originally stood in Maulana Mohamed Ali’s name. But I am here to move it in obedience to the President’s summons. We see from the newspapers that the assassination of Swamiji has evoked grief and horror throughout the land. I said speaking on the same subject at the All-India Congress Committee that we should not mourn over Swamiji’s death. He had died the death of a hero, and every one of us might wish for such a death. But I want to make a slight correction in that last statement. Every brave man welcomes such a death whenever it comes to him. He greets it as a friend. But let no one therefore invite or hanker after such a death, let no one desire that someone else should be in the wrong and err against God and man, so that he might become a martyr. It is wrong to wish anyone to go astray. Let us all be brave enough to die the death of a martyr, but let no one lust for martyrdom.

Swamiji was a hero among heroes, the bravest of the brave. He had astonished the nation with an unbroken record of bravery. I am witness of the pledge he had taken to sacrifice himself at the altar of the country.

But need anyone speak at length on Swamiji’s services to the nation? Swamiji, as everyone knew, was the help of the helpless, the

---

1 The text of the speech was also published in Young India, 13-1-1927, under the heading “Hero among Heroes”.

442 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI friend of the weak and the oppressed and the work he had done for the untouchables was unsurpassed. I well remember his having told me once that, unless every Hindu member of the All-India Congress Committee had an untouchable servant in his home, the work of the Congress for the uplift of the untouchables would not be complete.
This may sound as an impracticable proposal, but it shows his unbounded love for the untouchables.

I shall not refer here to his many other services. Whilst the assassination of such a great hero and patriot, such a servant and devotee of God as Swamiji, can be made to serve the country’s cause, imperfect men as we are, it is natural for us to mourn over his sad death. And when one thinks of the circumstances under which he met his death, one is naturally filled with horror and indignation. The assassin sought an interview with Swamiji to have a discussion on Islam. His faithful servant refused to admit him as he had Dr. Ansari’s orders to allow no interviews so long as Swamiji was seriously ailing.
But God had evidently ordered otherwise. Swamiji, when he overheard the request, asked Dharam Singh to let the man in. Brother Abdul Rashid was shown in. I purposely call him brother, and if we are true Hindus you will understand why I call him so. Swamiji asked his servant to admit Abdul Rashid, because God had willed to show therethrough the greatness of Swamiji and the glory of Hinduism.
Swamiji was, of course, too ill to discuss religious topics and he asked the stranger to seek another occasion. But he would not go. He said he was thirsty and asked for water. Swamiji asked Dharam Singh to fetch water for him and taking advantage of his absence, the man deposited bullet shots in Swamiji’s breast.

This is a thing which should not have happened in India—India where both Hindus and Mussalmans are proud of their faiths. I have studied the Koran with the same reverent attention as I give the Gita, and I say that the Koran nowhere sanctions or enjoins such murders.
The murder has been possible because the two communities look upon each other with feelings of hatred and enmity. Many Mussalmans believe that Lalaji and Malaviyaji are the sworn enemies of Islam as was Swamiji in their opinion. On the other hand, many Hindus regard Sir Abdur Rahim and other Mussalmans as the enemies of Hinduism. To my mind both are wholly wrong. Swamiji was no enemy of Islam nor are Lalaji and Malaviyaji. Lalaji and Malaviyaji have a right to express their opinion freely and even if we disagree with them, no one may excite feelings of hatred against them. And yet, what do we see today? There are few Mussalman papers today which do not use foul language against these patriots. Now I ask in all humility what is the wrong they have done. We may not see eye to eye with them in their methods of work. But I am sure that it is his great service that has earned for Malaviyaji the name, Bharat Bhushan. Lalaji too has a great record of service. Then take the Mussalman leaders. Sir Abdur Rahim may think that Hindus are in advance of the Mussalmans in every respect, that they are rich, they are educated, and the Mussalmans are poor and uneducated. Sir Abdur Rahim thinks that his community should have a preference in the services. It is open to us to feel and say that he is mistaken in his views, but why should we abuse him for his opinions? If Maulana Mahomed Ali says that although he has respect for Gandhi he holds that the faith of a Muslim who believes in the Koran is greater than the faith of Gandhi, why should we be angry? Do not some Christian clergymen say that a Christian regularly going to church and serving Jesus is better than a Hindu however pious he may be? What does that matter to us? I therefore appeal to you that if you hold dear the memory of Swami Shraddhanandji, you would help in purging the atmosphere of mutual hatred and calumny, you would help in boycotting papers which foment hatred and spread misrepresentation. I am sure that India would lose nothing if 90 per cent of the papers were to cease today. Many Mussalman papers today subsist on hatred of the Hindu and many Hindu papers subsist on hatred of the Mussalman. Swamiji has left for us a rich lesson written in his blood. "Do you know the liberality of the Arya Samaj?," he once asked me. "Do you know how Maharshi Dayanand forgave the man who poisoned him?" I knew it. How could I be ignorant of it, knowing as I did that the Maharshi had before him the example of Yudhishthira and the teaching of the Gita and the Upanishads? But Shraddhanandji in his overflowing reverence for the Maharshi dilated upon his forgiveness. I tell you the disciple had no less of that noble quality than his great master. Speaking once about the implications of shuddhi he told me that his shuddhi excluded any feeling of ill will for the Mussalman, that it meant purification of self and of the great community to which he belonged, and that his ideal was the ideal of the Gita—"See thyself in every one of the created beings." But he emphasized that the Hindu also was no less a friend of his than the Mussalman and that it was his duty to serve him. Even if the whole Muslim world were to turn against me, I would declare that Malaviyaji is my friend and elder brother. I declare also in the same breath that none of the Mussalman leaders is an enemy of Hinduism. Sir Abdur Rahim is not an enemy of the Hindus, nor is Mian Fazli Hussain. When I met him he assured me that he was an old Congressman, that he loved the Hindus no less than the Mussalmans, but that as a Mussalman he wanted to serve the latter. We may disagree with him in his views, we may not like his demands for the Mussalmans, but why should we therefore swear at him and say that he is an enemy of the Hindus? Why should we not express our dissent from his views and fight them, if necessary, even as I do with Malaviyaji, in many respects, in a satyagrahi way? I repeat, therefore, with all the emphasis I can command that Sir Abdur Rahim or Mr. Jinnah or the Ali Brothers are no enemies of the Hindus. Let not the lesson of Swami Shraddhanandji’s death be lost on us. You will all be accepting this resolution standing while, at this moment perhaps, there are Hindu-Muslim disturbances going on in Delhi. But I tell you that, if every one of you understands and lays to his heart the lesson that Swami Shraddhanandji has left for us, it is again possible to win swaraj in no time. I am a mad man, you will say, accustomed to giving rash promises. Well, I tell you I am not mad, I am still as much in earnest about my programme as I was in 1920, but those who made pledges in 1920 broke them and made swaraj impossible then. We are all children of the same Father—whom the Hindu and the Mussalman and the Christian know by different names. What if Sankara declared his faith in one God in his formula Ekamevadvitiyam of Ramanuja in his dual doctrine or Mahomed in his La Ilallah Ilillalah? All meant one and the same thing. If we cleanse our hearts, we shall be able to see that Swamiji has served us in his death as much as he served us when living. Let us purify our hearts with his blood, and fight, if need be, for our rights in a peaceful and satyagrahi way. Let every Mussalman also understand that Swami Shraddhanandji was no enemy of Islam, that his was a pure and unsullied life, and that he has left for us all the lesson of peace written in his blood.

Now you will, perhaps, understand why I have called Abdul Rashid a brother, and I repeat it, I do not even regard him as guilty of Swami’s murder. Guilty, indeed, are all those who excited feelings of hatred against one another. For us Hindus, the Gita enjoins on us the lesson of equality; we are to cherish the same feelings towards a learned Brahmin as towards a Chandal, a dog, a cow and an elephant. This is no occasion for mourning or tears, it is an occasion that should burn in our hearts the lesson of bravery. Bravery is not the exclusive quality of the Kshatriyas. It may be their special privilege. But, in our battle for swaraj, bravery is essential as much for the Brahmin and the Vaisya and the Sudra as for the Kshatriya. Let us not therefore shed tears of sorrow, but chasten our hearts and steel them with some of the fire and faith that were Shraddhanandji’s.

184. RESOLUTION AND SPEECH AT CONGRESS SESSION, GAUHATI

December 26, 1926

RESOLUTION

This Congress welcomes the Round Table Conference now sitting in South Africa to deliberate upon the best method of dealing with the question of the status of Indian settlers in that sub-continent and prays for divine blessing and guidance upon its deliberations.

This Congress once more tenders its thanks to that good Englishman, Mr. C. F. Andrews, who has been chiefly instrumental in preparing in South Africa a calm atmosphere suitable for the holding of the Conference.

This Congress authorizes the President to cable the text of the Resolution to General Hertzog, Sir M. Habibulla and Mr. C. F. Andrews.¹

Mahatmaji addressed the assembly in Hindi and the following is a summary of his speech:

He said that Mr. C. F. Andrews had kept him in touch with the position in South Africa through correspondence. Mr. Andrews had emphasized in his letters that prayers should be held all over for divine guidance of the Round Table Conference. Need for such prayer was paramount. They knew that the Indian Government had no power to force its will on South Africa. The recent Imperial Conference had conceded to the dominions even greater freedom and independence in the field of imperial relations. They could, therefore, only pray to God to shower His blessings on those engaged in the discussions of the Round Table Conference so that enlightened by the divine blessings, the Conference might concede justice to the Indian settlers in South Africa.

He then drew the attention of the audience to the fact that the untouchability of South Africa, from which their countrymen were suffering, was nothing but a repercussion of Indian untouchability. It therefore behoved them to put their own house in order.

He reminded the South African statesmen that history showed those who having power abused it prepared for their own ruin, and implored them to grant the Indian settlers elementary justice which they desired. They did not ask for favours; in fact they had forgone, for the sake of peace, things they need not have in strict justice.

¹ The resolution was seconded by Abul Kalam Azad, and passed unanimously.
185. LETTER TO ASHRAM WOMEN

GAUHATI,
Monday, December 27, 1926

DEAR SISTERS,

Instead of writing to you in the morning as usual, I am writing this just before the mail is cleared. Here it is cleared early.

The scenery around here is lovely. Our hut is put up right on the bank of the Brahmaputra; Kaka Saheb would be tempted by the very sight of the hut to stay here. There is a thatch of straw by way of roof. The walls are made of pieces of bamboo that grows all round here. The bamboo is plastered with mud. The inside of the wall is covered with khadi made in Assam. There is no cot inside, but there is an improvised platform, a wooden plank with bamboo legs. Over it is spread straw, on the hay a carpet and on the carpet a khadi sheet. On this I sit, dine and sleep. It is big enough to accommodate four more, but no one else sleeps on it. The ground in the hut, too, is spread over with hay, on which is spread a carpet, which again is covered with khadi. Who would not like to stay in such a hut? Of course, the life of such a hut is very short. It is useless in the rainy season. But it costs very little, takes only a day or two to put up, and requires no great skill. This is so with all true art. It is always simple and natural.

It is quite damp and cold here, but if one moves about briskly one does not get ill.

More next time, whatever comes to my mind then.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G. N. 3631
Mr. Gandhi said an appeal had been made to him for sense of justice. His sense of justice would restore the yarn franchise and make spinning also obligatory. Personally he believed in quality rather than in quantity, but if Congressmen believed in quantity rather than in quality, he suggested that the fewer the restrictions the better for the Congress. If, on the other hand, they believed in quality, then they must impose certain restrictions upon membership which promoted quality and thereby promoted national regeneration. The Congress wanted all the parties within its fold, but they wanted them not at any cost, and let it not be a charge either against the No-changers or against the Swarajists that they wanted to keep the Congress as a close corporation; but, after all, national organizations had their own restrictions which regulated their growth. It was, therefore, for the committee to decide whether khaddar was essential or not. In his opinion it was the only binding tie between the Congress and the masses. There were on the Spinners’ Association’s register more than fifty thousand men and women who were provided with work. Congress must harness this power of khaddar and increase it in order to achieve swaraj. Swaraj would not drop from the Downing Street but by linking the Congress with the masses through that slender cotton thread. He granted that the present franchise could not work because as it stood it was humiliating. What had happened in a number of cases was that a few yards of khaddar hired or purchased were kept near the Congress Committee’s offices and the members, while entering the offices in order to participate in committee discussions and registering their votes, put on the khaddar cloth.

Please do not insult the masses who are dumb. They are already sufficiently insulted. If you believe in the number and not on the quality of Congressmen, then we may as well urge the Congress to

---

1 Gandhiji was speaking in the Subjects Committee on a motion by Motilal Nehru which read: “Resolved that the following amendment be made in Article 7 of the Congress constitution: Substitute the following for sub-Clause 4. ‘No person shall be entitled to vote at the election of the representatives or the delegates or any committee or sub-committee or any Congress organization whatsoever or to be elected as such or to take part in any meeting of the Congress or Congress organization or any committee or sub-committee thereof if he has not complied with sub-Section (1) hereof and does not habitually wear hand-spun and hand-woven khaddar.’

2 Mahadev Desai’s report in his “Weekly Letter” has this here: “Let me say my sense of justice will be reconciled only by the restoration of the spinning franchise. If a stiffening of the franchise is, as I think it certainly is, necessary for national growth, am I not justified in laying down conditions for it? If any member should charge me with motives to exclude any party, I should feel deeply sorry, if not insulted.” remove this yarn franchise completely; but if you believe in quality, then we must stiffen the franchise. Not that I want Congressmen to go out of Congress but because this stiffening is necessary for the growth of the Congress organization.

The amendment of Pandit Motilal is a plea for honesty. If you do not believe in the wearing of khaddar then it is your bounden duty to unhesitatingly vote against it, but the existing clause is nothing but humiliation. In voting on this question, consideration of person must be avoided. Khaddar must stand on its own bottom or it should be destroyed. Please, therefore, eliminate me from your considerations. I do not care whether khaddar remains or not, but I do care for honour of the Congress, because Congress is a mighty name. No success at the polls will achieve swaraj. Yesterday you had to raise the delegate’s fee from one to five rupees. Why? Has the Congress chest become so empty? If we had faith in Congress, our financial position would have been brighter. Was not our financial position far better in 1920-21? Is it khaddar that has brought our finances so low? I would ask you to put your hands on your heart and ask yourself why this downfall. My individual opinion is that this proposition must be carried without any dissentient but if you carry the proposition, you must carry it with all the implications, that is, we must carry on the education of the people in the use of khaddar. You must do nothing to placate me. I do not need your patronage. I am an humble servant of the nation exactly on the same basis as you are, on the terms of absolute equality. I reserve all the rights of a member to myself and, as I am a lover of liberty, I give you the same right to exercise your liberty.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 28-12-1926

187. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

[December 27, 1926]

CHI. MIRA,

I have all your love letters. The one about the repugnance against Mussalmans is disturbing. It is the fear of conversion that has caused this repugnance.

You are doing the right thing there. Watch everything. Mend where you can. Be still, where you are helpless. You have gone there

1 From the postmark
only as a learner. Your business is to finish your Hindi. You will teach and reform only by the way. You will not therefore become a participant in anything that goes on in your school which the Gurukul is for you, even as I cannot be a participant in the sins of a drunkard who may teach me how to shave. But this is not to criticize anything you have hitherto done. This is merely to assure you that you are doing quite well.

Why apologize about the expenses? We do want to be stingy. But we do not want to deny ourselves the things we need for keeping us fit for service. You know that you can get what funds you need from Mr. Gadodia.

Rita is aritha the soap-nut.

You will see many more Miss Rams. May your contact open their eyes. *Raisina*¹ is all you describe it to be and much worse. It is built with blood money. Instead of the blood circulating down to the feet, it is all being sucked by the head. Presently there will be meningitis and—!

Here the scenery is beautiful. Our hut is on the edge of the bank of the mighty Brahmaputra. It is damp and cold; very windy. But the weather is most bracing if one would take vigorous exercise. I generally walk to the Congress tent—one mile and a little over.

I leave tomorrow for Calcutta where I expect to be for four days.

With love,

BAPU

From the original: C.W. 5193. Courtesy: Mirabehn

188. SPEECH AT CONGRESS SESSION, GAUHATI

_December 28, 1926_

You are seeking to inculcate a spirit of complete independence among those who are divided amongst themselves. A wise man does not attempt to take a bigger bite than he can digest. Supposing complete independence was something infinitely superior to swaraj, even then I suggest to you to be patient and attain what is possible at the present moment and then mount further steps. One step is now

¹ New Delhi
² Gandhiji was speaking on the Independence Resolution in the Subjects Committee.
Mahatma Gandhi at this stage made a statement about his views confidently on the Nabha question in the light of the fact that the Congress should not take up questions concerning Indian States. He wanted this question to be reopened and also felt that the currency issue was so important from the point of view of the masses that he was surprised to hear that last night [Subjects] Committee dismissed it summarily.¹

The Searchlight, 2-1-1927

189. SPEECH AT CONGRESS SESSION, GAUHATI ²

December 28, 1926

Mahatma Gandhi congratulated Mr. Banerjee on this sentiment.³ They should not mind the galaxy of Mahatmas throughout the length and breadth of the country. It was better to get out of their clutches (laughter).

But I am not a Mahatma. I am an humble servant of the nation and you won’t easily get out of my clutches (laughter). Because I do not yield to the fiery anarchist in my capacity for self-sacrifice, I am never frightened of even the most forward programme; but I would like you to consider and weigh the words from the lips of a man who has seen many a battle in his life and who knows how forward marches can be performed. If you define the word “swaraj” today, you will be simply limiting its potency. I may say complete independence is included in the word ‘swaraj’. It also includes something else which is repugnant to your sense of self-respect today. I say it does include a close association with the British people on terms of absolute equality. Those to whom this association is unbearable because of the atrocities of the Jallianwala Bagh and because of what has gone on even after the inauguration of the Reforms, I sympathize with them, but I say you are impatient and my advice to you is festina lente (hasten slowly).

¹ After Gandhiji, Motilal Nehru and Sambamurti spoke.
² Gandhiji was speaking for a second time on the Independence Resolution.
³ Upendranath Banerjee had said that the mere fact that Gandhiji was opposed to the resolution should not be an argument against the resolution.

If this resolution is not withdrawn and is challenged to division and rejected by an overwhelming majority, you will still have before you a most forward programme I have given, but do not delude yourself even with the distant hope that I will lead even you in the Council programme. There is no if about it today. When the spirit within me tells me that I shall go to the battle-ground in the Council, I shall on my knees apply to Panditji to take me into his fold and give me his secretarship (laughter), but that is not yet. You should not say or think that the time may never come. I have never erased out of my mind the Council programme. Those who have a long memory may recall that, at the special session in Calcutta, I said that they must not think that the Councils might never be considered by us, but if I went to the Council or sent people to the Council, and Lord Reading asked me, ‘You come to my Council,’ I would say, ‘Yes, but do these things and I come.’ Just as I accepted the Champaran Commission of enquiry, I am quite capable of accepting office in the Council and capable of becoming an Executive Councillor (laughter), but when I become an Executive Councillor you may depend upon me that swaraj has come (laughter) and Mr. Sambamurti’s complete independence also.

I have acquired and achieved my own personal independence. Now I want every Indian to acquire that independence and the sum-total of that is complete independence. I can tell you negatively that, until the All-India Congress Committee really becomes the working body of the men determined to complete the work, when India has really completed one of its promises, namely, the boycott of foreign cloth, when you have very nearly achieved the boycott of foreign cloth, you will find me going to Pandit Motilal and saying, ‘Please sir, may I be admitted into your Council party?’ But that boycott cannot be achieved unless you really become determined men. I want every one of you to join this Khadi Service. I can give you thirty rupees a month and training, but I will send you to the villages and you achieve the boycott of foreign cloth. Then, you will have me to work the Council programme also.

Today we are not a disciplined body. You put your hand on your heart and say that you are. We do not yield with willing obedience to the Chair that we ought to. We should lift up our Chairman and say, ‘Yes, we shall march with you shoulder to shoulder.’

Do you know that threatening letters are being received that now that Swami Shraddhanand has lost his life, some Mussalman should also lose his? There is a postcard which is now in the hands of the Chairman. It is anonymous. There is nothing in it, but the sum-total of these anonymous letters gives us the clue as to where the country is going. Can I have any time for shouldering the Council programme when the atmosphere around us is surcharged? If it is possible for so many of us to cleanse the atmosphere, you will find me giving my attention to the Council programme. Please eliminate me from your mind. If you summarily reject this amendment, you will do so on your own responsibility and its merits without the slightest bargaining and without the slightest mental reservation.²

The Searchlight, 2-1-1927

190. SPEECH AT MEETING OF MUNICIPAL BOARD, GAUHATI³

December 28, 1926

Mahatmaji, in a brief reply, thanked the Board for the honour done to him and stated that he was very much pleased that spinning and weaving had not yet lost their hold on the people of Assam. He was conscious that even today it was essential for every girl of marriageable age among them to have the knowledge of weaving. He wanted the Gauhati Municipal Board to set an example to other local bodies by introducing teaching of spinning, weaving and Hindi to the boys and girls in primary schools under their control and for this purpose he wanted them to get trained teachers. If Gauhati gave the lead, others would follow.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 30-12-1926

1 The source has “surfeited”.
2 The amendment was rejected by a large majority.
3 Gandhiji was presented an address of welcome by the Municipal Board.
191. INTERVIEW TO ASSOCIATED PRESS

GAUHATI,
December 28, 1926

He informed the Associated Press representative that his business in the coming year would be to spread the message of the charkha and use of khaddar and also collect funds for the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial, the central factor of which is spread of khaddar.

Forward, 30-12-1926

192. LETTER TO PUNJABHAI H. SHAH

ON WAY TO CALCUTTA,
Wednesday, [December 29, 1926]²

BHAI PUNJABHAI,

I received your letter just when I was getting anxious about you. I cannot think of making any changes right now. You know what you should do. Do not strain yourself too much. Eat only what suits you. Keep writing to me.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a copy of the Gujarati: G. N. 4011

193. ABHOY ASHRAM KHADI WORK

The following report³ of khadi work done by the Abhoy Ashram, Comilla, for 1925-26 will be read with interest. I would urge the reader to study the reports I am publishing. They prove, as nothing else can, the progress and potentiality of khadi in a cumulative and compelling manner. The reports make not an isolated case nor a case for one province only, but they present cases from almost all the provinces. Those provinces that show nothing or little are the provinces that await workers. ‘The harvest is, indeed, rich, the labourers

¹ The interview took place before Gandhiji’s departure for Calcutta the same day in the afternoon.

² From the contents it appears that Gandhiji was on his way to Calcutta on this day, a Wednesday.

³ Not reproduced here are few.’ The report of the Abhoy Ashram gives one an idea how khadi has gone down in prices. It shows that khadi prices will drop still further as the skill of spinners and weavers increases. The most remarkable fact about this enterprise is that khadi has been self-supporting from the very beginning. The reason is not far to seek. The majority of the members are volunteers and take only a subsistence wage. I would like those who draw up reports to avoid ‘about’ and ‘nearly’ whenever they are giving figures. ‘About 8,000 spinners’ carries but a vague idea. Each centre must be able to give the exact number of spinners, weavers and carders, etc. In a great movement of a universal character, one cannot be too careful, too accurate. The movement depends for its success upon the strictest adherence to truth and purity of character on the part of workers. It has no bounty save the honour, character and sacrifice of its workers. And no movement that has this backing needs any other bounty.

Young India, 30-12-1926

194. SHRADDHANANDJI—THE MARTYR

The expected has happened. Swami Shraddhanandji passed a day or two at the Satyagraha Ashram at Sabarmati, now about six months ago, and told me, in the course of his conversations, that he often received letters threatening his life. Where is the reformer who has not a price put upon his head? There was, therefore, nothing untoward in his getting the letters. And there is nothing untoward in the assassination having taken place.

Swamiji was a reformer, he was a man of action, not of words. His was a living belief. He had suffered for it. He was bravery personified. He never quailed before danger. He was a warrior. And a warrior loves to die, not on a sick-bed, but on the battlefield.

Shraddhanandji became seriously ill about a month ago. Dr. Ansari was, as his physician, giving him all the loving attention he was capable of giving. The telegram I received from his son, Indra, in reply to my inquiry at the beginning of month, was that he was better and that he wanted my ‘love and prayer’ both of which he had before the asking.

God had willed for him a martyr’s death and so, though he was still on the sick-bed, he died at the hands of an assassin who had asked to be admitted to the Swamiji’s presence for the purpose of holding a religious discourse on Islam, who was admitted at the Swamiji’s instance, and who, under pretence of wanting water to quench his thirst, had Swamiji’s faithful servant, Dharam Singh, sent out to fetch water, and who, in the absence of the servant, deposited two death wounds in the patient’s breast, as he was lying in his bed. We have not the last words of the Swamiji, but if I knew him at all, I have no doubt that he prayed to his God to forgive him who knew not that he was doing anything wrong. In the language of the Gita, therefore, ‘Happy the warrior who achieves such a blessed death’.

1 This communication is not available.

Death is at any time blessed, but it is twice blessed for a warrior who dies for his cause, i.e., truth. Death is no fiend, he is the truest of friends. He delivers us from agony. He helps us against ourselves. He ever gives us new chances, new hopes. He is like sleep, a sweet restorer. Yet it is customary to mourn when a friend dies. The custom has no operation when the death is that of a martyr. I cannot, therefore, mourn over this death. He and his are to be envied. For though Shraddhanandji is dead, he is yet living. He is living in a truer sense than when he moved about in our midst in his giant body. The family in which he was born, the nation to which he belonged are to be congratulated upon so glorious a death as this. He lived a hero. He has died a hero.

But there is another side to the shield. I regard myself as a friend of the Mussalmans. They are my blood-brothers. Their wrongs are my wrongs. I share their sorrows and their joys. Any evil deed done by a Mussalman hurts me just as much as that done by a Hindu. This foul deed has been done by one who bears a Mussalman name. As a friend of the Mussalmans, therefore, I deeply regret the event. The joy of the death is thus tempered by the sorrow that an erring, misguided brother has been the cause of it. Martyrdom can, therefore, never be wished for. It becomes a thing of joy only when it comes unsought. We may not gloat over the errors of the least of our fellows.

But the fact is that an error often refuses to become patent until it becomes atrocious. It dies only after being completely disgraced.

This tragedy has a national importance. It draws pointed attention to an evil that is eating into the vitals of the nation. Both Hindus and Mussalmans have the choice before them. We are both on our trial.

Hindus may, by being resentful, disgrace Hinduism and postpone the unity that must come. They can by self-restraint show themselves to be worthy of the message of the Upanishads and of Yudhishthira who was the embodiment of forgiveness. Let us not ascribe the crime of an individual to a whole community. Let us not harbour the spirit of retaliation. Let us not think of the wrong as done by a Mussulman against a Hindu, but of an erring brother against a hero.

Mussalmans have an ordeal to pass through. There can be no doubt that they are too free with the knife and the pistol. The sword is no emblem of Islam. But Islam was born in an environment where the sword was and still remains the supreme law. The message of Jesus has proved ineffective because the environment was unready to receive it. So with the message of the Prophet. The sword is yet too much in evidence among Mussalmans. It must be sheathed if Islam is to be what it means—peace. There is danger of Mussalmans secretly endorsing the mad deed. It will be a calamity for them and the world. For ours is after all a world problem. Reliance upon the sword is wholly inconsistent with reliance upon God. There should be, on their part, unequivocal mass condemnation of the atrocity.

I wish to plead for Abdul Rashid. I do not know who he is. It does not matter to me what prompted the deed. The fault is ours. The newspaper man has become a walking plague. He spreads the contagion of lies and calumnies. He exhausts the foul vocabulary of his dialect, and injects his virus into the unsuspecting, and often receptive minds of his readers. Leaders ‘intoxicated with the exuberance of their own language’ have not known to put a curb upon their tongues or pens. Secret and insidious propaganda has done its dark and horrible work, unchecked and unabashed. It is, therefore, we the educated and the semi-educated class that are responsible for the hot fever which possessed Abdul Rashid.

It is unnecessary to discriminate and apportion the blame between the rival parties. Where both are to blame, who can arbitrate with golden scales and fix the exact ratio of blame? It is no part of self-defence to tell lies or exaggerate.

It is too much to hope, but Swamiji was great enough to warrant the hope that his blood may wash us of our guilt, cleanse our hearts and cement these two mighty divisions of the human family.

I must deal with the life of Swamiji as I knew him in the next issue of Young India.

Young India, 30-12-1926

195. COMPARISON IN UNTOUCHABILITY

During my stay in Wardha, I had occasion to visit the untouchable quarters. The inmates seemed happy but the awakening that has come into being amongst them has made them dissatisfied with the progress of the campaign against the curse of untouchability. They resent the fact that they are still being debarred from the use of temples, wells and public schools in general. They cannot, they will not, understand that progress is ‘lame’ and, therefore, tantalizingly slow. They can see no reason, there is none, for the insufferable disabilities under which they are labouring.

Two days after this interesting visit I discovered that in Wardha, thanks to the efforts of Jamnalalji, they were better off than anywhere else. They have several public wells open to them. They were freely admitted to the Municipal schools. As orphans they had the same facilities as the others. They had free use of public water-taps. And a continuous attempt was being made to break down completely the wall of prejudice against them.

About the same time that I was having experiences of the thought-current of the untouchable brethren, I had to rehearse to myself the incidents of the untouchability of South Africa. I had to do so in view of the Round Table Conference that is deliberating there at present. We who are responsible for Indian untouchability are ourselves victims of it in South Africa. It is a case over again of ‘the biter bitten’. We have sown the wind in India, we are reaping the whirlwind in South Africa.

The Conference is now sitting to consider whether there is a way out. Andrews is making herculean efforts to bring about a happy result. He has mobilized the purest forces of South Africa in favour of the cause.

Let us, however, see the difference between the two untouchabilities. The Indian is withering. The axe has been laid at its root. Enlightened public opinion is against it. No one whose opinion carries any weight defends it. The chains that bind the ‘untouchables’ are daily being broken. Law does not countenance it. What there is of it is all due to the persistence of custom. Customs die hard, they long survive the withdrawal of legal sanction, especially if they are ancient. The disappearance of Indian untouchability is now purely a question of time.

The South African species on the other hand is growing into a hardy tree. It is being daily armed with fresh legal sanctions. The legal disabilities of the Indian untouchables of South Africa have grown with every sitting of the Union Parliament since 1915 in spite of the final settlement of 1914. It is spreading in other parts of the British Empire, as was made plain by the Kenya letter printed last week in these columns.

It is against this growing evil that Andrews is fighting almost single-handed in South Africa. Let us hope that his efforts will be crowned with success.

But the very best way of dealing with the evil no doubt is to rid ourselves of it in India. The members of the Union Deputation were heard to say more than once that it would be time for Indians to agitate for the removal of the bar in South Africa when they had got rid of it in India. No doubt they forgot or did not know that with us here, there was no legislative bar against the untouchables. But it would ill become us to advance an argument of that nature when we are seeking justice. There is a fine legal maxim which is applicable to our case. Those who seek justice must come with clean hands. The best case therefore that we can prepare against South African untouchability is to put our own house in order. Till then, I suppose, we will have to be content with what palliatives the Round Table Conference secures for us.

There is the other side to the question. The untouchables owe something to themselves and to India. But I must deal with this phase of the question in another article.

Young, India, 30-12-1926

196. NOTES

SIR HABIBULLA DEPUTATION

Mr. C. F. Andrews cables.
Advisable delegation stay till February to tide over provincial election and keep atmosphere calm.

I do hope that it would be possible for Lord Irwin to comply with Mr. Andrews’ advice and permit the Deputation to stay in South Africa till the elections are over. The elections in South Africa, as everywhere else, raise not the best thoughts but the worst passions and create bad blood. There is no doubt that the Deputation’s will be a restraining influence. But that, of course, from a South African point of view, may be the best reason for sending the Deputation away.

1 The Parliamentary deputation from South Africa headed by F.W. Beyers, which arrived in India on September 18, 1926, on a three weeks’ visit at the invitation of the Government of India.
before the elections begin. The candidates may resent the courteous curb that the presence of the Deputation must impose upon a free flow of their eloquence.

“HAPPY DESPATCH”?

The esteemed correspondent whose letter evoked the article “The Greatest Good of All” (Young India, 9-12-1926) writes:

Of the three cases, you have dealt only with the first that of Dr. Blazer and expressed no opinion on the merits of the other two—the Paris case and the Danish law. I and many others of your readers, I am sure, would be grateful if you could enlighten us as to how you would judge these matters also from your own ethical standpoint.

The cases referred to are:

At about the same time last year I remember I read about the Paris case in which an actress shot and killed her lover at his own importunate request, as he was suffering excruciating pain from a disease from which there was no hope of recovery. The actress was tried for manslaughter, but acquitted on the jury’s verdict that no crime had been committed in view of the circumstances. Though there appears to be no law in France to justify such a verdict, I have read that in Denmark there has been actually a law passed making it no crime for certain authorized persons in cases like the above to put an end to a human life with ‘happy despatch’.

In my opinion, such killing, if it is done bona fide, will certainly not count as himsa as understood and defined by me. But I could not take it upon my shoulders to justify such action on the part of a third party, as I would never have sufficient material to judge such a case. The defence will rest solely upon the intention. And since no one but God is the infallible judge of intentions, everyone must act on his own responsibility and take all the consequences. It follows, therefore, that the Danish law cannot be defended. And I should hold it to be most dangerous to justify any act of killing on the ground of the desire of the victim to be killed. There are many cases in which a man may for the moment, being overwhelmed with pain, desire to be killed rather than live in agony. But he would be most grateful upon recovery to know that his wish was not complied with. The better thing would, in my opinion, be boldly to put an end to a life which we may absolutely know to be past saving. Such a case would be that of a comrade on the battle-field who has received a fatal wound and who has no possibility of receiving any medical aid. In this case, it will not be his wish that would determine the act of killing but the certain knowledge of a lingering death in utter helplessness and without hope even of loving nursing. For it is assumed that the soldier who ends the agony by

\[\text{\textsuperscript{1}Vide “The Greatest Good of All”, 9-12-1926.}\] killing is not able even to nurse his wounded comrade.

CONTROL OF EVIL THOUGHTS

A correspondent sends me an essay in support of the view propounded in these columns in the series of articles “Towards Moral Bankruptcy”. There is nothing new in it, but it contains a quotation from Buddha’s teaching which should help those who are trying to control evil thoughts. Here is the passage:

When by reason of a phase of mind, there arise in a brother bad and wrong thoughts associated with appetite, hatred and delusion, then he should divert his mind from that to another phase associated with what is right. If they still arise, then he should study the perils they entail, marking how wrong and depraved such thoughts are and how they ripen into ill. If they still keep on rising, he should ignore them and not let his mind dwell on them. And if they still continue, he must be think him how to allay all these modes and fashions of thoughts. As he does so, these thoughts will pass away and disappear, so that his heart stands firm, is steadfast, is focussed and concentrated. And lastly, if, allay as he may, these thoughts continue to rise, then with his teeth clenched and with his tongue pressed against his palate, he should by sheer force of mind, restrain, coerce and dominate his heart. As he does so these thoughts will pass away and disappear. He will think only such thoughts as he wishes and not those he wishes not to think.

Young India, 30-12-1926

197. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, CALCUTTA

December 31, 1926

Mahatmaji, addressing the gathering in Hindi, said that Swami Shraddhanand’s death was not an easy thing. It was not the death of an ordinary man. The heroes died not the death of an ordinary man. Swamiji was immortal by sacrificing his life for the cause of Hindu religion. They had assembled there to perform some “tarpan” for the memory of the late Swami. A memorial fund had been opened and he hoped that everybody would contribute his mite to it. They had chalked out a proposal that ten lakhs of rupees would be raised for the memorial fund half of which would be spent for untouchability work and half for shuddhi and sangathan. Swamiji had done much for the Hindu religion and he was one of the foremost religious workers. Swamiji, continued Mahatma Gandhi, had no differences with him in respect of removing untouchability. To speak the truth, the late Swamiji lived for the untouchables and if they meant to do proper honour to his memory, they could only do it by taking up the mission of Swami Shraddhanand’s life.

Speaking on shuddhi and sangathan Mahatmaji said that the mission taken up by the late Swami was on the proper way. Every religion had a legitimate right of conversion and self-organization so long as it was not based on force. Swami

1 The meeting was held at Maheshwari Bhavan, Barrabazar, to pay tribute to Swami Shraddhanand’s memory and to collect funds for shuddhi and sangathan movement. Madan Mohan Malaviya also spoke on the occasion.
Shraddhanand was not ever for forcibly converting anybody and he could claim to know Swamiji fully well.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 1-1-1927

198. LETTER TO MAGANLAL GANDHI

Monday [December 1926]

I have your two letters. It is good that you have started taking your meals in the common mess.

Please let me know about Keshu’s condition. Nobody can manufacture or sell the Ramchandra lift. Have you renewed the registration of its patent? If you received any communication from the Patents Office, please pay up the arrears. We can pay Best & Co. only after the formalities about the patent are completed, when we start selling the lifts.

Kakasaheb should prepare a report of the prayer for South Africa and sent it to Andrews. I have no more time to write; it is about 10 p.m.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 7749. Courtesy: Radhabehn Chowdhari

199. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

1926

CHI. MANI,

I got your letter. Well, if unmarried girls fall ill, to whom shall I complain about it? It is as if the sea had caught fire. We should master the art of preserving good health if only for being able to serve others. I think that all of you must use mosquitonets at night as a matter of course even as you wear clothes. For the rest, read my letter to the Ashram Children.

I hope that by the time you get this letter you will have completely recovered from your illness.

Blessings from

BAPU

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelne, p. 37

---

1 December 19, 1926 was observed as a day of prayer for success of the Round Table Conference in South Africa. Reference in the letter to this day suggests that the letter was written sometime in December.

2 Son of the addressee

3 As in the source
200. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

Silence Day [1926]

CHI. MANI,

I have not heard from you lately. I hope you are quite well now. Your illnesses will become fewer as you cease worrying needlessly and your mind becomes trusting like a little child’s. You should understand the meaning of “trusting”. It means that one with such a mind never takes offence, nor takes notice of anyone’s misconduct nor sees wrong anywhere. This is a noble state of mind. Let me tell you straightway that I for my part have not attained it. I wish to reach it, but I am still far away from it. It is reached earlier by men and women who observe inviolate brahmacharya. I have known such people. Andrews has nearly reached it. Men who look upon him as a fool are fools themselves. You must cultivate such a trusting nature.

Blessings from
BAPU

[From Gujarati]
Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelne, p. 38

201. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

Silence Day [1926]

CHI. MANI,

I got your letter. I heard the news from father too. I do not write more about [your] illness, for I hope to meet you on Saturday at the latest. But you should get well and strong immediately.

Blessings from
BAPU

[From Gujarati]
Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelne, p. 39

1 As in the printed source
2 Ibid
202. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

Silence Day [1926]

CHI. MANI,

I have your letter. Upon a chance remark by me, Mahadev [Desai] showed me your letter to him without waiting to get your permission. No one should expect Mahadev to keep anything from me. That is beyond his power. Once we have formed a habit, we are unable to do anything different. This virtue is worth cultivating so far as good habits are concerned. One who sincerely meditates over non-violence becomes in the end incapable of violence, not in deed but in thought. Thought is the father of action. When thought disappears, action automatically becomes impossible.

What if separation from you has been as painful to me as separation from me is to you? You chose what was for your good, and I chose what was good for me. In acting thus lies your welfare, mine and the world’s. Education should enable us to find our happiness in our good. If, therefore, you think that living in the Ashram is good for you, you should feel happy in doing so. And in this do not deceive yourself or me. You may be sure that the moment you do not like to stay in the Ashram, I shall willingly let you go elsewhere. Writeto me without reserve. Never mind if I do not understand you or lecture to you in reply. Learn to bear with the lectures of seniors.

Blessings from

BAPU

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelne, p. 40

203. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

Monday [1926]

CHI. MANI,

I got your letter. You did well to go to Ahmedabad city at the time of uncle’s (Vithalbhai’s) visit.

Manu' and Manilal' can be brought round only with patience.

1 As in the printed source
2 As in the printed source
3 Vithalbhai Patel visited Ahmedabad after his election as President of the Central Legislative Assembly.
4 Grand-daughter of Gandhiji
5 One of the Ashram students

464 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
Ba again said she would start on Sunday. She must reach [Sabarmati] on Wednesday at the latest.

I am writing this just before retiring to bed. So I will not write more.

Blessings from

BAPU

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelne, p. 41

204. LETTER TO LAKSHMI \(^1\)

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
[1926]\(^2\)

CHI. LAKSHMI,

This time, it may be said, your letter was late. Your handwriting has improved. There should not be two kinds of writing in one letter. There is nothing to worry if you are inclined to play. Children are bound to be playful. But they should have the same heart for work too. Those children whose mind is always engrossed in play can’t help lying some time or other. Now you will be entering your 13th year. It is not so young an age. You should get from here new clothes if those you are using wear out. If they can be stitched there, that is, if Danibehn knows how to sew, khadi can be sent from here; but if she is unable to do so, the clothes can be made here and sent to you. Take a vow to do some good deed on your birthday.

Rukhi’ and Anandi’ are ill. Both have fever. I hope they will be all right in two or three days.

From a microfilm of the Gujarati: S.N. 19627

---

\(^1\) Daughter of Dudabhai; a Harijan inmate of the Ashram

\(^2\) The addressee was born in 1914. Reference to her 13th birthday suggests that letter was written in 1926.

\(^3\) Daughter of Maganlal Gandhi

\(^4\) Daughter of Lakshmidas Asar
205. LETTER TO PRABHASHANKAR PATTANI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Friday [1926]\(^1\)

SUJNA BHAISHRI,

After you wrote about the fever, there has been no letter from you; I trust there is nothing to worry about. I wish you to recover the strength you have lost even if you have to try hard. Can you disentangle yourself from administration till you completely regain strength? I may be tempted to come to Trapaj if you take complete rest and make a vow to get back your full strength. If I do so, I would place you in the custody of a guard. Will an unrestricted authority tolerate this restriction?

Vandemataram from
MOHANDAS

From a photostat of the Gujarati: C.W. 3200; also G.N. 5886. Courtesy: Mahesh Pattani

206. LETTER TO PRABHASHANKAR PATTANI

THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
Saturday [1926]\(^2\)

SUJNA BHAISHRI,

I have your letter. Looking at your meagre weight, you cannot be said to have really recovered. Nor do you seem to have improved much in Abu. Your acceptance of my condition for coming to Trapaj is lukewarm. Such acceptance will not tempt me to pay the visit. The weather here at present is not inviting to an ailing man. The afternoons are very sultry. The sky is overcast; and it would not rain. In such weather even otherwise healthy people may fall ill. Why not take your family and go to Panchgani? Of course, I do wish you to spend a few days at Panchgani.

Vandemataram from
MOHANDAS

From a photostat of the Gujarati:C.W. 3201. Courtesy:Mahesh Pattani

\(^1\) Reference in the letter to the addressee’s indifferent state of health and his stay at Trapaj suggests this year.

\(^2\) Year inferred from contents; vide preceding item.
207. LETTER TO CHHAGANLAL GANDHI

Silence Day [1926] ¹

CHI. CHHAGANLAL,

I understand that the time of the prayer is not going to be changed. After gaining some more experience, if you want to change it, do so. Do not think about my view. Even if the time is not changed, the time for going to bed should be fixed. We are all guilty in this regard. Under some pretext or other, we do not go to bed early. I believe our good lies in our success in getting over this weakness. As long as we do not overcome it, no time of the morning prayer will suit us. The morning prayer should be discontinued if everyone believes that this weakness cannot be overcome. It would be undesirable to leave the decision to individuals, but as long as we do not observe the time for going to bed, we cannot fix the time for the morning prayer.

I do not believe that the timing of the prayer is the cause of illness. All the malaria patients must use mosquito-nets. They should not bathe in cold water. It is enough if they rub clean the body with a dry towel or use a towel dipped in hot water. There is no need to believe that one has bathed only when one has poured water over his head.

There is no time to write more.

Blessings from
BAPU

[PS.]

Everyone should read this letter.

From the Gujarati original: S.N. 32892

208. TALKS TO ASHRAM WOMEN ²

O Govinda, O Krishna residing in Dwarka, O beloved of all Gopis, how is it that you do not know that I am oppressed by the Kauravas, i.e., wicked passions?

O Lord, O husband of the Goddess of Beauty, O Lord of Vraja, the destroyer of all distresses, O Janardana, rescue me submerged in the ocean of the Kauravas.

O Krishna, Krishna, O great sage, Soul of the universe, Creator of the ¹ From the contents; vide “Telegram to Chhaganlal Gandhi”, 6-12-1926.

² Notes taken by Manibehn Patel at Gandhiji’s morning prayer meetings for women during 1926 universe, O Govinda, save me who seek your help, drooping in the midst of the Kurus.

My ideal is this: A man should remain man and yet should become woman; similarly a woman should remain woman and yet become man. This means that man should cultivate the gentleness and the discrimination of woman; and woman should cast off her timidity and become brave and courageous.

It is said that women are jealous, but this does not mean that men are free from this failing or that all women are jealous. Women have to stay indoors for all the twenty-four hours and therefore their jealousy becomes more conspicuous. That is all.

* * *

My patience in teaching you will be endless. It will end only when your readiness to learn ends.

* * *

Both man and woman can become fearless. Man thinks that he can be fearless, but it is not always true; similarly woman thinks she is weak and allows herself to be called so; this too is not right. Women have no need at all for fear. I will tell you what I heard about Mirabai the day before yesterday. Mirabai went to Vrindavan and knocked at the door of a sadhu. The sadhu replied from inside that he never looked at a woman. Mirabai asked him, “Who are you? I know only one man, and that is Krishna.” On hearing this, the sadhu opened the door, fell at the feet of Mirabai and said, “You have opened my eyes today. I have been saved from an abyss.”

* * *

Man and woman are characterized by fear as long as both are subject to passions.

Draupadi showed as great a strength as Yudhishthira did.

Draupadi had five husbands at one time and yet has been called ‘chaste’. This is because in that age, just as a man could marry several wives, a woman (in certain regions) could marry several husbands. The code of marriage changes with time and place.

But from another point of view, Draupadi is a symbol of the mind. And the five Pandavas are the five senses brought under its control. And it is indeed desirable that they are so controlled. Since all the five senses were under the control of the mind and had become refined, the mind (Draupadi) can be said to have wedded the five senses (Pandavas).

The strength which Draupadi showed was immense. Even Bhima and the Dharmaraja Yudhishthira were afraid of her.
While in jail, as I read the prayer of Draupadi to Krishna at this time, as given in the Mahabharata, I wept bitterly.

To my mind, this prayer of Draupadi has extraordinary strength in it. Countless men in North India recite these verses.

The power of words too increases or decreases in proportion to the penance underlying them. What is there in the word ‘˙’? It is simply made up of three syllables •, @ and ◊. And yet its value lies in the penance associated with it. When there is greater penance behind the word, its value becomes greater. The same is the case with Draupadi. She may even be regarded as an imaginary character created by Vyasa. Such a woman may or may not have existed. But the great strength of Vyasa’s penance and the recitation by crores of people of the prayers put into Draupadi’s mouth by him have raised the value of that prayer.

‘Govinda’ means the master of the senses; by Gopis are meant the thousands of sense-organs. Gopijanapriya means one who is the beloved of the masses or, say, of the weak. Draupadi was surrounded by the Kauravas. The Kauravas are our evil desires. Draupadi cries, “O Keshava, how is it that you do not know me?” It is the cry of the distressed, the voice of the aggrieved. Do not we all have evil desires? When are we free from passions? Draupadi says that she has been surrounded by Kauravas. Here ‘Kauravas’ may also mean wicked persons. But we are overpowered even more by our evil desires than by wicked persons. So it is better to interpret ‘Kauravas’ to mean evil desires.

Draupadi is a servant of God and as such she has the right even to quarrel with Him. She cries, “Oh Master, Oh Lord, Oh Ramanath, i.e., Lakshmi, i.e., Lord of the World, He who gives salvation, He who brings about self-realization, Vrajnath, i.e., Lord of the Universe, Artinashana, i.e., Dispeller of grief, I am drowning in a sea of Kauravas, i.e., I am sinking in a multitude of desires; I am full of wicked passions. Save me.”

Draupadi repeats the call “Krishna, Krishna”. When a person is either in great joy or in great misery, he calls out to God twice. Draupadi says, “I come to you for refuge; save me; I am beset with evil passions, and have become weak; my limbs are giving way. Save me.”

In Bombay there is a woman named Janakibai. In 1915 when I was staying with Revashankarbhai she came to see me. She boasted a great deal about herself. At that time I did not believe her. Then when I went to Dwarka, she also was there. I made particular inquiries in regard to her and found that she moved quite freely among the most wicked of men. Her idea was that she should be able to preserve her chastity even while living in the midst of the worst men. It so happens that no one even in anger addresses her with a disrespectful ‘thou’. She moves amongst them like a lioness.

* * *

We are helpless like Draupadi, because we are all full of impurities and evil desires. Our fear of serpents and such like is a proof of our weakness. I am regarded as the highest in the Ashram; even then I, too, feel afraid. It means that I am also more helpless than Draupadi.

Dwarka means the whole world, or we ourselves, not the dirty little town near Porbandar in Kathiawar.

* * *

What can women have done that even men like Tulsidas have used insulting epithets for them? Whether it was the fault of Tulsidas or of the times, the blemish is nevertheless there.

The ancient laws were made by seers who were men. The women’s experience, therefore, is not represented in them. Strictly speaking, as between man and woman, neither should be regarded as superior or inferior. The place and functions of both are different, and God has defined both.

* * *

Only the self can raise the self; the self is the help of the self. Only women can raise women. This requires tapascharya and hard work. It is true that women are more capable of it than men; but the tapascharya must be intelligent. Today women merely toil on in a helpless condition like drudges.

It may be agreed that no one can save woman except herself. But it may be asked, ‘Can she be self-supporting?’ My heart says that she can. If she learns satyagraha, she can be perfectly independent and self-supporting. She will not have to feel dependent upon anyone. This does not mean that she shall not take any help from others. She will certainly. But if such help be not forthcoming she will not feel destitute. If we are detached, even while we use the articles which we receive, we are self-dependent. In such a state, even though receiving help from all the world we in fact never become dependent on anyone. And if help were refused, we would say, it was good that it was not given, and would not get angry, nor blame anyone. This is called satyagraha. It is not enough merely to be convinced that we should be fearless. We should become fearless at heart. Casting off fear does not mean that we should not care for the world’s opinion.

One should give up the idea that one is helpless. God is the help of all. It is possible to throw the blame for the present sorry condition of women on their husbands. But women should think how best they can themselves cast off their own weakness.

* * *

There can be only one prayer for us all. If we offer this prayer daily, understanding it properly, it will get embedded in our minds. Keshava (God) is always with us. He is not in some Dwarka. That is only the language of the poet. Draupadi forgot that Keshava was with her. He clothed her body again and again remaining beside her. Whenever evil thoughts or evil desires spring in our mind, we should say to ourselves: oh, why do such thoughts come to me? We should then think of these verses of prayer.

* * *

This ¹ is not a mere political book. I have used the language of politics, but I have really tried to offer a glimpse of dharma. What is the meaning of ‘Hind Swaraj’? It means rule of dharma or Rama-raiyya. I have addressed as many meetings of women as of men. At women’s meetings I have always used the word Ramarajya in place of swaraj.

This book is the gist of my thinking for several years. Just as one cannot help speaking out when one’s heart is full, so also I have been unable to restrain myself from writing the book since my heart was full. The book is meant mainly for the illiterate masses.

* * *

Whatever character we have inherited from our parents is our real inheritance. It may be said to be our spiritual inheritance, and it is our duty to add to it. If a father leaves an inheritance of a lac of rupees and the son increases it to a million and then says “What kind of man my father was who collected only a lac and how clever I am that I amassed a million”, he is a wicked son; there is pride in what he says. We do not wish to add to money inherited from our parents, but to character, to our spiritual inheritance, and we should not feel proud about it, for spiritual inheritance is not possible without humility.

* * *

In abstaining from a thing we have not been used to from birth—for example, meat-eating—we make no sacrifice. Such a thing is quite natural for us, and we perform no heroic act thereby.

* * *

Man’s beauty is in his character, that of a beast in its body. In the case of a cow, for instance, we may say how good it is because of its skin, or hair, or feet, or horns; in the case of a man, on the other hand, we do not say that he is good because he is five feet and a half, or bad because he is four feet and a half, or better if he is an inch more than five feet and a half. Being good or bad in the case of man lies in his heart, not in his body or even in his accumulated wealth. Here in the Ashram, we have regarded it our dharma to build up the virtues of the heart. We eat and drink, and construct buildings with sand and mortar. That is because we have to do these things. We have not despised mud huts, we would not be ashamed to live in one but we should indeed feel ashamed to live in luxury. We should hang our heads in shame if we add to our wealth. Indeed, we may possess wealth for service; we have to accumulate such wealth, much against our will. But some people accumulate wealth regarding greed as their religion. This is not proper. In proportion as we make our outer life more and more elaborate, we harm our moral progress, and we injure our dharma.

¹ Hind Swaraj

* * *

Our merchants earn crores of rupees in the markets of Bombay. That is no cause for delight to us. It is rather a matter for regret. Because when a Bombay merchant earns five crores by way of brokerage, the Britisher gets ninety-five crores and that too he takes away from the country through bleeding the poor man white. We do not realize this, because after all it takes time to bleed a nation of thirty-three crores of people.

* * *

If a labourer does all his work dedicating it to God, then thereby he can attain self-realization. Self-realization means purity of self. Strictly speaking, only those who do bodily labour get self-realization; because ‘God is the strength of the weak’. By ‘weak’ is not meant ‘weak in body’, though for them also their strength is God—but we should take it to mean weak in means and materials. The labourer must cultivate humility, for mere developing of intelligence may lead to the development of an asuri intelligence. By doing merely intellectual work, we develop asuri tendencies. It is, therefore, that the Gita says that one who eats without labour eats stolen food. Humility is inherent in labour. And that is why it is karmayoga or activity that leads to salvation. Doing physical work simply for wages is no karmayoga, since the idea is simply to earn money. Cleaning of latrines for earning money is no yajna (sacrifice). But the same work if done by way of service, for the sake of sanitation and for the good of others, becomes yajna. One who does bodily labour out of a spirit of service, in all humility and for self-realization, gets self-realization.
Such a one should never feel reluctant to work. He should be ever awake.

* * *

How can the pot call the kettle black when both are of practically the same colour? In the same way what can man say to woman or how can he criticize her? If numerous suspicions, doubts, passions and fears characterize women, they exist also in men. Some pundits say that woman cannot attain salvation. But as I see it, that is not so. The Vaishnavas believe that there has not been a greater devotee than Mirabai. My view is that if Mirabai cannot get salvation, no man can ever get it.

* * *

The farmer sleeps in the field. Are you or the British officer ever likely to sleep there? But who cares for the poor man’s feelings? What joy does he get out of life? He has to work in the field from early morning. So he also spreads his bed there. He may die of snake-bite. But the farmer leads such a life by compulsion. If it is at all called sacrifice on his part, it is sacrifice forced on him. It is not as though he refused to travel by train; if someone provided him the opportunity, he would travel. But if he leads his particular kind of life in full knowledge of it, his life would indeed be blessed. Some sages lead a life like this farmer, or like Jada Bharat. But in their case they have taken to such life purposely.

* * *

I would certainly worship an idol made of clay, if thereby my mind becomes lighter. If my life becomes fruitful, then only the worship of young Krishna’s idol has meaning. The stone is no God; but God resides in the stone. If I besmear the idol with sandal paste, make an offering of rice, and pray to it for strength to cut off so many heads, one of you should throw the idol into a well, or break it into pieces.

* * *

If we wish to develop in us the capacity to look on all with an equal eye, we should aim at getting only what the rest of the world gets. Thus if the whole world gets milk, we may also have it. We may pray to God and say, “O God, if you wish me to have milk, give it first to the rest of the world.” But who can pray thus? Only he who has so much sympathy for others and who labours for their good. Even if we cannot practise this principle, we must at least understand and appreciate it. For the present, our only prayer to God should be that since we are fallen so low He may accept whatever little we do. We may not progress in this direction but He should give us strength to lessen our parigraha. If we repent of our sins, they will not increase further. We should not keep anything with us thinking it belongs to us, but should strive to give up as much of our parigraha as we can.

* * *

If man needs the help of the whole world before he can follow truth and non-violence, then he would indeed become dependent. But God has arranged things so beautifully, that even if the whole world is against him, he can still follow truth and non-violence himself. If we do not wish to quarrel, the other person can certainly not quarrel with us. In the end he will get tired and will be quiet. On the other hand, if we become angry, we increase anger. It is like adding fuel to the fire.

* * *

How can he rise, in whose mind there is never any problem?

* * *

From the fact that . . .† committed suicide, we should learn that we should not allow sorrow or troubles to prey constantly upon our minds. We should not brood over them. If we have felt hurt by someone, we should tell him so straightway. Then the pain will not remain in our hearts. Even brooding sorrowfully within oneself is a kind of suicide.

Self-condemnation is desirable to some degree. In a way it is good to remain dissatisfied with oneself. If a man’s dissatisfaction is within limits he will rise. But if he always needlessly goes on finding fault with himself and says, he has not been able to do this or that, then he will really not be able to do anything and will become a fool. We should at the same time be contented and discontented. Then only can we rise.

The body is sometimes called a ratnachintamani. If we remain devoted to God, it would really prove to be so. But to become wholly devoted to God, we have to control the body.

Man has to move about out of doors. His work is outside the house. So he does not quickly become despondent. But woman has to stay all the time inside the house. So she is lonely and falls an easy prey to despondency. If she finds another woman to talk to, she becomes so talkative that she fails to discriminate between what she should say and what she should not. Being always in the house she develops such defects. Of course, in a sense such loneliness is desirable. It saves her from many temptations. But it is fruitful only if we learn to turn our eyes inward, search our hearts, and become

† Name omitted in the source introspective.

* * *

Suppose there is a woman who is entirely illiterate yet remains devoted to her duties. She does not touch even a blade of grass that does not belong to her. She does not steal even in her dreams. If you ask her what the Bhagavata is, she stares you in the face. But she loves every human being as though she were the mother of all mankind.

Suppose there is another woman, who knows everything, has all the Upanishads by heart, whose pronunciation is excellent, but who steals, lies, is clever in making others work for her and is adept in almost everything. There is not the slightest doubt that the former is superior to the latter. Of course if she learns reading and writing, she would be better still.

* * *

Of what use is knowledge in which there is no humility or tenderness? Sage Kaushika became angry when a bird eased itself over him. The bird was consumed to ashes by his anger. The sage felt somewhat proud at the power of his penance. He then went to a house as a guest. The lady of the house was busy serving her husband, and so kept the visitor waiting. After she had finished her work she went to the sage with some food for him and stating the cause of her delay apologized to him. The sage got angry. The lady said, “I am not a bird that you can burn me with an angry look; besides, such anger cannot be called wisdom.” The sage learnt a lesson and said, “You have given me two kinds of food—food to eat and the food of wisdom.”

* * *

A man who does the work that falls to his lot in the natural course of things can remain unattached to it. He does not get false attachment for such work.

Real knowledge and true education can be had by devoted performance of one’s duty.

It is disgusting to see people that throng the hospitals. Doctors treat them, but it is also their duty to teach them how to remain healthy. But hardly any doctor does this. Most doctors pamper the body. By doing this they harm man’s character and degrade his soul. Besides, by pampering the body they do not really save it.

To kill living animals for medicinal purposes to learn suturing, is this the work of a human being? It is the work of the devil.

* * *

Passion is common both to man and woman. The mind of a passionate person always wanders about seeking objects of pleasure. We must understand that our life is not for enjoying or giving such pleasures, but for self-realization.

The marriage of Siva and Parvati is regarded as an ideal marriage. One who wants to wed like Parvati should think of a man like Siva who is free from all passions. It is not Parvati alone that was destined to get such a husband. Every woman holds that fate in her own hands.

In choosing a husband, one must not go by the kind of clothes he puts on, or the turban he wears. One must see how educated he is, and how good he is in character. Once you have decided to marry, marry one who has good character, and whose mind is compatible with yours. If you find such a person, well and good; otherwise resolve to remain unmarried. One should not think of marrying anyone that comes along. Parvati had resolved that she would marry only one who was free from all passions like Siva, otherwise she would remain unmarried. Every girl should cherish the ideal of Parvati.

Not to ride on another’s back is also service. Not to accept service from another, and to develop an attitude of not making others work for one is also service.

The world is such that if we put three stitches at one place thirteen others give way elsewhere. Then how can we improve it? Real progress consists in recognizing Truth which exists within us as our Soul.

If you are good, the world is good. Bhagawan Patanjali has written that the desire for revenge disappears in the presence of nonviolence. If we are ourselves slaves we regard all others also as slaves. In short, who wants to cheat an innocent man? One who tries to play false with such a person will ultimately only hurt himself. If we do not retaliate, if we do not oppose the misdeeds of a wicked person, his misdeeds themselves will bring about his downfall. He will fall and then correct himself.

If we achieve swaraj in our own Ashram, we would obtain swaraj for the whole of India. It means we would all be straight like a stick. None of us would look upon another with suspicion. If we have no mutual distrust swaraj is at hand.

Swaraj means rule over one’s own self, not over another. It means controlling one’s self. He who has gained control over his sense organs, has obtained almost everything.
He who believes in punishment and violence has necessarily to resort to deceit. Deceit is a necessary accompaniment of such belief.

Our temple is in our Ashram, nay, it is in our hearts. A temple constructed of a few stones has no meaning. Only a temple raised in our hearts is useful.

If our Ashram goes on well like this and does not produce any bad people, it will become a place for pilgrimage.

Every pebble on the bank of the Narmada is said to be Siva. By the Narmada we do not mean only the river near Broach, but all rivers. If we wash clean a pebble on the bank of a river and offer bilva patra\(^1\) to it, the pebble becomes Siva for us. Going a step further, if we take a lump of earth and mould it into the shape of a Siva Linga it also becomes Siva for us. On going still further, we may think that Siva resides in the hearts of us all.

We are idolators as well as iconoclasts. We destroy the stone in the idol, but we worship the image of God in it.

I expect all the women in the Ashram not to do a single piece of work without giving it proper thought. To this end, women should acquire knowledge. At present, the women of India have become dull and lifeless.

A girl who wishes to remain unmarried should be wedded to independence. A girl dependent upon others can never remain unmarried.

If the ghost dies, the spirit will rise. If we rob someone, someone else is ready to rob us. There is a proverb in Gujarati which says that there is always something mightier than a lion to subdue a lion.

Just as when we do not know cooking, and yet prepare half-cooked things and eat them we get indigestion, in the same way if we cannot understand what we read and yet go on reading, we shall get literary indigestion.

Even the greatest are punished if they do things they ought not to do.

---

\(^1\) The leaf of a tree regarded sacred by Hindus
Devotees of God carry on activities dictated by their inner voice. But this inner voice also may sometimes deceive. So devotees must always remain vigilant.

A person who tells a half-lie tells one lie and a half, because he deceives also his own mind; whereas a person who tells an absolute lie knows that he is telling one.

Education of children mainly depends on mothers. Howsoever I may try to educate children in the Ashram, my efforts would prove futile without the co-operation of mothers. We have to educate our children to be helpful to others.

Even when a child goes to a teacher for studying, he takes with him a string attached to his mother’s heart. He is always thinking when he can return to his mother. The mother draws the child to herself by means of this string.

We may read the Gita, or the Ramayana or the Hind Swaraj. But what we have to learn from them is desire for the welfare of others. We have to teach this to our children also.

Those forefathers of ours who gave up liquor did a manly thing. But for us who have never drunk liquor, there is only negative kind of merit in not drinking. We simply do not incur the sin of drinking—that is all. We may be said to have really given up drinking only when we understand all the evils that result from drinking.

In the same way, there is no meaning in our observing sacred days and vows without understanding their significance. Such observance becomes useful both to us and to society if we understand and can explain to others their significance. Our women observe Nagapanchami, Janmashtami and other holy days. But they should understand their significance. It is possible that the meaning of Nagapanchami is that considering the serpent as a symbol of the enemy, it was sought through this means to inculcate the principle of not killing even one’s enemies. In this world, excepting perhaps man, there is no other creature so poisonous as a serpent. If we regard anyone as so full of venom as a serpent, we should learn to love him, as though he were full of nectar. From doing this, we shall learn that every human being is worthy of worship, i.e., of service.

This world is held together by bonds of love. History does not record the day-to-day incidents of love and service. It only records incidents of conflict and wars. Actually, however, acts of love and service are much more common in this world than conflicts and quarrels. We see innumerable villages and towns flourishing in the world. If the world were always full of discord, they could not possibly exist.

* * *

We must necessarily abolish those laws that destroy dharma. Not only should we not abide by such laws, but we should even actively resist them. Now there are two ways of doing this—either through violence or through satyagraha. We should follow only the path of satyagraha. We cannot commit violence in the name of dharma. We may allow ourselves to be hanged or to be killed rather than kill others in the name of dharma.

* * *

It is often asked how women may protect their honour. It is even suggested that they should carry daggers on them. If they do carry daggers, the daggers could of course be used against their own persons. One has to be very tough to be able to wield a dagger. One would have to change one’s whole mode of life, for a person who has never seen blood drawn, or drawn blood himself, can never use a dagger. In order to be able to use a dagger, we shall have to take to hunting, kill quantities of sheep—so hard shall we have to make our hearts before we can thrust a dagger into someone.

So instead of teaching women to use a dagger, it is better to teach them to be fearless. God’s protecting hand is always over us. If we really believe in the existence of God, whom shall we fear? Even if the most wicked of persons assaults you, recite Ramanama. Most wicked persons would run away at this earnest cry to God. But if that does not happen, what does it matter? We should learn to die on such an occasion. If a child is on its death-bed, do we not almost kill ourselves in looking after it? If even after the mother’s greatest efforts, the child dies in her lap, she has the satisfaction that she did her best for it. It is our duty to be ever prepared thus to lay down our life. However wicked the man, if we die rather than yield to his physical strength, what after all can he do to us? It is possible that a wicked man may give up his wickedness when faced with a pure-minded person, who is quite prepared to die. Thus satyagraha is twice blessed. It blesses him who offers it and also him against whom it is offered.

[From Gujarati]

_Bapuna Patro—Ashramni Behnone_, pp. 77-97
209. LETTER TO MAHARAJA OF NABHA

AS AT THE ASHRAM, SABARMATI,
January 1, 1927

DEAR FRIEND⁴

I was distressed to find that a resolution was brought up before the Congress² in connection with yourself. I understood also that the resolution was brought at your desire and instance. When it was first brought to my notice, I told Sardar Sardul Singh that it would be injurious to press the resolution. I told him that even whilst I was ailing in Poona¹ I had studied your Highness’s papers and I was satisfied that yours was not a case for public agitation and that if any relief was to be expected, it was to be had only through proper diplomatic channels which really do not admit of public agitation. I told Sardar Sardul Singh further that it would be wrong for the Congress to be identified with the agitation and it would be harmful to your own cause. Nevertheless, in the absence of Pundit Motilalji and myself, the resolution was brought up before the Subjects Committee which, in my opinion unthinkingly and hastily, adopted it. The following morning I was informed of the event. Pundit Motilalji was equally distressed with me to find that the resolution was passed. And it was only then that I heard that Pundit Motilalji was your legal adviser. As a lawyer of some experience I think that a client does grave injury to his cause who behind the back of his legal adviser adopts means of redressing the wrong which he entrusted to a chosen adviser. I further learn that you were so impatient to be reinstalled that you were paying heavy sums to all sorts of men who at all held out hope of securing relief for you. As a friend and servant of India and therefore of your Highness, I have no hesitation in saying that if you have been paying people in the manner described to me, you are but injuring your cause and your reputation. I think that you could restrain all your friends, however well-meaning they may be from carrying on public agitation such as ventilating your case before the Congress, that you should be true to your legal adviser and should do nothing behind his back, and that if you have a good case, you will get relief only through proper and clean diplomatic channels. Lastly, I repeat what I have said to the Sikh friends who, I expect, saw me on

¹ Ripudamansing Malavendra Bahadur, deposed ruler of Nabha
² At the Gauhati session of the Congress on December 27, 1926, a resolution was moved regarding the addressee’s restoration; vide “Speech at Congress Session, Gauhati”, 28-12-1926; background information, vide also “Statement on Akali Movement”, 4-3-1924 and “Advice to Akalis”, 9-3-1924.
³ In January, 1924

480 THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
your behalf and who were hurt because I had intervened and persuaded the Subjects Committee to reconsider and reverse its decision. If they thought I had not properly studied the case or there were any documents which had not been shown to me by the Sikh deputation that had seen me at the Sassoon Hospital I would be prepared patiently to go through the case and give my opinion. You must have seen that the Subjects Committee has referred the case to the Working Committee for examination, if the matter is brought before it on your behalf, and for confidential report.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

HIS HIGHNESS THE MAHARAJA OF NABHA
DEHRADUN

From a copy: C.W. 10704. Courtesy: Jamia Millia Library

210. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

[January 1, 1927]

CHRI MANI,

I have your letter. Read the letter on the reverse. I am thinking of sending you for this work. Only you or Mirabehn can work there. The girls there would be Sindhi and so knowledge of English and Hindi would be necessary. We cannot send Mirabehn as yet. I, therefore, should like you to go. If you decide to do so let me know.

Whether you feel happy or not, you have to stay in the Ashram, that is to say, with me. Pour out your heart to me and exact from me a mother’s duties. Are you sure that the reason for your lack of interest is not the absence of a life-companion? A well-wisher of yours emphatically advised me that I should get you married. The suggestion was made as we were talking about a certain young man. He is not a Patidar, but is a deserving youth. I said that I had no fear on your account. I see no signs at present to suggest that you may wish to get married. He then told me that I did not know you. You can see from my language that I am not joking this time. Reply to me

1 In March 1924
2 For Gandhiji’s further correspondence with the addressee, vide “Letter to Maharaja of Nabha”, 28-5-1927.
3 As in the printed source
4 Dated 20-12-1926, from Narayandas Anandji of Karachi, asking Gandhiji to depute a competent lady from Gujarat to teach takli-spinning in the Municipal Girls’ Schools of Karachi without any fear. One thing is certain, that a girl who wants to remain unmarried all her life should be brave. She should remain cheerful otherwise people would say that she should be married off.

Blessings from

BAPU

CHI. MANIBEHN PATEL
SATYAGRAHA ASHRAM
SABARMATI

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelne, pp. 43-4

211. LETTER TO MAZHARUL HAQUE

January 1, 1927

MY DEAR FRIEND,

Writing to you became necessary as we did not meet at Sivan. I do not have your original letter on Hindu-Muslim unity. Therefore I cannot speak more than what I wrote on the piece of paper last Monday. Today again is Monday, when I am free.

If Mahadev really understands you, you have stopped trusting me because of my article published on Swami Shraddhanand. And he told me that the reason of your distrust is only one sentence, i.e., ‘The Muslims enjoy much more freedom in using the sword and pistol’. If I write something on the basis of my faith, then why not believe me. Can I retain the faith of my friends only by accepting what they do. If my statement is wrong, you should oppose it and keep me away from it sympathetically but you should go on believing me till you are able to say that I am not partial towards any religion or caste and, what I write, I really believe in it.

If there are some other things in my article which have hurt you, tell me about them and correct me. Do not stop believing in me. The trust that has stood the test of time, should not disappear because of my one single article.

Now, take the statement. I had some fixed opinion about Muslims since the day I knew them. Because of this, when I came out of jail, I wrote all those things without reading anything about them. They are based on my long personal experience and unbiased opinion of friends. These friends are as unbiased as I feel you are. In fact, many Muslims have made the unrestricted use of [violence in the name of] their religion. Just tell me how I can distrust my own eyes or friends whom I trust.

However, despite this, I love Muslims. It is not their fault but it is the fault of their circumstances.

Peace is the message of the ‘New Testament’ and yet the behaviour of a Christian is violent as it appears to me. But this faith of mine does not stop me from loving them and appreciating the good things in the ‘New Testament’.

I had thought of writing to you that very time when you did not like my article. This is the least one can expect from friends. You should not mind it. But now that I invite you, you should find out the facts for me. You should not think that I had not written to you because of your differences on my article.

I do not expect that my friends should agree with whatever I say. It is enough if we shared a common goal and I trusted them. If there were differences and all of them were to be sorted out, life would become a burden. But the differences that hurt should certainly be resolved.

Now, let the white beard do some cleaning up.

With love.

Yours,

M. K. GANDHI

[From Hindi]

Ashiyana Ki Awaz, pp. 45-6
DEAR FRIEND,

I find, at last, an hour for conversing with you—, and, through you, with your Bapu.

I am replying to your letter of the end of July, and I return to my regrets that Gandhi could not take part in the conference for Christian Young Men at Helsingfors. Those regrets are accentuated since my meeting with several of these young men and with K. T. Paul.

The question is in no way, as you think, one of a fashionable enthusiasm for Gandhiji’s person, or a superficial infatuation for the doctrine of Gandhi. No, there is not even a question of it,—the fact, more unexpected, but indisputable, is that the person, the action, the life and the faith of Gandhi have been the strongest stimulant for European Christianity. Neither you nor Gandhi could have expected it; and it was scarcely the goal for which the Mahatma was searching. But great actions have unexpected repercussions; and often their effect equals or surpasses in importance the effect which had been expected and wished by the man of God. Because, after all, it is not he who acts; it is, by his means, God.

The fact is then that Young Christian Europe has seen in Gandhi the purest Christian (without knowing it) of today,—the man who, over and above all the priests and pastors, resumes the direct tradition with the spirit of the Gospel.

That he has found himself in possession of immense influence over these young Christians, for interpreting to them their own doctrine, and for showing them the path in an hour of agonizing uncertainties and doubts.

Once more, it may be, that Gandhi did not wish this. But once more, another greater than he willed it for him. And he has not the right to escape from it in the future. Because, however imperious may be his Indian task, the human task envelopes it and surpasses it. And whatever may be his personal faith in Hinduism,—the most ardent fire, the most divine of all faith, the eternal is that which feels sin common with all, and not that which differentiates God is in the centre of the Bush. And he who hears Him speak, and repeats what He says, speaks for all.

Translated from the French by Mirabehn
. . . Now, the Christianity of today is consumed by the anguish of a problem of conscience and faith, that not one of her chief's or official representatives has the power to solve. I find acute expression of this in the works of a professor of the University of Rome which I have just received. Ubi Christianus? and Doctrina di cristo, by Luigi Trafelli—the author, who is undoubtedly a tortured conscience, starts with the declaration that the “Metanoia” or “evangelical conversion” where the preaching of Jesus begins, is an absolute overthrow and the complete transformation of the values, which, in the normal life of men, are the most appreciated. It is necessary to strip “the old man” and to redress “the new man”, who will not be able to enter into the Kingdom of God, if he does not sacrifice all half-duties to the whole duty, and all compromises of the world to the will of perfection. “Be thou then perfect as is thy Father in Heaven.” No concessions to the world. “Leave all and follow Me.”

Now, after having examined the perpetual conflicts of this order with the worldly order, and all the “combinations” imagined by the Church and the pseudo-believers, for reconciling them, Luigi Trafelli asks himself the mournful question: “Do Christians still exist?” and concludes: “No, they exist no more,”—and he admits himself: “I am not a Christian.”—but adds: “At least, I have not got the hypocrisy to call myself Christian, as do the churches, while betraying the express word of Christ.”

This question is made particularly tragic owing to the social crisis, which is passing over Europe,—the world—(and especially the country which is the seat of official catholicism, Italy).

At the present hour, the power of the State in Italy has reached a sovereignty which is veritably demoniac. Everything is sacrificed to it, religious conscience is trampled under its feet. The individual soul is annihilated. He who resists the “public will” (translated by one or two leaders who incarnate it) is or will be crushed. A Mussolini, with formidable cynicism, displays this doctrine, accepted by millions of Italians, which will certainly spread before long in Europe and America (above all, in America).

Now, what are the guides of religious conscience doing at this hour? They dare not take the responsibility of the nameless sufferings into which they would throw those who ask their advice, by saying to them, “Resist! Be persecuted!” the worst, the most mediocre think of their tranquillity. The best remind themselves of old Tolstoy who was in despair at seeing his disciples persecuted while he could not succeed in getting persecuted himself: because power is too cunning not to treat with care the men who are in broad daylight, and severely the obscure. The result is that all search for and teach compromises—the inner lie; and the soul degrades itself.

The young men realize this, they listen for the voice of the gospel which will say to them:

“The duty is there—the voice speaks not. They are left—it is for this reason that so many young Christians look towards Gandhi.

. . . You say to me, my friend, that it is for me to reply to them. . . . No. I cannot. It is necessary to see me as I am, and not lend to me a faith, thoughts, a mission that I have not got.

I am not a Christian, I am not a Gandhist, I am not a believer in a revealed religion. I am a man of the Occident who, in all love and in all sincerity, searches for the truth. That which I strive to teach to myself is for others, it is never to believe one's own thoughts, never to say that one knows that which one only “believes” or hopes, to say exactly that which one knows,—nothing more,—and, be it that one understands or does not understand, to conserve intact energy and love. The word of the Introduction to The Life of Michael Angelo “See men and life as they are,—and as they are, love them and act . . .”

There is my role. And it is also to discover and make known to others all the sources of strength, all the hearths of light, which exist in the world. To the heroes and the saints I say: “Take, and drink!”

But my role is not to speak in the name of a religion which I have not. Let those speak who have!

. . . We have lately had a visit from a gay American who is making an express tour of all the celebrated men of the globe; five minutes for each one. His name is Buchanan, and he has seen Gandhi at the beginning of the year. He says that Gandhi said, regarding my book on him: “It is literature” (“C’est de la litterature”) it is not altogether just. It should be said: “It is love” (“C’est de l’amour”). Everybody knows that love does not see very exactly. My book must often be erroneous. How could it be otherwise? I knew nothing of the atmosphere of India, or of the language. I made the tour de force in six to twelve months, from imagination, after the books I had read, all a great life, and that of a people who were far away and unknown to me. It was very audacious! But love did not give me the liberty not to imagine, and—that which I loved, my joy, my enthusiasm,—not to share them with my brothers of Europe. In that, I believe I have succeeded. If I have sometimes often misrepresented the character and the thought of Gandhi, may he pardon me. I have often asked myself what Christ would have thought of the narratives of his disciples! In any case, true or false, I have not written for “literature”. (The litterateurs scarcely consider me as one of them). I wrote to relieve my heart.

. . . We are pretty well, in spite of the fact that I have just been laid up for a fortnight with intestinal fever. Madeleine has spent a little time in Savoie and we have had beautiful walks together. Since August the splendor of the summer has been marvellous.

I am not surprised that you feel yourself “at home” in India. Did not you tell us that you have gipsy blood? And you have seen that, according to the latest discoveries the gipsies unquestionably had India for their cradle. You return to your point of departure.
Madeleine and I send you our most affectionate thoughts. To Bapu my filial respect,—in spite of the fact that I am corporally older than him. But the soul belongs to other cycles of time to the body.

Yours,
ROMAIN ROLLAND

From a photostat: S.N. 12174

APPENDIX II
ROMAIN ROLLAND’S LETTER TO GANDHIJI

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your good letter1 that Mira has sent me. I thank you cordially for it. But I do not understand at all what the Poet could have told you. I never said or wrote anything to Tagore regarding your article in the Liber-Amicorum. I have never spoken about it to any of the Poet’s party. If I had done so, it would have only been to express joy which those words have given me and the gratitude I have felt. How could the idea have entered my mind to complain of a judgment like yours? I consider it an honour of my life to have been able to place myself at your service and to have spread your thoughts in the world.

I claim this role of free servitor—far far from protesting against it! And I am grieved to see that such thoughts have been attributed to me.

I cannot understand this at all. These are without doubt baseless reports which start without cause and are magnified in circulation, and lead to so much misunderstanding. This one must be entirely [ef] faced, for it has absolutely no basis.

Dear friend, I love you and revere you. Pray remain to the end of your life towards me and all others what you always have been, the absolutely sincere man who does not seek to please or flatter, who says not one word more than he thinks. All amour propre disappears in your presence.

From a photostat of the draft in Mahadev Desai’s handwriting: S.N. 13288

APPENDIX III
KENYA INDIANS: D. B. DESAI’S LETTER

BROACH,
December 12, 1926

SIR,

I think you are by now aware that Kenya (British East Africa) Government has decided to levy an additional tax of one pound on every Indian, as a non-native Poll Tax. The Indian Citizens’ Association has sent me now the following cable:

“Additional Poll Tax one pound Asiatics only. Move Press, platform, Congress and Government.”

From this cablegram, I gather that things have become worse and they ask help of the people of India as well as the Government of India, and I have no doubt that both will readily give assistance to Kenya Indians in the matter.

I think it will be of some use if I give you some history as regards this non-native Poll Tax. The ordinance for the collection of this non-native Poll Tax was passed by the British East Africa Government in the year 1912 to collect from every non-native male adult a sum of fifteen rupees per annum from the 1st of January 1913. At this time, i.e., in 1912, there was no Indian Representative—either nominated or elected—on the Kenya Legislative Council; so according to that popular maxim “no taxation without representation”, this non-native Poll Tax of fifteen rupees was both bad and unjust against Indians.

Further up to 1920 in Kenya (then British East Africa) the Indian rupee was a current and legal coin, and from 1912 till the day the currency was changed, a rupee there was equivalent to one shilling and four pence; so Indians used to pay every year Rs. 15 equal to 20s. Subsequently rupee currency was changed to florin currency, making a florin equal to a rupee (or in other words substituting “florins” wherever the word “rupees” appeared in all the local laws and ordinances in British East Africa). By this change of currency florins 15 were charged for this non-native Poll Tax. In the year 1922, a further change in currency was effected in British East Africa (Kenya) whereby shilling currency was introduced in place of florin currency making two shillings equal to a florin. So under the latter change of currency 30s were charged for this tax, thus making this tax of 30 shillings instead of 20 shillings without any fault of the tax-payers. This shows an increase of 50 per cent, which is really, one must admit, unjust.

I further think it will be of interest to you to know that in the territories now known as the “Colony and Protectorate of Kenya” there is included a ten miles coastal strip of land which is under the suzerainty of H.H. the Sultan of Zanzibar and for which the Kenya Government, from the day it assumed the administration in that country, is paying an annual rent to H. H. the Sultan of Zanzibar. And under the treaty which has been made by the British Government with the Sultan of Zanzibar, it has been agreed inter alia that no new taxes will be imposed, save and except those enumerated and mentioned in the said treaty upon the residents residing in this ten miles strip and it is understood that the British Government has not got the sanction of H. H. the Sultan of Zanzibar with regard to the levy of this non-native Poll Tax.

Last month the Kenya Legislative Council has passed the Non-Native Poll Tax (amendment) Ordinance whereby the Government will charge every non-native male Asiatic 50 instead of 30 shillings stated above. The reason advanced for this and other taxation (of which particulars will be found mentioned below) is to provide for educational facilities to European and Indian children. But the Government of Kenya, it seems to me, has forgotten, when advancing the above reason, that from the beginning till now the Government of Kenya has spent considerably large amounts after European children’s education neglecting and at the cost of Indian children’s education, and the provision was hitherto made from “General Taxation”. But now in order to tax the Indian community, it seems to me, the Government has engineered this new device which, in my opinion, is both inequitable and unjust.

From the Minority Report which has been submitted by the Hon. Messrs J. B. Pandya and Shamsud Deen, the two nominated Indian members to the Kenya Legislative Council, it appears that the Kenya Government requires £52,000 for education purposes and this sum is to be earmarked as follows:

- Europeans £32,000 for 960 children, i.e., about £33 17s per head
- Indians £20,000 for 2,318 children, i.e., about £812s per head

So from this one could easily understand how Indian education in Kenya is neglected. Over and above the number of children mentioned above there are 2,547 Indian children without any means of education. Further, I think, it will not be out of place here to mention to you that school-going children pay 2s, 4s and 8s per month according to the standard in which they study, which will also mean that Indian children are contributing much more than their European brothers and sisters and this fact the Government of Kenya has omitted to take into its consideration.

As stated in the Majority Report (which is signed by the Colonial Secretary to the Government of Kenya as one of the Members of the Committee), which is submitted to the Kenya Government (and of which report the Governor has spoken in very high terms) and which is passed by the Kenya Legislative Council, the said amount of £52,000 has been raised in the following way:

- Spirits £25,000; Wines £7,000; Champagnes £500;
- Male domestic servants £7,000 (from Europeans only) and Asiatic Poll Tax £12,000.

It is alleged and assumed in the said Majority Report that for the first three items which are to produce £32,500 in taxation, £24,500 will be contributed by the Europeans and the rest by the Indians. But as the Kenya Government keeps no record to show the proportion, it will be unwise to arrive at any assumption. Barring this £32,500 there remains £19,000 in the new taxation which are divided between the Europeans and the Indians; the former contribute £7,000 and the latter £12,000.

The domestic servants’ tax which is mentioned in the above paragraph is to be payable “at the rate of two shillings per mensem on every male domestic servant above the apparent age of sixteen and in excess of two servants per household” which will mean that there will be many families which will not be burdened with this tax, which is not an individual tax, while in the case of the additional Asiatic Poll Tax every male adult Asiatic will have to pay 20s extra. Here too there is an open injustice.

One of the members who has signed the said Majority Report has stated during the debate in the Kenya Legislative Council, “With regard to the Poll Tax, this was especially put in to meet the requirements of the Indian community, as it was felt that the Indian community did not spend money in the country on luxuries like Europeans did, but sent it out of the country.” From the above statement one naturally gathers the prejudices which are working in the matter of levying of this new tax. The only motive for the new additional one pound poll tax, to my mind, is to harass the law-abiding Indian citizens of Kenya by the Kenya Government which is in the hands of the Kenya white settlers practically speaking.

On behalf of the Kenya Indians I have to request you to take this matter up and do the needful justice to this subject as occasions require. Your advice to Kenya Indians will be appreciated. I may in the end mention that if the people in India and the Government of India will not take steps to cause this new additional tax to be removed, the Kenya Government will start collecting it from the 1st January, 1927 and if it is once collected it will be very difficult, as I understand it, to get it removed. I think the Gauhati Congress should take this matter up.

Yours, etc.,

D.B. Desai

Young India, 23-12-1926
1. SPEECH AT MEETING OF DEPRESSED-CLASS SCHOOLS, CALCUTTA

January 2, 1927

Mahatmaji in reply said that he never knew that the members of the depressed classes would present him with an address. He felt their troubles and untold miseries and he sometimes wanted to become an untouchable so that he would clearly realize their position in the country. Mahatmaji was sorry to say that the members of the Hindu community were not helping them in any way. On the other hand, they were having their service in the way of labour. The country would be ruined if that feeling prevailed in the Hindu community. Swami Shraddhanand who had sacrificed his valuable life in removing untouchability from the country had said that, if he saw that the Hindus were keeping at least one depressed-class boy in their house, he would think that the Hindus were really feeling for the untouchables in the country. Before that Swamiji expected that they should give up the habit of drinking, gambling, and other vices which always kept them behind the other communities in the country.

Continuing, Mahatmaji said that Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya had issued an appeal to collect five lakhs of rupees to complete the shuddhi and sangathan movement of Swami Shraddhanand. Malaviyaji did not expect any money from them as he knew the members of the Hindu community would fulfil his desire for their good. Still as a mark of respect to the sacred memory of Swami [Shraddhanand] they should collect some money among themselves and approach Malaviyaji with the purse.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 4-1-1927

2. SPEECH AT CHITTARANJAN SEVA SADAN, CALCUTTA

[January 2, 1927]1

In declaring the foundation to be well and truly laid,2 Gandhiji emphasized what Dr. Nilratan Sarkar had described as the spiritual unity between Deshbandhu and Gandhiji which had become, if possible, more real after Deshbandhu’s death. He had no doubt that, if Deshbandhu’s energies had not been absorbed, like all other political leaders’, by politics owing to the peculiar conditions of enslaved India, he

---

1 Gandhiji was replying to an address of welcome presented by the students of sixteen depressed-class schools in Calcutta and Howrah. The meeting was held at Mirzapur Park, Calcutta.

2 Extracted from Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”

3 The date is taken from the Forward report.

4 Two annexes for the Obstetric Ward and X-Ray Block of the Seva Sadan—the Deshbandhu Memorial Hospital

VOL. 38 : 2 JANUARY, 1927 - 3 JUNE, 1927
would have entirely devoted himself to religious reform and to the service of Daridranarayana. But Deshbandhu believed, said Gandhiji, in following the lesson of the Gita—Do your immediate duty, even though other duties may seem to be superior—and if he seemed that day to be laying the foundation of an ordinary maternity home, he was sure that from the point of view of Deshbandhu it was a step forward to swaraj. He then alluded to the suspicion expressed in some quarters that the Bengalis being of a parochial outlook, the memorial would also take a parochial character.

I would not mind the Bengalis absorbing the whole of India in Bengal, for then the old Panditji from the U.P. and myself, an old Bania from Gujarat, would be left free to have some rest. I would not mind in the least the whole of India being absorbed in Bengal that gave birth to Rabindranath, Ram Mohan Roy, Keshub Chandra Sen, Ramakrishna Paramahansa and Vivekanand, Bengal which was hallowed by the sacred feet of Chaitanya, Bengal which is sanctified by the sacred rivers the Ganges and the Brahmaputra. But the fear is baseless, as Dr. Bidhan Roy has declared on behalf of the trustees, that Seva Sadan would be conducted on the same broad lines as [those on which] Deshbandhu served the Motherland. The institution is a living tribute to one who had the emancipation of women at heart, those down-trodden sisters of ours who are the victims of our lust and passion. It does not belong to this or that trustee, it belongs to the nation. Let us strive to make it worthy of Deshbandhu and let it immortalize his memory in India.

Young India, 13-1-1927

3. SPEECH AT KEORAHTALA CREMATION GROUND, CALCUTTA

January 2, 1927

Mahatma Gandhi made a short speech on the occasion. He said that he laid the foundation of a memorial in honour of one of the greatest patriots of Bengal, nay, of whole India. Mahatma Gandhi thought himself very fortunate in performing the ceremony. He regretted that he could not come into intimate acquaintance with Aswini Babu. When Mahatmaji was in South Africa, he used to read newspapers during the Bengal Partition days and it was there that he got acquainted with Aswini Babu’s

---

1. God in the form of the destitute
2. Madan Mohan Malaviya
3. Gandhiji was laying the foundation for a memorial to Aswini Kumar Dutta.
works through the papers.

On his return to India, Mahatmaji continued, he had the privilege to have darshan of the late Aswini Kumar Dutt and that was during his Bengal tour when he went to Barisal. At Barisal, as soon as he got down from the steamer, he was told that Aswini Babu was lying on sick-bed and hence could not come to welcome him. So he thought it his first and foremost duty to go directly and see the great patriot on his sick-bed. He still remembered that loving look when he met Aswini Babu and he could never forget it.

Mahatmaji next recognized that the lesson we learnt from the life of Aswini Kumar was that only those could be the worshippers of the motherland who had given up all pleasures of life and sacrificed all their desires for the cause of the country. Mahatmaji advised young Indians to learn the spirit in which Aswini Kumar led his life, and that was the lesson that every young man should learn from the life of the great men of the world.

Mahatmaji further said that many things could be heard about many people in the papers, but until and unless one could come in contact with those men, one was not able to get the truth about them. When Mahatmaji came in close contact with Aswini Dutt, he realized the absolute truth of what he had read in the papers.

Mahatmaji, in conclusion, appealed to young men to mix with such great men and follow in their footsteps if they wanted to serve the country, and the only true memorial that they could raise in the name of such great men was only to follow in their footsteps.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 4-1-1927

4. SPEECH AT KHADI PRATISHTHAN, SODEPUR

[January, 1927]

You will see that he has staked his all on Khadi. Many of you will think that he has gone mad, but I tell you it is faith that moves mountains, and Satis Babu has faith in khadi, and the determination that he must stop, as much as he can, the lakhs of rupees worth of foreign cloth that is dumped every day in the Calcutta market.

In response to his appeal for collections, Rs. 500 were collected on the spot and Rs. 3,000 and odd were promised.

Young India, 13-1-1927

Gandhiji was opening the Kalashala of Khadi Pratishthan, established by Satis Chandra Das Gupta, at Sodepur, near Calcutta. The report is extracted from Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”.

The date is taken from the Hindu report.

Satis Chandra Das Gupta
5. LETTER TO GANGABEHN VAIDYA

[After January 2, 1927]

CHI. GANGABEHN,

I find that you make mistakes in gender. In the Kutchhi dialect there are only [two] genders—feminine and masculine. But in Gujarati there is a third, the neuter gender. You say ghar kevo, while in Gujarati we say ghar kevun, you say tamaro sharir, while in Gujarati we would say tamarun sharir. You will find it interesting to compare the two languages in this manner and will be able to correct your mistakes more easily. Such mental exercise will also develop your intellect.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 8703. Courtesy: Gangabehn Vaidya

6. TELEGRAM TO PARASHU RAM MEHROTRA

CALCUTTA,

January 3, 1927

PARASHU RAM

SATYAGRAHA ASHRAM

WARDHA

YOU MAY DEVOTE FOR [TNIGHT] STREEDARPAN.

BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 7487; also C.W. 4962

1 The letter was in reply to one from the addressee dated January 2, 1927.
2 Gujarati expression for “What kind of a house”; the adjective is in the masculine gender and in the second expression in the neuter gender.
3 Gujarati expression for “What kind of a house”; the adjective is in the neuter gender.
4 Gujarati expression for “Your body”; the adjective is in the masculine gender.
5 Gujarati expression “Your body”; the adjective is in the neuter gender.
6 This part of the original is damaged.
7 Streedarpan was a Hindi magazine devoted to social topics, edited by Mehrotra before he joined the Ashram. He had sought leave of absence from Gandhiji for attending to its financial problems.
7. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

January 3, 1927

CHI. MIRA,

I have your two letters. I see what you are passing through and I am glad of it. You have to love humanity in spite of itself. The Ashram is finally not at Sabarmati but in yourself. The vilest beings must enter there purified. That is the meaning of treating all alike and in this universe of opposites remaining unaffected even as the lotus remains unaffected by water though immersed in it.

I understand your programme. You may carry it out. I continue to send you letters to Kanya Gurukul till I hear from you again.

I suppose in the circumstances related by you, you will not advice me to send anybody to the place as a pupil.

I am writing this at Sodepur, a suburb of Calcutta, where Satis Babu has built his Khadi Works. It is a great effort. It has cost nearly Rs. 80,000.

We leave for Comilla tomorrow as per programme sent to you. But for future guidance, it would be well to note that when in doubt send to the last address.

You will be interested in the enclosed which was handed to me by a friend.

With love.

BAPU

From the original: C.W. 5194. Courtesy: Mirabehn

8. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

[SODEPUR,]

Monday [January 3, 1927]

CHI. MANI,

I had hoped to get a letter from you but so far I have not had any. I hope you are keeping good health, both of body and mind. You must be making rapid progress in Sanskrit. Write to me in detail. I shall be in Comilla till the 6th, and in Kashi till the 9th. In Kashi, address the letter at “Gandhi Ashram, Banaras Cantonment”. Write to Father. He seems to be worrying about you. We are all well.

Blessings from

BAPU

SHRIMATI MANIBEHN
SATYAGRAHA ASHRAM
WARDHA, B. N. RLY

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelne, p. 44

9. LETTER TO ASHRAM WOMEN

SODEPUR,
Monday, Magsar Vad O¹, January 3, 1927

DEAR SISTERS,

This time I have not yet received your weekly letter. We have shifted today to the new buildings erected on the land purchased by the Khadi Pratishthan. They have built many small houses here. The houses took only nine months to build. The processes of washing, bleaching and dyeing khaddar with the aid of machines are now carried on here. There was a big gathering here yesterday. The atten dance was very good. I thought that I should ask for a collection from the audience; I did, and got about Rs. 3,500/-.

Prayers are held here just as we hold them there. The verses which they recite are also the same. But their recitation is out of tune, compared to ours, and so it jars a little on the ear. But gradually they will improve.

Perinbehn, Mithubehn and Jannabehn are still with me. They are carrying on their khadi work. They have sold about half the stock they had brought with them.

It is a very good thing that your prayers are held regularly. I note that they are also well attended. Do not forget that spinning is yajna. The Gita says that he who eats food without offering yajna eats stolen food. ‘Yajna’ means work done for the good of others. For us spinning is such public work.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 3633

¹ The new moon day
10. LETTER TO PRABHASHANKAR PATTANI

ON THE TRAIN,

January 4, 1927

BHAISHRI,

You ask me not to write merely to acknowledge your letters, and want to know when I am going to Kathiawar. I must reply, then. I am hoping that I shall be there in the beginning of March.¹

Look after your health.

Vandemataram from

Mohanandas

[PS.]

If the Hindus forgive Abdul Rashid², what can be more welcome than that?

From a photostat of the Gujarati: C.W. 3210. Courtesy: Mahesh Pattani

11. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI

Tuesday [January 4, 1927]³

CHI. RAMDAS,

I write this on the train. Regarding towels . . .⁴ to Pattani Saheb and others. There are many hospitals in Kathiawar. All the towels can be easily sold among them. After buying from Gondal did you not buy khadi at all or did you buy it from somewhere else? I am making arrangements for the rent to be paid by aunt. I will not leave her without any means of support. Manilal⁵ is going to the Ashram.

Blessings from

Bapu

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 6852

¹ The Kathiawar Political Conference was to be held at Porbandar in March.
² Assassin of Shraddhanand
³ From the postmark
⁴ Some words are missing in the source.
⁵ Manilal Gandhi who had come to India from South Africa
12. PRAYER DISCOURSE AT ABHOY ASHRAM¹, COMILLA

[January 5, 1927]²

You are the pioneers and like the Jamnotri and Gangotri.³ Be you as those two streams. As I think of you I picture to myself two fine horses running abreast and drawing the khadi carriage at full speed, vying with each other. You have achieved a unique success inasmuch as you do not depend on extra-provincial help for the sale of your products. You have bent the women of Bengal to your will—all honour to them—and they are proud today to wear saris that you supply to them. Let then the strength and weakness of each be the strength and weakness of the other, and let the Khadi Pratishthan look in its hour of difficulties to the Abhoy Ashram, and vice versa.

Young India, 13-1-1927

13. SPEECH AT VILLAGERS’ MEETING, COMILLA

January 5, 1927

The Mahatma with his party visited two Namsudra villages, viz., Rajapura and Muradpur, near about the Ashram and addressed the inhabitants in Hindi. The Mahatma was received by the villagers, men, women and children with hullas⁴, and the blowing of conch-shells and sankirtans⁵. His message to them was not to consider themselves lower than others and not to imitate the bad habits of the so-called higher classes. He asked them to give up drinking and to lead a simple and honest life. He specially dwelt upon the importance and utility of khaddar and exhorted them to follow the examples of the members of the Abhoy Ashram.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 7-1-1927

¹ Institution run by Dr. Suresh Chandra Bannerji. The Ashram conducted seven schools for untouchables and also ran a khadi store. Only the concluding remarks of a long talk at the prayer are available.
² The report is extracted from Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter” where no date has been assigned to it, but it is placed before the report of the public meeting, which took place on January 5.
³ The reference is to the Khadi Pratishthan and the Abhoy Ashram.
⁴ Sound uttered by women of Bengal on auspicious occasions as a sign of welcome.
⁵ Devotional mass singing
14. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, COMILLA

January 5, 1927

You have been so kind to me in giving me permission to speak in Hindi. If only because I want to show you my appreciation of your kindness, I propose to say a few words to you in English. Every time that I am obliged to speak in the English language before an audience of my countrymen, I feel humiliated and ashamed. I have urged upon Bengali audiences several times not to put an undue strain upon my loyalty, not to put an undue strain upon Bharatamata herself. It is the easiest thing possible for every Indian north of the Vindhya range to pick up Hindi inside of a month. Try it and tell me if what I say is not true. Let us not say that our mother tongue is only Bengali or Gujarati or Punjabi, as the case may be. These are provincial languages. When we sing that ode to the Motherland—Bande Mataram, we sing it to the whole of India. When Bankim Chatterji wrote the inspired song he said saptakoti bhujaih. But you and others deliberately said dwi-trimshatkoti bhujaih and it was proper. It was proper and dignified on your part to sing of dwi-trimshatkoti bhujaih, and it was proper and dignified for the whole of India to accept that magnificent ode. Shall we not then live up to it and sing with all our hearts and say we are sons of Mother India, not merely sons of Bengal? I ask you, therefore, next time I happen to come here or you invite me to come, to insist upon my speaking to you in Hindi and Hindi alone. That is one thing.

We have seen the last of the last session of the Congress. On the sacred banks of the Brahmaputra, in the midst of that magnificent foliage and scenery almost unrivalled in the world, our leaders deliberated. They have evolved a Council programme. But how many of us can take a direct part in the working of that programme? How many of us can enter Councils and the Legislative Assembly? How many of us are entitled to elect members to these legislative bodies? Are the millions of the villagers of India enfranchised? Is India living in her 10 or 20 cities, or is she living in her 700,000 villages? What then is the programme that can weld together the 30 crores of people scattered on a surface 1,900 miles long and 1,500 miles broad in...
700,000 villages? What is it that every villager, man, woman and child, Hindu and Mussalman, can do with profit and, at the same time, uplift the whole of India? The one and unequivocal answer is the spinning-wheel and khaddar. The message of khaddar can penetrate to remotest villages if we only will that it shall be so. The spinning-wheel can be turned by millions of the villagers of India who have been reduced to pauperism, who have been ground down to dust, not merely under the foreigner’s heels but under your heels, under my heels. We the city-dwellers are living upon the labour, upon the wealth of these millions of villagers; not like the Americans, not like the Englishmen, who live upon the exploitation of Asiatic races or the so-called weaker races of the earth. Even they would be obliged to take up the spinning-wheel or any equivalent if they were not able to exploit India, China, Africa and other parts of the earth. We do not exploit them, because it is a virtue of necessity with us. But I hope that a time is coming when out of the fullness of our hearts, out of a wider national outlook, we shall disdain of our own free will to exploit a single nation of the earth, no matter how weak. I hope that in your lifetime and mine that time is coming when we shall reach our freedom and having reached it, we shall say to all the nations of the earth that they need not fear us, as we have lived in perpetual fear of the so-called civilized races of the earth. You may not believe me today. You may call me, if you like, a mad man. But the time is coming when you will say that what this old man said was right and that, if India was really to prosper in her villages and not in her cities, the spinning-wheel was the only instrument of India’s prosperity and India’s freedom.

And hence it was that you saw the phenomenon at Gauhati, which I did not expect, which I had not asked for, however much I desired it. But you saw at Gauhati the extraordinary phenomenon of the Congress franchise being improved along khaddar lines. I know there were bickerings about it. But I also know that it was the pressure of the popular mind that extorted that improvement in the franchise. The leaders made that important improvement because they saw that khaddar and khaddar alone was the only passport to the hearts of the villagers. Let me assure you that it was khaddar that won the elections for the Swarajists. You may not know, or perhaps you know, that in Madras even those who were otherwise opposed to khaddar were obliged to take it up at the time of appealing to the electorate, and as the days roll on, you will find that khaddar will gain in importance, because it has intrinsic worth about it; and because no national popular organization contains for its working so many self-sacrificing, able, young, educated men as the khaddar organization; because no organization is capable of giving employment to an almost unlimited number of patriotic youths who will be content with an honourable livelihood and who will be content to pass their lives in the closest touch with the villagers and share their food, their sorrows and joys. I invite you to show me a single other organization which has that capacity in it.

Believe me, khaddar is not a dying cult. There is no fall in the barometer of khaddar. Five year’s experience show that it has been an undoubtedly gradual, but a steady and hopeful rise. It could not have been otherwise. Because India wants it, because India’s millions require full means in order to sustain their energy, therefore the Congress has passed the resolution making it necessary for Congress-men to wear khaddar habitually and not merely on ceremonial occasions. They may wear mill-cloth on rare occasions, when it is absolutely necessary for their bread and butter; but they dare not, if they are honest Congressmen, habitually wear anything but hand-spun and hand-woven khaddar.

And now a word about untouchability. A great hero and patriot Swami Shradhanandji died for the sake of the untouchables. He loved them as dearly as his own life. He regarded them as his own children, and, if it was in his power, he would have banished untouchability from the shores of India. And what does that banishment mean? It means universal love. It means translating into action the great message of the Bhagavad Gita which is: Treat the Brahmin and the Bhangi alike, if you would but know God. But how are they alike? A Brahmin is any day superior to the Bhangi in learning, and how am I to treat both alike? The Bhagavad Gita says that you should treat them even as you would wish to be treated by them, or even as you would treat yourself:

अत्मववस्थाृपुरुषाः पश्चायिसि पश्चायिः

That is the teaching of the Bhagavad Gita. That hero and martyr translated this teaching into action in his own life and he has sanctified it, and sealed it with his blood. Let that blood purify us, and let it remove the last taint of any isolation or aloofness that we may be harbouring against those brothers of ours whom in our arrogance we call untouchables. They are not untouchables, we are untouchables. Let them have every attention, every kindness that they deserve from 1 This is not to be found in the Bhagavat Gita; cf., however, VI, 29 & 32, with one of which, it is possible, Gandhiji confused it.

---

us. During my Comilla visit, I have seen two villages which are predominantly occupied by the so-called untouchables. Had I not been told, I should not have known that the people I saw were untouchables. I could see no difference between them and the others who were standing with them there. They eat and drink and think and feel even as we do. If a sum-total of their virtues and vices and the privileges they are denied were to be made and compared with our virtues and vices and the privileges we enjoy and deny to them, I am sure in God’s books we should find our debit side far heavier than theirs. Let us then think no more of any single person on earth as an untouchable. That is the lesson that comes down to us from South Africa too. A just Nemesis has descended upon us there. Just as we are treating our brothers here, our kith and kin are being treated as pariahs and Bhangis in South Africa. The moment we purge ourselves of the sin, the moment we are free from the curse of untouchability, you will find the shackles dropping off our countrymen in South Africa.

I dare not touch the problem of Hindu-Muslim unity. It has passed out of human hands, and has been transferred to God’s hands alone. Even as Draupadi, forsaken by her husbands, forsaken by men and gods alike, asked God and God alone to come to her help, and God gave her unfailing help, so it is with me and so should it be with every one of us. Let us ask for help from God, the All-Powerful and tell Him that we His tiny creatures have failed to do what we ought to do, we hate one another, we distrust one another, we fly at one another’s throat and we even become assassins. Let our heart’s cry then ascend to His throne, and let us wash His feet with tears of blood and ask Him to purge our hearts of all hatred in us. We are disgracing His earth, His name and this sacred land by distrusting and fearing one another. Although we are sons and daughters of the same motherland, although we eat the same food, we have no room for one another. Let us ask God in all humility to give us sense, to give us wisdom.

You have listened to me with the greatest attention. I have given you also what I don’t willingly give to the audience—an English speech, and that also at some length. I now want my reward. I want you tomorrow to come to the Abhoy Ashram and denude it of every yard of khaddar in its store, if my message, the message of the paupers of India, has gone home to you. There you will see a band of workers working for them and for you. They are the link between you and the villagers. They are trying to do their level best to serve the motherland. I want you to put your hands into your pockets and give me what you have and what you can and what you will, not out of shame, not out of any pressure that you may feel because you are in this meeting, not out of patronage for me or affection for me. I shall use your affection for other work if you will give me your affection. But I want you to give me what you can and what you have for the sake of paupers, for the sake of those who do not even get one square meal a day. If you are satisfied that this organization is being worked well, and with ability and self-sacrifice, and if you are convinced that it is not sinful to wear khaddar and it cannot be wrong to wear khaddar woven and spun by your starving countrymen, and that it is right and proper and necessary to do so, you will give your coppers and silver and gold, whatever you may have.

If you have any suspicion about it, any doubts in the matter, I ask you to restrain your hands and not to give me a single pie. If not today, at least on some near date, you will be convinced of the message. But if you are convinced that this is the right thing—although you may not have the strength to carry out the message fully into practice—you will support this great, aye the greatest, national industry. There is no better way of industrializing the villages of India than the spinning-wheel. No man has yet been able to show a better or more effective substitute—I say even an equal substitute—than the spinning-wheel for the millions of Indians who are idle for at least four months in the year, who are starving for want of a square meal, and for whom even one anna a day means a fortune. I plead on behalf of them. May God help you to understand this simple message.

You will recall that last time I was in Bengal, I collected for the All-Bengal Deshbandhu Memorial. That was for what is now the Seva Sadan. I announced then that, in due course, I would collect for the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial. You know that its object was to promote the message of the spinning-wheel. You will thus be contributing to the Memorial by contributing to khaddar.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 7-1-1927; also Young India, 13-1-1927

15. SWAMIJI AS I KNEW HIM

My first acquaintance with Swamiji was when he was Mahatma Munshiram, and that by letter. He was then Governor of Kangri Gurukul, his great original contribution to education. He was not satisfied with the orthodox Western method. He wanted his boys to be saturated with Vedic teaching, and he taught through Hindi, not English. He wanted them to be and remain brahmacharis during their training. He had inspired his boys to contribute to the fund that was then being collected for the Satyagrahis of South Africa. And he wanted them to do so by themselves labouring as coolies for hire; for, was it not a coolies’ fight in South Africa? The boys rose to the occasion, earned full wages and sent them to me. The letter he wrote to me about this incident was written in Hindi. I was addressed as ‘my dear brother’. It endear me to Mahatma Munshiram. We had never met each other before.

Andrews was the link between us. He was anxious that whenever I returned home, I should make the acquaintance of what I used to call his trinity—the Poet, Principal Rudra and Mahatma Munshiram.

From the time of the receipt of that letter, we became brothers-in-arms. We met each other in 1915 at his favourite Gurukul and with each meeting we came closer and knew each other better. His love of ancient India, Sanskrit and Hindi was remarkable. He was undoubtedly a non-co-operator before non-co-operation was born. He was impatient to gain swaraj. He hated untouchability and was anxious to raise the status of the untouchables. He could not brook any restriction upon their freedom.

When the Rowlatt agitation was started, he was among the very first to hail it. He wrote a very warm letter to me. But the suspension of Satyagraha after the Amritsar and Viramgam tragedies he could not understand. From that period our differences commenced but they never once disturbed the brotherly relations that subsisted between us. The differences showed to me his childlike nature. He blurted out the truth as he knew it without regard to consequences. He was daring to a fault. I observed more and more the temperamental differences between us as time progressed but they only proved to me the goodness of the soul in him. To think audibly is no crime, it is a virtue. It is the hallmark of truth. Swamiji thought audibly.

The Bardoli decision broke his heart. He despaired of me. His open protest was most energetic. His private letters to me were still more so but with the emphasis on the differences there was an equal emphasis on love. He was not satisfied with an avowal of love in mere letters. He sought me out as opportunity offered and explained his own position, tried to understand mine. But the real reason, as it seems to me, for seeking me out was to assure me, as if any such assurance was necessary, of undiminished love for me as for a younger brother.

My remarks about the Arya Samaj and its great author and my references to him hurt him deeply; but our friendship was strong enough to bear the strain. He could not understand that it was possible to reconcile my general estimate of the Maharshi with the quality of forgiveness that he had in a boundless measure for personal injury. His devotion to the Maharshi was too great to brook any criticism of him or his teachings.

He has been severely criticized and maligned in the Mussalman Press for his shuddhi movement. I myself could not accept his standpoint. I do not accept it even now. But, in my opinion, he had a complete defence of his own position from his own standpoint. Shuddhi is entitled to the same toleration that is claimed for tablígh so long as either remains within moral and legitimate bounds. But this is not the occasion for entering into an examination of that highly controversial question. Both the tablígh and the shuddhi which is a reply to the former, have to undergo a radical change. Progress of liberal study of religions of the world is bound to revolutionize the existing clumsy method of proselytizing which looks to the form rather than the substance. It is the transference of allegiance from one fold to another and the mutual decrying of rival faiths which gives rise to mutual hatred.

Swamiji’s assassination can be turned to good account by us if we both Hindus and Mussalmans could possibly realize the deeper meaning of shuddhi.

I cannot close the reminiscences of the life of a great reformer without recalling his last visit to the Satyagraha Ashram only a few months ago. Let me assure my Mussalman friends that he was no hater of Mussalmans. He undoubtedly distrusted many Mussalmans. But he bore them no ill will. He thought that Hindus were cowed down and he wanted them to be brave and be able to defend themselves and their honour. In this connection he told me that he was much misunderstood and that he was absolutely innocent of many things that were said against him. He told me he had several threatening letters. He was warned by friends not to travel alone. But this man of faith said, “What protection shall I seek but of God? Not a blade of grass perishes without His will. I know therefore that nothing can happen to me so long as He wishes me to serve through this body.”
During this stay of his he spoke to the boys and girls of the Ashram school. He said the best protection of Hinduism must come from within, from self-purification. He put the greatest emphasis on the need of brahmacharya for the building of character and body.

Young India, 6-1-1927

16. NOTES

SHRADDHANAND MEMORIAL

It is in the fitness of things that there should be an appeal on behalf of the Hindu Mahasabha for funds to perpetuate the memory of the late Swami Shraddhanandji. I congratulate the Sabha on having decided upon inviting collections for carrying on the work for which the Swamiji chiefly lived after his sannyasa. This was removal of untouchability, shuddhi and sangathan. The appeal has been made for five lakhs for untouchability and as many for shuddhi and sangathan. For my own part I still remain unconvinced about the necessity of the shuddhi movement, taking shuddhi in the sense it is generally understood. Shuddhi of sinners is a perpetual inward performance. Shuddhi of those who can be identified neither as Hindus nor as Mussalmans or who have been recently declared converts but who do not know even the meaning of conversion and who want to be known definitely as Hindus is not conversion but prayaschitta or penance. The third aspect of shuddhi is conversion properly so called. And I question its use in this age of growing toleration and enlightenment. I am against conversion whether it is known as shuddhi by Hindus, tabligh by Mussalmans or proselytizing by Christians. Conversion is a heart-process known only to and by God. It must be left to itself. But this is no place for airing my views on conversion. Those who believe in it have a perfect right to follow their own course without let or hindrance, so long as it is kept within proper limits, i.e., so long as there is no force or fraud or material inducement and so long as the parties are free agents and of mature age and understanding. Those, therefore, who believe in shuddhi have a perfect right to subscribe to the appeal.

Sangathan is really a sound movement. Every community is entitled, indeed bound, to organize itself if it is to live as a separate entity. I have kept myself aloof from it because of my peculiar ideas.
of organization. I believe in quality rather than quantity. The fashion nowadays is to rely upon quantity even at the cost of quality. Quantity has its place no doubt in social and political economy. Only I am ill-fitted for organizing quantity in the way it is done at present. Therefore, for me the appeal only for funds for the removal of untouchability has a value. It comes with a force all its own. For reform of Hinduism and for its real protection, removal of untouchability is the greatest thing. It is all-inclusive and, therefore, if this the blackest spot on Hinduism is removed, you have automatically all that shuddhi and sangathan can be expected to yield. And I say this, not because of the vast number of untouchables whom every Hindu should seek to embrace as one of his own but because consciousness of having broken down a barbarous and ancient custom and consequent purity it necessarily implies gives a strength which is irresistible. Removal of untouchability therefore is a spiritual process. Swamiji was a living embodiment of that reformation because he had no half measures about it, because he would not compromise, he would give no quarter. If he could have had his way, he would have made short work of untouchability in Hinduism. He would have opened every well and every temple to every untouchable on conditions of absolute equality and he would have braved all consequences. I can conceive no more fitting memorial to Swami Shraddhanandji than that every Hindu should henceforth purge his heart of the uncleanness which untouchability undoubtedly in and deal with the untouchable as with his own kith and kin. His monetary contribution to the memorial, therefore, will, in my opinion, be merely an earnest of his irrevocable resolution to root out the evil and cast it away once and for all from Hinduism.

The 9th day of January is the day appointed for doing public and religious reverence to the memory of the Swamiji. I hope that the ceremony will be performed in every city and every village. But the ceremony will lose its real significance, if at the same time those who take part in it do not purge themselves of the taint of untouchability. Every untouchable should, therefore, take part in the ceremony; and what a great thing it would be if every temple were thrown open to the untouchables on that day. If an organized effort is made, the collections could be finished without the slightest difficulty before the sun sets on the 9th January.
KHADI BOARD OF STUDIES

In selecting the Board of Studies the Council of the All-India Spinners’ Association had included Dr. Profulla Chandra Ghosh’s name in the Board subject to his acceptance of the office. But as his acceptance was not received owing to his absence from his headquarters in time for publication, the name was withdrawn at the last moment. Dr. Ghosh has now kindly accepted the office. The reader will be glad to learn that the Board will have the assistance of one who has made a study of and has practical experience of the science of charkha and khadi.

PRIZE ESSAY ON HAND-SPINNING

The Prize Essay on Hand-Spinning and Hand-weaving issued by the All-India Spinners’ Association and written by Professor S.V. Puntambekar and Sjt. N. S. Varadachari is a publication which I commend to the attention both of the khadi worker and the sceptic. The khadi worker will find many things in this volume occupying 235 pages of bold type in octavo size, which he perhaps had not known before. It has four chapters. The first gives the history of hand-spinning and hand-weaving in India before the advent of the British. The second deals with the complete ruin of hand-spinning, the greatest national industry, and almost complete ruin of hand-weaving, the second great national industry. The third deals with the possibilities of hand-spinning and hand-weaving and incidentally sets up a comparison between mill-spinning and mill-weaving and hand-spinning and hand-weaving. And the fourth deals with exclusion or boycott of all foreign cloth through the spinning-wheel. The authors give facts and figures for every statement made by them.

The price of the book is one rupee. Copies can be had from the office of the All-India Spinners’ Association, Ahmedabad, or from Mr. S. Ganesan, Current Thought Press, Triplicane, Madras, by sending one rupee and two annas to cover postage.

Young India, 6-1-1927

17. THE CONGRESS

When, in Cawnpore, the Assam delegates gave the invitation to hold the Congress of 1926 at Gauhati and the Congress accepted the invitation I was filled with misgivings. I felt that Assam was too far away, too unorganized and too poor to shoulder the heavy burden of holding a Congress session. Gauhati has a population of only 16,000. No place with such a small population has, before Gauhati, had the temerity to invite the Congress. Gauhati, however, beat all previous records, and in an incredibly short space of time erected, in the midst of surroundings of great natural beauty on the banks of the great Brahmaputra, a city under khadi canvas. The huge Congress pavilion itself was made of pure Assam khadi. The Reception Committee had to import material and men from outside in order to provide for the varied tastes of delegates and visitors from different provinces. Leaders’ quarters were isolated from the delegates’ quarters. When I resented the isolation, I was told that it was not done intentionally, but it had to be done because there was not enough ground available in one single spot to provide accommodation for all. The construction of the cottages was incredibly simple,—Assam bamboo, Assam mud, Assam straw, Assam khadi and Assam labour were responsible for the very simple but artistic huts erected on the Brahmaputra bank. And as Mr. Phookan led me to one of these beautiful huts, he said, “Now it must delight your heart in that we are giving you not a palace miscalled hut, as you had remarked in Belgaum¹, but we are giving you a proper hut, only we cannot claim any merit for it because it is a virtue of necessity; for we could have given you nothing more, nothing less.” I was, however, more than glad for this virtue of necessity. Let not the reader however imagine for one moment that there was in any degree whatsoever less comfort in these artistic huts than in the palatial-looking structure that was provided in Belgaum. All the other arrangements so far as I gather were in keeping with this artistic simplicity.

The address of the Chairman² of the Reception Committee was equally simple and equally artistic and therefore naturally brief.

Proceedings commenced punctually at the advertised time. No time was lost in ceremonial functions. In a few minutes Mr. Phookan’s brief address was finished, the President³ amidst shouts of applause walked to the rostrum and read his address. The suppressed gloom cast over the assembly through the news of the assassination of Swami Shraddhanandji was no doubt there, but it was not allowed to be made visible. The delegates knew that Swamiji had died a hero’s

¹ The venue of the Congress session in 1924, over which Gandhiji presided
² Phookan
³ S. Srinivasa Iyengar
death and it therefore demanded no tears but action and so the business part of the Congress went on as if nothing had happened. The ceremonial was severely cut off including the usual presidential procession. The address of the President for the matters it covers is brief enough. I pass by the references to the Councils and the defence of the Swarajist attitude which occupies half of the address.

The constructive programme has its due share given to it. The place of honour is assigned to khaddar. The President trusts that the All-India Spinners’ Association will become a nation-wide labour organization which, if it cannot be identical with swaraj, will go some way towards it. It can become that if every Congressman and every Congresswoman will do his or her duty.

The spinning-wheel has by its persuasiveness affected to a visible extent the national psychology, and has lent a new dignity to our manhood and womanhood. This was more than exemplified by the enthusiastic manner in which the amendment in the franchise clause regarding khaddar was accepted by the Congress in spite of stubborn opposition offered to it. No wonder that the President considers that “khaddar is at once the radiant symbol of our self-reliance and of our power of resistance”.

In the constructive programme the second place is given to prohibition and the President correctly pleads guilty to the charge that we have not lately paid much attention to the question of total prohibition. He says,

The movement will gain in moral grandeur if we successfully organize the will of the nation in that behalf.

He remarks that

No minister has during the past six years been found, and I doubt whether a minister will now be found, to be courageous enough to bring in a bill for total prohibition and to resign his office on its rejection or disallowance.

There is something somewhere utterly wrong if, in a place like India which is overwhelmingly dry, ministers are unwilling to provide what is the nation’s due, namely, total prohibition. There is as much flaw in the argument that it is an interference with the right of the people, as there would be in the argument that the laws prohibiting theft interfere with the right of thieving. A thief steals all earthly possessions, a drunkard steals his own and his neighbour’s honour. It surprises me to discover that the President has failed to suggest the obvious method of providing for the deficit of revenue. There is a huge military expenditure, so much of which is utterly useless and based upon distrust of the nation. It is capable of reduction by more than 25 crores which is the revenue from drinks and drugs.

Untouchability comes next. He does not think that it is necessary to wait for swaraj till untouchability is removed. He cites the capital instance, in his favour, of the United States of America achieving freedom long before the abolition of a very real and widespread slavery. But he hastens to add,

We must all agree that we must make an end of untouchability, apart from any question of swaraj and whether we ever win swaraj or not.

And then this Brahmin philosopher lays down that the higher philosophy of Hinduism as well as the history of the religious dissidence in our country emboldens me to claim that the rule regarding untouchability has neither part nor lot with the indestructible soul of Hinduism. Judged by any test humanitarian, rational or spiritual, patriotic or democratic, we cannot with decency uphold in Hinduism the dogma of an immutable untouchability. It clouds our vision, limits our experience, hardens our heart, narrows our sphere of responsibility and prevents our ideals of justice, love and sincerity from being perfect.

I congratulate the President for this eloquent and severe condemnation of the curse that has descended upon Hinduism.

The next heading is labour and unemployment. I am inclined to think that this needs more diligent study than appears to have been given to it. It requires, in my opinion, considerable revision. I suggest that the charkha movement with all its implications provides the largest form of relief to the unemployment of millions.

The currency policy of the Government has also claimed a paragraph in his address. The President ‘cordially’ welcomes the formation of the Indian currency League and trusts that it will adequately educate public opinion on the question of the ratio, the gold standard, gold currency and other cognate questions. He says:

But I am certain the League will be able to achieve nothing, either by debate and vote in the Assembly or by protest outside, unless it comes into line with the Congress and unless its members harness themselves to the dynamic politics of the Congress.
Indian States have also found a paragraph in the address. Greater India naturally follows the paragraph on Indian States.

The status of Indians abroad, whether in South Africa or Kenya, in Fiji or Guiana, in Ceylon or Malaya, in America or Australia, depends inevitably upon the status of Indians in their own land; and swaraj for India depends in its turn upon the brave and unflinching spirit of our kith and kin across the seas.

I suppose the presidential suggestion “of the holding once in a way of a session of the Congress in South Africa” is merely a pious wish. The subject deserves better examination than it has received. I presume the absence of any reference to Mr. Andrews’s signal services is an unintentional oversight due to the many local preoccupations of the very busy President.

The Asiatic Federation comes in too for a few lines. Mr. Iyengar deplores that “we have too long neglected the possibilities of a cultural and business union with all Asiatic countries.” I venture to suggest that the cultural union is being sufficiently attended to by our great Poet and the business union by the great commercial firms.

The irrepressible optimism of the President is to be observed in the paragraphs upon Communalism and Nationalism. He says:

I am confident that wherever intensive propaganda, sincere and persuasive, clearly analyses the fallacies underlying it, communalism will go to the wall. Happily, prejudice and suspicion are not deep-seated amongst Indians and communalism is but their offspring.

Under the heading ‘Plea for Tolerance’, one reads the following pregnant sentences:

Though each community should be free to make conversions, no resort to conversion is really any longer useful or necessary. For the lives of the best and most pious men in each community are a fitter and more effective propaganda in that behalf than definite missionary effort. But wherever the latter is made, it should be open and general and neither secret nor directed to the converting of particular men or women. Let us realize that no great and long-established religion gains in truth, beauty or spirituality with any increase in its census figures.

He winds up the paragraph by quoting the following beautiful passage from Ashoka’s inscriptions:

He who does reverence to his own sect while disparaging the sects of others wholly from attachment to his own, with intent to enhance the splendour of his own sect, in reality by such conduct inflicts the severest injury on his own sect.
The President is evidently against communal representation. He says:

That much abused expression “communal representation” is a misnomer; for all the communities are equally interested in all public questions and in the country’s problems and in particular solutions of them.

Again he says:

Let us realize clearly that to uphold justice between man and man is to uphold justice between community and community. As a safeguard a negative rule against members of any community or caste monopolizing offices is all that is required.

The President remarks:

The intrusion into politics of religion, and very often of dogmatic religion, must be resisted as a primitive or mediaeval idea, born of theocracies, and disastrous alike to religion and to politics.

But he adds:

I do not speak of morality or of that spiritual quality which is common to all religions; for thereby politics and organizations are cleansed and made sweet and wholesome.

Sjt. Iyengar adds:

Let us not forget, in the fever of political controversy, that the strength of each religion is derived from God and rooted in the souls of Prahlads. Not all the tortures of a Torquemada¹, nor all the burning at the stakes, nor all the forms of persecution have been able to destroy the mystic quality of the human soul. Neither Hinduism nor Islam derives or requires strength either from the present or from any future Government. Both stand far, far above swaraj which is not comparable to them. Neither foreign governments nor self-governments, neither democracies nor autocracies, can destroy that seed of faith which is in every one of us, that inspired interpretation of the universe to which one clings for guidance and solace in this world and for salvation in the next.

The last three pages of the address are devoted to a fervent appeal for unity.

There can be only two parties in India, the party of the Government and its adherents that obstruct swaraj, and the party that fights visibly and unceasingly for swaraj . . . I deprecate the philosophy of individualism in a supreme struggle for freedom against a powerful people with their trained bureaucracy and with unlimited material resources. On a question whether a

¹ Thomas Torquemada (1420-1498): Inquisitor-General of Spain who is said to have condemned more than 10,000 people to be burned at the stake particular course is wise or unwise, will succeed or fail, will accelerate swaraj or retard it, to make one’s opinion or judgment or feeling a matter of conscience is false philosophy. On a point of religion, of morality, of honour, one’s own conscience must be the arbiter, but in transacting the affairs of a country, when a decision is not irreligious, immoral or dishonourable, I fail to see how we may rely on our right to differ from one another and yet uphold the discipline necessary for an organization fighting for swaraj.

The conclusion is in keeping with the fervency of the appeal and the deep emotion that underlies every line of this address. He says:

Swaraj is not an intellectual but an emotional proposition. We must cherish it in our hearts with unquenchable faith. . . . We must become possessed by a passion for swaraj that is not warped by fallacies and impulses, that will stand for a uniform and rapid corporate advance in serried masses, that will know no obstacles, that will not wax and wane with the seasons, that will not be daunted by imprisonments or depressed by failures.

Let me hope that the appeal will find an echo in the hearts of us all.

The resolutions do not require an elaborate examination. Besides the condolence resolutions, there is of course the Council resolution for the guidance of Council-wallas, then the resolutions about South Africa and Kenya, the Bengal detenus and the Gurdwara prisoners. The khaddar clause in the constitution is, in my opinion, altered for the better. The ceremonial wear had become the laughing stock of all. Habitual wear of khaddar is the right thing if khaddar wear should find a place in our franchise qualifications. It is to be hoped that every Congress worker will enforce this resolution in his own person and induce others to do likewise. But I must deal more fully in a subsequent issue with many other things that were discussed in the Subjects Committee in connection with the resolutions withdrawn or rejected.

Young India, 6-1-1927
18. INTERVIEW TO FREE PRESS OF INDIA

COMILLA,
January 6, 1927

With reference to the statement\(^1\) issued by Mr. T. C. Goswami\(^2\) on the habitual khadi wear resolution passed by the Congress at Gauhati the following interview was granted to a representative of the Free Press of India by Mahatma Gandhi:

I tender my congratulations to Mr. Goswami upon his frank statement on khaddar. It should clear the atmosphere of cant, hypocrisy and humbug. Khaddar must stand or fall on its own merits. Mr. Goswami betrays a mental attitude which no doubt makes any mention of khaddar repugnant to him. His is not an objection to khaddar as a fetish but it is an objection to khaddar even as an economic factor, because he says that khaddar may be even an economic waste and permanent exclusion of foreign cloth may not be a desirable thing. If I thought like Mr. Goswami I should also object to the khaddar clause as strongly as he does. The change from ceremonial to habitual wear was not due to my prompting. But I have no hesitation in endorsing the change as desirable and even necessary for the growth of a true national life. Politics apart from nationalism I do not understand. I consider boycott of foreign cloth not merely as a political expedient but as a permanent duty. I regard it as immediately possible in terms of khaddar if we have the will.

I go a step further and say that boycott of foreign cloth through khaddar is the only thing the nation is capable of achieving within a measurable distance of time, and since the economic aspect of khaddar includes organization of the whole nation towards one single effort, it has tremendous political consequences. If, therefore, it is right and proper to restrict the membership of the Congress to those who desire swaraj and to exclude those who wish to retain the present British domination, it is equally right to restrict the membership to those who desire and work for the boycott of foreign cloth, through active, continuous and persistent khaddar production and sale. It is the beauty of khaddar and not its limitation, as Mr. Goswami suggests, that it is no respecter of persons and that it can adorn the body of a government spy as much as that of a saintly servant of India, whoever

---

\(^1\) Not reproduced here
\(^2\) Member of the Legislative Assembly from Bengal he may be. For the nation includes all the highest and the lowest, the healthy and the unhealthy, the good as well as the wicked. But it should be the privilege of the good to reform the wicked and serve them.

Forward, 7-1-1927

19. SPEECH AT WOMEN’S MEETING, COMILLA

January 6, 1927

... Next he addressed a big gathering of ladies, where he said that they must have swaraj, which meant Ramarajya which again could not come without Sita. He exhorted all to attain the virtues of Sita and to wear clothes made by their own hands as Sita used to do, and also to follow the examples of Sita by leading a simple and pure life. He concluded by saying that the charkha was the only cure for pauperism.

When he appealed for funds for the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial, the ladies contributed some money and some of them even gave away their gold ornaments.

Amrita Bazar Patrika, 8-1-1927

20. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

[KASHI,]

Saturday [January 8, 1927]

CHI. MANI,

I have your letter. It is good that you are studying with Valjibhai’s help. You will learn much from him.

I do not know why you have been relieved of your teaching work, for I could not understand the reasons from the letter in which the news was conveyed to me. You yourself should be bold and ask the reason. I thought that the reason must have been explained to you. I remained unconcerned by the news because, irrespective of whether or not you teach, you continue to stay in the Ashram, and the salary, or whatever you name it, will continue to be paid to you. The responsibility for you is mine. You should not get angry with the teachers. They have to run the institution, and so they may act as they think proper. But you have a right to know the reason, and you shall know it.

1 As in the printed source

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
You should now get ready to learn spinning. You should learn everything that goes with it, that is to say, repairing the spinning-wheel, recognizing the different varieties of cotton, ginning, pressing, carding, spinning, moistening the yarn, making skeins, joining the broken thread—all these processes. You should learn to make a mal¹ and to wind the sadī² round the spindle. Moreover, wherever you go you should learn what else you can besides these processes, and as part of this programme of studies you should improve your proficiency in Hindi and Sanskrit. In studying Sanskrit, you should know the meaning of every verse in the Gita along with its syntax. And of course, you should learn to spin on the takli. There was a telegram from Karachi to say that your name has been sent to the Board. I am happy.

Write to me regularly and go on working very cheerfully. Now, from the 2nd to the 8th I shall be in Gondia, Nagpur, Wardha, Akola and Amaravati. I am not certain about the towns on the programme. It will be better to address your letters to Wardha.

Blessings from
BAPU

[From Gujarati]
Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelne, pp. 45-6

21. COMPLICATIONS OF UNTOUCHABILITY

I publish in this issue Shri Govindji Jadavdas’s letter under the heading which he has himself given to it, viz., “The Downfall of Hinduism”. The purport of his letter is this: If untouchability is to be removed, then why have separate schools, temples and wells for the untouchables? This argument is certainly not pointless. Similar problems have arisen and still arise in South Africa. I had raised the argument myself, in South Africa, that setting up of separate schools for the Indians means prolonging the life of untouchability. Only those who have themselves suffered can realize the pain of other sufferers; in the same way I can appreciate Shri Govindji’s unhappiness.

But where I realized that it would be considered foolish on my part to ignore the existence of a thing which does exist, I did my work with full realization of the discrimination which was there. So I accepted the proposal of having separate schools. I had also accepted [in S. Africa] the proposal for separate first and second-class compartments in trains for Indians. Like Govindji I too had opposed such a discrimination there. But when the mere existence of a community was in danger, I accepted such a discrimination which would virtually lead to lightening the discrimination in spite of its continuance. For example, the Indians could formerly travel only by the third class; as a result of the agitation an order was issued allowing them to travel in first and second-class compartments. Simultaneously it was decided to have for the Indians separate first and second-class coaches. We accepted this provision even after we had opposed discrimination. The government authorities can make arrangements [for common coaches] but how can others be forced to sit with us?

¹ Belt or cord passing round the wheel and the spindle
² Cotton thread moistened with gum

VOL. 38 : 2 JANUARY, 1927 - 3 JUNE, 1927 27

I yielded to this line of thinking and came to the conclusion that as long as the Antyajas are not able to make use of common temples, etc., it is better to have for them separate institutions by which they may benefit, rather than totally to deprive them of the amenity. Theoretically, untouchability has disappeared. Still many are not yet ready to discard it altogether in practice. What should the friends of the untouchables do so long as such a situation persists? How else can they prove their sincerity of purpose? The answer should be that it can be done by constructing temples, etc., for the untouchables.

Shri Govindji says that such temples, etc., may be built, but why label them with unpleasant words, “for the untouchables only”? No one has assigned such unpleasant labels. The temples, etc., which are being built are used by those who have made donations towards their cost as well as by other friends of the untouchables. From this viewpoint the institutions built for the benefit of the untouchables are in fact for the general public. But the untouchables have the first claim upon them. In the matter of using these institutions, the untouchables are given the first preference, and their requirements looked to first.

Though I can fully realize the unhappiness of an Antyaja like Shri Govindji, I wish him to believe that the Antyaj Directory¹ and the underlying motive to build temples, etc., is pure, laudable and in the interests of the Antyajas.

[From Gujarati]

Navajivan. 9-1-1927

¹ Vide “Antyaja Directory”, 12-12-1926.
22. INTERVIEW TO BHAGWANDAS

BANARAS.

January 9, 1927

BHAGWANDAS: Mahatmaji, I wish very much to know what you think of certain measures which seem to me very helpful, or indeed indispensable, for the welfare and progress of India in political as well as other respects. I have been trying my feeble best to place them before the public for the last six years, but more or less in vain. If they could secure your approval, the country would look at them with more consideration, and might attempt to put them into operation, for the force of your tapasya (asceticism and self-denial) is very great, and the country rightly places great faith in you because of your great selflessness. I put these measures into the form of proposals for Resolutions, and requested my dear friend, Shri Shiva Prasad Gupta, to try to get them placed before the Gauhati Congress. But nothing more could be done than to place copies in the hands of the members of the A.I. Congress Committee. With your permission I will put the same in the form of questions to you.

First of all, do you think, or not, that the essence of true swaraj, true self-government, is that all the laws should be made by the elected representatives of the people, and that these elected representatives should embody the higher self, and not the lower self, of the people, that is to say, they should be the wisest, the most experienced, the most unselfish and philanthropic persons available?

MAHATMA GANDHI: This also is among the essential features.

What other essential features are there, if any?

My ideal is that every person should realize dharma. In that case, there will be no need left for any representatives. That is the ideal swaraj. There are no rulers and no ruled in that swaraj. no government servants; all are the servants of all. This is the ideal swaraj. If this ideal swaraj is kept in view, mistakes would be avoided, or, at least, minimized. It is certain that such ideal swaraj can never be attained; but we will be able to make a near approach to it.

This is no doubt the highest kind of swaraj. Apparently the Republic of the Uttara-Kuru as described in the Mahabharata was something like this.

But the inhabitants of that happy land were all supermen and superwomen, god-and-goddess-like Jivanmuktas and Yoga-Siddhas, perfect, final, men and women,

---

1 The original Hindi report of the interview was published in Aaj, 19-2-1927.
insan-ul-ka-mil, mard-wa-zan-i-mam ("Be ye perfect, even as your Father in Heaven is perfect"), according to the tradition of that epic. In view, obviously, of our present condition, however, you yourself said at the Ahmedabad Congress of 1921 that you could lead this country to Dominion Home Rule. Would not that be the preliminary or intermediate form of swaraj which would be suitable for us now?

Yes.
There must be legislatures in such swaraj?
Yes.
Representatives would have to be elected for them?
Yes.
These representatives should be the wisest, most experienced, most self-less, most philanthropic persons available?
Yes.
Electors should always keep this ideal, this guiding principle, in view?
Yes.
Should this guiding principle be followed in making elections for District Boards, Municipal Boards, and other local elective bodies, as well as for the Congress Committees of all grades?
Certainly.
Is this guiding principle recognized by, is this ideal spread among, the Indian public?
To some extent.
Looking at the elections made to the Congress Committee and the various elective bodies, what inference can we draw as to the extent to which this principle is recognized and acted on? Is the extent very small, or sufficient?
It is less than it ought to be.
This same principle should guide the elections to the legislative bodies, should it not?
It should guide all the elections that are made nowadays.
Has sufficient effort been made by leaders, individually, or by the Congress as a body, to spread this ideal among the public?
It would not be enough to say yes or no in reply to this question. I believe that the present atmosphere is not favourable for this purpose.
You said before that the principle had been recognized to some extent by the public. What was the cause of the spread of the ideal to that small extent?
So far the effort has been individual. When the atmosphere becomes favourable, then all persons begin to act according to such ideals without any effort.
Should effort be made to create such a favourable atmosphere or not?
It should be made unceasingly.

What kind of effort would be helpful?

The number of the individuals who make this effort should increase constantly. And there is, and has always been, only one way to bring about this increase, viz., that those who believe in this ideal should cling to it in the face of all difficulties.

That is to say, individuals should spread the ideal by teaching and preaching, in speech and writing?

Individuals should preach by the example of their conduct. Speeches and writings are also of help. Conduct includes speaking and writing.

I entirely agree that preaching has no force if the preacher does not act up to his own advice. But while you have been putting on khaddar and working the charkha yourself, you have also, side by side, with the setting of this personal example, been preaching them very extensively and very diligently. And that is why they are spreading. So too you have been preaching assiduously and widely various measures connected with non-violent non-co-operation. Do you not think that in this very important matter also it is very necessary to give advice to and remind the public persistently as thus: “Whenever you have to elect representatives, you should elect persons of such-and-such qualifications”? Without such advice, will not the general public remain in darkness, without any guide, in this exceedingly important matter?

This question is right. But really the answer to it is included in my previous answer. I regard advising and preaching as part of conduct generally. I do not give a separate place to precept because when a person cannot set a good example his precept is useless, and often becomes harmful. And he who keeps his conduct right does as a fact give advice also whenever there is an opportunity.

But so far as I am aware, you have not advised the Indian public as yet, in your speeches and writings, as to the qualifications they should look for in the persons they elect.

Not once but many times have I given this advice, in speech and writing.

Should I find writings on the subject in Young India?
Yes.

I will search. In the meanwhile, will you kindly tell me what means should be employed, what rules followed, to secure properly qualified representatives? So far as I can see, the general complaint is that the representatives chosen are not of the right quality, either in the self-governed countries of the West or in present-day India under the new election system. This is the one chief and serious defect in current systems of self-government, is it not?

And this is the reason why I strongly oppose Council-entry. So long as the people do not realize swatva (i.e., spirituality), so long as their intelligence is not awake, so long it will not be possible to secure purity in elections by any laws. And this purity has a large part in my present efforts. From the very beginning my endeavour has been directed towards the increase of the power, the soul-force of the people, by self-purification and tapasya (self-denial, riyazat, nafs-kushi). By such tapasya their intelligence will be purified and rectified. Because of this, the persons who were elected for Municipal Boards, etc., after the commencement of the non-co-operation movement, were good persons, and they were elected without trouble and expense. When that atmosphere disappeared, confusion began.

By the ancient tradition of this land, tapasya (self-denial, riyazat, zohd) and vidya (right knowledge) are two distinguishable (though more or less interdependent) things, and only by the combination of both is achieved that true humanity, true spirituality, or realization of God or Self or Brahman or Allah or Brahmanhood, or Kamal, however it may be called, which is what I believe you mean by swatva (selfness). In the Puranic story we read that Ravana and others made great tapasya, but the result of that was tyrannical earthly power and excessive luxury to them, for some time, and groaning to the rest of the world. They made tapasya without vidya (right knowledge). What I feel is that in the atmosphere created by the N.C.O., there was the element of tapasya, but not of vidya (emotion and enthusiasm and self-denial but not clear intelligence and right knowledge of the essential feature of the object to be striven for); and that this was the reason why the atmosphere could not gain permanence, but dispersed in two or three years. Do you think this belief of mine to be right or wrong?

It is generally right. A little modification is needed. Our tapasya at that time was not sufficient in amount. Had it been sufficient, we should certainly have achieved the vidya also. The Lord has said in the Gita that God gives right understanding to the person of firm devotion.

I too believe so, but devotion brings such wholesome fruit only when it is rightly directed, when its aim, its object, its ideal, is the Right Object, not otherwise. The Gita also says: “They who worship other gods go to the other gods; they who worship Me (the Higher Self) come to Me.” Also : “There is no purifier like unto knowledge.” My belief has therefore always been that from the very beginning of tapasya (self-denying effort), right knowledge of the essential features of the true Goal is also absolutely indispensable; otherwise the soul-force, the power, of whatever kind, gathered by tapasya, will certainly err away into wrong paths, as that of Ravana, etc. Is that belief of mine wrong or right?

Entirely right.

Just for this very reason have I been endeavouring, from the very beginning of the N.C.O. movement, that side by side with the tapasya (self-sacrifice) of N.C.O., appropriate vidya (right knowledge) should be particularly imparted to the people, by the Congress and the leaders, as to the essential of this intermediate swaraj, i.e., Dominion Home Rule, viz., the election of duly qualified representatives. Was this wish of mine wrong?

If it meant that any yojana (detailed constitution) should be placed before the people, then I have arrived at the opinion that it would be of no use. But it is quite right and proper that such knowledge should be given to the people, that they should be so awakened as will make them able to elect duly qualified representatives only.
What the qualifications of the representatives should be—I do not like to fix this now. All this should be left to the intelligence of the electors.

In respect of the charkha, the cultivation of cotton, the storing of yarn, the weaving of cloth, the selling of it, etc., you yourself and through your co-workers, are constantly giving instruction and information to the people in much detail. Do you not think it necessary to give to the people, similarly, in respect of this very important matter even some little specific indication as to the marks by which the fitness of representatives might be recognized? Even such self-evident truths, as that two and two make four, have to be taught to children with much labour. That the charkha should be worked in leisure hours is also an almost self-evident proposition; yet this also, and with all the labour you have spent on it, is not yet so widespread among the people as it ought to be. Now then can you leave for the unaided understanding of the electors the decision of the fitness of representatives, without any instruction and guidance? If you think it undesirable to fix any age-limit, you might give indications in some other respects at least.

I have written something in this respect, and will write as I find time. But there is no need to speak about it in the Congress. When the people come to the occasion for electing representatives, then advice will have to be given to them about it, as is done now regarding the charkha. Everything has its own fit time.

Which of the qualifications suggested by me in No. 2 of my proposals for the Gauhati Congress do you think to be desirable, if any at all, for persons to be elected?
Almost all, but not for legislative enactment. It is a matter essentially for the education of the electors.

I will now ask about another matter. Is it possible to bring about unity and peace between the followers of the several religions without explaining to them that the essentials of all these religions are one and the same? Without showing that the various religions are one at heart, is it possible to make the various religionists one at heart?

No.

Only when it is explained to the followers of the several religions that the heart of all religions is the same, will it become possible to make peace between the followers thereof?

Yes.

What should be done to bring this about?

All the good and true followers of the several religions should preach and promulgate this fact.

What special effort have you made, or intend to make, in this behalf?

I have made enough individual effort; and it continues to be made even today. There is a lack of persons amongst us for this prachara (propaganda), i.e., there are very few persons amongst us who might separate the merits and demerits of the various religions, bring together all the merits, and put them before the people.

Do you not think that an influential leader like yourself should bring together into a committee elected representatives, large-hearted and broadminded, of the several religions current in India, who might preach such essential unity of the religions by speech, writings, and conduct?

I think I have made efforts to the extent of my powers; but it seems I have not the ability to bring together educated and learned persons for such work. I have, therefore, contented myself with my own individual efforts.

As the time is short, I pass on to another subject. The Hindu Sabha is laying stress on shuddhi and sangathan. Can the work of shuddhi be done effectively without accepting the principle of “class-caste by temperament and functions (and not by birth)”? And is the work of sangathan possible without first abolishing the mutual untouchability which prevails at present in respect of dining among the thousands of sub-castes of Hindus?

I have explained my views as regards shuddhi and sangathan in Young India in the articles I wrote in appreciation of Shraddhanandji. I am unable to say more. I may say here, however, that even panktibheda (Separate seats at dinner) is destructive of sangathan, without a doubt.

You have said in Young India of 6-1-1927: “Both the tabligh and the shuddhi which is a reply to the former, have to undergo a radical change. Progress of liberal study of religions of the world is bound to revolutionize the existing clumsy method of proselytizing which looks to the form rather than the substance. It is the transference of allegiance from one fold to another and the mutual decrying of rival faiths which gives rise to mutual hatred. . . .” “The third aspect of shuddhi is conversion properly so called. And I question its use in this age of growing toleration and enlightenment. I am against conversion, whether it is known as shuddhi by Hindus, tabligh by Mussalmans, or proselytizing by Christians.”

I most heartily subscribe to all this; in saying it you have completely endorsed the first two objects of the Theosophical Society, which has been working for fifty-one years, and of which I have been a member for forty-three. But the “growing toleration and enlightenment” are obviously growing very very slowly, and the “liberal study of the religions of the world”, which “is bound to revolutionize the existing clumsy methods of proselytizing” which seek simply to change the labels and signboards on the foreheads of persons, has failed to produce its due effect, so far, on the practice of the highly educated men who are at the back of these conversion movements. Therefore is it not desirable that a great leader like yourself should diligently help to quicken the growth of the toleration and enlightenment and the progress of the liberal study of religions, in more specific and express ways, as suggested in No. 6 of my proposals for the Gauhati Congress, by organizing committees for the purpose all over the country, to do this vitally important work, which has been rather put aside latterly by the Theosophical Society?

When I asked in my previous question whether the principle of caste according to character-and-functioning (karmana varnah) was not the only legitimate basis as well as completion of shuddhi, my implication was just this that if the principle was accepted, the whole of mankind would at once be “converted” to essential Hinduism without anyone having to change his particular religious label or signboard.

I can only answer in the words of the seer: “The distant scene I do not care to see, one step enough for me.” After all, the future is determined by the sum-total of the present activities, often contradictory, of mankind.

You do not, presumably, think it undesirable to form an army of volunteers for public work in connection with the Congress. If so, do you not think that if the qualifications mentioned in No. 5(a-b) of my proposals for the Gauhati Congress were prescribed and adopted, the army would become much more efficient? If you consider any particular qualification out of these inappropriate, or any other as more appropriate, would you very kindly mention it?

It would be desirable to form such a corps if it is possible. The qualifications too are good. But my experience shows that we are not in a position to form any such body for all India. It will not come into being by means of resolutions.

The Hindustan Times, 4-10-1927

23. SPEECH AT BENARES HINDU UNIVERSITY

Banaras,

January 9, 1927

“...You have had your say now. No one is listening to you. Why not stop talking of khaddar?” That was the advice that was being given him in some quarters. Gandhi ji said:

But why should I stop reciting my favourite mantra when I have before me the example of Prahlad of old refusing to give up Ramanama in the teeth of tortures worse than death? And I have not had to go through any tortures yet. How can I give up the only message that the condition of my country has been whispering to me? Panditji* has collected and has been still collecting lakhs and lakhs of rupees for you from Rajas and Maharajas. The money apparently comes from these wealthy princes, but in reality it comes from the millions of our poor. For unlike Europe the rich of our land grow rich at the expense of our villagers the bulk of whom have to go without a square meal a day. The education that you receive today is thus paid for by the starving villagers who will never have the chance of such an education. It is your duty to refuse to have an education that is not within the reach of the poor, but I do not ask that of you today. I ask you to render just a slight return to the poor by doing a little yajna for them. For he who eats without doing his yajna steals his food, say the Gita. The yajna that was required of the British civic population during the War was for each household to grow potatoes in its yard and for each household to do a little simple sewing. The yajna of our age and for us is the spinning-wheel. Day in and day out I have been talking about it, writing about it. I shall say no more today. If the message of the poor of India has touched your hearts I want you to raid Kripalani’s khaddar store tomorrow and denude it of all its stock, and to empty your pockets tonight. Panditji has cultivated the art of beggary.

---

1 The meeting was attended by about 2,000 students and was held under a shamiana specially erected for the Viceregal visit which preceded Gandhi ji’s by just a week. The report is extracted from Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”.

2 Madan Mohan Malaviya
I have learnt it from him, and if he specializes in laying the princes under tribute, I have learnt to be equally shameless in emptying the pockets of the poor, for the benefit of those who are poorer than they.

* * *

Malaviyaji’s one object in begging millions for you, in raising these palatial buildings, is to send out to the country gems of purest ray, citizens healthy and strong to serve their motherland. That purpose will be defeated if you allow yourselves to be swept with the wind that comes today from the West—the wind of impurity. Not that the methods have the general sanction of Europe. There are friends in Europe, a very few, who are fighting hard to counteract the poisonous tendency. But if you do not wake up betimes, the immoral wave that is fast gathering strength might soon envelop and overwhelm you. I cry out to you, therefore, with all the strength at my command: Be warned, and flee from the fire before it consumes you.

Young India, 20-1-1927

24. SPEECH AT SHRADDHANAND MEMORIAL MEETING, BANARAS

January 9, 1927

It is a sacred day today and the meeting is taking place at a very good spot, where temple and mosque stand side by side. If any Mussalman considers Swami Shraddhanand to have been an enemy, he is in error. Swamiji died as a hero. He pursued his mission according to truth and dharma with great courage.

[From Hindi]
Aaj, 10-1-1927

25. SPEECH AT MEETING OF UNTOUCHABLES, BANARAS

January 9, 1927

I thank you for the address you have presented to me. If Mussalmans will only realize it, this is for them too a sacred day. We have today paid homage to the memory of Swami Shraddhanand and have bathed in the Ganga. We took the holy bath in the hope that we too might gain some of the qualities of Swamiji. Swamiji was a friend of the untouchables. He suffered in their suffering. And it was for their sake that he sacrificed his life. It was all to the good. If someone gets killed for the sake of religion it brings him only good. He cannot die a nobler death. Swamiji was so firm that he found it painful himself to go where untouchables were not allowed to go—just as Yudhishthira would not go even to heaven without his companion, the dog. The untouchables too have faults. Some of them drink. This they should give up. They should not argue that after all caste Hindus drink too. For the untouchables have got to go forward. They should imitate virtues, not vices. They should not gamble. They should not lie. They should maintain cleanliness. Every morning and evening they should repeat the name of Rama and thus cleanse their souls. We should all wear khadi. For this gives livelihood to the poor. Contributions will be raised all over the country today for the emancipation of the untouchables. I want that you should also contribute at least one pice each. I pray to God that the hearts of the so-called untouchables may become pure and they may be pillars of the Hindu community.

[From Hindi]
Aaj, 10-1-1927

26. SPEECH AT MEETING OF WOMEN, BANARAS
January 9, 1927

Sisters, I have just come from one meeting and am on my way to another, a bigger one. Please listen peacefully to the few words I have to say to you. The first thing is that if you want swaraj or Ramrajya in India you have to become pure as Sita. Sita was pure in body and mind. When she was put through the ordeal on her return from Lanka, the flames did not even touch her. Why? Because she was pure not only in body but also in mind. No cloth was imported from England at the time, English cloth was not worn. All women plied the charkha and wore khadi. Foreign cloth does not add to your beauty. Real beauty consists in making body and mind pure. Only a woman who keeps body and mind pure can be worthy of our reverence. Therefore, sisters, wear khadi, ply the charkha and become pure. Make your sons and daughters pure by having them wear khadi. If you wish to give me something make some donation for khadi.

The other thing I wish to talk to you about is the death of Swami Shraddhanand. Swamiji is not dead: he lives in our hearts. He was brave; he had a noble soul. We have taken a bath in the Ganga and we have paid tribute to Swamiji. May God impart to us some of his qualities so that we can carry on his work.

1 The meeting was held in the Kashi Naresh Hall of the Hindu School.

[From Hindi]

Aaj, 12-1-1927

27. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, BANARAS

January 9, 1927

MahatmaJI thanked the Municipal Board for the address presented to him and said it had been suggested to him that he should start his new programme from Banaras. He said:

I am sorry I have not come here to enunciate some new programme. Nor am I aware of any new programme. I am afraid therefore that those who have come to this meeting looking for a new programme will have to be disappointed. I put before the people only what I feel is to their good. There is nowhere else in the world such stark poverty as prevails in India. The poor want work. The peasantry want work for four months of the year. The purpose is not fulfilled by simply distributing money among the poor. This will make beggars of them. The best occupation for them, the best work for the peasantry is the charkha. No one has told me that there can be any simpler occupation than the charkha. I therefore appeal to you to wear khadi, ply the charkha and help in this programme. I appeal to you to go and see the khadi exhibition after this meeting. You will then know what fine khadi is now being produced. If people were to help in this, ten times as much could be accomplished.

God dwells in our hearts. If we listen to Him we shall know that it is our duty to wear cloth made by poor people. Foreigners would even distribute their cloth free to make it acceptable to us. Those who grudge paying a little extra money for the poor cannot be either true Hindus or true Mussalmans. For those who will not help the poor, it is futile to think of God.

I have just come from Bangali Tola and a meeting of women at the Hindu School. Women have made donations. Some of them have parted with even their jewellery. Here at this meeting also there are some sisters. I ask them too to be pure as Sitaji. When she was put through the ordeal, when she entered the fire, she did not get burnt, the flames did not so much as touch her. No foreign cloth ever came... in contact with Sitaji’s body. Sitaji and her maid both plied the charkha. During that age yarn was spun with hand and people wore hand-spun cloth. I appeal to the ladies to ply the charkha and wear khadi.

I am asked why I keep silent on the Hindu-Muslim question. We have now lost grip of this question. Today is the jalanjali1 day of Swami Shraddhanand. Let us today commune with his soul. A brother of ours became mad and killed him. In truth he is not dead. He lives yet. Had the assassin not become mad this tragedy would not have occurred. I receive letters saying that there are a number of people behind this. I do not know. But I know that this killing is against the teachings of the Koran. I cannot accept that Shraddhanandji was an enemy of the Mussalmans. I did not agree with all his views. All the same I have repeatedly said the Mussalmans should not consider Shraddhanandji, Malaviyaji and Lalaji their enemies. All have the right freely and fearlessly to express their views. All can preach their several religions. Swamiji was full of compassion for all living things. Now of course the untouchables are treated much more humanely than before. In this respect we have made some progress. Swami Shraddhanand had been associated with this work from a very early stage. Emancipation of the untouchables was the main part of his programme. The time is now coming when Hindus and Muslims will cleanse their hearts and God will be pleased. The only way in which we can please Swamiji’s soul is for all of us to help in the work for the emancipation of the untouchables.

I must tell the Hindus to wash off the stain of untouchability. This will be true shuddhi. They should not think of revenge. If they do, they will cause pain to the soul of Shraddhanandji and disgrace Hinduism. Madness cannot be answered by madness. I appeal to the Hindus not to seek revenge, not to think of it. Otherwise they would cause pain to the soul of Shraddhanandji.

To the Mussalmans I have to say this. Let there not be a single Mussalman who approves this killing of Shraddhanandji even privately. There is nothing in the Koran to support this. If we wish to free India, we must cleanse our hearts.

[From Hindi]
Aaj, 12-1-1927

1 Offering of water as part of obsequies
28. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

Unrevised

BANARAS alias KASHI, January 10, 1927

CHI. MIRA,

I have your letter, or letters is it? I am writing this against my time for going to the station.

I am glad of all the varied experiences you are having. I shall not be angry so long as you keep your health and your mental balance. For the rest we learn through mistakes. Not that I know of mistakes made by you. But where there is consciousness of mistakes, readiness to mend is sufficient penance and antidote in a majority of cases.

I had rich experiences in Kashi, but of these I have no time to speak.

With love,

BAPU

From the original: C.W. 5196. Courtesy: Mirabehn

29. LETTER TO ASHRAM WOMEN

KASHI, Silence Day, Pausa Sud 6 [January 10, 1927]

DEAR SISTERS,

Only yesterday I got the letter written by Chi. Radha. I see that your 7 o’clock prayers are going on regularly and that all of you feel interested in them. I am happy. What Kaka Saheb has said is certainly worth bearing in mind. Instead of replying by a mere yes or no, we should develop the ability to understand and explain the reasons for our reply.

Yesterday was the day of homage to Shraddhanandji. Pandit Malaviyaji is here in Kashi at present. He sent word at the last moment that we ought to go to the Ganga-ghat for a bath and prayers. I got ready and took with me the students of the Rashtriya Vidyapith who had come to see me. We formed ourselves in twos and started. Malaviyaji joined us and slowly our procession swelled. I have not time for describing the scene at the Gangaghat. It was simply grand. The ghat is not as clean as I would wish it to be.

1 Pausa Sud 6 seems to be a slip for Pausa Sud 7 which was a Monday.

After bath, we went for the darshan of Kashi Vishwanath. Mahadev will perhaps give you a description of other things there. The German lady was with us. It was doubtful whether she would be permitted to enter. She is a Buddhist and hence can be regarded as a Hindu. How could she be denied admittance? I had decided that if she was stopped, I too would not go in. But the priest kept quiet when he was told that she was a Hindu.

How can I describe the dirtiness of the street leading to the Kashi Vishwanath temple?

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 3634

30. LETTER TO MANILAL GANDHI

KASHI,
Monday [January 10, 1927]

CHI. MANILAL,

I have your letter. There is no harm if Ba reads it. I have not given it to her so far, but I intend to. You would have done a good turn to Harilal if you had not given him even the ten rupees which you gave. But don’t mind, since you have given it. I don’t think you have made any big mistake. Often strictness results in real kindness and kindness turns out to be cruelty. If all people become strict with Harilal with a loving heart, his eyes would soon open. But all of us are full of weaknesses and, therefore, cannot cultivate such loving strict-ness. Being ourselves in need of false kindness, we show such kindness to others. I am not reproaching you for giving him ten rupees but am only trying to teach you wisdom. You will still have many ordeals to pass through.

I have been trying to do something for you. Have no worry on that account. But make yourself worthy. Do not waste a single moment. If you have time, write an article about E. A. either for Young India or Navajivan and send it to me immediately.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 1118. Courtesy: Sushilaben Gandhi

1 Gandhiji was in Banaras on Monday, January 10, 1927.
31. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

January 10, 1927

CHI. MIRA,

I have your letter describing the drive with Hakimji. I do not mind either your tasting the dishes at Brijkishen’s or the pan from Hakimji. The latter’s tempting you with pan distresses me. It is bad stuff and he should never have offered it to you. But opinions differ. He evidently considers it to be harmless. However, the reasoning that you have employed for justifying the tasting of the dishes and the pan is in my opinion faulty. Why should one know the taste of what one does not need or wish to take? Do you know that this is the reasoning that has been applied to justify every form of vice? It is the million times told story of the forbidden apple: why should I not know the taste of the thing I am asked not to take or touch? But you must not worry. If you do not understand my reasoning, you must argue with me patiently. If you appreciate my reasoning, it is to serve as warning in the future. But it must not result in self-reproach. There is no cause for it. The incident is trivial. But trivialities possess deadly potencies. Hence the paternal warning.

Now about your analysis of the Kanya Gurukul. I hope you have spoken about it to Vidyavati. But you must discuss it freely with Principals Ramdev and Sethi. Principal Ramdev is her guide and if he is convinced, immediate improvement can be made. I propose to send him the relevant extract from your letter. That will make your position quite clear. The insanitation, the indiscipline must go. The anti-Muslim feeling is a more difficult proposition. But you have to do your duty. Little girls’ minds must not be poisoned if we can help it. But whilst you will talk about these things, you will remember your limits. You have gone out to learn Hindi and to observe and gain experience, not to reform or teach. Yours will, therefore, be remarks only by the way and merely as suggestions either for acceptance or rejection. Your own conduct is sufficient effort for reform otherwise. I am writing this on the moving train during my silence which finishes at 9 p.m.

With love,

BAPU
[PS.]
Yes, when you go back to Delhi to inspect takli-spinning you may stay with Brijkishen.

BAPU

[PPS.]
Can you decipher my writing?

From the original: C.W. 5195. Courtesy: Mirabehn

32. LETTER TO NANABHAI I. MASHRUWALA

ON THE TRAIN,
Monday [January 10, 1927]\(^1\)

BHAISHRI NANABHAI

I have your letter. I feel that Dastane’s demand is reasonable. Just now I am touring for collecting funds. Hence I should go in the main to places where I can expect to obtain some contributions. But I think Akola is bound to be included in the itinerary. There is no question of my not visiting a place which has a devoted lover of Khadi like you. Formerly I used to tour with the idea which you have explained. If you do not follow the difference, ask me again. Gomati-behn\(^2\) must be free from her fever and Kishorelal must have left by now.

Blessings from

BAPU

SHRIYUT NANABHAI CHCHHARAM MASHRUWALA
AKOLA DISTRICT

From a photostat of the Gujarati: C.W. 4319. Courtesy: Kanubhai Mashruwala

\(^1\) The postmark bears the date January 13, 1927. Monday fell on January 10.

\(^2\) Wife of Kishorelal Mashruwala
33. LETTER TO HARIBHAU UPADHYAYA

KASHI,

Monday [January 10, 1927]

DEAR HARIBHAU,

I have received your letter. There is no reason to be unhappy about the resolution passed by the school committee with regard to Martand. I personally feel that your decision to keep him there is best. But if you wish to send him to Wardha there should be no difficulty. It would be as well to know what Martand himself wants.

My health is fine. I am going to Bihar today. Devdas is with me.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: Haribhau Upadhyaya Papers. Courtesy: Nehru Memorial Museum and Library

34. LETTER TO ANASUYABEHN SARABHAI

KASHI,

Silence Day [January 10, 1927]

CHI. ANASUYABEHN,

I have been wanting to write to you every Monday, but the letter remains unwritten till it is time for the post to go. So I decided to write early today.

I may not write to you; but can I forget you? I cannot forget you even if I want because the packet of cloves and the blankets you have given constantly remind me of you.

As for my experiences, what should I write and what not write? You can read about them in Young India and Navajivan.

I am keeping very good health. Now I am closing the letter because people have started coming. Tell Mridu that I shall ask her for the account. Do go to the Ashram occasionally.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 11573

1 From the contents. Gandhiji was in Kashi on January 9 and 10, 1927, and left for Bihar on the 10th.
35. LETTER TO GANBEBEHN VAIDYA

[After January 10, 1927]

CHI. GANBEBHN,

Never mind if you commit mistakes. If you keep on trying to avoid them, they will cease by and by.

Spiritual progress is easy for one whose mind is always occupied with thoughts of serving others. Since you are constantly engaged in such service, everything will be well with you.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 8704. Courtesy: Gangabehn Vaidya

36. LETTER TO COW-PROTECTION COMMITTEE,

MYSORE

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
January 11, 1927

DEAR FRIEND,

I must apologize to you for the very long delay in acknowledging your letter of 27th November, 1926. I duly received your first intimation which I thought was purely formal and as I had nothing effective to say, I did not send you a reply. From your second letter, however, I observe that you were anxious to have my opinion. But when I received it I was so overwhelmed with work that I had no time to collect my thoughts and give you a considered reply. Even as it is, I am sending you this reply in the midst of my Bihar tour. I hope you will accept these facts as sufficient excuse for the delay that has been caused in sending you my reply. Probably now it is of no use, even so I gave myself the satisfaction of telling you that there was no discourtesy intended by me in the first instance in not replying and now in replying at a time when my reply may prove too late.

In matters of religion I am against any State interference, and the cow question is in India a mixed matter of religion and economy. So far as economy is concerned, I have no doubt that it is the concern of every State, whether Hindu or Mussalman, to conserve the cattle supply. But, if I have understood your questionnaire rightly, the underlying note is whether the State would be justified in interposing itself between Hindus and Mussalmans and regulating cow slaughter even for purposes which Mussalmans consider to be religious. In India which I consider to be as much the land of Hindus born in it as of Mussalmans, Christians and others born in it, even a Hindu State may not prohibit cow slaughter for purposes considered to be religious by any of its subjects without the consent of the intelligent majority of such subjects so long as such slaughter is conducted in private and without any intention of provoking or giving offence to Hindus. That the very knowledge of any such slaughter would give offence to Hindus is inevitable. But unfortunately we know that in India cow slaughter is often resorted to defy and wound Hindu sentiment. This should be put down by every State that has the slightest regard for its subjects. But in my opinion the economic side of the cow question, if it is properly handled, automatically provides for the delicate religious side. Cow slaughter should be and can be made economically impossible, whereas unfortunately, of all the places in the world, it is the sacred animal of the Hindus which has become the cheapest for slaughter. To this end I suggest the following:

1 The letter was in reply to the addressee's dated January 10, 1927.

1. The State should in the open market buy out every [head of] cattle offered for sale by outbidding every other buyer.
2. The State should run dairies in all principal towns ensuring a cheap supply of milk.
3. The State should run tanneries where the hides, bones, etc., of all dead cattle in its possession should be utilized and should offer to buy again in the open market all privately-owned dead cattle.
4. The State should keep model cattle farms and instruct the people in the art of breeding and keeping cattle.
5. The State should make liberal provision . . .

From a microfilm: S. N. 12667

The letter is incomplete.
DEAR FRIEND,

Your letter written on Christmas Day has followed me in my travels and I am able to overtake it only today. I would ask you to believe me when I tell you that I have nothing against General Dyer or even Sir Michael O’Dwyer. They were both creatures and symptoms of a deep-seated disease of which I had not sufficient knowledge when I pleaded for co-operation at Amritsar. Whatever force there was in my plea was in my honest belief behind it. The Rowlatt Act and the subsequent events having opened my eyes, I cannot summon to my aid the fervour of Amritsar. My belief is shaken. Nothing has happened to restore it, though I am eager for its restoration. It gives me no pleasure to disbelieve men and measures. But I shall be false if I shut my eyes to facts as I see them. I think that non-co-operation is a fundamental fact in God’s plan, even as darkness is. There is no such thing as co-operation if there is no non-co-operation. If we give our co-operation for the prosecution of that which is good, we must withdraw it from that which is evil. I believe that the present British administration of India is on the whole not good but positively evil. The military policy and the revenue policy which includes the hideous

1 A.C.C. Harvey was on the staff of the Khalsa College, Amritsar, during 1919-20, and met Gandhiji when he visited the institution (S.N. 12094).
2 Harvey had referred to a meeting at Bombay on December 21, at which Sir Chimanlal Setalwad and Jinnah had “urged the policy of ‘back to Amritsar’”, whereas Gandhiji, he recalled, has persuaded the Congress at Amritsar to adopt a ‘policy of moderation and co-operation’. Harvey had observed that “Worse things were done on the nationalist side than that of the Government”. Ibid.
3 The source has “preachers”.
4 Criticizing the policy of non-co-operation as not being right “in the light of the universal religion”, Harvey had commended “the policy of co-operation, of friendly discussion, of ‘getting together’ to talk over things, to explain viewpoints, quietly, sincerely and with desire to understand, as so ably exemplified by such men as Lord Reading, Lord Irwin”. Further, Harvey had described the policy of non-co-operation as not only negative and therefore barren, “not only politically wrong, but also irreligious, contrary to the will of God”. He had appealed to Gandhiji “to ponder over these words so that you may perhaps be helpful to them to give a right lead” (S.N. 12094).
traffic in drink and drugs and the preference given to English interests over Indian are causing progressive deterioration both moral and material of the people of this unhappy country. English people are not all conscious of this tremendous wrong that is being done to the country and they will never be if we continue to give our co-operation whether through ignorance, through hypocrisy or through weakness.

Ludhiana Punjab] Non-co-operation, therefore, is the only alternative to an armed rebellion. It has been suggested that the object can be achieved by persuasion and argument. In my opinion, which is based upon extensive experience, argument has only a limited place in an endeavour to persuade people. In deepest matters argument hopelessly fails. But whilst I feel so strongly about my position, let me assure you that my non-co-operation is itself designed to bring about co-operation. I need hardly assure you. . . .

[A. C. C. HARVEY
GOVERNMENT INTERMEDIATE COLLEGE

From a photostat: S.N. 12804

38. A LETTER

AS AT THE ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,
January 12, 1927

DEAR FRIEND,

I do not propose to deal with your letter in the columns of Young India, because I think the average reader has not the difficulty that has presented itself to you. I could certainly call myself a votary of non-violence, if in spite of the consciousness that I kill thousands of invisible creatures, I incessantly long to be free from the necessity of so killing and avoid every occasion possible for so doing. And, I therefore long to be free from the bondage of the flesh which is birth and death. My refusal to live the present life does not end the agony. But refusal to have another body after the dissolution of the existing one, is a possibility capable of realization.

Yours sincerely,

From a photostat: S.N. 12805

1 The text in the source is incomplete.
2 The addressee is not known.
39. SPEECH AT DHANBAD

January 12, 1927

He said that on an enquiry from Babu Rajendra Prasad about the inclement weather he had come to know that rains even in winter were not quite unusual in the province and that that was to some extent necessary too. He was no doubt conscious of the immense difficulties the audience had to face on account of the rain; his own difficulties were no less. But he was capable of working in the midst of all sorts of difficulties, his life had been only a prolonged story of his fight with difficulties of every description.

After announcing the meeting to be addressed by him at six next evening, he proceeded to explain the purpose of his visit. He said that they were perhaps aware that his tour was specially intended to preach the message of the charkha and khaddar. He admitted that there was enough field in the country for other activities with a view to the attainment of swaraj but he had taken to the charkha because he had found that that could be prescribed with equal force for all—Hindus and Muslims, males and females, men and boys, touchables and untouchables. The charkha was the universal thing and as such it was to be taken up by all according to the capacity of each individual. Working at the wheel was the sacred business of every Indian; everyone was required to join this universal yajna. But if that was not possible for all, they could do one thing. They could at least put on khaddar.

Continuing, he said that khaddar work to be conducted on a large scale throughout India demanded a large sum of money to be spent over it. That money was to be supplied by the country. Nearly 16 lakhs were already collected and spent and as a result, nearly 50 thousand women who had formerly nothing to do, and about 4,000 men who also formerly had almost nothing to do, had got employment. Weavers, many of whom were compelled to give up their profession on account of hard competition with Lancashire weavers, had once more found occupation, while large sums had already gone to the carders and ginners. Spinning, therefore, was the saviour of the poor, while the middle-class men also could derive much benefit from it. Without humbly approaching the Government, without supplicating the rich, middle-class young men could solve a good deal of their unemployment problem by taking to the charkha. Riches were of course not to be expected from this work, but young men could very well earn an honest living by reverting to khaddar work.

Proceeding, he said that the fund, for which he was appealing for money, was called Deshbandhu Memorial Fund, started to commemorate the sacred memory of the late Deshbandhu. Khaddar was very dear to his heart. He had realized that the charkha was the thing for the whole of India and through that alone one could approach the masses for village reconstruction work which was the unrealized dream of his life.

1 The meeting was held in a local hall.
few days before his death, he had expressed his wish to the speaker to accompany him (Mahatmaji) on his tour for khaddar work. But “man proposes God disposes”. Before he could begin to work according to his plan, he was snatched away by the cruel hand of death. It was in order to fulfil his last wish, said Mahatmaji, that the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial Fund, to be utilized by the All-India Spinners’ Association, was inaugurated. He referred to the circumstances under which the All-Bengal Deshbandhu Memorial Fund was allowed to be spent over the Hospital, while at the very time he had appealed for money for the All-India Memorial Fund for khaddar work. It was time, said the speaker, that each one of them contributed his quota to fulfil the last wishes of Deshbandhu. By contributing to this fund the donor might serve two useful purposes at the same time; firstly they would honour the sacred memory of Deshbandhu who lived and died for them, and, secondly, they would be helping the poor with work and money.

Proceeding, Mahatmaji said that to purchase one yard of khaddar was to help the poor men of their country to the extent of about four annas, whereas spending money over foreign cloth was to send the same abroad to the untold miseries of their own people. To purchase Indian mill-made cloth did not mean helping the poor, for it was the capitalists who used to enjoy the largest amount of profit, doling out a negligible amount to the labourers, which was not sufficient for them even to keep their body and soul together. Three-fourths of the money spent over Indian mill-made cloths, said the speaker, filled the already overflowing coffers of the capitalists, while the labourers who were really in need of money did not get collectively more than one-fourth of the profit. The charkha was the only effective weapon to fight the poverty of the country to a successful close.

Mahatmaji then appealed for money. He wanted everyone present to contribute his mite for this noble work and asked them to send the money to the proper authority if they had not it with them at that time. He exhorted the audience to solemnly promise in that hall to put on khaddar habitually for all time to come. He said that he would ask them even to burn their foreign clothes, if they had any. But if they could not go so far as that, they must henceforward boycott all foreign clothes without the least hesitation. Khaddar had become the burning passion of his life because he had found that and that alone could give food to the poor. People might call him mad, but he could not give up that work for anything. He asked everyone present in that hall to pay whatever he could. He did not want that people should pay money out of fear or shame; he wanted every one of them to feel the nobility of the cause and then do whatever lay in his power.

Referring to untouchability, he said that that was greatest blot upon Hindu society and that should be wiped out at the soonest possible date. Hinduism never taught one man to consider another man as untouchable. By observing the custom of untouchability, Hindus were committing a sin. Swami Shraddhanand gave his life for the sake of the removal of untouchability. It was their duty to take up that work of service to the poor and the untouchables.

Incidentally he referred to the Hindu-Muslim tension and deplored the murder of Swamiji. But Sawamiji’s death could be turned to good account, if both the Hindus and the Muslims cleansed their hearts with his blood. That would be the work of purification, that would be a real shuddhi work. What was the duty of the Hindus? They should not seek to retaliate. The teaching of all religions was not to return evil for evil but good for evil. All the religions taught that the greatest conquest was the conquest of one’s own self. The Hindus should attain that self-possession. Abdul Rashid was a poor creature; he alone was not responsible for this diabolical deed. The bulk of the Muslim Press in Delhi and all those who had been holding up Swami Shraddhanand, Lala Lajpat Rai and Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya as the enemies of Islam collectively contributed to the murder. The results of those things were before them. The whole atmosphere of the country demanded purification. Enthusiasm like that of 1922 was necessary for their success in the battle they had undertaken, but that could not come until the process of purification had reached its completion. Everyone should, therefore, concentrate all his attention upon self-purification. It was wholly unwise to be inimical to the enemies, one should rather pity them.

The Searchlight, 16-1-1927

40. INDEPENDENCE

Year after year a resolution is moved in the Congress to amend the Congress creed so as to define swaraj as complete independence and year after year happily the Congress throws out the resolution by an overwhelming majority. The rejection of the resolution is proof of the sanity of the Congress. The moving of the resolution betrays the impatience (pardonable in the circumstances) of some ardent Congressmen who have lost all faith in the British intentions and who think that the British Government will never render justice to India. The advocates of independence forget that they betray want of faith in human nature and therefore in themselves. Why do they think that there can never be change of heart in those who are guiding the British people? Is it not more correct and more dignified to own that there is no change of heart because we are weak? Nature abhors weakness. We want from the British people and the world at large not mercy but justice that is our due. And justice will come when it is deserved by our being and feeling strong.
I am sure that the staunchest votary of independence does not mean that he will not have any British association on any terms whatsoever. Even when he says so, he means, as one of the supporters of the resolution admitted in answer to my question, that the British people will never accept association on equal terms. This is totally different from rejecting British association on any terms.

Indeed the word swaraj is all-embracing. It does include complete independence as it includes many other things. To give it one definite meaning is to narrow the outlook, and to limit what is at present happily limitless. Let the content of swaraj grow with the growth of national consciousness and aspirations. We may be satisfied today with dominion status. The future generations may not be, may want something better. Swaraj without any qualifying clause includes that which is better than the best one can conceive or have today. Swaraj means even under dominion status a capacity to declare independence at will. So long as we have not achieved that capacity, we have no swaraj. This is the least it should mean. South Africa has achieved that status today. It is a partnership at will of free peoples. Between Britain and the Dominions there is a partnership at will on terms of equality and for mutual benefit. What India will finally have is for her and her alone to determine. This power of determination remains unfettered by the existing creed. What therefore the creed does retain is the possibility of evolution of swaraj within the British Empire or call it the British Commonwealth. The cryptic meaning of swaraj I have often described to be within the Empire if possible, without if necessary. I venture to think that it is not possible to improve upon that conception. It is totally consistent with national self-respect and it provides for the highest growth of the nation.

After all, the real definition will be determined by our action, the means we adopt to achieve the goal. If we would but concentrate upon the means, swaraj will take care of itself. Our exploration should, therefore, take place in the direction of determining not the definition of an indefinable term like swaraj but in discovering the ways and means.

_Young India, 13-1-1927_
41. NOTE

INDIANS IN PANAMA

The Legislative Assembly of the Republic of Panama recently passed an Immigration Restriction Act prohibiting the entry of British Indians among others. President Chiari had in a well-considered message returned the Bill to the Assembly advising considerable amendments and reconsideration. But the Assembly refused to make the amendments recommended except in matters that were inevitable. The Assembly defended its restriction upon the liberty of British Indians on the ground of protection of the rights of posterity. There are at present not more than perhaps thirty Sindhi Indian merchants of fancy goods. It was acknowledged that their presence was no menace to the inhabitants of Panama. Nevertheless the law is retrospective in its effect with the exception that those who can prove continuous previous domicile of ten years may receive exemption certificates. I hardly think there are many settlers there who can prove continuous residence in Panama for such a long period. If African experience is any guide, Indian settlers abroad are not in the habit of staying out of India for such a long period. The matter is now, I understand, before the Foreign Office. It remains to be seen how far that office is able to protect the rights of the resident Indian population and of those who may choose to emigrate to Panama in search of an honest livelihood.

Young India, 13-1-1927

42. MESSAGE TO CONGRESSMEN

Have faith. Along with intellectual capacity develop strength of character.

[From Hindi]
Aaj, 13-1-1927
43. SPEECH AT DHANBAD

January 13, 1927

Mahatma Gandhi in replying thanked the commissioners for the welcome addresses they had presented him. He thanked particularly the commissioners of the Municipality for frankly confessing that khaddar and charkha were not much in use in the jurisdiction of their municipality. He said that he used to take keen interest in municipal affairs even when he was in South Africa. He knew that towns played a prominent part in the affairs of the country and that almost all movements in the modern world sprang from the towns. He was aware further that sense of civic responsibility was to be awakened in their young men. But in the peculiar condition of India, towns were at the most only of secondary importance. India lived in villages and towns, sank into insignificance when compared with seven lakhs of villages. This importance of village life in India was not to be lost sight of by the commissioners of the municipalities. There was a growing tendency in this country on the part of the educated men to cut off all their connection with villages and wipe them out of their memory. This tendency was to be checked. In Europe the villages depended for everything upon the towns which were the centres of all sorts of activities. But in India it was the villages which nourished the towns and as such it was the duty of every townsman to see that the healthy growth of the villagers was not interfered with in any way. One wondered how India could be so poor in spite of her exports exceeding her imports. The reason was that crores of rupees went out of this country to add to the prosperity of other people while the majority of their own men did not know what it was to have two full meals a day. Whatever little money was left in this country went to the coffers of merchants and middle men. He (Mahatmaji) did not envy their lot but the poor villages were not to be forgotten. They themselves were starving while they were supplying the townspeople not only with food but also with other luxuries. It was to find out a few morsels of food for these hungry millions that he was asking them to take to the charkha. The poor, weak, miserable villagers could eat and live if only they all used khaddar in preference to all other cloth. He wished them all to work at the charkha as a sacred duty but if they could not do so they could wear khaddar at least. He said that he was glad that they had introduced spinning on a small scale in their jurisdiction but the work remained still incomplete. All their activities would remain incomplete until they perfected the khaddar organization. He himself would not be satisfied till then. To work for khaddar was to work for the poor.

1 At the meeting, held in the morning in the Dhanbad town hall, Gandhiji was presented addresses by the Dhanbad Municipality and the Local Board. Gandhiji addressed altogether five meetings at Dhanbad, Jharia and other places.
That was why he had been devoting all his time and energy to the work. It was their duty to take up that work for the sake of the poor, for the country and for God.

Concluding, he thanked them once more for the warm reception they had accorded him.

The Searchlight, 16-1-1927

44. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, KATRAS

January 13, 1927

He said that he was glad to see them there. Last time when he was at Jharia, he had no opportunity to go to that place [Katras]. Jharia, he said, was a place which attracted people, both capitalists and labourers, from all parts of India. Labourers were the chief inhabitants of that place and as such he wanted to speak a few words to them.

Continuing, he said that he used to call himself also a labourer. If anybody enquired about his calling, he used to say that he was a weaver, or a cultivator. He would rather like to be called a scavenger. The profession of a scavenger was not to be looked down upon. He did a great benefit to human society. His profession was to cleanse the most dirty portion of a house. Society was, therefore, highly indebted to him. His was a profession of service and it was unwise to consider him low. His (speaker’s) mother, in fact, every mother, did the same thing as a scavenger. Did they hate their mothers for that reason? If his own mother had not done the work of a scavenger for him in his boyhood, he could not have lived so long and come in their midst to address them. It was not due to the profession that a scavenger should be looked down upon. Unless the heart of a man was dirty, there was no reason why he should be considered low, no matter how low his profession might be. His appeal, therefore, to the scavengers as a matter of fact, to all labourers, was that they should begin to cleanse themselves simultaneously with cleansing the household of other persons. He was aware that the labourers were addicted to drinking, gambling, smoking and other evil habits. They must be free of all these vices. He was in favour of total prohibition, but as long as that could not be achieved, they should themselves try to get rid of that pernicious habit. Credit lay in a man’s abstinence in the midst of all sorts of temptations. He appealed to them to give up drinking for God’s sake as well as for their own sake.

Referring to gambling, he said that was a most vicious practice. The Pandavas lost their all on that account. But they recovered at last because they were on the side of truth. Yudhishthira was himself repentant for what he did. Referring to their lustful

---

1 The meeting was held in a spacious pandal. Gandhiji spoke after an address of welcome in Hindi was presented to him.
habit, he said that he was aware that there were people who used to leave their wives and destroy their health and wealth after vile prostitutes. That was a very bad habit.
All women, other than one’s wife, were to be considered as sisters.

Smoking of bidi and ganja was also to be given up. He could not understand why people smoked ganja. He knew that even rich and learned men smoked cigarettes and bidis. But that was no reason why they also should be addicted to the same. There was no reason why one man should be addicted to vicious habits because another man was used to them. His appeal to even the educated men was that they should give up smoking.

Continuing, he said that labourers should remember that there were men who were poorer than them. They (the labourers) had money to spend over wine, gambling, smoking and all that, but there were people in villages who could not get even sufficient food and clothing to keep themselves alive. They could at least earn about 15 to 20 rupees, but their brothers in villages could seldom see the face of a pice. Had they any feeling for them? They themselves were poor. Was it not very reasonable, then, that they should realize the miseries of those who were poorer than even them, he asked. If they felt like that, it was their duty to wear khaddar exclusively. They should clothe themselves with khaddar woven with pure yarn spun by their poor sisters in villages. Whatever they paid for khaddar was paid to those poor creatures. Women who could not earn even a penny were earning about two annas a day each. He was appealing to them for that money to be paid to their poor fellow beings. They could help them with that money by wearing khaddar. The law of God was that man should sympathize with his fellow-creatures in distress. He appealed, therefore, in God’s name to them to exclude all clothes except khaddar and help him with money in cash, no matter how little it was, to carry on that work.
Khaddar worth Rs. 96 thousand was produced in Bihar the previous year and about 60 thousand worth was sold within a period of six months. All this money went to the homes of the poor. A good deal of money was now spent over the selling of khaddar.
If they purchased khaddar as they purchased foreign cloth, much of that money could be saved and utilized for the purpose of production. If they decided to do that, the entire amount of khaddar required in the country could be produced here without any difficulty. What was necessary was their sympathy and support; would they deny that?

Addressing the ladies he said that, if they wanted swaraj, which term was synonymous with Ramraj, they should each be like Sita. Sita was pure of heart, she kept her body clean by wearing hand-spun and hand-woven khaddar. She lived at a time when the charkha was to be found in every household and every woman used to spin. That time was to be revived again. The charkha should even now find as important a place as the household hearth.

Addressing others, the Mahatma said that, if they wanted freedom they would have to undergo considerable sacrifice. The minimum they could do was to put on khaddar. The khaddar movement must receive their whole-hearted support; they must render every possible financial support to that cause. He then narrated the circumstances in which the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial Fund was inaugurated and appealed to the audience to honour the sacred memory of the departed great by contributing to that fund.

Continuing, he said that the Deshbandhu Memorial Fund was to be utilized for the purpose of spreading khaddar. They had already got some money for the Fund but the work they had undertaken demanded more and more money. Sixty crores of rupees annually went out of the country; their aim was to keep that money here. A huge sum was, therefore, to be spent over that. Their task was great, but he hoped to fulfil it with their help. Everyone could pay to that fund without any difficulty; even Government servants could contribute to that. He hoped that he would not go disappointed from that place.

Referring to untouchability, he said that Swami Shraddhanand sacrificed his life for that cause. They should remove this blot at least for the sake of Swamiji. Hinduism had nothing to do with that pernicious system. The Gita never taught a man to consider another as untouchable.

Referring to Hindu-Muslim unity, he said that both the communities were to go through the process of purification before they could hope to attain that unity. To the Muslims, he said that, if anyone of them considered the murder of Swamiji as a praiseworthy act on the part of the murderer, it was a great mistake. He claimed to be a sanatani Hindu, but he had studied the Koran with as much reverence as the Gita. But he had nowhere found in the Koran any approval of such dastardly deeds. On the contrary, there were passages there distinctly against violence. If violence was to be committed, it was to be committed upon one’s own self for the purpose of fighting the evils in oneself, not upon another person. Hindus had become weak and cowardly; how could they expect to rise in spite of their weaknesses? The real shuddhi work was the work of self-purification and it was the duty of everyone of them to go through that process. He prayed to God to help them in their work.¹

The Searchlight, 19-1-1927

45. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, JHARIA ²

January 13, 1927

Mahatma Gandhi, in addressing the meeting, said that he was glad that the president of the Employees’ Association had complied with his request and did not read the address written in English. He had received two addresses in the morning.

¹ At the meeting, a purse of Rs. 885 was presented to Gandhiji and some money collected on the spot.

² At the meeting an address of welcome was presented to Gandhiji by the members of the Indian Colliery Employees’ Association, Jharia.
which were written in English. But he objected to the third, because there were few people in the meeting who could understand that language. He would have very much appreciated the address if it was written either in Hindi or in Bengali. He had no quarrel with the English language; it was, indeed, a good language. He claimed to have some knowledge of it. If he had any ill feeling against the English language, he would not have conducted an English paper. But all occasions were not favourable for using that language. They had their lingua franca, that is, Hindi. They could very well use that language on interprovincial matters no matter if it was faulty. A man was not to be judged by his words, they were to see whether his heart was sincere. He himself might speak grammatically incorrect Hindi, but his motive was honest and that was enough to recommend his speech to them.

Continuing, he said that Jharia was a place where people, Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs, Christians, Marwaris, Gujaratis, Bengalis, Biharis, in fact, people from all provinces of India flocked together. He hoped that they all lived together on friendly terms without bearing ill will to anyone.

Proceeding, he narrated the havoc caused to India by imported cloth. He said that it was but natural and desirable that man should try to do good to all, irrespective of their nationality and religion. But it was monstrous for a man to help others in such a way as to incur irreparable loss to his own house. Why did they put on foreign cloth then? Was it to help the weavers of Manchester? Certainly not. The one answer he had found to this question was that it was a fashion to put on foreign clothes and that khaddar was rough and coarse. But would they refuse the bread prepared by their mothers if it was bad and go begging from door to door for the better bread? Khaddar was the gift of their motherland and therefore sacred to them. They might demand of their mothers for better bread; but, as long as that was not ready, they had no other alternative but to take that contentedly. Similarly, they might try to improve the quality of khaddar but as long as that could not be done, they had to remain content with what was available, no matter how coarse it was.

Proceeding, he said that a characteristic feature of Indian civilization was that a man was to help his fellowmen in distress. By wearing khaddar, they could perform their religious duty, namely, helping the poor. Their Gita taught them that a man who did not perform yajna committed sin thereby. Spinning at the wheel was yajna for them; a spinning-wheel was to be kept in every household as a sacred altar. He said that he was just coming from the local khadi Bhandar. He had seen that khaddar worth only Rs. 1,000 was kept in stock in that shop and even that could not be consumed. He did not know how many rupees worth of foreign cloth was sold in Jharia, but he was sure that the sale of foreign cloth exceeded that of khaddar many times. It was a matter of great regret to him that even such a small khaddar shop could not be conducted in Jharia. He appealed to all to make it a point to wear khaddar. He requested them to solemnly promise to discard all foreign cloth and habitually wear khaddar.

Addressing the labourers, he asked them to observe temperance and put on khaddar in preference to all other cloth. They would thereby be giving food and clothing to hundreds of their own hungry men and women who could not earn even a single pice for want of occupation. Mahatma next touched upon untouchability and Hindu-Muslim tension.

Replying to the address, he said that he was glad that the work of the association was improving and he congratulated the organizers on their success. As to the second, namely, the relations between the capitalist and the labourer, he assured them that his sympathy was always with the poor labourers and that his aim was to establish harmony and peace between the employer and the employee. He said that he had, of course, done something for the labourers of Jamshedpur but he was not fully aware of local conditions. In Jamshedpur the leaders of the labourers included some of his own men and even his friend and brother, Mr. Andrews. Nevertheless, if his help was at any time necessary, he would try to do what little he could. He, of course, did not believe that all capitalists were bad and oppressive; on the contrary, he knew many who had really the good of the employees at heart. He was for equal and legitimate rights for all. He advised the labourers to be on the right path and said that he was sure that truth would triumph at last. He concluded his speech by once more appealing for money.¹

The Searchlight, 19-1-1927

46. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, AURANGABAD ²

January 14, 1927

He said that when he toured in Bihar on a previous occasion he had not the opportunity to come to that place. He was glad, therefore, to meet them there and thanked them for coming over to that place from distant villages. He said that his visit was intended to appeal to them to do some little work for India and for themselves and hoped that they would not disappoint him.

India, he said, was a poor country. Those who lived in the towns could scarcely imagine how poor the villagers were; even those villagers who had come to the meeting did not know that there were men living in far-off villages who were poorer than them even. These poor people lived in woeful obscurity dragging somehow or other their miserable existence to a melancholy close. The people of the towns depended for their livelihood upon the villagers who, in their turn, got money from those miserable creatures. They produced wealth for the whole country, while they themselves had no means to keep their bodies and souls together. The railways of India might bring some amount of wealth to a fortunate few, but they deprived the real producers of wealth of even their means of livelihood. He appealed to them in the name of God for those poor, wretched and miserable villagers who were the very backbone of Indian society.

¹ At the end of the speech Gandhiji was presented a purse of Rs. 1,001.
² About 10,000 people were present at the meeting which was held in the open maidan near the Dak Bungalow and which Gandhiji addressed for about half an hour.

Continuing, he described how the imports of foreign cloth had contributed to the misery and poverty of their people and explained how a check on that unlimited import might give an effective check to the growing poverty of the country. The most effective weapon he had devised to fight the course of such unnatural events was the spinning-wheel and he said he had come to recommend that to them. He was confident that if they could effectively boycott foreign cloth and take exclusively to khaddar, they could proceed a long way towards their goal, namely, swaraj. But if the political significance of khaddar was not recognized, there were other grounds strong enough to recommend it. If khaddar was not to be used as a political weapon, they might use it with a view to helping thousands of their poor countrymen. The charkha, he said, was their Annapurna because it had the power to give food and drink to almost an unlimited number of poor men. The poverty of their people was a universally recognized fact; even English chroniclers had in their books testified to the fact that there were thousands of people in India who did not know what it was to have two full meals a day. He himself had seen with his own eyes in Orissa what he had so long read only in books. People in Orissa were so poor that they had really no means of subsistence. Was it not their duty to help them?—he asked. If they could not help them in any other way, they might help them by wearing khadi. The work of khaddar could be done by all-Hindus and Muslims, males and females, men and boys. The Bengalis and the Punjabis, all could join this work and contribute their mite to its success. There was no ban even upon Government servants in respect of wearing khadi. Khaddar produced by their own brothers and sisters in the peaceful atmosphere of villages situated far off from the din and bustle of modern industrialism, deserved every sympathy and encouragement from them. It was sanctified with their memories of the past; it was their religious duty to put on khaddar in preference to every other kind of cloth.

Continuing, he said that money spent on foreign cloth went into the pockets of the weavers of Manchester and Lancashire, while that spent over Indian mill-made cloth filled the already-full coffers of the Ahmedabad merchants. It pained him to think that in spite of there being expert manufacturers in India, Indians had to pay so much money to foreign manufacturers. The East India Company might have been responsible for the extinction of their industry during the first period of their reign. They might have put an end to their textile industry by violence and their undesirable methods. But who was responsible for the continuance of that state of things, he asked. If they even now began to patronize khaddar, Indian cloth might once more become the observed of all observers of the world. They should take to spinning and khaddar as a means of prayashchitta. Even the rich men should begin to spin, not for money, but for setting an example to the credulous and imitative people of the villages. Hinduism strictly enjoined upon everyone to perform yajna. Yajna was that which was performed not in the interest of one’s own self, but in the interest of others. In the present circumstances of India, no other work could be more beneficial to the poor villagers than spinning and it was therefore the best possible yajna for the Indians.

Proceeding, the Mahatma said that in Bihar alone they had distributed Rs. 29,000 and Rs. 36,000 among the spinners and weavers, respectively. It seemed to him that the people of Bihar had love for khaddar, but if all of them had patronized it they might have distributed more wealth among the poor inhabitants of the province. About one hundred years ago, Patna used to produce very fine khadi which was exported to foreign countries and the people of those countries used that cloth as an object of luxury. The wheel had turned and India instead of exporting fine cloth to foreign countries consumed imported cloth worth crores of rupees and the people of India felt proud to wear fine foreign cloth. They as people of Bihar must remember the progress that the textile industry had made in Patna in the past and it was their duty to revive those good old days. They could do so by patronizing khaddar in every possible manner. Khaddar had made progress; fine khaddar was now available and the price also had considerably gone down as compared with what it was in 1921. If the people made adequate response it might still be made cheaper.

He then appealed for funds for the All-India Spinners’ Association and then dealt with the problem of untouchability and the problem of Hindu-Muslim unity.

He said that swaraj which had ever been the dream of his life had almost come in 1921-22. The real shuddhi work, namely, the process of purification, had begun at that time. A wave of enthusiasm had swept over the country and that was why they could come almost near their goal. The same chapter was to be repeated again, but that could not be done till dissensions and disunions kept them hopelessly divided.

Proceeding, he said that those who entered the Councils did it with the sincere desire of doing good to the country and they might do some good work as well. But how many could go to the Councils and how many were there who had right of voting, he asked. Sixty lakhs of voters did not constitute the whole of India; his aim was to raise the thirty crores of Indian people. Khaddar, he believed, might serve as a link between the rich and the poor; the spinning-wheel might bring about unity and harmony among the entire population of India. He appealed once more to the people to contribute to the funds of the All-India Spinners’ Association and prayed to God to help them in doing their duty.¹

¹ At the end of the meeting, Gandhiji was presented a purse of Rs. 2501.

The Searchlight, 21-1-1927

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
47. ENTRY IN VISITORS’ BOOK

GAYA,

Pausa Sud 12, 1983 [January 15, 1927]

I feel very happy to see this library. While thanking the donor, I pray for the progress of the library.

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 2509

48. TELEGRAM TO MANIBEHN PATEL

GAYA,

January 15, 1927

YOUR DELIGHTFUL LETTER. MASTER CARDING GINNING SOON.

BAPU

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Pateline, p. 46

49. SPEECH AT MEETING, GAYA

January 15, 1927

Mahatmaji, speaking in Hindi, regretted that the address presented to him on behalf of the municipality was written in English. He said that whenever he found an opportunity he had repeatedly asked the people to present him addresses either in the vernacular of their province or in the national language of India, namely, Hindi. He had no spite against the English language; he himself used that language on special occasions, but it was undesirable that they should use it while addressing their own men. He requested the municipality to use Hindi whenever they presented any address, not merely to himself, but to any other Indian leader.

Continuing, he said that Gaya was really a sacred place to the Hindus, a place of pilgrimage for them. But it pained him to see the deplorable state of the roads of that sacred city which was frequented by people from all parts of the country. He had occasion that morning to see some of the roads in Gaya. They surpassed in dirtiness even the roads of Ahmedabad, which was an old city and home of many poor people,

1 Of the Munnalal Library at Gaya
2 There was no Pausa Sud 12 in this year. Gandhiji was in Gaya on January 15, 1927 which corresponded to Pausa Sud 13.
3 At the meeting, Gandhiji was presented addresses by the Municipality and the District Board. which fact might be an excuse for the municipality of that place. He regretted to say that he had never before seen such dirty roads in any part of India. Gaya, being a place of all-India interest, its municipality ought to have been an ideal one, but he was sadly disappointed. He said that the commissioners should be up and doing in reforming the municipal arrangements of that great city. How could they do so? In order to achieve that end, the commissioners should themselves take up the work.
Mere dependence upon paid sweepers and scavengers would not better the situation.
He would rather request the chairman and the commissioners of the Board to take the broomsticks and buckets of water themselves and proceed to cleanse the roads and latrines of the city. Towns were of considerable importance to the development of a country. Growth of civic responsibilities in the people was an urgent necessity for their political emancipation. He said that the case of Gaya was not an exception.
There were many other municipalities in India which were guilty of such bad administration. But the exceptional character of Gaya city demanded it to be free from these evils. There was nothing to be ashamed of in sweeping the streets; he himself had done it in many places; he had done it even in Bihar, in Champaran. He was no lover of Western civilization; he would rather oppose all Western influences which tended to injure the vital interests of India. But he would welcome all that was good in Western culture. In respect of municipal administration, they had much to learn from the Western people. Glasgow and Birmingham were formerly as dirty as Gaya, or perhaps even worse. But the way in which the municipal administrators of those two places had reformed them was worthy to be imitated by the municipal commissioners of India. He hoped that the Gaya Municipality will be prompt in reforming the state of that city.

Continuing, he regretted that the Chairman of the Municipality did not inform him in the morning that he and his colleagues could not agree on two points, namely khaddar and removal of untouchability. In that case he might make time to try to convince them on those two points. If they wanted to create a link between them and the villagers, the charkha and khaddar were unavoidable for them. As regards untouchability, he did not think that there was any necessity of arguing on that point, after the death of Swami Shraddhanand. He claimed to be sanatani Hindu. But he had never found any of the Hindu scriptures sanctioning untouchability in the form in which it was practised by them. If untouchability was not removed, Hindu society might altogether perish in the near future. There were only three religions in the world, namely, Christianity, Islam and Hinduism. He would regard Buddhism and Sikhism as branches of Hinduism, as the Hindu Mahasabha had defined it. But the mighty Hindu society was fast disintegrating. Christianity and Islam, in fact, the entire non-Hindu population of the world, were keenly watching the movements of the Hindu society. If they wanted to justify their existence and revive their old glory, it was their clear duty to remove that blot from Hinduism.

He had received that morning a cable from Mr. Andrews. If they continued to tyranize upon the so-called untouchables, how could they expect to receive proper treatment at the hands of the white men in South Africa? Sjt. Gokhale had rightly said in one of his addresses that it was but quite natural that the white people should look down upon the Indians who so inhumanly treated certain sections of their own people. So long as the removal of untouchability was not achieved and the khaddar movement was not made to succeed, all their works would remain incomplete.

Continuing, he thanked the District Board for taking up khaddar work, although he was sorry that spinning could not be made popular with school-children.
He was not surprised, for he knew the habit of children. In order to make them spin regularly, the teachers should have to spin themselves. The example of teachers might prompt the students to cling to the charkha as a plaything and they might create wonders while playing with the same. He reminded the people of the good old days of their textile industry and asked them to endeavour their best to bring back those days.

The Searchlight, 21-1-1927

50. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, RAMNA

January 15, 1927

He said that he was reminded by the chairman of the municipality as well as by the president of the Hindu Sabha that Gaya was a sacred place of pilgrimage, hallowed by the association of Lord Buddha. But it pained him to see the miserable state of the latrines and the roads of Gaya dirtier than those which he had ever seen in his life. He said that he had reminded the commissioners of their duty, but, if the people had not developed sufficient sense of responsibility, it was impossible for the municipality to discharge its duty. Where the people were alert, the commissioners could not neglect their duty, for it was in the hands of the people themselves to replace those commissioners by new and better ones. He had advised the commissioners to sweep and cleanse the roads, he would advise all the people to join them in their work.
Keeping the roads clean was as much the duty of the citizens as of the scavengers; the latter could not discharge their duty if the former did not heartily co-operate with them.

Referring to the Hindu Sabha address, he said he was glad that the Sabha was trying to free the Hindus of cowardice. But he had found that the Hindus alone were not cowards. Cowardice had become the attribute of Indians as a whole. If they could get rid of this evil, there could be no power on earth to check their forward march.

He thanked the Hindu Sabha for working for khaddar and removal of untouchability. Untouchability, he had told them on a former occasion, was no part of Hinduism. They should hang down their head in shame before the world for indulging

1 Over 10,000 people attended the meeting at which an address of welcome was presented to Gandhiji by the local Hindu Sabha.
in that sin. The Gita taught them that man should not differentiate between a Brahmin and a Chandal. The interpretation which he would give to that verse was that man should serve both Brahmin and Chandal alike and hate none. According to Hinduism, there were only four varnas; there could not be a fifth one.

Proceeding, he said that shuddhi with him was synonymous with atmashuddhi, self-purification. They would work this shuddhi by loving the untouchables. Swami Shraddhanand had died for religion. The one burning passion of his life had been the regeneration of the untouchables. They should do away with that evil at least for the sake of the great Swami. He (the Mahatma) had of course his honest difference of opinion with Swamiji with regard to shuddhi as he (Swamiji) understood it. He said:

I have made no secret of the fact that I did not approve of all aspects of the shuddhi work. After much prayerful study of the Hindu Shastras I have come to the conclusion that there is no room in them for conversion such as they have in Islam and Christianity. I am also certain on a prayerful reading of the Koran that there is no warrant for the tabligh that is being promoted today. It is possible that I may be mistaken. Let God correct me in that case. I for myself would love to protect my religion with tapascharya—the way of prayerful suffering which is the royal road to success in any noble object. The real memorial that the Hindus can raise to Swamiji is to rid Hinduism of the curse of untouchability. Let both Hindus and Mussalmans cleanse their hearts with the purifying blood of Swamiji’s sacrifice. I must be free to read the Gita or the Koran of my own accord. Why should a Hindu compel me to read the one or a Mussalman to read the other? Why should I need a Christian to compel me to read the Bible? No one may stand between a man and his religion or God. He who has no inkling of religion, whose heart is arid and purified—how dare he purify (by proselytizing) others? But that is my opinion. And as I am a votary of liberty I have in spite of my opinion insisted that Shraddhanandji had as much right to propagate the Vedic dharma as a Mussalman to propagate that of the Koran. And if Shraddhanandji was assassinated for his shuddhi work, it did no credit to Islam. Hinduism is proud of the sacrifice and has been enriched by it. Let no Mussalman secretly approve of the act or believe that it has done any good to Islam. Let not a single Hindu harbour any thought of retaliation. If the Hindu and the Mussalman rid themselves of mutual distrust and fear, there is no power that can stop their freedom. We are the makers of our own slavery. I had sealed my lips up to now on this burning topic. It is Shraddhanandji’s sacrifice that has compelled me to open them to a certain extent. But I can give no guidance in this atmosphere. I shall only send my prayers to God that He may rid us of fear and hatred and distrust, and make us rely solely on the strength of love.

---

1 The paragraph that follows has been extracted from Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter” in Young India.

Referring to the protection of cows, he observed that it was a non-controversial matter and he was glad that they were doing so. The Hindus themselves were responsible for the present condition of Indian cows. If they did not sell their cows to the butchers for money, if they took proper care of the milch cows, their condition could not be so deplorable. He had heard that there was a goshala in Gaya. There were many such in India. If they could properly conduct them, they could easily maintain old and decrepit cows out of the income derived from milk, milk-products and hides of dead cows which could be made payable by establishing tanneries.

Continuing, Mahatma Ji appealed to the people to help the poor villagers by habitually wearing khadi. Charkha, he said, was their kamadhenu. It had the power to feed thousands of poor, starving villagers. He regretted that even a small khaddar shop could not be conducted in a town like Gaya. It pained him to see a small khaddar shop amidst a number of big shops full of foreign cloth. He longed to see that day when all the big shops in the market would be stocked with khaddar, while there would remain only one or two small shops with foreign and Indian mill-made cloth and even those few not properly conducted.

Concluding, he appealed to the people in the name of God, to contribute what little they could to the Deshbandhu Memorial Fund for khaddar work and thus give financial help to the poor people of their country.

The Searchlight, 21-1-1927; also Young India, 27-1-1927

51. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

[January 16, 1927]

CHI. MIRA,

I have your letter giving a description of your mishap, etc. I thought that the Bihar itinerary was sent to you, but I now remember it was not even ready when the first dates were sent. The Bihar dates were sent to you yesterday. I take it that you are using your map to locate the places and I suggest your writing the stations in Hindi.

1 From the postmark characters as an interesting and useful exercise.

With love,

BAPU

[PS.]

This is being written just after prayer time 5 a.m. for we are just going far away.

From the original: C.W. 5197.Courtesy: Mirabehn

52. LETTER TO DAHYABHAI M. PATEL

ON TOUR,

[January 16, 1927]¹

BHAISHRI DAHYABHAI,

I got your letter. There is no doubt that the condition of the cultivators is deteriorating in these times. But the causes of that deterioration go deeper than you think. Impatience will harm the cause. Anger does not mend matters. If you realize that the remedy lies not with the Government but with the cultivators, you will go ahead with your work without feeling unhappy all the time. If I get even a moment free, I will write about the subject in Navajivan. I got the cutting from the Prajabandhu. I did not get the one you say you sent before this. I think I shall come upon it by and by.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 2698. Courtesy: Dahyabhai M. Patel

53. LETTER TO V. G. DESAI

Sunday [January 16, 1927]²

BHAISHRI VALJI,

I got your letter. I had also got your telegram. Every effort is being made to send you all the original writings.

I wish to engage you for translation work. I am writing to Kaka about it. The series being contributed by Shankerlal’s brother-in-law

¹ From the postmark
² A Gujarati weekly of Ahmedabad
³ From the postmark
will continue for a long time and I feel that you can be utilized in that work. I am writing to Kaka as he is the editor.

I suppose you remember that March 11 is the date fixed for the meeting of [All-India] Cow-protection [Association]. You must have found the names of the members and written to them. Sunday you must have despatched the Association circular regarding the meeting, and finalized the accounts by obtaining details from Revashankerbhai, the Ashram, etc.

Are you taking care of your health?

Vandemataram from

MOHANDAS
BHAISHRI VALJI DESAI
SATYAGRAHA ASHRAM
SABARMATI

From a photostat of the Gujarati: C.W. 7390. Courtesy: V. G. Desai

54. SPEECH AT WOMEN’S MEETING, SONEPUR

January 16, 1927

Think of Sita. Do you imagine she went about with Rama in his 14 years’ forest wanderings with heavy ornaments like you? Do you think they add to your beauty? Sita cared for the beauty of her heart and covered her body with pure khaddar. The heavy ornaments you wear are not only ugly but harmful inasmuch as they are the permanent receptacles of dirt. Free yourselves of these shackles and relieve the poverty of people who have no clothes, much less ornaments, to wear.

Young India, 27-1-1927

---

1 The addressee was then secretary of the Association.
2 Revashanker J. Zaveri, who was then the treasurer of the Association
3 The Sabarmati Ashram, the headquarters of the Association
4 Extracted from Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”
55. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, CHHAPRA

January 16, 1927

Mahatmaji made a joint reply. After having thanked the Boards for kindly presenting him the addresses, he said that although he would speak a few words on other subjects also, his visit was mainly intended to preach the message of khaddar and charkha. He said that one of the addresses referred to his efforts to root out the evil of untouchability. It was the burning desire of his heart to wipe out that blot from Hindu society. Swami Shraddhanand, he said, who died in his attempts to do so, used to say that unless one untouchable was kept as family member in the house of each and every Indian leader, they could not say that untouchability was removed. The fifth varna was their own creation; the Shastras never sanctioned it. If the leaders kept the untouchables in their houses, there was no reason why people should blame them. ‘Serve the untouchables’ was the lesson of Swami Shraddhanand’s life. They should learn further the lesson of fearlessness from his life and that of the evils of communalism from his death. He said that Hindu-Muslim unity was a dire necessity for them. Unless that was attained they could not even dream of swaraj.

Continuing, he said that the poverty of their country was a universally admitted fact. If they were true to their religion and true to their country, they could not but have sympathy with the poor. The best way they could help the poor was by wearing khadi. They should not spend even a cowrie over foreign or Indian mill-made clothes.

He appealed once more to them to put on khaddar in preference to all other clothes.

He then announced that he would himself sell khaddar in that meeting, and, with a few pieces of Khadi in his hand, he stood on the dais and called for purchasers...

The Searchlight, 21-1-1927

---

1 At the meeting, which was attended by about ten thousand people, Gandhiji was presented addresses in Hindi by the Municipality and the District Board. He later addressed a women’s meeting at the Town Hall before proceeding to Ekma.
56. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, SEWAN

[January 16, 1927]

I am glad you say that your sub-division is better than other parts so far as Hindu-Muslim unity is concerned. But can you say that you are so united that your unity will stand the strain of anything happening elsewhere? I wish there can be at least one province, one district, one sub-division in this vast land which can proudly say that no power on earth can foment a Hindu-Muslim quarrel there. We may think we are living but disunited we are worse than dead. The Hindu thinks that in quarrelling with the Mussalman he is benefiting Hinduism, and the Mussalman thinks that in fighting a Hindu he is benefiting Islam. But each is ruining his faith. And the poison has spread as among the members of the communities themselves. And no wonder. For one man cannot do right in one department of life whilst he is occupied in doing wrong in any other department. Life is one indivisible whole.

I said at Comilla that the problem had passed out of human hands, and that God had taken it into His own. Maybe the statement springs from my egotism. But I do not think so. I have ample reason for it. With my hand on my breast, I can say that not a minute in my life am I forgetful of God. For over twenty years I have been doing everything that I have done as in the presence of God. Hindu-Muslim unity I had made a mission of my life. I worked for it in South Africa, I toiled for it here, I did penance for it, but God was not satisfied, God did not want me to take any credit for the work. And so I have now washed my hands. I am helpless. I have exhausted all my effort. But as I am a believer in God, as I never for a moment lose faith in Him, as I content myself with the joy and sorrow that He wills for me, I may feel helpless, but I never lose hope. Something within me tells me that Hindu-Muslim unity must come and will come sooner than we might dare to hope, that God will one day force it on us, in spite of ourselves. That is why I said that it has passed into the hands of God. This, I said, might be taken to be an arrogant utterance—arrogant inasmuch as it implies that it is not in the power of any other man to achieve the work, as if no one has worked for it more than I. But there is no arrogance in the statement. Hundreds may have done the work with the same earnestness, love and energy, but none with more. And I believe that all of them must be feeling as helpless as I. In 1920, I said that not even the British Empire with all the resources of its armed strength, diplomacy and organization could efface us, make us slaves, or divide Hindus from Mussalmans. But that was because I thought we were godfearing then. We trusted one another and we relied on one another’s strength. But how am I to prevail upon you today to cast off all fear, hatred and distrust? Shradhanandji was not the enemy of Mussalmans. He was a warrior, he had the courage of his convictions. Assassination was not the way to fight him. Let us Hindus and Mussalmans both wash the sins of our heart with his blood.

---

1 Condensed summary of a speech delivered in Hindi
2 Sewan is a sub-divisional town in the district of Saran, which, according to The Searchlight, 21-1-1927, Gandhiji covered on January 16.

And what is it that we should be fighting for? We Hindus may be idol-worshippers. We may be mistaken. But when God gave every man the right to make mistakes, when God suffers us to live although we are idol-worshippers, why should not the Mussalmans suffer us too? And if a Mussalman thinks that he must slaughter the cow, why should a Hindu stay his hands by force? Why should he not fall on bended knees before him and plead with him? But we will do no such thing. Well then, God will one day make the Mussalman and the Hindu do what we will not do today. If you are believers, I beseech you to retire into yourselves and pray to the In-dweller to stay your hands from wrong and to make them do the right thing. Let that be our prayer every morning and evening. There is no other way.

Young India, 27-1-1927

57. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

January 17, 1927

CHI. MIRA,

We are now on the north of the Ganges and therefore letters will for the time being take longer to reach you. We are on Rajendra Babu’s ancestral property in a remote village1 though not remote from the railway line.

What is your progress in Hindi now? Are you speaking it without reserve? Do you get much time to talk in Hindi? Or do you have to carry on your work through English? I hope you have continued your weekly Hindi letter to the Ashram. It is fairly cold here. It is never warm in the shade. The weather is also damp but bracing. One feels like walking all day long and yet I can get but little [time].

1 Jeeradei

I am there somewhere about 20th March. I suppose you would want to be there till then but in no case if the place does not suit you.

With love,

_Yours_,

BAPU

[PS.]

I hope you have got the itinerary. If not, address your letters to Khadi Office, Muradpore, Patna. It is incessant wandering. By the time your reply to this reaches me, it will be quite 10 days, I fear. I reach Patna 30th inst.

From the original: C.W. 5198. Courtesy: Miraben

---

58. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

_Ch. Mani,_

I got your letter. There is nothing in your letter which you need keep back from others. However, no one else except Mahadev has read it.

Surely, I will never force you to marry, nor will Father. If I could have my way I would rather force girls to remain unmarried. It is the girls themselves who compel me to force them to marry. You are, therefore, safe so far as I am concerned. I was being harassed by people who did not understand you and so I wrote to you to ascertain your desire and that too because I had observed your restlessness. I do know of young women (girls) whose restlessness is due to their desire to get married, though they themselves are not aware of this. I am sure that is cannot be so in your case. Still it was my duty to draw your attention to the problem, and I also wished to suggest that there was no harm in thinking of getting married even after having expressed one’s intention not to do so. Of course it would be different if you had taken a vow. In that case, the heavens may fall but the vow must not be violated. Since, however, you have not taken a vow, even a person like me may ask you what you desire. Others may even urge you to get married. This does not mean that I want you to take a vow. That you may do when you feel that it is absolutely necessary. I shall never feel compelled again to mention the subject of marriage to you; not only that, but I shall even prevent others from doing so. You should, however, get over your restlessness and so live always that your unmarried state may win people’s respect. Brahmacharya should be understood in a spiritual sense, and in order that it may bring you spiritual benefit, you should observe it in the manner recently complained by me in my autobiography in Navajivan. You should, therefore, maintain a calm and cheerful temper, be industrious in your habits and cultivate a tolerant outlook.

---

1 As in the printed source

Read Margopadeshika\(^1\) several times over till you have mastered it. Understand the meaning of every word in the Gita with the help of the rules explained in that book.

I have sent a wire to you asking you to master ginning and carding. I have sent a wire to Narayandas too at Karachi. But have not received a reply from him; whether or not I hear from him, I have received similar requests from others too. I intend to send you to various places from time to time for teaching spinning. I have asked for a salary of Rs. 50 and travelling expenses. This will give you good experience too. We shall think afterwards what to do then. You should not take up any work there for the present. You should, however, continue drawing Rs. 30/-. You may save what you can from it. I will ask for an account later on.

BLESSINGS FROM

BAPU

CHL. MANIBEHN PATEL
SATYAGRAHA ASHRAM
SABARMATI

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Pateln, pp. 47-51

---

\(^1\) Sanskrit Reader written by Dr. R. G. Bhandarkar

74

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
59. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

Silence Day, Pausa Sud 14 [January 17, 1927]

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I have your letter. I have sent you a telegram regarding the stores at Gondia and Amaravati. If I have to visit Gondia, I may be able to go there too. I have to leave Patna on the 31st evening. I can catch the Bombay Mail at Mogulsarai on the 1st. I shall be reaching Jabalpur . . . on the same day. That means that I shall be arriving in Gondia on the 2nd. I shall get a seat in the Bhusaval [Mail] at any rate on the 3rd.

Now about Manilal. I have written to Kishorelal in that connection and have asked him to show the letter to you. My suggestion just now is that either Gomatibehn or Vijayalakshmi should ask Sushila, without mentioning the name, whether she intends to get married. I gather from Kishorelal’s letter that none of the girls is yet thinking of getting married. If this is true, why should we persuade her to marry? Kishorelal believes that, if at all, Sushila may be thinking of getting married. That is why it seems to me that we can proceed further in the matter after ascertaining whether she wishes to get married. Meanwhile I will definitely come there. Perhaps we shall then know more clearly what to do.

My tour in these parts is going on at great speed . . . is arranged well. Better arrangements . . . can be made though today we are in Rajendra Babu’s village.

Although Janakibehn’s complaint of piles has become less acute, it is better to consult a doctor and do as he suggests. I should not like you to postpone consulting a doctor.

I hope Vinoba is keeping good health. I wish to hear about Shivaji’s health too.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2879

---

1 The itinerary of Gandhiji’s tour mentioned in the letter suggests that the letter was written in January 1927. Although Pausa Sud 14 corresponded to January 16, Monday was January 17.

2 Omission is in the source.

3 Omission is in the source.

4 ibid.
DEAR SISTERS,

I have your letter.

I always write to you on Mondays; but as I keep moving from town to town, the day on which you receive my letters may vary. Till now I was to the south of the Ganga. Yesterday I came over to the north, crossing the river. From Patna we crossed over to the other side by means of a boat. A car awaited us there and took us to Sonepur. Soil here is not sticky like mud; it has a mixture of sand in it. It, therefore, feels soft to the feet like velvet. Ba and I walked for about a mile. We were not wearing sandals. We liked to walk on the sand very much indeed. Mother Ganga prepares new soil every year in this part of the country. For hundreds of miles she carries mud and silt with her and, depositing them here, she runs along to the sea as though she wanted to avoid feeling embarrassed by being told by anyone of the great good she was doing to the land.

Today we are in Rajendra Babu’s village. Rajbansi Devi is here. Chandramukhi and Vidyavati are at present in Chhapra, the town where he (i.e., Rajendra Babu) lives. We met them in Chhapra. Both are in relatively good health—Chandramukhi slightly worse than she was in the Ashram and Vidyavati slightly better.

In a women’s meeting yesterday I started educating them on a new subject. The women here wear heavy silver ornaments; they keep their children dirty and do not comb their hair. I, therefore, criticized their habit of wearing ornaments. The result was that some of them gave away their anklets, necklaces and so on to me, and promised that they would neither buy nor wear others in future. While doing this, I thought of all of you. Ba is giving me great help in this work, but that is because she agrees with me in this. You can do work of this kind better than I. But that requires self-sacrifice, enthusiasm, and opportunities. All this you can have there. Do we not sing atmavat-svabhuteshu? We should regard all as ourselves. Then, on finding somebody’s children dirty, we would feel as if our own children were dirty and so would feel ashamed; on finding someone else suffer would ourselves suffer and seek a remedy for the suffering.

1 (He sees rightly who) in all things sees himself.

But I have exceeded my limit. Much as I like to exceed, I feel nervous when I look at the pile of correspondence lying before me.

Find out from a map where Patna, Sonepur, and Chhapra are situated. This is the land where King Janaka lived.

Blessings from

BAPU

[PS.]

With whose permission did Gangabehn Zaveri let her foot be sprained? Well, God’s will be done! If one is negligent, one deserves punishment.

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 3635

61. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

[January 18, 1927]¹

CHI. MIRA.

I have two more letters from you. Yes, you may go to Hardwar as soon as you wish. You need not stay there for teaching carding and spinning unless it is a help to learning Hindi. As you do not seem to be getting much Hindi, it is better to go away at once. In no case must you endanger your health. You will therefore judge for yourself and do what you think is best. You will of course tell Vidyavati exactly as you feel.

Your letter about the assassination makes me sad. I am hoping that you probably did not understand what your informers were saying or feeling. Hatred is of course there or there would have been no strife. But to think that youngsters can be infected makes one shudder.

Did you go to Swamiji’s house?

With love,

Yours,

BAPU

From the original: C.W. 5199. Courtesy: Mirabehn

¹ From the postmark
62. KHADI IN BIHAR

Sjt. Rajendra Prasad has sent me the report on the work of the Bihar branch of the A.I.S.A. for the year ending September 1926. It is a record of steady progress. After mentioning the vicissitudes the organization had to pass through in the early stages, the report says:

There are 8 production and sale centres and 11 sale depots. Besides these there are sale agencies at 6 places and more are being established. The agency has 65 wholetime workers including two honorary workers. Their average earnings are Rs. 25 per month. During the year under review 2,698 spinners earned Rs. 29,519; 489 weavers, Rs. 36,862; 6 tailors, Rs. 230 during two months; 8 dyers and printers Rs. 2,273 during six months including the cost of dyes; and 40 washermen Rs. 1,951 during six months. It goes without saying that the spinners and weavers too were not wholetime workers. They worked only during their spare time and irregularly.

The report then says:

The progress that has been made is not only in regard to increased production and sale but also in regard to the quality of khaddar and reduction in its price.

The average price in 1923 was Rs. 1-0-5 per yard of fine cloth. It was reduced to As. 13 in 1926. When the yarn was very weak the weaving charge was 3 annas 3 pies per yard of 45 inches width. On account of the improvement in the yarn, it has now been reduced to 2 annas 3 pies per yard of the same width. Nor is there any difficulty about getting sufficient weavers to weave hand-spun yarn. Some of these weavers weave even up to 72 inches width and the variety of weaving includes twills, coatings of various designs, etc. Dyeing and printing is being developed under the special care of a graduate of the Bihar Vidyapith.

The report, after mentioning the work in different branches of the organization, says:

If we could dispose of our present stock, it is expected that we shall be able to reduce our prices still further by about 10 p.c.

The statement, which gave figures of the production and sale of khaddar, is not reproduced here.
It naturally dwells upon the successful peripatetic exhibitions that were held during the year, of which a detailed account has appeared from time to time in these pages. The interesting report contains the following pregnant reflections:

The province of Bihar is particularly suited for khaddar work. The population is agricultural; there is no industry in the province worth the name, outside the coalfields of Chhotanagpur and apart from the great Tata Iron and Steel Works at Jamshedpur. The tradition of spinning is still extant in most parts of it and the number of weavers and looms is large enough to supply almost the entire requirement of cloth of the province. Cotton, though of an inferior quality, is also produced in many parts of it. The work of production of khaddar is, therefore, not very difficult, although it requires organization and technical skill to improve its quality. It can be extended almost indefinitely, if sufficient capital and organizing and technical skill are forthcoming.

The above narrative will show the progress made in reviving the ancient but practically all but dead industry of spinning in Bihar. We have succeeded in touching but the merest fringe of the vast area in which spinning can be revived and made to furnish a much-needed occupation for the idle hours of our great agricultural population. That its possibilities are vast can hardly be denied. That some supplementary occupation, not to speak of income, is necessary for the population will be apparent from the fact that the average quantity of land actually cultivated with food and non-food crops is less than three-quarters of an acre per head. It is the yield of this small quantity of land, nearly four-fifths of which are unirrigated and depend upon the freaks of the monsoon, that is expected not only to keep the body and soul together of every individual but also to supply him with cloth and other necessaries of life and to meet among others all demands of the zamindar, the society and the State. Looked at from this point of view the admittedly scanty earning of 7 pies per day by charkha is not after all so small and does afford, as experience has shown, substantial relief to a class of people who need such relief but cannot get it through forced unemployment. It is believed that agriculture does not require more than a hundred days’ labour in the year but the work is so distributed that the agriculturist cannot leave his farm and seek work elsewhere at a distance. In fact, the nature of the work is such that it allows plenty of leisure but at short intervals and a supplementary industry, which is not capable of being taken up and put aside to be resumed later at the stage at which it was left, cannot be usefully taken up. Experience has shown that the charkha alone can serve the purpose.

It is hoped that the appeal made in the report to the public for the purchase of khaddar will meet with the liberal response it deserves. Young India, 20-1-1927
Organizers of meetings seem to require constant reminders that not English but Hindi or Hindustani is the common medium of expression among the masses. I have observed that unlike as in 1921 the addresses hitherto presented to me during the tour have been in most cases in English. The absurdity became patent when an address in English on behalf of the employees of Jharia collieries was sought to be read to me and that, at a big mass meeting attended by thousands, hardly fifty of whom could possibly understand English. The vast majority could have easily followed Hindi and a very large number could have understood Bengali. The officers of the association were from Bengal. If the English drafting was meant for me, it was wholly unnecessary. They might have written the address in Bengali and given me a translation in Hindi or even in English. But to inflict English on that big audience would have been an insult to them. I hope that the time is coming when, if the proceedings are conducted in a language the majority cannot understand, they would leave such meetings. Be it said to the credit of the chairman at this meeting that he saw the absurdity as soon as I drew his attention to it and very courteously allowed the address to be taken as read. May the incident serve as a warning to all the organizers but more especially those in the Andhradesh, Tamil Nadu, Kerala and Karnatak. I know their difficulty. But they have had now for six years in their midst an efficient organization for the spread of Hindi. Their addresses should be in the vernaculars of their respective provinces with a Hindi translation for my benefit. I have always made an exception in Dravida land and delivered my speeches in English wherever they have so desired. But I do think that the time has come when they should dispense with English for big public meetings. Really it is the English-speaking leaders who are blocking the way to our rapid progress among the masses by their refusal to learn Hindi which can be easily picked up inside of three months even in Dravida land, if the learners will give three hours per day. Let those who doubt give a trial to the Hindi Prachar Karyalaya conducted in Madras under the aegis of the Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, Prayag. They will find at the head office in Triplicane and the branches in Andhradesh and elsewhere books and teachers that will satisfy them. There is no excuse save idleness or disinclination for not knowing Hindi which is understood by over twenty crores of the people of Hindustan.

Young India, 20-1-1927

64. NOTES

ALL-INDIA DESHUBANDHU MEMORIAL

I hope the readers of Young India have not forgotten the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial. When I suspended touring after the Cawnpore Congress for one year, I knew that the collection of funds for the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial to which I had pledged myself would be suspended. But it was inevitable. At the time of suspension I had stated that, if God willed it, at the end of the year I would resume my tour for the collection. I resumed it at Calcutta and all the collections that I am now making will be for the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial except where the donors otherwise specify the object of their donations. And since the object of the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial is village organization and that through the spinning movement, all these collections automatically become part of the All-India Spinners’ Association which is the agency through which the Memorial collections are to be utilized for the purpose. A resolution to this effect was passed by the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial Committee at Cawnpore in 1925. I trust, therefore, that those who are in charge of the organization of meetings in connection with my tour will take good care to inform those who may attend meetings of the object of the tour. There should be no desire to spring a surprise upon those who attend meetings by asking for subscription. The honest course is to let them know beforehand that they will be asked to pay. No one need pay unless he believes in the Memorial and its object. I know, too, that a man may revere the memory of Deshbandhu and still not believe in the spinning movement. But I would venture to remind such people of what were Deshbandhu’s last wishes expressed to his wife, his sister and his trusted lieutenants and Satis Chandra Das Gupta of Khadi Pratishthan and to me almost exactly 7 days before his death. He said that as soon as he descended from Darjeeling, he would throw himself heart and soul into the spinning movement. He could see that that was the greatest constructive movement we could undertake and that it was the most effective method of village organization and village reconstruction. It was for that reason that he had asked me to send for Satis Babu with whom he had discussed the plan of working the spinning movement and it was for the spinning movement that he had intended to spend the largest part of the money that had been collected for village reconstruction. The Spinners’ Association, therefore, is the natural outcome, if I may say so, of Deshbandhu’s wishes.

TO ORGANIZERS

If all goes well, I hope during the year to cover, besides Bihar, part of Maharashtra, Madras Presidency including Karnatak, U.P., Bengal and Orissa. I should love to visit the other provinces also if time and health permit and if they intend to subscribe to the Memorial, that is, khadi work.

To Orissa I have promised to go and pass there, so far as it is humanly possible, the month of November, not because I expect to make large collections but because it is to my mind an epitome of our distressful condition. Orissa regenerate is to me the regeneration for the whole of India. It is a land which need not be the poorest in the country. Its people are in no way inferior to those of the other parts of India. They have a fine history all their own. They have magnificent temples. They have the Lord of the Universe in their midst who knows no distinction between his creatures. And yet, sad to relate, under the very shadow of the mighty temple people die of hunger in their thousands. It is a land of chronic poverty, chronic famine, and chronic disease. Nowhere have I seen in the eyes of people so much blankness, so much despair, so much lifelessness as in Orissa. I therefore look forward to my stay in November with sad pleasure.

It is a province that can be, ought to be, easily organized for spinning, because the people have no work. The whole of Orissa cannot be transplanted to the factories of Bengal or the factories of all India put together. It would be wrong even if it was possible. Happily it is not possible. The people must live on their own land and learn to be resourceful, industrious, and learn even to be happy. They have forgotten what happiness can be. Let the workers in Orissa, therefore, understand their responsibility. I expect them to throw themselves heart and soul into the spinning movement. Let them not think of the whole of Orissa. Let them think of single villages where they will establish themselves, and where they may, by prayerful and persistent effort, lift the people out of the Slough of Despond into which they have stuck.
And though, as I have said, I do not expect to make large collections, I shall welcome the only pies of the people who will attend meetings, even as I welcomed them when I travelled in 1921. The sight of old people with their trembling fingers untying the knots which firmly held their pies and willingly surrendering them to me is never to be forgotten. I want to see it again and renew, if a renewal is necessary, the determination that this winter of despair is to be changed into the summer of hope and happiness within a measurable distance of time.

May I ask the organizers also to bear in mind that the tour is to be almost incessant and that I must do my editing and attend to my correspondence during the hours they may leave for me and in the trains? Besides Mondays, at least three hours should be left for me in addition to the time required for ablutions and meals. All night demonstrations must be avoided. It is impossible after a strenuous day’s work to stand the strain of disturbance during sleeping hours.

And as this is to be a purely business tour, the meetings should be so arranged and the audiences should be so seated as to leave passages for collectors to pass to and fro. All shoutings and noises should be avoided. I have observed that where management is efficient, collections mount up. The audiences have invariably been found by me to be responsive. Though the thousands of the rich are welcome, I know that it is the coppers and the single rupees of the poor people that bless the movement. It is theirs and let them freely contribute to it their mite.

Young India, 20-1-1927

65. THE CENTRAL FACT

During my tour in so far as it has progressed up to now, I have observed that spinning organizations have not an accurate register of spinners and that the figures supplied and published by me from time to time in these pages were based upon the deductions drawn from the actual wages paid to the spinners. For statistical information the calculation is sound enough because it must err on the right side, i.e., of understatement. But it is not good enough for the movement itself. The spinning movement depends for its permanence upon a vital and direct contact being established between the workers and the spinners; for then and then only shall we be able to understand the wants, aspirations and limitations of the spinners. The object is to penetrate the remotest Indian homes in the innumerable villages of India and to introduce a ray of hope and light into these homes. This we shall never do, if we do not establish a living touch with the spinners. We cannot, therefore, be satisfied with the work of middlemen whom we may not and do not know. We must be able to trace the course of every pie till it is safely deposited in the hands of the spinners. And let it be remembered that spinning is the central fact of the movement, not weaving, not dyeing, not printing, not even carding and ginning, anterior though the last two processes are to spinning. For the economic solution depends upon a supplementary employment being found for the largest number of the semi-starved millions. That employment by far the best is spinning and that alone, as will be seen by a study of the figures for the various provinces given in these pages.

The Bihar figures reproduced in this issue show 489 weavers against 2,698 spinners. My own observation is that ten spinners are required to feed one weaver both working for the same amount of time. The ultimate ambition is to teach the spinners carding and ginning so as to enable them to increase their earnings as spinners without much effort and without much training. This is being done on a fairly large scale in Bihar, Bengal and the Madras Presidency. The Spinners’ Association can justify its existence therefore only upon its achieving a progressive amelioration in the economic condition of the vast masses who can be reached in no other way in a shorter time. The movement depends also for its increasing influence and vitality upon this fact of its tender care for the millions of whom it has as yet only touched but a small part.

Workers have suggested to me that, if an accurate register is to be kept of every spinner, it would involve extra cost. Possibly, it will. Not being in charge of a single centre, I am unable fully to understand the difficulty of keeping such registers. But I can say without any fear of challenge that, whatever the cost may be, a complete register of spinners is an absolute necessity until spinning has become an automatically working movement beyond risk of destruction. The extra cost that the keeping of such a register may involve will be worth undertaking if we are to put the movement on a stable foundation. What an accurate and simultaneous entry of every pie received and spent in a banking corporation is to its honest existence and steady growth, an accurate register of spinners is to the honest existence and steady growth of the spinning movement. I hope therefore that every spinning organization will without any loss of time set about keeping a full and up-to-date register of its spinners. Needless to say that the workers who will be in charge of the registers and who will come in contact with the spinners must be men—and how nice if they were women?—of unimpeachable character and purity. The discovery of this flaw in the movement was made by me through the hypersensitivity of the workers of Bengal. In my notice of the Abhoy Ashram report, I made an incidental observation that our statements of figures must not contain “abouts” and “nearlies” and then I made a general observation about the necessity of purity of character. I had in making that observation no one in particular in mind but owing to the juxtaposition of the general remark to the mention of the work of the Abhoy Ashram some of its inmates suspected that my remarks were aimed at them. I had no difficulty in disabusing their minds of the suspicion; but the conversation enabled me to understand and convince the members of the Ashram of the necessity of keeping an accurate up-to-date register of spinners. I am therefore not sorry for the paragraph that I wrote in my notice of the Abhoy Ashram, if only because it has led to the discovery of the flaw in our human account-keeping. But let me reiterate for the information of all concerned that in this spinning movement which is fraught with tremendous consequences, we cannot put too much stress upon the absolute necessity of members of our organizations being and remaining beyond suspicion, and if we are to attain this standard of purity, we will have to develop a thick skin enough to stand and take in good part well-meant suggestions, criticisms and observations.

Young India, 20-1-1927

66. A CANDID CRITIC

I must not withhold the following letter from the readers:

I have perused your article ‘Swamiji the Martyr’ with the care and reverence it deserves. I have read it five times before attempting to criticize it. This is to avoid hasty criticism.

The article is undoubtedly written in fascinating language. I envy your style. It attracts, but to me it appears, that it is rather dangerously attractive.

1 Vide “Abhoy Ashram Khadi Work”, 30-12-1926.
My criticism is based on my estimation of your character. I have often debated with some friends on this subject. They hold that you are a statesman in the garb of a saint—ready to forgo truth in the cause of your country. I have on the contrary maintained that you are a saint—who has entered politics in fulfilment of your mission, to practise truth in the face of most trying and perplexing circumstances. I shall be very obliged to know if my estimation is correct. For if it is not, the criticism that follows has little value. I am of the opinion that a man of policy is within his rights to write in the manner you have done.

You will agree with me that to suppress truth is a form of falsehood; to refuse to call a spade a spade when you feel it like that is cowardice; and that fearlessness and truth go together.

Do you feel, Mahatmaji, that the murder of Swamiji was an inhuman, barbarous and cruel act of a Muslim ruffian and that the entire Muslim community should be ashamed of it? Why do you refuse to characterize it as such? Instead of condemning the deed and the doer, and those who are responsible for this act (those who describe Hindu leaders as Kafirs—the hot Muslim propagandists and the mad Muslim priests), you have begun to defend the murderer and hold an apology for the community. You never defended Dyer. Is not a European a brother too?

You say further, Islam means peace. Is this truth? Islam as taught by the Koran and practised by Muslims ever since its birth never meant peace. What makes you write a thing so patently wrong? Buddhism, Christianity, Hinduism of course teach peace, but not Islam. May I know what makes you think and write like this?

You never minced matters when condemning the wrongs of the Government, you never minced matters when you condemned Arya Samaj, why fear to condemn Muslims for even proved wrongs?

I am sure if such a black act had been committed by a Hindu against a Muslim leader (which Heaven forbid!), you would have condemned the murderer and the community in unsparing terms. You would have asked Hindus to repent in sack-cloth and ashes, to offer fasts, hold hartal, raise memorial to the departed Muslim and many other things. Why do you accord preferential treatment to your ‘blood brothers’ the Muslims?

A truth-teller knows no fear, not even of the sword of Islam and I trust you will oblige me by giving reply to above in the columns of your esteemed weekly.

The writer is frank and obviously in earnest and reflects the prevalent mood.
To clothe me with sainthood is too early even if it is possible. I myself do not feel a saint in any shape or form. But I do feel I am a votary of Truth in spite of all my errors of unconscious omission and commission. The correspondent has judged rightly that I am not "a statesman in the garb of a saint". But since Truth is the highest wisdom, sometimes my acts appear to be consistent with the highest statesmanship. But I hope I have no policy in me save the policy of truth and ahimsa. I will not sacrifice truth and ahimsa even for the deliverance of my country or religion. This is as much as to say that neither can be so delivered.

In writing about the assassination of Swamiji, I have not suppressed truth. I do believe the act to be all that the correspondent describes. But I feel pity for the murderer even as I felt for General Dyer. Let not the correspondent forget that I refused to be party to any agitation for the prosecution of General Dyer. I do claim that a European is just as much brother to me as a Mussalman Indian or a Hindu.

What I do feel about the assassin is that he is himself a victim of foul irreligious propaganda in the name of religion. Hence it is that I have held the newspapers that have corrupted the public mind to be responsible for the murder. I do hold the maulvis and all those who have indulged in exciting hatred against Swamiji to be responsible.

But I do regard Islam to be a religion of peace in the same sense as Christianity, Buddhism and Hinduism are. No doubt there are differences in degree, but the object of these religions is peace. I know the passages that can be quoted from the Koran to the contrary. But so is it possible to quote passages from the Vedas to the contrary. What is the meaning of imprecations pronounced against the Anaryas? Of course these passages bear today a different meaning but at one time they did wear a dreadful aspect. What is the meaning of the treatment of untouchables by us Hindus? Let not the pot call the kettle black. The fact is that we are all growing. I have given my opinion that the followers of Islam are too free with the sword. But that is not due to the teaching of the Koran. That is due in my opinion to the environment in which Islam was born. Christianity has a bloody record against it, not because Jesus was found wanting, but because the environment in which it spread was not responsive to his lofty teaching.

\[1\] Non-Aryans

These two, Christianity and Islam, are after all religions of but yesterday. They are yet in the course of being interpreted. I reject the claim of maulvis to give a final interpretation to the message of Mahomed as I reject that of the Christian clergy to give a final interpretation to the message of Jesus. Both are being interpreted in the lives of those who are living these messages in silence and in perfect self-dedication. Bluster is no religion nor is vast learning stored in capacious brains. The seat of religion is in the heart. We Hindus, Christians, Mussalmans and others have to write the interpretation of our respective faiths with our own crimson blood and not otherwise.

Young India, 20-1-1927

67. SPEECH AT MADHUBANI ¹

January 20, 1927

Mahatmaji in replying thanked the Boards for presenting him addresses. He thanked the boys of the Brahmacharya Ashram also for singing before him the sweet Vedic hymns. He said that there was neither any necessity, nor had he so much time at his disposal to reply separately to all the addresses presented to him. But one thing had drawn his attention. He said that he was told in three or four addresses that attempts were being made to start Ayurvedic dispensaries in many parts of the province. It seemed to him that the people of Bihar were interesting themselves in the Ayurvedic system of treatment. He had expressed his opinion on the subject on many occasions and he would like to draw their attention to that. He believed that there was a good deal of truth in that system, but he believed none the less that the practitioners of that system had their own defects and joined the profession without proper training. He admitted that the Western system of medical treatment was very defective, but he knew this also that the Indians did not do even half of what the people of Europe were doing for the success of their medical science. But they had great opportunity to work for the improvement of that science. He requested the Municipalities and District Boards to see to this matter. He further requested the vaidyas to make a scientific study of the system. If there were defects in the system, ¹ At the meeting, addresses were presented to Gandhiji on behalf of the Municipality, the District Board, the goshalas, the Youngmen’s Debating Club and the Arya Samaj.

and defects there certainly were, they should not try to conceal them; on the contrary, every effort should be made to remove them.

Continuing, he said that he was glad to learn that the organizers of the Madhubani goshala agreed with his views on the utilization of the hides of dead cattle for the improvement of the cattle themselves. Goshalas, he said, had two aspects, one economic and the other religious. The question of cow-protection was a non-controversial matter. He did not understand why there should be any quarrel with the Muslims on that point. His views on kurbani, he said, remained unchanged.

Continuing, he said that the existing line of work of the goshala had also many defects in it. They should be maintained in the right and proper way. The organizers of these houses should be thoroughly acquainted with the treatment of animal diseases. They should know how to house and feed the cows, how to make milk cheaper for the poor village purchasers; in fact, the conductors of goshalas must thoroughly study the science of cattle-keeping and then alone could the purpose of goshalas be served.

Proceeding, he said that he had done all he could for the attainment of Hindu-Muslim unity but had failed. For that reason he had given up reading newspapers even. He had no time to read them either. His condition, he said, had become like king Janaka of Mithila who had looked indifferently when his own city was burning, for he had done all he could to prevent the fire. Similarly his (Mahatma J’s) attitude towards Hindu-Muslim differences was that of indifference for he knew that it was not in his power to remedy it. He said he did not know how or when Hindu-Muslim unity would come. The people of this country had gone mad; they were unhesitatingly cutting the throats of each other. He could not be a party to it. His religion was of non-violence, his faith in non-violence remained as unshaken as it was before, although attempts were made by his friends to convince him of the utility of violence on special occasions. To him all things were not as they seemed and he believed firmly that non-violence was the religion through which alone one could triumph ultimately. For all those reasons, he said, he had stopped dealing with the subject altogether. But he believed that the unity would certainly come one day, if not through the agency of man, through the agency of God.

Referring to khaddar, he said that he was glad that a purse was presented to him for khaddar work. But from Madhubani he expected much more. Madhubani, he said, was a big khaddar centre. He saw that many poor spinners of the place came four or five miles walking on foot with their yarn to take cotton or money from the workers. He knew that there were people who were even poorer than they. While he was at Champaran he had heard a lady complain that she could not take her bath in the Ganges and clean her clothes because she had no additional clothes to spare. This might have been an exaggeration but such cases were not absent. There was no other way to relieve the poverty of those people except by giving them an occupation and the best possible occupation they could give them was spinning.

Continuing, he said that he had just heard a hymn from the Isopanishad which meant that those who did not work stole other men’s property. What did it mean, he asked. It did not mean that he actually stole other men’s property but it meant that he lived on the food earned by other men’s labour. As a matter of fact, no man had any right to live, unless he worked not only for himself but for all men alike, for an individual is but a drop in the great ocean of humanity. Similarly, the Gita taught him that no man should eat unless he had performed yajna and of the many yajnas sanctioned by that sacred book, that of working for others was the best. Spinning, then, was the only work which could help thousands of people; it was the universal yajna which could be performed by all.

Addressing the ladies, he said that to him all who were clad in foreign clothes were naked, for nothing but khaddar could cover the nakedness of Indians.

Mahatmaji appealed to the people to look into the affairs of the local national school and of the goshala and help them with money if they deserved it. It was the duty of a citizen, he said, to help his fellow-beings and institutions in distress.

He concluded by appealing once more for money for khaddar work and asking people to purchase khadi which was stocked at the meeting.

_The Searchlight, 26-1-1927_

---

68. SPEECH AT PUBLIC MEETING, SAMASTIPUR

_January 20, 1927_

He said that he was glad to see them once more. It was impossible for him to forget the people of Samastipur who had once brought him there in a special train with Bapu Brajkishore Prasad and others. He had, therefore, come to Samastipur with great hope. His tour, he said, was intended to preach the message of khaddar. It pained him very much to see that most of the people who had come to see him had not put on khaddar. He had preached the message of khaddar for five long years from thousands of platforms but still the people were reluctant to use khadi. Bihar had the capacity to produce as much khaddar as could be consumed in the province and if only the people patronized that great cottage industry, thousands of their unemployed men and women—ginners, carders, spinners, weavers, and even bleachers and washermen—could be provided with food and clothing. Every farthing that they could spend on khadi would go to the homes of their poor countrymen. It was their religious duty, therefore, to put on khadi and khadi alone.

Continuing, he said that by purchasing mill-made cloth they were helping only the rich mill-owners of either Lancashire or Ahmedabad. He was intimately acquainted with the condition of labourers through Anasuyabehn. He knew it definitely that the labourers were little benefited by the huge amount of money that people spent over mill-made cloth. The rich mill-owners were not in need of money and they had a wide market even outside India, but the poor countrymen of theirs were dying for a bit of rough bread. He knew how poor the people of Bihar were, for he had been in Champaran for a long time. Would they not be kind and sympathetic to these poor people, he asked.

Proceeding, he said that money was necessary for the furtherance of khaddar work. In order to save crores of money permanently in the country, crores of money were to be invested in the beginning. He had come to their door to beg of them that money. He regretted that no khaddar was stocked at the place of the meeting, although he was told on his arrival that there were khaddar shops in the town and that some khaddar would surely be stocked on the spot. Nevertheless he requested the people to go at once to the khaddar shop and clothe themselves in khadi.

Concluding, Mahatmaji spoke a few words on the evils of untouchability and paid an eloquent tribute to Shraddhanand, the martyr, who had embraced death in his attempt to regenerate the untouchables.

An address of welcome on behalf of the Municipality was then read by Babu Giriwardhar, Chairman, to which Mahatmaji made a short reply. He expressed his satisfaction that there was no ill-feeling between the Hindu and the Mussalmans of Samastipur. It was a great thing. He hoped that that state of things would continue to exist.

Referring to their desire to have a khaddar-producing centre at Samastipur, he said that if they sincerely desired such an organization, Rajendra Babu would surely look into the matter. He hoped that if requisite amount of money was advanced by the people themselves, Rajendra Babu would be coming to their help with all the energy he possessed.

Referring to the national school, he regretted that it was not what it ought to have been. He saw there certain charkhas and the students were also seen sitting by them, but it was all a mockery, a mere show. Neither the teacher nor the students knew anything about spinning. He had given proper instructions to the head master and he (the head master) had agreed to work according to that plan. He hoped that they would send him a satisfactory report within a month.

Continuing, he said that the municipalities could do a good deal of work if they so desired. They could push on the khaddar work to the great profit of not only the work but of themselves also.

A purse of Rs. 2,000 was then presented to him on which he remarked that Samastipur should not have contributed such a small amount.

The Searchlight, 26-1-1927
69. LETTER TO ABBAS TYABJI

AKOLA,
February 7, 1927

MY DEAR BHRRR',

I was delighted to receive your note. Of course you had great success in Kathiawar. Ramdas told all about it.

Sohaila’ certainly will have my blessings, if she and hers will behave themselves and wear khadi.

Here is the letter you want for Dr. Mehta. But must you go to Rangoon for the amount? Why can you not collect what you can locally and the rest may be collected without your going to Rangoon, seeing that you will allow Hindus to participate in the contributions? Of course if you go to Rangoon you will collect the small amount you mention in a few days.

With love,

Yours,

BHRRR

From a photostat: S.N. 9557

70. LETTER TO MAGANLAL GANDHI

AKOLA,
Silence Day [February 7, 1927]

CHI. MAGANLAL,

I got your letter and Radha’s, and also other letters, acquainting me with Rukhi’s progress. Now we need not worry on her account. We are crushed under the triple burden of the doctor’s services as also those rendered by others. We ought not to think of repaying it. Even the thought of a token payment would be sinful. We can return their kindness only with a general awakening of our conscience. How can we make our young men and women see this? Had we been house-holders, even a single such illness would have consumed what-ever Santok might have kept back. But there is no end to the illnesses

---

1 This was a form of greeting used by Gandhiji and Abbas Tyabji for each other.
2 Addresssee’s daughter who was engaged to Mahomed Habib of Aligarh around us. Why, even amongst those whom Santok regards as her own there is no less misery. . . .'

I expect that separate accounts of all these matters are properly maintained; I mean they ought to be. I would say they are correctly maintained only if the rent and other items are correctly entered. I see you have been carrying rather a heavy burden. You alone know how it should or could be lightened. How are things going on at Vijapur? How much khadi has been lying with us? Hurry up with the statement about our agricultural activities, which is to be sent to Sir Gangaram. I have another letter from him.

_Blessings from_

BAPU

[PS.]

Radha should not expect a separate letter for some time, but she should write to me all the same.

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 7774. Courtesy: Radhabehn Chaudhri

71. LETTER TO MAGANLAL GANDHI

[Feb. 7, 1927]

... serve us and others should attend to our comforts. Do we really deserve all this? Please think over this. It will be long before we really serve the world. At the moment we just accept what the world offers us, claiming to be social workers. Let us live up to the world’s expectations of us. May I hope you will contribute your full mite to achieve this?

_Blessings from_

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 8839. Courtesy: Radhabehn Chaudhri

---

1. As in the source
2. From the reference to accepting services this appears to have been written about the same time as the preceding letter.
3. The earlier part of this letter is not available.
72. LETTER TO ASHRAM WOMEN

AKOLA,

_Silence Day [February 7, 1927]_

SISTERS,

Today I am observing my day of silence in the midst of the members of our Ashram family. Kishorelalbhai, Gomatibehn, Nathji, Tulsi Maher and Tara—are not all these to be regarded as belonging to our Ashram? And who would regard Nanabhai, his wife and Sushila as outsiders? So do not expect me to write anything except about them this week.

Gomatibehn is still having a little fever, and is confined to bed. But she is cheerful; no one could say from her face that she was suffering from a long and serious illness. The reason for this cheerfulness is her faith. May we all have such faith!

Kishorelalbhai is getting on as usual. It cannot be said that he has acquired more strength. He even had fever and shivering last night. The fever lasted for a short time and subsided.

Whenever there is illness among the dear ones, Nathji cannot but be in their midst.

Nanabhai is perpetually ill. He is down with asthma but his face shows great calm.

_Blessings from_

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 3638

73. LETTER TO RAMDAS GANDHI

AKOLA,

_Silence Day [February 7, 1927]_

CHI. RAMDAS,

I have been getting your letters. You should improve your health a great deal. Today we are here in the midst of Gomatibehn, Kishorelalbhai and Tulsi Maher. And here too is Nathji.

_Blessings from_

BAPU
Programme:
9       Bhusaval
10      Jalgaon
11      Chopda
12      Amalner
13-14   Dhulia
I do not know the subsequent programme.

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 6853

74. LETTER TO ANASUYABEHN SARABHAI

AKOLA,
Silence Day, February 7, 1927

CHI. ANASUYABEHN,

Today we are in Akola. Kishorelal has been ill for a long time and now Gomatibehn is bed-ridden. His elder brother, Nanabhai is also ill. In spite of all this the family’s tranquillity and faith in dharma is great. Meeting them is a rare pleasure.

The summer heat has already started in this part of the country.

I had already asked you about Sparrow¹. Her letters that followed have shocked me. I have written to her. If she shows you the letter, read it. I was much distressed.

I am awaiting a detailed letter from you.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: S.N. 32826

75. LETTER TO V. A. SUNDARAM

February 8, 1927

MY DEAR SUNDARAM,

I am glad you are by Devdas’s side. His stay there is bound to do him good. You should have an operation without delay for

¹ Helene Haussding
Savitri’s tonsillitis. You had become irregular about sending me weekly verses. I am glad you have now recommenced.

Yours,

BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 3198

76. LETTER TO MANILAL GANDHI

ON THE TRAIN,

Tuesday [February 8, 1927]

CHH. MANILAL,

Now I can let you have the news. I have almost settled the betrothal. But although you have given me the authority to finalize the matter I do not propose to exercise it.

Herewith a letter from Sushila; she is Tarabehn’s elder sister. At 19 she is in good health though slightly hard of hearing. She knows Gujarati and Marathi. She also understands Hindi and a little English. She had her schooling up to the fourth form. I send with this Sushila’s photograph. She is Kishorelalbhai’s niece. Her parents are alive. Sushila is good at painting and also tries a little music. She plays on the harmonium. She is good at house work. She has herself written the letter without any help. She has also been told that you were almost engaged in South Africa. I would not have been able to find out a better match. Initially the suggestion came from Jamnalalji. Sushila’s brother is to be operated upon. The marriage can be fixed for the 11th of March if he recovers [by then], and you can set sail immediately. If the operation is not successful marriage would be postponed on account of the mourning.

Now about you. I believe . . .² you have no disease such as syphilis or diabetes. I also told Sushila that . . .³ if you ever go astray she should try to stop you and if you persist she should leave you.

Now along with your approval I want a solemn assurance from you that . . .⁴ you shall honour Sushila’s freedom; that you shall treat her as your companion, never as a slave; that you shall take as much

¹ Gandhiji left Akola on February 8; vide “Letter to Mirabehn”, 7-2-1927.
² A few lines are omitted here.
³ Two lines are omitted here.
⁴ A line is omitted here.
care of her person as of your own; that you shall not force her to surrender to your passion, but that you shall take your pleasure only with her consent. I would advise you to set certain limits to your enjoyment.

While describing your good points I have let it be known that you are generous, guileless, and affectionate; that you have great love for the motherland and want to serve her.

I carry a grave responsibility. Here is a devout family. I would be glad if we become related. They have left everything to me. You must never deceive me. I would be mortally hurt if Sushila suffered the least unhappiness. She has impressed me as an innocent girl true to her name¹.

You know my attitude towards women. Men have not been treating them well. I have proposed this alliance assuming you to be capable of coming up to my ideals.

Now if you are agreeable to this engagement, wire to me and write a detailed letter. If you do not approve of this match or if you cannot accept the conditions I have laid down, wire to me: “Unable accept”², and if you would say ‘Yes’, then wire, “Approve match, can satisfy your test”³.

Write to me at length. Here is my address: 10th Jalgaon; 11th Jalgaon; 12th Chopda; 13th, 14th and 15th Dhulia.

With the fear of God in your heart, write to me only the truth. May God bless you.

_Blessings from_
_BAPU_

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 9124. Courtesy: Sushilaben Gandhi

¹ _Sushila_ literally means ‘of virtuous character’.
² The source has this word in English.
³ _ibid._

VOL. 38 : 2 JANUARY, 1927 - 3 JUNE, 1927  97
77. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

Tuesday, February 8, 1927

CHI. MATHURADAS.

I have your letter. You are always in my thoughts but I just do not find time to write. I did not know that Mahadev too had not been able to write to you.

I have sent your letter to Pattani Saheb and asked him to reply to you direct. The only reply he will send is that you should stay there. Devdas has sent you Dr. Ansari’s letter. Let me know your decision after reading it.

Perhaps you do not know that Revashankarbhai is going to Ceylon, taking Dhiru with him.

Even if you do not write letters, Pyarelal must. Even otherwise Pyarelal should write to me as a rule.

Blessings
BAPU

[PS.]

Dates: 10th Bhusaval, 11th Jalgaon, 12th Amalner, 13-14Dhulia.
I do not know the names of the other places.

From the Gujarati original: Pyarelal Papers. Nehru Memorial Museum and Library. Courtesy: Beladevi Nayyar and Dr. Sushila Nayyar

78. SPEECH AT NATIONAL SCHOOL, KHAMGAON

February 8, 1927

The reason why I have taken the trouble to carry out this examination is that I have heard much praise of you, and what I am saying now is not to criticize you, but because I appreciate your effort and wish to help you. I must inform you that I am not satisfied if this is the standard of the most brilliant boy of the school. I am not satisfied either with his pronunciation or with the translation. English pronunciations were also bad. Only teachers who can teach correct pronunciation, whether of Sanskrit or English, should be employed. If such teachers are not available, then we should stop teaching. But we have forsaken satyagraha and so plan our work to please the people anyhow. Let us follow truth in our system of education too. I will now suggest a little modification in your attitude to the charkha.¹

I see that the charkha has a place on your programme, but it is one out of the four or five things you teach here. Now I want you to understand that the charkha has a place all its own, for reasons that should be obvious to you. For charkha is not one of the professions that you teach. A profession is for earning a livelihood, and if charkha was to be taught as a profession it should have no place on your syllabus. But it has a special purpose. When you put it in line with carpentry, clay-modelling, etc., you are guilty of a confusion of thought. Charkha is an instrument of service. In a national school therefore where the nation expects us to train national servants, the scheme of studies will centre round the charkha. It is a science in itself and it is a science which gives us a knowledge of the means of ameliorating the condition of the masses.

Devotion to a cause is no longer a strong point in our life. A true brahmachari is one who is devoted to his ideal and single-minded in his pursuit of the Brahman. If you at all want to give a place to the charkha, then it ought to have a special place. The distinctive quality of our national schools should be that we treat them as a great yajna and should train ourselves to run them accordingly. You must always think how much the knowledge of English helps in the propagation of the charkha, what support the Gita gives to the charkha, and what improvement you can effect in it if you learn carpentry and smithy.²

Do you know that we have not a national institution where mechanical engineering is taught and where good spindles are made? If therefore you learn mechanics, concentrate on learning how to make a true spindle and how to mend a wrong one. You should be able to tell the circumference of an ideal wheel, the distance between the axle and the poles, the number of revolutions of your spindle, etc. A carpenter in a national school will not have as his ambition the making of an ideal cabinet, but of an ideal charkha. In short, you should study the charkha scientifically and with religious zeal, i.e., with a view to making it the mightiest lever of the nation’s salvation.

Young India, 17-2-1927

¹ This paragraph is taken from Navajivan, 20-2-1927.
² ibid.
79. SPEECH ON UNTOUCHABILITY, KHAMGAON

February 8, 1927

If I could think of anything that is untouchable it is foreign clothes. Anything that is prejudicial to the welfare of the nation is untouchable. Anything that is calculated to do the nation a disservice is untouchable. Liquor therefore is untouchable, foreign cloth is untouchable, but no human being is untouchable, and I regard it as fiendish or satanic to regard a fifth of the land as untouchable.

Young India, 17-2-1927

80. SPEECH ON TILAK SWARAJ FUND, PACHORA

February 8, 1927

Mahatmaji addressed the meeting emphasizing the need for khaddar and the removal of untouchability. Some questions were put to him and he answered them. The important question was as to how the one crore of rupees collected for the Tilak Swaraj Fund had been spent.

In replying to this question at length, Mahatmaji invited the curious to study the audit accounts published by the All-India Congress Committee. Every pie had been properly accounted for. Did they distrust the honesty of the treasurers like Seth Revashanker Jagjivan Zaveri and Seth Jannalal Bajaj? The fact was that some people had given their contributions specially earmarked for certain purposes and they were being spent for them. For example, Seth Revashankerbhai had himself given Rs. 40,000 for educational purposes in Kathiawar. A gentleman in Bombay had given two to three lakhs for the removal of untouchability and they were being properly used.

Both the treasurers as well as Mr. Shankerlal Banker, the Secretary of the All-India Spinners’ Association, had given magnificent donations and it was not likely that they would be careless in the management of the funds. Capable business man as every one of them was, he was, however, ready to admit that there were some losses in some cases, but the total could not in any case exceed Rs. 50,000. They were due to the inevitable risk that every business man has to face. In Bihar, for instance, khadi was sold on credit to a number of people who had failed to satisfy the obligations. In Andhra, good Konda Venkatappayya was imposed upon by certain people. He had disbursed certain amounts, which could not be readily realized. He had put undue trust in them and they had deceived him. Everyone knew that he had not taken a single pie for himself. Then there were cases of loss, which the greatest carefulness on one’s part does not always succeed in avoiding. Recently Sjt. Mahadev Desai, who had been in the service for ten years, now as a trusted "hamal" (cooler) lost Rs. 400 at

\[1\] From Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”
Bhandara. Could he ask him to repay the amount? He was bound to enter it in the accounts as being lost, though Mahadev Desai himself was looking forward to make good the loss as soon as possible.

These things were bound to happen in the regular course of business and he would even warn the audience that on rare occasions there might be even frauds. But, knowing all these things, if they thought that good work was being done, they might give whatever they could. He for himself was bound to trust the workers, whom the people trusted. Sjt. Dastane, for instance, was their worker. If he commanded their trust, why should Gandhiji distrust him? Mahatmaji assured them that every pie would be credited and accounted for and every loss accurately shown.

Knowing all these things, if they wanted to subscribe to the Deshbandhu Memorial Fund, which is the same as the Khaddar Fund, let them subscribe; and he assured them that whatever they gave would be carefully spent and accounted for in the best manner possible.

_The Hindu, 12-2-1927_

81. BE IN TIME

The eventful month of April will be soon on us with its memories of the birth of the nation accompanied by unparalleled rejoicings in which lakhs upon lakhs of people took part and which showed the possibilities of what the nation, if it could only act with one mind, could do. It is a month which showed also what haughty, revengeful and merciless Imperialism could do to save itself. The 6th and the 13th of April are never-to-be-forgotten days in the life of the nation. Since then the nation has been struggling not to return evil for evil, not to act in a spirit of retaliation, but to use for self-purification the mingled crimson stream that flowed in Jallianwala. The nation has been struggling to express itself in a non-violent spirit expressed by the spinning-wheel and khadi, the removal of untouchability and solidarity of the different sects and creeds. It is clear, however, that khadi is the only thing in which the whole nation can take part. If we want to act non-violently, we must act constructively, patiently and with quiet and quenchless confidence in ourselves and in our method. We must evolve unity, strength and iron discipline. We must learn to give effect to our views in spite of the vast odds against us. Let us realize that the British rule is imposed upon us because British commerce is forced upon us. If we could but purify British commerce, we would purify the British connection. Our commercial transactions with the British as with the world should be on our terms and should therefore be mutually beneficial and absolutely voluntary. But Lancashire cloth is a symbol of our helpless exploitation, whereas khadi is the symbol of self-help, self-reliance and freedom, not merely of individuals or groups, sects or clans, but of the whole nation. It is a movement in which the prince and the pauper, men and women, boys and girls, Hindus and Mussalmans, Christians, Parsis and Jews, Englishmen, Americans and Japanese, if they wish well to India and get rid of the spirit of exploitation, can also take part. Thus it is a unique movement. It is good not merely for some, not merely for the vast majority, but it is good for all. We may do many other and many more things during the forthcoming National Week. But let us at least organize khadi. Here are the ways:

---

1 1919

1. We can, every one of us, buy as much khadi as we can.
2. We can sell as much khadi as we can.
3. We can spin as much yarn as we can.
4. We can give as much as we can to the All-India Spinners’ Association and collect from others.
5. Lastly, if we have the will and the opportunity, we can dedicate ourselves wholly to khadi work.

As I write this, the question arises in my own mind: ‘But what about the immediate present, what about the Bengal detenus who are pining away in their prison-cells without any knowledge of charges against them, without any trial and without knowing how long they are to be detained?’ My answer however is quite clear. If I could think of any other more expeditious method of setting them free, I would adopt it and suggest it today; but there is not. Slow, as this may seem, it is, in my humble opinion, the surest and the quickest method. Let those therefore who have belief in khadi or who have no belief in anything else, do their best bit during the National Week. A true soldier does not argue as he marches how success is going to be ultimately achieved. But he is confident that if he only plays his humble part well, somehow or other the battle will be won. It is in that spirit that every one of us should act. It is not given to us to know the future, But it is given to every one of us to know how to do our own part well. Let us then do that which we know is possible for us if we only will.

Young India, 10-2-1927
82. NATIONAL LANGUAGE

In reply to my innocent paragraph about the evil habit of using English at our public meetings, a habit happily growing less day by day, a correspondent writes:1

_The Hindu_ of 28th January quotes _in extenso_ your article2 in _Young India_ suggesting that in your proposed tour to the Southern Presidency, any address that may be presented to you should be in the vernacular of the place. You suggest also that a Hindi translation of the address should be supplied for your benefit. I observe further that you think that the time has come when South India should dispense with English for large public meetings. According to you, it is the English-speaking leaders who are blocking the way to our rapid progress among the masses by their refusal to learn Hindi. But the truth seems to be that, had it not been for this language, there would have been no active political life in India as we have it today. . . Just as you say it would be an insult to inflict English on an audience composed of colliery workmen, I contend that to inflict any other language but English on an audience composed of people collected from various parts of India will be an affront to the latter. You will remember that the President3 of this year’s Congress was in the first instance called upon to speak in Hindi. It was only his rare courage and his rarer wit that saved him from what looked to be a very embarrassing situation. Supposing the President addressed that body in his own vernacular, how many in the audience would have understood him? Or for the matter of that, how many of the delegates assembled would have sat through the whole speech? . . . So long therefore as a common Indian language suitable to India and Burma is not agreed upon, English is bound to be and will be the only medium of communication among the Indian people. Instead of therefore setting your face against the use of the English language, and until such time as a common language is evolved for India, a man situated in your position should not add to the existing difficulties of the people by calling upon them to learn altogether a different language. . .

You remark in your article that it would be difficult to approach the masses if English is used as the medium. I quite agree with you there. But the masses should in the first instance be approached by people belonging to themselves and who live in their midst. It is, of course, understood that when approaching them their own language will be used. . .

I publish the letter because it reflects an attitude with which one

---

1 Only excerpts are reproduced here.
3 S. Srinivasa Iyengar has to reckon. The correspondent in his eagerness to defend his own laziness, for it is difficult otherwise to characterize his mentality, has missed the following fundamental facts: English is known hardly to one per cent of the population. It will never be learnt by the masses and we have to reckon daily more and more with the masses in all our political transactions. The Congress every year has delegates and visitors the majority of whom do not know and understand English, and when it becomes a thoroughly democratic body, whose delegates are scavengers, cobblers, farmers, washermen, tailors and such others, there will be very few to know English. As against hardly one per cent of the total population knowing English, over 60 per cent of the total population of India at the present moment understand the ordinary rustic Hindustani. For an Indian it is any day infinitely easier to learn Hindustani than English. These are the facts, but the correspondent has overlooked them.

Moreover, in his zeal to make English the official language of the Congress, the correspondent has forgotten the agitation that has been going on in the Congress ever since its inception for a wider recognition of Hindustani as the common medium and that there is now already a resolution of the Congress making Hindustani the common medium. The correspondent seems to think that I decry the use of even learning English, which I have never done. That the English-speaking Indians have rendered immense service to the country nobody can deny, but unfortunately it is equally undeniable that further progress is being blocked by us English-speaking Indians refusing to learn the language of the masses and to work amongst them in accordance with methods best suited to them. The instance given by the correspondent of Mr. Chen is beside the point. I do not know what he is doing, but I do know that he is not speaking to the Chinese masses through English. And all I have claimed is that at our mixed mass meetings where the language of the province will not be understood by all, if any other language is to be adopted, it must be Hindustani. Surely, it is a proposition which does not admit of any challenge.

Young India, 10-2-1927
I tender heartiest welcome to Sir Habibullah Deputation on its return home. The public have not yet sufficient knowledge for forming a definite opinion about the results of the Deputation. One thing is however certain that they have by their tact, ability and cohesion contributed not a little to the peaceful atmosphere that reigned supreme whilst the Round Table Conference was going on. One can only hope that the atmosphere will be reflected in the result of their deliberations. Not much importance need be attached to the cablegram from South Africa attributing the opinion on the part of a section of the Indian settlers, rejecting the conclusions of the Round Table Conference. It is as yet too early. The opinion can only be based upon conjecture, for nobody knows what the conclusions are. We are therefore bound to suspend judgment till we have the full text before us of the agreement said to have been arrived at between the parties. The ever-vigilant Mr. Andrews is there to watch Indian interests.

In this connection an Indian settler sends me the following appropriate reflections on the deliberations:

Recent messages from South Africa through Reuter’s agency and Mr. C. F. Andrews suggest that with the enhanced status acquired by the Union of South Africa... she has begun to view the Indian question... in a more generous spirit...

The Round Table Conference too according to the Hon. Mr. Sastri has terminated successfully and Mr. Sastri has expressed his thorough satisfaction with the agreement arrived at between the Union and the Indian Government delegates... We can only wish that his high hopes may be fulfilled. Mr. Sastri has further advised the Indian settlers: “If you, our people from India, play the game, it will not be long before you get your due... even in the measure that you expect.” Mr. Sastri has thus given the Indian settlers the hope that they would even be granted full civic rights. Whether Indians are given full civic rights or not, even if the present policy of persecuting and driving Indians from pillar to post is abandoned and they are allowed to earn

1 Vide “Honourable Compromise”, 24-2-1927.
2 Only excerpts are reproduced here.
3 V. S. Srinivasa Sastri
an honest livelihood undisturbed and unmolested,—the labours of the Conference will not have been in vain.

It were well to give the advice to play the game to the Union Government. Even while we are given the hope of a satisfactory settlement of the Indian question and while we are being told that a change of heart has taken place, we find that the policy of depriving Indians of their means of livelihood and ousting them is being persistently pursued by the Provincial Governments with the sanction of the Union Government.

The Town Council of Pietermaritzburg is clearing what it has chosen to term the European locality of every single Indian trader by refusing to grant him a renewal of his licence. Many old established firms have thus already had to close down their businesses in those places without any compensation whatsoever. From a report published in Indian Opinion dated December 31, we find that several tailors, shoemakers and barbers who were carrying on their respective occupations for the last ten, fifteen and twenty years have been refused licences on the only ground that they were Indians, and on appeal the decision of the Licensing Officer was upheld by the Town Council in every case. That this should happen just when the Conference was deliberating is not a little surprising and it is a glaring illustration of who has not been playing the game.

Young India, 10-2-1927

84. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

Thursday, February 10, 1927

CHI. MANI,

I have two letters from you. You have done well to begin learning Hindi. Whatever you do, you should preserve your health, and then I shall be free from anxiety.

Never spoil your handwriting. It does not matter if you have to spend more time on writing. Soon you will be able to write a good hand fast.

The slivers are very good indeed. I wish that you take a first in every single process connected with cotton. You will be most useful to me as a spinning teacher in girls’ schools, and later on as a welfare worker for poor women if your health permits. There is no end to the work to be done among women, but this can be done only to a limited extent by men.

1 The Source has “Indian”, a misprint, Young India, 17-2-1927, published this correction.

Let me know everything that is wrong with the [Ashram] kitchen, and gently draw Sankaran’s attention to it. You may even demonstrate the right method of doing things for a couple of days, but you must not get mixed up with it every day. You have to learn to live with others. I shall be very pleased when I can place you anywhere without hesitation as I can place Mahadev or Devdas for instance. I shall be satisfied when you do not hurt anyone’s feelings or feel hurt yourself.

Blessings from

Bapu

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelne, pp. 52-3

85. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

Thursday [February 10, 1927]

CHI. JAMNALAL,

Tulsi Maherji tells me that I should let you know my opinion about [supplying] cotton to him, and that you propose to act accordingly. I am on my way to the station and will therefore write only this.

I think we should make up the deficit by drawing on the Charkha Sangh or from the Ashram. If you have no objection to drawing on the Charkha Sangh and obtaining the Council’s sanction later, you may do so. Or else debit it to the Ashram account and let him have the cotton.

He has Rs. 300. He wants to have a wagonload of cotton packed in gunny bags. You may let him have that much if it would not cost more than Rs. 800, over and above the Rs. 300. I would think it advisable to send less cotton if there could be a saving on railway freight. He has asked for 50 Bengali maunds presuming that transport charges up to Raxaul will be the same for 50 maunds as for 25. If it is so it appears advisable to send 50 maunds. Now if I have left anything unsaid you should do as you think fit. Whatever you think may be considered as my opinion.

1 From the reference to Tulsi Maher who was with Gandhiji on February 7; vide “Letter to Mirabehn” 7-2-1927.

When you go to Bombay take with you my things such as books, clothes, etc. On reaching there get yourself promptly operated upon if the doctor so advises.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2883

86. SPEECH AT JALGAON

February 10, 1927

One of the special features of the tour was the auctioning of the caskets containing addresses at the meetings where they were given. The beginning was made at Jalgaon and the process was continued until Dhulia. Gandhiji said:

You must know, friends, that excepting things which have a special artistic value and which I can hand over to Prof. Malkani who is collecting such things at the Gujarat Vidyapith, I cannot afford to carry these caskets with me. For one thing I carry no steel trunks with me, nor have I any provision at the Ashram to keep them. The only course left for me therefore is to sell them. Don’t you think that in doing so I am in any way disregarding or belittling the love with which they are being given. On the contrary, I propose to return the love in the best manner I can, and that is by converting the caskets into money for the work which is nearest my heart and for which you are showering your love on me.

The sentiment was appreciated everywhere, with the result that at a village like Shahade a trifling casket fetched as much as Rs. 300, and at Dondaiche the plate and other things fetched over Rs. 200.

Young India, 24-2-1927

---

1 From Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”
2 N. R. Malkani
87. LETTER TO FULCHAND K. SHAH

DHULIA,
Friday [February 11, 1927]¹

BHIAISHRI FULCHAND,

I have your letter. The Parishad’s stars, it appears, are not favourable. We might therefore have to make some [propitiatory] sacrifice. We have not yet been able to get a site for setting up the pandal; surely we cannot afford to be so dependent. Why can we not hold the convention in some private premises? Why not at Umarsheh’s or some other farm? Why not at Ranavav? But a player always sees more than an onlooker. It is no use my arriving at any decision when I am so far away. Please do whatever you think proper. Devchandbhai asks for some dates during April or May. But it cannot be done. The position at the moment is that a date once cancelled is finally cancelled.

From April to July all days are engaged. A few days in August are free. After that I shall be free only in early December. I shall certainly be at the Ashram in the beginning of March. We shall meet then.

Blessings from
BAPU

[PS.]

Now up to the 14th write to me at Dhulia.

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 2831. Courtesy: Sharadabehn Shah

88. LETTER TO JANAKIDEVII BAJAJ

Saturday [February 12, 1927]²

CHI. JANAKIBEHN,

I am not surprised that you faced the operation with great courage. I would have been surprised to see you break down. I have always found you full of courage. May it endure for ever. Get well

¹ It appears that the letter was written before Gandhiji reached Dhulia on February 13.
² The addressee was operated upon on February 11.
soon and after that observe the whole regimen strictly and never fall ill. I am in need of many women who are strong in both body and mind.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2887

89. SPEECH ON KHADI, AMALNER

February 12, 1927

At Amalner for instance a doubt was expressed as to the utility of carrying the message of khaddar to a mill area like that place. “There are 2,000 labourers here and they form the bulk of the population. Do you expect them to wear khadi? Do you expect the mill-owners to wear khadi?”

Gandhiji gave a lengthy reply.

It is a question that you may well ask, and yet should not need to ask at this time of the day. Truth has to be repeated a million times if it is not understood by all. If only a single expression of truth was sufficient everyone should have been a believer in God by now. The fact is that the truth that God is one has a million times been told, but the hearts of only a few have been able to receive it.

The 330 rupees that the labourers have contributed to the purse are for me worth their weight in gold. But it is not for the first time that labourers are giving concrete expression to their sympathy. Even the mill-owners have done so and will do so in the conviction that they are helping a good cause, and the labourers are doing so because of their sympathy for a fellow-labourer like myself. But an understanding of one’s duty and the observance thereof are different things. If they went together we should have Ramarajya. There are for instance those who know the value of brahmacharya but who cannot observe it. Even so there are those who appreciate the message of khadi but who are not able to conquer their love of ease and comfort and exclusively wear khadi. Many come and tell me: ‘We value your message, but show us the way to carry it out.’ And as honest conviction is bound to be followed by practice sooner or later this attitude fills me with more hope. You may be employing 2,000 labourers here but do not forget that you tear them from the soil, do not forget that your mills can provide only a handful with labour, and can never find employment for the millions who must be rooted to the soil and who want more work. The question has been before the Royal Commission of Agriculture, the question is before the Viceroy and I challenge any-one to find a better solution than the one I have placed before the country. Dr. Roy could not carry his chemical works to the famine areas in Bogra and Khulna; he had to fall back on the spinning-wheels. Let not your ambition be to concentrate thousands of spindles in a mill, but to convert every home into a spinning mill.

1 From Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”

‘Do I seek to destroy the mill industry?’ I have often been asked. If I did I should not have pressed for the abolition of the excise duty. I want the mill industry to prosper—only I do not want it to prosper at the expense of the country. On the contrary if the interests of the country demand that the industry should go, I should let it go without the slightest compunction. The mill-owners who support me understand my attitude and many want this movement to prosper, even if its prosperity should mean their loss.

And you ask how those who produce mill cloth may wear anything else. Do you know that in Manchester the manufacturers do not wear their own products? You need not mind your inability to use cloth produced by your own mills. The good Duchess of Sutherland saw the miserable plight of the poor islanders of Hebrides and placed spinning-wheels and looms at their disposal. The citizens of Manchester, including mill-owners, do wear the hand-spun stuffs prepared by the Hebrides people, even at three times the cost of the mill stuff.

Do not hanker after cheapness and fineness. If you want cheap and fine stuffs you must spin fine yarn as the late Jogesh Chatterji did or you must spend more money for it. Those who talk of swaraj cannot have both cheapness and fineness. Think of the sacrifices all fighters have to make. In Queen Elizabeth’s time heavy duties were imposed on foreign stuffs and heavy penalties were prescribed for the purchase of Holland laces. Am I asking for much when I ask you to remember your poor and to purchase their khadi? Do not say you will maintain the poor on charity. Only two classes of people are entitled to charity and no one else—the Brahmin who possesses nothing and whose business it is to spread holy learning, and the cripple and the blind. But at Jagannath Puri the iniquitous system of giving doles to the able-bodied idle is going on to our eternal shame and humiliation, and it is to wipe out that shame that I am going about with the message of charkha up and down the whole country.

---

1 P. C. Ray

Young India, 24-2-1927

90. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

Unrevised

DONDAICHE,

Sunday [February 13, 1927]

CHI. MIRA,

Today is Sunday morning before prayer whilst the others are getting up.

Here is the further itinerary.

I have your latest letter.

I forgot to tell you how glad I was that Father and others were coming nearer to you. It must be the natural result as you have for them nothing but pure affection daily growing purer. Knowing affection grows purer if also more detached.

I understand the changes in your vow. They are quite all right.

No more today.

Yours,

BAPU

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Location</th>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Location</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>15th Feb</td>
<td>Dhulia</td>
<td>24th Feb</td>
<td>Satara</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16th Feb</td>
<td>Nasik</td>
<td>25th Feb</td>
<td>Belgaum</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17th Feb</td>
<td>Ahmednagar</td>
<td>26th Feb</td>
<td>Vengurla</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18th Feb</td>
<td>Kurduwadi, Dist. Sholapur</td>
<td>27th Feb</td>
<td>Dist. Ratnagiri</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19th Feb</td>
<td></td>
<td>28th Feb</td>
<td>Ratnagiri</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>20th Feb</td>
<td>Sholapur</td>
<td>1st March</td>
<td>Chiplun</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21st Feb</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>Dist. Ratnagiri</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>22nd Feb</td>
<td>Gulbarga</td>
<td>2nd</td>
<td>Mahad</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

1 According to Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter” (Young India, 24-2-1927) Gandhiji was at Dondaiche on February 12; Sunday was February 13.
23rd ,, Pandharpur, Dist. Kolaba
Dist. Sholapur 3rd ,, Bombay

From the original: C. W. 5203. Courtesy: Mirabehn

91. LETTER TO KSHITISH CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

DHULIA,
February 13, 1927

MY DEAR KSHITISH BABU,

I have your two letters redirected to me at Dhulia. I am glad that Anil is better and entirely out of danger. I send you a copy of my itinerary. Please continue to advise me upon his progress.

I have just learnt that Tarini Babu has left Wardha. I am myself more anxious about him than Anil because Tarini Babu’s disease has made a home in his body whereas Anil’s was a temporary crisis.
Tarini Babu therefore requires the best attention possible. I suggest your taking him to Dr. Bidhan Roy or Sir Nilaratan, if necessary, with a note from Sir P. C. Roy. We must not hesitate to take the best advice available if we are to save him.

The samples sent by you have not been forwarded to me. I shall he writing to the people at Jalgaon about it.

I value the note you have sent me about Mr. Chatterjee. I am going to make use of it for Young India.¹ Please give my respectful condolences to the family of the deceased.

I hope you and other members are keeping well and that the work at Sodepur is progressing. I know that the whole brunt now falls upon your shoulders, but thank God they are broad enough to bear it.

Yours sincerely,
M. K. GANDHI

Enclosure 1

SJT KSHITISH BABU
170, BOW BAZAR STREET
CALCUTTA

[ENCLOSURE]

Programme
Upto 15th Dhulia 19th
16th-17th Ahmednagar 20th Sholapur

DHULIA,
February 13, 1927

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your illuminating letter. Everything coming from you commands my attention because I like your straightforward and popular exposition of a subject which has been [made] unnecessarily abstruse by economists. I am taking the liberty in anticipation of your permission of sending your letter to Prof. Wadia so that he may understand and appreciate your viewpoint. I would love to constitute myself a bridge over the gulf that, without cause as it seems to me, separates economists and that makes it difficult for a layman to study this very important subject. If all the principal economists of our country will agree on the fundamentals and issue a brief, reasoned joint statement, it will prove very useful to students like me who have opportunities of educating the popular mind.

What is this thunderbolt that Mr. Shroff has hurled in our midst? It is occasionally that I get a peep at the newspapers. Whenever therefore you get a moment and have anything to pass on to a busy man like me, please do not hesitate. For, though I am saying nothing in the Press, I am watching everything with an absolutely open mind.

From a photostat: S.N. 11777-A
93. LETTER TO P. A. WADIA

DHULIA,
February 13, 1927

DEAR FRIEND,

I send you Mr. Madon’s letter and a copy of my reply to him. These speak for themselves. I therefore add nothing beyond saying that I know that I can implicitly rely upon you doing everything possible to put this controversy on a high and moral level.

I send you my itinerary up to the end of the month so that in the event of your wanting to say to me anything urgently you can put yourself in direct touch with me without the intervention of my permanent address.

Yours sincerely,
M. K. GANDHI

Enclosure 1 + 1

PROF. P. A. WADIA
MALABAR HILL
BOMBAY

From a photostat: S.N. 11777

94. LETTER TO SUSHILABEHN MASHRUWALA

Sunday [February 13, 1927]

CHI. SUSHILA.

Herewith the telegram I have from Manilal, and also a copy of the letter I had written to him; so you will now understand what I expect from both of you. God alone would know how fortunate you are but Manilal, I think, has certainly been lucky in getting you.

1 Vide the preceding item.
3 Inferred from the contents
Get used to writing in ink. Try to improve your Gujarati as much as possible. Write to me if you get the time. Remember you can always write to me frankly.

Blessings from
BAPU

[PS.]
My tour programme can be had from Nanabhai.

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 1122. Courtesy: Sushilabehn Gandhi

95. LETTER TO NANABHAI I. MASHRUWALA

[February 13, 1927]

BHAISHRI NANABHAI,

I got your letter at Jalgaon. Please go through the telegram from Manilal, which I got at Amalner, a copy of my letter to him and my letter\(^1\) to Sushila and then pass them on to Chi. Sushila.

Now that Chi. Shanti is not to be operated upon for the time being, it would suit me if the marriage is solemnized at an early date and then the eight days of Holi\(^3\) will not come in the way. I am likely to reach Sabarmati on the 6th which will be Phagan Sud\(^3\). I would suggest we discontinue consulting an astrologer for choosing a date. For an auspicious thing the sooner the better. But in these matters I would not insist on my own views.

I can appreciate your wish to have Akola as the venue. All my tour dates are fixed. Only this change could be made: Since the Kathiawar [Political] Conference has been postponed I am free from the 4th to the 8th; on the 4th I reach Bombay. From Bombay I can straight away come up to Akola along with Manilal. Thus we can have the marriage on the 6th when I reach there and having spent there Monday the 7th, my silence day, I can leave for Ahmedabad. I must reach Ahmedabad by the 10th at the latest. I would like to put you to the minimum inconvenience. If you would have the date some time before the 6th that could be done if the marriage is performed wherever I happen to be. The other alternative is that you should

---

1. Inferred from the contents
2. Vide the preceding item.
3. Which are considered inauspicious perform the ceremony without my being present. You would all like me to be there. I know Ba would desire it, so would Manilal. But I do not consider my presence indispensable. If you agree to this and if you can find out a date that suits you and falls before March 11 you can have a day of your choice.

I do not regard marriage as always indispensable. When it becomes indispensable it could only be a religious rite which may be performed with or without the presence of elders. And it could be done any time. This is why I do not insist on my being there. I implore you for an early date because Manilal’s work in Natal suffers, and I want to send him off at the earliest opportunity.

Please consider all this and fix any day that suits you, and, if possible, send me a wire.

Here is my tour programme:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Place</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>13, 14, 15</td>
<td>Dhulia 22</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>16</td>
<td>Nasik 23</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>17</td>
<td>Ahmednagar 24</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>18</td>
<td>Kurduwadi 25</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>19, 20, 21</td>
<td>Sholapur</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Blessings from BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 1123. Courtesy: Sushilabehn Gandhi

96. SPEECHES AT DHULIA

February 13, 1927

The programme at Dhulia was heavy, but everything was so ordered and quiet that Gandhiji could address six meetings during the day, spinning on his charkha throughout the speeches! He said:

You will not regard me as impertinent if I go on spinning whilst I address you. I do so because of the wonderful stillness here, and because I think I can best respond to your affection by giving you an object-lesson in the thing I most believe in. When Dr. Tagore came to our Ashram some years ago, I asked him, after the morning prayers

---

1 From Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”; the first speech is from the issue of February 24 and the other two from that of March 3.
2 In 1920.
were over, to address a few words to our boys. He said nothing, spoke nothing by way of apology, but sang one of his sweetest songs in his sweetest way and was quiet. That to my mind was the acme of his courtesy. He satisfied us with the best that his soul could give. I am simply following him in turning my wheel before you, which is my only lyre and through which I think I can render the greatest service to India.

There have been everywhere addresses from the local bodies. Let me summarize Gandhiji’s reply to the Local Board address at Dhulia.

During my wanderings throughout the land I have not yet come across a single local body which has been functioning of its own independent initiative and which I could point to as an ideal body. Mr. Lionel Curtis remarking on the contrast between an Indian village and an English village said that whereas the one gives you an impression of general untidiness and reminds you of a village built on a dunghill, the other gives an impression of cleanliness and health and beauty all around. Of course he knew nothing of the condition of the Indian villager, he did not know that his daily income was five per cent of that of the English villager. But let us not ignore one substratum truth in his remark. There is no gainsaying the fact that our villager betrays a woeful ignorance of even the rudiments of village sanitation. One could deplore the race prejudice amongst the South African Europeans, but their attempts to keep their towns healthy and sanitary were heroic and worthy of imitation. Do not say that politics occupy all your time and that you have no time for other things. It is a lame excuse. The capacity to look after the village and town sanitation is included in our capacity for swaraj and when we demonstrate it, nothing on earth can stand between us and swaraj. You may be sure that we shall be able to retain only as much as our capacity has won for us. Some of our local bodies keep only those roads clean as are likely to be used by Government officials, but they have no regard for the roads which are used day and night by poor villagers and their bullocks, and which are always and everywhere ill-kept. Can’t we make the roads more easy and better negotiable and make the villagers’ and the bullocks’ lot a little less irksome? . . .

At Dhulia the merchants had insisted on voting him an exclusive address and an exclusive purse, and in the address Gandhiji as one of them, as belonging to the Vaisya class. And in his reply they got more than they had bargained for.
As I said at Jalpaiguri in 1925\(^1\), it is not the Brahmins, nor the Kshatriyas nor the Sudras that lost India; it is the Vaisyas who lost India, and it is the Vaisyas alone who can regain it. Indian history is replete with instances of Banias who helped and served the English shopkeeper to the prejudice of India. The shopkeepers who came here in search of trade became warriors to protect their trade and became Brahmins too to maintain their dominion based on trade. Our varna-sharma dharma does not say that a Bania may not be a Kshatriya and fight for the honour of his mother and sister, nor does it say that a Bania may not acquire knowledge like the Brahmin and serve like the Sudra. The Englishman combined all the qualities in himself; and dazzled at his feat we forgot our dharma, we became cowards, we forgot the real work of the Bania—agriculture, cow-protection and trade—and became traitors to the motherland. You can retrieve the situation today by becoming true Banias again, by capturing again the whole of the national trade. Our black caps, our mill dhotis and our women’s fine saris are the badges of our shame and slavery. Instead of keeping the raw produce in the country and manufacturing it we looked to our narrow interests of the hour, sold the raw produce, and helped the Englishman to tighten his grip on us. We are engaged in our immoral trade today to the eternal ruin of our motherland. Doctors may heal if we are ill, lawyers may help us in law-courts, but only merchants can win swaraj. I want us to be the Vaisya of the Bhagavad Gita, the Vaisya whose natural calling is protection of the cow, agriculture and trade, for his own country. If we were true to our calling why should a scrap of foreign cloth come to our country, why should a cow be sold to a butcher, why should nine crore rupees worth of hides be sent out abroad? What is it that has so deadened our sense to our obvious duty? We think we must trade in foreign cloth, we refuse to listen if someone asks us to keep our dead cattle and treat their hides ourselves. We turn away in disgust when we are asked to convert our dairies into good milk-producing centres and tanneries. I cannot tell you the deep agony of my soul. Do you think I am mistaken? Do you think I am in my dotage? I tell you I shall pocket

\(^1\) Vide “Speech at Public Meeting, Jalpaiguri”, 10-6-1925.
all my pride and fall at the feet of anyone who proves to me that I am wrong. Win me over to you, if you dare, otherwise follow me and take up the cause of khadi and the cow.

Young India, 24-2-1927 and 3-3-1927

97. LETTER TO SUSHILABEHN MASHRUWALA

Sunday night [February 13, 1927]

CHI. SUSHILA,

I hope you have the letter\(^1\) I wrote earlier. Preserve that letter as well as its enclosures. Let me have your reply. Let Nanabhai and others read the letter. Young people, young women especially, fight shy of discussing such matters with their elders. You need not feel the least embarrassment. You should not even hesitate to call each other by your names. In later life this kind of reserve comes in our way. I see no sense in it. Manilal too has become tongue-tied. I shall write to him to shake off his bashfulness.

Write to me about Gomatibehn’s health. I do hope Kishorelal won’t have fever again.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 1126. Courtesy: Sushilabehn Gandhi

98. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

Unrevised

DHULIA,

February 14, 1927

CHI. MIRA,

I wrote yesterday a brief letter.

You need not worry about sending me your account\(^2\). You should certainly keep an account of every pice spent, and that not on scraps of paper, but in a properly kept account book. It is incredibly simple. There are credit entries and debit entries. Cash is debtor to the extent of moneys received by it, creditor to the extent paid out.

\(^1\) Vide “Letter to Sushilabehn Mashruwala”, 13-2-1927.
\(^2\) “Account-keeping was always a nightmare for me, and I finally reduced it to writing down everything and giving it to others to add up and balance.” (Mirabehn)
Therefore receipts go to the debit side and expenditure to the credit side. Thus:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Date</th>
<th>Dr. to Date</th>
<th>Cr. by date</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>12-8</td>
<td>Paid for</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>monies received</td>
<td>150/-/-</td>
<td>tonga 1/8/-</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>from Ashram</td>
<td>postage 3/8/-</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Balance</td>
<td>145/-/-</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

This is how according to the English system all cash-books are kept, and yours is a cash-book. A ledger is an index for the different accounts in a cash-book and a day-book. A day-book contains all transactions where no cash passes. Thus sales on credit and purchases on credit will be entered in a day-book. This is in practice the whole of account keeping.

I am surprised you had no wheel there. I must give you a travelling charkha such as I have. I am asking Khadi Pratishthan to send one to you. If you cannot manage it yourself, I must teach you when I come there.

Dhulia is a very restful place. We are accommodated in the house of a worker who joined me when I was working in Champaran. And here too lives a gentleman who wears a face gentler even than Andrews, if it is possible. Akola was another such place. And Akola has given me a bride for Manilal. She is Kishorelal’s niece, 19 years old. Marriage will take place almost immediately. She will accompany Manilal when he leaves for South Africa. She belongs to a godly family.

With love,

BAPU

[PS.]

17 Ahmedanagar 23 Pandharpur
18 Kurduwadi 24 Satara
19 } Sholapur 25 Belgaum
20 } { 26 Vengurla
21 } Gulbarga 27, 28 Ratnagiri
22
If I cannot give you the other dates you may address Ratnagiri till 3rd.
4th Bombay: Mani Bhavan, Laburnam Road, Gamdevi
From the original: C.W. 5204. Courtesy: Mirabehn

99. LETTER TO HEMAPRABHA DEVI DAS GUPTA

DHULIA,
Monday [February 14, 1927]

DEAR SISTER,

God is testing you severely. Never give up. Happiness and unhappiness, birth and death, old age and disease are ever with us. I could not bear to see you crying when I was at Sodepur. It is good if God would let our dear ones be with us, nor is it bad if He takes them away. They belong to Him; and what is it to us if He takes away his own? Surely, He is going to take away everyone. Being the greatest of all actors we call Him Natavar, the Supreme Actor. He tosses us as He pleases. We are after all puppets. Is it not better to dance in tune with Him than with the world?

May God grant peace to you all.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 1663

100. LETTER TO BRIJKRISHNA CHANDIWALA

DHULIA,
Monday [February 14, 1927]

Bhai Brijkrishna,

I am awaiting your reply about the job at Jamshedpur. Have you now regained your peace of mind?

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 2355

1 From the reference to the death of addressee’s son in “Letter to Hemaprabha Devi Das Gupta”, 19-2-1927
2 Vide also “Letter to Brijkrishna Chandiwala, 22-2-1927.
101. LETTER TO MAGANLAL GANDHI

Silence Day [February 14, 1927]

CHI. MAGANLAL,

You must have got the news about Manilal. If Manilal has not shown the letters written to him, you will know from letter to Chhaganlal. Please inform everyone. I do not know if Nanabhai will have Panditji or someone else to perform the rites; I have left it to him. Please ask Panditji to be ready in case he has to go. The wedding will be at Akola.

Herewith two more letters from Mirabehn. I have already asked Mahadev to write to you about Parasram.

Please let me have the news from Vijapur. Ask John to write to me.

Blessings from

BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 7764. Courtesy: Radhabehn Chaudhri

102. LETTER TO ASHRAM WOMEN

DHULIA,

Monday, Maha Sud 13 [February 14, 1927]

SISTERS,

I am in receipt of your letter written by Chi. Manibehn.

What you write to me in regard to women who intend to visit the Ashram is quite right. For the present, I cannot expect any of you to keep them with you. I wish only that you will mix freely with them, will look after them if they are ill, will not keep away from them, and you will invite them off and on to your midst.

You might have known that Tara’s elder sister Chi. Sushila has been betrothed to Chi. Manilal. The marriage will take place at Akola on the 6th of March. I shall, therefore, reach the Ashram on the evening of the 8th or on the morning of the 9th. 14th is Monday. I

1 From the reference to the news about Manilal’s wedding
2 ibid.
shall stay on in the Ashram till that day, and then again I set out. So I shall have only a few days in the Ashram.

Whether I will or no, I get involved thus in marriages. And yet the more I am drawn into such activities, the more I see that it is very necessary for men and women to observe brahmacharya. Chi. Manilal remained unmarried for 32 years, merely in order to develop self-control. He then expressed a desire to marry, and so I began looking for a good match. As he is to marry in a family of persons devoted to God, I expect nothing but good to result from this alliance.

We should not feel bashful to talk about marriage. But whether married or unmarried, we should not become a prey to passion by such talk. One who cannot control one’s passions should certainly marry. But one who can control them, should do so and seek to obtain moksha in this very life.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 3639

103. LETTER TO NANABHAI I. MASHRUWALA

Silence Day [February 14, 1927]

BHAISHRI NANABHAI,

I have your telegram. I am glad that the 6th suits you. Please get either Gopalrao from Wardha or Sahasrabuddhe there for the marriage ceremony; or shall we ask Panditji to come over from the Ashram? Or if there is some particular person in your view, that makes no difference for me. Nothing suits me better than if Nath himself performs the rites. If you would have Panditji, let me know by wire.

We shall have no ceremony other than the strictly religious. You must not incur expenditure by putting up pandals and other things. Please have no sweets in the meals. Our new relationship is not going to make you my in-laws nor is Sushila going to be my daughter-in-law; she will still be a daughter to me, and you will all be my cousins as always.

You must not give away with the bride so much as a grain of gold. Indeed, she must not wear any jewellery on the occasion. If afterwards she has a liking for them I shall be helpless. Because she has as much freedom as you and I.

1 From the discussion about Manilal’s wedding and Gandhiji’s tour programme

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF MAHATMA GANDHI
On my part I am not bringing her anything besides a garland of my hand-spun yarn. Of course I am going to present her a takli, the Gita and a copy of the Bhajanavali, if available.

In South Africa Manilal wears foreign dress; he had asked my permission for it, but Sushila would not need it. In her khaddar sari she will be as resplendent as the celebrated Sita. Please do not gather a crowd, nevertheless do not hesitate to invite those whom you ought to. I shall leave Bombay along with Manilal by the Nagpur Mail and reach Akola on the 6th morning. The 7th being a Monday, I shall stay on there. On the 7th if there is a convenient train in the evening I shall straight away leave for Ahmedabad.

Ramdas and Devdas may arrive there either with me or direct. I will not stop anyone else who wants to go there.

Blessings from

BAPU

[PS.]

My Tour Programme:

15 Dhulia
16 Nasik
17 Ahmednagar
18 Kurduwadi
19, 20, 21 Sholapur
22 Gulbarga
23 Pandharpur
16 Satara
25 Belgaum
26 Vengurla
27, 28, 1, 2, 3 Ratnagiri and adjoining areas
4 Bombay

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 1120. Courtesy: Sushilabehn Gandhi

104. LETTER TO MANILAL GANDHI

[February 14, 1927]

CHI. MANILAL,

I have your letter. The marriage will be at Akola. The day has been fixed for Sunday, 6th March. I have to go to Akola direct from Bombay. I am likely to reach Bombay not earlier than the 4th. Being a Monday, the 7th will be spent in Akola. We can leave on the 7th evening and reach the Ashram on the 8th evening or the 9th morning.

1 Vide the preceding item.

I have written to Nanabhai asking him not to put up any show. He should give the bride not even the most insignificant jewels. I am giving her nothing. In South Africa, you use foreign dress with my permission but Sushila need do nothing of the sort; in her khaddar sari she will look as resplendent as Sita. Let me know if you want any change in these arrangements. After you are married you are both free to live as you like. But I certainly wish that you should give no jewels to Sushila and that there too she should wear no cloth other than khadi.

The more I think the more I feel that you are going to have a jewel. My only fear is whether you would be able to take care of her.

Please keep your passion under control; let her study. The girl would be helpful in many of your activities. She can even learn composing. If she tries she can improve her Gujarati but it all depends upon you whether you would make a doll or a companion out of her. After all, she is just a child. She does not know the ways of the world. If, henceforth, you will observe more restraint than hitherto I see a blissful future for both of you.

May God grant strength and wisdom to both of you.

Now you can easily go to South Africa in March. You can make the necessary preparations.

You should start from there on the 4th and meet me in Bombay on the morning of the 5th.

I am writing to Ramdas and Devdas that they may come along if they want to.

Blessings from

BAPU

[PS.]

I have sent your letter to Sushila. Write nothing to Harilal.

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 1130. Courtesy: Sushilabehn Gandhi
105. LETTER TO RAMESHWARDAS PODDAR

[After February 15, 1927]¹

BHAISHRI RAMESHWARJI,

I have both your letters. The garland that you got was given [to me] for khadi work; so the price you paid for it would be utilized for the same cause. For cow-protection too we should do only what is right, and now I shall need quite a lot for it since the tanning school has started functioning. But we must be patient.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 206

106. LETTER TO HERMANN KALLENBACH

February 16, 1927

MY DEAR LOWER HOUSE,

It was a great joy to have your letter after so many months.

Yes I did receive the Schreiner volumes.²

You must not give up the struggle against life’s temptations. I do indeed expect you one fine day in India. Do come if it is only for a brief visit.

Manilal is to be married on 5th March.³ He will take his wife with him. You will look after both please.

I dare not give you a long love letter as I have to work against time. Incessant travelling is my lot this year. I have to cover about six ¹ During his Maharashtra tour Gandhiji was in Dhulia, the addressee’s home town, from February 13 to 15. It is presumed that the garland mentioned in the letter was auctioned by Gandhiji in Dhulia.

² Vide “Letter to H. Kallenbach”, 29-7-1926.

³ Vide “Letter to Satis Chandra Das Gupta”, 6-3-1927.
villages daily except on Mondays which, thank God, is my day of silence.

With love,

Yours,

UPPER HOUSE

From the original: Gandhi-Kallenbach Correspondence. Courtesy: National Archives of India

107. LETTER TO MANIBEHN PATEL

ON THE WAY TO NASIK,

Wednesday, February 16, 1927

CHI. MANI,

I have got your letter. It looks as if I shall reach there on the 8th at the earliest. There is no news from Karachi.

How is it that Gangadevi falls ill every now and then? We shall arrange for her to go somewhere else for a change of climate if she wants to. Ask her as well as Totaram. Does she have a restricted diet?

I will subject you to a test in Sanskrit, carding, spinning, etc., when I come. Improve still more your Gujarati handwriting and make further progress in Gujarati grammar.

The programme for perfecting the Ashram kitchen which has been engaging their attention much must now be brought to an end. Do your bit.

Blessings from

BAPU

[From Gujarati]

Bapuna Patro—Manibehn Patelnne, p. 53

1 The source has “18”.
108. LETTER TO NARANDAS GANDHI

Wednesday [February 16, 1927]

CHI. NARANDAS,

I got all your letters. I have asked Mahadev to reply to them as well as to take the necessary action. Something has already been done.

I still have to write about the laxity in spinning. I shall take out some time and attend to it. I am writing this on a moving train. The schedule was such that I could do nothing. But now I have asked the programmes to be so arranged that I may get some more margin. Who else but the Charkha Bhandar is to make up the losses resulting from the transfer to Jerajani when the two stores are amalgamated? I do not very well understand it as I have forgotten many of the facts. Anyway we shall finally decide about it in the Conference which is to be held at Belgaum on the 25th or 26th. Are you supposed to attend it? Take over into the Charkha Sangh the yarn we got from South Africa. I am very glad that you examine the strength of all the yarn. Whatever time is spent in it is only . . .² for us because we get to learn much out of it.

Whatever experiences you have, whatever there is worth knowing, do write out in Gujarati and send over to me so that it can be published in Navajivan and we can also take out of it whatever we want for Young India.

Other things you will learn there and so I do not write about them.

Blessings from
BAPU

From the Gujarati original: C.W. 7712. Courtesy: Narandas Gandhi

¹ From the reference to the “moving train” it appears that the letter was written on the same date as the preceding letter. The itineraries show that Gandhiji planned to be in Belgaum on the 25th or 26th.
² Illegible in the source
109. LETTER TO MIRABEHN

Nasik,
February 16, 1927

CHI. MIRA,

I had first thought of asking the Khadi Pratishthan people to debit the Ashram with the price of the travelling charkha that will he sent to you. But I reconsidered my decision and I saw that it would be cheaper to have the charkha by value payable parcel. If therefore you receive a parcel from Calcutta by value payable post, please discharge the bill there.

On the 6th and 7th of March, I shall be at Akola for Manilal’s marriage. From the 8th to 14th March I am at the Ashram, 15th to 17th Bardoli. I entrain at Surat on the evening of the 17th for the Gurukul.

With love,

Yours,

BAPU

[PS.]
Better a dictated letter than none.

SHRIMATI MIRABEHN
GURUKUL KANGRI
From the original: C.W. 5205. Courtesy: Mirabehn.

110. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

Wednesday [February 16, 1927]

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I have your letter. I shall reach Bombay some time on the 4th or by the morning of the 5th. Dastane wants me to be in Poona on the 4th. Jaisukhlal Mehta wants me to devote a few hours to Santa Cruz. If I can satisfy him by spending the 5th morning at Santa Cruz I can allot the evening of the 4th to Poona and leave there on the same night for Bombay from where I can proceed to Akola.

1 From the reference to Manilal’s wedding and Gandhiji’s programme “to proceed to Sangamner”
Since Gomati has returned there she and Kishorelal need not again come to Akola. If Nath is there please ascertain from him if he would perform the wedding rites. I would like to have the ceremony performed by him, if it is no inconvenience to him.

I think it would not matter if you could not come because of Janakibehn’s operation or something else.

I have to proceed to Sangamner this very evening.

Blessings from

BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2884

111. SPEECH AT NASIK

February 16, 1927

Some youths handed over to me several questions as soon as I arrived here; my replies to them will be my speech today.

[1.] Don’t you think as a Hindu you should concentrate on collecting for the Shraddhanand Fund rather than for any other fund?

I am an imperfect mortal and my capacities are limited. I know the theory and practice of economy, and whilst all my time and energy are given to the country, I am not vain enough to think that I should do all things myself. The work you refer to is engaging the attention and energies of men like Malaviyaji and Lalaji and there is no reason why I should also put in my oar. At the first meeting held in Calcutta to collect funds for raising a fitting memorial to Shraddhanandji, I was asked to be present by Pandit Malaviyaji and I did so. I do not think he expects more from me. I claim to follow in daily life the teachings of the Gita and I know that, humble as is the work that I am doing, it is better for me than much other work which may be quite as good and even better but which is not my work.

[2.] The collections you make today are only for khadi, are they not so? If they are, how will you utilize them?

Yes, of course, this fund is only for khadi because it is being collected for the All-India Deshbandhu Memorial Fund. The 1 From Mahadev Desai’s “Weekly Letter”. The introductory paragraph, questions 2, 5 and 6, and their answers are from Navajivan, 27-2-1927.

2 Vide “Speech at Public Meeting, Calcutta”, 31-12-1926.
Deshbandhu’s name has been associated with this fund because he had drawn up, a few days before his death, a scheme for the organization of villages through khadi. Khadi work was dear to him. The All-India Spinners’ Association has been set up only to collect funds for khadi and use them to organize work. Accounts of its funds are being maintained to a pie and everyone has a right to inspect them. The Association has an executive committee, auditors and inspectors. This Association has now placed before the country a scheme for an organization of khadi service. You will ask what effective work this association can do, paying as it will be only thirty rupees a month to each worker. Of course, ours is a poor Association, for it has been established with money collected from the poorest of the poor. It is not another Indian Civil Service, so that it can afford to pay salaries of thousands of rupees. The Indian Civil Service is maintained with taxes paid by the people and is meant to rule the people; our poor little association is meant to serve them.

[3.] Are you partial to the Mussalmans? Why don’t you answer the charges some of the Mussalman leaders level against you?

I can do justice to people of other faiths by appearing to be partial to them, and I know that I am protecting my own faith by showing if you will a reasoned partiality for other faiths. I do not, I cannot, wish to harm the Hindu religion, for I am after all a drop in the ocean of Hinduism. If Mussalmans call me kaffir, what then? What can be the answer to it? In South Africa, a nephew of mine was staying with me. It was only when people said that I was partial to him that he realized, and I realized, that I was only just to him. The fact that the Mussalmans are finding fault with me possibly suggests that I am not yet sufficiently partial to them to convince them that I am just to them. Why should I answer their charges? All my twenty-four hours are consecrated to the service of Lord Krishna who is ever with me, who guides my footsteps, and whom I always pray to do whatever is needed for me. He will answer for me, if there be any need.

[4.] If you fought for the Khilafat, why do you not fight for the Hindu sangathan¹ today?

The question is well asked. I had pledged myself to lay down my life for the Khilafat and I knew that I was indirectly helping thereby the cause of the cow. ‘How much cow-protection have you achieved?—you will ask. Very little, I admit. But what does that matter to me? “To work you have the right and duty and not to fruit thereof,” says the Gita.¹ It was at the bidding of the Lord that I offered my co-operation to the Ali Brothers and rendered whatever help I could. I have never had reason to regret it. I would do the same thing should another occasion arise. That is the teaching of all our religious books. Let the people rail at me, insult me if they like. I am not going to pay them back in their coin. Mine is the religion of tapascharyā, the way of penance taught by the scriptures and by Tulsidas. That is the law of my being and I cannot do otherwise. “The whole creation,” says the Gita, “follows the law of its being. How will restraint then avail?”² My joy is in the fulfilment of my duty and the confidence that when some day the Mussalmans join hands with the Hindus in protecting the cow, everyone will say that the good result is due to the efforts of that mad Gandhi who died working for the cause.

¹ Movement for unity

In my opinion, there is no sanction in Hinduism, Islam or Christianity for the shuddhi, tablīgh or proselytizing (respectively) as it is going on today. How then can I take part in the shuddhi? The Gita and the Tulsi Ramayana teach me to resort to self-purification whenever I or my religion is in danger. And what is true for me is true for all. That process of self-purification I am going through all the twenty-four hours of my day. Parvati, Narada had foretold, would have an ominous-looking husband. She knew that only Siva was as blissful as he was ominous-looking and she performed penance for winning Siva and won him. So the lesson of penance and self-purification is writ large everywhere in our scriptures and the Himalayas are the living witness to it—the Himalayas where countless rishis ground their bodies to dust for self-purification The Vedas, to me, are not the texts writ on paper, but my very conscience and the In-dweller. They tell me to observe yama and niyama (the cardinal and the causal virtues) and trust everything to Lord Krishna. In all humility I claim that all my work is conducive to the service of Hinduism. As a Hindu, I could do nothing else. The way of doing it is of course my own.

[5.] Do you know that most of the donors of the money that will be presented to you today are dealers in foreign cloth, and they give you money for the love they bear you, not for the love of khadi?

¹ II. 47
² III. 33
I do not want a single pice offered through love for me; I want people to appreciate my mission and help it with money. Through love you can give me another thing. Through it you can give me your foreign clothes, but not money. The truth is that business men give me money in the belief that, if my business thrives, it will harm neither them nor the country. They know that ultimately they will have to deal in khadi. They understand the position correctly but today they lack strength of will. They ask me to pray to God that He may grant them that strength. Meanwhile, they donate money and help this movement. They do not give me money in order to deceive me.

[6.] Why do you confine yourself to khadi work alone and neglect other important or even more important political activities?

I have already said that the sphere of my work is limited. Duryodhana described how his warriors had taken up their due positions on the battle-field. He had asked everyone to remain in his place and protect Bhishma. The varnashrama dharma taught in the Gita also says the same thing. It asks everyone to know his own sphere of work. If India wants me to serve it, it must understand my limitations. Although it is possible that I can do other jobs well, there are people doing them. As I believe that no one else can do khadi work as well as I can and since I regard khadi work as my supreme duty, I have confined myself to that work. I favour satyagraha, I want to start it, but I want to create a suitable atmosphere for it through khadi. Satyagraha is like my very breath, but I regard it as impossible without khadi.

[7.] What is the extent of the help you are getting from the Mussalmans during this tour?

I admit that for my khadi work I have been having not much help from them. But what does that matter? I do not bargain with my brother or wife in my domestic affairs. I do my duty and leave the rest to do theirs. In the same way I will not bargain with the Mussalmans, as I will not with Pandit Motilalji or Kelkar. Why should we fear the Mussalmans? We need fear only God and no man. Even if men should play you false, do not be deterred from doing your duty, in the confidence that God will take care of you.

Young India, 3-3-1927
112. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

[Before February 17, 1927]

DEAR SATIS BABU,

You must be well. Now that you have gone out of Calcutta, you must give yourself prolonged rest and be thoroughly restored. You will not be anxious about Pratishthan affairs. Leave them in God’s hands in so far as your share of the work is concerned. After all khadi is not and cannot be one man’s affair. If it is pleasing in the eye of God, He will raise His own instruments and keep in order those He has raised. Let us realize that we are nothing even as a machine is nothing. The machinist is everything. Let us reduce the teaching, of the Gita and the Ramayana to practice and we shall cease to worry.

Do please keep me well posted with news about yourselves. Here are the dates:

17 Ahmednagar
18 Kurduwadi
19, 20, 21 Sholapur
22 Gulbarga
23 Pandharpur
24 Satara
With love,

Yours,

BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 1633

113. OUT OF NOTHING

When one thinks of the immense possibility of the charkha it is surprising that its simple message is taking so long to become universal. “Nothing comes out of nothing,” says a Latin proverb. But the charkha would seem to falsify at least the letter of the proverb. For without destroying or replacing anything useful, it seeks to utilize the waste and idle hours of the nation.

This idleness, whether it be regarded as enforced or voluntary, is killing the very soul of the nation. The more I penetrate the villages, the greater is the shock delivered as I perceive the blank stare in the eyes of the villagers I meet. Having nothing else to do but to work as labourers side by side with their bullocks, they have become almost like them. It is a tragedy of the first magnitude that millions have ceased to use their hands as hands. Nature is revenging herself upon us with terrible effect for this criminal waste of the gift she has bestowed upon us human beings. We refuse to make full use of the gift. And it is the exquisite mechanism of the hands that among a few other things separates us from the beast. Millions of us use them merely as feet. The result is that she starves both the body and the mind.

1 From the tour programme

The spinning-wheel alone can stop this reckless waste. It can do that now and without any extraordinary outlay of money or intelligence. Owing to this waste, we are living in a state almost of suspended animation. It can be revived if only every home is again turned into a spinning-mill and every village into a weaving-mill. With it will at once revive the ancient rustic art and the rustic song. A semi-starved nation can have neither religion nor art nor organization.

The only objection that has been urged by its critics is that the wheel does not pay. But even if it pays only one pice per day, it does pay when we remember that our average income is six pice per day against the fourteen rupees and six rupees per day respectively of the average American and the average Englishman. The spinning-wheel is an attempt to produce something out of nothing. If we save sixty crores of rupees to the nation through the spinning-wheel, as we certainly can, we add that vast amount to the national income. In the process we automatically organize our villages. And as almost the whole of the amount must be distributed amongst the poorest of the land, it becomes a scheme of just and nearly equal distribution of so much wealth. Add to this the immense moral value of such distribution, and the case for the charkha becomes irresistible.

Young India, 17-2-1927

114. A GREAT SPINNER

When at the end of the Bihar tour and on my way to the Central Provinces, I heard at Calcutta of the death of Babu Jogeshwar Chatterjee whom I had the privilege of knowing as a spinner who gave promise of being able to revive the old Dacca shubnum—the night-dew muslin—I at once sent a message¹ to Kshitish Babu of Khadi Pratishthan to supply me with details of the deceased’s life. These have been now received and I share them with the reader:²

Jogeshwar Chatterjee, son of Sjt. Jatileshwar Chatterjee of village Panpur in the district of 24-Parganas . . . died on Sunday, the 30th January morning. He left behind him his wife, a daughter aged one year, a younger brother and aged father. . . .

Jogeshwar Babu read up to B.A., and was a teacher for some time. He then took service in the E.B.R., and served it for seven years. . . . He was aged 35 at the time of death.

He took to spinning during the Non-co-operation days, and was an ardent spinner. . . . At the Gauhati Exhibition a muslin of 200 counts was exhibited by the Pratishthan, the yarn of which was spun by Jogeshwar Babu. During one year—Cawnpore Exhibition to Gauhati Exhibition—he spun 200 count yarn for the above muslin, and sufficient yarn of 100 count, out of which two dhotis are made. Of the last two dhotis, one was for Acharya P. C. Ray and the other for his father. . . .

He was all along spinning on the Pratishthan’s box charkha. He was out-and-out a khadi man, who used to spin during leisure hours, and made such a rapid progress in spinning.

I tender my condolences to the family of the deceased and hope that the attempt to reproduce the ancient art will not die with Jogesh Babu’s death. Let it be remembered that Jogesh Babu’s was a labour of patriotic love. And it is only voluntary spinners who can follow up Jogesh Babu’s grand effort.

Young India, 17-2-1927

² Only excerpts are reproduced here.
115. TELEGRAM TO SAM HIGGINBOTTOM

AHMEDNAGAR,

February 18, 1927

TO

ALAGIN
NAINI

YOUR LETTER. COULD YOU COME SABARMATI NINTH TENTH TWELFTH OR THIRTEENTH MARCH STAYING WITH ME AT LEAST TWENTYFOUR HOURS.

GANDHI

From a photostat: Higginbottom Papers. Courtesy: Nehru Memorial Museum and Library

116. LETTER TO HARRY KINGMAN

SATYAGRAHA ASHRAM,
SABARMATI,¹

February 18, 1927

DEAR FRIEND.

I thank you for your letter which is so seasonable.² Could you not give me some reliable literature on the Chinese movement and give me a truthful story of current events? I never put much reliance upon newspapers and I am most anxious to know what is happening now in China.

Yours sincerely,

M. K. GANDHI

HARRY KINGMAN, ESQ.
68, RECREATION ROAD
TIENTSIN CHINA

From a photostat: G.N. 5043

¹ Permanent address
² Vide “Our Helplessness”, 3-2-1927.
117. SPEECH AT AHMEDNAGAR

February 18, 1927

I have just been to the Rashtriya Pathshala. I have inspected for nearly an hour like a strict inspector all the management and working of the institution and found it to my satisfaction. I have thoroughly examined the boys in a lively heart-to-heart talk and found them sharp in intellect and prompt in answers. In short, I see in Ahmednagar Rashtriya Pathshala a lovely little oasis in the midst of such a vast desert of darkness.2

[Continuing,] Mr. Gandhi said that, if Ahmednagar district was poor, the rest of India was poorer still. Hundreds of thousands of men and women were without any kind of employment and almost starving. He had not the slightest doubt in his mind that khadi work alone could give these people some employment and bread. He appealed to all present to give their mite to him for his great work.

The Hindu, 19-2-1927

118. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

MIRAZGAON,
February 19, 1927

MY DEAR SATIS BABU,

So you and Hemaprabha Devi are being tried through and through. You will stand this very severe test and come out victorious. Read the second chapter of the Bhagavad Gita again and again and face the battle like true warriors that you are. It is now your double duty to take care of yourselves. Among the properties you hold in trust for God’s purposes, your bodies are not the least important. If we may not indulge them neither may we for-bare them through false love [sic].

But enough of philosophy. Ever since the receipt of the telegram I have prayed for you. And this letter is the first thing I have

---

1 In reply to addresses by the Municipality, District Board and Hindu Sabha
2 From a microfilm (S.N. 14841) of a printed pamphlet issued in 1928 by Principal H. B. Hiray, Rashtriya Pathshala, Ahmednagar taken up after the morning prayer. May God sustain you and bless you.

        Yours,
        BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 1565

119. LETTER TO HEMAPRABHA DEVI DAS GUPTA

        Saturday [February 19, 1927]

DEAR SISTER,

What can I write to you? May your wisdom, your faith and your devotion all come to your succour. Can Anil die? Anil is with us for ever, only his body has been shed. Pray, do not lose heart.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Hindi: G.N. 1661

120. LETTER TO JAMNALAL BAJAJ

        Saturday [February 19, 1927]

CHI. JAMNALAL,

I have your letter. I did not wire to you because I had no reason to stop you from trying to meet Lalaji’s demand.

For some time I would like to have a postcard daily informing me about Janakibehn’s health.

Anil, Satis Babu’s son, has expired. Satis Babu is at Giridih. His address is: Home Villa, Giridih. It would however be safer to write to the Khadi Pratishthan address. I have a telegram telling me that both of them have sustained a great shock. I have sent them a long wire of condolence.

Now it is certain that I shall reach Bombay on the 5th.

Blessings from
BAPU

From a photostat of the Gujarati: G.N. 2885

1 Vide the preceding item.
2 From the reference to Anil’s death
121. LETTER TO PRABHUDAYAL

ON TOUR,

February 19, 1927

BHAI PRABHUDAYALJI,

Your letter has been moving along with me. I could lay my hand on it only today.

However much the world may change, if you are convinced that khadi brings material as well as spiritual benefit and that other stuff merely pleases one’s fancy, you should be content with khaddar clothes alone.

Yours,

MOHANDAS GANDHI

From the Hindi original: G.N. 10063

122. LETTER TO SATIS CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

[After February 19, 1927]

DEAR SATIS BABU,

I have your pathetic letter which I see you wrote to lighten your burden. Gods, it is said, take away those they love most. The human mind has devised many methods of assuaging grief. But the real fact is not to feel the grief. But that is almost superhuman especially in Hindu society. Please tell Hemaprabha Devi not to think of what Anil would have done, if he had lived. His work in that body was finished. A rare soul such as Anil’s had much higher work to do and he left the body. Let us not grieve over our loss which may be the world’s gain. It is as well that we do not know the mysteries of life and death. I want you both now to get rid of your weakness. Pray do not think of stirring till you have fully recuperated yourself.

With love,

Yours,

BAPU

From a photostat: G.N. 1634

1 The letter appears to have been written on receipt of addresssee’s reply to Gandhiji’s condolence letter of February 19.
123. LETTER TO KSHITISH CHANDRA DAS GUPTA

ON THE TRAIN,
[After February 19, 1927]¹

DEAR KSHITISH BABU,

I did not know till today, and after the receipt of Satis Babu’s letter that you had no son and that you were lavishing all your affection on Anil as your own son. Your grief I am able now to understand more fully than I had done before. It is difficult on such occasions to give any consolation. It has to come from within. May all your knowledge and your faith come to your assistance to give you courage and hope. If only our faith in the immortality of soul is real, nothing like death can matter. May God give you peace and strength.

Yours,
M. K. GANDHI

From a photostat: G.N. 8923

124. LETTER TO EKAROZ

ON TOUR,
February 20, 1927

DEAR FRIEND,

I have your letter. I espoused the Khilafat cause not for the sake of tyranny but for the sake of humanity. This insidious attempt that, I think, was made to destroy the Khilafat had to be resisted. My resistance being non-violent prevented in my opinion, violence which would but for the movement have undoubtedly broken out. The Khilafat movement was not decided upon to bolster any Turkish tyranny. Wherever tyranny exists, it must be resisted by non-violent means.

Yours sincerely,

REV. FR. EKAROZ
HAIFA, GERMAN HOSPICE OF ST. CHARLES PALESTINE

From a photostat: S.N. 11785

¹ Vide the preceding item.
125. LETTER TO MATHURADAS TRIKUMJI

February 20, 1927

You forget you are a son of Bapu’s niece; Manilal therefore is your maternal uncle. Would children offer any presents to their mother? Herein you forget even our Hindu tradition. However, if you are so affluent, I am willing to accept the amount for cow-protection and the tanning school. I might grab all the money that you may offer. So, if you are not going to be disappointed, you had better take my advice and keep quiet over it.

[From Gujarati]

_Bapuni Prasadi_, p. 92

126. SPEECH AT SHOLAPUR

February 20, 1927

As at Nasik, the speech at Sholapur was a reply to questions and criticisms made in an open letter addressed to Gandhiji by some people from the town. Their first criticism was that those who appeared in khadi on the occasion of Gandhiji’s visit were hypocrites inasmuch as they would shelve it the day he left. Did that indicate the progress of khadi? Gandhiji said:

Well, I do not know. I know that I am selling khadi wherever I go, and there ends my work. Supposing you purchase from me millions of rupees worth of khadi and sink it into the sea, the sale is not vitiated. But the criticism is unfair. I know that some wear khadi for the occasion, but they do not disguise the fact. They appreciate the message of khadi, but they say they cannot exclusively wear it for a number of reasons. Am I to tell them, ‘You are no good. I can do without your khadi?’ No, no. My duty is to define our dharma in its fulness. Their duty is to follow it as much as they can. People deceive me, you say. I do not understand how they can harm me even if they do. I am but a self-appointed agent of Daridranarayana and I shall take from you only what you can give me. . . .

1 Written by Mahadev Desai to Gandhiji’s dictation
2 This was published under the title, “Two Speeches”.
3 Vide “Speech at Nasik”, 16-2-1927.
“You are good enough,” they say, “but your work has ruined the country.” I am but an erring mortal and like any one of you I am full of shortcomings; therefore I beseech you to reject them and simply make the best of my capacity for service. Turn my good points to account and reject the bad ones. If you do not pick and choose and simply reject me wholesale, what will the world say to you? Will you regret the service of a man as a carrier because he is blind?

